- Owners of biting dogs must be fully held responsible and not be allowed to flee the scene and leave the victims with the consequences.
- All owners should be able to accept responsibility for their animals. If not, they should not have them.
- A responsible owner no matter what breed, should stay at the scene and talk to whom ever to help resolve the issue
- Like if you accidentally hit or ding another car, you should remain on the scene to give your details. It is the right thing to do.
- yes in order to do follow up with both parties.
- On occasion the owner leaves the scene and not located
- However, most owners of aggressive dogs quickly leave the site of an altercation. And I expect most would not be aware of this rule.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs actions , especially if the health of other animals or people are in question

- Just like a car accident it should be considered a crime for any animal injury to leave the scene
- the owner should be held responsible for your dog action
- It's like a car accident. The person didn't have control of their property and another citizen was hurt.
- Depending on the circumstances that caused the dog to bite, the owner or human with the dog at the time of the incident should remain at the scene to get both sides of the said incident. Sometimes the dog may have been provoked by the person or people with the person that was bitten. No different than when a human has had enough provocation or teasing. Therefore the animal should not be blamed. However, if the owner/human encourages the dog or teaches the dog to be aggressive then the owner/human should be found accountable and the dog should have behaviour training at the expense of the owner/human.
- "Anyone can cry wolf. If my dog bit a person and I ran away with my dog, the victim doesn't know the health of the dog, if they're vaccinated or if there's any health issues to be worried about. Not to mention this gives an opportunity for irresponsible owners to continue to put others at risk due to their dog (or their) risk to public safety.
- But on the other side of the fence, my "'blockheaded' dog could get seized or PTS if only one side of the story is told. My dog could be attacked and he could retaliate and depending on the type of dog that went after him, he may still be found at fault and penalized whereas the offender gets a slap on the wrist.
- Being present to see both sides of the issue will get a better understanding of the issue as a whole and help offer clarity to the possible triggers that may have been stacking prior to this incident.. which also is where the dog trainer contractors would come into play. They could attend with animal control (or be animal control officers) and address and ask questions direct related to the dogs and their behaviours displayed. When you know what you're looking for, you can pick out problems much quicker"
- Can determine if the dog was provoked, or if the owner is irresponsible knowing the dog is under-trained
- it seems like common sense - I've seen bad owners ignore incidents before.
- a dog owner should be held responsible for there dog action
- Just like a car crash, you stay at the scene to ensure info is swapped and everyone is ok
- Because the owner of the dog needs to be held accountable. Too many cases occur where a dog was bit in the off leash parks and the offending owner ends up taking off and getting away with it
- I believe owner should face criminal charges as well as fines
- If your animal has bitten someone, you need to act responsibility and do the right thing. Ie: paying for the damage
- People need to be held responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- Because of course they should, just like a driver involved in an accident must remain at the scene.
- Only if it is a significant bite that may require medical attention not a nip or superficial bite.
- A responsible and accountable Owner would do this. Being a pet Owner comes with a high of responsibility and accountability.

- The inconvenience would probably ensure people with nuisance dogs would remain alert and vigilant about the behavior of their animal in public.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their pet. I do however feel that some dog owners are way too protective over their pets which could cause an innocuous incident to be blown out of proportion
- Too often owners leave the scene and the victim with a large vet's bill
- Owners should be held accountable for dog behavior. Their training and responsibility is far more important than the breed of a dog. The success of the dog's future is determined by the owner's response to incident, and to ensure their accountability they should remain at the scene, like an automobile accident.
- I have been bitten by a Rottweiler in the past and the owner tried to flee with the dog
- This should be done anyhow by any responsible person. A rule should be in place to enforce.
- Any incident involving injury should require the perpetrator to remain at the scene.
- Accountability. I can not believe that this is a question and that owners leave the scene
- I think it important that the responsible adult be available for discussion with an enforcement officer who could offer direction to that person.
- opportunity to educate
- And a fine and potential removal of the dog from the owner's custody.
- This is no different than you have to stay at the scene of an accident
- If the victim requests it,
- Owners need to be held responsible for their dog's behaviour and thus must remain at the scene of an incident.
- Only if it's serious
- Too often people know the dog will be euthanized for a bite so they take steps not to be found.
- For better information, to provide personal info etc
- If this issue is serious it must be escalated and the offender should not be allowed to simply walk away
- Just like driving...never leave the scene of an incident until statements and information/identification has been exchanged
- Same as drivers being required to stay at the scene of an accident; if someone does bodily harm to another (or their pet does) it seems more than reasonable that the victim be able to seek reparations.
- The owner needs to be held accountable as well as making sure information is shared between them regarding any health issues or contagions either one of the dogs may have that could be spread.
- A pet owner should be responsible the same way a driver is responsible in an accident.
- It's important to know if the dog is up to date on all vaccinations. It could also help prevent future attacks by the same dog.
- This is just like a hit and run, if someone or their animal was harmed, the person who owns the dog who harmed the other should be questioned so they can get both sides of the story when it's fresh.

- It's the responsible thing to do.
- Owner must provide valid identification and contact information. A dog attack is as serious as an assault by a human/
- It would identify their dog is vaccinated
- These incidents can be wildly one-sided in how they're reported, either by the owner or by the person who was attacked. A dog biting a person may be the result of poor handling, or it may be the result of direct provocation. And nobody deserves to lose their pet based on false accusations.
- If it is a serious bite then yes they should be there long enough to ensure the other person is okay.
- Yes, any accountable owner should be willing to share contact information, vaccination records, and such.
- No different than a hit and run
- Broadly similar to the case of damages in car accidents, you should have to remain to take responsibility.
- It is not necessarily easy to ascertain the severity or consequences (such as infection) of a bite. The dog owner needs to have a sense of responsibility for the outcome and provide information so that follow up for educational or consequential outcomes can occur.
- If a person owns an animal they are solely responsible for that animal and their behaviour. If a situation arises the owner should absolutely have to stay, not matter breed or severity of incident.
- They can't be biased there can't be against dogs or fearful of dogs in general especially pitbull type breeds. Need to be fair as dogs are taught 99% of its behavior by the owner the owner should suffer a major consequences such as jail.
- To explain, especially if the other dog was the cause, ie. aggressive or the biting dog was dog shy and the other dog was off leash and poorly trained
- Because you should
- It's like a car accident, be responsible, be safe, talk to authorities
- My neighbor's dog was mauled by a leashed (But owner lost control) Pit Bull Breed and the owner disappeared. Dog required surgery and meds at vet. costing approx $1000, plus the children were traumatized as well.
- For a responsible dog owner this should not be an issue
- Cannot enforce without compliance
- There are two sides to every story. Both should be heard. Photos of injuries should be taken from both parties of both parties.
- As iterated above, same comments apply.
- The same type of liability as if the owner has a car accident.
- This sounds responsible. There's 3 sides to every story....
- I have heard of too many instances where the dog owner leaves the scene
- Your Dog bites, u R responsible
- I also support persons driving cars to stay on scene. It's a no-brainer....

- It is necessary to remain at the scene of an accident if someone or someone's pet is injured by another animal. Information must be exchanged for insurance, follow-up, civil suites, or criminal investigation
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets. Leaving the scene of an incident where a person or another dog has been hurt is not responsible.
- NO BREED SPECIFIC LEGISLATION!!
- He /she más be responsible for the pet
- Just like in a car accident, all details should be recorded
- Their animal caused damage and you as the owner are responsible for them.
- It's important to understand exactly what happened when an event where there is an attack occurs. There are a variety of factors and all sides need to be heard
- Unless the victim need medical attention
- Thought that was the bylaw
- They should not leave "the scene of the crime", the same a motor vehicle incidents or other incidents where a personal injury may or might likely to have occurred.
- Because they are fully responsible.
- common sense
- as in any accident, the victim and perpetrator should exchange information.
- Owners should take responsibility for their pets action and should be on site to clarify events leading up to the incident
- If the bite is serious (not just a minor scuffle with the dogs), the aggressive dog should be assessed. The owner should be liable for vet costs etc as well
- To collect history data for that animal.
- If a driver hits someone and leaves, it is an offence called hit and run. There may be diseases or other issues affecting either the dog or the injured party. Leaving is irresponsible and wrong. If you own the dog, you should be responsible enough to own up to its behavior.
- Unless it adds further trauma to the incident. In that case the dog should be removed from the scene ASAP
- A responsible owner should see an incident through to resolution by remaining at the scene.
- If a dog bites someone, the owner needs to give info about the dog
- It should be treated no differently than a car accident causing bodily injury, with failure to remain at the scene something similar to "hit and run".
- A dog biting someone or another animal and then leaving the scene is like fleeing the scene of a car accident.
- Dog owners must be responsible for their own pets. If their dog causes harm, it should be illegal for the owner to leave the scene until the matter is resolved. It is illegal to leave the scene of a car crash if you caused it - if you and your property cause harm, you are responsible for dealing with the aftermath.

- Pet owners are responsible for their pets, and that means being accountable for their pet's misbehavior
- Accountability, esp if bite is serious and medical bills incurred
- That is common sense.
- Absolutely. Pet ownership is a privilege and a responsibility. Stay at the scene, your dog may have been baited or provoked. You are their voice.
- Similar to other matters where there has been an injury or possible injury the owner ought to remain at scene
- As long as both parties remain separate but within the vicinity (as long as is safe to do so).
- Again train new Canadians to leave dogs alone. And not scream every time they see a dog.
- I think a dogs owner is more responsible for the dogs action than the dog. There is no such thing as a bad breed of dogs, there are bad owners.
- Why wouldn't they? If their dog is biting they should be accountable, it's never the dogs fault.
- So a proper and full investigation can be done
- No different than a car accident. May have been an accident but there is still financial ramifications
- would you care if I said I was bitten by a jack Russell terrier, or do you only care when it's a "nuisance dog"?
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs
- Unless immediate medical attention is required
- They should stay or be treated like a hit and run.
- At the victim's request, if the injury is serious
- People need to take responsibility for their animal
- It's their responsibility and like a vehicle accident, they should be mandated to stay
- Absolutely they need to stay.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the animal
- [removed]
- If either party would like the case documented, it should be mandatory to wait for bylaw to take the information.
- It's an accident or incident causing harm. Info should be exchanged.
- It's like a car accident.
- Owners need to be held accountable at all costs. It's never the dogs fault for being poorly trained
- dog owners must accept & take immediate responsibility for their pets actions & be willing to make restitution to the victim of the attack.
- The owner should stay in case the bills need to be paid
- It's the owners responsibility to stay at the scene!
- Dog owner needs to be held accountable and pay for any expenses incurred.
- "Tribunal may be biased
- Exchanging info when there is an occurrence sounds good reality wise people would get into altercations"

- Any dog involved in a bite situation should be tagged by the city. My concern would be enforcing the pet owner to stay and exchange contact info.
- If the owner leaves the dog may not be identified and could bite others.
- Owners are responsible for their pets, and should handle the consequences of improper pet behavior.
- Humans must be responsible for their animals and accountable for behaviour that puts others at risk.
- The owner of a vicious dog is 100 liable for its actions.
- If the owners had to stay and an officer had to come things would be recorded properly at that time.
- I don't think you should have to wait for enforcement officer, but somehow be more similar to when there is a minor car accident and An exchange of information happens
- if there is a bite that causes injury to another dog or person if the victim requests the owner stay to speak to announcer they should or follow up if contact info is provided
- Too many dog owners take off for fear of outcome
- So that both parties can give their explanations around what happened
- This would help both the dog and the person/animal that was bit because the owner would be able to identify more about the dog then if they weren't there and people had to assume things about that dog without having clear facts.
- Yes, the owner should be held accountable for their animal
- similar to any other injury accident the exchange of information must take place
- "A responsible owner should explain the situation leading up to the bite. Was the dog being teased or attacked? Was it a bite in play wrestling with another dog and the other dog's owner doesn't understand dog play?"
- And a responsible owner should acknowledge the potential need for more socialization and/or training."
- If a dog is biting it is the responsibility of the owner to their due diligence. There are no bad dogs, just bad owners.
- I would assume if a dog owner left the scene, they would be harder to identify. Similar to a hit and run situation
- Of course the human must stay and take responsibility. Just like an auto collision.
- Many accidents happen at dog parks where the owners just leave. Put the onus on an owner to stay and exchange information with the other dog owners and law enforcement personnel.
- As with other incidents involving accident or injury, contact information is a good expectation to ensure that follow up, should it be needed, be doable. Maybe something like I'd first aid is required, then contact information must be shared.
- This should be recorded so that enforcement could keep track of if it is a repetitive occurrence and act accordingly
- Owners should be required to stay at the scene just like you are when a vehicle is involved
- Similar to car accident laws, no matter the breed
- It could be a bylaw but again horrible owners are the problem

- Its logical
- Then you can see exactly what the context was, breed, owner and if preventable.
- The pet owner is responsible for their animal. They should remain to provide information and face repercussions
- It reflects the principle of asking dog owners to be responsible for the behaviour of their dogs. It provides a way to hold derelict dog owners accountable for their dogs' behaviour.
- They may have caused unexpected bills.
- Too many owners flee because they fear their dog will be apprehended.
- If the bite or incident is severe then this would be applicable. If the incident is minor (ie. Two dogs are engaged with no injuries, a dog and a person with no or minor injuries) then I do not believe requiring someone to remain on scene is necessary.
- All/any owner whose dog/pet bites/attacks another dog/pet/person should be expected to stay at scene and give information regardless of breed, size etc.
- It is irresponsible owners that cause dog biting not the dog breeds. The owners should be held accountable (not just for pitbulls)
- Emergency vet care is expensive and thus, if someone's dog attacked mine I would want them to pay for it.
- The owner should definitely remain at the scene and the dog should be removed from the owner's custody at that time.
- It's currently too easy to evade consequences for a dog attack.
- If safe to do so, if the victim is threatening or aggressive (even if rightly so) they should be allowed to leave and phone someone to share their details.
- My dog bitten by pitbull. $1500 in vet Bill's. Never found owner of pitbull. My dog on leash. Unprovoked attack. Pitbull almost killed my dog. I was in shock as was my dog. Owner verbally gave me phone number and quickly left scene. I was unable to remember number.
- If the dog owner was decent they would happily stick around to ensure all is well
- Same as car accidents.
- There is no such thing as a bad dog there is idiot ownership so don't punish the breed punish the owner... And ask yourself what caused the dog to bite?
- If it's a playful bite, absolutely not. If the bite has harmed something so much so it needs medical attention, then yes information should be exchanged.
- Had an experience with a dig that attacked my young children in a park. The owner quickly left the scene taking no responsibility for the incident. When we spoke to bylaw, we were advised to follow the owner to his house if it happened again. Yeah right, follow the owner of a dangerous dog to their house while my children are with me... Punishment for this needs to be severe. Criminal charges if necessary.
- owner of vicious dog should be fined and should pay medical bills of the person or animal that was attacked
- As long as there is proof of injury, the owner should stay
- To take ownership of animal and incident

- The owner should be held responsible for the incident and required to help find a solution
- Just to be safe. Plus two sides to every bite
- It is similar to having to remain at the scene of a vehicular accident. When dogs are involved in an attack or biting incident the dog owner must remain at the scene to exchange identity and residency information in case sanctions or charges are possible. The victim must also have this information if a civil suit is considered.
- The dog and owner need to be able to be identified so it can be determined if there were prior issues and in case there are medical costs associated with a bite or attack. Owner could be held responsible.
- Rule? How is it enforced? I'd hope, with a significant fine for leaving the scene
- Similar to a car accident, the person responsible should not leave the scene of the incident until information is exchanged or an enforcement officer arrives. This ensures accountability.
- Should medical attention be required for the person or other animal contact information shared and witnessed by enforcement may be needed should law suit be required to compensate the victim(s)
- Otherwise you'll never find them.
- They have the opportunity to explain the situation and to follow up with next steps. They must not fear their dog being taken by staying.
- Responsible owners should be prepared to give up a dog that has been involved in an incident.
- To confirm identity.
- Only if the dog bites a person
- This is tricky. If an owner is alone somewhere with one or more of their dogs and an incident occurs then the potential for the animal to require medical care is higher (even if they are the attacking dog) and should not be delayed. If there is no injury then getting their dog(s) away from the situation and secured somewhere should be top priority to avoid further escalation. That being said, I agree that they need to at least provide valid contact information before leaving the scene entirely.
- The dog owner should be allowed to remove their dog from the high stress area and then be allowed to return to defend their position if needed.
- To be a pet owner, person(s) making a decision to care for another life and accordingly has the responsibility and accountability as part of that decision.
- This will be a difficult rule to enforce because problematic owners are quick to run; and next to impossible to locate.
- An example: a recent incident involving a teenage neighbour whose (parent's) small dog was badly attacked. The teenager was so traumatized that she didn't remember any details about the owner. On top of the financial burden of the veterinary interventions required, not knowing whether the same owner and/or the same dog could repeat an attack made her anxious about taking her own dog to the same park.
- It is important for the both owners to remain at the scene when a bite occurs, whether it is a dog-to-dog bite or a dog-to-human bite.
- An owner should be directly responsible for the behavior of their pet and be willing to assume liability for poor behavior thus (hopefully) increasing training in all animals who are looking to use city parks.

- Most self respecting people would stay, it is the people who are not responsible pet owners who leave the scene, how would a bylaw change this.
- You need to stay to take responsibility but this is any dog whether large or small. Small little poodles and smaller can cause more damage than shepherd or pit bulls
- This ensures a vicious dog gets properly reported and labeled and owner held responsible.
- Vet bills!! There is payment owing by the other party
- This is a basic responsibility to share information - no different that a vehicle collision. there must be an exchange of information, even if one party must rush an animal to a vet.
- responsibility owners would not leave and both sides need to be heard
- "The owner should be willing to exchange /share information contact details, etc
- If the dog or other person is injured or the animal requires emergency vet care - It's basic human decency/courtesy"
- The current Residential Tenancy Dispute Resolution Service Tribunal in Calgary is not as effective nor harsh in its sentencing regarding tenancy disputes. I am afraid an animal tribunal would be equally weak.
- I have been bitten by my own dog and a strangers dog. I was protecting my dog from the attack of the other dog. The owner walked off without a worry to my safety or injury. A greater fine should be given to those owners who walk away and are found.
- As an owner of a pitbull I have had multiple dogs run up to mine and try to attack, these are normally small dogs such as a chihuahua
- You should be at the scene so no one can blame the other dog. There are 2 sides to the story.
- If your dog bites a person you need to take responsibility for that.
- The attacking dog owner should be held liable
- If a dog bites another dog, then the owner of the dog doing the biting should be held responsible for any vet costs that are incurred.
- Dog ownership is subject to regulatory laws just like driving a car. An owner of a dog that has attacked a person/another animal should have to remain at the scene just like a driver involved in an accident.
- As long as it does not pose further threat to anyone at the scene. If the individual has to leave to ensure their animal is contained properly, and provide contact details to return at a later time to speak with an enforcement officer.
- DEFINITELY! You have to do that with a car accident, it should be the same with a pet incident.
- This would ensure, the owner and the animal, have the necessary training.
- Should be similar requirements as vehicular hit and run.
- If your dog bites no matter the breed you need to stay there so that your info is shared with everyone who will need it
- The owner is responsible for the animal's behaviour and therefore should be required to provide contact information.
- dog bite that results in injury and the victim requests contact information must be supplied

- A dog owner is wholly responsible for the behaviour of their dog, and should offer their contact information and make themselves available to face the consequences of their dogs actions.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their dogs behaviour. They should not be able to walk away from an incident involving their dog.
- Many owners of these vicious pets do not demonstrate responsibility or acknowledge that they have an animal that is dangerous.
- They should be made to remain on scene.
- This would allow for the enforcement officer to engage with the pet and owner to assess if immediate and or follow up action is necessary
- They need to state their case. No “bite and run”
- everyone should take responsibilities for their pets, and deal with the consequences of mishandling / training. It shouldn't be breed specific though, all dogs can potentially pose as a threat.
- The owner of a dog that bites needs to identify them selves to a by law officer
- If a dog bites either a person or another animal it's a severe problem, therefore an authority figure should be involved to be an intermediary.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to make any reparations due to the victim of their dog's behavior, and so they should be required to give their information in case a charge or claim is made against them
- Owners of the dog need to take responsibility for their dogs behaviour whether it was brought on by the other party involved or the dog just being an ahole.
- We must all be accountable for our pets, it is not always the dogs fault it bites and both sides of every story should be heard
- Why punish the dog when it is the owner we need to be monitoring. Being there to share information is responsible pet ownership.
- Responsible owners should remain and deal with their actions as the dog injury may be expensive. Also tracking patterns of nuisance animals is important.
- This will help you realize it's not just pitbulls, it's bad owners. Maybe you'll stop trying to make asinine bylaws specifically geared towards bully breeds.
- Dogs that bite for any reason should be euthanized and owners fined heavily. Any dog that bites is a liability and any owner that puts a dog in a position where it can bite is irresponsible at best. Perhaps we should treat dog owners like firearm owners. There are likely far more dog related injuries to citizens than gun related injuries on a per capita basis.
- This is a good idea and makes sure that the dog owner takes responsibility for the actions and train god their pets. This can also help with incorrect or vague and general breed descriptions.
- That way all pertinent information is conveyed and pet owners held to account for their animals actions.
- Common sense. You wouldn't hit a car with yours then drive away would you?
- A dog biting another person is always preventable and is the result of an owner being negligent. It does not however make sense to punish those owners who are never involved in an incident.
- Owner needs to be held responsible

- Because that OWNER needs the training, or the fine, or perhaps a muzzle? The DOG is rarely the problem - the OWNER usually is.
- I think it's important for the enforcement officer to talk to the dog owner. However, if the attacking dog is pumped up and ready to attack again then take the dog home. It's a case by case basis. I would be worried if the aggressive dog was still outside if it would attack again. I'd have to have a dog expert lend their advice on this question.
- The owner is responsible, not the animal. The owner should providing all information and should be under investigation, not the animal.
- They should explain the circumstances/provide proof of rabies shots and insurance if there are damages
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets, too many are flippant and value dogs over humans.
- A dog biting a person is a criminal offense. The dog is in control of the owner just like a bat or a gun. No one who hits me with a bat should be able to walk away and say "Oh my bat did that I have no responsibility."
- all parties should remain at the occurrence
- Just like having to remain at the scene of an accident
- Anecdotaly, there are too many irresponsible pet owners in the city. A law requiring owners to remain on the scene would help curb one aspect of irresponsible behaviour.
- a responsible owner should share info to help defend the dog. Leaving the scene can be seen as an automatic admission of guilt. All factors should be considered in this type of case, especially the behaviors or irritants leading up to the bite.
- The owner should be held responsible for their dogs actions
- The owner is responsible. The dog is at the mercy of irresponsible owners.
- If there is an obvious injury or property damage, yes. The responsible parties should have to provide personal information so that restitution can be obtained.
- This just sounds like common sense - why wouldn't they stay at the scene of the incident to share contact information?
- Similar to a car accident, all parties should remain present until the matter is in the process of being non-biasly settled.
- It's important to understand the situation as well as what actually happened
- The owners need to be held accountable
- It is the owner's responsibility to control the dog's action, I truly believe there is no "bad" dog it all depends on the upbringing by the owner.
- This is no different than a vehicle accident. Owners are responsible.
- The dog owner is always responsible for the actions of their dogs so it's common sense that the dog owner would be required to remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer if necessary. Otherwise, there is no accountability.
- people should be able to discuss the incident with an officer. Sometimes dogs provoke other dogs and the dog owner must be able to give their side. Plus, the person with an injured dog should be able to have someone pay for potentially bad bites requiring surgery

- The owner needs to be held accountable.
- Otherwise there is no accountability
- Similar to owning a vehicle, any responsible pet owner must remain at the scene of an incident, at least to identify themselves and explain their side of the story.
- Yes if a dog bites someone the owner should be cooperative. Noting this could happen with ANY dog.
- It holds the dog owner responsible similar to car accidents. It should also make the bylaw officers job easier for reporting.
- As similar to a motor vehicle, I believe any witness and participants involved in the incident should speak with an enforcement immediately after the incident. This option will only work effectively if the officers can arrive in a timely manner.
- How else can you prevent it from happening again?
- I would say yes to this, as in my experience many people are in denial of their dogs behaviour. Once they leave the scene many people will not acknowledge the incident and ignore the complainants request for help with the vet bills, if required.
- Come on this is basic [removed]
- I do believe if a dog bites a person or animal the owner should remain at the scene, for information purposes.
- I feel all parties involved should remain at the scene if authorities have been called. Witnesses if available as well.
- Information should always be given
- If they leave it's just like a hit-and-run. We wouldn't stand for that in an auto injury scenario, so why would we in this scenario? The owner is accountable for the dog's actions.
- And owner should be liable for costs incurred, including replacement costs of dog including all training and pain and suffering.
- "Walking away from the dog's bite's scene is fleeing the scene of a crime, and practically inhibits enforcement / identification.
- However, keep in mind the impact of the dog's continued presence. Leeway needs to be given for the uncontrolled dogs, and a recommendation that the dog be removed and secured away from the scene's vicinity."
- Absolutely. My dog and boyfriend were both bitten. We left for treatment but thinking back, we should have called it in so the owners would have had to deal with bylaw that way the bites would have been recorded in case it happened again and to get them to pay vet bill.
- There still needs to be accountability
- I think it needs to be documented if a dog bites, if it's a reoccurring issue it needs to be addressed appropriately
- I had a friend but by a dog, the lady said the dog only hates bad people and left.
- As a responsible dog owner, this is considered good etiquette. Owners who do not do this already are frowned upon in the dog community.

- If a person is not training those dog properly they could be getting away with it by simply leaving the scene before the other citizen had the opportunity to bring in authority, thus leaving that owner unchecked. We need a better record of bad owners.
 - This is logical
 - You need to be able to find out if the dog has rabies, and also if the dog has bitten/attacked anyone before this incident.
 - yes if it is a serious incident that one or both parties agree may require some sort of follow up.
 - Context is imporant for all incidents, so if it's safe for the dog owner to remain on the scene for follow up report, I would support this. If it's not safe or appropriate, then post-incident follow up could occur in any other number of ways.
 - The victim needs to have a chance to contact the dog owner
 - No different than a car accident. You should remain at the scene or provide your identification and contact information to the other party.
 - Any responsible dog would do this.
 - Seeems like a no-brainer. The owner should be required to stay and deal with a situation his dog has created. Ther might be further consequences that need to be addressed so we need to know whose dog caused the problem.
 - Lock the owner up it is not the dogs faultobvious the dog was not trained.
 - I believe it is important that the dog owner provide contact information so that they may be held accountable for any financial losses incurred by the victim. If, however, the phrase "talk with an enforcement officer" implies immediate or unfair seizure of the offending animal, or implies that the dog owner may be unfairly penalized for someone else having provoked their dog to defend itself, then I do not support this.
 - This actually makes sense. If this happened I don't know why the owner would leave, unless they're just a terrible person.
 - "We are responsible for any harm our dogs cause harm to other parties. This should be similar to vehicle ownership/operation.
- There should be an exemption for cases where remaining on scene would be dangerous or otherwise risk further harm (ie: the offending dog needs to be immediately relocated to prevent it from causing further injury)."
 - Both parties should be present, as well as witnesses in order to better understand why the bite occurred.
 - makes owner accountable for their lack of training the dog
 - Owners of dogs who bite other dogs need to be responsible for vet costs. Remaining at the scene, sharing contact info, and talking with an enforcement officer for documentation of the incident are all imperative.
 - Accountability and assurance that proper actions will be taken so that this won't happen again

- A
- No different than a car accident.
- It's like any accident...if you are involved in one, you should remain there until it is dealt with
- Depending on the severity of the bite and if it is safe to keep the dog there for an enforcement officer, otherwise take the dog home and a simple exchange of information in case the dog owner needs to be contacted.
- With exception of if it's an extremely dangerous situation where the animal needs to be removed from urgently. The owner should then be required to come back, if that's the case.
- To many people will not take responsibility if they leave (hit and run).
- There shouldn't be a need for law enforcement, unless it's clearly a large issue between owners.
- Yes the owner needs to take responsibility with any breed of dog
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for the mean dogs they've trained.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for their dog's behavior and needs to be held accountable.
- Matter of accountability
- It just makes sense. Just like you would do with a car accident.
- This is absolutely paramount. It is responsible dog ownership on a basic level.
- This is something a responsible pet owner would do anyway, regardless of legislation.
- To me this is just common sense.
- In case issues arise from the bite and the owner needs to be contacted.
- Owners must be immediately held accountable for pit bull vicious dog attacks
- Because there is two sides to every story and people think because there dog is small ot cant do any harm. Remember if my dog is leashed and yours isnt or on a retractable leash and your dogs bites mine my dogs bite is going to csuse more damage but i dont see how it would be my dogs fault
- They need to be held accountable, and tell the full story.
- Too many walk away to avoid having to deal with what the animal has done.
- The owner needs to be responsible for their animal.
- A dog incident is no different than a car accident, people should have to talk to an officer for perspective and people should be held accountable.
- Why not?
- This should be no different to a vehicle accident with injury.
- As long as animal can be restrained while owner waits.
- I feel like it should be treated as a car accident. The owner should be responsible for a dog's actions. Poor training can result in aggressive dogs.
- I support this for if a dog bites a person only. Sometimes dogs get into little scuffles but thats no reason to involve an enforcement officer unless its a vicious attack. Sometimes its just dogs being dogs.
- Too many scumbag owners will just leave to avoid consequences.
- If a persons dog bites another animal or human, they need to be held accountable and this would make it easier for law enforcement to get their information

- My wife was attacked by a pit bull and the owner stayed on-site until I could get their details. I was attacked by a pit bull like dog (off leash on the pathway) and the owner walked away and told me to fk off.
- Shocked this isn't in effect already. Bad dogs often have bad owners, unwilling to stick around to face the consequences because Fido will never do it again.
- You need to know the owner to proceed with the outcomes
- This is common sense
- The dog owner must be held responsible for the actions of their dog.
- This is common sense. A dog but can be serious and it should be the law that an owner remain at the scene
- Absolutely - no different than a car accident
- Identify the owner and repeat offenders
- improves accountability
- With the provision that the offending animal can be controlled at the scene. Alternatively, a requirement to provide name address & contact info
- It's like a car collision. People need to be accountable and remain at the scene
- It's the responsible thing to do. Like a car accident.
- It's just like remaining at the scene of an accident
- If your pet has harmed another person or pet. It is no different than the owner, as a human being, committing assault. The pet owner should be held responsible. The pet owner should be forced by city by law to go to court ordered safe pet handling course. How to become a better PET parent. Failure to attend this course may result in the animal being seized from the owner. And potential he put up for adoption somewhere else with a parent that would be willing to take the time to retrain this pet.
- Makes identification of owner and dog simple.
- There might be a number of external factors that invoked the dog attack. It is important to know these factors and how to safeguard against them in the future.
- Hold all pet owners to the same standard
- It's essentially assault with a weapon. A crime was committed. Leaving the scene would have additional charges for any other crime committed, why is this different?
- The owner should stay if bylaw has been called unless there is imminent risk of further conflict or violence from either party. This way, both parties are there to give their story.
- It's their responsibility as a dog owner otherwise it would be hard to trace where the dog came from and the medical history of the dog (eg. Vaccinations)
- I believe owners should take responsibility for their dogs aggressive behaviour. If a dog bite a person or other animal they should have to shoulder at least some of the financial burden to help the affected person or animal. Enforcement may be necessary in some cases when owners avoid accountability for their pet.
- If it is a severe bite, I agree it is necessary.

- "Take responsibility for what occurred. There are ALWAYS two sides. Was the person invading the space of the dog? Did the dog dislike what was happening and try to protect itself?"
- Is there enough education around 'How to be around a dog you don't know?'"
- All owners have to be responsible for anything their animal does. Period
- Calgary dog parks are dangerous, I have stopped taking my dogs years ago after witnessing way to many dog fights/attacks. However a dog fight is not always the result of 1 dog being aggressive. I have witnessed fights where one owner cries foul stressing their dog was attacked when in fact it was the aggressor in a situation. It's a complicated issue for sure.
- They need to be there to take responsibility for their animal, just like an accident with a car
- Unless it is necessary that the dog owner must remove their dog from the situation first. I have heard countless stories of dog owners leaving immediately following their pet being involved in an incident.
- My dog was attacked when he was a puppy and the other dog's owner left the scene.
- By requiring the owner of the animal who bit a person or other animal to stay at the scene it will allow the enforcement officer to hear from the owner and assess the dog immediately after the incident.
- If your dog were to bite someone i feel it is the owners responsibility to ensure the victim is taken care of an an medical costs should be paid by the dog owner.
- It is certainly necessary for follow up if needed and to provide information in general. A fine should be given to anyone not staying at the scene.
- As the owner of a dog, it is your responsibility if the dog bites another person or animal. STaying at the scene is important.
- There is no recourse otherwise. It's not like you can take a picture of their license plate if they walked off.
- Owners should remain on the scene so the situation can be properly assessed.
- Appropriate behavior
- For punishment to be effective it has to be possible. For it to be possible the dog and dog owner need to remain at the scene.
- This makes sense.
- Just like a car accident - if a person's dog bites, they should remain at scene!
- Owners of a dog must accept responsibility for the situation & if possible without creating further issues, remain at the scene so the enforcement officer can properly assess both the Owner and the dog. Typically it is not the dog that is the issue but rather the owner.
- Yes, it is important to share contact information in the event the injuries become worse after the initial incident.
- The dog should be put down
- The dog owner needs to remain at the scene no different than a car accident. Leaving the scene will make it harder for the person or dog bitten to give details about the incident.
- This should be no different then an automobile accident.
- For safety of all parties involved— dog may need to be removed from scene and brought home, but owner should be sharing information.

- Jerk dogs belong to irresponsible people
- To ensure incident is correctly reported.
- It's important to provide contact info, however, if the owner needs to go home to bring the dog home and then return, that should be fine.
- Depending on severity there are vet/medical bills that should be shared
- Accountability is important.
- The facts need to be made known to the owner and the best way for this to happen is to require the owner to remain at the scene.
- Same as any other property/ injury incident ie car accident, property damage
- All sides need to be heard. All parties should remain at the scene if immediate medical care is not warranted.
- If someone's dog bites something/one, the owner should be held accountable.
- The owner is responsible for their dog and their dogs actions and should provide information on their dog, especially such things as rabies vaccination dates.
- I believe that the owner is responsible for the dog 's behaviour and should be legally obligated to stay on scene.
- It happens far to often that people run away from the incident and there is no repercussions
- Make the owner responsible.
- If the dog bites someone and the owner is there they should tell their side if the story
- It is an owners responsibility to the dog. A dog does what it is trained or encouraged to do. How an owner treats the dog reinforces the behaviour of the dog. Can also provide a list of owners who are involved in incidents and see if it is the same owner over and over again, who is as a result, putting the dog at risk.
- Leads to a clearer understanding of what has appended.
- The guardian should be responsible for further training of dog or make retribution's for injuries, if any.
- If needed of course...
- If the owner doesn't have any reason to run away and hide and stand up for their dog that's a good owner if the dog bit another dog or person in most cases it was to protect the owner I have seen many Doglas jumped their fences or open gates to get to these dogs that are on leash, so who's to blame???
- It's about being a responsible person
- A dog is your property same as a car. Yes they have emotional attachments to humans, but they are your responsibility.
- This is the owners responsibility to stay at the site of the incident
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for their dog's actions.
- Too many people leave. Make it the same as leaving the scene of an accident or crime.
- Owners are, or should, be responsible for their pet's behaviour.
- Rabies vaccination must be proven, so the owner must remain there.

- If a dog bites anyone pitbull or not, the owner should stay and make sure they are okay and give any information. The owner is also at fault and there could be many reasons why the dog has bitten it. It isn't the dogs fault
- It should be treated as an assault and the owner is liable to stay and speak with police.
- Owners are the best person to describe what their dog's characteristics are
- It's like getting your car hit, would you run away? No.
- Protect the majority from selfish minority.
- I was bitten and the owner took off, no apology, nothing
- If the victim would like to proceed via law enforcement a dog bite should be treated the same as something like a car accident.
- Dont flee the scene of dog bite
- An owner must be accountable for their ownership - and how would absenteeism reflect accountability? It doesn't.
- No different than an accident scene
- Yes. So law enforcement can follow up and make sure the owner gets properly educated on the dog they own and how to properly train their animal. It is so often lack of education and understanding of the breed on the owners part that causes problems. A properly trained animal is so crucial.
- Just like a car accident. You should wait at the scene to exchange information and speak with a officer
- if someone or another animal is injured, the owner should be responsible and deal with the situation accordingly.
- Owner is responsible for dog's actions.
- Owners are responsible for their pet and their actions. Period. Your dog acts up, YOU stay and deal with the consequences.
- A vicious dog attack needs to be treated like a traffic accident. Bite-and-run should be illegal.
- As long as the officer will come in a timely manner, and by other animal you aren't meaning a gopher or porcupine or something. I'm sure there are circumstances where this wouldn't make sense, but in general it seems like a good idea.
- Just like after a car accident - responsibility is required.
- Owners are ultimately responsible and accountable for their dog's behaviour.
- vet fees are expensive
- With the exception of having to leave the scene in an attempt to control the situation by removing the aggressive dog from the situation.
- The owners information needs to be documented and the incident on file.
- It is the owners that are responsible for the behaviour of their dogs. It is not a specific breed but poor handling and training. I have seen incidents at Southland where the dog owner high tails it out of the park after an incident so there is no responsibility or chance for re education of the owner and pet. Accountability!

- My dog was in an altercation with another dog (mutually at fault) and I wanted to get contact info from the other party so that we could discuss how to handle this in the future (as we frequent the same off-leash park). She didn't want to, and while I have taken steps to deal with my dog's issues (training, muzzle, qualified dog walker), she doesn't seem to have done anything, as we had another negative encounter while my dog was muzzled and hers wasn't.
- The owner of a dog that bites may be civilly liable or criminally responsible, and therefore must remain at the scene for identification purposes.
- Yes or they need to exchange contact information ... with relevant parties
- Dog owners often vanish after a bite or attack
- People do not take responsibility. They are ready to blame the victim and the victim will be traumatized and not remember all the details
- I was walking my pitbull (shared ownership) through a neighbourhood alley while on leash. Another, much larger, furry mountain breed dog ran out of an open garage and immediately attacked my pitbull. Though my pitbull defended himself and sustained a neck bite in doing so, I had to kick the other dog off of him and I suffered a small bite wound in the process. The other dog's owner eventually came out and accused my pitbull (who was still held by myself on a leash) of attacking his dog (which was not leashed). I corrected him in protest, but his neighbour from across the alley, who had seen the whole event, looked at me and said "well you know that breed of dog has a bad reputation" whilst pointing at my pitbull. I asked him if he saw the events correctly and he again implied that due to the breed of my dog he would take the side of his neighbour. If it was required that the owner of the other dog had to stay to deal with the situation, I could have easily shown the officer my and my dog's wounds and the lack of on the other dog. Instead without assistance I had to take the injured pitbull and my own wound home under the threat of wrong doing happening to the pitbull.
- To prevent someone from running away and not being held accountable, like a hit and run.
- This is an important part of ensuring that the owner is taking responsibility for their animal, just as one must do in the case of an auto accident.
- Shouldn't this happen anyway? Penalize the owner not the breed.
- If your dog bites someone you should give all the info and take responsibility
- ACCOUNTABILITY, LEGAL REPERCUSSIONS.
- But, only after they are separated from the victim.
- It is merely responsible behaviour.
- I do not support the discrimination against pitbull type dogs.
- Their responsibility
- "We have an American Staffordshire Terrier who has been attacked probably a dozen times in dog parks mostly by Australian shepherd type mix dogs (While our dog has never bit or even nipped any dog or human)
- These owners are not taking responsibility for their dog initiating aggressive behaviour which should be the focus regardless of breed....

- If a chihuahua goes under any other dog and bites their nuts the following reaction isn't going to be "breed specific" as much as it's going to be about physics"
- To prevent an owner not being accountable and responsible
- The owner of the offending dog should be required to stay on scene after they are able to contain the offending dog so that things are handled fully and all contact information is shared.
- At the very least, the owner should have to give the victim their information before leaving the scene.
- the owner should be responsible for the actions of there dog
- Bites should be taken seriously
- It seems some owners run off when they are well aware their dog caused injury or death. They should stay unless there is immediate need to get medical/veterinary help.
- Dog owners must be responsible for the actions of their dogs. There should be a heavy penalty for those that leave the scene without providing contact information.
- The person whose dog attacks a person or dog may not be the owner. What then?
- Just like a vehicle hit and run
- damage assessment can not always be determined at the time of attack.
- Too many people run away
- The owner should be held responsible. Like a car accident, do not leave the scene of the crime.
- The offender causing harm should be required to stay at the scene, pet parents need to be held accountable.
- If it's a small minor bite with no broken flesh and does not require stitches or immediate attending, then no. If the bite is severe, then yes.
- Na
- Yes—but don't point fingers at bully dogs. Small dogs bite too.
- Same as a traffic accident- owner should take responsibility if negligent, pay vet bills (at least in part)
- You need this to insure they have provided the correct vet records for the dog.
- it is important for the owner to be responsible for the action of the dog they own
- The person should be accountable.
- If there is an accident between two car, the parties reasonable are expected to stay on scene otherwise it is considered hit and run, how is this any different.
- Duh?
- The owner needs to be able to explain if the dog or the other party seemed to be at fault, it's too easy to play victim.
- People need to be more responsible
- Having a pet means taking responsibility for their actions. You should be identifiable in a situation like this.
- The owner needs to stay to at least give a vaccination history of the offending animal. Also, in the case of severe bites, compensation may be required so exchange of contact information is essential.
- The owner is responsible for their animal. This is obvious to me

- Enforcement officer needs to verify and document the detailed events of the incident.
- Irresponsible owners need to be held accountable.
- Owners need to take responsibility for having a dog and make the right choices raising their animals
- Leaving the scene of a dog bite should be a crime similar to leaving the scene of an accident while driving.
- This should always occur if the situation is serious. However, the bylaw should be written with flexibility.
- it should be no different then a car accident. Animal bites and attacks fall back to the responsibility of the owner.
- This could help prevent the waste of time and the costs of locating the offending dog and owner. Treat this in a similar way as a hit-and-run driver.
- Should be enforced to take responsibility for pet
- The only exception to this would be if they are unable to control the animal and stop it from attacking or Biting again.
- My dog has been attacked three times and in each case the owner grabbed their dog and hurried off while I checked my dog for injuries. It's akin to a driver fleeing the scene of a MVA. Owners of nuisance dogs should, by law, be required to stay at the scene.
- Owners should be held responsible for bites, not the animal
- You need to be able to track owners.
- The responsibility for the dog's behaviour should be considered the owner's, and if an owner is not careful and attentive to their dog or doesn't train it properly to prevent incidents, they should be held accountable. Owners should be required to exchange their information or speak with an officer to determine whether the dog is safe and being trained properly to prevent any future incidents
- This seems like an acceptable suggestion
- no different from any other physical assault, and should be treated as such.
- Unless the dog needs to be taken away for safety I guess
- I know of an incident where a dog (pit bull) severely attacked 2 smaller dogs. The owner had the dog off leash in a small park where kids play. He took the dog in his car and later tried to surrender it to dog pound saying he had caught it after the attack but it was not his dog. Bye law could not prove that he owned the dog.
- Owners of aggressive or vicious pets should be held responsible if their pet bites.
- This seems to be self-evident - responsible dog owners should do this automatically.
- They should have to stay until the other party is ok with it or authorities arrive
- Accountability.
- This gives a clear idea as to what happened and both sides of the story.
- It's the owner's fault that the dog was trained so poorly as to bite or otherwise behave poorly. The punishment should be on the owner, not the dog
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for any incident that may happen. They should stay on scene absolutely.

- Our Jack Russell terrier was bitten by a pit bull on Long Beach near Tofino. The pitbull was unleashed and the owner came up and clipped the leash on and walked away. My sister, who is a by-law officer with City of Edmonton, says that is very typical. Even if you had a law, I doubt people would obey it. There should be a law anyway.
- Need to get both sides to the story as quickly as possible IE was the dog being provoked or not
- Unless it is unsafe to do so. However, the victim should always have contact information for the defendant. The defendant needs to explain themselves to enforcement officers before having time to calculate a defence.
- It's just like a car accident. You can't just leave the scene. Info needs to be exchanged; illness, vaccines, severity of altercation to the bylaw officer, also the officer can determine if it's a first time offense.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs exhibiting dangerous behaviour.
- Far too often these people wander off leaving the owner of the victim left to not only pay for vet bills on their own, but the dog who did the biting could do it again.
- Virtually every story I read about a dog attack involves the owner leaving the scene and avoiding any recourse.
- Owners should always take responsibility in their dogs actions because if they raised the dog correctly it should never bite.
- In my experience at public places -- mainly dog parks -- (have owned 2 docile and friendly dogs in the past), owners of animals that tend to bite or attack KNOW that this behaviour is part of the animal's pattern, and often do nothing to prevent it. They are more likely to try and get away.
- The owner is responsible for how their dog acts, stay and take ownership of what happened. That way people can get these situations taken care of faster and easier
- A pet owner needs to take responsibility for the actions of their pet. Too many times, victims of attacks are left without the proper information from an offending pet, and left with huge bills.
- Share information for sure.
- The owner is responsible for the dog. A dog bite is serious event that needs to be investigated and all parties involved must stay at the scene, like any other serious event.
- They are the party responsible for the dog, therefore they should be responsible for the fall out of said incident
- So many are not held responsible for their animals actions. Just like a car accident, both parties need to exchange information. And it should be a by law to be required to do so. If the owner of the guilty animal fails to do so and is later found responsible for the incident... more fines should be added for not providing information.
- Owners who do not control their dogs and they know they have a dangerous dog/pet should be required to stay in the place of accident and maybe be banned from owning a dog
- It's the same concept as a traffic collision. You can't leave the scene until it is properly dealt with
- In the case of an actual injury
- Just like any accident where someone needs medical assistance, the owner of the pet should be responsible for the assault inflicted by their animal.

- I think leaving the scene of someone is hurt or injured should be criminal
- Like hitting someone's car, people should wait and make sure everyone is okay and if they need to proceed legally.
- For the same reason a person involved in a car accident must stay. Unless the dog bit because it was antagonized, the owner must stay. It is not common for a dog owner to not know their dog has a problem. Bites don't "just happen".
- My dog was involved in an altercation at an off-leash park. My dog lost the fight and needed minor medical. The owners of the other dog were great- they paid half the vet bill and followed up for the next 3 weeks while my dog healed. Neither dog is vicious or dangerous, they just simply had a dog disagreement. This should be the example of the right thing to do.
- They are the responsible owner of the dog that does the biting. All owners are responsible for the actions of their pets. So many owners are not in control of their dogs and are walking them with long leashes and not short leashes where they can control the dog's actions easier should it lunge out at someone or another animal all of a sudden.
- Often owners know their dogs are aggressive and in my experience they don't remain at the scene
- You can't deal with the dog if the owner takes off and makes it difficult to find them or the dog. Leaving the scene of a bite should be punishable in some way and is totally inappropriate
- Just like when a car accident happens, if a biting incident happens everyone involved as well as the witnesses should wait at the scene for an enforcement officer to arrive and take statements with contact details for each person.
- The dog owner remaining at the scene is basic responsibility and human decency.
- This should be common sense and I thought it was a rule already
- Provide proof that the animal has had their vaccinations.
- Owners are ultimately responsible and should be mandated to BE accountable.
- Unless the owner is actively retrieving the animal if loose - assistance at the scene should mirror policies in MVA events
- Leaving the scene should be punishable
- As with the scene of a car accident, if you cause damage to a person or their property you should be responsible and supply your information in order to accept responsibility.
- Frequently persons whose dog has bitten someone the owner takes off
- It is comparable to a hit and run
- The owner must be held accountable
- My pitbull has been attacked 5 times at off-leash dog parks by dogs that are not pit bulls!! he has never related but I tell the owners of the aggressive dogs that if it was my dog that attacked theirs he would be put down and there would be a huge article in the paper about how vicious pitbulls are! This is as small minded as being prejudice as hating a race of humans due to what you've heard or one person's actions!! Open your mind!!! My dog is known as the friendliest, most social and loving dogs at the off-leash park!
- Both sides of story, view dog's behaviour.

- Dog bites, FROM ALL BREEDS, EVEN SMALL ONES, can result in serious injury, and often dogs who bite are put into very uncomfortable situations, unless life threatening, BOTH parties should remain until the situation is sorted out. If someone kicks a dog and the dog bites, that needs to be looked at, not just that dogs are biting randomly, because they usually do not.
- It should be considered an accident and treated as such. It would also keep the wrong dog/owner from being accused.
- Owner should be responsible for dogs behaviour .
- Dog owners must provide information about the health of their animal, as that has direct impact on other people and animals. They need to provide proof that dog has all appropriate vaccines as well.
- Just so the offending dog's owner can pay the Vet Bill.
- Provided circumstances are taken into consideration - if the other person was being aggressive or something similar the person should not be required to stay
- Based on the severity of the bite and the nature of the interaction. If someone is antagonizing the pet and the pet reacts, it should not be the responsibility of the pet owner. However, if there is an unprovoked bite there should be a sharing of information at the very least to make sure the dog has been appropriately vaccinated.
- Yes, because if they do need medical attention that comes at a fee, the owner of the dog should pay for it. Only reason I would not like this to happen is if the dog gets euthanized for the bite. There are no situations that I believe should result in euthanization. It is never the dogs fault.
- It is the responsibility of the owner.
- How is this not already a rule?
- The dog only follows its owner. That's what a dog does. So if a dog bites then the owner is responsible. And should be held accountable.
- This includes all dogs. Cocker spaniels are one of the worst dogs for bites but no one ever talks about that.
- A dog bite is never a dog's fault. It is always a human error, or a lack of training or control by the human. The human owner should be liable for any of his/her pet's actions.
- Similar to a vehicle incident, I think owners need to remain responsible for the actions of their animals and should be willing to work with law enforcement if necessary
- Being accountable for the dog should be a requirement of dog guardianship.
- I believe if a dog, any type of breed was to harm another animal or human if it's the owners fault then yes I believe they should swap information but if it's the other companys fault then I believe information is to be swapped but is told to be the truth about the incident and only should face consequences if it's their fault
- Because they should be responsible for any vet bills and leave contact info (like at a car accident).
- Owners are responsible for ensuring their pets are properly trained and cared for. It is also necessary that they provide their viewpoint, in case the animal was being harassed and bit out of self preservation.
- Just like damaging personal property it is still your responsibility to follow up.
- Why shouldn't they stay and offer assistance and their info?

- Owners need to be in control and if there's an incident, need to take responsibility. This includes a bite victim who was at fault due to not following bylaws or requests for additional consideration. The majority of incidents are actually due to the "victim" refusing to listen to requests for space or having their own dog on leash in designated areas.
- this is so very important - accountability is key to hold owners responsible
- Owners need to be held accountable. They need to train their pet properly.
- Yes, much like a car accident, people should remain on the scene. However, how long can a person realistically wait? From what I understand it can take enforcement officers a very long while to attend the scene. This will be a tough one to enforce. People need to be responsible for their actions and the actions of their pets but there are again many things to take into consideration. Example. Dog A bites Dog B. However Dog A was on-leash and Dog A's owner made it very clear that Dog A doesn't like dogs that they do not know running up to them. Dog B was off-leash. The incident occurs in an on-leash residential area. Dog A is not aggressive and has no history of attacking. Dog B is not aggressive and has no history of attacking dogs. However Dog B's owner goes into a rage and reacts terribly. Accusing Dog A's owner of having a bad dog that needs a muzzle. Dog A's owner feels unsafe and chooses to leave the scene before things escalate further. In this situation perhaps it is better that Dog A and owner leave the scene. They could call the city from the safety of their own home.
- Even for car accidents both parties are required to stay at the scene/give info. Should be no different here.
- As long as it was safe to do so, if an incident occurred in which there was sufficient severity to engage an enforcement officer the dog owner should be able to provide that information if necessary.
- It's the same as a car crash, no hit n runs.
- It is important to make owners responsible. Most cases it is not the dog but the owner not being responsible
- If a specific dog itself has bitten another person or attacked an animal the owner should be liable.
- Owners need to be held responsible for the behaviour of their pet.
- It should be the same as a serious car accident, you should remain at the scene until all information has been collected by an officer
- It's the responsible thing to do
- If your dog bites you need to be held accountable and if it did not you need to defend your animal immediately to avoid false claims
- Information should be collected from the offending dogs owner. Dogs that repeatedly bite should be euthanized
- While walking with a friend and her 2 pitbulls, another dog (lab/shepherd) ran up and bit one of the pitbulls resulting in over $1000 vet bill for antibiotics and stitches. Because the owner of the biting dog took off, the owner of the victim was left with a scared/injured dog and a massive vet bill and there are no repercussions for the "non aggressive" dog

- Many dogs bites occur between dogs without the owner of the offending dog remaining at the scene and the owner of the victim dog is left with a vet bill.
- Taking responsibility for a dog's actions is part of dog ownership. The only exception would be if it is safer to remove the dog from the situation. Under those circumstances the dog should be removed from the area, but the owner should still report the incident or provide their contact information from a distance.
- If a dog bite were serious resulting in broken skin, injury, bleeding, broken bones etc the dog owner should be required to give their contact information to the victim and have the incident filed with an enforcement officer in the event injuries require additional care, medical bills, time missed from work, recovery time, overall impact to victims life ect. This should be treated the same as a car accident where the owner of an animal is identified and held responsible for the bite.
- It may not be the dog owner at the scene so this would help people to identify the people and animal involved in the scenario.
- Any dog that bites a person or dog the owner of that dog no matter the breed should be held responsible.
- I view it as the same as a hit and run if they don't stay there.
- Also officer should be allowed to remove dog from owner permanently if owner has been negligent more than 2xs
- It's the owner who needs to learn to train the animal. They are the ones who should be held accountable.
- This would show taking responsibility for your dog's behaviour
- Absolutely. I was attacked by a dog when I was young and it is very important that everyone stays on scene until police and bylaw can get there.
- But also to possibly defend the actions of the dog. Get the full picture.
- Too many owners of vicious dogs do not take responsibility for their dog's actions.
- Not sure why you require an explanation. Clearly owners responsibility no different from an auto crash
- I used to be a meter reader. I have had a few occasions where owners would weaponize thier dogs. My worst bite was from a lady I revive assurance she put in the house. But she didn't, the dog she got to protect her kids and property did what she trained it to. Bit me badly when I entered the yard with her still waving me in. There are stupid people with dogs and some stupid people think it funny & cute to tease dogs. I had a cocker x I rescued, was a pretty good dog, a kids dog, but I think his previous family teased him. One day my husband at the time opened the garage door, was going to cut the grass. The dog loved to sit just on the side of the garage. Suddenly shock and surprise the neighbourhood paperboy went by on his bike. The dog shot out of the garage and charge red him viciously growling. We grabbed him and were stunned. The kid left and the neighbours came over to tell us this kid pounds on our front window when we are gone to work, while he's delivering papers. Well here's the thing, we. Didn't get paper delivery. His dad shows up threatening to sue, kid. Has spiked gashes in his shin, from his bike petal actually. The neighbours came over again. Was the only thing that saved his word our word. At that time Yyc would have seized our dog and put him down.

- Owner may explain why their dog bit I.e. previous injury to part of body that bitten dog may be near, previous attack by similar dog. Not an excuse for their dog to bite but to react. Important owner be present.
- It means you can get health information and follow up if needed.
- I think as long as they don't need to leave to get emergency care for themselves or their dog, they should have to stay. If they have provided accurate information so they can be contacted, leaving should not be penalized.
- The owners need to take responsibility so if that means the victim will have vet bills due to the dog bite, the owner of the biting dog should be paying those bills.
- This seems obvious. Not staying is like hitting someone with a car and driving away.
- As a dog owner I say yes, fleeing the scene of an incident of a dog bite is no different than a hit and run.
- This would be difficult though as when it happens is is very traumatic for the dog owners and dogs involved so standing around and waiting would be difficult. There was nowhere to add this comment but I'm tired of cities targeting breeds, it's a question of responsible, educated pet owners. Make a course mandatory (in person with your dog) before a license is granted. Make people enroll in a Behavior class for their dog. Terriers And Rottweilers are not aggressive by nature, it has to do with the owner, the training and even the breeders. Quit accusing the dogs and go to the source - the OWNERS, BREEDERS. EDUCATION PLEASE!!!
- Your animal bites someone, you should stick around and talk to whoever shows up about it. It's like a hit and run.
- If they do not there should be a criminal charge and fines much the same as leaving the scene of a vehicular accident.
- All pet owners hold have to do this it is no different than leaving the scene of a car accident.
- Yes, but consideration needs to be made for safety factors ie it may be unsafe to keep the dog that bit there if it can't be controlled
- Tired of hearing about pit and run all the time. Pit owners are notorious for leaving the scene when their dogs attack
- Because most times the offender don't want to assume responsibility.
- Yes because otherwise it's no different than leaving the scene of a crime
- Of course. The dog is only doing what is in its nature or what the owner has allowed. The owner should receive the consequences not the dog. These consequences should include medical bills being paid and fines and proof of completion of a training program that is more then obedience and should include canine behaviour and dominance. I have had large muscular dogs and I only do dominance training and have had the most loving and happy and gentle dogs, including 2 pit bulls
- Everyone needs their side of the story being told. My Pitbull was attacked in Regina and Calgary and the offender just said it was my fault because I have a Pitbull when my Pitbull hadn't bit their dog and my Pitbull would hide behind me. All dog breeds can be aggressive if they do not have access to appropriate training.

- That way if this particular dog is doing this frequently then the mandatory training order can be issued then and there
- owner must take responsibility to prevent it from reoccurring.
- The owners are the problem, not the dog. They often flee the scene, especially because they know the dog has issues and they are irresponsible in not training or staying away from dog parks or areas known to have other dogs ie hiking trails
- The same as harming someone with your car
- Would ensure that incident is handled appropriately
- Their responsibility if a dog bites, just like it is getting in an accident and staying at the scene
- This is reasonable, creating bylaws specific to one dog breed is not.
- if necessary then yes, the rule should ensure they stay but when it is not necessary they should be free to leave
- Too many times dogs that have shown a propensity to attack are encouraged by their owners. Like a car accident, all involved parties should stay.
- It is the owners responsibility for controlling their dog and facing the consequences of their dogs actions especially when it hurts another animal or person.
- Depending on the actual bite. Given the current climate with cops and white privilege, this scenario would need to be handled kindly and properly.
- if it is serious or a deep bite then yes you should stay with them until you get help
- It is important to have full knowledge regarding this dogs vaccinations and health status. At the time of the incident, the victim of the bite may not think to ask these questions. It is important that there can be communication after the event so everything can be disclosed.
- there are 2 sides and usually biting behavior is due to dogs who are off leash (small dogs) that bother and are in the face of well controlled on leash dogs.
- My cousin's dog was bitten by another dog and the woman fled the scene. It took months to track down the owner and my cousin had to bring her dog in for care and treatment.
- This is the definition of being a responsible pet owner. Dogs should not be bullied based on their breed or appearance.
- Details should be given, but again, all details of the incident should be recorded so there is a fair assessment of the animal's behavior. Especially if it is a first time offense.
- Almost impossible to find them after the fact.
- All dog owners should be responsible enough to provide information regarding shots and name, address and telephone of the owner of the biting dog.
- Just like the scene of a motor accident!
- If any dog of ANY breed bites and severely injures another party the owner is absolutely responsible to share information to cover any costs
- Responsible owners.

- Similar to car accidents, you are responsible for your dog's actions so contact information is important somthe dog is not needed to be searched for.
- the owner is responsible for the animals actions. There's a fine for hit and run, why not bite and run?
- This should be treated no differently that a hit and run, the dog owner of a dog that bites should remain at the scene of the offence.
- Both sides of the story need to come out. A dog biting isn't always because a dog is aggressive, the circumstances surrounding the incident must be taken into account.
- Or at least provide contact info
- Vehicle owners are required to remain at the scene of an accident, it should be the same dog owners. In addition, leaving the scene of a dog bite should be an additional penalty, beyond the penalty for the bite.
- People should be responsible for their dogs actions.
- Any incident involving the dog involves the owner of the dog.
- I wish there was a circumstantial answer rather than a yes or no because it's situational. Obviously if a bite was severe, of course I would expect this. I have accidentally been bitten by a few dogs, one a toy poodle, when I was a kid - the bite broke skin but I was fine. Would that dog be as likely to be euthanized than a German Shepard or a pit bull?
- It works the same as a car accident. If a animal bites another animal, the person should stay and wait for help to arrive
- However, if there is a dog that was provoked by another dogs bad behaviour, or the dog is anxious, it might be best/safest to keep a distance and or leave the area. It's not the same as a car accident. The cars don't want to keep hitting each other once they crash.
- assuming this is dealt with in a timely manner and both side of the incident are required to remain (ie the "victim, unless emergency medical attention is required).
- Similar to a car accident, it is prudent to obtain all relevant information from the offender.
- Same as a car accident
- There needs to be more accountability for dog owners and remaining at the scene and sharing their information is a good first step.
- If there is an incident then the owner should stay on the scene.
- So they don't run off.
- It should be treated like a car accident- you cannot leave the scene.
- it's fair
- Within reason. Anything that does not involve a visit to the vet shouldn't be considered.
- This should be common sense, but a rule in place seems to be required nowadays
- Any responsible dog owner will take responsibility for their dogs actions. It's those that don't that cause problems for the rest of society.
- You are responsible for your pet. Every owner of every pet should be required to stay at the scene - much like remaining at the scene of a motor vehicle accident.
- treat it the same as a vehicular collision in that respect.

- That dog owner needs to take responsibility for their pet's actions and behaviour.
- Dog behaviour is the responsibility of the owner & so many owners do not own up to this
- Just like any other incident involving injury like a car accident, then a dog owner should stay. This is putting the responsibility on the owner.
- Often the owners of a dog who bites try to get away to avoid any fines or having a dog taken. These are not responsible pet owners.
- It should be the same as a hit and run if you run off without offering assistance and your information, etc.
- Each person takes responsibility for their dog.
- But they should be able to leave temporarily to secure their dog in car or home but must return
- It's the responsible course of action.
- Same as a vehicle accident. You should stay and swap information
- A bite against a human should require the owner to speak with enforcement officer. Treat this similar to hit and run with a vehicle.
- There are two sides to every story.
- What has happened is essentially an assault. The fact that the animal is under the care and control of the owner/walker places the responsibility on the owner and/or walker. So long as this is available to be applied for ALL dog bites from chihuahua to golden retriever.
- That is basic responsible pet ownership as well as human decency and respect to make sure all parties are ok.
- If you leave that should have a huge fine.
- Just like any accident you are required to stay at the scene.
- Not only for the victim, dog owner should be responsible for their animal and/or be able to defend themselves if the other person or their dog provoked the bite etc.
- An owner is responsible for the actions of their animal and should remain at the scene of an incident to properly convey any necessary information
- Is that not obvious? That is common decency.
- To defend the dog if necessary. Not all bites are the fault of the dog.
- If your dog is in right or wrong you need to stay to explain situation, I was getting mugged and dog bit the mugger or the other dog got loose and came bolting at us and my dog thought we were being attacked.
- The dog owner will know the health history of the dog which will help for the medical examination. The owner can also give an insight to why the dog bit to help against unfair charges due to protecting.
- it is the way a dog is raised and not breed that dictates aggression. The owner should be charged
- doesn't matter what dog it just matters how u train them
- in case of further incidents
- If the attack from the dog was to protect the owner I think enforcement should know that.

- Depending on the severity of the bite. If two dogs get in a fight and there are bites but neither are severe then no. If there is no broken skin, no. If a dog attacks another human or animal unprompted, then absolutely. If the bites are life threatening or cause serious injury, then yes.
- Similar to a hit and run, owners of dogs who cause harm to someone should be required to stay at the scene.
- Just like a car accident, you should remain at the scene.
- Can't flee the scene. Should wait for reasonable amount of time.
- Owners should be responsible for training their dog and should be present anytime there is an offense
- Owners need to be held accountable for their pets actions
- This process could serve as early prevention. My concern is with staffing/process - if one of my dogs were involved in a biting incident, I would share my contact information (and photograph any visible marks). Would "talking" to the enforcement officer be by telephone, or would all involved be expected to wait for an in person meeting? This could dramatically escalate the situation.
- All side of the story should be looked at. And responsible owners would not leave the scene if warranted
- It is good to follow a chain of evidence in case the bitten animal/human develops any type of infection.
- If one adult attacked another adult the correct thing would be to stay at the scene, the same should apply to the pet of that adult in the case if that pet attacks another pet or human
- Banning an entire breed because you can is the wrong thing to do and literally just proves the underlying values of racism that you people live your lives in. If this "law" gets passed the wonderful friendly lives of hundreds probably thousands will be lost and not a single person besides some Karen's in their 50s will be happy. And you'll be to blame.
- A dog that bites is a serious issue - there should be consequences for doing so.
- It's like any "accident" everyone should stay and make a report and a witness should stay as well
- Only if it is safe for everyone involved
- If you're in a car accident or assault someone you need to stay so why would this be different, common sense people.
- To ensure if an offense occurred, it is dealt with and reported to the city for follow up.
- The person should be held responsible.
- There is no way of tracking aggressive dogs if the owners aren't staying on scene.
- I believe the owner should have to stick around if both parties agree the situation warrants it. Depending on the situation obviously. But also any witness's for either side would also need to stick around so it's not a "he said she said" situation
- Keeps people accountable
- In any situation, if something goes awry, all parties should stay on the scene for it to be assessed and proper action taken place (making sure everyone, including the dog, is ok and gets any help they may need).

- People should be responsible pet owners. The [removed] (pardon my language) discrimination about Pitbull breeds is disgusting. Maybe we should have bylaws to arrest people for being crappy humans instead.
- There are two sides to every story.
- Makes sense to get the information right away, however not all circumstances would necessarily allow this in all situations.
- Treat it like you would a car accident
- No different than a car accident. Challenging but there are potential very fees so it sounds like the right thing to do. Need to have parameters - damage done and criteria.
- Seems like common sense. You shouldn't leave a car accident, why leave an animal attack?
- Owner taking responsibility !
- If a dog bit someone that is similar to an assault.
- "It is not only large breed dogs that bite. I and my dog have been bitten by small breed dogs. If the owner had stayed on both occasions then there would be better data and tracking on the types of dog breeds that are more likely to bite a person or another dog."
- The person being bitten needs to know the dog's vaccination background and keep in touch if anything persists.
- This is serious and needs to be dealt with immediately. It will likely happen again if not addressed.
- Totally anecdotal but I have heard a lot of stories about dogs attacking other dogs, and the owner leaving the scene with their dog immediately after it happens. It would be good if they were legally required to stay at the scene (though practically speaking I am not sure if the threat of a bylaw offence will really do that much)
- An owner should always be at fault for their animal's behaviour as they are the one who trained it, intentional or not and are at fault like any other accident.
- The breed of dog doesn't matter at all but I do support the city cracking down on nuisance dogs (aka dogs who have already had incidences and issues) but it's not the dogs fault, the owners need to be responsible and accountable.
- A person needs to be able to give their side of an incident in order to best resolve the issue. This needs to be the case with any breed of dog not just large pit bull breed dogs that you are so wrongfully targeting
- I mean if they are a responsible pet owner, they will take responsibility. If they leave, then you know who to take away because they don't deserve pets.
- Dog owners and their behaviour influence dog behaviour directly. If they remain on the scene, law enforcement can get some idea of the human's influence on the incident and their animal.
- Dog owner must take responsibility.
- As a dog under the law is considered a possession, an owner needs to take responsibility for their possession. Just like a car accident, it's illegal to leave the scene.
- Owners MUST be accountable. Leaving the scene would be an admission of guilt that the owner was negligent.

- I think everyone should be present to ensure that there is a fair investigation, and that there is no bias.
- It is important for the owner to provide contact information as the animal's health history may be required when seeking medical treatment (if necessary) for the bite.
- I am agreeing so the person can defend themselves but it would be hard to keep a dog at a scene of an incident if they were being aggressive or territorial.
- A dog is the owners responsibility, no matter the breed. They need to take ownership over the dogs poor behaviour and live with the consequences of their poor training of said dog
- Too often, owners flee the scene of a bite or attack.
- This will help with random dog attacks that seem to happen and then the owners can take responsibility of their dog.
- It is much easier to identify dogs/owners who are a problem if they don't vanish into the wind
- "The animal is YOUR responsibility, that is your child if the dog did something bad it's your responsibility no, if ands or butts. But training will be a huge difference! Also if the humans are questioned more, as a pose to "making money" then this offense against pit bulls wouldn't be a thing. It's all on the humans, if you were raised with abuse would you get put down it's a food for thought thing and it's unfair. They were
- Here before us and we get to judge how they live or die. Honestly they're genuinely amazing until a human gets involved it's just not fair."
- For tracking purposes and possible fines
- I have been bitten very badly by a dog. It was not a pitbull or any of the other breed listed above as a "vicious" breed. It was a smaller mid sized dog that the owner did not think was necessary to train because of its size. I had to go to the hospital for help. The owner of the dog simply walked away and I was therefore forced to have multiple shots because of the unknown health situation of the dog that attacked me.
- As a dog owner you must take responsibility for your pet. Just like driving a car, if there's an accident you must stay at the scene.
- The owner should be responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- While the rule may encourage respectful folks to stay at the scene of an incident, it would likely have no impact for the non respectful folks who are most likely to be involved in an incident. I think the threat of criminal charges is the only way to make that latter segment respect the rules. I'd really rather see rules focus on the owner and not the breed, though, because in my opinion the owner is the source of the problem.
- It doesn't matter the breed of the dog. It's the training and ownership. A responsible owner would support this.
- "At the end of the day it's the owners responsibility. They are in care of that animal and they have to answer to the situation at hand.

- No different than a parent of a young child who has committed a crime or harmed someone/an animal."
- Offending dog owner should be responsible for any vet bills acquired as a result of their dogs actions. And a fine should be issued.
- I think this is just being socially responsible
- You can contact the owner if you need further info and it gives the owner a chance to explain or make amends
- If a dog bite happened due to a fight then yes. If it was not intentional, say during play and an accident happened, then no.
- Similar to a car accident. If there is a severe incident they should have to wait for enforcement officer
- I feel that if someone's dog bites another they should be responsible for any damages caused.
- I don't see how this would be enforceable.
- Dogs aren't born aggressive, the owners train them to be aggressive. You can't single out breeds because people on media platforms show videos of dogs biting. Any dog can bite!
- It's like hitting someone with your cat, except it's living creatures involved. Of course owners should be responsible for reporting to police and remaining at the scene of an incident
- This is necessary to prevent future incidents.
- If an owner leaves the scene they should be fined a larger amount similar to fleeing a hit and run
- Any breed of dog can bite. Small dogs bite ankles and that hurts as well. Yet they get away with being a small dog. Do not point the finger at larger breed dogs.
- If a dog bites someone they both parties should stay. Tell both their side of the story, and decide further action from there.
- This increases the accuracy of incident reports and could reduce the number of dogs being euthanized
- Owners need to be responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- Not sure what to explain - this seems obvious. I'm glad that this has happened with all incidents that I have been involved in - people are generally courteous and act appropriately.
- If there is a dog who bites a person, the owner of that dog should hold accountable for that dog's actions.
- Yes if ANY dog bites the owner should be held responsible. This is not breed specific. Even if it's a chihuahua (who have the highest bite rate by the way!)
- The owner is at just as much fault, if not more than the animal. Owners should be able to read their pet's body language and prevent the acceleration of altercations
- I imagine there are a lot of people who would want to flee the scene if their dog caused an altercation. It's important to have controls in place to prevent this from happening.
- It comes with responsible pet ownership.
- This will help with identification and assuming responsibility for the incident.
- I think that by leaving shows they are not accountable for their actions and that of their dogs.
- Owners are 100% responsible for pet's behavior

- Any accident, you should stay and be present, give your information and your side of the story.
- Accountability is so important. As someone who is allergic to many pets, I get so frustrated by the idea that a person who chooses to be a pet owner could dodge accountability.
- When you own a pet they're part of the family you wouldn't run away if your kid got in a fight or you're in a car accident same thing
- This would depend on the severity of the situation.
- Like car accident trade info then wait for peace officer or head to where ever to report the incident
- Makes sense
- Yes if it is a vicious bite causing damage, no if it is a playful bite or nip
- Contact information needs to be shared but not sure it makes sense to keep dogs who are antagonistic against each other at the scene if it could potentially escalate the incident.
- Like any other accident
- At the very least provide contact info to the other person involved. It's called being decent and responsible.
- Then the dog owner must take responsibility for their animal.
- So that both sides of the story could be heard. Also, to gather information one the owner and dog for future use.
- Yes, if the bite is major/caused significant injury. If it's a nip, no. If it's a bite while playing, no.
- I think doing so is part of being a responsible dog owner. No matter the size of the dog
- If you hit a car, you have to stay and give your insurance. It is the same with a dog.
- It's the responsible thing to do as a pet owner!
- Of course!!!
- I think all parties should remain, unless medical attention is required. Every aspect of the incident must be questioned. The dog that did the biting may have done so in their defence, not out of aggression.
- Of course. The behaviour and actions of the dog are the responsibility of the owner. It should be no different than remaining at the scene of a car accident.
- This should go for owners of any breed.
- Unless the situation requires the dog to be removed from the area immediately for safety concerns.
- Responsible dog owners would do this anyway
- We have to stay on the scene for a fender bender in our cars where no one even gets hurt. We should ABSOLUTELY have to stay on the scene if someone gets hurt by an animal
- n/a
- Any time a dog bites someone the owner has the responsibility to take care of the person or animal that was injured. They absolutely should stick around and make a statement.
- There are 2 sides to every story. The dog is not always in the wrong in this scenario.
- As the owner of a dog in that situation it only seems fair to have your side and take responsibility
- People take off because they don't want to be held accountable for their dog's behaviour (or be forced to pay veterinary fees for damage that their dog has done to other dogs/cats)

- It's like the scene of an accident. You don't just walk away
- Goes to history. Can ease tension a victim may feel.
- Proper reporting and proper processing
- If you own a dog, be a responsible dog owner.
- A dog owner should take responsibility for the dogs behavior, regardless of breed...
- Responsible pet ownership
- Yes. They need to take responsibility.
- It is important the owner be responsible for their dog's actions
- This is effectively no different then a vehicular accident in terms of causing bodily harm.
- Mandatory and failure results in fines
- Like a vehicle accident make dog owners accountable for their dogs behaviors
- Just like a car accident info should be shared
- The owner of a dog that injured a person or another dog should stay to help if they need it.
- Owners should be responsible enough for their dogs that this is a given. This scenario has nothing to do with their breed, I've seen labs that are more vicious than pit bulls and they are just ignored completely as theyre considered a "family pet".
- Breed specific legislation is dangerous.
- No brainer. You should always stay on scene of any accident where first responders have to be called.
- To follow up on dog owner having received more training to correct dogs behavior going forward.
- Long enough to share contact info if bite is severe enough to cause damage.
- Considering the dog is under control at that point.
- I think this is just common sense the same way you don't leave the scene of an accident or it's declared a hit and run
- If necessary. Depending on severity and conditions in hand.
- This would support increasing accountability for owners, ensure easy access to animal health records, and help identify repeat offenders (owners who repeatedly do nothing to improve pet behaviour or take responsibility for damages)
- People need to know the health status of the dog that bit so they can seek the appropriate medical care.
- "It is the owners responsibility to control there dog
- If they do not and the dog bites they need to be held responsible"
- There are two sides to every story so all parties involved need to remain in order tp collect all info.
- Too many people just take off and then the incident is just rumour and misinformation on social media
- Or to contact enforcement to report the incident immediately. Same as car accident.
- It would be a good idea to get the whole context of the situation: was it a provoked or unprovoked bite? Several documents that prove unprovoked bites should be the cases that get escalated, while cases of provoked bites get support or warnings.

- An owner is solely responsible for their dog and their dogs actions. If another dog or person gets hurt, the nuisance dog owner needs to ensure everyone in the situation is taken care of a reasonable amount
- Unless the dog remains aggressive, or circumstances prohibit staying, I don't see why they shouldn't wait for an enforcement officer
- Dog bites can be provoked or unprovoked, if unprovoked the owner should tell their story. They can also be quite serious depending on the severity of the bite, they should absolutely stay put until police arrive.
- As the dog is not the one at fault. The owner is to blame not the dog the dog is doing what they know to protect themselves.
- "Just as you would a car crash, both parties of a dog-biting incident should stay at the scene as the bite could be harmful to the persons health long-term and they may incur hospitalisation fees that they should not be responsible for.
- Also, if the dog and owner has previously been apprehended for a similar crime, it would be helpful for them to stay at the scene so further action can be taken to stop the dog from continuing harming people."
- In many cases, it is the owner, not just the dog, at fault. A dog bite can be very costly at a vet and the owner must take that responsibility. It should be treated like a car accident . If it can be resolved to both parties satisfaction then no enforcement officer is required , but if not ,then one should mediate.
- So it's known who the problem dogs are.
- If a dog bites another person it is not the dogs fault or the breed of dogs fault, it is the owner who is at fault for not properly training their dog. The owner should be held responsible, not the dog.
- Owners should be held accountable if their dog bites someone else
- Just like any accident u need to stay to report
- Dog bites can happen with all breeds. Tracking should occur with no discrimination of breeds.
- The injured person needs to know if they are at risk for anything.
- Their dog hurt someone, so yes, they need to wait and deal with the situation. They are the owners of the dog, and need to be held responsible.
- If a dog were to bite another dog or a person hard enough to warrant medical attention then they should be required to stay on the scene until information can be taken and processed to determine if sanctions should be given. Similar to a car accident wherein the police are called if damage is severe enough.
- I think an owner needs to have more responsibility for their dog. The dog that bites should be required to stay on a persons property for a period of time.
- It's the owners fault. Not the dogs.
- Being a responsible pet owner means that you are just that....responsible for your animal. If they bite a human or other dog the situation should be handled to a level both parties are acceptable with.
- Depends on the severity but if it's bad then there might be medical involved

- BOTH should be required to remain at the scene. Sometimes it is not the offending dogs fault as the aggressor, they may have been provoked or scared.
- Yes, I support this - it's fair.
- N/a
- Yes, OWNERS should be held responsible for how their dog acts.
- Owners need to accept responsibility for their animals.
- A responsible pet owner will stay at the scene. An irresponsible owner or someone who feels as though the rules don't apply to them, such as a small dog owner, will likely walk away. Should someone have a small dog that's acting against these proposed bylaws, whoever handles the case will need to not be bias because of breed.
- I have seen and heard of alot of pitbull attacks and nothing done, this needs to be addressed
- If major hospitalization is required the offending person should be contactable.
- They are accountable for the safety of their animal and responsible for the actions said animal commits on other animals or people in a public space.
- Just as with vehicles, if someone's property causes damage, they should be expected to stay and provide information
- It is the responsibility of owner for their own dog and for the victim of bite.
- Ownership is absolutely required not only for legal reasons, and for public safety.
- I believe it should be like a car accident.
- You need to hear all sides of the story.
- People need to be held more accountable for their animals and there are some people who shouldn't be able to own them if they cannot take care of the ones they have
- I have experienced two dog attacks in my life, one where my daughter was bit and nothing was done (even though it was reported), secondly, at an off leash park where my small dog lost her life by being chewed to death by a pit bull. Both times fortunately, the person stayed on scene; however, I know that isn't always the case. I completely support this and if an owner does not follow said rule, should be fined.
- Yes, I agree that if another person or animal is bitten (by any type of pet not just dogs) that the pet owner should stay at the scene to share incident info.
- The owner needs to be held responsible not the dog.
- if a dog bites a person..or causes serious injury to another dog.. dog fights happen..the onus is on owners to prevent these incidents by being in control of their animal, abiding by leash laws and not leaving animals unattended... all of these things should include all kinds of dogs..not just pitbull type dogs
- to help render first aid and so the officer can get all the information regarding why the attack happen
- I feel that it is the pet pwners responsibility to remain at the scene of the incident and share their personal information, just loke they wpuld in a motor vehicle accident.
- If the parties involved wants to take the matter further, then the offending dog owner should not be allowed to run off without giving contact information.

- Yes, a dog owner who's pet bites a person or animal (UNPROVOKED) should remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer, and deliberately fleeing the scene should be a criminal offense. Exceptions pertaining to ALL biting laws should be made for dogs who are deliberately provoked and/or dogs protecting their owners from attack.
- Though they may need to remove the dog from the situation first.
- But Depends on the severity of the bite
- "It is not always the dog's fault. And there are always 2 sides in a story.
- I have seen strangers, adults and kids, approach a dog without asking the owner if it is ok, and that is when a dog may react.
- Educate people is a MUST"
- This is fair. If your dog does do something, you're responsible for their behaviour.
- Yes but only if there is a safe place for their dog and then as society often tries to take things into their own hands and then more people will get hurt.
- This way its is dog specific information, not breed specific. It irritates me that so many people make incidents BREED specific, which is why we run into issues like this.
- Every dog owner is responsible for their animal; show it if something happens.
- This falls under educating owners.
- A responsible pet owner would do this without question. The people who would run will do so regardless of a bylaw but can now be charged for being irresponsible
- That's just common decency
- If they are able to. owners need to first ensure their animal is no longer causing problems and is under control also may need medical care for their own animal
- Owners need to accept responsibility for the actions they take as owners, and for any aggressive behaviour of their animal.
- If I can't hit someone with my car ajd
- The owner should be held responsible for medical bills and must train their animal.
- Owners not being held accountable is a big reason for aggressive animals and repeating behaviour.
- If there are vet bills, the owner of the biter should pay
- Thats just a responsible thing to do as a pet owner.
- Only if it is a severe bite. If someone's dog badly hurts another person or animal they should be held responsible and fined or something. I don't necessarily think the dog needs to be euthanized or taken away.
- Some people are full of [removed]. You can tell when a dog is aggressive, or afraid and it's important for the owner to be able to say what happened so that the situation can be resolved and the next right steps can be taken to prevent another bite from happening.
- I support declaring nuisance designation for dogs that attack or bite so the identity and contact information must be provided after an incident
- Dog owners involved in an incident must be held responsible for negligence

- I believe if the dog is not in need of medical attention, all witnesses involved need to place a statement and or have a number to call. As well as the dog owner should be present to give their statement of the incident to bylaw. Or police
- Well the dog can't answer for himself...
- Sounds similar to hit and run with vehicles otherwise
- Any dog can bite someone, not just bully breeds. Other dog owners should be held accountable for their own dogs actions. Why is this only about "pit bull" type dogs?!? Chihuahuas, Poodles, Dalmatians are all proven more aggressive yet no one cares about that
- I feel it is necessary to have all the information given from both parties and to make sure the person is okay
- Same as motor vehicle accident. Owner must stay at scen of accident or charged.
- it is the owners responsibility to make sure all parties are ok after an attack
- If a dog attacks a person or another dog and they leave the scene, an enforcement officer may not be able to find them for information later.
- I would hope that they would share contact information but it seems excessive to wait for enforcement. The dog would get much more agitated during this time
- The person or owner of the animal bit needs to know if the biter is up to date on shots, etc. they may be held liable for any medical expenses.
- Owners should be held responsible for not training their dog resulting in these incidents.
- Being able to give both sides of a story is crucial when it comes to the law regardless so by taking both sides into account things may be more fair
- I agree they should remain available if possible. BUT if their animal is hurt and needs emergency attention or they need to go to an ER they should not have to wait around.
- Not as a way to charge them but to make sure any animal who bites has all of its shots.
- For ALL breeds. Small dogs included
- It's is important to hold irresponsible owners accountable. And when there are severe/violent incidents those people need to face consequences.
- T
- If this can be done safely with the dog contained and all people and animals can be calm and distanced.
- It's important to get both sides of the story on record.
- Make people accountable for their pets actions. Reasonable.
- This is an owner's fundamental responsibility
- If you get into a car crash you have to stay on the site and talk to an officer. It's the same logic.
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- Leaving the scene of any incident causing bodily harm is unacceptable.
- If they leave the scene that should be considered fleeing the scene. If anyone was harmed they should be required to stay and speak with victims or officers
- Accountability

- It should be the pet owners responsibility to stay and make sure everything is ok and give their side of the story to Bylaw. Especially in severe situations. Pet owners should take responsibility for their pets at all times. Most of the time it's the owner and not the dog anyway.
 - When a dog is aggressive at the park owners give so many excuses "he's just a puppy" "we are working on it". However you shouldn't be working on it. If I feel that my dog was unsafe because of your dog it should be reported.
 - There have been multiple incidences where owners feel they do not need to take responsibility for their animal, and leave the scene very quickly with no contact information left. This leaves covering fees and such up to the victim of the incident, which is not fair in any instance.
 - Too often the owner takes off and there is no way to track the animal or impose consequence. As well, offenders will often give false information to the victim so they can't be tracked down and the victim is too flustered or upset to realize anything is wrong. An officer could demand identification to ensure follow up.
 - Personal harm towards another has taken place while offending dog was in said persons custody. Therefore, a person with a dog assumes responsibility for dogs actions.
 - It's only logical to take responsibility for it and helping
 - No.
 - If someone was seriously harmed the owner should absolutely remain for give contact information and their side of the story, as with any assault.
 - To make them take responsibility
 - The owner or person responsible for the animal should be present, same as a driver involved in a motor vehicle accident.
 - Should be responsible to offer information
 - Seems appropriate to stay and give information if your dog bites someone.
 - This feels like a necessary step to collect information for billing for related expenses.
 - "The owner is responsible for the pet. If that pet bites someone the owner is responsible and should stay to share information.
- The exception would be if the dog can not be settled and the owner needs to get it out of there to prevent more issues."
 - The only time I would disagree is if the dog needed medical attention or they needed to evacuate the area to keep safe.
 - As long as there is a sufficient number of officers. This way the event can be documented properly and the officer can help if there is any disputes
 - Liability. Both views need to be present to find the solution and reasons to why said incident would have occurred.
 - If you get in an accident you stay and give the other person your information same should go for a bite.

- It's the responsible thing to do... people should be answerable for their or their dog's actions
- this way owners side of the altercation is heard
- The owner is the problem - not the breed.
- Because it's not the dogs fault but the owners.
- To help determine what happened accurately and without bias
- This should just be common sense. As a dog owner I could never leaving the scene of an incident with my dog without ensuring the proper steps were taken.
- Tishomingo that there dog is not an aggressive or a threat to others. explain what the circumstances were as to why the dog got aggressive in the first place.
- Breed specific legislation has been proven to be ineffective at preventing dog attacks. I do agree however that nuisance declared dog must go through mandatory behavioural training and that the owner must be responsible at all stages.
- If law enforcement is needed than people should stick around to discuss, and this way the owner can be held accountable for the dog's behavior, not JUST the dog. However I would imagine most situations can be resolved without that.
- "Irresponsible owners must be held accountable It's not the breed it's people --
- Possibly a course the owner has to complete to continue being given the privilege of having companion animals"
- Open communication, ensure all parties are okay, discuss conflicts.
- That is responsible dog ownership
- That is just common decency. The owner needs to confirm that the dog is up to date on shots and remain accountable for possible negligence on the owner's part.
- People should be accountable for allowing their dogs to harm a human, so long as the consequences are uniform. No breed discrimination!
- If someone is bit and the bite gets infected or there are other medical problems they need to be contacted.
- Depends on the situation
- I really shouldn't have to.
- If any dog bites someone the owner should stay present to give information out and deal with law enforcement if the person chooses to go that route
- It is the owner at fault if the dog is aggressive towards anyone or any other pet. So yes the owner should stay put and speak to the enforcement officers. It's not the dogs fault they were given to an incapable owner to train them correctly.
- If there is a situation where a dog has bitten you or your own animal it would be good to have someone there to mediate, if necessary.
- It's like a car accident. If the damage is significant enough, law enforcement should be called and information should be exchanged.
- If a dog harms someone the owner should stay to help and take responsibility.

- if there is any kind of incident, all information should be given to help effectively figure out what happened and come up with a solution
- Alright let me be clear: I think the rules slated to effect pit bulls are short-sighted and anti-intellectual. Dogs need to be dealt with on an individual basis: a friend of mine was brutally attacked by a Poodle. A family friend's child was permanently mangled by a Shar Pei. These proposed bylaws just seem... dumb.
- i think the owner should have to take responsibility for their animal's actions. it is like staying at the scene of a vehicle accident.. if they don't the animal owner should be arrested and charged.
- The owner leaving the situation after a dog bite, could be equated to a "hit and run." Owners should be open to talking with officers if needed.
- Pet ownership is a responsibility and when a dog is attacked, it can become aggressive toward other dogs as a result. Owners need to be held responsible for any behavior of their dog.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs so should be there is something happens. But that also goes along with training. I don't believe that breed specific bylaws are a good idea- it is better to ensure owners have the incentive to train their dogs.
- the owner should stay at the scene of the incident so they are able to share their side of the story.
- This ensures higher accountability
- Yes of course. A responsible pet owner would stay at the scene
- Responsible owners always stay at a bite or aggressive dog situation.
- A poor dog owner is no different than anybody else when causing an injury and fleeing from the scene of a crime is illegal.
- I consider it the same as a vehicle accident. Stay and share info
- any responsible pet owner should and would stay at the scene
- Many owners of dangerous dogs don't take responsibility for their dogs and allow them to get away with injuring or killing humans or other animals.
- It is important to have both sides of the story. What were the actions leading up the the bite, was it provoked or not?
- This is responsible dog ownership
- Owners should be able to be held accountable for any incidents their pets caused, therefore, they should remain at the scene to do so.
- Just makes sense
- Dogs bite because of handler errors.
- I think it's only logical
- Both sides of the story are important.
- Owners should be held responsible for their dogs. That is what responsible dog owners would do. They also owe it to their dog.
- There are quite often mitigating circumstances and hopefully the owner can explain.
- I feel that is part of responsible animal ownership (similar to an accident with a vehicle)
- It's the responsible thing to do

- They need to take responsibility for their pets actions
- Yes, if it's safe for the person to do so and bylaw is attending.
- It is similar to a car incident... don't leave.
- No matter the circumstance if the said "golden retriever" went at my pitbull and hurt him instead of vice versa. Like [removed] anyone would believe it wasn't my fault. That's the Discrimination wrong with this entire survey. "It's all pitbulls" no it's the owner!
- If you get in a car accident you have to stay on the scene unless it's a risk to safety. So same should apply to this.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for his/her pet's actions
- Owner needs to stay at the scene, otherwise there is no enforcement and the irresponsible dog owner is gone.
- AS THE OWNER THEY ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE PETS BEHAVIORS/ACTIONS. IT IS ALSO THE MORAL THING TO DO SPECIALLY IF IT IS A MINOR INVOLVED.
- Again the owner is responsible for their dogs action no matter what breed
- If the bite is severe enough to cause bleeding I believe the owner should be held responsible for sharing information to determine what actions to follow up with and if the bitten dog needs medical attention it should be up to the owner of the dog that caused the injury and necessary socializing training should be held for the dog.
- Should be treated like an automotive accident, including fleeing the scene being an offense.
- The owner is responsible for their dog's behavior. In the same way someone would be expected to stay on the scene of an automobile accident where someone is injured, a dog owner should remain when their animal hurts someone.
- Owner should be held liable. It's no different then leaving the scene of an accident. They should be convicted if they did so
- It would be helpful to know history of dog and can track owner if this is a repeated offence.
- they need to be held accountable for their dog.
- An owner should be responsible for their dogs actions and it should be documented properly by law enforcement.
- Yes, if person expresses desire of offending dog owner and dog to do so
- It's like hit and run. If you run after a dog has injured a person you are accomplice in the act. It should be criminal if you run.
- I assumed that rule was already in place.
- If any injury happens to any person on account of me or my pets it is my responsibility to remain at the scene until all information is collected. Really high fines should be levied where the person and/or pet flees the scene.
- It's an accident and just like a vehicle accident, you must remain on scene
- Too easy for people to take off with the offending dog prior to police / bylaw arriving. Bylaw is understaffed and does not work 24 / 7. There should be a known bylaw saying if you don't remain at the scene or provide accurate info then you will be charged. Take responsibility for your dog's actions. And I'm a dog owner.

- The owner is held responsible. It allows the dog and owner to receive proper training to prevent attacks.
- The dog owner should be responsible for their dogs actions
- The owner needs to be held responsible for their dogs behavior in public. I do not support this for people trespassing on private property.
- The owner is responsible for their dog and its actions.
- Once the owner and the dog leave, it can be very difficult to find them if the victim wishes to ask for recompense.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility in these situations, a rule enforcing this would be beneficial in my opinion.
- For the same reason that drivers exchange information following an accident; It seems only common sense; To do otherwise seems irresponsible, however the dangerous dog would need to firstly be brought under control/ removed from situation; it may be challenging to exchange info in that moment - but owners should do their best to follow up and assist as possible.
- Owners need to be accountable and speak to the officer.
- Officer should have training to also be able to assess owner and determine fitness for ownership
- It's always good to hear both sides. The dog owner should and then be present for proper identification and accountability.
- Would be the same as a car accident or any incident. Both parties should remain at scene until information is exchanged.
- Yes, only if it was a serious injury.
- People need to be accountable and liable for the actions of them and their pets. Ensuring proper identification, complaint/incident documentation and tracking is key to this accountability being enforceable. It works for driver id in the case of car accidents, why not pet or other incidents
- As the owner they are responsible for the dog's behaviour and therefore need to provide information and reparation to the victim.
- Just like a car accident, stay at the scene or follow instructions specifically given by 911 operator staff of medical attention is required.
- Why on earth would you leave the scene of a potential bite that your dog inflicted. Of course info should be given.
- The dog owner should have to remain at the scene. However guidelines about what should be done in the event that the victim has to leave to go to the hospital or take their pet victim to the vet should be outlined. I doubt the owner will stay around but there may be cases where the victim needs to leave to get support.
- "In chatting with many dog owners, some have had their pets bitten and had to pay thousands of dollars in vet bills. Not to mention the stress on the animal. The nuisance dog owner should be liable.

- The owner should also be responsible for getting training for their pet. Under no circumstances should a pet be put down. It is not the animals fault."
- It should be required for the same reasons a person is required to give their contact information at the scene of a car accident. The owner should be held responsible for damage caused.
- when this happens at the moment it us easy for the owner to just walk away
- The dog and the dog's training is the owner's responsibility, therefore, they are responsible for any injury that is caused. They should provide their information to the injured person, the owner of the injured dog, or an enforcement officer. This should be treated no different than the responsibility one has to remain on the scene of a car accident.
- That is the responsibility of the owner regardless of breed. Happens a lot with German Shepherds (as they are just as powerful as a pitbull) but should also apply so smaller dogs such as chihuahuas that can bite and not let go.
- the dogs behavior is typically a result of the owner's handling. The owner must take responsibility for and be accountable for, the behavior of his/her dog.
- Owners need to be accountable and held to account, for the behaviour/misbehaviour of the animals they keep. Much stiffer penalties (Large fines) should be awarded to those who shirk their responsibility by fleeing a scene.
- Owners must remain, this isn't a bite and run situation.
- To give their side of the story
- Or else it is a "bite and run" which should be punishable by law.
- It is the reasonable and prudent thing to do.
- Info should be shared, but depending on the circumstances (eg, if the dog is being aggressive), whether to stay or go should be a judgement call
- I think it would be useful to hear both sides of the story
- They can definitely remove their animal from the situation and return to the individual who got injured and talk with an enforcement officer to tell their side of the story.
- Often in the aftermath of a bite there are questions important for medical care to the victim that are not thought to be asked immediately. Follow up for rabies often requires monitoring the animal for 10 days.
- Owners should take responsibility for their dogs actions
- In cases of disease, such as rabies or Capnocytophaga canimorsus, information provided by the owner or victim after testing can provide vital to understand health issues and solutions after a dog bite. The presence of an enforcement officer can provide necessary to understand the true motivation behind a bite (whether the victim was harassing or scaring the dog or the dog is being mishandled by their owners.
- Unless the owner needs to remove the dog to reduce further harm, they should be required to stay, just like if they were to hit someone with their car.
- Accountability is important.
- Similar to if I hit someone with my car and caused damage, if my pet causes damage to someone the onus is on me for my lack of control.

- Dog owners should be responsible for the actions of their animal. It should be mandatory for them to remain at the scene if a dog attack incident and should be charged if they leave the scene.
- Owners should take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
- Of course. If the owners cannot wait, contact information should be provided.
- To Make sure the dog is licensed and the dog received all required vaccinations.
- Shouldn't his already exist. A let us the extension of the owner. They are responsible for the stupid thing. They need to be held accountable
- The person responsible for the animal should be there.
- You may need to defend your dogs actions, it is responsible thing to do
- There are no bad dogs, only bad owners.
- N/A
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions. By providing contact information, we can follow-up to see how the dog has been rehabilitated or if the owner took any responsibility to send their dog for proper, professional training. All dogs can be saved and their behaviour can change.
- Then problem dogs could easily be identified
- its no different than remaining at the scene if a car accident. People must be held accountable
- Yes, but within reason. In certain situations it would make more sense to isolate the fighting dogs or to calm them down by leaving. Also, how quickly does an enforcement officer respond?
- Pets are owners responsibilities. They need to stay so the officer can get all information and give fines if necessary.
- It is called "being a responsible pet owner"
- Responsibility as a pet owner.
- It would depend on the bite severity. But for the sake of all parties, they should stay and gather witnesses so the story can be told properly from the beginning as there may be the dog was not the agressar.
- It's important to understand all scenarios. Not all dog bites are the fault of the animal and some are provoked by people approaching animals they shouldn't. Strangers should respect the owner when approaching a dog that is unknown to them.
- Same as cars, if there's an injured party.
- They should be held responsible for their dog!
- In other injury-relates situations (like a car accident) where there are potential civil or criminal consequences, parties must remain at the scene to exchange information and ensure accountability. Why should a severe pet bite be any different?
- I think they should stay at the scene if it is serious. That being said, dogs sometimes get in fights. They need to be broken up and checked for severe injuries. But I have seen a lot of dog altercations where small dogs run up to larger dogs barking and biting and if the larger dog reacts, the larger dog is to blame. My friends husky was approached by two small dogs who were barking and nipping. The husky nipped back and caused a small cut. The small dog owner got animal services involved and was trying to blame my friend. So sometimes there are situations where people are dishonest and try and make larger dogs or certain breeds at fault. As a dog owner and having experience dogs attacking my dog before, you just need to understand that dog fights happen sometimes and you just need to be fast at breaking it up and deal with your own dog accordingly. People who do not have experience tend to freak out and make situations worse than they need to be. I can't emphasize the importance for putting more resources into training people and making sure they understand dog behaviour and that their own energies can make a situation worse than it needs to be. People need to be trained on how to have control of their dogs and how to effectively react in various situations.

- If their dog causes physical harm or damage, they should have to give their account to an officer and not just leave. They should be accountable.
- Absolutely. It should be a crime.
- A person should be liable for their animal's behaviour.
- But there needs to be a system to remove the dogs from the situation
- So people can held responsible for their dogs.
- This is just common sense
- They need to exchange information but may leave to secure the dog after information has been exchanged to avoid any further issues.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of the dog. Therefore should be held responsible for any lost wage due to injuries or excess cost that comes to the victims due to the actions of their animal.
- The owner of a dangerous dog who walks away cannot be held accountable.
- Most owners of little dogs that nip people or animals don't think it's a problem and flee. Those are the people you should be targeting
- The owner must be accountable.
- It should be done automatically, in any case.
- of course you should stay
- "It's common decency isn't it?"
- If the bite is minor (ie excited puppy jumping up On people or dogs wrestling and one gets nipped) then common sense has to apply."
- Everyone should not fear the outcome and right by any situation. Why should the victim pay for outcome if owner was not responsible for their animals actions.
- Both sides of story
- Owners must be responsible for their dog biting someone or another dog. They must be held accountable to provide needed information to law enforcement.
- Because you need to explain what happened, why that dog felt the need to bite. Was it protecting their owner, was the victim acting irresponsible and not respecting space boundaries.
- It's simply responsible, common decency
- I believe owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions.
- The owner knows the dog better than anybody.
- If an animal under their supervision harms someone or something, they need to be there to explain why they could not prevent it.

- The owner should be held responsible for their dog's actions and should be forced to pay any vet bills/damages
- Not staying at the scene leaves more time for the owner to have the problem dog in public again before an officer can follow up. If the owner leaves without giving info they should be charged for not remaining at the scene of a crime they could be responsible for, same as a car accident. They are responsible for their property including damage that property/dog has caused.
- If someone leaves after a dog bites someone or another animal it puts more strain on bylaw or police to find that person.
- The goal should be education and correction as well as the safety of all animals and people involved. If a dog bites you first have to make sure they dog has all his current shots and then also give the owner an opportunity and resources in order to correct the behaviour of the dog so that it doesn't happen again. Reactive dogs are not 'bad' dogs however they may need extra attention to make sure they don't get into trouble. Off leash parks are not for all dogs. Also people need to understand that just because your dog is friendly doesn't mean you can let them approach any dog they want to (if not in an off leash area). There are many responsible dog owners I know who have reactive dogs but keep them out of situations where they get into trouble (muzzles, away from other dogs and on leash).
- It would be consistent with the current rules involving motor vehicle accidents. Logically, both a dog bite or a fender bender would be the owner's responsibility to remain at the scene and exchange information.
- The owner needs to be responsible for his/her pet. Bad behavior is a lack of training on part of the owner. Owners need to be accountable for their pets, if the owner can't be accountable they should not be allowed to own an animal. We also should not single out the breed of the dog. I have never had a problem with pit bulls. Been attacked by a dachshund, and lunged at by a Yorkie terrier. I have had more problems with smaller dogs attacking. Also German Shepards are more viscous than pit bulls in my experience. Again it goes back to the owner training, and taking responsibility for their animals.
- Treated as Hit & Run if Owner dont remain at the dog bite scene.
- Other wise you may be unable to obtain info if they leave
- If you arrive to scene and only judge the animal then your training as a peace officer/ spca has failed you. Bad training and abuse from owners cause a dogs behaviour to swing. Example. You raise a child poorly and abuse them chances are they will follow suit and abuse others. Wasn't there fault but those who raised them. Understand the animal could also be scared.
- An owner should assume responsibility for the animal actions and be present until an officer arrives. The officer must hear both sides.
- For any and all breeds from chihuahua to great dane
- It should be treated similar to car accidents
- A dog bite can seriously harm a person! Leaving the scene of a crime is an offence, dogs can be weapon used and trained to harm people. We need more strict laws for dog owners, we live near a dog park and a playground and it's a free for all with dog owners. There are way too many irresponsible pet owners on this city. Please do not lessen the rules, increase them so people will follow them. It honestly seems like dog owners have far too many rights.

- If necessary, the owner should take responsibility, however this provides the opportunity for the owner to explain the dog's behaviour and situation that occurred to prevent unnecessary fines or euthanization.
- I believe they should stay and explain what happened. Its easier than trying to track down where the dog lives.
- Dog should be taken away and euthanized.
- The owner is responsible for their pet. Their side of the story is very important as what did the other person do to provoke the attack. It is not always the dogs fault but what a person does to provoke it.
- Owners should be responsible for the actions of their pet. They should have to provide their information.
- Of course - like remaining at the scene of an accident
- To explain what happend before the attack why , and see if it the dogs fault!
- If it's minor not necessary
- Share information just in case 3rd party needs more information, but not seize the dog
- They should stay be to take responsibility for their dog's actions and to ensure the victim is cared for.
- If there is a liability or insuance as discussed above then there is an importance be made on the owner to take responsibility and stay at the scene and follow the proper procedure
- A responsible dog owner takes responsibility for their dogs' behaviour.
- This goes for ANY DOG BIG OR SMALL. I have been bitten by small dogs several times and owners just say "their playing" and bolt away
- Yes
- I think they need to stay similar to if there was a car accident
- Dog owners must be held accountable for any aggression by their dogs.
- The owner should remain at the scene and discuss the situation and exchange information to hold the owner accountable for any injuries or loss of life be it human or animal
- Bit and run is no different from hit and run.
- Much like a car accident, a dog bite could become a bigger/more serious injury as time progresses. PTSD could also occur for the victim of the attack. Knowing dogs can be trained and are not always at fault, owners should know whats best for their dog to avoid the worst
- Just like a car accident
- It's like a car accident. Stay responsible and be present to take responsibility for your dog. It's not bad dogs it's bad owners.
- The person is responsible for their dog. I would suggest holding people criminally responsible for dog behavior.
- It's only ethical
- There are two sides to every story, and it's important that both sides are heard.

- You should take responsibility for you & your animals actions. If something bad happens don't run. But don't put you or your dog in the position to have triggers happen if there are any.
- Similar to a car accident, or in the case of a bite, the owner needs to be held liable for assault and battery.
- Yes as long as makes sense and doesn't put anyone at risk.
- Dogs that bite should NOT be allowed in parks & should have a muzzle at ALL times.
- If dog owners are responsible for the dog, then they bear responsibility for the attack. Fleeing the scene should be illegal.
- Owners should always stay at the scene so that both parties can have a say in what happened.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs behaviour.
- Dog ownership requires responsibility including owning any injury caused to another dog. Remaining at the scene is just the right thing to do.
- Its the equivalent to fleeing the scene of a car accident.
- Not requiring this would be the equivalent of a hit and run.
- Owner needs to be held accountable.
- I was the victim of a an unprovoked, vicious attack by a pit bull belonging to the girlfriend of a neighbor. The neighbor had agreed to keep the pit bull on his property, since the girlfriend could not control the dog. However, that dog as well as his own pit bull were free to roam the back alley, where I was attacked. Other neighbors cited instances of aggressive behavior by the same animal. In my case, Bylaw responded, but nothing was done. In my experience, those who chose to own this breed are themselves problematic individuals who are very unlikely to be responsible owners of such unpredictable, powerful animals. I should have hired a personal injury lawyer, but the guardian of the dog in question was a renter, and was unlikely to have home insurance. He was an unsavory character who also liked to plague the neighborhood by roaring up and down the street constantly on his noisy motorcycle. He moved away shortly after this incident. If Bylaw had been at all interested in properly dealing with this case, it would have been necessary to take immediate action.
- The owner is responsible for their dog. They are responsible for damages or injury caused by their dog.
- If a dog is involved in any physical altercation, ownership information should be shared with whomever when necessary.
- Same as car accidents. Leaving the scene of a crime/assault.
- If either parties require medical attention it is important that all information is given out in the event that there are medical bills.
- Of course the owner should deal directly with enforcement if their dog has attacked or injured someone. That is responsible pet ownership.
- Is it v the same as a MVA they need to provide contact information and a statement
- Dogs are getting out of hand. Many people are not responsible w their animals. Strict enforcement is the only solution.

- yes that way we know who is responsible and who is held accountable and if they leave the scene a large fine levied.
- They should be held accountable if the injury is serious.
- I feel it should depend on the severity and circumstances of the incident.
- I would expect anyone involved in any incident to give pertinent information and stay out until told otherwise.
- Yes, that's being a responsible pet owner. Leaving a dog bite incident is like leaving the scene of an accident.
- Dog owner is 100% responsible for the damages and should be held liable!!!
- They need to face the consequences of their dogs actions
- The owner is responsible, they should be assessed that they are treating the animal properly otherwise the animal probably wouldnt have attacked.
- Of course, as a pet owner you are responsible for their behavior and any consequences if they behave poorly.
- I think that should be happening without it being a law.
- Only when the victim has the intention of getting Bylaw officers involved.
- You need to be responsible for your dog but the situation should be looked at properly And all circumstances must be taken into consideration such as other persons actions towards a dog
- Dog owners must be responsible for their dogs, therefore they should give their information and cover any costs
- I agree that it's important to manage the current incident as well as future incidents
- This shouldn't even be a question - an attack of any sort you should remain with the victim to make sure they're okay and answer any questions
- Any dog owner involved in an incident should take responsibility
- Its important for owners to take responsibility and be accountable for the actions of their animal.
- NO BREED SPECIFIC LANGUAGE!!!
- Owners need to be held accountable for the action of there dogs, regardless of the breed. Training is essential and most important when thinking of getting a dog. They are WORK!
- I think it is appropriate to share contact information in case of need after assessment of bite. As well, discussion can be made at the time if either party feels the need to talk with an enforcement officer or if it can be avoided.
- Remain at seen and surrender offending dog immediately. Leaving the scene will result in huge fines and euthanized dog.
- How is this not already in place?
- Explain "yes"? Explain my advocacy of responsibility, accountability and citizenship? What's next; "Do you think hit & run is an acceptable way to deport one's self in Calgary?"
- Getting the facts at the time of the incident is ideal especially if it proceeds to court.
- It is essentially a hit-and-run but for dogs.
- Just like the scene of an accident, people should remain on scene to complete an investigation

- Those people must be held responsible for the damage of their dogs!
- Only makes sense.
- Common sense.
- It's not hard to explain that THE OWNER is responsible for their dog's behavior.
- It is only fair
- I think that would be fair
- Just like being struck by a car, an injury has occurred and you must remain until authorities attend.
- It is no different than any assault or motor vehicle incident.
- As in all "accidents" it is a felony to leave the site of the accident. Would this not be the same?
- The only danger is it can increase post event stress and lead to confrontation but there should definitely be recourse for the bitten party
- Yes, but difficult to enforce.
- It's the owners fault when a dog bites for the most part.
- But owner may not be aware of an incident. Must also place reasonable limits on how long they are required to wait for an enforcement officer to attend. If an enforcement officer is not available, should not mean that dog owner is off the hook, but just not penalized for not waiting around. Should penalize owner, not the current handler of dog (similar to photo radar doesn't penalize driver, only registered owner).
- too many people don't see a problem with "feisty" dogs not seeing that its never okay to put teeth on people and even less take responsibility for their dog's misbehavior
- Dogs sometimes bite because they've been provoked. I think gathering information on the incident is essential. Sometimes it's not the dogs fault, but the humans.
- Responsible per ownership
- This is a serious incident and should be attended to by an enforcement officer. It's an assault on an animal.
- Want to get both sides of the story and can't do that if the owner leaves the scene
- The owner should be held directly responsible for the damage their pet has caused.
- I believe that it is logical for an owner to remain at the scene of an incident and take responsibility for their dog's behaviour.
- Should be the same as any sort of altercation
- Too often they walk off
- how else will owner and dog be brought to justice?
- This should be the same as a minor/major car accident. Offender should suffer some kind of consequence for fleeing the scene.
- If both parties are okay with it... They can leave. If not, it is equivalent to a hit and run.
- The owner needs to take responsibility if there dog(of any size) bites,unless the dog was defending themselves or there owner
- If ANY breed attacks, yes, the owner better stay. I am also okay with euthanizing the animal too! But not to ban or muzzle them.

- Self explained
- People are responsible for their pets. If their dog bites someone or is behaving in a “nuisance” manner, then it should be determined if they are able to care & train their pet. Pets behave purely based on how well their owner trains them. Owners need to be held accountable, the dog should not be punished.
- If the dog and owner flee the scene what's the difference betwthat and a driver leaving the scene of an accident.
- The guilty dog owner should be held responsible for the attack.
- That is the MINIMUM that a dog owner should be required to do! A dog bite can be severe and is always traumatic - to allow ppl to leave the site of an attack is to send a message that such an attack is no big deal. Please protect everyone.
- I support this, but NOTHING that singles out pit bulls. They are not the problem, little dogs and big dogs can be a problem anyway. Not just a specific breed. I have owned many dogs and the pitbull was and still is the MOST BY FAR best behaved dog. Hands down. This is disgraceful that the city is even trying to do this to such an amazing breed. What will happen if the city goes forward with this and another dog attacks and tears a pitbull apart because it was muzzled and cant even defend itself? Punish all dogs/cats equally, not just one. Pull up facts and dont just assume. This city is by far my favorite place to live and this is causing me to seriously question why I even live here after seeing that this is even being entertained.
- Absolutely if they don't they should be fined
- Dog owners at all times are responsible for the behaviour of their dogs and must be held accountable.
- The owner should be held responsible and stay to provide contact information.
- Otherwise it's too hard to find owner
- Even though mistakes can happen, owners must hold themselves accountable.
- If police officers are present, owners are more likely to be truthful about their contact info etc.
- This is common sense, the dog owner is responsible for the incident and must remain at the scene.
- The owner is responsible for keeping the dog under control. The owner is also responsible for the dog's misbehaviour, including violence, and must be available to speak to officials.
- Any incident where there is a bite should be reported and enforced. All dogs and all owners are responsible for the actions taken in any shared space.
- Yes to take the proper steps to properly resolve the issue in the best interest of the owner and victim
- We need to be responsible for our dogs at the park and keep them under control.
- Common curiosity
- As long as it is safe for the owner and dog to remain on scene
- Like driving a car, if an accident occurred, find witnesses and keep the involved at the scene.
- I have seen many dog owners flee the scene with their dog after their dog has bitten another. In some instances, the owners of problem dogs have done this several times and have never been reprimanded. This is unacceptable.

- The owner of the dog who bites is responsible for that dog and should be required to stay at the scene and should be required financially for any costs associated with the dog bite. This expense should NOT be a cost of the owner of the victim dog. This seems like common sense.
- Humans needs to be responsible for their pets.
- Only if bite is severe and requires medical treatment
- The dog is their responsibility, and a dog attack should be seen as a crime. They shouldn't be able to flee.
- Owner MUST stay and be responsible or face additional charges/fines
- This answer does not need an explanation - it is a matter of common sense & responsibility. The biting dog should be automatically be euthanized!
- It's no different than a car accident in my opinion. You witnessed someone get hurt, you must remain on scene.
- Often people simply flee the scene when there has been an incident. If this was a law stating that people must exchange contact information and talk to enforcement then it would increase the penalty for simply fleeing
- If your dog harms a person or animal, remaining on scene seems appropriate to take responsibility for your animals actions. Leaving the scene seems like attempting to avoid responsibility
- Remaining at the scene is absolutely required for this type of offence.
- It is in my opinion the best way to get the whole story as to what happened and why if all involved parties are on scene.
- The owner needs to prove he can control his animal - if he's not there it's like a hit and run when driving - leaving the scene. Protect the victim not the dog or it's owner.
- It's appalling to think that a person can watch their animal in an incident and then walk away. Making it mandatory is a very good decision
- There needs to be accountability
- You have to do it for car accidents so its a fair call, *ONLY if applied to ALL BREEDS
- The owner should be held responsible.
- the owner should be required to give all contact information so that the victim can sue for damages, the owners can be fined and given bills for termination and sign over dangerous animal for termination
- since there's no box for comments on the pit bull section it's absurd that you're attempting to put in restrictions for a specific breed because of the "potential" for stronger bites. It's the exact same as if a muscular person stabs someone and the city decides that anyone that attends a gym isn't allowed to own knives and has to wear restricted gloves that don't allow them to hold onto anything when they leave the house. It's not the breed it's the owners and how they're raised. Don't punish good dogs with good owners!!
- This is a must. Jest common sensie and rugby thing to do.
- Seems no different than if you are in a car accident. You stay at the scene and provide required information as required.

- "I think it should be a given that the owner stays. My last dog was randomly bit/attacked by another dog. The owner stayed.
- In 2006, I lived downtown and my dog at the time was bit by a dog while walking near the other dog's house - that other dog was off-leash! The bylaw officer who attended said that I (yes, me) overreacted when it happened. My old dog (9 years old) was bit. Please train your staff. The officer was condescending and blamed me for what happened."
- I assumed that was already the case.
- This is required in a car accident, it should be the same.
- In the case I describe, the owner was drunk. There were 3 police cars, the last leaving at about 11:30 PM. The police came to the house, the victim left (after getting help from one of our neighbours), and the problem continues. It's not realistic to assume that people who mistreat animals, and who have pitbulls which are dangerous, are going to remain at the scene. I wonder why this isn't already a bylaw. I think it's a good idea but I doubt it's enforceable. Presumably, CPS and/or the City are monitoring this situation on my street, but if the owner refuses to pay the dangerous dog registration fee, I doubt there is anything to do besides wait until they are drunk again, and the dog gets out.
- All dog owners should be responsible for their animals actions and should remain in order to resolve the situation and take responsibility.
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog and needs to be prepared to accept appropriate penalties and ensure that the situation is corrected.
- Too many times, owners don't take responsibility for their dog's behaviour
- to take responsibility
- I think the owner of the dog should take responsibility but also bare witness to anything that could have triggered the dog.
- For any other type of accident, parties are to remain at the scene. It should be the same involving pet accidents.
- People have to be responsible
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets' actions
- accepting responsibility must be shown before a second incident occurs
- No need to run and hide
- To answer questions
- I am surprised that this isn't already a rule. That said, I'm not sure I would want the owner's dog to remain at the scene if it is still agitated so perhaps a requirement to report to law enforcement within a certain amount of time after the incident.
- If they don't they should be charge with leaving the scene and surrender their abusive animal to be put down
- Well why would you leave, you need to make sure everyone is ok.
- Yes I think this would be like any other offence. The dog owner must take responsibility.
- My dog has been chased after and bitten by other dogs, and in these instances, the owners have been quick to flee the scene.

- Dog bites should be treated like traffic accidents. Do not leave the scene.
- I think that this is a grey area. Should the other person require information/to talk to an enforcement officer then I guess yes it should be a requirement, but I wouldn't care if I got a bite because any true dog owner knows that it happens sometimes and it is what it is?
- Holds owner accountable for their pets actions
- It would ensure owners are held responsible and a record of a dog's behaviour to help ensure repeat offenders get the training and assistance needed.
- Absolutely yes, the owner must remain at the scene of the incident, and leaving the scene should be considered an offence and liable to fines or even criminal offense.
- Just as you're expected to remain at the scene of an accident you should be required to stay and explain and/or accept responsibility for causing harm.
- They need to be able to contact the owner for further information.
- A dog attacking a person or other animal is never the dogs fault it is the owners responsibility to properly train their dog to not do so as well they should have complete control over their dog if something were to happen it is the owners responsibility and they should have to pay for any bills such as vet bills that may occur from a bite
- The victim (assuming it is a person, or the owner of another animal) deserves to have the owner own up to the offense and the owner of the dog needs to be questioned on their at-home treatment of their dog and be informed of proper ways to prevent such dog behaviour in the future. The owner (at most times) is the one responsible. In the case that it was a freak accident and the owner was not responsible, actions must be taken by the owner to prevent such attacks. If the dog severely injures wildlife that should be protected, the same rules should apply.
- All parties should stay on scene and give both sides of the story.
- NO BREED SPECIFIC SEGREGATION. Targeting pitbulls is dangerous, ignorant and unlawful.
- Same as a vehicle accident
- PLEASE make this the law! Pit and runs are way too common in Calgary and elsewhere! I was stuck with a nearly 2,000 dollar bill after a pit and run last summer. My dog needed 25 stitches on her scalp. The pit bull ran across a street to attack her and the owner grabbed its leash and fled when I was still calling for help.
- Everything needs to be properly documented and tracked
- Clear responsibility
- They should remain so that the officer can document the incident with the owners name and details of dog (picture etc). The owner of the dog that bits someone/animal should be liable for costs if it clearly is the dogs fault ... ie someone wasn't teasing the dog or being aggressive, or hitting the dog ...
- In any other situation leaving the scene carries heavy penalties, like with car accidents. Dog attacks should be the same.
- If an animal bites me out of nowhere I get a allergic reaction I should have every right to sue that owner of that dog.
- You need to be accountable for your pet and it's actions

- It is important to obtain the necessary information (the dog's medical records, vaccinations, relevant medical history, etc.).
- Because there needs to be a record of that dog and there is no other way to know if the owner gave the correct information
- Be responsible! What if it was a car accident, same expectations!
- First hand information given at the scene by the dog owner seems like a good way to gather accurate information, as well as to hold owners accountable for their pets' actions.
- Treat it the same as a vehicle accident.
- as a dog owner you should take full responsibility for your pet and their behavior
- Yes but with restrictions. The dog owner only had to do that if they is damage.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs
- It's called being a responsible owner. However, certain dogs breeds will be targeted.
- This should be the state of the law already. If a person causes harm or loss to another person's property, that person is generally required to do this. Loss or harm to a pet should be the same.
- Owners need to be accountable for all veterinary costs if they attack another animal and attacks on a person or animal must be reported.
- I think all dog owners should be held accountable for the actions of their pet regardless of breed. Often both sides of the situation have a part to play in a bite scenario and should exchange information.
- If someone got into a car accident then have to stay, why would it be different if there was an accident with a Dog
- The incident could cause serious consequences. If the owner does not remain, then investigation becomes very difficult.
- Yes. Share the contact information but also explain the situation. Dogs attack usually in circumstances where they feel they are threatened. Or this falls on the training and discipline that should be in effect with people who own dogs.
- If a dog bites someone, they should take ownership of their failure to adequately socialize and train their animals. Hit and runs are illegal in a vehicle and they shouldn't be allowed with an animal.
- Owners be required to be financially responsible
- Just like remaining at the scene of an accident, information should be exchanged.
- To ensure the appropriate vaccinations of Biter is complete and to give opportunity for the dog that bites to offer compensation. Address And contact exchange is important
- Just like a "hit-n-run", there should be a high penalty if one leaves the scene of a crime they are a party of.
- It's like a car crash, whether there's long term damage or not you need to be accountable for the action.
- Owners are responsible for their pets, and their pet's actions and need to be accountable if the pet is at fault.
- This applies to ANY dog!

- If its a serious event absolutely. I think info has to be exchanged just like a car accident so if a person or animal requires attention or help the owner of the dog should be responsible to pay for it. Depending on the circumstances.
- It is what was done when a lab bit my pit bull at the off-leash park.
- The enforcement officer would be able to get a clearer picture of what may have happened. They would also get any info with regards to the dog's shots and health.
- This seems to be the only way that is fair to both parties.
- This is no different than any other "accident". If a vehicle owner were to not stay at the scene they would be charged with a hit and run. Same sentiment applies to dog bites.
- Owners are responsible for the training, handling and behaviour of their dogs. Too many times owners treat an attack as though they had no idea something could happen. Allowing owners to leave without talking to an enforcement officer is like a hit and run. Owners need to be held responsible for the improper training, and inadequate handling. If you know your dog is or has shown any signs of aggression to strangers or other dogs, then when walking their dogs need to be treated as though.
- This is like hit and run. If owners's dog bites a human the owner should be required by law to remain on the scene and share at least contact information. If owner departs from scene there should be very serious charges. This should be criminal.
- The owner needs to be there to explain the situation (if present) and to represent the dog. We also need to track owners and see if they have multiple dogs that need to be assessed.
- see the answer for 3. owners need to be accountable.
- Pit and run happened so often. Owners must be arrested and heavily fined if they flee the scene, and have their Pitbull immediately euthanized.
- If your pet bites another person, or animal you should by law by required to exchange information.
- Only if it draws blood. A nip shouldnt count.
- Owners should be held accountable for their pets behaviour and should be required to provide all relevant information when their pet causes an injury.
- It's like a car accident. It didn't mean to happen but it needs to be documented properly with both sides of the story being able to be heard.
- Owners need to be accountable for their dogs
- Both sides of the story need to be shared with the enforcement officer. The owner of the biting dog also needs to accept responsibility if their dog is proven at fault.
- Kind of obvious. We can't hit and run with our vehicle, and we shouldn't be allowed to attack and run with our pets
- Only if the dog owners cannot exchange or decide what to do themselves. Not every dog bite or skirmish requires municipal intervention. It requires dog owners to be more responsible and not take their untrained dogs in the public, or at least causes them to think about the consequences.
- For me it's the same as a car collision. Stay to provide information. But remove the dog from the scene (put in car, in house, etc).
- If a dog bites and causes serious injury, the dog should be destroyed.

- People need to be held accountable and responsible for their pets. Most of the time the animal's behavior is a result in an uneducated, cruel owner.
- It us an incident. Everyone should remain on site until reports are taken
- I support it but it is unenforceable. I think civilized individuals would exchange information just as they would in a car accident.
- I think it's important for the owners contact information to be shared with authorities in case, as an example, the person who was bit has to take time off work as the result of the bite, or an animal who was bit requires treatment. In this case, contact info (or a repost from an enforcement officer) would be beneficial in regards to having the owner pay for treatment/lost wages as the dog is their responsibility.
- The owner is responsible for the dogs behavior and actions. Therefore it is their responsibility to remain at the scene.
- People should be accountable for their dogs.
- It just makes sense, if a person has a car accident, all people need to be on scene, so why not the owners of a dog who bites? Owners need to be responsible for their dogs.
- If the dog bites another animal there is potential vet fees that should be paid by the owner of dog owner. So yes, they need to stick around. If the dog bites a person there is the potential for disease passed on from the dog. So again, yes the owner needs to be present in case the dog needs to be tested.
- They need to supply their recollection of the incident, just like a vehicle accident.
- This is an assault, therefore the owner must be present to accept responsibility.
- I adopted 2 dachshunds 4 years ago. My daughter took them out for a walk and the male dachshund was attacked and bitten on the chest by a boxer. The people who owned the boxer told my daughter that they would pay for all the medical expenses and when she called me at work, she was very traumatized. These people did pay but only when I said I was going to call enforcement officers. I believe that if they had and officer that went out to see them, they would have paid right away.
- They should be required to remain at the scene or face consequences .
- As long as all parties involved agree to it.
- It would be similar to a car accident. People should be leaving the scene.
- So they are able to be assessed and held accountable.
- Accountability for the dog owner, as well as pet.
- Too many irresponsible owners that know their animal is dangerous and put people and other animals at risk regardless so need to be accountable.
- Accountability expectations will enforce better training from the beginning
- Medical information needs to be obtained
- Of course yes
- To explain why their dog became aggressive. Is the dog a rescue? Did someone else hurt the dog? Is the owner of this pet abusive? If so, the officer has the right to take the dog away until owner is proven themselves that they are not abusive and has a solid reason on why the dog bit in the first place.

- To explain why their dog became aggressive. Is the dog a rescue? Did someone else hurt the dog? Is the owner of this pet abusive? If so, the officer has the right to take the dog away until owner is proven themselves that they are not abusive and has a solid reason on why the dog bit in the first place.
- It is important that dog owners are held accountable for the physical and emotional damage their aggressive dog may have inflicted, not only to compensate the victim, but to prevent future bites.
- I think that's only reasonable u have to wait for the police if u get in car accident .
- Depending on the severity of the bite. If your dog bites, you are responsible for that animal and should be contactable If medical attention is required.
- If it is a serious wound then yes of course. But the dog should not be taken away from the owner unless it is a reoccurring problem.
- The owner is accountable for all actions of its pet and should be held legally liable if not present at the incident to share contact information to the applicable authorities.
- It should be treated like a hit and run accident. I hear too many times of owners just grabbing their dog and leaving without ensuring the victim is okay and without exchanging information & contact info. You should have to provide picture id and correct contact info or be charged with an offence.
- The owner is responsible for the dog so has to remain on scene just like a car accident
- This way they can be held accountable for their dogs actions as well as ensure the other party is ok
- The owner should stay to help address the issue and ID the dog
- If a dog causes an incident, it is ultimately the responsibility of the owner. The owner should absolutely be exchanging information with the affected person/dog owner and enforcement officer.
- Accountability,
- Identification so victim can seek retribution and so fines/apprehension can be imposed
- Like any accident, it is responsible to share contact information.
- Owners should be held responsible if its their fault
- It allows for accountability as well as easier follow-up to the incident
- It's the right thing to do if it's bad enough. If there is no injuries, then no
- I feel the only time a dog owner cannot stay is due to not being present at the time of attack. I feel owners of dogs who attack, or have an "incident" should be fined HEAVILY and should have follow-ups with officers to ensure the dog is not being mistreated.
- That's what a responsible pet owner should be doing regardless of a bylaw
- Owners are to be accountable and should remain OR have a duty to provide factual information - like you would do in an accident.
- If a dog bites someone that dog should be put down.
- Need for owner to take responsibility
- The owner must be held accountable for the dog attack.
- Owner must take responsibility.

- That's the proper thing to do, if you crash into someone you're supposed to stay on scene otherwise it's a hit and run. Which equals more trouble that individual gets into. So it should be the same for animal owners.
- Too many times, the way to avoid taking responsibility for your dog is to run away and not be traceable. This has happened to me.
- It's no different than if you are in an accident with a vehicle. You should remain on scene.
- It's the right thing to do
- Too many people run off after an incident.
- It's generally the owners' issue not the dog. They need to be held accountable
- Yes if both parties agree? I have reservations about that
- Without contact information it makes it harder to find and report incidents, it would also give the opportunity for both parties and any witnesses to provide statements while the situation is still fresh.
- You are responsible for your dog
- Shouldn't it be like any other incident, where people should have to wait until the proper authorities come.
- It is being a responsible dog owner to do so!
- Should be treated like a car accident, insurance and contact information shared. If the dog has rabies or other diseases it should be traced.
- Owner must remain at scene so they cannot deny incident and so they realize full extent of injury
- If a person hits another vehicle with their car they must stay at the scene. If a dog bites another dog, the owner and dog must stay at the scene until the circumstances can be recorded by a neutral third party.
- It is no different than a car accident, there's an incident, details can be shared and responsibility determined. With the key understanding being it isn't always the larger dog that started the interaction, or it could be the human involved that it's the actions in motion for the bite.
- Because that person is responsible for their dog same as a motor vehicle accident.
- None of the rules would be enforced if the owners can legally walk away.
- Any incident causing harm, a person should remain at the scene. Would you leave a car accident scene?
- Information should be shared when incidents happen. Waiting for a bylaw officer for god knows how long with 2 dogs that have been in a fight is a beyond stupid idea.
- Being attacked by a dog is the owner's responsibility, they should be held accountable
- Dogs, in the past, have been abandoned by their owners when they attacked. That is not the acceptable behaviour of a responsible pet owner, That becomes a court issue not a tribunal issue.
- Seems reasonable that an owner should be required to provide their contact information if their dog bites someone
- If a dog bite occurs the owner must remain and take ownership for the event
- Just like a car accident

- The owner is responsible for the actions of the animal they have in their possession, therefore the owner should be present and accountable
- My wife was bitten by an out-of-control dog in Nose Hill Park, and it was very difficult getting any info from the owner, who was very defensive.
- Take responsibility for your pet's actions and work it out there. Look at facts to determine if the incident was provoked by the victim
- It's the responsibility of the owner to stay
- I'd wanna know if the dog was up to date on its rabies shots.
- You have to be responsible for your pet and any dog causing the death of another pet or serious injuries to a person should be euthanized
- Owner should be responsible for the actions of their dogs not the dogs
- As owners we are responsible for our animals. This includes when the animal acts in a threatening manner or has injured someone or another animal.
- That is common courtesy for both parties involved. Exception would be if emergency medical care is required by both dogs or people.
- All information needs to be collected at the time of the incident. Then all necessary information and details can be collected at that time.
- Right now owners walk away knowing that their animal could be taken away from them or fines assessed
- Yes just like anything else, if your animal hurts someone/an animal you should be held responsible
- Leaving is cowardly and avoids prosecution.
- Sometimes the dog runs away and the owner and dog cannot be found
- The pet owner is liable and needs to be responsible for their pet's action.
- Only to determine if care for veterinary or medical costs for the victim is required, and if tests for disease (has the dog in question had their vaccines etc). Not to punish the dog or human on the spot.
- No explanation necessary!!!!
- Dog owners must show respect and empathy in all dog bite cases regardless of how minor they are. Dog owners who leave the scene of an incident should have their dogs confiscated immediately.
- The owners need to be held responsible pay damages to the family.
- "This promotes accountability for your dog's actions.
- It also shows the integrity of the owner.
- It protects both the owner and the victim. If both are there to account or defend their story."
- People should always remain at the scene of an incident regardless of what has happened
- If a dog (any breed) bites another animal or person the owner is responsible to have this reported in case it is a repeated behaviour of that dog. Or a serious injury occurred and There are costs associated with the dog's behaviours
- It would be hard to enforce, but how else do you deal with bite and runs?
- Obviously if the owner leaves how can bylaw possibly find them

- Need to take accountability for dogs. However, efficient and timely use of an Enforcement officer appearing is also critical to success.
- Both sides can fairly be heard
- Accountability
- Owner takes responsibility for their dog and pays any costs incurred to bite.
- How is that not already a rule. You can't leave a auto collision if you're involved, how's this different.
- "Many owners of small dogs view small dog breed bites as humorous or "cute". As an individual that trains dogs, works with dogs, and handles dogs on a daily basis, it is my experience that small breed dogs may cause just as much damage as large dogs. Thus, I believe that if any dog owner does not stay at the scene and exchange information with the victim or victims animal they should be fined, and (or) their dog should be removed from their custody. Too many times have I or my dogs (all of which are large breeds) been bit by small dogs, and the owner gets off without any warning, and they allow those poor animal behaviours to continue. Yet, if my dog barks at another dog it is deemed "dangerous". These rules are one-sided and dictated by people who either have no experience to pet ownership, or are poor pet owners themselves.
- To arbitrarily discriminate against one specific breed of dog (and the fact that "pit bull breeds" were named specifically in this survey) is unbelievably uneducated and ignorant. In many places, breeds such as poodles, German Shepard's, and hound dogs are regarded as more dangerous. In the experiences of many pet trainers and dog care professionals, there is no ONE breed which should be the subject of bylaws. Rather, the city should enforce a mandatory program training owners, and should fine owners who lack the knowledge and ability to train their dogs.
- If you intend to make bylaws about which pets should and should not be kept, make it include dogs of ALL breeds. That way you can make bylaws that the citizens of Calgary can universally support - instead of pitting owners of different breeds against one another."
- This helps to hold the owner accountable and better track repeat offenders (both dogs and owners)
- accountability
- Do the dog can be identified for strikes against becoming a nuisance
- Owner of dog needs to take responsibility for its behaviour towards other dogs, cats and people.
- Just like a car accident, all parties involved must fill out a report
- Many pit bull owners run after an attack to avoid liability just like a hit and run in a vehicular accident and that is an additional charge.
- It is important to have on record and the dog is the responsibility of the owner and such the owner should pay for any damages.
- Tribunals are not always impartial. A dog owner needs to be held accountable and give out their information.
- Take responsibility for your pets and their actions
- It is impossible to track down a dog by bylaw control once they have left the scene
- Most dogs of any breed can b aggressive because their owners don't care
- I think it's important for owners to be there for each other if an incident happens
- Any accident, should be against the law to leave.

- Not sure what to explain to this. I agree with the statement.
- If a person is attacked by a dog and requires medical attention, it should be put on the owner of the perpetrating dog to pay the medical expenses or be charged for manslaughter if the victim dies.
- That would be the only thing that I would agree with. And a responsible owner of a pet would have no issue doing so anyway.
- That's common decency.
- Like an automobile incident. Stay on scene till authorities get there
- As above.
- I liken it to leaving the scene of an accident which you are involved in. Owners need to be held accountable, to often the animal pays the price for the owners poor training.
- They have interacted with the animal and they are responsible for the training and behaviour of their pet.
- I've been bitten which caused a longer term issue with hand pain. The dog and owner was dismissed. Next time I will seek legal support to sue the owner.
- So there is no confusion as to which animal was involved in the incident as often the victim is unable to recall details accurately especially if there is significant trauma!
- If the owner is required to remain it will be easier to manage any necessary action required rather than trying to locate them later. Unless there is an immediate danger in them staying there they should have to contact bylaw services and let them know what happened
- To get all facts from both parties involved.
- I think it's important to get each other's information in case of serious complications.
- I think they must stay until an officer comes or else there's no way of tracking them down.
- As it will show that you do are about what happen and that you take responsibility for you animal
- The problem is evenly between the owner and dog so someone has to look at the owner to see if they're the problem and prevent them from owning a dog in future.
- Every dog bite is unique in its details. Law enforcement should be aware of all details before automatically determining the dog is guilty.
- It's the owners responsibility to stay and give information and explain what had happened
- This assumes the owner is aware that a biting incident has occurred.
- It pretty evident that the owner by available to deal with the issue created by their dog!
- Dog owners are completely responsible for the actions of their dogs.
- The legislation should focus on responsible ownership, especially for anxious dogs or dogs declared a nuisance.
- It's like a car accident ! Information needs to be exchanged
- Owners should be held accountable and own up to what their dog did.
- I know of people who's dogs have been violently attacked by other dogs in a public dog park and the owner fled the seen with the dogs taking no accountability and showing no concern for the other dog. In a car accident fleeing the scene would be illegal and I think for something like a violent dog attack the same makes sense.

- Only if it is aggressive in nature and injury has occurred.
- Both sides of the story should be heard, otherwise there is too much room for speculation and one sided blame.
- You have to remain at the scene of an accident don't you? Only makes sense that you need to stay and give your information to a person who may have been injured by your dog or cat.
- I think it depends on the severity. A little nibble? I don't think so. But I think if there needs to be medical intervention, it's not a bad idea. I think it's important for whatever authority comes to be able to see both sides (if the dog was being teased etc).
- If your dog bites someone or another animal the owner and dog should be held responsible. That can only happen if the owner stays to answer to an enforcement officer. Too often owners leave the scene immediately after an incident.
- There's no explanation needed. The offending owner needs to be there to accept responsibility for the actions of their animal.
- Owners are ultimately responsible for the behaviour of their animals. Highlighting the responsibility and consequences associated with nuisance or dangerous incidents may increase the recognition of this duty
- Treat it like car accidents. If damage is severe then the parties should stay at the scene. If damage is not severe or both parties agree to go then both parties can leave.
- Owner of the dog should explain why the bite happened. Example is some dogs are on with adults but become skiddish with children. If the child walks up to a dog that doesn't like children and is told to stay away and ignores being told. Why would it be the dogs fault?
- How can u hold someone accountable if they run away after there dog attacks. Part of responsible pet ownership is staying if ure dog bites.
- owners should take ownership, accept their fine as well as financial responsibility for the other pet or person who was injured. The persons information needs to be recorded so follow up can happen
- No different than a hit and run. If there's an injury the dog owner needs to remain on scene.
- This seems prudent.
- The owner needs to be held accountable and this would enforce that.
- Only if requested by the bite victim or victim owner. It should be like vehicle collisions - people exchange contact information and only involve authorities if it's severe
- It's like getting in a car accident, you give your contact information so that you can help the other person.
- I think dog owners should be held accountable if their dog harms another animal or person
- With the caveat that the bits was not done during play. That actual blood is drawn. That the bite did not happened because the person that was bitten was not being an idiot.
- Some owners leave the scene immediately after a dog bite attack and in the case where the person whose dog is bitten is responsible for the full vet bill. Many instances result in the bitten dog being euthanised as the owner cannot afford vet bills. I support a rule to ensure that that owner needs to remain on scene to share contact and he/she should also be sharing all/part of the vet bill.

- You need more than the said victims statement. There are always 2 or 3 sides to an event. People see things differently during high stress situations.
- It seems like a good idea.
- Feel this would similar to fleeing a scene of accident? Also, the owner is responsible for the pet and just as a child requires a guardian to be present so should a pet.
- Both sides should be shared as to how it lead up to the incident
- Of course it should be necessary as they can give a first-hand explanation on what happened. Leaving would be equivalent to that of a hit and run.
- Owners run off and hide the vicious beasts so the law can't cease it.
- Accountability
- If a person injures someone else in a car accident, or does significant damage to a vehicle, they are required to stay at the scene. Why should an owner having a dog who causes injury to another person or animal be any different? Their information should be recorded in case their is another incident in the future or further action is needed against the owner, such as liability for any injury to a person.
- a person should stay like at any other accident...exchange info only to someone in charge and not the other person for safeties sake....car
- The owner is responsible. Not the breed of the dog.
- If there is any follow up information, the victim can do so. It should also be required for insurance and liability reasons similar to vehicle accidents. Also, the victim should have full access to the dog's veterinary records including immunizations.
- As the owner of a Staffordshire terrier I believe too often the blame is placed on my breed of dog due to stereotypes and lack of education. Often it is the other dog that is the instigator and lacks obedience
- To many times dog owners leave with their dogs and leave the bitten victim shocked and traumatized. There should be laws for owners who don't stay.
- There may be another side to the story that the owner can provide ie the person the dog but may have been abusing it or causing harm to it
- It's a no brainer. No different than divulging info at a car accident.
- The dog owner must take responsibility for their pet and their pets' actions and behavior
- No different than leaving the scene of a car accident, people should take ownership of their role in their dogs behavior as it is rarely the dog's natural instinct to attack humans.
- One of the only fair things that have been brought up in this.
- Similar to an a car accident, the owner should remain on scene to provide details.
- Responsible
- It is difficult to get this kind of information as you could be dealing with an urgent injury/trauma. Sometimes problem dogs are being walked by youths who just cannot manage dogs.
- If necessary, but I don't think there should be punished if the person bite was provoking the animal
- If the incident is in an official police report the owner can't lie about their identity or about the incident as well.

- Many times bites can be attributed to stupid decisions from other parties. Officers also need to be non biased towards certain breeds
- Having this rule would help incentivise people to stay of their dog bites another dog or person. Hoefully there would be increased fones or penalties for owners who do not stay
- Too many dog owner leave the scene of an attack because they don't want to be held liable - people caught doing so should be treated as an extra offence
- It's an accident so yes if deemed serious for law both owners should stay at the scene until a third party arrives
- Contact information is vital to find who to hold responsible.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dog's actions. There could be long term health And financial issues from the dog bite and the owner should be accountable.
- It is the owner who is responsible for there dog and responsible to ensure he is well trained. STOP always blaming the dog.
- Too many cases where there are dog attacks, the Perpetrator flees the scene with their dog or gives a false name or number. This should be illegal.
- It's the right and responsible thing to do. Sadly it has to be made law because people do not take responsibility.
- It is foolish to think a person responsible for an offence of any type to remain at a scene of any incident. Unfortunately a person who has a pet prone to an attack will not have an acceptable responsibility for accountability. If there is no reasonable accountability for the offender, there is no reasonable expectation for an offender to comply.
- only if it draws blood. Dogs play with each other by biting.
- This goes for all dogs. Ive been out on walks with my pitbull cross and had other peoples off leash dogs come up with out notice or once had an attack from a small dog and the owner came over laughing. This behavior is dangerous and puts everyone at risk if the larger breed dog doesn't want to put up with that at the time. My one pitbull handles different dogs great and never wants to fight or be aggressive so she would rather walk away. My other bully breed American bulldog mix needs slow introductions, but she is the biggest sweet heart with people and kids.
- Some people may not be following the law.
- Needs to take responsibility!
- Far too often after a bite owners take off and are often not held accountable because they vanish. There absolutely should be a law prohibiting people from leaving a bite same as prohibiting from leaving a traffic collision
- It does not mater the bread as a responsible pet owner you need to share imfo
- This is most fair to both the owner and the victim because each side can state their story.
- Bite and run is like hit and run
- I believe if an incident happens all parties are allowed to state their facts of the incident and witnesses should also be allowed to make a statement.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their dog's behaviour and be held accountable.
- An exchange of information perhaps

- So that the guilty party is held responsible and pays for any damage or vet costs.
- Most owners would run away so it's impossible to catch them.
- Bites need to be followed up on and dealt with accordingly.
- Leaving an accident is a crime, this is the same
- This is what responsible pet owners should do.
- If injury / puncture from the bite occurs and it is necessary.
- The animal is the owner's responsibility. Leaving an incident scene should be akin to leaving the scene of a vehicular accident.
- owners need to be responsible for their pet's actions
- Dog owners should also be accountable for their animals actions and never leave the scene of an incident
- The owner is responsible for the actions of the dog.
- And they should pay expenses associated with treatment for the other dog or human
- the same concept as a hit and run in a vehicle. you are responsible for your dog.
- It would just be part of being a responsible owner, and it is important to hear both sides of the story. You need to advocate for your dog
- They are responsible for their pet!
- It is necessary to know if the dog's medical history and to know if the dog has received necessary vaccinations.
- Drivers have to remain at the scene of an accident, why on earth would owners not have to remain at the scene of an incident in which their dog attacks someone?
- If the dog is a responsible owner, it is the right thing to do.
- A pit bull attacked my senior mom at a seniors home parking lot in calgary, the owners left her bleeding on the ground in the parking lot then she was taken by ambulance to a hosp with a concussion and severe facial lacerations.
- People need to take responsibility for their pets. Biting and running is the opposite of that.
- Really
- Absolutely. Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their dogs.
- Much like any crime, a thorough investigation of all parties involved should be performed.
- There needs to be follow up with people who are not properly able to handle or train their dogs to be in a public setting. Their information would be required for follow up
- Owner's should be held responsible for any attacks or damages made by their own dog.
- Due to injuries that could be sustained the owner should be held accountable
- Absolutely necessary that the owner owns up. A bad or misbehaving dog is the result of the owner.
- Makes sense to pass along your information for an accident scene
- The owner is ultimately responsible. It is like leaving the scene of an accident.
- It is like a hit and run unless they stay on site!
- "Only if the bite is significant.
- Nips causing no significant injury to be excluded."

- All dog breeds.
- Owner is responsible for any problem dog behaviours
- Owners need to take responsibility, big fines if you leave after a dog bite
- If vet costs occur, the attacking animals owner should be held responsible for vet costs.
- This is common sense, like not leaving the scene of an accident. Owners have been known to leave in an effort to escape fines and/or other repercussions, leaving the victim pet and owner with no recourse. Absolutely in favour...stupid question in my opinion. Sorry.
- if the neighbours are ok
- The dog owner must assume responsibility, share rabies vaccination information and talk to enforcement officer
- If they are not required to stay then the likelihood of trying to follow up with them is near impossible
- If a dog bites a person or other animal it would only make sense that there is a follow up investigation and therefore would require the owner to speak to an enforcement officer
- Like a car accident you should stay
- It would be fair and reasonable to have this rule.
- Yes. Otherwise, it should be deemed as leaving the scene of an accident
- People should be held responsible for the actions of their training and raising of their animal.
- They need to be held accountable
- Why would the owner of a biting dog even think to leave the scene, if not to avoid liability.
- A hard one, having had a dog that I took to an off-leash park... some dog owners are remarkably unaware of the conduct of their dog and after several warnings from other dogs sometimes that shitty[removed] dog gets wrestled to the ground... and oh my god the owner has a fit. Perhaps all witnesses should be mandated to stay on scene.
- This should have always been a requirement. I don't think making this a rule will change that many people's intentions. If a person is generally a responsible individual, they most likely would and will remain at the scene of an incident, regardless if it is a rule or not. Similarly, I don't think making a rule, so that people remain at the scene of an incident, is going to change a person's mind to stay there, if they weren't going to stay initially (without the institution of the rule).
- Good owner = good dogs
- Owners are responsible
- The dog owner is 100% responsible for a dog that bites and must be held accountable.
- Dogs should be able to defend themselves. We are.
- Need to take responsibility for the actions of their dog instead of running away
- No explanation needed; if a person owns an animal that bites someone they must be responsible for that animal's behaviour and stay with that animal at the scene of an incident, just like a traffic accident; failure to do so should result in heavy fines and could result in the animal being seized as well as the owner having a possible ban on owning animals in the future. Simply stated, people should be held responsible for their own (or their animal's) actions.
- Remaining shows responsibility and often will explain why the dog behaved in the manner

- Dog owners, in my experience, may even blame the other dog! or the dog's owner...strange. An owner must be held contactable.
- I imagine it must be hard to get accurate information from some people who would just rather flee the scene and not be held responsible. They should wait for some authority to assess the situation.
- Similar to a car accident.
- I believe if a serious bite happens or a person is bite the owners should remain there, however, this can be hard to determine what a "serious" bite may be from one person to another. This is also something that I would see being used as an omission of guilt. This is a very hard question and I'm certain can't be answered in a yes or no fashion. I'd also like to add that the Voluntary Early Dog Warning System is a great idea and should be widely adopted by owners.
- Any and all animal attacks (against animal or human) should be dealt with by all the parties involved
- Prohibit pit bulls!
- Dog behaviour is owner's responsibility.
- in the event that more injury occurs or there is any to start they should share info in case of payment for vet bills be needed.
- It should be like an accident scene.
- Of course the owner should stay at the scene. I would like to once again reiterate, however, that if any part of your bylaw is breed-specific (e.g., for "pit bull" breeds), then it needs to be reconsidered and rewritten so that it is not so.
- It has just injured someone, why shouldn't they stay.
- People are afraid to do so. No one wants their dog euthanized. Accidents happen. It's hard to choose and hard yes or no for this.
- They need to provide vaccination information and contact information for medical repayment. Also, there are usually 2 sides to every story.
- Identify the person so they can be held accountable
- Owners need to be accountable for the behaviour of the animals under their care
- There is virtually no way to enforce this and the victim will have to be rushed to the hospital. This is a poorly thought out idea.
- Only evidence must be used not one person's word against another. If a small dog bites a Rottweiler nothing may happen but when the Rottweiler retaliates it should be the instigator dog owner that is punished - not the Rottweiler for defending themselves
- Yes. They should be held responsible for their dogs actions.
- Common sense and decency
- Being a responsible pet owner requires that you take responsibility for all actions of your pet. Fines should be levied against owners who neglect to stay at the scene of the incident unless for reason of immediate danger.
- "many times , bites can be instigated by owners with small dogs who feel leasing is not needed for their small dogs and these dogs go up and bite the bigger ones nipping their jowls so both owners should stay and the whole explanation taken down by both owners

- many small dogs owners should have to be subject to the leash laws and fined when their dogs are off leash in leash areas
- Many small dog owners dont think laws apply to them , letting them bother bigger dogs or driving with them in their laps"
- I think its important to be a responsible pet owner
- All too often owners if dogs who bite ir injure people take off before their info can be gathered
- People need to be responsible for their actions and those of their pets.
- Owners should be held responsible for all dog bites or issues. They are responsible for training their dog and therefore responsible for its behaviour.
- This should always be mandatory.
- Owners should be held responsible for the actions of their dogs
- Yes for the OWNER to TAKE RESPONSIBILITY
- I agree that the dog owner needs to do the responsible thing and exchange info in this situation, I just don't want the animal taken away from the owner or in fear of being put down.
- Pet owners should be held accountable for the behaviors of their pets
- "If it's a dog playing then no.
- If it's aggressive then yes."
- It should be treated the same as if a traffic accident. Must not leave the scene or the owner can be charged with an offence. Unless there's an emergency to leave
- The dog owner is responsible for the incident that occurred and needs to give the proper information to all parties involved since legal action may be required
- The owner of the dog should be held responsible if their dog is out of control and causes injury to another person or animal
- Sometimes the dog that does the biting is doing it in self defence, or protecting an owner...
- Too many times have I seen in our community forum that the owner and dog flee with no repercussions
- There should be a criminal charge if they fail to stay at the scene.
- If an incident occurs. All parties and witness should remain at the scene to give a full story and provide all views and perspectives to the incident.
- The owner should be fined with an order to take dog obedience classes. The dog should be removed from the owner in some situations. The dog should be euthanized with a serious attack or bite.
- The owner is responsible
- How would you find the owner of the offending dog otherwise?
- I think a person should remain at the scene and make sure the other person is okay.
- The owner should be at fault and fined if they leave. It's all part of responsible dog ownership
- Responsible dog ownership.
- Reduce time for collecting information and reduce cost in obtaining the required information from both parties.

- Any responsible pet owner WOULD automatically stay at the scene.
- Pets are the responsibility of owners. The situation above describes an owner being responsible for their pet.
- Because there are a lot of liars claiming they got bit but won't show you the bite. An officer needs to view the bite and hear both sides of the incident right then and there.
- There seems to be little to no guidance on this issue. I have had dogs attack my own dogs and the owner is in no way obligated to stay and be held liable for their actions. Many perpetrators leave the scene as they know there are little to no consequences.
- There should be an opportunity to document all sides of the incident from the parties involved. Injured parties deserve assurance that it won't be able to happen again to someone else.
- Yes and the aggressive dog owner must pay any vet/medical bills for animal or human who was attacked.
- To minimize chances of another bite
- [removed] Not different than a car accident, both parties should remain whether it the Dogs/owners or victims fault.
- This would be the epitome of "responsible" ownership
- They are responsible for the dogs actions and need to remain at the scene
- How could this not be a law now? If they have a dog that is not social then the probability that it is up to date on shots is lower. Cost of vet care is their responsibility. This is truly a no brainer.
- The owner may be able to keep some control of the animal after the incident
- The owners should be held liable
- The owner is ALWAYS the one responsible. Not the animal. It's not a gun that is responsible for hurting someone its the person holding it.
- Surely no explanation is necessary for this. Runs off double the fine.
- The dogs aren't the problem. The owners are. That is why they should stay and take responsibility for the actions of their pet.
- In order for this to work, the penalties for "incidents" at a dog park (for example, aggressive behaviour) must not be so severe that the owner will fear an extreme punishment for their dog-- focus the consequences positively (i.e. obedience classes or consulting with a dog behaviourist rather than physical measures such as muzzles or disallowing the dog from going to an off-leash park)
- "just as with car accidents there are always 2 sides to a story.
- Both owner and person harmed should give statement in order to ensure that the animal had not been provoked or that there were not odd circumstances"
- As long as this doesn't lead to people facing charges for taking their animal home, say in a mutual incident, perhaps their animal or themselves are scared or injured.
- Normally it's the owner who's the problem not the animal
- Similar to a motor vehicle incident, dog owners should be required to remain at the scene
- Taking responsibility for their animal should be first priority as well as insuring the injured animal is cared for by the costs of the offenders pet.

- Ownership requires responsibility, and a small minority of dog owners are not responsible for their dogs actions.
- Why would it be different than a car accident in that way?
- It is the owners responsibility to properly train or muzzle their dog (any breed), or explain the situation to the proper authorities
- Both parties (the victim and the owner of the dog as well as the dog) should stay and exchange full information as well as give a detailed explanation to the officer present.
- As in any other incident potentially causing bodily harm or any sort of trauma all parties involved have the responsibility to report the incident. This protects all parties involved.
- "Yes, if there's no law to euthanize the dog.
- If there's laws that are going to reprimand the owner or the dog for being a pitbull or euthanizing the dog for minor bites (or provoked bites) The owner should be allowed to leave the scene."
- Nothing to explain.. they should stick around and not run off
- Both parties should provide any necessary information.
- The ability to leave the scene of the incident disempowers the person or animal who was bitten from an investigation or a fair review process, if this is desired by the victim.
- It is responsible pet ownership. Similar to remaining at the scene of an accident
- This could be required if the victim/guardian of a victim or owner of an animal victim wants to file a report.
- A dog bite might require additional costs to treat the animal or person who was bitten. The dog owner should be responsible for covering these costs.
- Depending on the situation, I have people let their children run up to my pets, I speak please do not. The parents always say its okay, they do not listen. I have wonderful pets, just do not want people running up and scaring them. I always stand in front of my pets and advise them no, unless I say it is okay. The parents then start using vulgar language, saying I am being mean. Where are my rights to say, I said please do not unless, I say let me let them sit and you can now approach. So, put yourself in that situation. I have no problem, with that.
- I would hope this would give victims more power to hold the attacker accountable and request they stay.
- The owner needs to be held responsible if a dog attacks another dog/person. It isn't the dogs fault, no dog is inherently bad, just poorly trained and cared for.
- People should take responsibility for the actions of their dog.
- Any incident needs the involved to share information, should be similar to vehicles incidents etc.
- n/a
- Yes. Treat it like a car accident.
- As a frequent user of Calgary dog parks (primarily Sue Higgins), i have seen and heard too many stories about irresponsible owners attempting to flee the dog park after their dog has been involved in an incident. While a law may not keep people from attempting to flee and avoid their responsibility as a pet owner, there should be consequences for those that attempt to flee.

- An owner should always be held responsible and ensure the other dog and owner are alright, safe, and cared for. Accidents happen, sometimes dogs just don't like each others scent. Both parties should be in agreement with what happens next, but it has to be humane.
 - They need to be aware and take responsibility.
 - it is important for the owner of the animal to be responsible. They should remain at the scene to provide their contact info and inform if there have been other incidents in the past or if there was a trigger for the dog to bite
 - owners should be held accountable for their dog and should provide necessary information should their dog bite someone or another animal
 - Yes absolutely the owner should remain at the scene and BOTH parties should share contact information along with any witnesses
 - You can't cause a car accident and leave, why should dogs and their owners that attack get to just walk away as if nothing happened?
 - Owners should be responsible for their pets 100% of the time.
 - All dog owners not just pit bull style dogs so owner's of dog who bit or instigated I'd held accountable
 - Law enforcement do not have time to waste tracking down unknown owners. It is the dog owner's duty to stay and take responsibility just as it is a driver's duty in the event of an accident.
 - "Any time an enforcement officer is called, both parties should be required to remain at the scene.
- NOTE: sometimes incidents seem minor and a separate third party phones the authorities or the owner of the dog that was attacked phones after the fact....if the attacking dog's owner isn't aware that a call has or will be made, I don't feel they should be able to be punished should they leave the scene."
 - People need to be responsible for their pets.
 - If a dog bites another person or animal it is more than reasonable to have the owner of the dog stay at the scene to provide information. That way the person/dog that was bitten has the information in case of any potential cost to them (vet bills, medication, etc.) Also then the owner and dog are on record so if the incident occurs again there can be a resolution whether it be obedience classes, not being allowed at off leash parks, and so on.
 - It makes sense the same as staying at the scene of an accident. But the bite couldn't just be a nip. Also I'm uncertain because then are they not having the dog with them who has already been riled up waiting too. It might be better for them to provide contact info and meet to discuss later.
 - Should always involve an enforcement officer. Would like to see larger off leash areas patrolled more regularly.
 - Dog attacks can be terrible and often leave there victims with ptsd if a dog attacks and bites another dog or person then by law they should have to remain on scene to deal with all repercussions. It should be treated similar to leaving the scene of a accident and if the owners leave they should also incur penalties.

- Dog owners should always be responsible for their dogs
- This only seems reasonable. If you own a dog and are responsible this would form part of being responsible. Dah!
- The dog owner should be liable for any cost incurred by the victim or animal that was bitten
- I don't know how you would enforce this, but of COURSE the owner should be made to take responsibility for their dog's behaviour.
- Owner needs to take responsibility
- Dog owner should carry dog insurance all time whenever leave the house for a walk with a dog. Owner should share insurance documents and his full details by physically showing documents to whoever demands.
- I would say doing otherwise can be similar to a hit and run. It is the owner's responsibility for their dog and their dog's actions. That includes if the dog bites someone, to be a responsible owner and ensure that it is handled correctly UNLESS the victim insists that they are fine and police/EMS are not involved.
- Aggressive dogs of any kind are aggressive because that's how they are treated by their owner. So if a dog bites a person it should fall on the owner
- This will help determine both sides of the story and ensure that dangerous dogs do not continue to harm others (repetitive behaviour)
- Accountability
- It is important to get the dog owner's information. Too many times they flee the scene
- Accountability. Often dangerous dog owners are dangerous people and the victims are often intimidated not to report. And then have huge vet or medical bills or disfigurement. They have a right to sue.
- "1. It's like in a car accident. the owner must stay at the scene to talk to the police.
- This rule will deter the dog owner. He/she must always be responsible for what his/her pet does."
- The owner is the responsible party.
- This is important for both accountability and to hear the other side of the story.
- To complete a thorough investigation it will be required.
- This would force the owner to accept responsibility, or alternatively, share their side of the story.
- The owner should be questioned as to why the dog bit the other person. Is it being abused at home? Was the person not welcome to pet the dog? Was the person being aggressive or not being friendly towards the dog?
- Like a car accident, you or your property causes damage or injury you're responsible for it
- The animal's medical history is needed for proper treatment for possible infections. The owner is responsible for the animal and needs to take responsibility.
- Owner is liable and should then be forced to send the dog to obedience class within a certain amount of time from the date of the incident.
- Only in instances that cause bleeding.

- ANY type of dog can bite or become aggressive, ALL dog owners should be responsible for their dog's behaviour. If something does happen, the responsible thing to do is speak to enforcement officers if need be.
- Why would they be allowed to flee the scene? This seems redundant, unless there truly is no law in place to prevent someone from doing this.
- It should be no difference than if you were in a car accident. The only exception would be if the animal is in a state of extreme aggression and for the safety of everyone needs to be removed or secured. However in this case the owner should call the responding bylaw officer and provide all appropriate information before leaving the scene. In cases when the owner is securing the animal in a location 5 minutes or less from the scene of the attack, they should return to the scene once the animal is secured to speak directly with the officer.
- It is absolutely the responsibility of the owner to ensure he is responsible for any issues, just as it would be at the scene of a car accident.
- The owners should be held more accountable in situations where their dog has become aggressive towards other dogs or individuals.
- Good owner responsibility
- I feel that dog owners must be responsible for their animals and this type of incident is no different then leaving the site of a car accident
- I was bitten by a dog and the owner ran. he should be charged with criminal offense attempted murder
- accountability
- Owner should stay to give his or her side of the story.
- This should fall under the responsible owner act.. regardless of the which dog started it
- With a witness as well, to help keep owners responsible and help pay for vet bills.
- otherwise you would never see that person again possibly
- All circumstances are different. Bites can be provoked or unprovoked. An animal that is kicked, hit, beaten, etc is likely to defend itself. It is not always the animal that is in the wrong.
- The owner can share some of the responsibilities of what their dog did.
- An owner should stay and leave contact info in instances where their dog attacks a human.
- It should be treated like a car accident resulting in injury. Everyone stays on scene until the police can arrive. In the case the offering pupper is too excited/not able to be brought under control, the owner should remove the dog to a safe location and return to the scene.
- Sometimes a dog who just bit needs to be removed from the scene but like a car accident driver (dog owner/guardian at the time of incident) can't leave the scene without proof of ID and location for bylaw to follow up with that day
- Reduces investigation time and expense
- Their responsibility
- This is just common sense and a responsible pet owner
- Biting and run is not ok.

- It should be like a car accident, you remain at the scene until it's been dealt with. There are some dogs that are inherently more violent, but I believe it all comes down to their training. If an owner has taken the time to train their dog (no matter what the breed), then there should be no problem. If any dog, no matter what breed, thinks it's ok to attack a dog or other human, the onus is on the owner as being responsible for their training and response to various triggers.
- This extremely serious. Police should be notified too in case of human bite.
- To make sure the bylaw officer gets all the dogs information and the owner. They will be reprimanded accordingly and not flee.
- Dog owners need to stay at scene and take responsibility or face forfeiture of animal.
- This makes sense. Owners should not be able to run away if their animal does something wrong.
- The owners should be given considerable fines if their dog bites
- If their dog does all the damage they can cause serious injury/death and can cost a substantial amount. Unless at dog park you take responsibility for your own pet unless that pet is a danger/nuisance dog
- The owner should always be held responsible for the actions of any animal, no matter the breed.
- Damage done to property/individuals, similar to car collisions, there needs to be statements taken regarding the situation.
- All dog owners should be accountable for their actions and those of their pets. Responsible pet ownership extends to all pet owners, of any breed or animal type.
- A "Bite and Run" should have consequences, same as a "Hit and Run" in a vehicle.
- I believe that the responsibility is on the pet owner to manage their dog, and especially an aggressive dog such as the pit bull. They need to stay and provide their information.
- It would be similar to a hit and run in automotive vehicles as there has been damage done and the individual needs to be held accountable for those actions.
- My dogs have been bitten while at City off-leash parks and each time the owner has run. It's lousy. Not sure how this could be enforced, though.
- How else are we to know that it was the dogs fault. Possibly the person bit was harassing the dog.
- Too many instances of dogs attacking and owners leaving scene and not facing penalty. A fine might reduce this.
- Self explanatory
- So many people run off after a dog bite, and it turns out there are vet bills that need to be paid or other things to be taken care of. After a bite, dogs should also be figured out on what the cause was, whether aggression or otherwise.
- the dog is the owner's responsibility.
- As a dog owner, I need to be responsible for its behaviour.
- Legal reasons if the dog has bit a child or another animal they should be held accountable for the actions of their pet. You don't leave the scene of a serious car accident.
- The owner can leave and may not know where they live. Charges must be laid
- Owners are responsible for their pets.

- If your pet is responsible for an injury you must take responsibility.
- I believe that both parties should be able to share their sides of the story... not just one.
- It should be similar to a vehicle incident where it is required of you to stay at the scene.
- This shouldn't even be a question. Of course the owner needs to stick around - it's part of responsible ownership.
- Take responsibility for the dog!
- The owner should be held responsible for their animal's actions, not the animal itself
- Hold the owner accountable STOP BREED SPECIFIC BANS THEY DON'T WORK!!!!
- My nephew was bit by a dog and the owner brushed it off as her dog isn't good around people and provided no info to my sister in law. I feel as a pet owner you need to own the actions of your pet
- If we are required to do that in a vehicle accident, we should also be required to stay in a dog attack/injury.
- Like a hit and run, any incident regarding a person or animal should be held accountable.
- Ban pit bulls
- They should remain at or near the scene unless they can produce valid photo ID and location they are going to diffuse potentially bad situations from getting worse
- That's a no-brainer.
- Stay at the scene
- The dog owner is the owner of the dog there shouldn't be any question about it. He/she paid for the dog and cares about the dog.
- No different than a car accident. All people involved must stay.
- If they do not we may never find the owner or dog again leading to more issues down the road. Or a nuisance dog and owner avoiding consequences.
- The dog owner is solely responsible for the incident and the owner took that responsibility as soon as they took ownership of the dog. It's like owning a car and hitting other cars.
- Liability.
- As long as it is safe to do so, the owner must remain at the scene while everything is handled.
- No need for an exclamation. If your dog bites somebody or another animal, you damn well better stick around and provide information. What if the dog is sick or rabid or whatever? I would think most people would like that information. Sort of like a hit and run. You simply do not leave the scene!
- People need to know information about the animal that bit them
- We are required to stay at the scene of an accident and this is no different. If someone is injured, I believe a witness should stay.
- Common sense!
- The owner is responsible for the dog and therefore can be held accountable for the dog's actions (depending on attack)
- I believe that staying at the scene is common sense. If they flee, once identified, they must pay a fine on top of any fines that they get issued for the attack.
- Just like if you get into a car accident you shouldn't leave

- Dog owners are responsible for their pets. Regardless of what kind of dog they are. "Bully Breeds" should not be singled out in this. I've seen little dogs act far more aggressive than large dogs.
- Most owners of small breed dogs do not take the actions of their dogs actions seriously when they have bitten another person or animal
- People need to be held responsible for their pets actions
- This is no different than any other attack. However - it may be necessary to have provisions that ensure the dog in question is placed safely at a distance or otherwise contained. On paths or in parks, this may mean taking the dog to a safe place or a vehicle, or possibly even back to a nearby house and should be permitted.
- To help mitigate a helpful solution: what happened/share in vet costs/ticketing if necessary
- Keeping the dog owner there means less work for law enforcement to go out and find the owner and prevent another attack.
- If there is no severe penalty for leaving the scene they may never be found
- It's common sense
- The owner should be responsible for their pets. If they cannot handle them then they should not have them. They should be fined to the maximum. They should be on scene so their information is collected to fines can be enforced.
- I'm shocked to learn this rule doesn't already exist! Of course it's necessary, otherwise how can anyone be held accountable for their let's actions?? It's certainly not the animal's fault that the owner is incompetent to follow pet ownership requirements.
- If the dog does not need to be isolated before it escalates a situation.
- I see this as a similar situation to a car accident. Remain on scene and exchange information.. call enforcement if the situation requires it.
- No matter the breed, it is still a legal incident. Both owners should be required to stay.
- Being an employee of the Government of Alberta I can tell you the Court of Queen's Bench has a back log as well. I do not see this speeding anything else up, and having more hands dealing with the same case will take longer.
- Yes. Is this not already a fine? Seems like this would be the minimum requirement for a responsible pet owner.
- There may be exceptions if the dog owner has to assist the injured party.
- Taking responsibility for your pets behavior is the bare minimum that should be required of any responsible pet owner.
- they can explain what happened and see if the dog was provoked
- As long as the individual can place their animal in a vehicle or away to not cause further harm they should stay and be present to talk to authorities
- Do you walk away at a car accident? NO so why let owners walk away from a dog bite?
- Accountability
- If a dog bites, the owner should be held accountable, other than in cases that the animal was clearly provided, abused, or neglected.

- because that owner has failed their responsibility to train their animal OR the owner warned the victim that the dog prefers it's space and the victim did not listen. Either way there needs to be some sort of corrective action to resuce further incidents
- It makes sense and will make the process of fines and punishments for said dog behaviour go over smoother
- Dog bites are serious and the owner should be held to account and not just leave after the incident
- Yea
- Responsible pet owners already do this.
- The dog bite is the responsibility of the owner. Any dog has the potential to bite
- It's like a hit & run accident. The owner is responsible & should remain at the scene of a bite.
- You must take responsibility for your own animals
- The owner knows the fog and its behaviour and can better explain the whybir how it happened.
- Most dog owners which are involved in this situations tend to leave the scene before authorities arrive
- This is common sense and decency.
- If they leave victim has no recourse.
- Owners of aggressive dogs should bear full responsibility for any injuries caused by their dog and should be heavily penalized and have a compulsory liability insurance after the first attack.
- If the bite was so severe that medical conditions were needed
- Owners should be held accountable. Officers need to hear both sides. Were there any circumstances that led to the bite? Was it unprovoked? Etc etc
- Just for the purpose of proper communication and no loose ends at the end of investigation !!
- If they leave the scene... it should be considered similar to a vehicle Hit and Run and a Criminal Offense.
- Owners should be accountable for things that happen, officers that respond should have a background in animals behaviour to recognize the difference between provoked/unprovoked attacks, this would be oppportunity to assess owners knowledge of dogs/their dog behaviour.
- It is important, why wouldn't one stay. I would feel horrible if my dog bite someone or something.
- Owner of dog that bit should take responsibility for bite. Should offer assistance, should stay to give information.
- Well trained dogs should t be biting other people or animals. The owner is accountable and therefore should remain at the scene. Also, the owner should also be under review when incidents occur.
- the criteria for 'incident' would have to be clearly defined as many consider a loud dog scuffle to be an 'attack' (it isn't). So, with clear outline of what constitutes an 'incident' (blood?), I agree that both parties need to remain on site. Charges should be laid if an owner flees with their dog.
- I'm sure it's already a rule that you can't injure a person then flee to avoid accountability.
- Ensures responsibility
- Yes, and if the owner does leave the scene of the incident they should face the same penalties as a hit and run.

- The owner has to be accountable for the dogs action.
- Yes is common sense, isn't it?
- I think you have to determine severity of an incident. A bite needs to be defined. So “drew blood and/or punctured skin”. Dogs will correct each other and that is not aggressive behaviour so it needs to be defined.
- Should be treated the same as a car accident.
- The owner should be given the option to explain their side of what happens.
- If a person is bite by ANY breed of dog it should be the owners responsibility to be there and make a statement. I think it is outrageous that we are profiling a breed of dog based off of there strength! I have encountered more vicious and aggressive breeds outside of “pitbull” breeds. We should be looking at repetitive offenders, not by the breed of dog!! I know multiple “Pitbull” breed owners that have trained their dogs way better then smaller breed dogs. We are basically breed profiling which is NOT acceptable!
- Some cases require medical intervention both human and animal. Offending party should be the one to cover costs, especially if not first time offence. Having enforcement there would help hold the offending party accountable. Also, I believe it's important to procure witnesses of the incident, especially if there may be severe recourse placed on the animal. Many people are breed bias, protective of of own animal, may have caused the offending dog to lash out. Many factors play into the reason why a dog may retaliate, and having people present would help provide the appropriate action to be taken.
- Absolutely the owner has a responsibility to the victim, including paying any necessary veterinary (if victim is an animal) or medical (person) expenses. This should be a law.
- Owners should stay at the scene to take full responsibility on their own animal.
- Nice idea, but irresponsible dog owners won't stay.
- Depends on the situation, for example if two dogs fought. In some cases an enforcement officer may not need to be involved.
- How else will one get to the bottom of this horrid situation along with, (if any) witnesses.
- "It is the owners responsibility to remain at the scene. No different than a traffic incident.
- If the owner leaves they should receive a fine."
- It's basic human responsibility. It's my dog, and therefore my responsibility.
- I have been but by small dogs who do not cause much injury but there seems to be little focus on smaller aggressive breeds (like jack Russells). The issue is the owners lack of care and training and it is not the dogs fault. Because damage is less for smaller dogs, they do not get tagged as nuisance which is inappropriate.
- It is the responsible thing to, no different from any other accident.
- If a dog bites another animal or person at the fault of the dog (e.g the other animal or human couldn't have been causing it by annoying the dog or not listening to the owner) the owner should be responsible for the vet or healthcare bills
- These bylaws are only enforceable if it is possible to accurately report the owner/dog.
- MUST be for bites on BOTH people and other animals

- Owners of aggressive dogs should be treated in a similar fashion as people with weapons
- It's just the responsible thing to do. Like in a car accident. Leave your information, if you need to remove your animal from the situation be honourable.
- It is similar to staying at the scene of an accident - responsible pet guardianship
- Of course they should stay until the matter is resolved on either side; no matter what the breed! Breed specific legislation is cruel and unfounded. "A dog that has the appearance or physical characteristics SIMILAR to those in clauses etc" is too broad a term and banning these dogs from parks and forcing them to be muzzled will only unnecessarily cause them trauma and to lack socialization; which is ironic since you claim to want to spare them of that.
- absolutely but a dog that has exhibited aggressive behaviour needs to be restrained. If the owner is incapable of doing this onsite ie other dogs aggravating a large dog, they identify themselves to the injured before leaving to remove the dog from the situation.
- The owner is responsible for the damages that the dog does... How else does the public get the owners information to seek damages ..
- It should be applicable for y size of dog. As well as if a dog bites another dog
- Yes, as sometimes the dog bite was provoked this gives both parties an opportunity to explain what happened to give the dog a fair opportunity for decision
- Like a car collision, there is damage to someone's Elsa property of self and the at fault party should be ticketed /ggned for leaving the scene.
- It is the pet owners responsibility to pay for any damages committed by their pet.
- Sometimes it's important to get both sides. If a child was repeatedly told not to approach a dog by the owner or parent, even if the dog isn't generally a nuisance, the dog can get mad and injur the child. This is not the dogs fault. The nuisance may not be the one that attacked, but the one who provoked.
- Of coarse a dog owner should remain at the scene, if his or her dog has bitten or attacked another dog or person!!!!
- Only if it can help clarify circumstances of the bite and doesn't automatically leads to killing the dog that bite.
- I'm uncertain about this rule. It's very possible that after a dog bite (even a minor one) the dog owner may begin to be threatened or someone may try to attack their dog. I think in this instance it is perfectly okay to leave as long as they ring and notify authorities.
- Responsibility responsibility responsibility
- Just like a motor vehicle accident; if someone (person or dog) is bitten by another dog (any breed, and size), the owner of the biter must share their contact information with victim. It's pretty simple.
- It is a great way to keep track of the dog.
- they should be able to share there side of the story. and also if something were to happen to the dog or person someone should be able to get in contact with the owner of the dog that has caused the problem incident, no matter the breed.
- accountability is important.

- it's often the owner and their handling of the dog that causes the problem, so this might help the owner with taking some responsibility, and the chance for education
- The owner is responsible for their pet behaviour and therefore should be required to stay on site if a situation like a bite or attack takes place
- People that own dogs that are more prone to biting or nipping are usually in denial about their pet being dangerous. Unfortunately, police are needed to keep people safe even when it comes to pets. People have not demonstrated that they can police themselves well enough to take that responsibility on.
- As long As the dogs not taken from a concerned and responsible Owner.
- Yes, I have other owners bite my dog and leave without giving me any information.
- Owners are responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- This is a no brainer! Pet owners need to be held accountable
- Leaving is equivalent to a hit and run.
- Otherwise, it is no different than fleeing from the scene of a crime
- People need to be more accountable for their dogs actions. Often it is how the animal is raised not the actual breed. People need to be fined and be accountable to vet or health bills, should not be all on the animal.
- It is important for pet owners to take accountability for their animals and be responsible if something occurs
- If the victim is legitimately injured the dog owner should provide their contact information, or if the victim believes they are giving false information, should be required to remain at the scene until an officer arrives to collect the necessary information.
- Just good karma
- Like any incident in which a person is injured, all parties should remain at the scene until enforcement can sort things out. The only reason a person should leave the scene is if it is imperative that they get their do to a vet for life saving procedures
- responsibility of the dog owner to take care of the consequences of their pets actions. I was bite in an off leash park last year, the owner of the offending dog dissappeared and I had no idea whether the dog was properly vaccinated which when dealing with rabies / tetanus shots after the fact made decisions by health professionals more difficult
- You cannot just walk away from a car accident, so you shouldn't be allowed to walk away from another situation in which your property has caused injury such as a dog bite.
- I believe that like a car incident that person should have to pay for any medical attention.
- Owners are responsible for all their dogs actions and should be held accountable.
- People need to be responsible for dogs actions.
- Yes as it shows responsible pet ownership
- You don't leave a car crash.It is the pet owners ultimate responsibility
- I believe that if you are a pet owner it is a responsibility to follow all rules. and so many people I see when I am out walking do not even use a leash, they just carry it. My small dog was jumped on by a dog who was able to scare my dog who was wrapped around my leg, she is 7 pounds and this one was at least 6 times the size and weight. I was using a cane and trying to pick my dog up and fortunately, I was the one with the injury trying to pick my dog up. It was probably a one off and my injury healed, but this is not always going to be the case. If my dog did that, my job is to follow through to ensure that there was no injury and that should be the case with anyone who has a pet.

- Self explained in the question as an accident has occurred the person should remain at the scene as they are responsible for any damages that his/her animal has caused
- Dogs just don't bite for no reason. Often they are scared by something, like someone running at them or someone who swings something at them. A dog showing to be aggressive is usually caused by the mishandling and training by the owner or just plain old treat their dog mean so they are mean. Any breed can be a good happy dog if treated with kindness, care and proper handling and basic training. Not all dogs are good people lap dogs but that does not make them dangerous if they belong to the right owner who cares
- I got bites by a chocolate Retriever and the owner walk away. That dog attacked my bully who never moved cause she was very well trained
- it is like any other accident. If you hit someone you are expected to remain at the scene. Unless it is too dangerous then an immediate call into report it must be done.
- The owner of a dog is responsible for the actions of the dog and consequences thereof. Thus, the owner should be held to the same standards as a person committing an assault or similar offense.
- This allows both parties to be heard, people to feel safer and addresses the situation instead of blaming a specific breed. It also encourages responsible pet ownership since small dogs can and often do bite and while the 'damage' may not be as bad those owners should still have responsibility to train their pets.
- People should have to stay. It should be like leaving the scene of an accident
- we have been in instances where my dogs have been bit or attacked and the owner fled.
- The owner is responsible and should be held accountable for the actions of their dog big or small. I have personally been bitten by small dogs and have had my personal dog attacked by small dogs. Owners have a responsibility to ensure the best life for their dogs.
- It's a responsibility issue, any damages should be addressed and the victim(s) should be compensated for losses caused ie damaged clothes, vet bills.
- I think it should be treated like a car accident. If a dog bites it is up to the people on site to determine the severity of the bite and call officers if necessary.
- The enforcement officer would have an opportunity to talk to the owner at the time of the incident (not five days later when they've had time to alter the narrative to their own benefit) to collect additional information about the incident, communicate the seriousness of the offence to that person and the applicable next steps, explain the interim order or conditions if applicable to the owner, and assess whether that person is likely to comply with any conditions. If it appears to the enforcement officer that the owner will not comply, the officer should be given the authority to take possession of the animal immediately. The victim would get contact information to support a potential lawsuit against the owner if deemed necessary. This would reinforce the seriousness of the situation to owners of nuisance dogs if they could be open to a potentially expensive lawsuit. The owner would not be able to cut and run without providing this information which would hold them more accountable for their dogs misbehaviour.

- Any responsible dog owner would be willing to stay on the scene of an incident. If people are leaving the scene, it's once again a sign of a PEOPLE issue.
- It should be treated no differently than a hit and run.
- Owners of any breed, not just pitbulls or similar breeds, should have to stay at the scene and have to exchange contact info. If another animal is hurt, the owner of the dog that caused the injuries should be responsible for vet costs, exchanging contact info makes this possible. Also, if the dog that bites/attacks has done this on multiple occasions, there would be some sort of proof.
- It is important to have all details possible at the scene or wait in the vehicle until enforcement officer arrives. It often creates scenarios of mismatching stories. It is the best to have them remain at the scene.
- Or give the contact info as quickly as possible as to get the dog out of the situation
- I'm shocked this isn't a current requirement, especially if a person was bit.
- How are you going to enforce a law if no one stays on scene? Not much different than a hit and run.
- Yes but sometimes wouldn't it be better to get the dog home and calm it down? Rather than having it stay at the scene where it just bit someone etc.?
- It is the responsible way.
- It will be easier to collect info on dogs that bite when incidents are reported and documented
- All pet owners should be responsible for their pets. Whether it is a cat or dog, yorkie or mastiff, a pet owners must take responsibility for their pets actions
- To be responsible for your dogs actions.
- This can and will identify the owners and the responsibility They have to society to control their dogs.
- Owners should be held accountable for their animals, they should not be able to flee after an incident without repercussions.
- It should be seen the same as a hit and run.
- The owner should be held accountable, not the dog.
- it is important to get contact info in case of disease or costs incurred after such an incident
- Just like if a human abuses a human, they are given a chance to speak. As animals can not communicate with us it is then on the owner to explain. Why was the dog involved in an accident? Was the dog provoked by the victim? Did the victim go against the owners wishes and approach a dog that they were asked to leave alone?
- The owner is solely responsible for the behaviour of their dog
- This should be no different than a vehicle accident.
- I think witness testimony should be considered as well. Was this person or animal harassing the dog that bit them before the incident? In my experience, these incidents are often provoked.
- As long as a secondary entity is in agreement with euthanization of the animal. I don't like that one person can decide the fate of an animal
- Medical info such about the pet that bit is important, ex: does dog have updated rabies shot. Does dog have a history of biting.

- At the end of the day, the owner is responsible for the behavior of their dog. The owner must understand the consequences for their lack of judgement, lack of knowledge/training, and/or their negligence for letting such a situation occur. I believe it is important that they are educated on what went wrong to ensure such a situation does not happen again.
 - This should be a requirement if it can be accomplished safely; however, it may be necessary to remove animals or children from the immediate scene for medical attention or to prevent further aggression, especially given the length of time it can take for authorities to arrive. There should be a rule, that the dog must stay, if possible, and must provide immediate and accurate contact information.
 - I don't know why any decent person would flee such a situation if they are actually a responsible pet owner.
 - It's no different than a vehicle collision. Need accountability.
 - No
 - The owner needs to be identified and accountable.
 - "I work on animal bite follow up for animal to human disease transmission. Too often, pet owners just say that their pet's shots are up to date then leave the area which makes follow up difficult.
- An alternative to staying on scene could be a legal requirement to provide the bite victim or their parent/guardian with their name & contact information. Similar to car accidents: minor accidents trade info, major ones wait for authorities."
 - Responsible dog ownership includes follow up of any dog bite or incident.
 - at least dog licence info should be given - the insurance suggestions are only realistic if you can identify people
 - If a pet accidentally or intentionally is involved in an incident the owner should be accountable and exchange information to try to resolve the issue if necessary.
 - There are 2 sides to every story.
 - Any responsible pet owner should stay at the scene to control their dog and give their information to an officer
 - If the bite is severe especially. You have an obligation as an owner.
 - Any dog owner whos pet had been involved in any disturbance should stay to talk to bylaw!
 - Isn't fleeing the scene a criminal offence?
 - You should focus on enforcing the rules you already have in place before adding in a host of new ones that won't be enforced. I walk Edworthy almost every single day. NEVER once have I seen bylaw enforcing rules there or handing out fines. Stop with this pitbull nonsense.
 - Take responsibility.
 - I do not believe the pet owner should be charged, I think law enforcement should hear both sides of the story. Often, if not always, when a dog lashes out, there was a reason.
 - This should be applied to ALL breeds. Not discriminating against "pit bull" breeds

- It should be treated just like a car accident. Stay at the scene to exchange information and if you don't it's a hit and run.
- NOT FOR PUNISHMENT - but resources on dog training and support for people to be able to afford and actually go through with it.
- Similar to remaining at the scene of any car accident.
- Depending on the severity of the bite, when a large vet bill might be required, i think they should be held responsible for there dog if the dog was the first to engage in conflict.
- Need to record and gather info, is it a repeat offender/nuisance dog.
- If the incident requires medical treatment.
- I think if a dog bites a person they should give information to solve the problem however, to simply suggest that the only dogs biting people are pit bulls is a extreme generalization
- Yes, dog owners must be held responsible for all actions of their pet. In the past their has been too much focus on bad animals and specific breeds. It is my belief that it is the owners treatment and training of the animal that will impact whether their pet is a nuisance or danger to public - not the dog breed.
- If an animal or human gets hurt. If it is the owners responsibility to be there to support them since they let the dog run loose. The owner should take responsibility
- Usually there are things and actions that occur prior to the bite which contribute . People and other dogs must also be accountable to there contibutions to the bit.
- Most owners are not held accountable for their pets actions and the victim has difficulty finding the owner after an incident has occurred
- As a dog owner is responsible for their pets behavior, they need to be accountable to the victim and officers so they can be questioned on vaccines, past behaviors etc.
- But only if they refuse to leave their contact info. Better if they leave if tempers are high...
- Same as for when there is a vehicle collision. Who would think it's okay to just leave the scene? This needs explanation?!
- The owner should be required to share vaccination records to ensure the health of the victim. If they do not remain at the scene it can be impossible to find the offending dog.
- For sure he's the one to be blamed and should be accountable for his dog's behavior issues.
- Information should always be exchanged. Involvement of an enforcement officer only if necessary, I.e., someone is uncooperative, threatening or abusive.
- You need two sides to the story
- The dog tag number needs to be shared with all parties involved. Enforcing this rule will be difficult as most offenders vacate immediately
- Leaving the scene should be considered leaving the scene of an accident or crime.
- I think ANY dog owner, regardless of what breed they own should remain at the scene until it is cleared that everyone is okay. Pit bulls are no more vicious than your average dog. The idea of discriminating against a certain breed is an uneducated one. We don't discriminate against race, and now we are being forced to decide is an entire group of dogs should be penalized because of irresponsible dog owners. I have two pitbulls and a dachshund, and they are all equally trustworthy. I work at a vet clinic and everyone there would agree my dogs are basically bomb proof. Out of the staff pets, the mixed retriever, chihuahua, westie, border collie, Aussie, and the poodle mix have all nipped at someone. My pit bulls have never shown a shred of aggression towards people. So, yes, making a decision based on appearance is ridiculous.

- A car accident requires you to say. Same difference.
- Makes it much easier for an enforcement officer to investigate if the owner does not leave.
- "Interesting how you allow an area for elaboration here but not in section 3 regarding ""pit bull"" type dogs. Your note about how ""pit bull"" type dogs are not involved in more bite incidents than other types but have the ability to do great damage because of their strength should be enough answer for you to not move forward with that notion. Should men be required to walk around in hand-cuffs because they are physically larger and stronger than women and therefore could do more damage IF they were to involve themselves in violent action? no? that seems ridiculous?"
- This action is so incredibly harmful and will encourage stigma against this already discriminated breed. You should instead be looking into dogs with a bite history and encouraging fines, training and muzzling at that point. The action of muzzling all pit bulls when you have already indicated they do not account for the majority of bites will not do anything to help your cause."
- Because my dog always gets attacked by little breeds with no consequences.
- owner responsibility
- I'm surprised this isn't already required. I looks at this as being similar to auto accidents - you have to stay on scene and exchange info.
- Need to know if the dog is vaccinated as well and if they have had multiple offences.
- Please make this a bylaw offence. I've had my dogs attacked a few times by people who have grabbed their dogs afterwards and walked off. If your dog ends up in the vets, it's expensive, and these people get a free pass.
- Just as there are responsible pet owners, there are reckless pet owners as well. Some people will watch their dog seriously hurt another animal or person and run away to avoid liability. If there is an actual enforceable punishment for these types of people, it may deter the behaviour.
- The owner is responsible for the dog and as such must make themselves known to bylaw and or victim of the bite.
- If someone's dog attacks another persons dog, the first person should be the one to pay for vet bills and the like
- I feel it could be up to the victim to decide, but if it's serious enough, yes they should stay and ensure the proper people are notified.
- Many times the owner of the dog will flee the scene and refuse to take responsibility for their dog's actions and behaviours, leaving the burden for the cost of the injuries on the innocent party.
- Only if it is a bite that breaks the skin, dogs play-bite with each other all the time.
- The owner of the dog that bites is the one that should be deemed responsible. It is important they stay at the scene so that it is documented, especially if it is a comment occurrence for that dog.

- Same as a car crash
- only if he controls his dog
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dog and it's behaviour.
- Should be responsible to see if other dog is okay, needs vet attention which then costs the other owner money. Situation should be assessed which dog was aggressor, bite can happen in defence too
- The person bit could require medical attention and the dog needs to be assessed not only for aggressive behaviour but signs of abusive treatment by the owner.
- Yes to reduce repeated incidences
- The owner is typically the problem because of lack of training and structure for their dog. They are responsible for what happened.
- The owner should remain at the scene and take whatever responsible actions the situation warrants
- So that the owner can be blamed cause this has nothing to do with animals
- If a dog causes harm to a person or other animal it should be reported and recorded.
- If a necessary situation occurs, information about the owner and dog is crucial to determine if this is a singular event or repeat occurrence - to keep records.
- Same as car incidents.
- I have been attacked/ bit by peoples dogs before and they always say their dog is a nice one and their sorry and leave. Mean while I had to go to the hospital for the bite, very unfair.
- Yes you are liable and responsible to stay around if your dog was involved in an incident. However if a dog is too injured and needs to get to the vet ASAP there needs to be contingency plans in place. Even calling in to bylaws or a non-emergency police line to report the incident and provide your details would be sufficient in those extenuating circumstances.
- Just like a traffic incident....
- A police report should be filed.
- Owner must take responsibility for the animal and it's training
- Some concern about control of the dog while waiting.
- If a dog bites a person or another animal the owner should be held accountable for the vet bills that arise from that situation
- Both sides of the story are necessary
- Accountability and to avoid future liability
- All information should be transferred between owners including veterinary clinic information. This would insure proper notice of immunization records were gathered to prevent disease/sickness.
- Owner of the offending pet should provide satisfactory ID to the victim or remain on scene for enforcement officer.
- Should be mandatory to share info
- If the incident requires attention by an enforcement officer, both parties should remain at the scene
- The owner must accept immediate responsibility and should remain on scene.
- It's important to get the important facts and information from all parties involved

- The owner is responsible for the dog and its behavior, full stop.
- I would like to think responsible pet owners would stay behind and share contact info and pay for the vet bills for the injured dog.
- Owners should be held accountable for their dog's actions.
- It is necessary for safety of the public and proper follow up.
- Responsible dog owners would already do this, so it would hold the irresponsible owners accountable. There are no bad dogs only bad owners.
- If the bite is severe enough to cause bleeding, and the person bite is considering reporting it
- You don't leave the scene of Ann accident. This will help dial in who the bad dog owners are so they can be targeted for their incompetence in properly training their dog.
- "Tribunal is a feature of communist regime and not democratic!
- This is witch hunt directed at dogs this time that look different. In 21 st century dogs should be evaluated by responsible owner. Good owner- good dog, bad owner- bad dog. To be fair- German shepherds' and English bulldog' jaw bite is much stronger then pitbulls."
- However if this is not possible and it is more important to remove the animal from then scene then contact info should suffice
- It's required for vehicles and you pay for their upkeep and ownership. Should apply to pets (dogs) too since you also pay for their upkeep and ownership. Plus it's entirely likely a dog can kill as well as a car, but through proper training and socialization, a dog shouldn't have to.
- The dog owner should be held accountable for their animals behaviour. We are required to stay at the scene of accident, it should be the same when your animal is involved in an altercation.
- I've been bit twice. Once by a poodle type and once by a Border Collie. It is imperative for the owners to be accountable and provide a history of behavior and health to the victim.
- Yes- if necessary and both owners agree that there should be bylaw intervention, they must remain on site for a proper and supervised exchange of documents.
- Dog bites are uncommon and typically the dog is triggered or threatened in some way. Such dogs need special care and training to overcome this - this is the owner's responsibility and therefore they should stay and explain what happened from the dog' point of view.
- Many owners try and escape responsibility and liability for their dogs poor behaviour.
- Owners should take responsibility for any unacceptable behaviour from their pet. It is not the animals fault that they have not been giving a secure home with proper training.
- Owners of dogs that are a danger to people or other animals must be held to account. If the victim of an incident has medical or veterinary Bill's the owners liability should cover those costs.
- This is common sense. You damage a persons property you are held responsible so why not the same be true for your dog damaging another dog.
- This is a way to gain more knowledge about what happened and can allow follow up if it is an issue with the owner not the dog. Owners should be held responsible.
- Depending on the situation and severity of the bite.
- This builds into my early statement around managing the issue and not just a breed. Owners should be held accountable for the actions of their pet and this is part of that. Enforcement officers should be able to effectively investigate and understand the potential causes for that situation before making an informed decision on whether the pet should be seized from the owner.

- Yes people should stay at scene if harm caused. If no true harm then no
- as long as everyone is stable, if owner or pet requires immediate attention they should give information to the other person (name, phone number, vet or doctor office they are going to) and a picture taken of their face. Then go to the vet or doctorer
- They owner is liable, so clearly needs to remain at the scene.
- Absolutely the owner of the dog must stay on scene to talk to someone and give their side of the story about what happened. Remember, there are always two sides and sometimes it doesn't always fall onto the 'pitbull'....
- They must be held accountable
- Yes there is always two sides to a story and it is very important to get informed facts as to determine actual responsibility. Often owners whose dogs are attacked have unknowingly caused this incident by their behaviour and their dogs behaviour. Often dogs on those long retractable leashes are not under control . By banning those leashes on parkways it would reduce incidents right there as dogs would ge under better control
- Accountability- and to be responsible for all vet bills
- Owner must take responsibility for their pets actions.
- An assault—and therefore a crime—has occurred. The owner of the dog must remain at the scene.
- Fine for any dog owner who does not remain at scene
- Common courtesy.....
- Responsible pet owners should pay for any vet bills their animal has caused.
- I feel it is no different from remaining at the scene of a car accident.
- The owner of the dog that caused the bite should be held responsible and accountable.
- If a dog bites a person, the owner should take responsibility. What happens if the dog is running loose, however? And if a neighborhood cat damages someone's property (ex: using vegetable garden as a bathroom), should the cat owners also not have to take similar responsibility?
- Too often owners of dogs who cause the incident leave the scene and cannot be held accountable, so owners of the dogs who have been attacked or people who have been attacked are left footing the bill. It also leaves it open for it to happen again.
- owners are 100% responsible for their dogs - it is the owner's fault if there is an incident
- Needs to be a fair investigation, bit all dog bites are unprovoked either so i expect both parties to be investigated.
- During a road accident the driver has to stay. The owner is responsible for keeping the dog under control and needs to explain why they failed in their responsibility
- Knows dog's background eg shots. Trace dog's history eg previous issues
- Adequate follow up
- If your dog bit someone, be there to tell the animal's side of the story. Why did the dog feel threatened enough to attack.

- Policy reason seems similar to reasons why motor vehicle operators should remain at scene of a collision to share contact info and speak with an officer
- Too many just run off and call their dogs distancing themselves from incidents asap.
- Non-dog owners have the right to walk safely and without fear of being attacked by a fierce dog on City sidewalks. I often feel that dog-owners because they are better organized and represented gets their concerns heard by City Council. But there are a lot of people who prefer not to have pets and our rights deserve to be heard also.
- Allows the dog owner to explain their side of the story and what can be done in preventative measures.
- The person is responsible for medical bills that result from there dogs bite. An official report will need to be taken
- The owner of the biting dog needs to provide information and is responsible for the harm cause. Being able to leave the scene is equivalent to a hit and run.
- All dogs, big or toy dogs, who bite a person or another dog, should wait with the owner until law enforcement arrives.
- Just like a car accident it is important to take responsibility for your actions and the actions of your pet who is under your care
- Should be treated no different than other rules ie. Car accidents
- It's not different than any other accident, vehicular or otherwise. You need to exchange information and be present to speak to any officials.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their pets, much like their children (as minors). The owner must remain onsite and should be liable if it is determined that the owner may be at fault (for reasons of negligence, etc)
- Owners are responsible for the pet's behaviour.
- Responsible pet ownership. No bad dogs, just bad owners
- Yes, but good luck with that. People who allow their dogs to bite are generally not very responsible people and won't stick around after an incident.
- I feel the dog owner needs to take responsibility or get a severe fine if he tries to run, just like a vehicle accident.
- Seems logical
- They need to be available to surrender the animal.
- ANY BREED OF DOG COULD BITE SOMEONE!!! So it is the responsibility of the owner to do what they can to solve the situation.
- The person is the responsible member. Again don't blame the dog.
- As long as they are allowed to put the dog in a safe space first (car) and then return to the scene they may have some insight as to what happened that others would never know.
- No anonymity concessions for people who own dogs that cause harm and then just want to "disappear into the woods" thereafter -- leaving the victim to file the report and suffer alone. If the person (with the "bad dog") still flees the scene, photos taken by the victim or owner of the attacked dog could be provided to the Police who would compare it to a photo data base of ALL such owners and their nuisance dogs. This data would be shared between municipalities if the person moved to another city or town. There would be no place for them to hide.

- If the 'incident' is specifically related to dangerous behaviour. It should also be mandatory to have your dog's license number clearly displayed on its collar. This would provide an opportunity to acquire the pet & subsequently the owner's information, should there be any need to pursue legal recourse for attacks/biting and also for reporting dogs at large e.g. for safety, you may not want to try and get control of the dog (grabbing them by the collar to read their license).
- If your dog bites someone then the owner should be responsible as well as involved in the aftermath
- Treat it like a car accident, if it's just a little nip out of excitement or play just apologize and be on your way if it's a real bite then you should have to stick around
- Especially in a case involving another animal, the medical and financial consequences can be significant and contact information for the owner of the offending animal is essential to pursue reparations.
- The same thing applies with car accidents, it should with animal accidents
- I was bit by a dog inside a store who was being handled by a young girl. I had done nothing to provoke the dog, I was focused on my shopping. Both myself and the shop owner were surprised by the unprovoked aggression, the girl had wandered close to me, and the dog was "overly protective" she said. The adult owner of the dog never came inside & basically ran off to avoid taking responsibility. The only reason I was able to report the incident was that the store owner knew who the individual was. The store owner issued the incident report. Had this been in a park or elsewhere, no report would've been able to be made, since I didn't know them, and the adult male and girl fled the scene.
- Only if medical attention is necessary.
- The dog's proclivity to biting other people or dogs is solely the result of the person who has been training it. It is the dog owner's responsibility to document injuries accrued by the dog, as one would with a car accident, etc.
- To prevent people from fleeing the scene.
- Same as a motor vehicle accident. We are dog "owners" with licenses for them and there could be costs involved that I think both parties should communicate and be able to reach an agreement. Whether it be directly with each other or reported to the city
- It is similar to a car accident.
- The whole situation needs to be looked at. Yes, owner must stay on at the site. but this is NOT breed issue. This is ALL dog breeds
- Great idea. It reminds me of a vehicle crash scenario, and keeps the owner in check.
- You want to make sure everyone isn't injured and make sure the animals involved are all up to date on their shots.
- 2sides to every story and as a responsible dog owner you shouldn't even have the thought in your head to leave the scene
- This should be treated the same as an assault. If the owner leaves they should be charged as well.
- This is rarely the case and the ones who do are seen as guilty without considering the situation

- No explanation needed - common sense
- If the bite is severe and one of the parties involved doesn't feel resolved with the other owners, I believe they should stay to plea their half. Unfortunately I have seen a lot of crazy people in off-leash dog parks that try to provoke the dogs and get a response as well.
- "I am really frustrated at the use of pitbulls in this survey. There are several other dogs that have just as strong of bites then a pitbull if not stronger. I for one am not terrified of pitbulls. I've owned and have lived around them my whole life. Not one was vicious. I have however been bite by a German Shephard. I have been concerned about many shepherds getting out of yards as they sound like they are trying to break through doors and fences. However I would never condemn them like you do in this survey. Chows can also be vicious and I've been to a house where I thought a Cane Corso was going to jump through the window. It is ridiculous that you allow people's ignorant fears to fuel his survey.
- I hope also nuisance dogs refers to Basset hounds who Bray all day long when neighbours aren't home etc etc."
- I feel as though it's important to handle the situation immediately and get it under control so it does not spiral
- As long as the enforcement officer is only there to gather information and not to try and take the dog.
- People should be accountable for their dogs behaviour. It should NOT be placed on the breed of the dog.
- If the owner can safely stay at the scene, then yes. Important to get details of incident documented as soon as possible
- Owners are responsible for their pets. Period. A vicious dog is the result of upbringing by its owner. Fine the owner.
- the question states "if necessary". in my opinion, necessary would be a serious bite in which the victim doesn't just shake it off (blood, crying, severe pain). not only would it be the ethical thing to stay and explain to an officer what happened, it would make you a better person
- It is your animal and your responsibility to deal with the consequences of its actions
- Responsible dog owners should always give their contact information after an altercation.
- the owner should be held responsible for the dogs actions. As I have had to go through this when my dog that looks similar to a pit bull but is not one and was attacked by another dog that also was not a bully breed dog. That incident cost me over $800 in vet bills.
- Do not really care if it bites another animal other than the owner of the bitten animal should be paid replacement cost, no more. If it bites a person the dog owner must supply contact information so that liability can be assessed and must render assistance if necessary. (call ambulance, attempt to stop bleeding, etc.)
- They should provide information
- An attack by the owner's dog is same as an attack by owner with hammer... No difference

- Owners of both parties (accused and victim) involved should exchange information. Witnesses should also be obligated under bylaw policies to remain at scene, if present during the incident. Should emergency be required, the pets' health should supersede waiting on the arrival of a bylaw officer. Vets can make a call for bylaw officer to meet owner(s) at their clinic.
- Yes I believe that a person is required to get their dog under control and be responsible for any payments needed to help the other dog or person that was bit but also depends on the situation if a dog is not being aggressive towards a person or dog but is play fighting than this does not require law enforcement!
- That person is responsible for that dog. Also gives you an idea of the kind of owner they are; if they trained the dog or not. If they are an aggressive abusive owner towards that dog which caused that dog to pick up on aggressions habits. Because they will either scold or just grab the dog and go.
- I do believe that owners should be required to take responsibility and provide their information during a dog attack.
- The owner should absolutely not be allowed to leave the area after their dog has bitten someone. They need to remain so that their dog can be tested and evaluated for that attack and potential future ones.
- Makes sense.
- then the dog is able to get proper training (hopefully) and it keeps owners responsible.
- It is unfair when a pet owner leaves anonymously and takes no responsibility for their dog's actions.
- Dog owners should be held accountable.
- The owner can then explain what happened and how/why. The dog is not always to blame for the incident.
- Similar to a vehicle "incident". If you are in control of a vehicle and you have an "incident" (accident) - then you must be responsible for the reporting of all details. In the case of owning a dog - you are responsible in the same way. Losing control over your vehicle is not an excuse - neither should it be for a dog owner. If you can't control your dog - don't have it!
- I do agree if a dog bites unprovoked and random ie walking down the road then yes...but Every situation is different
- It should be the law. Don't what owner running away from their responsibility
- There needs to be accountability for the ownership of that animal. The animal needs to be under the owners control at all times. Too often the offending owner just curses out the victim and retreats quickly leaving the victim even more upset.
- The owner must stay to help handle the situation and explain the dog's behaviour
- Like all incidents there are 2 sides to one story so it would be beneficial to get both stories at the same time, but if the situation is very stressful and the dog is too aggressive, not sure if the owner would be able to control them on scene, so would be hard to enforce?
- I've experienced more dog bites from dogs under 30lbs and their owners always take off. They need to be held responsible for their animals behaviour.
- That seems pretty self explanatory - you wouldn't leave a car accident without providing information, you shouldn't leave the scene without providing at least a phone number.

- Owners are responsible for the actions of their dogs.
- Because the owner should be penalized..... not the dogs. you get the owner out of the dogs life you can turn any dog around. I have witnessed this
- I have been involved with a dog attack and the owner fled leaving an injured dig
- A person is responsible for their dogs action. It's not the dogs fault.
- We need to know if the dog has had it's shots.
- Yes, if the situation is safe for everyone.
- The bite must break skin significantly. We live in a gear ridden society whereas one will claim a play bite amongst dogs, a scratch from the paw etc as a bite. This is not true. Must be significant with broken skin that is more than a paq scratch.
- Of course. The owner's animal is ultimately responsible for their pet's freedom and ability to bite a person or other animal. If the City keeps a "rap sheet" on biting incidents for each animal, this can help to ensure the animal is kept from doing it again, i.e. not allowed at the dog park, muzzled, etc. If the owner doesn't stay or provide the dog's details, how can that animal's biting history be tracked, and how else can all of these rules, i.e. muzzling, be enforced?
- If damage/injury is done, the owner should be accountable for medical expenses at the very least.
- I do support this, as it demonstrates responsibility by the dog owner. However, if their dog, or the other dog or person is agitated, and removing a dog or person from this scene would benefit the situation, I do not think that should be punished.
- Obvious reasons. If the offender takes off, there's no way to track them down unless the victim know them.
- I do support this, as it demonstrates responsibility by the dog owner. However, if their dog, or the other dog or person is agitated, and removing a dog or person from this scene would benefit the situation, I do not think that should be punished.
- No.
- Any dog owner should be required to stay at the scene of an incident involving their dog. Failure to do so should result in a hefty fine, and you are responsible for that dog from the day you bring it home, until the day it dies.
- We all need to take responsibility and be accountable for the outcomes of our choices.
- An attack is an attack. Doesn't matter if your human or canine. Doesn't matter your color or breed.
- Depending on the severity of the incident I would agree that the owner of the dog remain present, of safe to do so. Similar to a motor vehicle accident, information should be exchanged, and authorities should be involved if the damages or injuries are above a certain threshold. Many times dogs can get carried away while playing, and a warning bite which does not cause any bodily harm would not warrant involvement by an officer.
- In the event it bites a person the owner should stay. I regards to another animal that is complicated as I agree if it was a vicious attack but some dogs when playing nip at each other. I think that would be hard to assess.

- There are always 2 sides to each story. The owner of the biter should be able to tell the officer what happened in their words too. Some bites are not truly the fault of the dog but by actions of the person who was bitten.
- An animal bite is a form of assault. It seems reasonable to have the person handling the animal to share personal information and be available account for the incident.
- It's similar to leaving the scene of a vehicle accident. Witnesses would be helpful as well.
- I think it should be if both people aren't in agreement
- Contact information is needed. Waiting for an officer, not so much.
- victim should be allowed to step away.
- I think it's important that the officer gets the entire story, from both parties involved. There are some incidences where a person isn't respecting the dog's space or the warning signs the dog is giving, which results in them getting bit or injured. There are other times where a dog may attack without being provoked, or where a dog isn't properly socialized/trained. I think it's important to know why the incident occurred to decide the next steps. If it was the owner's/dogs fault, the owner should face charges or should have to attend dog training classes. If it was the victim's fault (didn't ask for consent to approach the dog, etc.) then I think it's important for an officer to hear that side as well.
- Any time an animal is aggressive towards another animal or even a human it should always have been called in to appropriate authorities. Usually they are repeat offenders
- Owners are responsible for their dogs.
- I think it's important for dog owners to take responsibility when their dog bites a person or another animal and for them to share information so that whoever has been bitten has the best information when they go to get it looked at by a doctor.
- The owner needs to be made responsible & there be consequences. It's easy for people to blame the dog but a responsible owner will have a better behaved dog. This should not be breed specific. I've seen smaller dogs instigate more times than not.
- It is the responsibility of a dog owner to be present and explain the situation which would determine the future of the dog. A dog can't talk and explain what happened in that situation. It would be unfair to take the dog away and label it aggressive and, god forbid, euthanize the dog without knowing what fully happened in that situation.
- Owner is responsible.
- Places ownership on dog owner
- Too often a dog will bite someone or another pet and the owner will simply walk/run away to avoid its responsibilities. That dog will still be there and might 'strike' again.
- When an accidental bite or attack occurs steps should be taken to ensure an assessment of animal behavior be done, fines and or restrictions and or punishment be issued and owner accountability be addressed. Then a court or tribunal could decide if obedience training or other action be taken in the matter depending on the severity and number of occurrences.
- Pit bull owners take off because they know what can result.
- Owner responsibility

- It is essential a dog owner remains at the scene after a dog bite incident to provide important info regarding his/her animal's vaccinations and rabies status. This should never be a question but the responsibility of every pet owner. Unfortunately, it is not always safe to walk in many of Calgary's green spaces due to the propensity of dog attacks as Calgary has some of the most lax laws regarding pet ownership in the country.
- The owner is the responsible party. Not the dog
- My bully breed dog was bite as a puppy by a golden retriever dog and 11 years later and several reactivate dog classes later. She still has fear of other dogs.
- Unleashed dog attacked our leashed lab by our front door which resulted in bleeding paws. Owner just stood there and watched while I had to insert myself between the two animals. By the time I got our dog separated and inside, the dog and owner had taken off. They need to be held accountable, especially when attack occurred when animal was not leashed.
- This would be difficult to enforce but essential to declare the dog a nuisance dog.
- Dogs rarely attack for no reason. The owner should stay there to take responsibility and/or defend themselves and their dog.
- Important details such as shots being up to date are needed from the owner. And the owner must take responsibility and face any consequences.
- Too often irresponsible dog owners disappear never to be held accountable for their actions/inactions. Also, post the necessary contact information for enforcement officers at all dog parks.
- It is important to assist the wounded animal however, it should only ever be up to the owners what happens with the offending pet moving forward.
- Just like a car accident- pertinent information should be shared between both parties
- I think this would need to be investigated more. Unfortunately, people always seem to side with the "victim" of the bite when this person was the instigator in the situation. Something to consider is that kids under a certain age must be within arms reach of their parent when at the dog park. I don't even own a dog but I think if parents kept their kids closer at dog parks, less incidents would happen with dogs. The dog park is the only place where dogs can play and run somewhat free. Kids under certain ages do not understand how to approach dogs and dogs can get scared, causing them to try and get out of the situation. Parents should be held responsible for their kids.
- The victim deserves to know history of the dog firstly for health reasons and secondly for the owner to take responsibility.
- You have to stay at the scene of the accident. Share vaccine history and other information.
- Too many owners flee the scene and the injured are left to fend for themselves. Take responsibility
- Then the incident is open and clear as both side have there say. I would hope this would paint a clear and accurate information of what occurred .
- It puts the responsibility on the dog owner.
- Just like a vehicular accident where there may be an injury.
- People should be required to identify themselves and to answer questions if asked
- If injury is inflicted, it's exactly the same as leaving the scene of a car accident.

- Have witnessed dogs being attacked at off-leash dog parks. Exchange of information proceeded much like if it was a traffic accident. But have so seen altercations between owners and dogs being kicked by other owners. Owners will only stay if they feel it will be productive. How do you stay if the dogs cannot be kept under control/away from one another and are possibly injured?
- Contact information should be provided by the offending owner every time. If the bite requires medical attention, then he/she should also wait for an enforcement officer. If the bite does not require medical attention, the provision of contact information only should suffice.
- Many dog owners just run away, I have had that happen to me after a pit bull bit my leg.
- The owner is responsible for their pet's actions, therefore should stay, same as an automobile accident.
- Stops any misinformation being issued to the enforcement officer
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pet's behavior
- You are responsible for your dog. If they cause injury, you need to face those consequences.
- It's illegal to flee the scene of a hit & run. Should be illegal to leave the scene after your dog has attacked someone.
- Dog owners must be held responsible for their charges even if it isn't the dog's fault. For example: the dog is attacked itself or if the dog is defending its owner.
- I'm surprised this isn't already a law
- Reduces problem of identifying owner and reduces enforcement costs. Problematic in winter conditions though. Perhaps requirement to produce ID, like after a car accident, would be better. Tensions will be high!
- Information must be exchanged and witness info too. Especially if the bylaw officer takes a while to get there. Post signs with bylaw phone number.
- If it is not an emergency situation all parties involved should remain on scene.
- Such events often occur where there is no CCTV and are similar to a hit and run where private property is damaged.
- An owner MUST be responsible for their pets
- To me it is the same as an accident. You are supposed to stay and deal with the consequences of your actions.
- Often the dog is not known to the victim and it is important to obtain owner information.
- People need to understand that they are responsible for the conduct of their pets. What a concept that they have to work with the training of their pets?
- The offending dog owner is responsible and should be held to be accountable to the dog's actions
- It's important to ensure that an owner takes responsibility for the behavior of their pet.
- Owners should be fully responsible for the actions of their pets. They should know to warn others and handle their animals in a manner that protects the public and their pets as well. (Harness, muzzle, leash...)
- How is this any different than leaving the scene of an automobile accident? You cause damage you are responsible for it. Or if you witnessed it you are responsible to provide what you saw.
- I am surprised this is not already a requirement!

- Accountability
- If something in your care has harmed or damaged someone or something else, you bear the responsibility and must remain at the scene to face the consequences.
- If they leave the record of the incident is incomplete, allowing it to happen again more easily.
- if you own a dog you should be responsible for the dog and its behaviour. if you know you have a reactive dog then do not put them in situations that may cause harm. take appropriate training programs that can help with the behavior. Most GOOD pet owners know their dogs and take responsibility.
- Once the dog that has bitten is secured, the owner should be required to exchange contact information. Too many times the owner leaves and cannot be contacted regarding their financial and legal responsibility.
- Dog should be put down
- If a dog bites any other person the rights of the dog owner stop being a priority and the dog should be put down. Why has our society tolerated any misbehaving dogs? The amount of horrible dog owners out there is on the rise and it needs to stop.
- In case the hurt dog needs medical attention and if that attacking dog has had multiple incidents it needs to attend training or not be allowed at areas
- High Fines should be given if they don't remain at scene.
- Owners shall be allowed to share their side of the story.
- There needs to be an explanation of what is severe enough for this to be required. Some owners get upset by dog play. Suggest evidence of blood being drawn.
- Why wouldn't you stay?
- If you hit a car, do you immediately drive away without the possibility of being fined and potentially sent to jail? Why would it be any different for a dog attack, where you are responsible for the incident that has happened?
- But only if it can be done safely or without additional emotional trauma. If it is safer to leave, they must contact animal services as soon as possible or face triple fines and charge of 'fleeing the scene'
- It seems similar to a car accident. It shouldn't be up to the owner to decide what is worth reporting.
- owners need to be responsible for the actions of their dogs.
- I support this, unless there is a medical need to get to a vet or hospital, but then information must be left for contact.
- regardless of situation someone got hurt by your pet.
- People need to be responsible for their pets.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- I HAD A DOG GET BITTEN BY A LAB AT THE DOG PARK YEARS AGO, THE OWNERS DID NOT STICK AROUND- THAT JUST TELLS ME THEIR DOG HAS DONE IT BEFORE
- Pet ownership is a responsibility to the community. If a dog attacks, the owner must take responsibility.
- Seems reasonable, but I wonder if it would be helpful to get the dog away from the victim somehow?

- The owner is responsible for the dog and takes on all liability. Bad owner equals bad dog. There is no such thing as a dog being born bad. They are all blank slates and learn certain behaviours as they grow up.
- The owner is responsible and should therefore remain on the scene to deal with consequences.
- it could be not the dog fault
- Yes the owner should remain at the scene unless the owner is out of town and someone else who is looking after their pets should be at the scene.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their dogs. Proof of rabies vaccination should be provided by the owner.
- As long as the dog can be controlled.
- This is just common sense.
- A responsible pet owner should always be able to give their side of the event.
- The individual is responsible for their dogs actions. This would be no different than a vehicle hit and run, punishable if leaving the scene of a crime.
- these dogs are loveable there not visiose there owners are and yall may roll your eyes but ive owned pitbull for 9 years who was abused viciously by his previous owner and he just turned 16 has never bitten a soul in my custody nor is he ever been walked with a leash and muzzle and he never ever will however i do think fines need to be harsher for uncontrolled dogs dog abuse cases need to be better inspected and harsher sentences and fines placed
- Would require clarification of what constitutes a “bite”. Dogs can have playful situations that escalate to a nip or bite without a dog being injured that are best handled by the individual owners.
- It depends on the incident if a dog is severely injured then yes. People need to have their dogs under control at all times.
- My answer would actually be YES and NO! As Vet bills can be atrocious, if a dog bites unprovoked then the owner should need to help with bills. BUT I have also seen dogs mind their own business and get provoked by another dog and defend themselves it's a slippery slope!
- Obvious
- There needs to be a record of the incident so that appropriate follow up action can be taken as needed
- I support this only if there is no BREED SPECIFIC legislation
- Owners should be responsible for there dogs. No matter the breed.
- Breed specific legislation is a joke. However, it is the owners responsibility to take ownership of how their dog has been trained. Therefore, the owner should be at fault 100%
- Same reasons as if it were a car accident. The responsibility to make things right is put in the person with the aggressive dog.
- It's the right thing to do
- Unfortunately a lot of dog attacks occur and the nuisance dog will leave the scene. This would help track that dog and whether it should be muzzled or carry heftier fines.
- Just like a car accident. You should have to exchange information
- This is responsible and necessary.

- Then you will be able to declare said dog as a nuisance
- All dogs not just one breed.
- It is the owner's responsibility!
- Staying is what constitutes a responsible dog owner.
- Owner should have full care and control of pets at all times, before and after incident
- Owners should be held personally responsible for the actions of their pets up to and including making a statement with an enforcing officer
- We are responsible for our pets and need to stay responsible even when our pets do something dangerous or that we don't approve of.
- Not all of these incidents are minor. Some result in substantial and expensive procedures to mitigate injury to a person or other animal. How can one remedy the situation through education, fines or impounding if the dog and owner leave without sharing information?
- Of course, how else can the dog and its owner be identified?? I'm surprised this isn't already the case.
- It is important to get the whole story on record in order to better understand a situation and to better understand the particular dog involved
- Providing contact information is key to accountability and subsequent application of consequences.
- It's necessary to get the info so that we know the dog's health history and then secondly so the owner of the dog takes responsibility for their dog's behaviour; be it a warning or a fine. People don't seem to change what's going on unless there is a repercussion either shamefully or financially.
- It is consistent with staying at the scene of an accident.
- Responsible ownership comes with a responsibility to comply with the law.
- "Otherwise it's a 'hit and run' type of idea. Similar punishment should apply as in a vehicle hit and run/ or an assault hit and run.. same thing when your dog attacks and you run.
- Owner must remain at scene and give care to injured person and or dog, until the authorities arrive."
- For the purpose of paying doctors or vet bill in necessary as well as providing proper immunization documentation- this could be attached to information while licensing animal
- This shows that the owner is responsible
- This will not stop an owner from fleeing the scene of the attack, but maybe the thought of a criminal charge being added might help deter such irresponsible behaviour. I've spoken to several dog owners whose pets have been victims of severe dog attacks where the other owner just fled the scene.
- There are probably many more occurrences of dog bites than we are aware due to no reporting mechanisms and the inability to get contact information from people. How to enforce someone giving their information is the problem.
- I like this idea but hard to enforce I think
- I hear regular reports of owners fleeing after incidents
- It is the responsibility of the owner for the dogs behavior and they should be held responsible for their dogs actions. They should also be given the chance to state their side of the story, in case there was some wrong doing on the part of the person or animal that received the bite

- Ban pit bull type dogs.
- How is this not already enforced? What if it's a child? Very concerning that we have such relaxed bylaws when it comes to aggressive dogs in this city.
- People need to be accountable for their pets and they're own actions or lack thereof
- "There is always two sides to a story.
- Obedience training could be a positive solution"
- If they do not remain at the scene it is virtually impossible to identify them later which would include knowing if the dog has had appropriate vaccinations and whether the behaviour has occurred before.
- To track offences.
- To track vicious dogs in the city. Two or three strikes and they should be removed from owners.
- Any person who has been involved in an attack on another is complicit in the crime! Leaving the scene of the attack should have a severe penalty like jail time!
- As a responsibility pet owner I feel that it is my duty to remain at the scene of any issue that arises with my dog. There are always two sides to every story and getting a full picture of what occurred is important in making fair decisions.
- Accountability should be maintained
- If the dog bites a person and breaks the skin then the owner must remain on scene and provide insurance, interactions between dogs are too often misunderstood and a correction can be seen as aggressive
- There must be serious consequences if they do not. There should be a significant fine and responsibility for the costs to track them down.
- People quite often flee to avoid paying vet costs for the other dog.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour and need to be held accountable if something happens.
- N/A
- It is important to know the identity of the dog/owner
- It's just kosher. Although people are highly attached to their pets and don't want to see them do wrong, it's the right thing to do.
- It's unacceptable for an owner to avoid responsibility of its pet's behaviour.
- There are always 2 sides to a story
- Its called being a responsible dog owner
- Because the owner has to have some responsibility
- If the bitten dog needs vet care, the owner of the biter, if the bite was unprovoked, should be responsible for the cost of the vet care.
- Accountability.
- Sounds like a good idea. Otherwise the offending dog may never be identified and dealt with.
- Irresponsible dog owners should be handled by the police, not bylaw officers.
- Yes information should be shared

- Same rule as a car accident - stay at the scene.
- People should exchange information just like they do a car crash
- A dog attack is like an assault. Owners should stay on scene.
- Like a car accident someone is injured statements need to be take to prove what happened
- Info is needed if there are any issues later. Responsible owners would not object.
- Owners need to be held responsible.
- To take responsibility for their animal and be held accountable for any training etc. the dog may require to act more appropriately if at fault. Also to cover any vet or medical bills of the injured animal/person.
- Any person should assist as much as possible. Note that all breeds have the potential to bite and should be treated equally across the board
- This is no different than leaving the scene of a motor vehicle accident. You must exchange information. Although who knows if the information provided will be accurate.
- Info should be exchanged if safe to do so
- It's the right thing to do, to ensure all parties get the help they need.
- The dog owner is ultimately responsible, they should remain on scene until all they have been cleared to leave by either bylaw officer or victim.
- Too often, the owner with the aggressive dog leaves the scene, and the victims have no recourse, because they don't know who the owner is, or how to contact them. If you get into an automobile accident, you are required to stay at the scene, and talk to police if necessary. How is this any different?
- Allows for proper investigation and easier means of tracking and getting statements of both parties. Holds owners accountable.
- Pit bull owners often will disappear after their dog mauled a pet or person. They often give victims false phone number and address and refused to take responsibility.
- Dog owners should be liable for damages/injuries/psychological trauma caused by their dogs' behavior. They should remain at the scene till involvement of enforcement officers.
- You should be responsible for what your pet does
- Too often, a dog bites and the so-called "good" pet owners won't stay on scene because they know they would be held accountable and therefore they become an accomplice to their dogs behaviour.
- But would require some form of use immunity to preserve the right against self incrimiation in the case of proceedings against the person.
- The dog actually biting someone should be the problem not the breed.
- I have bitten by a dog at Glenmore a few years back and carry pepper spray with me. Did not use it on the dog and only considered afterward - probably on the owner though! The issue is it's not the dog's fault it's poor handling and training by owners. So perhaps you should think about regulating who can own a dangerous dog. They are more dangerous than guns and same issue - regulate ownership in the same manner as we do with guns.
- Too often the owner of the offending dog leaves the scene. This needs to stop, and legislation could deter irresponsible dog owners

- Their animal has caused harm. Basically, they're fleeing from the crime scene.
- Just like a car accident.
- If a person punches another person, should they be allowed to leave?
- Yes, however this may need to be balanced with a need to remove the aggressive dog from the scene
- As someone who has been bitten before, the other dog owner has a responsibility to keep their dog under control. If that includes a fine, so be it.
- Yes of course. As long as they can move to a secure area where the dogs can be under control and not come in to contact with other dogs. There should be more signage reminding owners that they are financially responsible for their dog's actions.
- an owner is responsible for his/her pet and its actions.
- It is the owner responsibilities.
- The owner should stay in the area but the dog should not. If there is no way to take the dog away (i.e. very hot day and cannot put the dog in a car) the owner should be allowed to leave after providing contact information.
- Owners need to be accountable for their dogs. Full stop. Full Responsibility. No Exceptions.
- As an owner you are responsible for your dog's actions
- That is just the responsible way of doing it. THIS IS WHERE YOU SHOULD FOCUS ON CATCHING IRRESPONSIBLE OWNERS AND LEAVE THE DOGS ALONE
- Both parties should have to wait around
- Dog bites can be life threatening for small children and smaller dogs. Any person who's dog bites another dog or person should be held liable for any hospital/vet bills.
- The owner is responsible for all actions made by their dog. If it was an accident (eg. startled) the owner can explain.
- The dogs owner is responsible for any actions of the dog, accident or not.
- The owner of the dog needs to be responsible to pay for vet bills of the animal it attacked or go to "trial" if it bites a person - leaving the scene is no diff then a hit and run and no responsibility can be placed where it belongs
- dogs can't defend themselves nor can they explain what they did and why, so the owner should be there to provide info on the dog
- Yes they should stay unless they are feeling threatened for their own or their dogs safety. Sometime lunch mobs can form which puts stress on the animal and owner which could encourage more fear aggression in the dog
- Obviously it is fair that the owner should take responsibility for their dogs behaviour. The dog should not get the blame until you absolute know that the human actually trained their dog.
- An owner is responsible for their pet.
- Just like with car wrecks, if an incident occurs by your hand, you need to take responsibility and follow through with the aftermath. Exceptions should be made if the dog or owner are in need of immediate medical care and cannot wait for an officer to show up.
- For things like vaccination history.

- This will ensure that all parties are taken care of in terms of vet bills and medical concerns. All information can be easily gathered.
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog's behaviour.
- This will allow both sides of the story to be explained as well as the ability to inspect the behavior of the attacking dog.
- We do it for car accidents
- Common courtesy
- Too many times dogs are blamed when irresponsible people tease, aggravate them. All parties involved- including children - should remain at the scene.
- Just like car accidents. You have caused physical damage to someone
- It is important that the dog can be identified and the owner take responsibility in these incidents, similar to a car accident.
- Need to exchange vaccine information and also provide details for tracking. Must provide proof of ownership and licensing.
- Makes sense
- There needs to be an explanation
- It is important to have the owner present in order to give their statement of the incident
- There have been too many incidents of a dog attacking another dog or person and then that owner taking off. That is wrong. And irresponsible.
- The owner is responsible for their dog, if they will not teach and control their dog they should be responsible for the consequences, just like a car collision.
- I feel it is necessary to tell information in case of emergency
- Owner can give his/her side of the incident.
- Just like you need to remain at the scene of a car accident...
- Many times the owner of the offending dog has to be tracked down. This way, immediate information is exchanged
- Aggressive dog's owners must be accountable
- The dog is the owners responsibility
- If a dog bites someone or another animal and the owner leaves before speaking to authorities it is the same as a hit and run to me.
- It is the owner's responsibility to control their dog
- is only logical that someone be required to remain at the scene of the incident. We expect it for car incidents, why wouldn't it be expected when an owner's pet is involved in an incident? Owners should be held responsible for their pets behaviour. If owners are required to stay and talk to enforcement, it may help to identify irresponsible ownership or behavioural issues with the animal and opportunities for training or removing an animal from an unsafe home.
- It may otherwise be difficult to locate the owner responsible
- If an owner can't take responsibility for their dog, they shouldn't have it.

- You get in a car crash u wait for cops. Same thing with dog bite. [removed] unfortunate but it does happen.
- Just like a car accident.
- It just makes sense. If your dog causes injury to another person or animal, you are responsible for any damages.
- It is a reasonable expectation that both remain at the scene to provide statements. That helps to ensure that both sides of the incident are documented immediately while as many details as possible are fresh in the memories.
- The owner should have to stay and own up to the responsibility of owning a dog who displayed aggressive behaviour.
- I was recently bite for 14 stitches and many puncture wounds. Blood all over the place. How do I restrain the owner from leaving in rider to get such information? But it is a nice thought.
- This should be standard, like for car crashes
- Contact is necessary for further follow up or civil litigation
- People should be responsible for their pets, regardless if it was a cat, dog, ferret or bird that started the altercation!!
- For the same reason you would half to stay on the seen of a motor vehicle accident.
- Yes they most certainly should so the person who's dog did the damage can be held accountable for their dogs actions.
- It's just responsible
- It is the responsibility of the owner to ensure that they are able to control their dog. Similar to a car crash if an incident should occur both parties should exchange information and make a decision if officials should be summoned.
- It's their training and animal.
- A dog is still an animal despite it being a pet. The owner is 100% responsible.
- People need to take responsibility for their animals actions doesnr matter how small or bug the bute is if a dog is constantly reopening something needs to be done
- The dog owner should be responsible for their dog's actions. Why do they get to walk out of the park and not face their (human) consequences?
- No question. You own a pet, you are responsible for it's actions.
- No different than an auto accident
- Owners are responsible and need to be held to account.
- Leaving the scene of an automobile accident is a crime, surely leaving the scene of a dog assault should be as well
- If we have to stay after a car accident so the victim gets all information, why not when someone is attacked by an animal?
- "Either the dog owner or who ever was in control of the dog at the time of the bite

- There are probably more bites made by humans than dogs... love to see the emergency visit numbers for human bites vs these so called "vicious" dog bites"
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- Only if it is a reasonable length of time. For example, if I were in a car accident and physically injured to the point of needing the hospital or a doctors visit, I would not want to be waiting for the other driver to give information to the police. Same considerations, if the victim dog is injured to the point of needing a vet, they should not have to wait for an officer. If it was an incident without serious injury or say a mouthing with not skin breaking, then (much like a rear ending) both parties should be able to stay at the scene and relay information.
- If an officer needs to be called all parties should remain present
- Pet owners need to be responsible and accountable for their pet's actions.
- No different than a car accident
- It is the only way to register the dog as a problem
- The owner is responsible for the dog
- It is what a responsible pet owner should do.
- The owner should be staying at the scene to give information and cover any vet bills the other owner has to bear due to said incident. Goes for a person being harmed as well.
- If my dog bit someone bad enough you absolutely follow up. You exchange information like if you were in a car accident and make sure they're alright.
- These incidences should be reported in order to keep track repeat offences (relating to the owner, not the dog).
- It is an owner's responsibility to be responsible for anything in their possession involved in an incident.
- As a dog owner I feel it's my responsibility to make sure my dog is well behaved. And if she does happen to bite someone, I'm gonna make sure the person that she bit isn't seriously harmed. Also it is my responsibility to except punishment as her owner
- Owners should take responsibility
- If your dog inflicts injury to another person or dog absolutely that needs for the owner to hold themselves accountable. When I'm at the park and the little jack Russell nips my German Shepherd mix and busts his ear and lip open and the owner says "he's just playing"...
- Owning a pet is a responsibility
- The owner of each dog should be able to be reached for follow up, such as vet bills or other expenses related to the incident.
- I feel like walking away from an incident where there would be liability is like a hit and run in a car.
- Just like at an accident as most but not all bites are generally an accident
- Stay, report it IF INJURIES.
- This will provide an initial assessment of both animals and/or people and the current situation.
- Owners should be held responsible for dog behaviour.

- Yes, however, so long as they exchange ID/share information with the victim, they may not be required to stay there as it may be better if they can take their pet home rather than try to manage the situation while also managing their pet.
- If someone is hurt yes they should stay
- It's part of responsible pet ownership, and akin to traffic collisions
- It is the biting dog's owner's responsibility to rectify any damage/harm caused by their dog as long as it is a clear case of aggression.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their pets actions. The owner is the one who let the pet out and therefore needs to be responsible for it.
- Owners are responsible for the damage their dogs have done to other people. If the dog attacked a victim. But primarily the owner should be fined an excessive amount and their dog confiscated if they cannot do so. It is wrong to ban specific dog breeds, as the blame relies on the owner to train their dog.
- If it is severe enough to warrant an officer attending the scene then the pet owner of the dog that bit should remain at the scene
- They can explain both sides
- Owners should be held accountable to their pets actions. It's no different than a car accident. Both sides of the story should be collected at the time of the incident.
- "Ensures people are
- Being held accountable for their dogs behaviour"
- They are responsible
- Same as a car accident. Exchange info. Can help in case follow up/medical attention is necessary
- It is a responsible way to deal with the situation.
- No explanation needed. It's just a given or be fined
- To take responsibility for their pets actions
- Dog owners should be held accountable for poor management and understanding of their dog.
- But let's be specific here and include ANY DOG in this sentence no matter the breed is to remain at the scene.
- I would say that behavior is responsible dog ownership. If the city is not seeing this then mandate it with a bylaw.
- Yes; it should occur to ensure accurate tracking/decision making as long as it is safe for the person to remain
- Info should be shared in case dog has an infection of some kind and for the peace of mind of all involved like any human dispute that results in violence
- If a dog bite results in a person or other animal requiring medical care, the dog owner should remain at the scene of the incident.
- Accountability is important - while it may be an accident, steps should be taken to prevent further harm

- Just like getting in a car accident. Accidents happen, its okay, but needs to be dealt with responsibly and by taking ownership.
- the owner is partially responsible for the dog's behaviour, and has a duty to ensure that the dog behaves appropriately and is under control in public. They have to ensure that they are reachable if further steps need to be taken
- It's what a responsible citizen and pet owner would do Also, dogs need the proper leash for the size and power of their pet and to be able to control them at all times. This is for protection of officers as well.
- If a dog attacks my dog or a person they need to be held accountable and should have to stay to provide their contact information.
- Unless the 2 parties agree that the incident doesn't warranty an outside party.
- With the condition that both the dog and victim are in a safe area and there is not a chance for a second bite. Ie; the dog should not be forced to stay in an area that will lead to aggression and another bite.
- As the owner you are responsible for your dogs actions. Simply put, you need to stay and try your best to make it right.
- A responsible owner should do this
- This should involve ALL dogs not just 'nuisance' dogs
- People need to be accountable for the behaviour of their dogs. Most dog-to-dog incidents can be dealt with cordially without bylaw officer intervention, but remaining at the scene should be a courtesy that people extend to one another.
- If there is a puncture or other visible injury requiring first aid, the owner of the dog who caused the damage should have to remain on scene until they've provided their contact information.
- Yes you should be held accountable for your dog and the actions of your dog
- Yes, because often the owner will take off and it may not be possible to hold that owner/dog accountable.
- Get the dog somewhere he can no longer harm someone, but yes we need to document these incidents, dogs and owners to determine how this happened, if it happened before and to assess the dogs and owner behaviour at a later date.
- good idea
- This allows for both sides of the story to be gathered by an independent person vs. Just the story of the "victim" at the time.
- For vet bills and vaccination status
- The owner should always be the one held responsible, the dog is the product that reflects the quality of ownership. It is not the dogs fault.
- Contact info should be shared in case there is follow up. This however should be up to the victim whether they want this information or not.
- Helps hold the owners responsible.
- But only if they can do so without further angering the animal or continuing to put other people at risk. I do not think that owners should be able to walk away from issue their animal has created but if they are unable to control the animal in such an environment, they should be able to access some form of containment or control while waiting an indeterminate amount of time for an officer to arrive.

- That's just being a responsible owner.
- Providing explanation allows more information to be conveyed to figure out what really happened.
- This needs to be done so that there is a record of any behavior issues and can show if there is escalation in the behavior.
- It's like a car crash, if there's bodily injury/trauma then proceedings should be dealt with to ensure the safety of all parties (people, dogs).
- This could be tricky because a dog fight could cause someone to try to enforce this rule where I only consider this situation to be needed for malicious one sided attacks. Too much subjectivity.
- If the injury requires the human to have to undergo subsequent medical treatment related to the health and well being of the dog, yes. All dogs have prey drive, some dogs may chase cats, birds, and other natural prey. The owner should stay to prove their knowledge of their dogs drive and the training done support or control this behaviour.
- Most times the owner or person that was bitten are left with vet bills. Bites are NOT always the fault of the dog biting, we must remember that they're still animals and they can only communicate in so many ways. If they're threatened, biting can be a response.
- It would simply be the responsible thing to do.
- It is the right thing to do
- Accountability is important
- It's important for all animals and owners involved in case there is a serious issue
- Responsible dog/pet ownership.
- They should at least have to provide their contact information.
- Because that's the responsible thing to do if your animal did the biting.
- The owner is responsible for their dogs behavior and should bear any consequences that come with bad behaviour as it is their fault.
- If someone doesn't stick around for something like that, I'd say their pretty suspicious of indecent care of any dog.
- just the dog is not to be blamed, the owner needs to take responsibility
- Seems like the same logic as laws against hit and run. If you are a part of an incident you should be responsible to make sure that the other person or animal is ok, and confirm what follow up is needed. Failure to show this degree of responsibility indicates irresponsible dog ownership in my opinion and bylaw officers should be able to enforce sanctions based on this.
- Yes... how would this be different than a car accident? One vehicle owner can't just leave the scene...
- However sometimes waiting for an enforcement officer may not be doable. People and dogs are upset definitely exchange information and sometimes the best thing is to go home and wait for the bylaw officer to come to the residence. That might be safer for all including the officer.
- Having been a victim of a pit bull bite where the owner gave false contact information I highly support this rule

- Similar to a car crash
- Only if it is severe if it is not then an officer is not needed
- It's like a car accident
- Anyone whose dog has bitten a person or another animal should definitely be required to remain at the scene. It is unimaginable to me that a responsible dog owner would not do so, however, both my husband and I have been involved in incidents where the owner of the dog(s) walked off.
- seems reasonable
- Just like a vehicle accident - an incident that involves an animals pet owner should require by law them to remain at the scene and provide identification/contact information
- Not to necessarily remain at the scene, this may or may not be necessary depending on the severity/circumstances. However I do think owners should be obligated to provide contact details so that any follow up is possible eg check vaccination (rabies) are up to date
- Depends on the severity, and on the situation. 1) Is there blood? Are stitches required? (We don't need Karen from the suburbs calling bylaw because Sir Fluffington III got his ears tugged at the off-leash park and he's a show dog and your Rover is clearly a menace! Look, you can see Fluffington's fur, it's wet and dirty now! His career is ruined. . .) 2) was this a free-use area? Or private property? Did users understand the risk/responsibility? (Like, any time you go to the off-leash park, there is a chance that you might be crashed into by an out-of-control Frisbee-chasing canine, and suffer mild bruising around the shins. Your dog also might get snapped at by some other park user. If you can't deal with that, don't go. [Cue members-only dog parks, where everyone signs an indemnity...])
- This is a good idea.
- Accountability
- I as a dog owner take responsibility over my pup and so should others. Thankfully mine have never been involved in an incident but if they were I would stick around and expect the other party to stick around as well.
- The owner is responsible for their dogs behaviour
- Like the scene of an accident, an owner is responsible to stay and report to ensure that a victim can retrieve proper care (vaccinations, etc)
- Just like a traffic accident
- I am cynical about owners of biters. They might not give honest answers without authority there. But I am concerned about the length of a wait if someone needs needs medical treatment.
- Agree in general but "bite" is a variable term and could be subject to a wide interpretation.
- its responsible thing to do
- The pet owner must remain at the scene of a violent incident
- This should be considered the same as a car accident.
- yes
- I feel that in dog attack/ bite cases it should be required that the owner is present to discuss the incident. Dogs are not bad, their owners most of the time play a big role in the behaviors the dog shows. Not being trained adequately, being neglected.. etc. so I feel it is important for the owner to remain at the scene

- All parties should be required to remain on scene unless imminent injury that requires treatment. This will help to better understand why the situation occurred.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- Too many dogs are running loose in parks or on paths, where they should be on leash. They run up and scare other people and dogs or worse yet...attack other dogs. Many of the owners of these dogs just take off and are never accountable for taking their dog off leash.
- Just like with a car accident. Things happen and you should never leave the scene
- It seems like a basic responsibility of a pet owner to have some responsibility over the actions of their pet. If pet owners are required to stay and give information to develop a history of the pet and more importantly the owner, hopefully we can see useful trends.
- People take responsibility
- They should stay and take responsibility for there animal.
- I believe this supports responsible pet ownership, however I don't believe it should be used in a case of one person's word against another, especially if the animal which bit another dog was provoked or acting in self-defense.
- It can be very costly if a dog has been bitten by another dog. It is imperative to see what damage the dog has incurred and also in order to find and investigate multiple incidences.
- Dog owners need to be responsible
- They should be transparent in what happened and responsible for any cost to injuries
- Responsible dog owners would not walk away from an incident
- Any responsible pet owner should be doing this already
- It's imperative that the dog owner cooperate with authorities after any bite attack.
- Just like the scene of an automobile accident, all evidence needs to be collected. Both sides need to be present.
- Responsible pet ownership does not mean breed specific legislation. I DO NOT support any of the measures related to "nuisance" dogs, and I DO NOT support the definition or declaration of "nuisance"
- Yes, is self explanatory.
- Hold the owner accountable for their dogs actions
- If a dog bites a person and the owner flees the scene it is basically a hit and run.
- Dog owners should be held responsible for what their dog does. Pitbulls may not be the whole problem with so many irresponsible pet owners in Calgary.
- Yes, they should remain at the scene so all proper information is exchanged. Including dog breed, too often pit bulls are wrongly accused when they aren't involved, keeping the owner at the scene would be helpful to get all correct information.
- It's just like a hit and run
- Treat it as a case by case basis, but make the owner of the offending dog liable for the attack and treat it as an offense that is similar to a hit and run and fleeing the scene.

- Same scenario for a hit and run in a vehicle.
- Unless needing vet attention, in which case contact information must be left with a witness/other person.
- The owner is responsible for their animals, if they are present they need to remain, unless the animal is in need of medical attention, then they should tend to the animal and be allowed a grace period to report/ ID themselves
- As a dog owner, I take responsibility for my dog. If an incident occurred, I feel it would be appropriate to exchange contact information with the other party involved.
- Dog owners are the problem not the dogs the owner should take responsibility
- This should already be mandatory any scenario where a dog attack occurs and the owner of the animal is not present for the arrival of law enforcement, is a circumstance where they got away with it. If this was a bylaw not only would the dog be punished, but the owner should at minimum be fined for knowingly being negligent to the victim of the attack.
- Emergency vet bills should be paid by the owner of the unstable dog.
- If a dog bites someone or another animal. It should be decided between the bitten party and owner what the next steps will be.
- It depends on the severity. Most responsible pet owners would do this anyway if it were serious enough, but having a law that requires irresponsible pet owners to be held accountable would help.
- Easy. If your dog got hurt you'd want the owner of the dog that hurt yours to stick around. Why wouldn't you extend the same respect???
- Exchange contact information, yes absolutely. But it may do more harm to keep an agitated animal around, I would support the owner exchanging information and leaving the scene instead of waiting for authorities.
- Why wouldn't you stay.
- This applies to ANY animal or breed.
- I think it's only appropriate for an owner to stay at the scene.
- "Sometimes the incident is minor but sometimes it is more than that and you won't know until you get home and have a better look at your pet (or you) that there is more damage than you initially thought. This would allow the injured party to contact a ""responsible"" pet owner to follow up and be accountable (usually financially) for actions taken by their pet.
- I have had my dogs bitten by other dogs before and have always demanded the other parties contact information immediately."
- Owners should be held accountable for their dogs behaviours.
- Leaving the scene is irresponsible and feels like a hit and run.
- It's no different than leaving the scene of a vehicle accident. If you (or your dog) cause damage, you need to stick around to begin resolving the issue.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their animal and should be held accountable if needed
- Yes doesn't matter the breed. Your dog bites someone [removed] exchange information and be an adult. Ensure that individual is alright. If you can't do that then you shouldn't own a dog period no matter the breed.

- I know of many stories of dog owners who have fled when their dog misbehaves.
- Humans are at fault as much as the animals. Often people ask for permission before approaching a dog. If the owner has the dog under control and a human comes and disturbed it, the dog isn't really at fault.
- really, an explanation? isn't it self evident? dog owners can't be trusted
- Requires no explanation. My answer is yes.
- In servers cases
- Accountability is key. Owners need to be held responsible
- .
- To give an extra account of what happened. That could affect future decisions about the dog.
- Such information is vital to following up and protecting the public
- An owner should not be allowed to leave the site of an incident.
- Bad dog owners should be held responsible
- Far too often aggressive dog owners leave the scene in order to avoid further embarrassment of dealing with by law. It should be a huge fine if they leave the scene prior to resolution
- The dog owner must be responsible to provide necessary information.
- They should stay and talk with the Bylaw officer.
- A bite should be treated similar to a car accident. The attacking dog should be removed from the situation, and informal exchanged between parties.
- We're expected to do the same thing for car accidents, this also kind of make sense. But maybe only if the other person is injured?
- it common sense
- The owner is then forced to take responsibility.
- It makes sense
- It makes sense to me. For the "if necessary" though, how is this defined? Is this that a bitten person or owner of a bitten animal determines if they want enforcement involved or not?
- Yes I agree with the owner staying at the scene of the incident to make sure everyone is ok. It should be treated like a car accident!
- Owner should either take responsibility or defend their dog.
- Within reason. If the animal requires vet attention or needs to be removed from the area for safety or health (including mental) health reasons
- The dog should be under the guidance of their owner, similar to a child, and therefore the owner is responsible for their actions.
- It should be the same as vehicular accidents where both parties remain at the scene unless medical attention is required.
- Should be a fine if they leave just like hit and run accidents
- Owner's are responsible for the actions of their pet and must remain on scene to provide contact information and assistance
- It's the responsible thing to do

- There should be a legal requirement to stay on scene just like any other injury related accident ie. motor vehicle accident,
- Owners are responsible for their pets.
- A responsible dog owner would want to explain
- its kinda like getting in a car accident I think a decent person will stay and do what is needed to make sure all involved are ok , will help weed out poor pet owner.
- Like an accident. Untrained dogs can provoke trained dogs, people sometimes have bad behaviours or children aggravating a dog, bylaw should see all sides
- As a victim of a pit bull attack the owners of the pit bull tried to lie about contact information
- as in any injury accident be it a car or job site you must remain on site, similar goes for an injury accident that involves injury by an animal or to an animal
- must stay to deal with police
- This is a criminal offence if owners are not able to keep their pet in line they should be facing consequences and if they fail to remain at the scene they must either call 311 and give their info or face fines and possible seizure of their animals
- This should be automatic. If your dog causes trauma to a person/child/dog, you should stay on the scene. This should be no different than fleeing the scene of an accident.
- You wouldn't flee a crime scene so adequate evidence and witnesses need to be present to obtain the most accurate information
- The owner should be responsible for the incident and provide information to the office. Just like you can't leave the traffic accident scene where somebody was hurt before an enforcement officer came.
- While sometimes these things happen and it may not always be out of aggression but fear we are responsible for our pets. With that we need to be prepared to do everything in our power to help our pet through the incident in a positive manner.
- i think any pet owner should be held accountable if they have not properly trained their dog. again, owners are the problem, not the dogs themselves.
- the owner of an unpredictable dog should have precautions in place to prevent incidents of aggression. if a dog attacks a person or other animal it is the responsibility of the owner for not taking the proper precautions to protect their dog and others.
- Yes I believe the owner should get to explain their side of the story.
- You're responsible for ur dog
- Just like a serious accident, they should stay on scene, exchange info
- Owner must remain with animal until bylaw is on scene to hear facts
- "What happens if they leave? It's just like a collision, how many times do people hit and run and nothing happens.

- Yes of course owners should stay and take responsibility."

- If I hit someone with my car I have to stick around, if my dog attacks someone I should be held equally accountable.
- 100% the owner in addition should be charged with assault and negligence of training and controlling the dog.
- The owner is responsible for their pet. If ANY dog should bite anyone then that owner should shell out money for proper training. If that can not be provided the dog should be taken away and find a suitable home to rehabilitate the dog.
- It is part of being a responsible dog owner.
- Common sense
- This is just good behavior. Same as when you are expected to stay at the scene in a driving accident.
- Something like this would be more beneficial than a restriction on dog breeds in general. It would ensure owners are kept accountable for bites.
- If vet and medical fees are necessary owners information needs to be acquired
- Dog owners should be responsible to stay at the scene just like any other crime or incident. I.e; car accidents
- I've been but to many times and the owner leaves and can't be found to be held responsible
- Dog Owner remain on the scene and speak to enforcement officer and fines and to keep dog in their home
- As with any crime or incident it is always best to talk to everyone that needs to know details so everyone understands exactly what and how it happened. Leaving the scene or trying to get out as fast as possible makes the offending party look guilty or guiltier to third party witnesses.
- responsible action to take responsibility for dogs actions/behaviour
- Well just like any other kind of accident you should be liable is your dog bites someone or another animal therefore you should be required to stay at the scene until everything is dealt with also think of it like a hit and run that's not right
- To many cases of irresponsible owner walking away
- they person whose dog bit if it is a very specific situation should be responsible for all medical costs.
- Explain what and why it happened
- The same as any incident which results in injury/damage to person or property, the person should be on the scene or have produced ID and contact info if the animal needs to be removed to de-escalate the situation.
- Dogs do not bite only because they are aggressive, it's natural defensive behaviour and would be good to give the owner the opportunity to explain the behaviour
- As long as it is safe to do so. If dogs have been fighting, having a requirement that owners stay together following, while the animals are with them and escalated, may be problematic.
- It is the owners responsibility to seek reparation for Safety and costs, as well as fines if their dog bites a human or other dog.
- The owner needs to be responsible for any damages caused by their dog

- They should remain to provide context (sometimes a bite happened because the dog was teased or a person didn't follow the owner's instruction to not touch a dog). Also to provide contact information so the vaccination status of the dog can be confirmed.
- The owner needs to be responsible and accountable for his or her dog.
- The dog/owner at fault should be liable to pay vet bills incurred by the injured dog.
- Common sense. Can't believe this isn't already a requirement.
- They are ultimately responsible for their pet. People who are being jerks and don't care about the attack and just leave should definitely be fined. Incidents need to be discussed by all parties, and often long term planning needs to happen (ie training) to prevent future incidents.
- To ensure that the bite victim receives appropriate care, that public health is considered and that the dog owner is held legally responsible for the dog's behaviour.
- A owner is responsible for their dogs actions and should take that responsibility
- We need to know that dangerous dogs are being recorded and receiving help. Following muzzle laws in public as well as shot records/health.
- It is the ethical response.
- It's important to know both sides of what happened. Sometimes dogs can be aggravated by human behaviour (ie. Approaching without asking)
- Similar to a hit and run
- As a responsible pet owner, we are accountable for our pets actions. ESPECIALLY if someone is hurt.
- If someone's child commits a crime the parents are typically contacted and informed/questioned, so it makes sense for a dogs owner to be held accountable for their pets actions as well.
- This seems like common sense and am surprised if there are no rules like this in place already.
- Only if the owner is able to do so without causing harm to the animal.
- Responsibility needs to be taken by those who have caused harmed, intended or not. Should be same system as car accidents
- Information is needed to follow up
- The owner should stay at the scene, as they are partially responsible for their dogs behaviour, and are completely responsible for the dog (owner).
- if the bite is minor (minor scratch not requiring medical attention) then this should not be enforced
- agree - Unless the dog bite was minor (i.e. made in play that resulted in a small scratch or wound not needing vet care)
- Each dog owner must be accountable for their dogs behaviour
- "Yes to explain. But euthanasia no.
- [removed]"
- an owner should take responsibility of his animals behavior
- You are responsible for your dog. If it is involved in any sort of incident it is the owners responsibility to ensure both sides are ok and share any and all information that might help. Dogs are not the problem; people are.

- It is an injury and should be assisted however why the dog bit the person should also be looked at
 - The owner should stay at the scene because if somebody got hurt you cant just leave them there.
 - Similar to car/vehicle collisions, all parties should remain at the scene.
 - It's like a hit and run- if you don't know who did it, how do you seek restitution?
 - Leaving the scene is an equivalent of a hit and run.
 - Of course the owner should stay at the scene it's the same with an accident. The owner is responsible for their dogs actions
 - The owner is ultimately responsible and there is no way to identify the dog if the owner leaves the scene.
 - This should be treated the same way society treats vehicle accidents. Information from the owner of the dog that bit should be given to the guardian of the dog/person that was bit to allow for follow-up/cost reimbursement for medical expenses as required. If medical attention is required for either a dog or person, vaccination information will be needed. As well, the owner of the dog that bit must attend force-free training classes or agree to surrender the dog to a non-profit animal rescue society that employs force-free training methods, and provide proof to the guardian of the dog/person that was bit. Failure to do so within 10 days of the bite incident may result in immediate seizure and surrender of the dog to a City of Calgary partner non-profit rescue organization specializing in force-free training and re-homing of dogs with bite history. City of Calgary agrees to reimburse said partner non-profit rescue organization for any vaccinations and/or medical expenses (including spay/neuter) the dog requires prior to being re-homed. All other supplies and food to be provided by the partner non-profit rescue organization.
 - If a dog bites another person or animal (domestic pet/livestock - lest we get inundated with complaints from bleeding hearts about every rabbit or squirrel) it should be treated no differently than an assault or negligence which results in bodily harm. Owners should be held accountable for their inability to control their dog.
 - "people should be responsible for their animals behaviour. So staying to ensure that any harm is remedied is responsible ownership.
- 100% yes if it bites a human, dog on dog is maybe up for discussion based on severity."
 - Absolutely support this. A responsible dog owner would stay and ensure that accurate information is given. Dog owners leaving a scene could suggest negligence of part of the owner and could also result in unfair resolutions (especially for the animal involved)
 - I see this as requiring a motorist to remain at the scene of an accident
 - It should be treated the same as an assault with injuries or injuries sustained in a vehicle collision; where an individual is required to remain on the scene.
 - Dogs have a different way of communicating and if one person feels that the other persons dog was being aggressive then they should remain behind to discuss the incident if necessary. Most reasonable and responsible dog owners will not need the involvement of an enforcement officer.
 - If mutual agreement both parties could waive this requirement if the incident is judged minor.

- Should be treated the same as damaging another car with own vehicle. If owner flees - treat it similar to a "hit and run".
- I don't see the difference between remaining at the scene of an accident or remaining on the scene of an incident such as a dog bite/attack. Whenever harm has come to an individual, the owner of the damaging item must stay at the scene until the situation has been fully processed
- Responsibility and accountability in any accident scenario should always be upheld.
- It is reasonable that the same principal with a car accident is applied- if damage or injury is done then the responsible party should provide detail to the injured party.
- The dog biting a person in a serious way should be viewed the same as a their owner assaulting that person and they should be required to stay on the scene. However the scene needs to be assessed by a professional to see if the bite was warranted. if it was defensive or offensive in the dogs eyes.
- Like a car accident, you should have to stay.
- Like any other incident , I can't leave the scene of a accident or crime if I witness or am directly involved
- People need to take responsibility for their animals
- If the bite is unprovoked and the victim requires medical attention, the offending dogs owner should be held ac out able. If the offender is not known to the victims owner, there is no way to identify the offending owner. Plus it's the right thing to do.
- Owners need to take more responsibility. I have a dog that has bitten, and we never go near other dogs or within lunging distance of people he does not know. You cannot leave these things to chance, and per owners just do not take the responsibility seriously
- While this doesn't address bites that are not discovered until later, it does effectively assign responsibility for bites that are recognized at the scene, immediately. For me, it is the equivalent of a "hit and run" to allow a dog owner to just walk away after their dog bites a human or animal. It sends a very disturbing message that it's no big deal, and offenders (and I mean the owners) don't have to take action (as in, go to training WITH their dog). Most likely these "bite and run" cases would be repeat offenders, too.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their pets especially if they have caused harm to aother person or animal. Owners should be required to talk to an officer at the scene.
- The owner is responsible for the animal's actions. The animal in question may have not known any better or had the intention of doing harm.
- In the same way as a car accident, it stops people from changing their position of stance after the incident has been dealt with in person. A dog may antagonize another dog and get bit for it, the former owner may admit it was their animals fault at the time then change stance. This creates a they-said situation which is bad for the system and the animals.
- I truly feel that most aggressive dogs are owned by folks who don't understand the dogs needs. A biting incident is a good time to step in and help the owner to better care for his animal. Engage a couple of volunteers to run classes on how to feed, water and exercise he dog. Both owner and dog will benefit.

- Many flee the area when their dog bites. An additional fine for leaving the scene of the incident should apply if you can find the owner
- Dog owners who have an animal that have produced harm to someone should be liable for providing all necessary information required to the victim such as they would be expected to do in a motor vehicle incident.
- Should be treated as a hit and run if they leave
- I witnessed a dog attack and the owner tried to leave the scene with no information as to how to reach them. Should be like a hit-and-run accident...bearing in mind that the owner, NOT THE DOG, is to blame for the situation.
- This would bring a safer sense of security to other pet owners when accidents like this happen.
- If any type of dog bits a person to the point where both parties agree that placing charges is important, then the owner should take responsibility despite the dog breed.
- As previously mentioned, my dogs have been attacked multiple times. Twice was at a dog park and I was able to separate the dogs but the other owner just walked away. Once was in my neighborhood and the owner drove with me to take my dog to the vet and paid for all vet expenses. That was proper dog ownership.
- They should have to provide their personal contact information with proof of identification.
- Accountability is one major issue amongst pet owners.
- No different than a traffic accident. It is your dog and there for your responsibility.
- It is important for the officer to see the dog to get a fair assessment of their character and behavior as well as their owners behavior. If it is a calm dog the is a possibility the victim could be embellishing the story or have provoked it.
- Just like any accidents responsible parties should remain to give information(their side of story) if the dog can be safely contained /restrained by the owner there is no reason they should not stay.
- I think it is necessary as the dog that was bit may require a vet appointment and the owner of the dog that was doing the biting may need to pay for the bill.
- I think for the purpose of best supporting the dogs rehabilitation and holding the owner accountable, this is important.
- Just as with a car accident, I think it is fair for the owner to stay and exchange information
- Accountability is absolutely necessary in these situations.
- to ensure that all contact information has been collected on both sides.
- I support it but I doubt it will happen. In alot of cases dog owners tend to make themselves scarce after their dog has bitten or attached another dog/person. It should be treated like a car accident, if you leave the scene you should be charged.
- Sure if a dog viscouisly attacks another animal or human yes
- Should there be blood drawn both parties should mutually agree if it was a normal dog scruff or further action is needed ie vet care
- Contact information should be shared, but we must keep in mind that often it isnt' the dog's fault. Many people don't know how to approach dogs properly. If a dog bites out of fear, that is partly the person who approached the dog in the wrong manner's fault. The general public should be educated about how to approach animals. Dos and don'ts

- the owner must be accountable for their pet. Personal information must be shared similar to a vehicle accident
- As with any crime, one must remain at the scene if they were involved.
- Dogs that are "repeat offenders" should be reported as such
- The individual who received the bite should receive medical attention and the person with the dog should help them to make sure they're OK.
- within reasonable time
- Regardless of how embarrassing it is, you are the owner and must take responsibility. Own up, maybe there's a 3 strike system. Regardless if your dog bit someone, it's absolutely necessary to stay and speak on behalf of your dog, we don't know if the other dog instigated it or what tell your side of the story!
- Sharing contact information only should be sufficient for dog on animal [dog] bites. I would support staying on scene for an officer for dog on people bites.
- Yes but you'll have to not threaten euthenazia otherwise they'll run away.
- If your dog bites someone or another dog you must remain on scene until by law officers arrive. If you leave the scene its no different than assaulting another person and fleeing and you should be arrested for fleeing the scene of violence.
- Unless vet care is requires for the pet or care for the owner
- Or at least ensure that the officer knows where u live
- A dog bite incident is similar to a car accident. The owner is responsible for their dog's behaviour. They should stay at the incident to explain what happened and why they allowed their dog to bite someone.
- Absolutely - if the dog owner is able to freely leave the scene before a record is made of the incident, then all these efforts are in vain, as there is no subsequent record and therefore no potential for penalty.
- I believe responsible pet ownership comes down to the owner accepting responsibility for their animal. They should remain at the scene to show their cooperation to resolve the situation and incident, without needing to be afraid of having their dog taken or penalties issued on them. They would also be able to witness to whether the party who was bitten was provoking the dog.
- Any bite attack that causes a visible wound or draws blood should be the threshold
- A dog owner is responsible for their dog - if the dog hurts a person or other animal the owner needs to take responsibility for what the dog did.
- The owner of an animal that bites another animal or person should be help responsible, and should be provided their contact information to cover vet and emergency bills, as well as their information to an enforcement officer to have a report ran and it noted on their pet license account with the city.
- Owners are fully accountable for their dogs. Not the breed of the dog.
- Absolutely, no disagreement here.

- Absolutely. You wouldn't flee the scene of a car accident. If the dog is responsible for an attack, both owners should stay and provide info.
- Their animal caused injury. As its owner, they need to be held accountable for its actions.
- People need to take responsibility for the actions of their dog. They are liable for damage/vet bills occurring from the incident. This should be enforced
- Pet owners need to take more responsibility for their animals
- Just like a car accident, there should be a requirement to share information.
- My dog was bitten by another dog and the owner took off. I had to pay for the vet and now my dog is traumatized.
- Depending on the severity - i.e. if an actual injury is sustained
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs behavior, good or bad, and also advocate for their dogs.
- Seems like common sense. i'm surprised that rule doesn't already exist.
- As someone who has been bitten by an aggressive Labradoodle in an off-leash, owners ought to be responsible for their pets, including consequences when they are poorly trained. Others shouldn't have to fear off-leash parks because owners face no repercussions for their pet's poor obedience skills.
- If an incident occurs where a dog bites a human , the owner of the dog and the victim of the bite should remain on scene to discuss what the next courses of action will take place. If said two people cannot come to an agreement or conclusion an enforcement officer can then get involved.
- "Just like a hit and run..
- if the owner leaves the scene there should be a charge!!"
- People need to be held accountable.
- It seems reasonable as dog owners are fundamentally accountable for their dog's behaviour.
- I believe that it's the owners responsibility to remain at the scene to exchange information or speak with a bylaw officer and they should be responsible for damages done by their animal
- How else can the owner of the dog causing harm be held responsible?
- People need to remain 100% accountable for their pets
- The owner should be held accountable for their actions. If there has been an injury the owner should remain at the scene this should be handled the same as an accident and fines associated with leaving the scene of an accident.
- I believe contact information should be shared but I believe the time it takes for an enforcement officer could be avoided and have separate meetings. If a dog bites a person or another dog it should be taken to a safe space so as to not harm anyone else in the meantime.
- It's the dog's owner responsibility not the dog.
- People should take responsibility for their animals, regardless of the size of the dog and the severity of the bite
- I have never met a mean dog, but I have come across poor owners, who either have not trained and socialized their dogs, or have trained their dogs to be aggressive. I think owners should remain on site and that thorough checks into the owners should be done in the case of a dog bite.

- Same as if you hit another car, you have to remain at the scene.
- It's the considerate thing to do. Less time is spent trying to track dog and owner. Comparable to leaving the scene of an accident.
- We need to hold owners accountable
- So they are able to explain their side of the story.
- Only if a dog bites a person
- Both parties need to stay at scene to discuss what happened
- ultimately the dog is the responsibility, dependent and reflection of its ownership, so they definitely need to stay and explain what they think has happened
- Dog owners should always stay at the scene
- We must hold dog owners NOT THE BREED accountable
- they should be charged if left site.
- I would like a biting incident to be treated the same was as a vehicle accident.
- I think there needs to be an accountability but the other side of that is also that there needs to be understanding and objectivity from officials and all parties involved. If a dog bites someone/something else because it is severely provoked or threatened, that is a natural reaction and the one doing the provoking should also be held accountable for that and remain on the scene.
- Just as in a car accident, the dog owner must provide their information to ensure their accountability
- Owners are responsible for all actions.
- This should go towards all dogs.
- I think this should happen with any dog ... this makes me sick
- Then it can be on record of the owner and the dog in hopes to prevent or recognize other offences.
- Accountability and responsibility on all parts!! It's truly that simple
- Definitely if the dog bites a human. If a dog bites another dog and it is not serious I don't think they need to remain on scene. Sometimes dogs get into small scraps.
- Absolutely. This is so important if we want to prevent repeat attacks by dangerous dogs. Right now there is no incentive to stay at the scene of the crime and I would expect most dog owners to want to protect their pets and leave with them right away. This also means that bylaw would need to be on site quickly.
- If an aggressive dog does bite a person or another animal then their owner should be investigated if they are treating the dog poorly to make it behave this way. If not then they should be ordered to attend obedience classes for their dog
- I've been bit and the owner took off so I didn't know if the dog had rabies.
- For ALL BREEDS. Bully breeds are not the enemy. Those chihuahua's and little ones are. There is 100% evidence that my shepherd bites harder than a Pitbull. They would never. But don't breed shame on no evidence.
- Yes, this should be related to insurance cases and mandatory insurance for pitbull owners. It would work same as vehicle accidents.
- I like this because it is due diligence as a pet owner. The problem is, how would you enforce this?

- AS A 911 OPERATOR I'VE TAKEN CALLS WHERE THE DOG OWNER FLED THE SCENE OF A DOG ATTACK.
- It's the right thing to do.
- The dog owner and dog fevered to be heard and the opportunity to explain. Especially of the dog had been provoked.
- That is their responsibility as a pet owner to take accountability for their pets actions. If they do not they should be fined heavily when caught.
- So the situation is dealt with efficiently, respectfully and lower risk for both parties. Also less stress on the animals. (Let's encourage the owner to take responsibility, instead of blaming the animal. It is NOT the animal's fault. It is the result of poor ownership and lack of training.)
- Some owners flee, leaving the victim not knowing if the dog has an up to date vaccination record..that needs to be disclosed
- no matter the breed or type of animal, if there is a bite the owner should always be present
- It makes sense to share your information however if the officer arrives and escalated as situation it's not on the dog it's on the officer and he should have to deal with the consequences
- Owners should take responsibility for their pets, regardless of how severe an incident is there are reasons as to why it happened and should be sorted out to make sure future incidents don't happen. By not staying present and talking to enforcement officers you'd be passing this incident off as not a problem and therefore the chances of bites happening in the future become a greater threat.
- I believe that there can be several incidents where a dog could bite. It should be recorded whether or not it is linked to animal behavior or potentially incited by another animal or person.
- It's the responsible things to do.
- It is a crime so the owner should stay to answer for the crime. It is no different from leaving the scene of a car accident.
- I have been by a dog and the owner and dog ran away while i sought first aid in a local business. I had to go to the ER to make sure that I was okay and had all required shots
- needs to be dealt with while incident is fresh, and in the event of injury, witness would be a great help in determining exactly what happened and possibly why
- It is no different than a car accident. A responsible dog owner should stay to make sure the individual is ok, unless the situation has escalated and it is unsafe to do so. (Example: Can't control dog)
- This prevents confusions or misunderstandings, by being present and explaining the situation.
- Should it be severe this would be necessary
- Mitigating factors need to be explained to the officer immediately to prevent skewing of events.
- If requested by the victim. Irresponsible owners, regardless of breed, who tend to let their animals out of their control tend to brush off negative interactions without nearing the situation. Particularly at dog parks.
- If the bite is serious and a Person or Dog is Injured then yes action should be taken. This needs to be handled carefully as some people will escalate a small situation and abuse the law to take action based on their own prejudices rather than a proportional response based on the situation.

- Do you allow hit and runs with a vehicle? It's common sense.
- An owner is responsible for their dog's behaviour. If an offence is committed, the guilty party should have to stay where they are.
- ABSOLUTELY. Why would they not?? Why would they leave?? Unless it is to avoid penalties and responsibilities. Responsible pet owners remain at the scene.
- Many years ago my dog was attacked by a dog running at large. Although the owner showed up, admitted responsibility, and offered to pay the vet bill, he disappeared and I was unable to find him.
- It should be expected that when a severe case happens people take responsibility. I'm confused about the box headed dogs, on all accounts box headed dogs are not more aggressive than any other breed nor do they bite as much. Why would we treat this any different than real crime? Because it has the potential to do more damage they are all penalized? What garbage is that? You'll have half of the dog breeds in the city caged up in half a year with these stupid rules.
- Is exactly like leaving the scene of a car accident. Someone/pet has been injured and the person responsible must remain until enforcement arrives.
- yes, because much like my answer above, it is important to know what kind of person is owning the dog. The person is much more at fault than the dog is. An enforcement officer can make sure the dog is in a happy, caring home, that gives it the best chance of success.
- it should be treated like a car accident.
- If your dog attacks someone or another dog, you should be paying for the vet bill of the other dog.
- Just like a car accident, I feel that if any injury at the time occurs then a monetary compensation should be delt with.
- Dog owners flee too often with their dog. It should be considered an offence.
- A dog owner needs to be responsible for their dogs actions, if something happens they need to stay and make sure the right things are done to resolve the issue.
- Law abiding citizens with decent morals will already do so.
- Of course just
- Owners should be held accountable for their dog's behaviour
- The owner of the responsible dog should be responsible for any vet bills incurred
- Owner are responsible for there pets
- owners need to be accountable
- Dog owners should be responsible for their dogs.
- It is the right thing to do
- A responsible owner would stay around, an irresponsible owner will run to avoid consequences
- Pet ownership is a responsibility not a free for all.
- Be a good human.
- Share contact information, they should not necessarily have to stay and wait for an officer. If you have a pic of of them and their drivers license and you have their phone number etc, and a bylaw officer can't be there for a while, no one should have to wait.
- "They should be able to do one of two things:

- Defend their dog in the event the dog was provoked by another dog or a human
- Be held accountable in the event they were in the wrong"
- The owner of the dog that bites needs to share contact information with the victim(s) to be able to find out the health of the offending dog for any issues that may arise regarding the victim(s).
- To verify dog ownership. To ensure owners are made responsible for the actions of their dog.
- To identify the dog for health & safety reasons. To insure owner is accountable for dog.
- It is important to obtain information such as vaccination history and if this is a primary attack or a repeat offence. As well the circumstances surrounding the attack: was the human being aggressive towards the dog or the dogs owner? What is the severity of the bite?
- If an owner is responsible they will stay. The problem with this whole "Pitbull" ban is that it punishes the well behaved dogs and does little to stop the criminal element. Don't forget that Pitbulls are called the Nanny dogs, they are sweet gentle loving dogs that happen to be extremely strong. The owners can make any dog mean.
- Pet owners must take full responsibility for their animal regardless of circumstances. To flee is synonymous with hit and run.
- It's the same as a vehicle accident for example. The dog owner should remain at the scene...tough one though as many dog owners haven't licensed their dogs and run - hence tripling the fines for doing that should occur.
- I think if both parties feel it is necessary then the owner should remain and only if the bite is severe enough to warrant enforcement officer involvement. If it is a minor scuffle at a dog park akin to regular dog behavior then no.
- Only necessary if the bite has caused harm that may warrant medical attention and the person has been the victim of the bite requests the dog owner to stay at the scene
- It is the responsibility of the owner to ensure their pet is not aggressive. If the pet observes aggressive behaviour the owner should be required to pass along contact information to help cover any cost associated with the behaviour. Again, this should go for ALL breeds, big and small.
- The dog owner usually (in my experience) has a role in why the dog has attacked something
- Same as car accident. Most times it's not the dog or the breed, it's the owners fault for either poor training and/or poor supervision and control of dog. Owner is liable for dogs actions.
- People need to be held accountable for their dogs actions. I don't believe a dog is bad, an owner is the bad one.
- The owner is the responsible party
- Should be mandatory already!
- There needs to be a threshold here. Not every minor dog fight that causes no harm at an off leash should trigger this. But if a person has been hurt, or another animal, then the dog owner should be required to stay and self-report because a civil wrong has been committed - damage has been caused. People should pay for their damage, and own up to it.
- Owners of dogs who have bitten other dogs or people must remain at the scene to ensure that all the information is given.
- No different than a car accident

- Why is this not already a rule. Dog bites are assault
- If a dog bites a dog or other animal then they should pay the vet bill . Information Should be exchanged just like a car accident
- I have been bitten by a dog before and the owners fled. Which left me with many questions regarding the vaccination state of the dog.
- Otherwise it allows for belligerent behaviour
- This should apply to all dogs, pitbulls should NOT be singled out!
- The owner should have the right to defend its dog.
- It is only fair to remain present and get statements from ALL the parties involved so that a reasonable result can be made
- All owners no matter the breed or size of dog should be responsible for their animal.
- Too often the owner does not take responsibility, leaving the victims with multiple forms of trauma to deal with and no support.
- Stop targeting pit type dogs [removed] proved it was the owners not the dog or create Lifetime Adversaries -- Coderre went against the people and LOST his mayorship you'll hear us ... at the ballot
- I've had a dog at the dog attack my dog an astounding vet bill and the owner of this dog gave me a false # so they didn't have any consequences. It was not a bully breed that attacked my Yorkie either .
- No dog should be allowed to maul another pet or person without providing pertinent information to the victim. The presence of an officer prevents any difficulties.
- Pure logic. Don't leave the scene of an incident or accident.
- As is reasonable. Owner may need to go retrieve the dog. Some enforcers are unreasonable, looking for any reason to slap someone with an offence.
- If people need to stay after a car accident then they should stay after a pet incident
- Owners need to take responsibility. If owners were to take responsibility of their pets in the first place this survey wouldn't even exist.
- In order to establish if the dog is up to date on rabies vaccine.
- Responsible dog owners take responsibility for their dogs actions
- That's just common sense of being a moral person and responsible dog owner
- Owner should be responsible enough to take ownership of their pet and how they have raised it
- Makes sense. Scene of an accident
- If someone or someones dog was bitten and needed to go to the hospital then by all means information should be taken down and kept on record. If it wasn't an intentional bite meaning to hurt but just an unfortunate incident it should be set as a warning for the dog at fault and owner but information is not needed. It should also be up to the people/dog(s) involved if they would like to make that call for police/bylaw services to be a part of that incident.
- They are 100% responsible for their dog's misbehaviour

- People need to be held accountable for the damage their property (dog) does. Why should it be any different than a hit and run with a car?
- Nothing to explain. Straight forward.
- Too many owners of attack dogs flee scene after their dog commits an offense.
- Yes, if no animal or person is in immediate danger of death, but consideration of circumstances should be given if there is need of emergency medical aid for human or animal.
- Dog incidents should be treated like traffic accidents
- Animals do not carry the responsibility to act civilized, humans do
- All owners should be responsible for their actions and the actions of their pers. Also others should also be responsible for their actions to the situation
- There are just too many dogs attacking humans
- ..? Be responsible for your dog. It is the owners responsibility to train their dog and to be mindful of their emotional state/behaviour around guests/strangers. If your dog lashes out then it is your responsibility to respond to the consequences.
- Accountability
- It's just more sensible and saves the owner more trouble than there could've been in the first place. But it'd be best to not make a big deal about it as dogs don't know that what they are doing is wrong, they just think of it as a protection mechanism, it's not their fault.
- Every owner should show responsibility for their pet. As it's most often not a bully breed going after another dog or human. A dog should not be punished due to owner negligence in training. But owners should be the ones that are held responsible, not the dog.
- Just like a car accident you must own up to what your dog does.
- It's the right thing to do as a responsible pet owner
- Yes ONLY IF the bite is severe enough to cause a person or dog to need stitches. If this is a play bite to another dog and maybe the dog was slightly injured but not because of a "vivacious" attack then no. The dogs are playing this happens and there are many owners out there who will over react and take advantage of a situation. This would be a waste of tax payers money if police are called for small incidents and anyone who has had a dog understands that dogs play like kids and sometimes they are slightly injured but they learn. The owners and discipline their dogs and work with them to play nicer and listen to commands to play nice from their owner while playing. In addition, people will over react and abuse this situation for dogs that nip at people. Often people will run up to strangers dogs to pet them without asking and sometimes if the dog is learning to socialize and they get scared or overwhelmed (especially if it's a large group and not a common occurrence they may nip). This does not mean the dog is aggressive or an owner should have to exchange information with someone who may report this to the police and the dog could be labelled as a nuisance dog defending itself. People like dogs and children learn from these mistakes. It's often not the dogs fault they bite. It's usually the other person.
- Dog owners must be responsible for their dog and the dogs actions reflect on the owner just as much as the dog
- Na

- An exchange of information after a dog bite seems reasonable. Just like any other accident or incident in the rest of society.
- It's important to remain to explain the situation. Animals bite because they are involved, not just because they feel like it. The bitten party could be at fault however if both parties are not there to explain then it could be very one sided. The animal should however remain in an area to reduce anxiety and refrain from causing it further stress.
- An owner should be responsible for their pet. They are suppose to be a part of the family and matter to us like family shouldn't we at least do the cleanse thing we'd do in the case of an accident exchange information ? Wait and clear up everything
- It's like a hit and run. You have the responsibility to stay, and if people don't, that is definitely worthy of a fine.
- i think it's important for the owner of the dog to explain the situation
- Owners need to be responsible and accountable for their animals behaviour.
- Its basically assault and should be dealt with as such. The penalty for not staying at the scene should be severe.
- There are ALWAYS 2 sides to every story, dogs just dont bite for no reason
- If there is a fight and you're seen as the agitator generally you should stay and please your case. If you leave you're generally seen as guilty.
- Dog bites should be treated the same as car accidents
- Information should always be exchanged in these situations however, if the medical attention required to the dog at all sever the safety of the dogs should be placed first.
- Because it was probably the person that provoked the dog then the dogs fault
- Only have too if something actually happens
- To ensure their dog has had proper vaccinations. Not to get the dog taken away or to be reprimanded as we don't know the circumstances under which the dog was inclined to bite
- Kind of like a car accident, make sure other person or animal is safe if not get medical help, and share phone number and I guess make a report to a bylaw officer
- If your dog bites someone and that person wants to call the cops on you. You should remain at the scene to accept responsibility.
- Human beings that exercise poor leadership/control over their animal need to be held accountable much like they are held accountable for poor control over their vehicle. However, dogs should not be punished for the poor leadership/training of their owners: all dogs, even involved in violent, need to be given the opportunity to rehabilitate with a trainer either in a day-program or a residential program for the dog, and if such owners are unable to provide such training, the animal should be forfeited to the humane society where that agency can be trusted to oversee and place the rehabilitation and rehoming of the animal.
- #NAME?
- I thought this was a rule already and I think it should be a rule. (Similar to if someone gets in a motor accident)

- The owner should take responsibility for their pet and the situation by remaining at the scene and reaching out to the victim following the attack
- Unless vet or doctor attention is required, both parties should stay at the scene to resolve the situation. If medical attention was required then an incident report should be made as soon as both parties are safe and able to complete one.
- Makes it easier to find and identify the dog
- to an extent. If the dog bit in response to being harassed then it is unfair for a traumatized dog to remain in an unsafe situation. Bites are often a result of people not knowing how to interact with dogs and are therefore not the dogs fault. The victim or owner are more likely to be at fault.
- It's the owners responsibility to explain the situation. If its never happened before and there is an explanation then that should be considered. If someone takes off then that would show that its the owner thats the problem.
- If I hit your car I wouldn't leave the scene?
- Common sense
- It's just like getting into a car accident: you should be there to share details with the other party.
- Just like any accident, information should be given on scene.
- Every responsible dog owner would do this without needing a bylaw. This would give bylaw enforcement the power to charge owners who fail to do this.
- Too many dogs attacking other dogs and the owner leaves, leaving the injured dog's owner with a huge bill at the vet.
- Be accountable
- If a dog causes harm the owner should have to share information, be liable for damages unless someone is breaking into there residence
- If there is an incident, BOTH people should have to exchange contact information. (Same as an automobile accident).
- Any responsible DOG owner would remain at the scene, regardless of the breed of dog!
- It should be similar to the rules of a traffic accident. You must stay on the scene and provide your pertinent info.
- They're difficult to locate once they leave the scene.
- Being responsible pet owner
- The owner should be held responsible
- As long as it is safe to do so, and does not cause further stress or harm to the victim, the dog, or bystanders. If it is best for the dog to be removed from the situation, then I think it's reasonable for the owner to leave their contact info to discuss with an officer at a later time.
- Responsible owners would do this without the need to make it a law
- An owner is responsible for its dogs actions, not the dog. The owner should be held accountable for bites, etc.
- As a dog owner, one needs to be responsible for their dog's behaviour. If that dog bites a person, or another animal contact info is necessary in case of any litigation.

- Sometimes a dog bite to another animal requires a vet's attention which should be paid for by the owner of the biting dog. Just like with a car accident and insurance you need to wait for an officer for a proper report
- Similar to a car accident, both parties should exchange contact information.
- Yes, dog owners should have to be responsible for their dogs behaviour but also be given the opportunity to explain any extenuating circumstances. Frequently, the erroneous "pitbull" label is put on dogs and they are blamed for dog incidents without any other facts being heard.
- They should be able to speak on behalf of their pet, as they know their behaviour the best. As well, if it is a recurring incident, then other measures can be taken as contact information would be in the system.
- Accountability of an owner when their dog bites any other animal or person seems like common sense and the responsible thing to do.
- the owner should take responsibility and stay to provide due diligence. However in the case of a dog bite, wouldn't it be safer if the dog was removed from the scene expediently to prevent further harm and trauma to the victim?
- Obviously
- If an official is not available.. then a photo of a driver's license is required.
- This way the owner can be given the proper supports that the dog may need going forward.
- Don't leave the scene of the crime
- The owner must stay to offer any assistance as well as supply required information
- It is extremely important for the owner to remain at the scene, just to ensure they are held accountable for the pet's actions and also to take care of any vet bills or hospital bills required due to the attack.
- Yes, with the caveat that the first priority should be to confine the dog to prevent further negative behaviour. If this involves leaving the immediate scene to put a dog in a car or kennel, that should be acceptable. Removing the animal completely before an enforcement officer arrives should be an offence.
- The information should be filed by all parties involved.
- Dog owners need to be held responsible and should be empathetic to others, especially those who are injured or scared
- Yes it's like a hit and run if they leave
- I believe it's important for all to stay at the scene to ensure all sides of the story are heard and proper action may be taken.
- If someone is seriously injured it should obviously be dealt with but it should not always be pinned on the animal
- As a responsible dog owner, you should stay at the scene. I can understand why a dog owner would leave - if they're scared their dog is going to be taken away and euthanized without investigation. A dog bite victim is not always innocent.
- Owning a dog is a privilege and not a right and as pet guardians we are responsible for how our pet behaves - and truthfully humans are more often than not the source of the dogs behaviour (good and bad). Thus, the owner must be held responsible and accountable for their actions which lead to their dog feeling they needed to bite in order to protect themselves. This needs to come with education to the owner of how THEY contributed to the bite incident as they could have instead helped deescalate their dog and likely avoided the situation.

- Unless both parties agree not to share or report the incident
- To many people are allowing their dogs to attack humans or other families dogs and are getting away with it because they leave before giving out any information to make sure something is noted on the dogs history.
- All information should be documented so both sides of the story can be heard rather than assuming it's the dogs fault.
- If owner does not remain at scene, they should be treated as leaving the scene of an accident with subsequent harsh penalty.
- Take responsibility for your dogs behaviour.
- An incident involving me and my pet, is similar to any incident involving me and my car. A dog bite is an act of violence or accidental injury that involves me and I should remain at the scene of the incident
- [removed]
- No different than staying at the scene of an MVA.
- if a dog bites the owner is the one that should take responsibility as they have not trained the dog properly and are not taking necessary steps for safety. it is the owners fault not the dog
- Same as an automotive incident
- a dog attack or accident should be held to the same standard as any other incident i.e. car accident. This way both parties are able to voice there version of events and come to a reasonable conclusion and resolve the issue fairly.
- If not remain, at least place the dog in a controlled location so they may return to give contact information.
- Owners should be also held accountable no matter what the breed!
- The owner must be the responsible party and receive the sanction.
- Absolutely support it. People need to be held accountable for their animals actions
- It's Would literally be like a hit and run If the owners of the aggressive dog just left.
- Yes because the owner needs to be held responsible. Its no different that a hit and run accident
- An owner is responsible for keeping their dog under control.
- Yes with a caveat, the dog should be placed in a safe situation but the owner needs to share contact information for insurance and legal purposes
- If the incident is serious, the owner of the dog should stay to share their contact information. If the other rosy owner does not mind it should not be necessary. The enforcement officer should only come if crucial and serious.
- similar to staying at a car accident. You stay to tell your side of the incident.
- If there an injury to the other dog or to the person, then yes. If there was no injury, then no.

- Remaining on scene allows the owner to properly explain their perspective and therefore take ownership and defense for their animal. It also requires that the victim remain on the scene of an incident so that they are also held accountable to a more accurate story.
- Like I said earlier, most dog issues are due to the owners own negligence in training their dog or meeting it's breeds specific needs. Therefore, they should be there to take responsibility when their dog causes problems.
- If an injury has occurred, I don't think they should have to wait for bylaw officers, they have no training to deal with this sort of thing, they shoot first and ask questions later!! But the injured party should be compensated for damages.
- How else would you be able to identify the owner?
- It ensures all details (eg whether dog has up-to-date) shots and makes the owner more visibly accountable
- It is important to do so because if an individual or their animal is attacked, it ensures the individual responsible (with the pet who attacked) takes responsibility and isn't careless incase it could happen to other individuals or animals
- As the owner of the dog, they should take responsibility for the incident- whether it was a freak accident or not. If I was attacked by a dog, I don't want the owner just leaving and maybe getting away.
- more emphasis on punishments to the owners and required education programs to retrain the humans who neglect their dogs / animals... humans need to face jail time and high fines to deter being [removed] pet owners
- If safe to do so. The animal may need to be removed which may require the owner leaving the area.
- I had to run behind someone's vehicle to keep them at the scene of the attack.
- Critical to understand dog history and vaccinations.
- People must take responsibility for the behaviour of their animal.
- Same as any offence for anything.
- This can be actively fixed, depending on severity. That being said, regardless of severity all dog owners are responsible for their dogs when it comes to the law of human beings, as dogs do not know these laws.
- The owner should be responsible for the vet bills of the injured dog of their dog instigated and there are witnesses
- This should always have been an enforced rule!
- The owner must take responsibility for their dog.
- If it's safe to do so, the owner has a responsibility to the actions of their dog.
- As long as it does not make the situation worse. If there are circumstances at play where remaining at the scene of an incident would make the situation worse, then, before leaving, contact information should be provided, preferably with proof that the information is truthful. Pictures can hopefully be taken of all involved as well.
- I feel that it is your responsibility as an owner to deal/ help with the situation caused by your dog

- I am in favor of anything that puts accountability on the owner rather than delivers a blanket punishment to dogs who are behaved.
- Only if the bite victim is interested in pursuing intervention with an officer
- Would also be helpful to clarify the definition of a bite and the implication to the owner. All dogs have the potential to bite - there's endless improperly trained chihuahuas out there but the damage they do is less.
- Yes, because obviously that is the right thing to do.
- Staying at the scene is a sign of responsible ownership
- It would depend on the circumstances. And for the record, I was victim to a bad dog attack in Calgary many years ago, I still have the scars from it. The dog was unlicensed, left the property to attack, and the owner verbally abused me. The attending officer did not issue this person any citation, choosing to give a second chance.
- Many dog owners will leave the scene or down play the issue or defect responsibility.
- As an responsible pet owner, it should be required that one takes on the responsibility of reporting to and communicating with enforcement officers in the case of dog bites.
- A dog owner should be held accountable regarding vet bills ect
- The owner must be held accountable and that requires the attendance of the owner or caregiver (if owner is outside the city).
- remaining on scene is responsible ownership
- to leave the scene of an incident without contact information can feel powerless to a victim. In order for everyone to be supported, contact information should be shared right away. No longer than 5 minutes, so as to access resources and remove any animals in distress.
- Otherwise there is no accountability for the owners.
- Like leaving the scene of a car accident which is illegal...
- Your dog bites, you stay and pay costs of vet bills and replacement of victim dog, if it is beyond veterinary care. Your dog bites a person obviously the dog needs to be taken away by proper officials.
- It is the responsible thing to do
- I believe the dog should have a chance to go home, by explaining the situation to prove if the dog was or wasn't provoked.
- Too many people run off without consequences after their dog bites another animal leaving that animals owner to deal with vet bills. The aggressors owner should be liable.
- It is a good idea, however, I can see that if people are scared of a risk of euthanasia from their dogs making a mistake, they might flee the scene. I think if that's not a risk people would be more likely to stay.
- It's the owner that is accountable for the behaviour of the dog, they must have certified training to care for and control the animal, they must be responsible for the animals actions should it cause harm, they must compensate appropriately for damages incurred by the animal due to the owners lack of control. The owner must provide accurate contact information for themselves and their insurance company that covers liability for the animal. ALL animals, not just the "pitbull" variety.

- There are many unreported bites by small dog owners. The City should start tracking these.
- Same as an accident. Owner whose dog caused damage should be held liable and that will only happen if they stick around
- If you hit someone with your car you can't legally leave the scene. It should be the same if your dog bites someone. However, it may be difficult to get the dog under control at the scene while speaking with the injured person and law enforcement, and depending on the situation could lead to more injuries. Perhaps it should be that they stay at the scene, and when calling 911/law enforcement they can request (trained, competent) assistance with a dog that is having difficulty calming down.
- If a dog is attacked by another dog information must be exchanged as the victimized dog may need veterinarian care, and owner of the dog who attacked must be liable for those veterinarian costs
- If your dog attacks someone, then an animal you are responsible for was involved in an assault. You should stay, just as you would in a vehicle collision.
- I think this is equivalent to a fender bender (minor car accident) - all those involved are required to stay at the scene if talk with an enforcement officer is needed
- if the bite is severe; drew blood. as it is only fair to take responsibility for your actions and those in your custody.
- It should be treated just like a car crash. Everyone has to stay and give their information and statements.
- It should not be only if the dog bites a person for a dog owner remain at the scene. I run in the parks and I have been charged by dogs (more than one sometimes) and had to repelled them with dog spray or trying to show an aggressive response to their attack. The fact that I have to track the owner residence for the city to do anything and may be give the dog owner a warning or a $68 dollar fine is pathetic. Dogs and their owners have more rights then Humans. The anxiety that an attack cause is worth at lot more than $68 dollar. I was given advice ounce by a park officer who advised to protect my arteries from a dog bite to prevent bleeding out if you can stop it. So it should not be just a bite that counts but an attack by a dog should have consequences for the owner and the dog and they should remain at the scene.
- the person is as responsible for the attitude of the dog and may be the reason for the attitude if treated poorly or abused.
- I think incidents should be recorded, so yes. If the owner leaves the scene there may be no way to identify the owner or dog
- The officer needs to be there within 15 mins. You can't expect people to wait longer. Animals/people who need medical attention cannot wait for someone to arrive.
- owners are responsible for their pets just like parents are for their kids
- To make sure the correct person is charged.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for the behavior of their dog.
- definitely to exchange information. And if a law enforcement officer is called both parties should stay at the scene.
- Its like a car accident. Damages occurred. Names need to be exchanged. Pictures taken.

- Understanding whether the dog is at fault or not is very important before even considering euthanasia.
- The owners have to be accountable.
- As with any “accident”, those involved should remain in attendance however with the number of dogs killed by police over the years, often needlessly, if I had such a dog I would probably get a friend to take the dog to safety first,
- Dog owners should be accountable for their dog, no matter the breed, and act responsibly if there is an incident. This includes sharing contact information and discussion with the appropriate authorities
- I think that the owner of a dog bite should be held responsible for the behaviour of their dog. It's the owner's fault, not the dog's.
- Yes, it's the right thing to do and can de-escalate the issue
- Accountability is important. As long as the animal is able to be safely and respectfully in a vehicle or at a distance from the direct area.
- Often, they leave as the wounded dog owner is in a stressed state. They should be held responsible for vet bills.
- It's part of being a responsible owner
- Proper human beings would do so with or without a law
- If you are in an accident, you must remain at the scene. It is easy for pet owner to disappear without being identified.
- They should have to pay for it too
- Of course the guy should wait. It's not always the dog's fault
- Dog is not responsible, owner is
- It's not the dog's fault. It's most likely from a bad owner, and he should be punished, not the dog.
- I feel it would be the same as staying at the scene of a motor vehicle collision.
- this would leave a consequence for those not responsible enough to own up to what has happened. It would help discover repeat offenders
- Otherwise it is hard to prove to identify the dog owner as they don't want to admit it was their dog that did it.
- Should be considered the same as a hit and run if they leave
- If the owner does not remain at the scene and can be later identified, there should be a significant fine.
- I agree with this statement, as I do believe many dog owners are very uneducated when they get a dog, and instead of instilling fear of enforcement, it should be an educational opportunity for everyone involved, and ensure that the proper measures are taken to make sure the OWNER is aware of the consequences. The owners of animals in my opinion are more at fault than the animal. And on a lower note below regarding the flag system, NO CHILD should approach ANY DOG it doesn't know. The parents should not be letting their child run up to any dog, under any circumstance. I think this should be an opportunity to educate the human beings, because humans are the ones who go into dog ownership unprepared, and always the dog is blamed.
- But this is for all dogs. Not one select breed

- ANY DOG CAN BITE AND LEAVE MARKS
- The owner themselves need to take responsibility for the dogs actions..this has something to do with how the dog is trained.
- You are responsible for your dog. On leash or off. It's the same as driving. You must remain at the scene of a collision. Why is this any different
- As long as it was safe to do so for all parties including the dog.
- It's the responsible thing to fo
- Same as what we would expect in a car accident or altercation between two (or more) people. Not sure how it could be enforced, but a good rule.
- The dog owner should be jailed for leaving the scene.
- Important to keep track so it doesn't happen again
- They just run off and don't take responsible
- I think this is an appropriate measure to have I. Place for ANY dog bite. Not specifically to pitbulls which wouldn't be fair.
- It's the same as if your in a car accident, you stay at the scene and exchange information and make sure everyone is ok
- This is a crime, you have to remain at the scene.
- This may be difficult to enforce in a bite situation but I do support it.
- People who are bitten should know the history of the dog that bit them, I.e the animal has rabies. They may have to pay for injuries out of pocket. I believe the dog owner should be responsible for that.
- It's much like a car accident responsible people stick around and endure everything is ok.
- If an enforcement officer is required all parties in the incident should be required at the scene of the incident
- Key word "If necessary"
- If it's a serious enough incident, than a report needs to be written/fine and have it decided that the dog needs training or special restrictions
- There are ALOT of situations where any dog can bite... I have had many people allow their dogs to come flying at mine saying "my dogs friendly" when I say no .. they have no control over their dog. My dog has been to obedience school and the trainer specifically said dogs are like humans and don't have to like every other dog. Responsible ownership of dogs is key! If I had a strange man walk up to me and I felt uncomfortable my dog is going to sense that ... if that person is to reach out to my dog who is fearful and touch it without permission than the repercussions are NOT that dogs fault ! Pitbull is not a breed it is a poor term to categorize a number of breeds, there is no such thing as a bad dog ... but there are such things as bad owners. I personally think all dogs should be on a leash at all times unless on their own property if that dog leaves that property or is unattended why should the dog suffer ???? I'm sick and tired of humans getting away with this and have no consequences. Bully breeds and many other breeds should be owned by somebody who is educated and has the time to spend with these animals and give them proper training and attention.

Too many irresponsible pet owners out there and the dogs are the ones being euthanized. It's not ok.

- I think if a dog gets aggressive the owner needs to stay and address the problem but it's not just Bolick types of dogs it is all types of dogs stop trying to pick on one breed
- Too many examples of people fleeing the scene after their vicious dog has attacked /injured another dog or person. It happens.
- You should always stay if your dog bites and give your information.
- Treat their action the same way a hit a run with a car is dealt with.
- Any dog owner has to be held accountable for their dog. If your dog bites a person or another animal because you didn't train it properly you are putting your dog's life on the line for your laziness and that is unforgivable.
- If a dog bites a person yes , If a dog off lead attacks a dog on lead yes but If two dogs off lead fight then no
- If it's a severe bite to animal or person yes the owner should be required to give his/her information to whoever was effected and talk with an officer if the severity of the bite is high
- Owners are responsible for their dogs actions. It may be hard but I would like to think I would do the right thing if this unfortunate event ever happened with my dogs.
- Pet owners need to be held responsible for their pet actions
- Yes of course, but any/all dogs not just pit bulls
- The owner is responsible and if they leave it is tantamount t to a hit and run. It is important that it be determined if this is a first offender or not, and the owner's identity is required for tickets or if compensation is deemed due.
- As long as the officer can make a timely appearance.
- Owners must be accountable and liable for their pets' training or lack there of.
- Birds are not an issue, feeding stray cats is. The food attracts skunks and other wildlife, however Birds are not an issue.
- The owner should be held financially responsible for damages. The owner should also be given a chance to defend the actions of their dog, in some situations. If the owner is irresponsible and negligent, they should be fined. Perhaps they should be required to undergo behaviour training. Perhaps they should be banned from offleash parks. They need to be there so that the appropriate actions can be determined.
- It is the dog 'owners' responsibility to explain the actions of the animal
- It is important to track the dogs vaccination history and to watch the dog for 10 days for rabies. If this information can't be properly verified without an enforcement officer then this needs to happen with the officer
- It's pretty obvious, it's the owner responsibility. Dogs, all dogs naturally protect owners, if a dog is hostile, the owner would be able to see it, knows about it. 95% of pit bull breeds don't hurt harm or are aggressive. Little mutts bite more often. This whole thing seems pregedious. Where some people own large dominate dogs, it's the owners that make or let them be aggressive.
- As long as it is safe for both the people and animals

- It's called responsible pet ownership
- many people give fake information
- Makes sense
- Absolutely how else will you get the information on what happened? To stay at the scene of the attack shows that the dog owner is responsible,
- Why not?
- The dog is the owners responsibility and they should be held responsible not the dog.
- These owners of vicious dogs don't want to be known to the public.
- To leave would be comparable to a hit and run. Unless they are unable to control their pet (which they shouldnt have if this is the case). They should be required to stay and make sure that the animal or person receives the care/help they need.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to stay at the scene of the incident as there may be large costs that incur after the attack and the owner should share some of the responsibility of helping with those expenses.
- The owner is responsible for their pet and therefore should ensure the safety of their dog(s) and others around them both human and animal
- Again, dogs that attack should be fined (owners) for first offence. Euthanized second offence
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions
- Owner can explain normal behaviour of canine and explain any reasons for temporary irritability. Explain context of the situation.
- It's what a responsible owner must do
- If you or you dog is involved in an incident where harm is caused then information should be exchanged between the parties involved.
- Must be able to know the dogs boundaries and triggers (from previous care, etc.) If someone was warned, the owner should be able to explain the incident on their own terms. Not just one-sided interview
- Owner of dog that bit should be responsible for any medical or vet bills
- If this owner is a responsible dog owner, this shouldn't even be a problem. It's incompetent, irresponsible dog owners that probably shouldn't have animals in the first place that would leave an incident. In that case, maybe the animal should be apprehended and given a proper home with a useful owner to care for them.
- The tribunal members should be qualified dog behaviorists.
- There are always two sides to a story.
- There is an amount of responsibility when owning a pet and you do get to say both sides to the story
- If you hit a car, you need to stay at the scene. A dog attack should follow a similar rule. Only exception would be if that animal is injured and needs immediate medical attention and the owner must take the animal. No matter what, the animal should not suffer.
- Unless there is a risk of escalation by owners or dogs, or a severe injury.
- Holds everyone accountable

- Treat it like a car accident. No hit and runs
- Owners are responsible for the behaviour of their pets. Aggression is trained, not bred. No single breed i.e pit bull should be singled out, only dogs that have proven to be a danger/nuisance should be reprimanded
- You need to get information from all parties to know what really happened. All too often the bylaws are written that “no dog shall bite a human”, period; but what if the human causes the situation? A TRUE investigation needs to be conducted as to what happened and for that to happen, all people need to be available.
- If your dog bites someone YOU are responsible for them, like a hit and run, it is YOUR fault, not the car.
- Dog owners should be 100% responsible for controlling their dog. Just like you cannot leave the scene of a crime without speaking to the police a dog bite can be a very serious situation depending on the severity of injury caused.
- Not staying on scene would be essentially the same as leaving the scene of an accident
- As a responsible dog owner I would like the bylaw to hear both sides of story
- Absolutely. However, when animals are present and aggressive, things can get dangerous. Allowances for confining the animal or vet care concessions should be made.
- "Information is needed to see what provoked the attack
- I wish to emphasize, it is not just pit bull
- Strains that can be unpredictable
- Chows,, Doberman's. A pregnant female, female with
- Pups. The emphasis must be owners control"
- To many leave the scene now. The owners both need to have their side heard.
- Absolutely. Need further information on the vaccination history of the dog. Need to understand what happened and if something similar has happened b4
- Within reason - securing the animal is of utmost priority in order to defuse the situation.
- it should operate the same way a car accident works.
- Owners of dogs need to be held responsible.
- There are near daily reports of owners leaving the scene of an incident in the Facebook Calgary Dogs group. An extra, significant fine should be imposed for leaving the scene of an incident.
- A responsible dog owner should remain at the scene so both sides are heard.
- Responsible pet owners should remain at the scene or nearby and providing contact details
- Only to explain why it happened. People tease dogs. They let their dogs run loose and they confront a dig on a lead. If the dog in the lead bites that loose dog it's not the owner or dog on the leads fault.
- Liability for one thing, Another is that people encounter more problems with other animals than "Pit Bull" breeds, but the breed of such animals are rarely mentioned unless there is a political racist bent such as the current leaning towards "Pit Bulls"
- Lots of little dogs bite too, owners try to pick them up instead of obedience training and there should be repercussions to those owners same as to large breed owners. Equal and fair to all breeds.

- This is the owner's responsibility to take actions for the situation.
- As long as there is no discrimination on the breed of the dog I believe this is a good idea since a responsible dog owner would do this regardless.
- Makes sense for them to stay on scene.
- Information must be shared, but injuries must be treated as well.
- If a dog is acting in a way that is unsafe to other people or animals that is a reflection on the owner and in turn they should have to stay and be held responsible for what their dog has done.
- It seems like a hit and run if you leave the scene
- Important to have information about the health history of the attacking dog. Important to help the victim call an ambulance if needed, or to take her injured pet to a vet.
- Owners must take responsibility for their animal's actions.
- Conflicts occur, and the owner should be responsible regardless of the size or breed.
- Seems strange that this isn't already a law.
- The owner is responsible for his dog and its behaviour
- Easier to explain exact circumstances surrounding incident if on location and demands speedy processing while incident is fresh in all parties' minds
- The animal's health history should be shared with the person who was bitten and or owner of the other animal bit. If they do not stay this history may not be shared and an animal who is prone to aggressive behaviour could go under the radar.
- In all things "dog", it's ALWAYS the owner's responsibility to be aware of, and accountable for the actions of their animal.
- If that makes someone else feel safe sure. First name and phone number only though.
- Dog owners should be held responsible
- There will be questions regarding up to date vaccinations among other things
- It's no different than a hit and run. If your dog creates damage to property, persons or other animals, owners or those in possession of the dog are required to stay on scene.
- Again this should be enforced for people who attack animals as well.
- Out of complete common courtesy
- Without the dog owner stating what happened to provoke an attack you won't know the actual truth in an incident
- As the owner you are responsible and should give your contact information and calmly remain at the scene. The caveat being if your pet has bitten because they are so upset they risk a second defensive action you should leave your information and leave to remove your pet from causing additional harm and more stress on it.
- Would be beneficial to work out vet bills etc
- Two reasons, one, they need to be held accountable. Two, they need to be able to provide a witness statement. There are two sides to every story. Is it not illegal to flee the scene of any accident?
- Taking responsibility for your animal is key
- I think it is an appropriate measure

- The victim isn't automatically exempt from fault.
- accountability
- The dog is in the care and control of the owner. This is common sense.
- Dog showing signs of aggressivity should take lessons from a good behaviorist. Owner should understand the dog's body language better. That will prevent the situation to repeat.
- The owner is responsible for their animal. It should be treated like a vehicle accident.
- People need more responsibility when it comes to their pets. I have had multiple dogs and breeds each one is trained differently but banning from socializing the dogs doesn't help in the training process, people need to learn how to respond to each individual dogs needs. Proper training and socializing for both people and pet.
- It's important to have input on why a dog may have felt the need to bite and for a reporting officer to see if the dog is behaving aggressively.
- Both parties have* to be present until an enforcement officer arrives.
- I was mauled by a dog and severely affected health wise and the owner never had to compensate me. I d not know if the dog was put down or the owner fined. Injustice!
- This is the same requirement for remaining at the scene of an accident. Yes please!
- I don't think an explanation is really needed - if your dog hurts someone it's your responsibility to ensure that person is okay and follow the proper procedures.
- No different than any other type of physical incident.
- Just like a car accident in my opinion, if a dog causes an injury you should have to pay for it
- Repeat offenders (irresponsible pet owners) need to be held accountable, and education provided as well as financial responsibility taken.
- It's no different than a car accident.
- You should be responsible for your dog!!!
- Yes, the owner should take responsibility of his dog. This also eliminates any misunderstandings on severity of bite and provides the victim information incase they are costs involved. Also, so victim can't exaggerate the bite. With a third party, enforcement officer, it would be documented accurately if the matter goes further.
- If a dog bites another living being the owner is responsible and should be held accountable in a timely fashion. (you'll notice that this reasoning is logical, UNLIKE the blatant attack on pit bulls in this survey. A survey should not be biased.)
- Owner being required to stay at the scene makes them more accountable in the event of a bite.
- Extra fines for someone whose dog injured someone or dog and leaves the scene. Owners of dogs that injure people or other animals need to be held responsible.
- Accountability
- The owner holds responsibility over their own dog's behavior, and therefore must be able to provide an explanation of the situation
- The dog owner should have to explain and take responsibility for their dogs actions.

- It is important to address the situation. The owner should be responsible to the victim and should be held accountable. This may prevent multiple incidents.
- Too many times, the owner takes off while the victim is distracted etc. It should be treated like a hit & run accident.
- It is very important for animal bite victims to be able to have the animal owner's contact information for follow up with bylaw or health care. Animal bite victims might need Rabies treatment.
- As the owner, they hold responsibility over the dog's actions and behaviour, and therefore must be available to provide an explanation
- this is simple the responsible answer.
- Their dog their problem their responsibility
- I would like "bite" to be defined. I would also like the rule to require the 'victim' or all those involved to remain - there could have been provocation.
- The rules should be the same for ALL breeds. A dog bit is traumatizing regardless of the breed. Obviously, if your dog bites someone you should stay on scene, even if it's a small dog.
- A dog is the responsibility of the owner. If it misbehaves, they owner needs to be held accountable. More than anything it's lack of training or lack of knowledge by the owner when a dog bites; dogs give plenty of signals before they resort to biting and it's on the owner to know and train their dog properly.
- An violent assault has occurred, the owner of the animal that committed the assault should be required by law to be present just as if the a violent assault by a human occurs.
- No explanation needed.
- It is similar to a car accident and the parties should exchange information so that parties can be responsible for their actions.
- Staying at the scene is a major part of being a responsible pet owner and taking accountability for the incident.
- Considering the potential for medical and or vet costs, this burden should not be on the victim. Hopefully this is not due to the victim tormenting/inciting the bite.
- SAME FINE SHOULD APPLY TO FLEEING THE SCENE OF AN ACCIDENT
- Yes to talking to the person who was bitten but as long as they left their contact info that should be enough. They should not have to wait for a peace officer.
- Do i really need to explain
- If a dog bites, the victim (person) or owner of the victim should be able to assess the severity of the injury and determine if they would like contact information from the owner of the dog who bit.
- You bump a car you have to, why not a canine incident?
- Because too often the owners make a run for it and they are not taking any responsibility for their dogs actions. Ultimately, the dogs behaviour falls on the dog owner.
- Dog owners must take responsibility for their animals
- Too many times the person just leaves and nothing comes of the incident. Especially in off leash parks.
- Because from the sounds of it whoever wrote this is uneducated.

- How is this not already required!?
- Not sure why this hasn't already been required as the amount of people with badly behaved animals that bite people has been aware of for sometime and there is hardly any accountability.
- It is the dog owners who are the issue, not the dog.
- The owner should be accountable for injuries if they are sustained by the owners animal.
- The dog owner should remain so that they can be held accountable for their dog's actions.
- A dog is the persons property just like a car. When you are in an accident with your vehicle you are required to remain at the scene. This should be the exact same for dogs
- It should be treated like a car accident - everyone should remain at the scene, including bystanders.
- If the bite results in an injury then it is the Due diligence of the owner to remain at the scene
- A dog owner should be responsible. ANY dog owner, I have been bitten by small dogs far more often than a large breed.
- Status quo
- Most bites are due to improper trained owners regardless of breed. Owners who cannot be responsible on training their animals should have a lifetime ban of owning a pet if they cannot care for the animals physical and emotional needs.
- Umm yes ita scene of a crime, like the dog is going to be able to talk to the officer telling it oh well I may or may not have bitten this person on purpose.
- This survey is really inappropriate towards pit bulls. Any dog has the potential to bite and while pit bulls MAY cause more severe bites (as your survey suggests) the way an animal is treated by its owner is by far more predictive of its behaviour than its breed. Irresponsible dog owners should suffer the consequences, not their dogs. If a dog has to be put down by the City because of a irresponsible dog owner let it get that out of hand, that person should be face significant fines and not be allowed to own dogs again.
- This is important for liability purposes and ensuring that insurance is contacted in a timely manner.
- Should the bite draw blood, I can't imagine as a responsible dog owner myself, leaving the scene. I think this should have further details (ie the bite needs to be enough to have drawn blood) and simply not an interaction between dogs.
- It is important to find out information about the dog that attacked and the the incident.
- to obtain owner onfo, and follow up records of the animal having had all rabies shots.
- If a dog bites a human or another dog, the owner should absolutely have to wait for an enforcement officer to provide their information. People leave to quickly and the injured party is left to deal with the incident themselves.
- I am a proud pit bull owner why don't u take the owner of the dog that bites to jail and not put down the dog and to make pitbull owners muzzle their dogs is the most dumbest thing I have ever heard pit bulls. Are a vary loyal breed of dog maybe u should educate yourself a little more one the pitbull breed
- owners must take responsibility
- any injury done to your animal by another animal and the owner is there it is their responsibility of both parties and bystanders to give report of what happened.

- A dog owner needs to be held responsible for any injuries, and speaking with an enforcement officer will ensure this.
- This should be obvious but some people are cowards, and a law is unlikely to stop some people from running from the situation
- The incident may require more evidence that 'said incident' did actually occur and if so, the reason. Ex: Who was actually at fault?!
- Because the dog has bitten someone or another animal it should be addressed and the dog should no longer be allowed in that particular area. If it happens 2 times then we KNOW the dog is aggressive and should be not be taken off the property. So I marked yes but in reality it should be for a written warning where someone should be keep track for the city. Once the warnings been done then 2nd stage is the action of the animal staying in its home.
- The person should be responsible for giving contact information.
- Like having to stay at the scene of an accident.
- An owner is almost entirely responsible for their pet's behaviour. They need to be held accountable and make reparations where necessary.
- As there are always 2 sides to every story, it would be ideal to have an enforcement officer interview both parties. This would also avoid bites going unreported.
- Common decency dictates that a person should stick around.
- Same as with a car accident claim - cell phone pictures of dog and the person in charge of the dog at the time of incident, record image of injury, time and place and circumstance of the incidence, exchange address and somehow proof of contact information, so that the person responsible doesn't just lie about their name and walk off with the dog, so that some other future incident could repeat offence. Not necessary to wait for an enforcement officer unless the attack was severe enough to tear skin or cause vicious bodily harm ... or no ID on person in charge of dog at the time of incident.
- Yes they need to be responsible for their dogs actions
- Obtaining a history of the animal is crucial - are all vaccinations up-to-date, is the animal properly licensed?
- It is up to dog owners to ensure that their pet doesn't become a nuisance, if they are a nuisance the owner should be held accountable and punished, not the dog.
- The owner is responsible for the dog, and therefore should be held accountable.
- Dog owners are ultimately responsible for their dog's behaviour. Requiring them to stay allows them to state what happened, which will help to determine if the dog was provoked, or is just not well trained.
- That way both sides of the story get heard not just one.
- To ensure the reason for biting was a vicious animal not one that was provoked by the person that was bit
- enforcement officers should be more visible in play areas and areas that are not off leash.
- There are many non-pitbull attacks that happen at the dog park and the owners just leave and they continue to bring their dangerous dogs to the park to hurt more people/dogs
- This is responsible and will ensure the same dog isnt in multiple attacks

- A dog owner should NEVER leave the scene of an incident, unless the dog requires emergency vet care.
- If the dog / owner has committed an offence they should be required to stay at the scene as long as they can do so safely. How else are you going to identify the perpetrators if they just disappear? It is a large city and parks are open to everyone.
- If something horrible happens from the incidence whether it's an animal needing to be put down or serious damage to a person the owner should have to take responsibility for it
- Don't be a [removed]. If your dog bites someone/their property it's on you to ensure they are safe and to compensate them appropriately
- The problem is always with the owner, rarely the dog. Bad owners equal bad dogs :(
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- Like a hit and run law
- Of any breed. Legislation should have no reference to breed type and should follow dangerous dog (of any breed) legislation.
- Owners of dogs that bite should be responsible for medical/veterinary expenses incurred by the victim, therefore they should be required to present contact information.
- It would be the owners fault and should take responsibility.
- Its just a common thing for practically all crimes/incidents. Both individuals need to share their accounts and possibly information.
- Dog owners need to be held responsible for their dog's actions.
- It's the responsible thing to do
- Yes because we had a dog that was attacked & bit and the owner & the dog took off & we or bylaw never found them
- For dog bites of humans only. No need to involve enforcement officers in scuffles between dogs. The pet owners should work this out between themselves.
- Yes, as a pet owner you are responsible for the behavior of your animal, good or bad. If you are unable to take ownership of your animals actions then you should not be allowed a pet.
- Yes is there is actual damage done. Not if it's just a little dog scuffle.
- To me, I see it not different than if you got into a car accident. Exchange info since you just harmed another person
- This is a no-brainer.
- Humans need to take responsibility for their dogs. Each situation in which a dog reacts needs to be viewed on an individual basis. No dogs are born bad.
- There must be requirements for proper actions in a civil society and more often than not, owners disappear and are not held responsible for their actions. There must be consequences for their actions at all times.
- Needed for cats too
- Of course! Any incident of biting that causes an injury needs to be reviewed and responsibility carried out as determined by appropriate bodies. It's not always the "biter" at fault (someone poking at a dog or otherwise provoking a dog) but every dog owner should be responsible enough to take ownership of the situation.

- You need to know what shots the dog has received to determine if the thing bit is in danger
- Its important to collect information as you dont know anything about that pet or its owners or the potential repercussions of the bite. So its important to stay connected
- It is the responsibility of the owner. Fine the owner! It is not a problem with the dog (regardless of breed). It is a problem with the owner.
- Irresponsible pet ownership / socialization / training is at the root of the problem in scenarios with aggressive dogs. Increased rigour around accountability and responsibility for pet owners is crucial.
- To paraphrase Barbara Woodhouse, there are no bad dogs, but plenty of irresponsible owners.
- yes, the dog owner should be there to discuss the situation and should not be removed from the scene. I believe dog owners should be held responsible, not the dog solely because it bit another dog or person. Both need to be held accountable. The dog is not always the culprit in these situations.
- I have seen 5 children be snapped at or bitten by small dogs in my local park. Not one did the owner apologize or take any action to correct their out of line dog. These dogs were not pitbulls, but small lap dogs. The children bit were escorted away by their family and the dog received no reprimand.
- No matter the breed of dog, they are still the responsibility of the owner and the owners should be held accountable for the dogs actions.
- Just like a hot and run you should have to stay. Maybe the rule is if broken skin? NOT a nip because this is often people not behaving properly
- The owner is responsible to the animal's behavior.
- Unless the party attacked releases liability and have agreed no significant damages occurred
- People need to be responsible for their pets no matter what breed
- Unless the dog or the human needs to go to the vet or hospital.
- In many cases the dog who has been charged was either bitten first or put in a situation where it was challenged but because the owner of the other dog allowed the situation to escalate out of control, Both dogs and owners now face a situation that could've been avoided.
- So record is maintained if owner is fit to have pets, and the quality of training the owner has. Also keeping up to date with shots etc for animal/registered.
- Yes, if a dog bites another person or animal, an enforcement officer should be involved immediately and both owners need to stay on the scene to provide their statement of what happened. And provide contact information.
- Dogs are not generally the problem. Typically "problem" dogs are the result of owners who are not responsible. Dogs should not be punished for bad owners. Owners need to remain at the scene of any incident and take personal responsibility.
- It's a crime to not remain at the scene, especially if your dog was involved.
- Rules regarding responsible dog ownership in and of themselves decrease incidents.
- Dogs can't talk. The only voice they have is the people around them.

- Any responsible owner would do that. It's the irresponsible owners that let their dogs roam free or who don't care if their dogs bite that are the problem
- If the person isn't required to stay and give out information how is the City every going to track or identify nuisance dogs.
- This is just responsible behaviour on behalf of an owner. There should be fines for leaving the scene
- they are responsible
- the owner should have to prove vaccinations at the very least
- You have to take responsibility. Even if you have the best trained dog things can still happen. They are animals
- Dependent on conditions and severity.
- Responsible owners should realize that their training (or lack thereof) led to their dog's actions, and should therefore be made to wait to talk to officers.
- It is on the owner. They should have to remain at the scene to provide pertinent information.
- Why would someone not support the owner staying?
- There must be accountability if the system is to begin to work, requiring owners to remain at the scene is a necessary first step
- If a dog bites a person that should be considered an assault and the owner should be charged under the criminal code.
- It's wrong to do a hit and run, so it should be at any incident no bite and run.
- It's an incident that should be discussed and made sure all parties are okay.
- When enforcing responsible pet ownership this is part of being a responsible owner.
- A dogs owner needs to be held more responsible for their actions. If a dog bit someone they need to make sure they stay and either exchange info or see if the person is okay.
- It is the owner's obligation to be responsible for the actions of their dog. You should stay like you would have to if there was a car accident
- Responsible pet owners must do so.
- Its just a responsible thing to do, you would do the same with car accidents, why should that change for animals?
- Dog owners must be responsible for their animal's behaviour at all times. However, the dog owner should also be able to contribute their side of the story, so the victims should also remain on scene
- Any bite should mean the owner stay to ensure they are responsible for damages
- Extent of injuries is not always known at the time. In order to determine what, if any, responsibility the offender bears and what remuneration for cost of medical care or vet services would be appropriate, all participants should be required to remain on scene and provide contact info to enforcement officers.
- If the owner has allowed this behaviour to manifest in their pet, a fine should be given. Depending on circumstance, not race/species.
- Exactly the same as vehicle accident, you must exchange information

- "Little dogs bite too. Owners think it's funny to allow vicious behaviour towards well behaved larger dogs, and run away.
- I just want to know that the dog is up to date on its shots if it bites another dog."
- So they can be held responsible
- Logic mate
- My dog was attacked at a pet store and the guy took off. I got stuck with a 500 vet bill because his dog attacked for no reason. Never found the guy either. (Note the dog was not a bully breed dog) its not a breed specific issue!
- It is far too easy for vicious dogs and their owners to go into "hiding" after these instances, as I've experienced myself after both my dog and my girlfriend were attacked by dogs on separate occasions.
- To avoid confusion and to hear both sides of the story. Not always the dogs fault.
- You are responsible for YOUR dog. Just the same in a car accident, owner is required to be present. Unless a medical emergency ensues.
- If the situation calls for it.
- There is way too many dogs even in my neighbourhood who let their dog off leash and than they run at dogs on leash and either attack or be a nuisance. Similar to bad owners who take their aggressive dog to the off leash dog parks! Please take this more seriously bylaw! Owners need to be held accountable.
- This is no different than a case of a traffic incident. The onus is again, dependent on the party. If the owner is at fault for mishandling the situation, they should be held responsible. On the otherhand, if the victim did not listen to the owner and engaged with the dog and holds more responsibility, they should be the one held accountable. In either scenario, it is important to have a third party there to hear, assess, and understand the situation.
- It is the same as leaving the scene of a car accident.
- As a responsible dog owner that is the right thing too do!
- responsibility
- I do agree with this unless the owner needs to leave in order to secure the dog for safety purposes
- This is self explanatory. It's the right thing to do.
- I would never leave the scene if my dog bit someone. I expect fair and unbiased investigations where incidents occur in every part of my life, so I don't see any reason not to. This also allows both sides of the story to be heard and any necessary testing (rabies) to be completed immediately.
- Its as if there was a motor vehicle accident
- For any dog that bites another person or animal the owner should stay on site and provide their information.
- the owner should be liable of the person.

- Yes, of course, but I can see an owner being worried their dog would be taken away and even killed so I understand why some might not want to remain. Staying should be seen as cooperative and viewed in the owner and dog's favour
- The owner should be 100% responsible for all damage caused by their dog regardless of the cause of incident.
- Dogs' reactions are always traced to their owners. Owners are responsible for all interactions and actions done by their dogs.
- Owners should have the option to defend their animal's response. Example being many people don't ask before approaching and petting a strange dog and don't know how to read dogs behaviour to know that they're giving them warning signs to leave them alone. They may not be an aggressive dog but the stranger might be doing something that is bothering them ie strangers liked to try to pet where my dog recently had a leg removed. His response is reasonable.
- I think this is simply common sense, and it's embarrassing that there needs to be a law put in place for this. Those who flee the scene don't deserve to be a pet owner. Very simple
- "The dog is the responsibility of the owner.
- If your dog attracts another dog or person you as the owner should assume all the responsibility, its an animal."
- Much like a car accident leaving the scene should be a
- The owner should be responsible for doctor/vet fees of the victim and should have restrictions placed on their dog like a muzzle
- It's an accident such as a car accident and it should be taken care of the same way
- Depending on severity and why the situation occurred, just an exchange of information would be important. Not waiting for enforcement officer as it would be better to diffuse the situation by removing animals from the setting
- Owner is responsible for their dogs behavior.
- Dog owners shall remain at the scene of a dog bite until bylaw officers attend.
- Not only for health & safety assurances, but information should be provided to note whether an owner has a recorded history of complaints, sanctions, or conditions. In this case, duty of ownership should be closely evaluated. As well, leaving the scene of a bite that requires medical attention should be HEAVILY fined.
- We should be able to ascertain the identity of the owner and any dog that is involved in an attack on another dog or any person. That dog needs to be dealt with in a safe and efficient manner. If it is a problem dog, we need to know. Is the attack isolated, or have there been other issues with the dog? The problem in general is not with the dogs, it is with the owners who do not train and control their dogs. Dogs should be off-leash ONLY in designated areas. Other dog owners should not have to worry that their dog might be attacked by someone else's dog.
- The owner is at fault for their dogs behaviour. Anger and aggression is learned by the animal from the owner. If the dog bites the owner should be punished not the animal.
- They are responsible for these actions

- Yes the owner should stay at the scene because IT IS THE OWNERS FAULT. Absolutely ridiculous that the city would think of singling out one group of dogs. I personally have multiple families with a Pit Bull related breed and they are harmless dogs because they are TRAINED. All the blame needs to go towards careless owners.
- I was bitten by a miniature poodle and the owner laughed and continued on their way. All dogs should be treated equally. I do not accept the idea of BSL.
- family member has been bitten. Without the owner staying to take responsibility, how is the victim supposed to confirm vaccination history of the dog etc? If your required to stay for a car crash, you should be required to stay for your animal assaulting someone else.
- If the bite requires medical attention/vet bills the offending owner should be responsible for the bills.
- yes, this allows for tracking, accountability and to ensure the victim can get adequate help if needed.
- If your dog bites someone, you should remain to 1. Lessen confusion (maybe you were being attacked — clarification would be necessary).
- Owners are responsible for their pets and should be held liable as if they committed the offense themselves.
- It would depend on the situation.
- It is important to the dog and families to have a fair outcome in this situation as in dog parks/parks in general either the owner has been negligent (not paying close enough attention to their dog/dog has run off), or another owner has let their dog bother the offending dog (or a person has bothered the dog) leading to this kind of incident. This needs to happen to protect owners who tell other people (or their dogs) to please give their dog space, and it is to protect victims who have not done anything wrong but were attacked or had their dogs attacked by someone else's dog.
- If they leave the scene it's the same as someone leaving in a car accident
- It's illegal to leave the scene of an accident/crime so the same precedent should be followed for an animal attack
- It would be no different than two cars that collided. They should both stay at the scene and wait for the enforcement officer to take down their information and hear from each person what has happened at the scene.
- The pet owner does panic and does not want to lose their dog. Some people can also over dramatize a situation (yes, I have witness one) Sometimes even though the one dog is the biter does not mean he/she is the one at fault. He could have been defending or reacting to the situation/energy by the other dog owner. Not saying biting is okay.
- Yes because how else would you find this out if the person left and there would be no evidence to link back to anyone. should be a fine if they leave
- Every owner should take responsibility for their dog in such a case.
- People should be held responsible for the actions of their animal. The animal isn't naturally aggressive
- To investigate the OWNER and demand training. STOP PUNISHING THE ANIMALS DUE TO NEGLIGENT OWNERS
- Dog owners should remain to take full responsibility for their dogs actions

- The person at fault needs to be held liable for their animal and should be exchanging information.
- If you hit a person (or another car) with your car You are expected to remain at the scene and provide contact information to ensure that the victim(s) involved is provided the proper repercussion(s) for the harm/damage you may have caused. Therefore, you should be expected to do the same if your pet causes harm onto another person and/or their pet. You're pet may have committed the horrible act, but as the owner you are responsible for training your pet so they do not engage in harmful behaviour.
- Seems obvious. Owners need to be responsible for their pets
- The dog would need to be moved to a different location to keep others safe if necessary.
- Each incident has to individual reasons or circumstances surrounding them. I do not think pit bulls are worse then any other breed I think it has to do with how dogs are raised and dealt with.
- Be a responsible pet owner and remain at the scene to discuss any incidents, I think many people in this situation run
- Dog owners should be held accountable for their pets, speaking to law enforcement would ensure help ensure that this occurs
- the owner is responsible for the dog and is a witness of the incident
- How can a no be considered an option?
- If there is any damage to the person or other animal attached then yes it is important for the exchange of information.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to make sure everyone is okay. That being said. I could understand why a pitbull owner would fear for their dog and run. If we didn't discriminate against pit bulls as we do, this wouldn't be the case.
- "Absolutely, this is not only expected but also polite and the responsible behaviour to show when their dog bites/attacks someone else. Any other behaviour to this is considered a "hit and run".
- It is illegal to hit and run by all vehicle/driving standards, it should be illegal when someone's animal hurts, attacks, bites, or kills a victim.
- This shouldn't even be a question, this should just be the expected standard, no matter what pet you own."
- To be accountable for costs associated with treatment of involved parties.
- Unless it's dangerous for the owner to remain, there needs to be an explanation provided to a, hopefully, neutral enforcement officer.
- just as in any incident the involved should stay
- "100%
- If you are responsible for the dog, you need to be held responsible for its actions."
- Of course all dog owners must be held accountable for the actions of their dog.
- This seems like common sense, just like you wouldn't leave the scene of an automobile accident.
- Why would they not remain at the scene is this different than any other attack?
- If any of a person's property - car, a tree on their property, bicycle, dog - causes damage/injury they should be required to stay at the scene of the incident.

- This benefits both parties, and serves to provide perspective in the case.
- I'm surprised this isn't already a rule.
- Just like a car accident, information needs to be exchanged.
- If your dog bites someone, it's your responsibility just the same as if you hit someone with your car.
- It's just like a car accident. Information should be given on both sides.
- I think it would be like any other incident; however I would support the person leaving the scene as long as some information was exchanged
- I hear of stories on our community Facebook page of dogs on and off leash (which are not pit bull or look like pit bulls) in various locations of the neighborhood where they have bit another dog. Based on description alone it appears to be the same dogs and owner of the biting dog leave the scene. They seem to be repeat offenders.
- Yes, much like a car accident, you should be liable to stay and exchange information -- and there should be some accountability on the dog owner to do so.
- It should be the same as a car accident, if your dog bites someone or something they should have to provide information
- It is the responsibility of the owner to stay there, similar to a car accident a person cannot leave
- I work in insurance claims, and to me it's similar to a motor vehicle accident. There is a requirement to stay at an accident scene, share your contact details, and speak to police.
- I believe there are many dog owners that know their dogs need better training and they basically run away from the problem. Generally the dogs that get reported are because the owner is responsible and it happens to be a bull breed. The majority of dog fights I hear about are involving smaller dogs and non bull breeds which have left the scene therefore feeding into the stereotypes of breeds.
- I think we need stricter guidelines on what constitutes a bite. As a large breed dog owner we have had our dog bite by small dogs who inflict no real harm to our big guy And therefore those dogs aren't considered as aggressive. When our big guy plays with smaller dogs and they wrestle it could be considered a bite when they are just playing.
- So that the each person can tell their side of the story, and that the enforcement officer doesn't get told one side of the story.
- Too many people leave and the victims have to resort to Social Media to try to locate the dog owner
- I have been bit multiple time as a kid never had the owner take responsibility
- Accountability. The owner may need training as to handling and training and owning a dog. Courses to be a proper dog owner should be employed just as driving a car.
- Should be a fine associated to leaving, if you've caused damage you are responsible for you should be charged, too bad we didn't have demerit points for pet owners
- Similar to other offences such as traffic ones, remaining on the scene provides the best opportunity for the dog owner to explain the situation from their point of view including where all the parties were at the time of the incident, take photos, review everyone's actions just before, etc.
- This is more likely to happen if a clear and fair process is expected in a tribunal or hearing situation.
- Much like a car accident. Assess damage and share information, if severe enough call police/bylaw
- No different than an assault or accident. Need to stay at the scene.

- if officers can get to the scene quickly. If not, having a stressed dog and owner wait would not be a positive.
- Its no different then a hit and run with a car.
- Obviously make the situation safe (leash the dogs) and remain on scene... If there are injuries to be taken care of, the owner of the dog should be obligated to reimburse the victim for costs.
- No different if I hit your car. Remain on scene exchange info
- If someone's dog comes into contact with another person and a hire occurs, then yes, that owner of the dog should stay on the scene and speak with an officer.
- The owner should take responsibility for the accident and see that it is sorted out before leaving
- It's not the animal that's responsible it's the owner.
- I think it's the owner's responsibility to help cover health costs for injuries to other people by their pet
- It makes more sense to pu ish irrisponsible owners than the dog.
- Too often the offending dog/owner run away or give false information. A rule would not necessarily stop this but could assist with gathering the correct information in order to follow up appropriately later.
- You can't profile a dog until theyve comitted an act of violence, if they have then the owner must take responsibility. Until the point that the dog has committed a violent act there is no reason to enforce muzzling, higher fines, or other discriminatory means.
- It forces the owner to be more responsible for the actions of their dog, and may encourage them to take up obedience training prior to severe incidents
- Owners need to be held accountable for the incident at hand, again bad owners have bad pets
- For safety, there are always two sides of a story. What if someone kicked the dog? Who is at fault then?
- Why is this not the case already?
- There needs to be prompt and proper follow up to determine circumstances.
- If your dog has bitten someone it is your responsibility, if your dog shows aggression it is based of what you have taught the dog not the dog breed. Owners should be held accountable for the behaviours of their pet REGARDLESS of breed
- It is important that the officer is able to get the correct details as soon as possible. The only exception would be if the dog required vet attention that could not wait.
- The owner should be help accountable for his dogs action. He should be fined, and forced to attend science based dog training and show his progress. If he isn't responsible, he should be banned from owning animals and there should be a registry to make sure he cannot. He should also be able to explain the situation, ex: an agressive dog off leash came towards him and his dog and the dog defended himself, or someone was yelling at his owner, etc. The context is important. If there are people that saw what happen, their statement should be taken too.
- Take responsibility for your pet
- take responsibility
- A dog will bite for a reason. Usually not because of aggression. I'd rather defend my dog if he bit to be his voice

- Unless both owners / parties involved agree to not involve the bylaw officers, then it should be mandatory to remain at the scene or exchange information, much like a car accident.
- Accountability for situation is important
- There is always a reason that a dog feels the need to fight or flight, in this case if the dog chose to engage there is two sides to the story. I don't believe the owner is always at fault. A lot of dog owners in this city use the phrase "My dog is friendly" and will allow their dog to approach other dogs without the permission of the owner. The dog who initiates the bite could have reasons beyond aggression for the bite. It's should be the same protocol if you would like to hold someone's child, you don't just go up to a random child and say "It's okay, I'm friendly".
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets since they are the ones who trained the animal
- Required to keep these incidents recorded and to hold the dog owner accountable to avoid future incidents
- yes, but the animal must be able to be safely removed from the situation. ie. put in vehicle or house, thereby reducing further issues.
- I believe the owner should stay as they are accountable for the actions of their dog, in any kind of altercation.
- We need responsible dog ownership. Owners should take responsibility for their pet actions. One exception is if the dog is putting the public at risk.
- The responsibility of an owner is to care and train the animal. They are also responsible for behaviours that may be exhibited. Owners usually know the animals best and should act accordingly. If an incident occurs people should take responsibility for thing they have happened and own up to the issue. Whatever that may be.
- Dog bites a person or other animal who advocates the circumstances. Also both parties should account for the situation, unless the is medical emergency needed first
- A responsible parent would do the same with their child. A responsible pet owner should be willing to do the same. Seems ludicrous that this needs to be legislated.
- Responsible dog ownership I believe is the best remedy.
- Common decency, this is already an unwritten rule.
- Of course!!
- If you own a dog it is very reasonable to be asked to stay at the scenes. It comes with the territory of owning a dog.
- The dog owned should pay for damages - vet bills for the affected dog or person
- yes
- It could be good idea, because that will help to know the details of the incident.
- Its the same as leaving the scene of an accident.
- This is self explanatory. The owner needs to answer for the dogs behaviour.
- It should be treated in the same manner as a car accident, showing responsibility for actions, for ANY breed, large or SMALL
- They're responsible for it so of course they should be required to stay
- All parties need to explain what they experienced.

- Sharing information is key but what is the rule re if necessary? If necessary is subjective so it means no one would stay around anyway.
- Have to be held accountable
- They should remain at the scene because their dog is their responsibility
- As long as the person's animal is not going to be seized if they cooperate.
- Should be current practice
- [DUPLICATE]
- They should be held accountable. The dog shouldn't have to suffer but the owners should as they didn't take necessary precautions
- In case the dog has a canine communicable virus, or disease.
- The victim is likely to color or stretch the story, maybe skipping their own behaviour that led to the dog biting.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their animal, however the circumstances always need to be considered. Along with this euthanasia should not be a tactic used to remedy the situation.
- Same as a car accident. If you are involved in an accident (including dog bites) you should not be able to leave the scene
- .
- The dog owner is responsible for ALL actions of their dog.
- It is the owner's responsibility to take accountability for the actions of their animal, the same as a car accident or other incident.
- Common decency
- [DUPLICATE]
- It should be like a car accident, where you exchange information and go through the proper channels with police.
- If your dog bites, you should not be taking off.
- It's similar to a crime (not as bad) but they should still have to share info with the enforcement officer.
- If the dog has bitten a person, proof of rabies inoculation is needed.
- There are so many reasons and sides to a single story. I think both parties should be listened to.
- The dog owner should have to remain on the scene of the incident to give their personal information (name/address etc.) Much like a car accident sharing of this information should be law. Failure to comply is like a hit & run & the dog owner should be liable for a more severe consequences.
- The owner of the dog responsible for the violent behavior should stay and exchange information with the victim/other dog owner and wait for bylaw as required. The owner of the dog that misbehaved should be responsible for all damages.
- Yes and no. If a dog bites a human or dog they almost always know they've done something wrong. Leaving two distressed dogs on the same scene is not helpful to them. I encourage exchange of information but a follow up call from a bylaw officer is better as then you can get your dog home and calmed.

- Yes, as there may be financial implications of the bite - vet bills, time off work etc of course it would depend on severity of bite, may need to seek medical attention first
- I don't trust the tribunal system and everyone should be given a fair and equal opportunity to have their case heard by qualified personnel.
- Just like a car accident, there will always be two sides to every story. Both dog owners* should remain at the scene, talk out and call for enforcement if needed
- Yes, but only if it was truly the dog at fault. There are many instances where people are the problem. An instance like this needs to be very clear to protect dogs from un-informed people
- Yes, except if it is necessary to restrain and remove the dog from the situation. They should stay as close to the scene as possible and stay with their dog, but safety must be the top priority. If they remove themselves from the scene, they should be required to contact Animal Services ASAP to identify themselves and their dog. Failure to come forward within 24 hours of the incident should come with a very heavy fine (up to $25,000) as well as potential jail time and probationary conditions to discourage people from avoiding responsibility.
- The goal is owner accountability. Not animal accountability. We domesticated dogs and then decided that our responsibility was left to randomness.
- The owner has to take responsibility for what happened.
- Any animal who violently bites a human is poorly trained, or has been threatened - both sides of the story should be told to law enforcement.
- An owner should be responsible to ensure the person/ other animal is ok and should share their info
- Yes, the owner needs to be held accountable right then and there - providing correct information on the incident while memory is fresh and also provide correct contact information should they be responsible for costs. They should not have the opportunity to disappear to shirk their responsibilities.
- I feel if your dog did something your information should be taken yes.
- Sounds like common sense!
- Of course! If a dog bites another dog or human then the person must stay there to make sure that person is okay, and also so that they are held responsible for their actions.
- It's the owner's responsibility to ensure public safety as well as educating those who do not own breeds like these.
- It's the same as a car accident. Both parties should be present as long as it doesn't create the chance for an escalation.
- People should be held responsible for their dogs' actions; this should apply to all parties involved, as a biting dog may have been provoked.
- The owner needs to take responsibility. Same as remaining at the scene of an accident.
- If a dog is aggressive the owner is responsible, NOT the animal
- It's no different than a car accident.
- I support a rule that requires the dog owner to remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer
- Because the owner should be held responsible for maintaining control of their dog.

- Same as a traffic accident...
- This is the only way to for accountability. The goal is to reduce these type of incidents and if a dog is involved in an attack there has to be some accountability so that it does not happen again.
- This should be a given! Any owner who leaves is irresponsible.
- Absolutely ALL OWNERS No matter of the size or breed of dog should remain present. Often small dog owners are so ignorant and assume because their dog is small they do not apply to the rules and the response has often been "oh they are small sorry" the size of the small dog does not and should not be an excuse for bad behaviour
- Certainly, owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour and training. If their dog injures someone, the person injured has a right to get more information to help their treatment.
- That is the right thing to do.
- Yes... unless it is causing more harm than good (like waiting for hours in the hot sun for someone to deal with the incident).. But if the dog owner of the biting dog (and thus the biting dog) remains, then the "victim" should too.... Because typically dogs dont just bite... there is always a reason for it... and assuming that just because a dog bit someone that they were doing something wrong and "victim" is completely innocent is asinine.
- It's the responsibility of the pet owner
- The owner of the dog that bites should be held responsible for any damage caused by that dog and should be required to give all information to an enforcement officer.
- Owners need to be held more accountable for the behavior of their dog. This should be coupled with enhanced awareness of obedience training options.
- I think there is a big difference between a dog that has bitten someone in aggression and one that is lost and scared and bites in fear. I think all parties to have a discussion and the status of vaccines is important.
- To gather information to pay for medical bills, document bite history, rabies information
- the owner should be held accountable for not training and restraining their dog. It is always the owners fault
- If severe or skin is broken, information should always be shared. Many owners brush it off and don't want to provide info.
- It just makes common sense.
- This will allow the owners side of the story too. Was someone tormenting the dog?
- There is a lot of emotion involved in dog attacks. I've had a lot of personal experience with this and enforcement officers can help mediate when emotions run high.
- Yes.
- How is this different than a car accident in terms of responsibility?
- In some cases a dog attack is provoked by the individual who was bitten. The dogs owner is the only person to defend the dogs actions. Not all people who get bitten by a dog are innocent!
- It's the responsible thing to do, although I doubt anyone would adhere to it.
- Remaining at scene would allow enforcement officer the opportunity to get facts from both sides.

- "My own dog has been bit multiple times by other dogs, neither time by a pit bull, once at an off-leash park and once while out on a walk. Neither time did the owner of the other dog offer any support for myself after what happened - At the off leash park, the dog and it's owner left immediately afterwards, and while on leash the dog had come running out of a building and attacked my dog on the street. The person who claimed the dog shortly after would only cede that it was not her dog.
- I also happen to work at a vet hospital and know that dog attacks can cause anywhere from non serious to potentially lethal damage, and that vet bills can also be quite expensive depending on the damage done. I feel it most appropriate that if your dog is responsible for attacking another dog, you should be forced to remain in place and cede personal details to the victim so that you pay for the costs incurred at the vet, minimally."
- "Dogs are like people they have limits too and sometimes they clash
- That being said I think as a responsible dog owner you know if your dog is aggressive prior to taking them out. So owners are responsible for placing their dogs around other dogs and risking an incident. I have a rescue and I don't take him to parks or around other dogs because I know him and wouldn't put him in that situation. It's [removed] owners not always the dogs fault. We are their voices..."
- I do not support extra measures for pitbulls.
- If the dog breaks skin I think it's important.
- You wouldn't commit a hit a run with your car.
- The responsibility lies with the owner and they should pay for damages depending on the situation
- I was bittend by a Jack Russell terrier. Would any of you care, or only when it's a pitbull.
- a bite causing injury should be treated as an assault and the owner must take responsibility for it.
- It would be the same if my child attacked another child. I would remain at the scene and give my contact information and if necessary talk to law enforcement. But I think I would also want to be given the chance to remove my child or in this case dog away from the scene (ie. put it in the car)
- This increases dog ownership responsibility and accountability. If an individual's dog is aggressive, the owner is held accountable. This also allows for the proper legal and medical processes to occur if needed.
- to ensure the dog is up to date on shots
- Like a car accident.
- the owner is usually at fault p
- Too many nuisance dog owners leave the scene and the injured animal ends up at the vet with costly vet bills
- It depends on the severity of the bite and the circumstances that caused the dog to bite, but a report could be made (regardless of breed)
- I think people should stay, but really - a rule isn't going to change whether they do or don't.

- Yes but. Usually during an incident, everyone is upset and reactive. Staying near the scene, in the vehicle if available, a short distance away is advisable for the exchange of contact information, etc. However, remaining directly at the scene of injured dogs, angry dog owner and upset is likely to increase the commotion. A little space is advised.
- No different than a traffic accident
- Just like every similar situation.
- "It is an assault and needs to be dealt with
- However
- It is ALWAYS the owners fault and responsibility for ANY dog"
- This should absolutely be mandatory to get details
- This is common sense, but I know this is an issue in our community.
- its that person's responsibility to make the situation as right as possible
- Many victims are left behind after a dog attack. I don't think that this will change people behaviour though.
- you are required to remain at a car accident. This is no different if your dog bites someone. Exchange some information especially if bylaw is being called.
- Owners need to be countable for the actions of their dog.
- All dogs bite and the owner should be responsible. Don't only do it when "pit bulls" vote because chihuahuas bite too, hold those owners accountable as well.
- I do, but in some cases removing the dog from the scene is paramount to calming them down. In those cases owners may need to be able to leave to remove the dog and either leave contact information with someone at the scene or return once their dog has been isolated.
- Yes, the owner of the animal in question should remain at the scene or provide the appropriate contact information. That is what a responsible dog owner should do
- Contact information is important
- It is the right thing to do as a responsible pet owner
- Yes, since the owner is responsible for their dog.
- Yes all dog owners need to be accountable.
- Tags are not large enough to read easily to later identify problem animals
- It is part of being a responsible pet owner and leaving the scene should be punishable (same as in a vehicle).
- Support responsible ownership
- The dog owner should be responsible for the actions of their dog.
- A person should be made responsible for their dogs actions. Not the dog.
- The details of the incident should be examined to understand why the dog bit in the first place.
- "If all parties are okay, there is no need for police.
- But if one or multiple parties are seriously injured, police would be more effective in the situation.
- If my dog was attacked and hurt & the other dogs owner just left, i would be crushed. Simple respect.

- You wouldn't allow someone who assaulted another human walk away."
- It's the same principle as a car accident; you have to take responsibility for your actions or inaction as a dog owner if those actions result in harm to someone else.
- To gather whether animal has up to date shots etc. My son was bit and the owner didn't stick around.
- As an owner, the responsibility for a pet should include training the pet to be social, remains on science ensures police can inform and provide training resources.
- Dogs, or particular breeds of dogs, are not to blame for aggressive behaviour. Owners are responsible for their dogs' behaviour
- The owner should remain at the scene. The owner should be punished for not raising and/or training their dog properly. This is not the dogs fault in any way. This is the owners fault. The blame is on them and so should the punishment.
- If an incident happens where someone's dog harms another person or animal the respective owner must remain on site until the situation is dealt with, if they leave then they should be fined or something along those lines. Your dog, your responsibility so also your consequences.
- Because it's just human decency. People who leave have something to hide
- If the dog owner is present, they can be a witness as to whether the dog was provoked by the other animal or person or not prior to the bite.
- People should take responsibility for their animals. If one person's dogs are involved in numerous bites that should alert the authorities that there may be an ongoing animal abuse or neglect issue that needs to be investigated.
- If bit- it would be reassuring to find out vaccination status & have to situation being properly handled- perhaps if requiring Professional medical attention only would be okay too.
- Encourages owners to be more responsible/proactive.
- Providing it's safe to do so.
- Every story has 2 sides. What if the dog reacted to something and isn't the dogs fault. What if it's the owner of dogs fault.
- An owner should have full control of their dog at all times, things happen, and if the bite was an accident then the owner of the dog should make it right.
- The owner of the dog that bit should be help responsible, and fined if they leave.
- It's important to keep contact in case of emergencies
- Need to gather both sides of the story.
- This would ensure responsibility is taken where appropriate
- It is important that information about this dog and its owner are entered in the database. I have been bitten by two breeds of dog in my life: a German Shepherd and a Portuguese Podengo Pequeno. The pit bulls and bull terriers I have come in contact over the past 50 years were all great family dogs.
- If a dog bites a person, the owner is liable and should be expected to take responsibility for the dogs actions.

- But if the dog was provoked by the “victim” which occurs frequently they should not face any penalty. The person who was bite also needs there actions up to the incident reviewed.
- "The owners need to take responsibility for what their animal has done. That being said, sometimes they need to get the animal out of there as fast as possible to keep from any further attacks happening.
- In that situation they should contain the dog and come back and find the injured person or owner of the injured animal as fast as possible. Or at least ask where they are going if they need to leave so that contact can be made as soon as possible."
- Yes, but only to a certain degree. Enforcement officers should only be brought into the situation if it is serious and an individual has been SEVERELY harmed or the owner of the animal does not take responsibility. There should be fines for those who waste an officers time due to over-exaggeration and anything of the sort.
- Owners a responsible for their pets actions
- Once everyone is safe this should be required. If unable to do so they should be required to call and report the incident.
- Fleeing the scene is not allowed in any other severe situation, why is this any different.
- Should be made to provide vaccinations records. Payment of vet bills.
- Theres a reason it's called a pit and run, or pit and split.
- owners should take responsibility but it should be determined if the victim has a responsibility for the incident. Approaching someone's pet only if requested and welcomed.
- I think we should require they stay long enough to share contact info, at least. This ensures accountability & follow up to ensure the dog and owner receive the help they need.
- Most pet owners leave the scene immediately after an incident, giving no contact information, and leaving no way for victim or owners to contact the other party
- The owner must take responsibility for their own lack of control of the pet. Has this pet had all their shots? Will this owner pay for the medical bills of their victim? This is a personal injury incident not unlike a vehicle versus person - you do not leave the scene of a crime.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to take responsibility for their dogs actions
- It should be treated the same way as a car accident where you should not run away. One should be responsible for providing contact information in the circumstance.
- This would help all dog owners feel safer and is mandatory for simple collisions why is this not mandatory here as dog bite can cause a much worse injury- but do not dichromate by dog breed
- Unless the biting dog was Injured and needs medical attention both humans should remain at the scene.
- It might be important to stay in case the dog that bit is sick or if some type of restitution is needed.
- The dog owner should remain at the scene and be held accountable for their dogs actions. It is the owner's responsibility to train their dogs properly and face the consequences when they fail to do so.
- Depends on the circumstance. Say the owner or the hurt dog has to go to the Vet immediately. That could be a problem, how long must they wait for an enforcement officer. Could be late in the evening could be 30 below, etc..

- I think it is important that an understanding is met about the situation and if law enforcement has to step in then it is both owner's responsibility to sort out the situation
- Any responsible owner will stay at the scene
- If a dog bites someone in self defence or defending its owner then the owner should be protected from having to stay but if the dog bits unprovoked and the bite was extensive enough then yes they should have to stay behind
- Yes, I believe information should be exchanged to ensure that the medical history (vaccinations) of the dog can be appropriately shared.
- It's a matter of education and responsibility.
- The owner is at fault more so than the dog is. They must take ownership of the dog and the incident.
- If the animal involved in the attack can be secured safely to prevent further trauma to the victim or attacked animal, I support having the owner of the attacking dog remain on scene to speak with bylaw.
- A person should always be required to stay at the scene of an accident, particularly if they are involved in the accident. IE: Dog Owner
- As the recent foster turned adopter of a bully breed constantly struggling with uncontrolled off-leash dogs in areas where it is mandated that dogs be leashed, I know that the only way my dog is ever going to have an opportunity to bite a stranger's dog is if an off-leash dog is permitted to force physical engagement on my dog illegally. This is certainly not a promise that my dog will bite - she is not an inherently aggressive dog - but I will be damned if, as a responsible pet owner, BSL will be leveraged to euthanize/muzzle/imprison my dog because she is a bully breed should an altercation occur with the dog of an irresponsible pet owner who refuses to obey leash laws and allow their dog to be uncontrolled and impose itself upon my leashed dog and our space. Perhaps we should place a little more focus on enforcing leash laws than encouraging prejudice against innocent animals based on their physical appearance alone.
- Yes, although these incidents may be accidental, animal owners must be held accountable.
- If your dog bites someone you should take responsibility for its actions
- Dog owners need to held accountable for their dogs actions as it is usually the humans fault they behave in the manner they do. It isn't possible to follow up and ensure training has been attended if people do not remain at the scene
- It is the responsibility of all dog owners of any breed to maintain control of their animals and are responsible for them. The excuse that it's just a little dog is no longer acceptable.
- Depending on how severe the attack or injury caused and how the victims owner wishes to proceed.
- Accountability, and liability. Basic decency too! Treat it like a hit and run if they leave. They should be fined for leaving the scene of an incident.
- Two sides to every story. If they love their dog they would stay.
- Depends on the situation and severity of the bite.
- To ensure any incident is handled correctly and reduce the possibility of future incidents by the same dog.
- All relevant information needs to be gathered at time of incident.

- acts as a responsible pet owner, accepts and understands these responsibilities especially in areas of human confrontations/bites. In acting there of, is deemed accountable for their pets actions. You would be held accountable just as in the case of an automobile accident, punishable by fine or jail or both for leaving the scene of an accident.
- Safety concerns
- I'm all good with the owners being held accountable, but we can't blame the dog, the owners should require training, and they should receive bans to owning animals and the dogs should get rehabilitated I get it's not for all dogs as some are too damaged, but very possible for a lot of them
- There needs to be an investigation to prevent people abusing this rule to get rid of neighbour's dogs
- Treaded like a car accident. You need to take responsibility.
- This would help to ensure the owner taking responsibility for he incident...there aren't bad dogs, only bad owners
- I would say it's like leaving the scene of an accident or a hit and run.
- It should be a common courtesy that you dog is your responsibility and as such you should take responsibility for their actions. ie; staying to exchange information and come to a common agreement
- The dogs should be identified, but the exception is if information is exchange after the bite. It may be difficult to keep a dog near a dog it has bitten due to it being over its threshold.
- I think the owner should have the opportunity to defend their pet at the time of the incident
- There should be documentation of the incident and an assessment of severity.
- As long as they leave contact info, they should not need to wait.
- Animals can be unpredictable and owners are not always properly educated. An responsible owner would stay and offer their side and provide all necessary information.
- Provided it is safe for the ublic to kerp the offending dig on site, a history of what happened needs to be provided as well examination of the offending dog.
- Again, my dog was attacked by a neighbor's pyrenees. It took bylaw over 2 weeks to even respond to the incident!! And the owners didn't even have bylaw go to their home. No fine, nothing. Disgusting.
- NA
- Just like a hit and run. If your dog injures someone, you are responsible for the actions of the dog and must remain at the scene.
- Any dog that bites another dog or person should be put down
- Because that's called common sense
- So proper measures are taken to prevent it from happening again. (Training)
- I believe if statements are taken at an incident wth an enforcement officer, there is less likely to be "finger pointing" or retaliation. Officers should also follow up on cases.
- Because you need to be held responsible for your pet hurting someone.
- But only under specific circumstances as some incidents are so minor or caused by playfighting and do not need an enforcement officer.

- "However, the dog may need to place in a safe place away from the other dog.
- Dogs react because they are scared, and potentially the other dog started it."
- Otherwise how do you know who the dog and owner is.
- The owner is responsible for their pet. They should have to face the consequences and be told to take training.
- I think it's important to get all viewpoints of the incident so there is less of a bias to favour the victim.
- I have had several dogs bite me and the owner either left the scene with their dog or refused to provide contact information. Similar to a hit and run with a vehicle.
- But it depends if for example my dog bit another dog and the owner of the other dog was aggressive or abusive towards me i dont think I should have to stay in that case.
- If the dog has bitten a person or another dog the should certainly remain on the scene as a responsible human being.
- If someone's dog is bit or bites to the extent that enforcement is needed, then accountability is needed.
- Its like a car accident, you must remain on site to get information and give a report.
- Take responsibility for the action, no different then a car accident
- I do not feel pit bulls should be treated any different than any other breed.
- The owner should be legally responsible for their dog
- It's important to obtain all health records and any liability regarding these instances
- No explanation is needed. All pet owners should re RESPONSIBLE owners. Quit blaming one type of dog!!!!
- There seems to be a certain type of person who owns dangerous breeds of dogs, and these people are not the likely type to stick around a scene. It would be good if there was a law, not because of the dog, but because of the dingleberries that own these dogs.
- I do agree they need to stay there. Dogs don't just attack without a reason
- No different than at the scene of an accident with a vehicle. The owner should remain on scene until the incident is reported.
- People should follow the same procedure as in car accidents...otherwise it becomes like a hit and run...a bite and run.
- Your dog is your responsibility. It's that Simple.
- You're responsible for your pets actions
- They need to be on scene so that the enforcement officer can get the full picture of what happened.
- People should stay at the scene to either defend the dogs actions or because they have improperly trained the dog and the owner should be held accountable.
- They should stay at the scene but the owner should try to put them in their vehicle while dealing with authorities.
- Like any incident, there are two sides & both need to be heard. Not all dog bites are the fault of the dogs behavior directly.
- This should be a law, not just a rule.

- With the owner being made to stay at the scene, EOs can get more comprehensive information about the dog. Plus if owners know that they'll be forced to stay and share contact information and talk to EOs, I would think owners would take steps to avoid an incident in the first place, rather than just be passively reactive (or not react at all) in the event something does happen.
- Too many owners get away with not giving information and can disappear and not receive punishment.
- This a great way to get both sides of a story as to why it happened. And less money spent searching for the dog and owner.
- Dog owners are NOT always taking responsibility here. How else are we to hold these behaviors accountable if not by enforcing this?
- Owner needs to be responsible for their dog
- Like a car accident. No he said/she said later in court. Officers collect all details asap.
- An owner is the equivalent to a parent and should remain when the animal they own is involved in an incident
- There is 2 sides to every story.
- People should be held accountable for not properly training their dogs. It's the humans fault, not the animals
- Proof of vaccines is required.
- They need to be liable for damages
- People should be accountable for their dogs, but also to provide both sides of the story (ie, if the dog was provoked/it was an accident).
- as long as there are additional people who are not primarily law enforcement. This will be a very high stress situation and will require sensitivity, compassion, and deescalation
- Seems the right thing to do if the situation is safe to do so.
- Otherwise they disappear and noone is responsible.
- Dog owner must remain at scene to both provide information and control and protect their dog.
- If a dog (ANY DOG not just "pitbull" type dogs) bites a human or an other animal, their owner should definitely stay and deal with it the proper way. Any responsible pet owner should do so, even if it's a small dog!!
- No different between a vehicle accident or a dog bite. Extreme fines and punishment for those who flee with there dog.
- it makes sense that this information is collected so it can be properly documented and repeat offenders can be dealt with.
- It would be similar to an assault case.
- Because the the owner can explain their experiences and all incident reports can be filled ou with both perspectives.
- Having a dog is a responsibility, and speaking to an officer can clear up any bias or miscommunication there may be.
- I believe that no dog is more likely than another by nature to be aggressive, violent or inherently at a disposition to bite. It is purely the responsibility of an owner to take into consideration their own dog's temperament (REGARDLESS OF THE BREED) and to train them as such. No dog is better or worse depending on their breed as every dog has their own personality just as any human does that is often a product of their environment. As such the owner should be held accountable for not taking the proper steps to address their dog's temperament, and likely not providing proper outlets and/or opportunities for exercise which is manifesting in aggressive behaviour. By requiring the owner to stay and provide information they are better able to make remedies for their inability to train their dog properly and perhaps this will better help portray that there is no statistically significant indication that pitbulls are more aggressive than other dogs.

- People should be held accountable to their dog's actions
- The owner should have accountability for the dog's actions.
- You own the dog you are responsible
- It is important for the individual to stay at the scene and share contact information and talk to law enforcement if needed
- People are responsible for their own animals
- It is the owner of the dog that needs to take responsibility of the dogs actions as the dog is not at fault. They should definitely be responsible and help if the injured dog needs treatment. Dogs are animals. They were one wild. The best dogs can have random burst outs. It's normal. We all need to be accountable for the actions of our pets as they are our family.
- You are responsible for your dogs actions. That's what you agree to when taking ownership of a dog.
- Like a vehicular accident, pet owners must take responsibility for their pets behaviour
- Responsible owners take responsibility for their animals. It is up to the owner to ensure their animal is properly trained. If an owner does not take responsibility for their animal, the animal should be removed from that person's care. The blame for irresponsible dog ownership needs to be placed on the owners, not the animals. And especially not on certain scapegoat breeds.
- It's illegal to leave the scene of an vehicle accident. This is almost the same thing. It's the owner's responsibility to stay and speak with law enforcement.
- This just seems like a common sense - its the rule when vehicles are involved in an accident, it should be the same for animal incidents.
- often there are issues(vet bills) that show up after the incident..public needs to be assured that proper education/training/ will be carried out to prevent further attacks.
- you are responsible to teach your dog as you teach your children. Bad parents make bad kids weather they are furry or not.
- Unless safer to leave scene, get dog to vet etc
- A dogs owner should be responsible for their behavior.
- Respect to those involved
- Responsible pet ownership requires you to take responsibility for any harm your animal may cause, and deal with the consequences in an effective manner that will prevent any further incidents in the future.
- I believe it would aid in preventing attacks from the same dog in the future.

- Pet owners need to be responsible for their pets whether it is waste pick up or alterations.
- Currently the owner of an biting dog often gathers up the dog and leaves the scene to avoid culpability.
- Responsible ownership
- In any type of injury accident both parties should remain until everything is sorted.
- This also provided the victim the opportunity to pursue compensation for injuries.
- Must remain to take responsibility of their actions.
- It's fair for everyone involved.
- It's the right thing to do.
- That is the most basic example of being a responsible pet owner
- Helps hold them accountable
- Fleeing the scene of any crime is illegal. Obviously if a dog attacks a person or other animal, the owner is responsible for speaking with officers.
- N/a
- This is assault. If Bob assaulted Jill and ran away, I would assume he was trying to evade the police. So, how is this any different?
- The dog could be in training or recovering from an abusive situation. There are no bad dogs, just bad owners.
- Dog owner should be reachable for future updates.
- With any dog in any case the owner should have to stay at the scene of an incident.
- This helps identify nuisance dogs and get them into obedience classes.
- it makes sense.
- Dog owners need to be made to pay for the nuisance dogs behavior. In my experience this is mostly small yappy breeds that the owner thinks cannot do damage because of their size. As a residential service plumber working in homes, I have only ever been attacked by small breeds (purse dogs / fashion accessories)
- This should be no different than a human injuring someone else. Stay at the scene until law enforcement arrives.
- Any dog incident the owner should take responsibility.
- I support this as long as it has been a serious altercation. It makes sense to stay at the scene of an accident
- This would place the responsibility of the dog's behavior in the owner's hands.
- Resolve things quickly
- A dog's behavior is usually the fault of the owner, so they should have to take the blame for it, not the dog.
- that's assault... of course you have to stay around and complete required documentation
- There may be extenuating circumstances which may need to be considered. Such as protecting owner of the dog or dog protecting itself
- How is this not a thing already?

- It could prevent repeat incidents and hold poor owners accountable.
- If a dog bites and the owner leaves the scene, it provides limited opportunity for the person who has been bit, or whose animal has been bit, to receive any necessary contact or veterinary information from the owner. There should however be provisions for if enforcement is unable to arrive within a reasonable time, reasonable being within half an hour.
- "Pet owners must be responsible for them.
- If a person or another animal gets bitten, it may not be the other person's/pet's fault, anyway (e.g. if person threatened & dog protecting owner is reason)"
- That's the only way to get some accountability.
- I agree.
- Not needed
- This should be considered the same as a hit and run with a car, if you are in an accident you remain at the scene, the same should apply if your dog bites
- Yes. Ppl who have dogs that bite should take responsibility. And 90% of pit bull owners I know do not have dogs that bite. So please don't single out one breed. Kick out nenshi for being stupid.
- Our dogs were attacked in May by a Boxer that the person walking it let off leash knowing that the dog had behavioral issues. This individual stayed and provided the owner's information. The owner was responsible enough to call us and paid the vet bill. When my daughter's Staffordshire/American Terrier was attacked (unprovoked) as she walked by on leash, the owner tried to dodge the damage her dog did and the cost of the vet bills - not good, not responsible.
- If a dog bite is serious enough to call in law enforcement then the owner should be required to stay on site
- Seems obvious to me
- It will assure that there is accountability. Some owners are not responsible.
- The owner is responsible for their dog and should be responsible for any damage or injury the dog causes. They should remain at the scene to provide all of their information.
- It's like hit n run unless both parties agree to move past and just exchange info no different than a fender bender
- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions. Not the animal itself.
- I agree that the responsibility lies with the dog owner to have to provide accurate contact information and remain at the scene so that the appropriate parties are held accountable.
- If the pet owner leaves the scene of an attack, it should be considered the equivalent of a suspect leaving a car crash or assault.
- I find owners that have dogs that bite like to leave the scene as fast as they can.
- I'm not sure how this could be enforced unless the owner is fined for leaving the scene.
- It's the responsible thing to do to remain on scene and provide your information if an incident occurs
- In cases of repeat incidents it can be beneficial as a method of tracking if a dog/owner is not taking the proper steps to protect others and opportunity to engage with community about animal safety/care

- It's like a car accident. To leave after injuring a person/dog is like a hit and run. The owner should be held responsible for any vet/medical bills.
- In that case you get to understand both parties involvement to the situation. Just as you would with any other court of law.
- That seems like the responsible thing to do.
- If the bite victim needs medical care they need to be able to contact the owner of the biting dog so that they can get compensation. If it is a dog that is bitten vet bills can be very expensive and should be paid by the owner of the biting dog.
- They should need to stay as it has caused damaged to another person's property.
- An owner should be held responsible
- Obviously, we need to streamline the process through which we handle dog bites (the cogs of the court system move far too slowly). However, I do not support automatic euthanasia in the case of a bite. It will need to be handled on a case by case basis with an understanding of the dogs background (ex: is it a rescue? in a currently abusive situation?) and the circumstances surrounding the attack (ex: was it wanton aggression? or was the dog in a circumstance in which aggression is understandable?). As for #5 obviously, the owner needs to remain present in order to actually determine what happened.
- If a dog bites a person or another animal, the dog owner is responsible and should able to provide an explanation on what happened and if the dog attacked unprovoked the human needs to take responsibility.
- Information should be exchanged by owners of both animals.
- It's the right thing to do.
- Of course they should stay
- The owner of the dog regardless of it being a small breed or large must remain at the scene. If they dont they should be charged with leaving the scene of an incident and fined heavily!!
- People need to take responsibility for their pets actions and they need to be held accountable for what ever damages occurred in the accident.
- "The owner would then be held
- Responsible for damages."
- If an owner flees the scene a larger fine/penalty should be issued
- You should have to stay the same as you would a car accident.
- But of the problem dog remains at the scene it may cause bigger issues. People should have to share their identity and contact information such as a drivers license so it can be followed up by bylaw officers if its not safe to remain at the scene.
- There needs to be a way to follow-up with the owner of the offending dog.
- Absolutely agree, the owner must remain responsible for any incident that their dog causes harm to another person or animal
- This is self-evident based on the question.
- Unless the biting dog is at large

- Dog owners are responsible for their pets (property) just like they'd need to be on site for a hit and run
- Dog owners should be responsible for their dog's behaviour. Therefore they need to remain at the scene in order to be held accountable.
- This is common sense. Owners are responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- Dog bites can be serious, and the owner and dog need to be held responsible
- This is a reasonable expectation of a responsible dog owner - any owner should be required to remain at the scene
- Just for insurance purposes and to clarify the story
- The owner of dog should stay and responsible to call emergency crew to handle the effected person.
- Respect common sense they must stay
- The dog owner should be accountable by ensuring the victim is cared for, as well as provide necessary information, without having an officer tracking them down.
- If your dog bites someone or another pet the responsible thing to do is remain at the scene period. The fact we need a rule or bylaw stating such is just sad. But as some people have proven again and again unfortunately, they won't do the right thing. Sometimes even when there are rules or laws.
- It's how all incidents should go. The people involved should stay at the scene of the incident.
- It's only fair to get all the info from the owner of the animal since their pet harmed another person.
- Yes because that is the right thing to do, however I do not support that Pit Bulls are bad dogs. There are no bad dogs only bad owners
- Treat it like a car accident.
- It's an assault
- It's like any other accident, information should be shared.
- too often these dog owners run away and are not forced to pay for the vet bills or have their dog noted as offending
- Owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour/control and should be held as such.
- Any animal that bites another person that is not their owner, the owner should be required to wait with the person who is injured and keep their animal a safe distance away. This should not just be for the Bully breeds. Any dog will bite so it should be mandatory for all breeds not just one in particular.
- Yes because I believe it should be treated as similar to a car accident. If a nuisance dog that is insured bites someone then costs will need to be increased for the owner.
- There are no bad dogs, only bad owners, of a dog messes up it is on the owner to fix the problem!
- Otherwise it's like fleeing the scene of an accident, and should be a chargeable offense.
- Yes the owner should stay. But if the animal is out of control should be placed in a safe place till they arrive as to not cause the dog more stress
- Your dog bites you stay to take responsibility....
- Like any other accident or incident, the dog owner is responsible for their pet.
- Stay and take responsibility.

- It is a dog's owners responsibility to remain at the scene of an incident. This will also give that owner the opportunity to present their side of the story.
- I had an unleashed pit bull looking dog attack my 1.8 kg (not a typing error) harnesses and on a leash chihuahua. It caused $7500 (not a typing error) to repair puncture near anus, an 7 cm by 5 cm of hind leg skin ripped off, a broken jaw, loose, knocked out and broken teeth. I had 2 puncture wounds on my arm and skin ripped off back of left hand. Without so many neighbors who tried to help me I am sure that given the chance, by the time the owner got there with a leash he would have disappeared with his dog.
- Responsible owners know their dogs and take responsibility for when things go wrong. If your dog bites you should be held accountable and all the evidence/situation taken into account on a case by case basis, for example if a dog bites a human because they antagonised it.
- Owners are responsible for their dog. Leaving with your dog after a bite that breaks skin is like a hit and run.
- Owners whose dog has biten another dog and/or human should remain at the scene of the incident. This way the injured human and /or dog's owner would be able to ensure that the vicious dog is up to date on vaccines, had been to the vet regularly and to contact the vicious dog's owner should any compensation or assistance be necessary. This would help for public safety of dogs and the humans.
- The dog owner shall provide his driver license. But waiting for an enforcement officer might not be possible if the dog/person who got bit requires emergency procedures.
- No different than a vehicle incident.
- It is at the victims discretion if they would like to take it further. If police arrive the number owner should be able to restrain the dog to be prevent further incidents but must return to the scene (ex: put attacking dog in the car or restrain dog at large)
- I can't believe this is a question and not human nature
- People need to be responsible, regardless of the type of dog. I have been several times by little dogs who's owners pick them up and leave.
- I feel as if it should be treated like other similar incidents. Since the animal clearly cannot speak for itself the owner should be required to stay on the scene to take accountability for the actions their dog exhibited.
- Only if the injuries are substantial (needing hospitalization)
- To allow for the officer to speak directly to the owner without delay
- I said yes because they are responsible for their dog/dogs, and whatever their dogs do they must be held responsible.
- MOST of the time a dogs behaviour is the fault of the owner, in order to make a fair judgment on the situation a proper interview of the owner needs to be conducted.
- Yes. We need enforce responsible OWNERS and not blame animals.
- If dog of any breed bites/ or attacks someone the owner should be held accountable for its actions.
- Your animal your problem. Stay there and be responsible owner.
- However it would be difficult to enforce.

- If any pet animal bites a human, whether skin is broken or not, an officer should NOT be dispatched. How about a department within the animal shelters that can dispatch an animal Trainer to try and advise the human as to what set the animal off, and how to curb that behavior. Police have nothing to do with this, or bylaw frankly. There are no bad dogs, cats, rabbits, horses, etc. There are only bad humans who taught the animal to react that way.
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their dogs. ASAP.
- I believe they should need to provide contact information so the officer could figure out why the dog had attacked another person/animal.
- My dog was almost killed by a pit bull at Sue Higgins dog park because it was pinned down snapping at my dog and the pit bull's owner couldn't care less.
- nn
- A pet owner is responsible for his dog's behavior at all times, and therefore must answer all questions about an incident involving his dog if it bites a person or an animal.
- It's important to hold potential offenders accountable additionally fleeing the scene is suspicious and makes public servant's jobs harder
- Similar to a motorist remaining at the scene of a collision.
- I think it's always important that both sides of the story are heard and enforcement officers get a full account of the situation
- accountability for your dog's behavior is important
- Owners should be present to be held accountable and fined.
- Incidents involving dogs should be treated like a car accident. If an owner leaves, it should be considered a "bite and run" and carry additional charges
- But only when the dog can be secured without threat to others.
- As with any other incident. Owners should be the ones held responsible.
- In case the injury requires it
- This might help de-escalate the situation
- Contact information I believe is respected to be exchanged if in a civilized manner, but if the 'at fault' party feels threatened or unnecessary behaviour is being portrayed, they should have the right to call law enforcement as a mediator on scene or leave the unsafe and/or negative environment.
- Owners of a dog that has bitten a person or other animal should take responsibility, so long as the dog was not acting in self defense
- Absolutely owners should stay. They should also be fined to the max if they leave the scene as well as consideration of whether they're fit to be a pet owner and looking at apprehending the dog, if needed
- owners are responsible for actions of their dogs
- They should provide information and be responsible for any vet bills, required to take training (depending on situation).
- Explain my answer? Are you serious? The OWNER is responsible for the dog, of course they should remain at the scene and THEY should face the consequences. I am not going to deny that the bite strength of a dog within the pit bull family is not on the higher end of the spectrum for dogs.

However, I am absolutely opposed to specific breed targeting. I have known many pit bulls (pitties) in my life and they have all been the absolute sweetest dogs. It is the owner's responsibility to train and provide whatever measures are needed for the safe handling and control of their dog REGARDLESS of the breed. I've known many little dogs that are not trained, qualify as a nuisance, and can be very dangerous even with their small size.

- All owners are responsible for their pets actions.
- It's a form of assault
- It is not the dogs at fault, it is their owner. They should be educated on their breed before allowance of the breed plus obedience training and higher fines.
- Liability and accountability for you pets actions.
- If the dog bites any one the owner has to be responsible for all the cost of it
- Notuch to explain . If a dog bites drone it needs to be reported
- I think it depends on the severity of the incident.
- Similar to a vehicle accident. The incident has to documented.
- "its an accident
- You stay at the scene of an accident"
- That PERSON is responsible not the dog so therefore they must stay
- Common sense !
- Why wouldn't they, it's called being a responsible dog owner or are you once again signaling out pit bull owners?
- Yes, because it would be the dog owners fault if their dog bit another dog. If a pet was bitten, the. The owner of that pet should also stay on the scene to clarify whether they had control of their pet when the bite occurred. Every owner is responsible to have complete control of their pet. If their pet was the "victim" of the bite but the owner did not have control of the pet at the time of the bite, they also should have liability for the incident. If you want to reduce dog attacks, focus on training the pet owners and holding them responsible for what happens not the dog. It is up to the pet owner to be fully trained to handle a pet and have full control at all times.
- Yes they should be held accountable
- To take responsibility and assess the situation as to why the incident happened. Take a strong look at what the environment and situation was including the actions of the HUMANS
- As long as the dog in offence can be relocated easily to avoid continued issues
- For the protection of both parties in the incident
- People with dogs they can't control should be held liable
- "if you are a responsible pet owner, then remaining at the scene would then enable the owner to show that responsibility to an officer and furthermore it would give the owner the opportunity to defend his dogs actions if warranted.
- IE: dog was kicked, or taunted. Whereas leaving the scene gives the impression of guilt."
- It's their dog - take responsibility for it. Dogs bite or are a nuisance for a reason and they should stay at the scene to see and hear everything. They need to help the dog (training, therapy, social interaction training, etc, so it doesn't happen again.

- Dog owners should know how to stop their dog from hurting others. Their dog is their responsibility.
- The dog owner should be held accountable and responsible for any costs incurred
- If their info is needed in the future and to say what had happened from their perspective.
- As long as there is a way to control the dog as they are waiting for officers to arrive
- Then the dog owner can explain their side of things
- The dog's vaccination history is very important and the owner needs to be responsible for the dog's actions.
- Of course the owner should need to provide their info/talk to bylaw if necessary. Responsible pet ownership means taking responsibility
- If there are further complications or medical intervention required, this information will be necessary
- All dog owners need to be accountable for their pet
- Same as a car accident
- Unless it is superficial where no injury occurred
- You should stay at the scene of any accidents or incidents.
- Accountability- cover vet fees, assess dog, i.e. is it a nuisance dog or was the dog asserting boundaries, such as someone petting without asking, dogs not paying attention to body cues etc
- It would be the same as a road accident. Take responsibility of your pet.
- Dog owners must be held responsible for the actions of their pets. If the owner of an aggressive dog leaves the scene, then it may be difficult to hold them to account.
- It's expensive to have your dog stitched back after another dog bites it. I had a husky & it was attacked by a black lab. We were on the hook for all medical bills. And that dog could go on to bite other dogs & people.
- Anyone free willed human should have the right and in good faith stay at the scene, should not be obligated but should be expected.
- They are responsible for the actions of the dog and should be held liable - as such they need to provide information similar to a car Collision a
- You are accountable for your pets behaviour and development. They need to stay at the scene. Should be charged with leaving the scene of an accident if they do.
- It's important for all parties involved to understand the details of the incident. If a Calgary citizen's dog has bitten someone or another animal, it is important for them to be aware of their animals behavior and (for all parties) to understand the circumstances in which it happened.
- Owner should be charged
- If a dog botes someone you should have to exchange info just like if you got into a vehicular accident
- Sometimes there is a lack of parenting or a lead up to the incident and without escalating emotions on either side it needs to be documented and followed up with like a car accident.
- It is our responsibility to be accountable for all of our actions and of those we are responsible for, including our pets.
- Dog owners should be fined for leaving the scene and not accepting responsibility

- A dog could very easily be goaded into biting someone/something and so an owner should be required to describe the situation if they are a responsible owner.
- Should be mandatory for every dog - not just this stupid signalling out of pitbulls.
- This would make it easier to locate the owner of the offending dog.
- It is important to track bites/attacks and to ensure the dogs vaccines are up to date.
- The dog owner is responsible.
- No need to explain, like a motor vehicle accident, one remains at the scene to exchange information and deal with enforcement.
- As someone who frequently uses the off leash parks most of the aggressive dogs I have encountered have irresponsible owners and they shouldn't have any dog. Most are young males who don't even stick around to make sure the other dog is ok.
- They are responsible for damage caused by their pets.
- The owner of the offending dog should have to pay for any physical damages caused.
- Yes, as it would be good to also get the biting dog owner's account of the situation. This should be considered when finding a solution/consequence to the biting dog. Not just get it all from the side of the dog who got bitten, knowing full well that dogs bite when they are also provoked.
- The owner of the dog should be held accountable, but the city of Calgary has no right to seize any animals.
- Yes when any personal injury takes place the owner should be required to remain at the scene HOWEVER I have been In a situation when another Citizen accused my dog of biting her even when there were witnesses present to discredit what she was saying. A clause needs to be added to protect dog owners from false personal injury claims.
- It should be treated the same as a car accident. If someone is harmed, you shouldn't be allowed to walk away as an investigation into why a dog bit is needed. Again, the likely outcome is that the owner didn't recognize the basic signs a dog was giving off of aggression or uncomfortableness.
- Once a bite has occurred, it should be treated the same as assault. I can't bite someone in public then walk away without consequence, why should a dog owner?
- The owner is responsible for the pet and it's trained behavior.
- this way both sides of the story can be told. So as to not put all blame on the dog, but the victim of the bite as well (eg. a child keeps blowing in a dogs face, pulling on its ears or fur causing the dog to react)
- Owners are responsible for their dogs, and any damage they cause.
- No explanation needed. Do you drive away after you hit a car? No, so stay.
- I think that the owners should take responsibility for their dogs because 1. It's their pet, 2. They are the ones who trained their dogs and possibly didn't train them well, hence the biting, 3. It the right thing to do.
- Makes sense
- My daughter's French Bulldog had his ear almost completely torn off by a Mastiff. She was lucky because, although the dog was not well controlled, the owner did stay and paid for the surgery necessary to reattach the ear. There were a lot of witnesses to the situation so, for this owner, I think he knew he couldn't get away without being identified. Owners of vicious dogs need to be held accountable at all times.

- Of course the animal damaged or injured someone. That is the owners responsibility to be accountable for it.
- They should face the fines
- It's the best way to guarantee correct information is gathered
- Accountability should be requires, yes, but all parties involved should be held to this expectation unless of course a injury sustained is life threatening.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs action
- Yes, however the definition and severity of what constitutes a 'bite' needs to be well fleshed out ahead of time. Dogs nipping at each other at a dog park would be impossible to moderate.
- If necessary.
- Obviously a person should be required to answer for damage or difficulty they have caused, just like any crime.
- of course the owner should remain at the scene but both sides of the story should be taken into account, if someone hits my dog or myself and then my dog attacks them then i think they have every right to do so in defending themselves or their owner
- There have been several instances of owners leaving the scene and the vicious dog has attacked again. - both humans and other dogs.
- Yes. This is necessary to determine why this happened in the first place and to access the state of the victim whether it be a person or animal. I believe each owner is responsible for their dog and their dogs actions, therefor needs to deal with what happens.
- I totally agree with the above. It should be treated like a motor vehicle accident
- I had a dog that once bit a woman terrified of dogs. It really was more of a scratch, and the dog was a puppy. The woman did not speak English and I didn't speak her language. I gave her my name and number, the number of my vet and my dog's tag. She had someone else call me. If my dog bites someone, I feel responsible and would like others to be responsible as well. It's part of being considerate in the City.
- be accountable for your pet
- The owner should be responsible for the actions of the dog.
- Responsible owner
- Otherwise it may be impossible to track someone down after an attack.
- like an accident or crash, if the damages are bad.
- I personally know of a friend who was attacked and bitten by dogs of an owner who allowed them off-leash in a leashed only area. The owner finally controlled her dogs then made a hasty exit without acknowledging my friends injuries or doing anything a responsible dog owner would do. I would be happy to share [personal information removed] contact information if requested.
- This would ensure that both parties have an accurate description of the events.
- Owners are responsible for the training and care of their animals. If a dog bites, the owner needs to explain what happened and why.

- The owner is responsible for the actions of the dog and should be required to stay and provide the necessary information
 - If I or my son are attacked by a dog and the owner is free to leave there's no guarantee of being able to take steps necessary to get the dog proper training or trauma care for the victim.
 - Absolutely! If a dog bites an owner should absolutely stay at the scene. Should share info (insurance) in case of doctors/vets bills. It's owner's responsibility!
 - That should be part of the owner's responsibility.
 - Responsible dog owners would stay regardless so a rule seems fine. Dogs do not usually bite without being provoked so this would allow the owner the opportunity to explain what happened in defence of the dog.
 - "Any dog that bites should be followed up by bylaw. Someone needs to verify of the dog's vaccinations are up to date even if the bite wasn't a serious one or the dog was provoked into biting.
- Bylaw needs to be trained to understand that just because a dog nips someone (much different than an attack) it isn't necessarily a vicious dog. If someone teases a dog and pushes it to the point where it has no choice but to give the person a quick nip, the person provoking the dog should be fined, NOT the dog owner! All factors need to be considered but I definitely agree that the responsible dog owner should wait around to speak to officials as per my opening remarks."
 - Dog owner should stay at the scene to hear advice on how to best deal with their dog's behaviour. I do not agree with euthanasia however and do not think that this should ever be a response.
 - better data gathering
 - Same reason as to why a driver needs to remain on the scene of an accident. It is important to hear all sides of the story and give contact information in case the person or animal that was bitten needs medical attention.
 - The owner should remain at the scene provided they are not putting their safety at risk by doing so.
 - the owner of an aggressive dog should be held accountable
 - The owner needs to be there to explain what had happened
 - If you have to do it for a car accident you should have to do it for a dog bite.
 - That's the responsible thing to do
 - "Owners should be responsible for their pet.
 - It is their duty to train them correctly and if an incident occurs they should be held responsible or at least be able to give an explanation as to why their pet reacted."
 - Because if you are in a car accident you don't drive away either.
 - There are two sides to every story.
 - As long as it applies to ALL BREEDS I agree. Much like a traffic accident where the drivers have to remain obscene. The officer involved would then be able to have a live view and judgement of the offending dogs character in person. I believe incidents are a lack of owner responsibility to raise proper behaved dogs or other pets the same as their children are raised to know to live peacefully etc.

- Our neighbourhood has now experienced two separate pitbull acts on smaller gentle good mannered dogs, latest attack resulted in Vet bills in excess of $1,000. The owner left the area hoping to avoid notice [personal information removed] and I am not aware of financial compensation has been made. The pitbull is still with the owners.
- Often it's the fault of the owner and not the dog.... owners need to be trained before they get dogs
- Basic accountability. OWNER accountability here is the issue, and this is why your BSL is off track. An owner of a vicious German Shepherd doesn't have to muzzle, but a friendly "pitbull" type does? That's ridiculous. Sorry, that's too long of a word for you guys. It's dumb.
- So they cannot escape
- The victim should be able to contact the owner or have enforcement contact them
- To take responsibility
- They should have to disclose information for future incidents, to be able to track behaviour of owners and their dogs.
- Owners should provide their interpretation of events.
- Most people realize they own a dangerous dog and know they will be fined/have their dog seized and therefore will not stick around in most cases.
- I would have assumed this was already the case. A pet owner must take responsibility for their pet and if their dog bites a person or another animal it is perfectly reasonable to expect the owner to remain at the scene until authorities arrive. Failure or refusal to do so is irresponsible pet ownership.
- They should share information for future contact.
- A responsible pet owner would not leave the scene.
- To me this is no different than remaining at the scene of an auto collision.
- Basic owner responsibility!
- It's just common Accountability
- Responsible owners would remain at the scene and do their best to cooperate.
- Dog owners must be responsible. There are far too many factors when it comes to a dog bite.
- If the incident in question is severe enough then all parties in question have to come to an agreement of the next necessary steps
- so all witness will be on sight.
- These incidents should be treated much like car accidents - sharing of personal information from both parties is required, and not doing so or fleeing the scene is a punishable offence.
- Owners should be responsible for insuring their dog is trained no matter what breed it is. This could also help the owner explain if the dog was provoked, prove the dog's prior training if necessary etc.
- So they can explain why they should be punished for their dog.
- It is the responsible thing to do
- yes if someone's dog harms someone they should have to remain. In no way should any rules about bully breeds be applied. I have never met an aggressive bully breed

- Depending on circumstances, the dog may need to be apprehended if it is considered dangerous. If not the serious of an offence, it should still be recorded and taken into account if there are further issues.
- This is self-explanatory. If you are involved in an incident where damage or harm as been done to another or their property, it should be illegal to leave the scene. You can't crash your car and leave the scene, this should be the same.
- Allows the city to better identify potentially dangerous dogs in the community. Exchanging contact info should be required at minimum.
- Any incident requiring police presence requires all individuals involved to remain for questioning.
- At the end of they day if they do not it should be treated the same as someone who flees the scene after committing any other crime
- Owners of aggressive dogs need to be held accountable. Dog attacks should be treated the same as car accidents.
- Accountability is key when dealing with aggressive pets; similar to having to wait on the scene after a car crash.
- Owners must be held accountable if their dog bites a person or other animal.
- Self explanatory. The person needs to own up to the incident and face consequences. I've been little vicious dogs the owners think they are small so they can't do harm. All owners need to know there are consequences.
- I think having to share contact info is a good idea because if it happens again then you can see that this dog has had more than one attack. And it should be treated the same as a vehicle accident, and a person fleeing the scene.
- They should be accountable for their pets actions
- Need to know about shot if it's the first time need info
- The owner has to be held accountable for the behaviour of his dog.
- I assumed this was the law. Seems self evident that owner should remain on scene unless agreement that matter is resolved.
- Depends on the circumstance.
- A responsible pet owner would stay , ensuring everyone involved was taken care of and voluntarily share information. It is only irresponsible owners that run off . Just like you have to do in vehicle accidents
- treat is same as a motor vehicle accident
- If a dog does attack/ cause injury I do believe actions should be taken, but attacking innocent dogs due to their breed is wrong.
- I have witnessed multiple cases as well as heard more anecdotally of owners panicking after their dog has attacked another person/animal and run away. By creating a legal requirement to remain at the scene, there will be at minimum an increased facilitation between victim and owner about what happened and the best course to pursue after the incident.

- If an animal bites a person or another animal, it is the owners responsibility to provide information and be sure the injuries person/animal is ok. If it happens once, it can happen again. This information needs to be collected.
- This needs explaining?
- Just like a car accident, you can't bite and run.
- I think it's imperative that both sides explain what happened to an officer to get an accurate depiction of what took place. If a dog is truly dangerous it needs to be addressed immediately but if the fault is not on the dog/its owner then they should be able to go home with their dog and continue further investigation from there.
- The owner of a dog should be held liable 'on the record' to trace repeated behaviour and monitor the owner's ability to train animals.
- The owner is responsible for how their animal acts. They are a product of their environment. So the owner should be assessed if they are fit to be owners.
- If your dog bites someone that is the fault and responsibility of that owner, wether it's a chihuahua or a pitbull bad dogs come from bad people. There is no bad breeds
- it should be mandatory to stay with the animal that bit to be fined or have the animal taken away
- If someone gets
- In cases of a bite, the victim is far less likely of recourse if the owner flees (similar to vehicle hit and run)
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs actions.
- But this will be difficult to enforce
- It's just like if you get in a car accident. You have to remain at the scene
- I believe that the dog owner should be responsible for sharing contact info to the involved party.
- People are legally required to stay at the scene for things like car collisions, I don't see how an animal bite resulting in injury should be any different
- I know of more than one instance where owners of aggressive dogs that have attacked people and/or other dogs have simply left the scene.
- Dog owners should be responsible for their pet's actions.
- I would support this so that more ignorance about dogs and Pitbulls in particular is not spread. If the owner is onsite the reason for the dog bite, what provoked the animal and the past treatment of the animal can be addressed.
- However, in most cases from my experiences, often the animal only bites due to being provoked, more than once, by untrained animals & inexperienced people. Also, to be around animals their are proper ways to approach animals & to pet them, etc. I consistently see people especially children, approach animals incorrectly. This is not the child's fault or the animal's fault in any regard, it is the parents/guardians fault. Therefore, I feel that an animal should NOT undergo any ramifications if it bites another after being provoked or threatened by another. If an animal immediately attacks & bites due to being provoked, that particular animal simply should not be around animals or people. But once again, this is often not the case & must be taken into strong consideration.
- Take responsibility for your actions. No different than a car collision.

- Information needs to be shared. If not in person, a call from the victim or assault dog owner needs to be made.
- This is common sense. Same as a hit and run.
- You need to be a good responsible dog owner. When you aren't bad things happen. Need to take responsibility and get proper training to train your dog if needed.
- If a dog bites I would be surprised that there is not a rule in place that compels someone to provide their contact information. If there is a discrepancy I would expect a bylaw officer attend, the same as police officer would attend in a car accident if there is a discrepancy.
- A dog bite may pose a health hazard beyond merely just injury (ie transmission of disease). The owner would be negligent to leave a scene in which their dog has injured someone and poses a hazard to health or safety. It should also be recorded on file when a dog bites someone in public.
- "Un my experience it has been smaller dogs that bite and attack other dogs.
- Its small dogs that are not trained by owners because they are small and if all owners had to stay we would have proof to support this"
- No different than an accident or incident with vehicles or if any issue occurred that required enforcement.
- Sharing information and assessing seriousness is important. Waiting to talk to enforcement only if immediate medical attention is required.
- Responsibility should lie with all dog owners to ensure dog bites are addressed, but only serious bites should warrant an enforcement officer.
- This is absolutely necessary so that the dog's veterinary status (rabies in particular) can be determined.
- If a dog i jury occurs it should be on the owner to stick around an explain the situation
- The owner needs to start taking more responsibility for their dogs. No dog should ever be put down due to an incident like biting. Dogs don't understand right and wrong, they live off of instinct and by what their owners teach them whats okay. Maybe people will smarten up and take more responsibility if the penalties were harsher for the humans and not the animals.
- Duh
- as long as it is safe for them to remain on site. I believe if you are a responsible owner you would remain. Leaving would be like leaving the scene of an accident.
- The owner should be held accountable and not have the opportunity to hide and therefore further endangering other people or animals.
- It's important to have accountability for dog owners to not run away, and to enact major fines for breaching this rule. This rule should also apply to cat owners.
- They should not be leaving the scene! There are to many people who run and do not take responsibility. They need to get the dog under control or put the dog in a car and stay!
- If severe it's important such as if a dog or person is injured and needs medical attention
- "yes if a dog bites a person. Depending on the severity of the bite
- No if the dog bits an animal again depending on the severity of the bite"

- Poor behaviour in dogs is always related to poor ownership. Owners just be made responsible for the actions of their animals, regardless of breed or animal type. Fines for poor ownership should be introduced and stuffer penalties for abuse causing animals to be dangerous to others.
 - If the bite needs treatment the owner can provide helpful info. Vaccines etc...
 - The owner of the dog should be held responsible for the dog's actions. The enforcement officer needs to have the contact info for follow up.
 - Owners need to take and accept responsibility for their dogs. Don't blame the dog for an u educated owner.
 - There are two sides to every story so the full picture should be known. People who don't stay are irresponsible it's like leaving the scene of an accident
 - For documentation purposes
 - of course to exchange information, i want the officers to question the owners as to why the dog would bite! EX poor training, animal abuse! i beleive owners need to be held responsbile for this
 - Obviously dont want people taking off after an incident
 - Just like a car accident, the dog owner and people involved should remain on scene until a police report can be made.
 - When you are responsible for an injured person, you should always stay and help!
 - If your dog bites a person or animal, there may be medical costs involved. If charges are involved the owner needs to provide information to bylaw/ police about the incident.
 - Do agree with it to an extent, if the dog has attacked a person/animal it's not like a car crash that's over and done with...there could be a secondary attack if the dog is anxious or overly agressive but I do agree that the owner should be held accountable.
 - I support it , so they take responsibility for what happened and exchange information if needed.
 - Taking responsibility for your pet is basic dog owner rules.
 - Their dog, their responsibility. Therefore, their responsibility to the injured party(s).
 - Same as we do with most other accidents requiring emergency services
 - "If their dog is not properly trained, or if the bitten person provoked the attack, it should be recorded and dealt with. If the dog has a history of attacking, they have not been correctly trained and that should be dealt with, and options provided (such as obedience classes, counselling for the owner, etc).
- If serious damage has been done to the bitten person, the owner should also cover the costs."
 - The owner should own up to their dogs mistake. Also it is the owners fault should the dog bite someone else and they should be held accountable. There are no bad dogs, just bad owners
 - Owner must comply with what is needed at an incident, to assist the injured and provide info and contact info.
 - They should separate the dogs and get them calm. Then the people should trade info do it can be resolved.

- Yes as long as it includes all dog breeds. Pitbulls and pitbull terriers are the sweetest dogs and there are more that can cause harm towards other people and other dogs.
- Too many escape to avoid dealing with the possible consequences of what happened.
- Way to many give false info or take off, however I personally don't agree with dog parks either as its usually the ignorant owners that are the cause of the issue.
- Sounds like something a responsible pet owner should do regardless of the type of pet.
- I am surprised this isn't a rule now. It's terrifying to think owners could just walk away after an incident!
- Just like car accident .
- because, like a car accident there could be damages and costs incurred from the attack, information should be exchanged incase there are injuries
- .
- People should be held accountable for their pets actions.
- Owner needs to be responsible for damages by their pet.
- only if it draws blood. Dogs nip when they play.
- It helps if the dog owner is there to fight for their dog in the case of a bite. Again, circumstances could mean the victim was teasing, abusing, harassing or otherwise provoking the dog.
- I believe they should have to stay so that proper documentation could be made. The only reason I believe they should leave is if the situation is not controlled and would cause more danger then good. If you are unable to control your animal or more harm could be done by waiting then I believe it should be okay to return the dog to the home.
- Because it may not of been the dogs fault, it could of been attacked by another dog, or bothered by another person. I believe they should stay to explain the situation so you hear both sides of the story
- If your dog bites someone of course it's the correct thing to do to stay at the scene. Dog owners should video every encounter as well.
- A crime/offence has been committed leaving the scene is no different than hit and run vehicle offence, they are responsible for property or personal injury. If the owner felt it was best to remove their agitated dog from the area he/she should identify themselves first or contact authorities when they reach their home.
- Owners need to be held liable for the actions of their dogs. They need to be punished if their animals harm others.
- If a dog bite happens it needs to be looked into. Not only for the injured but for the dog, sometimes it isn't the dog that is wrong.
- I was bitten last year by a dog who was on leash as i was running on the sidewalk...I informed them that i would be reporting them and that i required their information. However, i did not want to hang out waiting for an enforcement officer as my leg as bleeding everywhere, and i was somewhat in shock. I don't think the victim of the bite should necessarily have to wait at the scene.
- Dog owners must take responsibility for the actions of their dog. If an incident occurs involving their dog, the should have to provide contact information to the other person and/or enforcement office - similar to minor traffic collisions.

- If your dog bites anyone of course you need to stay and make sure everyone is okay ect
- I think it is important to acknowledge responsibility and cooperate with the city following an attack.
- Most dash. You don't catch them until they get caught by repeat actions .
- it is important to keep track of owners who have a dog involved in a bite incident
- Yes every dog that bites needs to be held accountable regardless of the breed. If it was a chihuahua the owner should stay just as much as a Great Dane or a German shepherd.
- Yes. Because they need to be held accountable for the situation at hand. Not to mention that you'll find that most who end up in this situation aren't bully breeds.
- Sounds like common sense.... didn't they have to already?
- So that they can be held accountable, have their dog/s go on record and enable the enforcement officer to follow up on any restrictions imposed
- The victim should have contact info in case there are any treatments required
- Absolutely support this. Pet owners should be responsible for their dogs actions.
- Most times it's the owners fault for not training the dog so it should be owners responsibility to own up
- putting a claim through insurance for a dog bite will be difficult without the owner information, and requiring the owner to stick around makes sense.
- It's only fair. If a dog attacks another dog it's destruction of private property which is against the law.
- Owners must be accountable for the conduct of their dogs.
- Dog owners should be responsible for their dog, regardless of breed. Small dogs included.
- They need to hear both sides of the story.
- need to hear both sides of the story. Both parties should remain wher the incident happened
- Both sides of the story should be recorded.
- The owner should provide information in the event of injury (animal history including health)
- If it was a serious bite I would definitely think that the owner should stay at the scene and/or help contact medical attention if necessary. However, if the animal is acting aggressively, it likely should be secured or removed from the scene in a timely manner which may mean temporarily leaving the scene.
- Yes
- Yes they should remain to give information
- To provide proof of vaccinations and to ensure all details surrounding the incident be reported
- Saves time trying to track down the owner to get relevant information.
- You won't get that if you start blaming one BREED for all of your bites/incidentcs. If I am a pitbull owner and an incident happens, I will most likely flee knowing you will falsely accuse my dog and treat him as a monster since you are keen to ban them. Responsible ownership and equal treatment of dogs or no one will respect you and your laws. There are many incidents where the larger dog is not at fault but because of their size there is a bias. All pet owners have a responsibility. If my large breed can't run around the city off leash neither can your Pomeranian! It's not cute either way.
- Very important to show that the dog owner shows responsibility.

- Its part of being a responsible pet owner
- It's no different than a hit-and-run with a vehicle. The property owner (car vs dog) is required to remain and provide information for the civil consequences for their lack of control of said property.
- Owner should help cover fees associated with bills from injuries that may occur to opposite party
- There could be injury and the dog should be assessed
- Its just like a car accident. As long as no one or pet needs urgent care, everyone should stay until enforcement arrives.
- I thought that already required
- Just like a car accident. Makes sense. If not at the scene you need to provide follow up information at the very least.
- Yes the owner should remain present to share information. However, the officer should be arriving on scene with the understanding that dog bites happen for a variety of reasons - most often fear and not outright aggression.
- If a dog, any dog bites or attacks a person, the owner should be responsible for the proper procedures to ensure that the person is healed properly. The dog should be reprimanded according to owners choice.
- The owner or caretaker of the dog (in the case of someone else besides the owner taking care of the dog) should be held accountable for the dog's behaviour.
- i say yes if something sevre happened, all dogs nip at other dogs while playing, DO NOT blow your petty ideas of serve dog bites out of proportion
- none required.
- The person or dog bitten should be able to contact the owner in regard to issues caused by the dog or medical expenses which the owner should pay.
- Treat it like an auto accident. Owners must stay on scene to fill out an incident report.
- It is the owner's responsibility for keeping their dog in line and making sure that everyone's in it's surroundings is safe.
- Yes information should be shared, but if there is a significant injury's, the health of person or animal should take priority.
- I have been bitten by off-leash dogs in a city park and had no recourse due to the owner leaving the scene.
- Speaking with the owner could give a general sense as to how they treat their pet/if this has happened before.
- Further checks need to be made to the home after the incident and also a log to make sure it doesn't happen again
- Many times the owner leaves, they should be held accountable
- The owner of an offending dog should be held accountable. This is analogous to why we have hit and run laws.
- It's the right thing to do. No different than a car accident.
- If the owners stay the at the scene it can easily be determined what happened.

- If my child was bitten by a dog I would like the owner of the dog to be present when I am talking to the enforcement officer.
- Both sides should be allowed to state their case, it's easy to twist facts or gain sympathy for your side if it's being told one-sided.
- Owners should take responsibility for their dog. It is not the dogs fault. Pitbulls should not be discriminated because they have a bad name, it's just that the owners do not know how to train their dog.
- It is much easier to get a hold of the owner. Witness the state of the dog shortly after the scene. And hear both sides of the story.
- Too many Pit and Runs by irresponsible Pit bull owners. Which most are.
- This makes sense as many people, when the are panicking, do not know the right questions to ask in order to get in contact with the offending dogs owner.
- I understand a situation can get heated and perhaps the animal needs to be taken home or placed in the car, so maybe the understanding that an owner would return
- We need to be able to identify the dog and owner
- If they leave the site, how would they be held accountable? If they leave the scene and this is a rule, Costa associated with having to find this person could be recovered through fines.
- Yes, if severe and requires medical intervention.
- All owners should be held responsible for their animals or they should not be allowed to have any.
- There are always two sides of a story. Too often, a dog is automatically presumed to be at fault. I have witnessed incidents were dogs have been approached even against the owner's wishes.
- The owner needs to be present as they are the ones that have trained their animal. The breed of the dog is not the issue, ANY breed can be involved in these incidents. It is how the breed is trained by their OWNER
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for the damages their dogs do.
- They should be there to explain their side of the story, and be liable if it was in fact their fault.
- It should be treated as a hit and run type incident if your dog bites someone and you take off from the area.
- I do feel it's important to share their information but it may be better to remove the dog from the situation asap and then come back rather than keep the dog in the situation that is already intense.
- People need to be responsible for their animals
- ALL involved parties should share contact information and speak with enforcement officers as necessary.
- Only to ensure dog is healthy and up to date on all vaccinations. Not to apprehend to dog.
- It's no different than a vehicle collision. The owner must be present to exchange contact information.
- Responsibility for all dog owners. Not focused on a breed or appearance.
- Is this seriously not currently required? People are just allowed to run off with their dogs that just bit someone?

- It's like a car accident, you must share info but if the owner is afraid of you taking away their dogs then it makes sense why they are leaving.
- If I cause an accident (e.g. a hit and run), I'm required to stay at the scene so if someone's dog bites a person or animal, it should be the same -- stay and deal with the consequences.
- Unless the owner must secure the dog to prevent further injuries.
- To take responsibility for their dogs behaviour.
- This way hopefully all the facts are present and no one can spin tales. Depending on the situation I do believe some people should be responsible for vets bills and the like.
- It's common sense.
- There was an accident. Yes the owner should have to wait on scene and not flee.
- It's called responsible pet ownership
- You wouldn't leave a hit and run.. same idea
- The pet owner has the responsibility of ensure the authorities are provided correct details of the incident whether it was accidental or not, keep in mind most bites are due to human error and the owner should have the right to be heard vs a dog being found instantly at fault.. You don't flee the scene of a vehicular accident even though your not at fault so same rules should apply.
- The owner must be held accountable for his/her dog's actions.
- However, this may not be practicable in cases where remaining at the scene may cause an escalation of aggression.
- Too often Pet owners quickly leave the scene of an incident where their animal had injured another pet or person; resulting in no recourse for the victim. There should be strict fines/charges related to leaving the scene following an attack caused by their animal.
- Make sure people are held responsible and bites are on record
- Not all dog aggression is more than a one time occurrence but it's important for owners to stay at the scene and be responsible for the follow up
- This is necessary as some owners may flee the scene. Vet bills should be paid by the attackers owners.
- Yes because that reflects responsible pet ownership
- Common sense.
- You'd never be allowed to leave the scene of an accident without leaving information or speaking with police. The same should apply for animal incidents.
- There should be penalties if the owner leaves the scene without sharing information or talking with an officer.
- Accountability is important, but also getting both sides of the story is important. Hearing the situation from 2 perspectives can go a long way. This would also be an opportunity for education and promoting resources for the owner to look into.
- Because this will make the owners accountable. Most peoples dog bite other dogs and the owners leave the scene and give no information

- It seems proper to have the owner of an animal that attacks or injures someone to be there to represent the animal in question. It also shows responsibility for their animals actions and what the owner should be held accountable for.
- The owner should be responsible for the care, control and behavior of their pet and any consequence of an incident. Especially vet bills if their pet causes harm to another.
- The cases of the offending dog's owner simply walking away are increasing. Scofflaws must be held responsible.
- It is the owner's responsibility for any actions of their dog and they should be liable for that. With that being said the most important thing is cor the owner to make sure they're dog is safe to be around other people in public but this should not be restricted to dog ONLY such as pitbulls. Any dog should follow this law including this like chihuahua's.
- The dog owner needs to be responsible for their pets actions. Contact information should be required so this dog will be flagged as having an incident.
- You should always stay at the scene, at least till help arrives
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their dog, so they should remain present at the scene. It's a form of assault.
- Responsibility for the pet is essential.
- "Multiple" reports need to be made to designate the dog as a nuisance, as stated in an above question, so each incident must be reported properly.
- I think it is self explanatory. It is responsible ownership. Simply.
- Sometimes the behavior of the dog will not warrant staying at the scene -but address info should be given to contact later
- They need to be responsible and have empathy for the animal and other owner. So you can also get both sides of the story. But as long as the biting dog is not seized yet from owner!
- As long as it doesn't take too long for the officer to get there.
- I feel this should be common curtesy
- Unless it was heated and the person was in danger of staying. As long as they immediately contacted the authorities and left their info, that would suffice.
- I support this so long as this is engaged as a level approached situation. If there are mitigating circumstances that lead to the attack (eg provoking the animal through teasing, etc) then neither the dog nor owner should be punished for first time offenses. If the animal becomes a "nuisance" with multiple events then this would come into play as well.
- Bites can be deadly and owners need to take responsibility. Also adding in a comment from above, there is no scientific proof that pitbulls are any more dangerous than other breeds.
- The person should stay at the site just like a car accident or any other type of accident
- The owner is liable for their dogs actions, since they are the ones training it
- The owner is responsible for their animal. Just like a driver is responsible for their car in an accident. Fining bad owner behaviours (leaving the scene) will lead to more responsible owners.
- It is part of being a responsible pet owner, alongside the duties of a driver involved in an accident. Additionally, it would save bylaw officers the trouble of trying to identify the person and track them down. Derelict owners should not be allowed to escape responsibility simply by leaving the scene and disappearing. It should be remembered that there may also be civil action as a result, and the victim should be given every opportunity to identify the other party.

- Too many people leaving the scene and not taking responsibility for their dog.
- Too many irresponsible dog owners out there hold them accountable
- It's just like a car accident. You're responsible for damage.
- Just like a hit and run, when any damage has been done to a human or pet, by a dog, the owner should be held responsible.
- Small dog bites that do not cause a lot of harm can be dismissed but anything that may need stitches should be forced to stay at the scene
- Sometimes dogs bite because other [removed] dogs aren't being controlled properly.
- yes....if the bitten party wants the owner of the biting dog to remain.
- By staying at the scene, the owner would take responsibility for the incident
- Because if they don't they are an absolute scumbag.
- It is the owners that must be held accountable for their animal. Don't blame the dog, hold owners accountable.
- Owners often run away with the animal and hide it from law enforcement officers.
- The owner of the offending animal needs to take financial responsibility for any medical expenses for an animal or a human affected
- Otherwise they might never be located & the dog will do it again.
- The owner is at fault and leaving the scene would be like a hit and run. They would be fleeing a scene.
- for mild infractions an exchange of information similar to a fender bender is sufficient but for more severe incidents would require an enforcement officer
- Situation needs explanation on how incident happened
- Most of the most serious dog bite incidents that have been reported recently involved owners who left the scene
- If the owner walks away with their dog, fines, need to muzzle/train or tribunal cannot take place.
- It is surprising that this isn't already a rule.
- Your pet is your responsibility. If there is an incident where there is a bite or attack, the owner should ABSOLUTELY have to speak with the enforcement officer and be held accountable.
- The human needs to be held accountable for the animal's actions. Animals do not have a voice and rely on their humans for direction. Bad animal owners need to be held accountable. This bylaw would help that.
- An offense has occurred, and this is no different than leaving the scene of a traffic accident
- I believe that dogs do not bite without cause. All possible reasons should be taken into consideration (ie teasing, leash aggression if more than one dog involved, abuse, and uncontrolled children)
- Owner should be charged with acts committed by their animals

- Unless it is too difficult to contain the dog. The person MUST provide their contact info, to the injured parties/ dog owners, so that there can be follow-up, as there would be in a traffic accident.
- It's common courtesy if the injury is significant
- They need to take responsibility for their dogs actions and so that the officer can evaluate the situation!
- Same rationale as in car accidents.
- Dog owners need to be responsible to the behaviour of their dog(s); this includes acting responsibly after any incident, such as a dog bite.
- No different from fleeing an accident
- This is just plain responsible dog ownership.
- the enforcement officer should be able to assess the owner / dog that is involved in the incident.
- Same as the scene of an accident in this case
- I think that's the way to go
- I believe that many times the owner of a dog that has bitten someone may give the other owner false contact information in order to avoid paying for veterinary bills.
- how else can enforcement measures be implemented and medical contact in case if rabies etc
- It is important to know if an incident like this has happened before. From there, you can eliminate repeat offenders and owners who have not given the dog a proper upbringing, training etc...
- Should be treated the same as a car accident.
- I think it's extremely fair for the owner of the animal to give an enforcement officer their side of the story, it can not be biased though. If you have an officer that hates dogs, they will immediately say it's the dogs fault. Look at the "victim". Were they provoking the animal?
- Yes AS LONG AS it is safe to do so. If the dog in question needs to be restrained then remaining in the situation could further aggravate a situation. If it is not safe or the dog is overstimulated, then safety first, as well as calming the animal so the handlers can discuss matters without the distraction of managing an overstimulated, hyper reactive dog
- Same as a vehicular accident. In case of criminal proceedings, the names of the parties involved need to be available.
- Dog owners should be held responsible for the behaviour of their dog.
- police show be able to say if the bite was the dog or the owners fault, as dogs are only as good as they are trained.
- It forces owner to acknowledge their dog bit someone/dog. Very often these owners don't acknowledge their dog is dangerous. By taking this action it tells everyone the city that we are serious about dangerous dogs.
- It's no different than a car accident. Information should always be exchanged.
- I have seen aggressive dog owners simply walk away when their dog bites and has attacked other dogs. Making it mandatory they have to stay will help the victims seek justice.
- It's the same thing as if your child gets involved in a fight or altercation the parents would want to share information and make sure everything is okay . Situations should be able to be controlled though with proper public training on how to approach dogs and never leaving children unattended

- Owners should take responsibility for their pets actions.
- There are no consequences if someone's dog can attack then they can just leave
- I was attacked by a dog this year. The person responsible for the dog at the time was not the owner. There should be more responsibility for pet owners.
- That is just general decency
- It's important to keep everyone safe
- Why shouldn't an owner have to stay and be held responsible
- They do it for car accidents so animal accidents makes sense
- "Common sense
- Responsible thing to do."
- Same as a car accident. Take responsibility for your actions and the actions of the animal in your care.
- Yes, all dog owners should be held accountable for their dogs actions including any vet or medical bills that might result for an altercation. Any dog owner should be required to stick around after an altercation until either both parties have any information they require and are happy with the outcome or enforcement officers have come and cleared the scene.
- The dog owner should be responsible
- Yes, provided that the dog owner or dog breed is not discriminated against.
- once they leave its hard to track them down
- This was an incident if an animal bites a person or animal this needs to be worked out so it does not happen again. Be proactive.
- If your dog bite somebody you have to wait for the authorities if the dog is on private property and somebody comes on the property and gets bit that's too bad stay off the private property
- The dog owner of the animal should remain at the scene due to the unknown severity of the bite and injuries as well as the expenses that may be involved. If a dog owner leaves the scene they take no responsibility and there is no penalties or measures put in place to ensure it doesn't happen again.
- My dog was attacked at the dog park by a pitbull. The owner wouldn't not speak to us and tried to continue walking his dogs through the park. A bystander called the police.
- I completely support any new measures to hold people accountable for their dangerous dog's behaviour. My dogs were the victims of bylaw case A18-067515 (unprovoked Pitbull attack on two small dogs), and the owners of the offending dog were never held accountable due to the fact they dropped the dog off at Fish Creek Pet Hospital and claimed that it was a stray. Bylaw was not able to prove ownership of the dog, and because of that I was never able to receive financial recompense via legal means for my vet bills that totalled $17,500. This was the second incident of a pitbull attack by a dog that lived at the same address, and witnesses came forward to identify the dog and declare that the dog had been living at the residence for several months.
- Pet owners need to be responsible for their pets actions, regardless of breed. I guess I assumed it was already a law but absolutely if a dog bites someone or another dog that person needs to be responsible for it. I don't know if waiting at the scene is the best option, probably best to remove the dog from the environment, but information needs to be exchanged and bylaw officers need to be involved. I could understand wanting to take the dog home right away but they should have to report it that day.

- good luck enforcing that... hey maybe you can make more cash from an incident if you create as many bylaws as possible. Owners are bound to break more than one... heck there should be a bylaw for not having a phone on the person.. or not wearing the right color... or maybe even the right color of their skin. Isn't this how we will be basing our opinions now?
- With bites to humans
- The person who owns the dog needs to be responsible for the dog if an incident occurs, they should not be able to just walk away.
- i have been bit and no one stays and had to go on rabies alert. they should stay
- The owner must assume responsibility for their dog's violent actions.
- If there is no bylaw to the effect, owners of dogs that have just attacked or bitten would feel free to walk away. Leaving the onus of reparation to the victim to track down their attacker. That's not fair
- Dog owners are responsible for the dog(s) they own (which means it is the PERSON who is responsible for the dog's bad behavior, not the dog). So if the dog bites a person or another dog, the owner should be legally responsible for staying at the scene to give contact information. Many dog owners don't have insurance, so if a poorly trained dog owner allows their animal to be in a situation (generally off leash) where they could become aggressive with people or other dogs, they should be legally responsible for the medical bills required to treat the victim person/dog, including long term physiotherapy or mental health consulting. There is a reason why it's against the law to flee from the scene of a car accident/incident.
- It should be set up similar to a car accident. Provide contact information and fill out a report at the Police station or on-line.
- Yes the owner should have to remain on the scene and provide contact information - however if the dog is aggressive its best to remove the dog from the scene and leave the information with a witness if possible
- Heres a funny- my Pitbull has been attacked 5 times in the last 8 years-twice at Sue Higgins-twice at Southwood and once in Canyon Meadows-not one person stuck around that had the vicious animal and so far I have spent over 1000.00 on vet bills. BTW-most of the vicious dogs were labs.
- A lot of people who own pit bulls/vicious dogs are not capable of properly controlling the animal. The people who own these animals are not equipped with the proper knowledge/skills to own a pet.
- A lot of Dog owners think that they are entitled to let their dog roam free in non off leash parks like playgrounds, green space or fields. Some don't clean after their dog and some just let the dog out at any hour day or night to bark up a storm. I think that if the owner is not responsible for the dog they should be prohibited from having one
- seeing as there is no further explanation for restricting certain breeds I will use this box. Naming Pitbulls as the sole breed as being aggressive is wrong and full of mistruth. Owners need to be held accountable not the dogs. Bad owners equal bad dogs. There should be severe penalties for those found abusing, and creating aggressive dogs what ever breed they are. Muzzling and restricting certain dogs is creating a fear of them that does not need to be perpetuated.

- It is the Owners Responsibility when their dog causes harm and should be held accountable!
- It is near impossible to identify a dog and owner when an offense has occurred . I think any attack with or without blood drawn should require an exchange of ID for further investigation. A major issue however is that my first concern is to get out of there and my dog to safety, so I am not sure how the exchange of information can happen in reality. This is why I think nuisance dogs need to carry a vest or easily readable tag or something to identify them from a few meters away.
- That should already happen but ALMOST ALL dog owners walk away. Instead of taking responsibility for there dogs actions. It's so ridicules I like there should be enforcement.
- Every owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions/behavior.
- Due process to determine liability of emotional distress inflicted on the dog by passersby. Dogs 99% of the time will only act defensively against aggressor.
- There are always 2 sides to a story.
- The owner needs to be held responsible not the dog
- A RESPONSIBLE DOG OWNER WOULD REMAIN TO PROVIDE INFORMATION. THIS SHOULD NOT EVEN BE A QUESTION. IRRESPONSIBLE OWNERS ARE THE PEOPLE WHO WILL NOT REMAIN OR PROIVDE INFORMATION.
- I think that if the offending animal is unprovoked, then there should be at the very least an exchange of information. I know that arguments happen more frequently, but if the rules are boldly posted at the dog parks, and maybe video surveillance of the parking lot would help deter bad actors
- Yes. The dog and owner should be identified for further action
- You talk about pitbulls its just a fear mongering created by media,there is never a story on the news of other dog attacks for instants there was a 2 year old attacked in the park by a golden lad a few years ago and is scared for life never made the news,ripped half of his face off,and owner never stayed to talk to nobody!
- People have been known to give false contact information. But if the victim is severely injured (dog or person) they should not be allowed to leave until the contact info can be verified.
- It allows proper management and follow up for potentially problem dogs.
- I believe these problems are caused by the owner in most cases. I also believe the owner needs to go to court to see if they are the problem and not the dog. If found it is the owner at fault .. then the owner is not allowed to own a dog for a number of years ??
- I'm not sure what needs explaining.
- To identify problem animals.
- Only when medical attention is necessary
- I believe a conversation is needed to understand how and why the incident occurred.
- much like any other incident, a dog bite usually requires medical services and having up to date information about the animal for rabies/vaccinations would be helpful.
- I have heard about so many people who run away when their dog attacks someone.
- Dog bites aren't reports enough, should be more recoil if a dog bites a child, especially if it's on the face.
- Regardless which party is at fault, exchanging information is reasonable

- "I have had experiences with small dog bites and the owner will just scoop their dog up and flee the scene attempting to explain "oh he's just small, there's no real danger".
- Make dog training a required. FOR ALL BREEDS"
- Fundamentally this is not different from requiring someone to remain on scene if involved in an accident.
- Any incident that ends with an injury should require all parties involved to stay at the scene to provide a statement to law enforcement. This protects both parties from the other giving false witness
- In 100% of my personal interactions with "nuisance" dogs, the owners are a nuisance themselves and poorly trained their pet.
- If you're a dog owner you are responsible for the actions of your dog and should make sure things are dealt with properly.
- They need to give their information and make sure the person/animal is ok , depending on how the incident happened they should also be responsible for the vet bill or a portion of it.
- However, enforcement actions should follow clearly established investigation and enforcement activities. The dogs should not be seized unless there is a clear danger to public.
- Yes - pet owners should be held responsible for harms that their pet may inflict on another person or animal.
- Some dog owners leave the scene and do not want to be reliable to the action of their dog.
- how else do u contact owner if there are further complications..following the incident
- No responsible dog owner would dream of leaving if their dog bit. Anyone wanting to leave has probably had other issues and they need help to ensure it doesn't happen again.
- The focus on lot bill like breeds is ill informed. While pit bulls used to be bred for fighting and attractive to owners wishing to look tough, this has changed dramatically. We walk twice a day in several off leash parks and have not encountered an aggressive pit bull in over 10 years in fact they are generally one of the sweetest breeds
- This is only fair, much like a car accident.
- Owner is responsible explaining the dog's behaviour, as long as they are not putting themselves in danger by staying at the scene.
- The current law states that the dog is an object owned by an owner, therefore the owner must take full responsibility for the animal.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs!!!!
- Any animal attack should be handled this way not just breed specific.
- If a dog bites, it would be considered a nuisance and might bite again. If the owner leaves, then it would mean the dog would not be apprehended.
- they are responsible for their animals actions
- Dogs of all sizes and breeds can cause serious physical and psychological damage when they attack. Ordinates and bylaws should be centred around responsible dog ownership, education and accountability.

- If a dog bites then statements should be taken and the responsible party should be involved in payment.
- I believe the responsibility of the dogs behavior lies solely with the owner, and as such requires disciplinary action.
- until damage is assessed, they should not leave. A lot of small dog owners seem to think the damage inflicted is minor, so they don't need to be responsible
- Yes, the dog owner should remain at the scene of an incident when their dog bites or attacks another individual. Often, the problem is only made worse and more traumatic for the victim(s) and the dog itself when the person flees. For example, when an individual is involved in a hit and run vehicle accident, and flees, they are charged with an additional crime when they leave the scene. An incident with a dog should be no different. A dog owner must be equally responsible for their dog as they are their vehicle, if not more so.
- none needed
- The owner is responsible for all costs incurred by those bite by the victims.
- Although, I don't believe that they will stay onsite. I believe that if my dog and I were involved in an incident, that I could take a picture of a drivers license, plate or other "official" paperwork.
- Dog bites are a dirty bite and need to be seen by a vet in some cases and if there is blood present then yes information needs to be shared to have the guilty dog owner pay the vet expenses if any are incurred.
- This is like any other scene of an accident so I feel it is appropriate that they wait to speak to enforcement
- You are responsible for your pet...
- It should be clear that the dog owner is only required to share their contact information with an enforcement officer, and that their contact information will NOT be shared with the other person. The other person may use the dog owner's contact information for nefarious purposes and, having to work with an enforcement officer for any necessary resolution (e.g. vet bills over and above a basic visit), it should reduce the chances that the other person lies to cause harm to the dog and/or its owner. The situations in which it would be deemed "necessary" should be clearly defined.
- However if the bi-law officer is delayed over 2 hours a dog needs to get water and rest and owner must produce ID.
- There should be a review of the situatio
- I think you should get each others information and take statements as to what happened because many dog bites are provoked whether it is peoples lack of knowledge on how to properly approach dogs or read their body language. I think it is also important to ensure the dog is up to date on all vaccines.
- The owner is responsible . A dog biting / attacking someone is Assault , by extension
- This should be treated like any other case of assault.
- Accidents happen and I would want to make sure that the owner is heard

- dogs biting is not okay! It should be treated like a car accident. The owner should be responsible for any damages the animal has caused and proper action should be taken for ensuring it doesn't happen again.
- I would want to be able to contact the owner if I/my dog contacted an infection from the bite.
- Some dog owners don't take responsibility for their dogs' actions, owners need to remain in the scene and share contact information
- Once dog attacked me and owner ran away
- It is the responsible thing to do when your animal has injured someone else
- Information should be shared.
- This might not be the first time a dog has bitten and each time should be recorded with the appropriate authority
- The owner should be taking responsibility for their dogs actions, and if medical is needed they should have to pay for it (in the case of another animal).
- Something or someone could be harmed and bi responsibility lies on the bad owners shoulders. They should have to deal with the consequences.
- Without this important first step, nothing else is likely to follow, i.e. an incident can only be acted on if the people and pets involved are able to be identified.
- I feel it would be necessary to have this information for instances where there may be a concern of rabies and for onsite evaluation of the dog and owners involvement.
- Yes, remaining at the scene would be the responsible thing to do. Unless they are in danger of course.
- I think with all our technology, and data collection at our finger-tips this is a absolute must, and a indication of the pet owners duty.....
- Your dog bit someone, stay there for the reporting.
- Also ensures proper health information is shared and tracked so the right info is provided to healthcare providers in order to prevent extra treatments for the human involved to to a lack of understanding of dogs history.
- If your dog bites another person or animal, you as the owner are responsible to ensure the safety of both your dog and the person or animal it bit. It's like driving a car and causing damage and fleeing the scene. To have a pet is to be responsible for them as you would a child.
- There are several owners who will simply leave when their dog causes damage. Owners need to be educated as to properly train and handle their dogs, especially if they have a bite history
- Too many people don't take responsibility when their dog bites. They should have to.
- This is kind of the same as a car accident. If a bite is severe enough to require medical attention beyond the average first-aid kit, then yes all involved parties should remain and speak to authorities. Again, this is breed-irrelevant.
- Information should be traded just as it would be for a car accident. However, dogs should not be taken away and held hostage unless the person has been attacked to a fatality.
- The owners need to be held accountable for the behavior of the dog. The animals are exactly that, beasts; dogs don't understand how their reaction to something may be perceived as "problematic" and respond the only ways they can. Humans need to be in control and responsible for their pets behavior and as such should have consequences for any negligence as pet owners.

- There are two sides and the owner needs to explain - what if it was in response to being attacked by another dog?
- Its called being a responsible pet owner.
- Just like a car accident.. you must accept responsibility
- The owner of the dog should be required to remain at the scene of the incident until the dog is put down (which should be done immediately).
- Any responsible dog owner should stay around and have the chance to explain the situation that has happened. Without fear their dog will be automatically taken from them .
- Like any incident, the parties should exchange information in case medical bills need to be dealt with or if it something the dog has done multiple times before. it needs to be dealt with accordingly. Justly but accordingly.
- Similar to leaving the scene of an accident
- Yes because if the animal is injured id want them to pay my vet bill
- people sometimes have poorly trained and disciplined dogs. They must be held accountable for their pets.
- If ANY dog bites someone the owner should have to stay and deal with it just as if they would if they hit someone's car. If vet bills are needed the owner of the accused dog should have to pay for damages their dog causes.
- It's the owners responsibility to ensure whatever damage done by their pet is looked after. If another being is injured by their dog, they should tend to that injury until further assistance can be given. In addition, they must own up to their dogs poor behaviour (provided the bite was not provoked) and reprimand it as they see fit.
- Just like at a scene of an accident, they should have to stay! IF they do not maybe a fine or something. I feel like those that would stay would care enough to get to the bottom of the incident.
- This is not only basic human decency but also basic owner responsibility: the dog can't deal with these kinds of matters!
- The dog is there responsibility therefore should be there to deal with the concerns regarding there dog & consequences of the dogs actions.
- The dog owner is the responsible party. Why would they possibly not be required to do so???
- Owners need to be held accountable for their pets and should have to pay for vet care if needed if their dog was the instigator and speaking as a vet tech myself we need rabies vaccine status of the offender to better help person or pet that's been bit
- of course the dog owner should be there, but sometimes the dog is running loose
- Owners should take responsibility for their dogs, but should also have an opportunity to state their side of the incident.
- If the victim or dog victims owner requests that the perpetrator stay to talk to the enforcement officer. If they don't then they can leave the scene.
- Responsible pet ownership.....duh

- The human is responsible for the animals behaviour. Any damage or injury should be heavily fined and possibly the dog should be removed to be rehabilitated.
- Yes but only if that person feels no imminent threat from the dipshit that got themselves bit.
- If an animal bit my leashed no or unleashed dog at a park, I would love to hold the owner accountable and a third NON BIASED party come and intervene and decide how to proceed fairly.
- Need contact info to confirm that dog is vaccinated against rabies.
- Bit and run = Hit and run, can't just flee the scene of an incident.
- But only if this can be done safely. In some situations, the best thing might be to remove the biting animal from the scene immediately. The owner should still attempt to leave identification behind.
- Answer questions and be accountable
- It is important to track these incidents.
- It is important to stay at the scene of an incident when you are directly involved
- Having children walk a dog is not responsible. Also the owner has the other side of the story. The person/dog bit is always going to say it's the others fault. Parents need to teach children to respect animals. You cannot hit or pull on animals....otherwise you may get bit.
- It's important to hear "both sides" of what lead up to the incident. It's also important to identify repeat offending pet owners.
- As long as the dog and dog bite victim are able to be in a safe place... Victim isn't going to want you "hang around" the dog who just hurt them.
- There needs to be accountability on the part of the owner. People should not be left with medical bills for themselves or their pet. Not having to remain at the scene is like a hit and run. This is regardless of dog size or breed.
- Please consider children under the age of 12 not being allowed to enter off leash parks. I have witnessed numerous times, young toddlers with their parents at the off leash parks and the toddler eating snacks! Cheese in the toddlers hands! This is absolutely setting dogs up for failure by the child being on the ground, eating a snack. Not fair to the dog or the child.
- Unless medical attention is required then they should be able to leave to do that and vets should notify by law like hospitals would notify officials if someone showed up with a gun shot wound
- I think the officer needs to hear both sides of the story and that person needs to understand the consequences immediately.
- Similar to an accident.
- Owners are responsible for the damages their pets cause. As such, an owner should not be allowed to "hit and run" a scene of a dog attack.
- How else would the victim or owner of the victim get the information about the responsible party for health and insurance purposes?
- They need to be accountable for their pets actions ; and or defend their pets actions...ie observed animal abuse towards said pet
- Absolutely! And question the owner to see if they properly trained/restrained their dog. Put more ownership on the dogs owner as opposed to the dog.
- Accountability....

- "It is always the owner's responsibility to ensure their dog is safe in public. If your dog bites someone you are responsible and should secure your dog away from the victim, help the victim as much as you can until the authorities arrive. If it's a fight between two dogs or an outright attack from one dog on another dog you need to separate the dogs, assess the damage to each animal, exchange info and take the injured dog to the vet ASAP. If neither of the dogs are seriously injured I'd say it's up to the parties
- involved what to do about the incident by either reporting it to the authorities or simply moving on with life."
- It helps get all sides of the story. There is one caveat though, where it might be necessary to leave to remove an aggressive animal or seek medical attention. So provision should be made to allow the needs of the animal to be looked after while also not hampering the investigation such as leaving contact information or phoning it in so that they can be reached at a later time.
- In the case that the person who was hurt I feel like the owner of the dog who aggressed should be liable to help pay for any health bills
- This is an incident and no different than a car accident. This is part of being a responsible pet owner but these are animals and sometimes it's not as easy as saying it was one dog's fault over another so if people are not penalized for staying that is the answer. People as we know don't always do the right thing.
- In my opinion this is considered an incident and requires both parties involved to claim their personal information for the purpose of follow up and or legal proceedings just like a Motor Vehicle Accident.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their pet
- This shouldn't have to be a rule, but it should be mandatory, and there should be penalties in place for failure to remain at the scene
- Why should the city fine the person? Why does the city benefit? The owner should be required to pay for all bills to the injured.
- Need to know names, address, contact info of offender and the dog who did the biting.
- If it's a vicious and severe bite
- This is similar to an assault on another person so they should be required to stay and explain their side of the events that took place.
- So proper information can be exchanged.
- This is just common sense.
- Separate so the dog does not continue to attack but isolate in the area to allow for proper information to be translated
- These pet owners need to be held responsible for their dog's behavior.
- Remaining at the scene as long as it is safe to do so is part of being a responsible pet owner you are responsible for your pet's actions.
- remove the dog from the scene but the owner should be there
- I'd say it would depend on the severity.
- Yes, I strongly support this because a lot of the time the pet owner needs to be educated on RESPONSIBLE pet ownership and how to avoid these potentially harmful or fatal encounters. I also feel a fine should be issued or at least ordered to attend some sort of information seminar regarding these issues.

- There needs to be reassurance regarding immunization records for both animals and humans
- these people shouldn't get away with walking away it is their responsibility to stay and be present in helping the situation
- If they don't stay, they might get away with it.
- As with anything that causes harm through negligence of another person, the individual who caused harm needs to be held accountable
- As a dog owner myself who owns a large, strong breed (German shepherd cross) I know that the responsibility should land to the owner and not the animal. I take my dog to one on one training sessions, and create very clear boundaries when introducing her to new people, animals, children, etc. If my dog were to bite a person or animal, it is absolutely my responsibility to remain at the scene. It's like any car accident (minor or major), and should be taken seriously.
- If there is a bad car accident you are required to stay on scene I don't see how this is different.
- A dog's behaviour is the owner's responsibility
- much like remaining on scene after an automobile collision
- Absolutely—it is no different than a car accident. Bite and run indicates an irresponsible owner and a vicious/nuisance animal.
- Stay at scene or at least exchange contact information in case person or dog requires medical attention
- If involved in a vehicular incident, you are required to remain at the scene. Why should a dog bite be any different.
- If a dog attacks anyone, the owner of said dog must be available.
- It's like if you hit someone with your car, you should stay and help
- Provides opportunity to explain situation
- Dogs that bite are not a breed issue, it is an owner issue. The owner needs to be accountable.
- This allows the victims to inform doctors of any potential infections that could have been passed from dog to person.
- An owner needs to take responsibility for his/her pet. They should remain at the scene like any crime. The enforcement officer will need to speak to both the owner of the dog and its victim to gather enough facts to make a decision on the next steps.
- If someone leaves the scene of a dog bite, they should be charged criminally.
- If there is damage done, information should be exchanged in case of insurance claims/vet bills etc
- It's important for both parties of an incident to give their perspective of what happened
- Just like any kind of other accident, the parties involved should remain at the scene to exchange information and give statements. It would make sense to apply this to this animal related incidents.
- I support this because the dog owner needs to take responsibility for their pet. There could be conditions when for the owner to stay on site is not feasible - ie extreme weather conditions, if the dog is in distress, if the enforcement officer's response time is a number of hours away.. Having said that the person or owner of the animal bitten needs to stay on site too. If a person needs medical attention then call an ambulance, i'm not sure who you call if the animal needs medical attention but all parties should be on site. OR, exchange information if it is a minor incident. I guess maybe treat these incidents along the same lines as a traffic accident.

- Just like with car incidents, dog owners should exchange information.
 - Dog owners should be responsible for the behavior of their pet.
 - No different than hit and run. Damage was done owner needs to answer to their/their dogs actions
 - If your dog harms someone then the owner needs to take responsibility and remain at the scene. Is this really a question?
 - Yes, I believe dogs are an extension of our families and should be treated as such. If a child were to punch a kid at a park, parents would be on stand by to comment on the incident and pet parents should be held to that responsibility as well.
 - Not unlike a traffic accident. Wait for the authorities. Otherwise, treat it like a hit and run where the owner faces the charge of leaving the scene.
 - I BELIEVE IF A DOG BITES SOMEONE OR ANOTHER ANIMAL THE OWNER SHE TAKE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE ACTIONS OF THEIR ANIMALS.
 - Don't make a big scene about it some people will get depressed without a god companion
 - It's morally correct
 - I think that if an animal is involved in something as serious as a bite that the owner should stay and take responsibility for their animals behaviour and speak with an enforcement officer face to face, so they can explain the situation.
 - "The pet is your responsibility, the consequences to their actions are theirs to deal with.
 - The exception being is if the dog cannot be de-escalated and needs to be removed from the situation, in which case the owner of said dog should identify themselves."
 - However, I can't how that would be enforceable, unless the victim were able to identify the owner.
 - Same logic as a car crash. There should be a fine for any owner that flees a scene where their dog caused an injury to another person or animal.
 - It is a safety incident and needs to be documented. Not sure how you would enforce this.
 - Have been bitten by a dog on a run - the owner ignored it and refused contact info. May make it easier if there is a 'rule' in place.
 - If a dog bites a person, I believe it is a small violent crime. I have had friends bitten through two layers of jackets needing many stitches, and the dog owner just walked away.
 - "Like a car accident the owner should wait to give all possible information to an enforcement officer. Officer should not be going into the situation ready to blame the offending dog before gathering all information and hearing the context in which the bite happened
- Also since there is no where else to put this, Breed Specific Legislation is ridiculous. Target the owners of nuisance dogs regardless of the breed."

- Same rules should apply as those in a hit and run. If owners leave with their dog after the dog has bitten someone, then consequences should be higher.
- It is the owners who are responsible for how they train their dog, and if they know their dog has aggressive behaviours or is shy of people to accommodate what their dog needs and not bring them anywhere that may cause an incident. It is never the dog's fault. Also asking a nuisance dog to be muzzled is [removed], and absolute crap.
- How is that not already a requirement?
- The owner should be held liable for cost of medical care
- Owners should always be responsible for their dog's behavior.
- It be the same as if you hit something with your vehicle. Your dog did damage and not staying on screen would basically be like a hit and run.
- Exchange info to be followed up later if necessary. Pretty hard to stay at scene if there is a injury as bilateral can't respond quick enough.
- There should be accountability. The owner needs to be examined to determine how their ownership, lack of training, what they need to improve on in order to prevent incidents. They should be set up with a dog trainer for assistance.
- I've been bitten by several dogs in the City of Calgary and by law does nothing other than give warnings out. Please note I have never been bit by a pitbull or a large breed dog I've only been bit by little dogs and even needed stitches from one. So what are the consequences going to be when a little dog bites you and you need medical attention. Does that little dog become a nuisance dog should it be put down should it be put through all the laws and regulations a pitbull or a doberman would. The people at the City of Calgary need to use their brains. There is no such thing as a bad dog only a bad owner. Do not punish a breed punish the stupid people that ruin those breeds. Laws should be there to protect the animals and punish the few that do not follow the rules.
- Dog owners must be held accountable for the actions of their dog, the best way to ensure this is to require them to stay at the scene and speak with an enforcement office directly.
- The owner is directly responsible for the actions of their dogs. The dog should be well controlled and socialized to try and avoid this type of behaviour, but when unforeseen issues occur, the onus of responsibility is with the people to be accountable. BUT, one dog bite should not spell a death sentence for a dog.
- This would be the responsible thing to do albeit I have seen people inappropriately blame a dog for an "attack" when they felt scared even when nothing happened. I have seen many little dogs nip and bite big dogs with the larger dog getting the blame for attacking.
- It should be treated like any other public offense requiring the offender (or owner of the offending animal) to be responsible for their actions.
- Any accident should be handled this way.
- But only if they owner refuses to share his contacts.
- I work for the City and in a role where constituents submit their concerns, and all too often I hear about dog attacks (on other small dogs or people) due to uncontrolled dogs either along a residential street or in a park, and it can be completely avoidable with more safeguards in place. Quite often it is a pit bull breed of dog. Owners might think their dog is well behaved, but those dogs still possess pit bull instincts. I have owned dogs all my life and have no fear of dogs, but have never really met a pit bull type breed dog that I have enjoyed or trusted.

- I believe contact information should be collected but only for the purpose of investigating the incident.
- This allows for accountability and ensured that both sides of the story are conveyed. It may allow for minimal assumptions to be made on the incident.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions. Bad owners are the issue, not the dogs
- But it may be hard to force that.
- I believe they should get their dog out of the environment ASAP, but should return to the scene to provide information.
- Contact information should be exchanged just like in the case of a car accident
- If a dog bites someone or another animal the information of the dog and owner should be collected to monitor if this is a regular occurrence and further intervention is necessary (it is irresponsible dog owners that cause these issues, not specific dog breeds). This should be true of all dogs regardless of size or breed (I have had my German Shepherd attacked by small dogs frequently and I do not think that they should be exempt just because of their size. I have also been bit my many small dogs to the point blood as been drawn, but because they are small it seems to be acceptable).
- Yes to give information to help cover the victim of the incidents vet or hospital bills
- People need to be 100% responsible for the actions of their pets
- Yes, if it can be done safely - ie if the dog must be removed from the situation and only the owner can handle it, then the owner should give their information at least to people around, so that they can be contacted once the animal is returned to home or car. Or they should be okay with someone (witness or enforcement officer) following r staying with them until they put the dog away and are able to provide Full contact details.
- The owners of the offending dog need to take responsibility. It should be a crime for them to leave the scene of the incident. But many times the owners do not assist the victim and also flee the scene without their dog.
- Would it be okay to crash into someone else's vehicle then drive away? Of course not. If an incident occurs the owner must be compelled to stay at the scene of the incident to provide contact information and statement, regardless of whether any punishment will be levied against the dog owner.
- N/A
- A dogs behaviour is the owners responsibility.
- Other than for injuries that requires medical attention, then yes the owners should remain present. No different than an automobile accident.
- The dog and owner has to be identified to create a register and trending porpoises
- Important to have contact information should further health issues arise or if an insurance claim is processed, much like a vehicle accident protocol.
- Obviously should stay by

- Owners should be held responsible for their pets. Not a breed legislation.
- Sharing information with the other party yes - waiting for enforcement NO.
- The situation should be assessed by both parties involved, police officers, and bystanders.
- As a dog owner I am responsible for said animal, no matter the breed. We require the same for a vehicle accident, why should dog ownership be any different.
- It seems similar to requirements for a car accident so it seems reasonable.
- They should stay and tell their side of the story.
- I think there needs to be clear guidelines on this. Puppies bite and their bites are often harmless but may draw blood. This would be stressful to deal with for the owner of a puppy. No matter the breed. Also the severity of a bite. And the person's behaviour that induced the bite. People try to pet my dog. And she is afraid of people. She never bites anyone. But some people still try to let her regardless. She gets agitated. They are bothering her. In this instance it is their fault.
- "Owners need to be held accountable. Holding specific dog breeds responsible for behaviours taught/incorrectly managed by their owners is discrimination towards that dog breed. All dog breeds have these issues, but it's up to the owners to responsibly handle them.
- Punish the owners not the dog breed"
- It is very important for all animal owners to be accountable and responsible for their pets.
- Support this rule of requiring an owner to stay if an incident occurs. However, authorities must be prepared to respond in a timely manner.
- As someone whose dog was attacked and the owner left scene I was left with a huge vet bill with no sense of responsibility from the other pet owner
- Our dog has been the victim of a nuisance dog and support requiring dog owners to remain at the scene of an incident to ensure all information and testimony are retrieved.
- I believe there should be a requirement for people to have to share their contact info with the victims/enforcement. However they could share it with a witness and leave with their dog so that there isn't the chance of further distress/injury to the dog or victims.
- If necessary yes, but if both owners of the situation can exchange info not meeting an enforcement officer. Then no, I would say it is not required and there for anyone to stay "at the scene".
- Dog owners should be responsible for their pets. If their dog hurts or bites anyone, they need to be held accountable and thus should give their contact information in case it is needed.
- Owners must address issue of aggression and take responsibility for their (the owners) lack of due care and training.
- There are many circumstances that lead to a bite, some of which are not the cause from the biting dog.
- Yes, if the incident is severe they just stay on scene and if necessary press charges.
- they need to be allowed to put their animal away or in a safe place and then return to the scene to exchange information
- If your dog bites someone it's your responsibility.

- Too often owners flee the scene and this attack is not recorded. Victims may be in shock, confused, or embarrassed and are not in a position of power to ask that the other owner stay. A bylaw would be helpful as this is all the victims would have to say “it is the law that you wait here”
- All too often the dog and owner leave the scene and cannot be located.
- most dogs that bite are small breeds and are not taken seriously. Pit bulls and bully breeds are least likely to bite
- The owner of the dog is responsible for the actions of the dog and should be held accountable regardless of breed.
- If a dog bites, their owner should take full responsibility and provide any information necessary to enforcement officers. Most people will flee the scene rather than be held responsible for their dog biting someone.
- Take responsibility, can't leave the scene of an accident
- The owner is responsible for whatever their dog does; so the owner either needs to stay at the scene and restrain their animal Or give proper information on how to get a hold of them if it is not safe for the offending animal to remain at the scene.
- If the owner flies the scene with the dog, the owner should face similar punishment to perhaps, a hit and run or depending on the severity of the bite, manslaughter.
- I think it's necessary.
- I believe this to be similar to a car accident in which the offending party should provide all pertinent information required to rectify the situation.
- If a person is injured, the pet owner has a responsibility to answer for it's acts.
- this is essential otherwise owners will simply take off to avoid the tribunal process.
- Leaving the scene with your dog after an incident is essentially a 'hit and run' should be treated as such
- Irregardless of breed it is the owners responsibility to remain at the scene.
- If the attack is serious enough for enforcement to be involved, then yes. If no injury comes from the bite or only a minor injury is sustained, I do not think enforcement is needed or for the owner to remain on scene.
- Dog bites are assaults against others and should be treated as such.
- I believe that if your dog bites, it has caused damage that may require medical attention. The owner should be responsible for vet bills. Also, I have been bitten by a little terrier dog and when it got infected, the hospital needed to know if the dog had all of its shots. If I didn't have the owners contact information, we couldn't have gotten this information.
- Only during incidents where actual damage has been caused. Many people interpret playing or wrestling as “biting” which is very wrong.
- Dog owners who's dogs bite need to stay to be held accountable for their dogs actions.
- Perhaps they should be permitted to bring the dog to a safe place first?
- Any owner who's dog harms a person or another animal must accept responsibility for their dog's actions.

- I feel this is equivalent to leaving the scene of an accident, and a person should be charged/fined accordingly.
- Owners involved incidents must 100% stay at the scene. Coward if you do not and should be held accountable
- It is the responsibility of the pet owner to take responsibility for the pet's actions. No different than a child.
- The Dog is the owners responsibility regardless of what happens so they must stay and be accountable.
- It's no different than any traffic incident requiring all involved parties to remain present when law enforcement has been called to deal with injuries or property damage.
- The dog is their responsibility and just like in a car accident, they should remain at the scene to provide all of their required information.
- have personally been involved with situations where the owner of the offending animal has left the scene without any consideration for the injured animal or human
- Pit pulls should not be treated any different then any other dogs. Owners should be allowed more than one pit pull. Pit pull should not have to wear a muzzle that cruel and wrong. Any dog can be dangerous if the owner has raised their dog wrong. It has nothing to do with the breed of dog. I'm ashamed of the city for even considering this.
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- they absolutley should be held like in a car accident
- Last week I faced a dog owner whose dog not only was not on leash but also it didn't even have a collar and it jumped right at me. It took the owner several seconds to move his butt and get the dog while I was screaming my lungs out. There must be serious consequences for such irresponsible and self-righteous owners
- To identify nuisance animals
- No explanation needed. This is very straightforward.
- I feel that you should remain at the scene it appropriate and safe to do so. If that is not possible then you must at a minimum give your contact information to the other party involved. It should really be treated like an auto accident. Both parties exchange information and report it to the appropriate authorities to fill out a report. If that can be done at the scene or after the fact.
- Because the owner is the voice of the dog. To ensure the well being of the dog is being taken into account. To ensure no discrimination is being placed on the dog because of breed. This is be the case for ANY dog bite. Both big or little, both bully breed or family loved Labrador. To allow to see if biting is a habit of the animal or a case of mistreatment to the animal, in which case, if self defence is acceptable for a human than allow for self defence of a dog.
- It's important to get all sides of the story.
- If the dog bites it is responsible for the owner to share the history of shots and assist with any medical help needed. However if the pup is distressed the owner needs to get the pup out of there. Leaving a phone number of giving the person a picture of the owner would be suffice.

- Yes, info needs to be shared so the case can be investigated whether it's a chihuahua or a collie, or great Dane. Sometimes there's a reason but it needs to be investigated in a way fair to both the pet and owner as well as the person bit. Pets are allowed to say no. If an owner is following all by laws walking their dog on a leash and an off leash dog approaches and gets bit, that's the fault of the off leash owner and dog, not the onleash.
- The owner must be held accountable for the animal's actions
- Should apply to both parties: the dog owner and the individual hurt. It's best to obtain the story both sides of the individuals when the incident occurs.
- "Take responsibility for your dog."

- children need to be taught to respect dogs, and be taught how to properly approach an animal! More important than removing ""dangerous"" dogs from society...*
- Owners do need to take responsibility for their pet if aggression is an issue. It's not the pet's fault it's poor training and awareness of their pet.
- Similar to staying at the scene of a car accident. The owner is the responsible party. If the owner and the victim exchange information, I do believe it would be ok to leave the scene similar to minor car accidents.
- As long as this applies to everyone/all dogs not just larger ones that likely cause more damage. I've seen little dogs bite people, bite other dogs that cause fights, and no punishment for them. It's ridiculous that the instigator is not held accountable.
- Having a dog with issues such as bite tendencies means you as the owner understand that a bite could be possible; it is therefore the owner's responsibility to stay and ensure the victim is properly taken care of in order as a result, since they assumed this risk when they brought their dog to a public space.
- It's too easy for the animal's owner to waive responsibility and walk away - it becomes the victim's job to report, identify and proceed.
- Limited contact and personal information unless shared with officer to avoid potential issues with harassment.
- Too many people do not take responsibility for their dog's actions especially at off leash parks
- the owner should be charged
- I've seen a few Facebook posts of owners not staying with a bite victim and it's the same as a hit and run in my opinion
- I support this for situations where a dog bites a person, so the owner can be contacted by public health as needed for the medical care of the bitten person. When a dog is bitten, I think information only needs to be shared if there are visible injuries, or at the request of the bitten dog's owner.
- If applicable or reasonable. If the dog staying will cause more danger than there should be another option
- Unless there is medical attention needed exchange information before you leave to seek help.

- This is no different than a traffic hit and run, if a bit occurs the person and animal must remain for the situation to be assessed for possible charges / tickets / animal control
- This can be a scary for all involved and their beloved family member has harmed another. Understanding that immediate euthanasia is not the first course of action would encourage owners to remain.
- Too many times they leave, so that they don't have to answer.
- If a dog bites a person or other animal, the owner of that dog should be responsible for any vet bills incurred
- Would be good to hear both sides of the story. If the "victim" was teasing the dog.
- Accountability of the owner
- "Yes, for there is always 2 sides of the story.
- I witnessed an incident where another dog attacked a pitty at an off leash park, pitty was on a leash. Other dogs owner blamed the pitty instead of his own dog
- Pit bull breeds are not bad dogs!! It's the other dogs that attack!!!!"
- It is something any responsible dog owner would already do. The problem is irresponsible owners.
- I literally don't understand why a responsible dog owner wouldn't remain at the scene.
- If the attack was severe and/needs medical attention, the owner should be held accountable. If there are expensive vet bills as a result, the party at fault should be paying them. There may be need for mediation to determine who is at fault, and if they leave without sharing their contact, how can it be determined?
- Anything that involves injury of another person is serious. The offender must stay on scene.
- They need to be held accountable.
- I think all incidents should be investigated and ALL owners should be held accountable for their animals actions (small dogs can bite too). However, I think that in bite instances, the owner should be provided with mandatory training support and education/resources, either through the Calgary Humane Society or other Calgary-based animal rescue organization. ALL bite instances can be prevented through responsible ownership and education.
- My dong has been attacked by a aggressive dog at the park and the owner gave fake personal information and fake dog number.
- It's important if there will be a case made against the animal, that the owner is there to be assessed at the time of the incident. You require both sides of the story to paint the picture.
- I feel that if my dog bit a person I would be a responsible pet owner and stay to give and receive information.
- For liability and to get both sides of the story correctly. To many times breeds are blamed because of the type of dog, even though they do not cause the altercations you start with. This is an archaic new bylaw being proposed to attack breed specific dogs. Poorly done Calgary.
- To allow immediate explanation of a dog unfairly provoked by a person or another dog, and provide faster accountability in the case of an incicent so resources do not need to be spent finding the dog/owner.

- The owner should take responsible for their dog. Essentially the actions of the dog are a direct relationship to the owner. Take ownership for what you technically raised.
- Too many bad dog owners try to tune and hide from what happened instead of owning up to your dog bit someone and deal with it.
- It's the responsibility of the owner to stay
- They need to take responsibility for the actions of their pet.
- An owner should remain at the scene so the circumstances of the incident can be recorded. However the dog or owner should not be punished for the incident.
- Owners should be held responsible for their pets actions, this includes paying medical/vet bills if necessary.
- Even if both parties cannot remain at the scene, at the very least, the owner of the dogs should provide contact information in case there are further complications or medical/vet bills arising from a dog bite.
- Either stay at the scene, or provide contact information - perhaps the victim would be traumatized or the animal still not under control. In that case, the dog owner must provide legitimate contact information for follow up.
- I believe that any incident that occurs should be dealt with like a traffic accident. If a pet causes damage or harm, the owner should be responsible and compensate for any required repair or medical issues. It is too easy for the pet owners to leave the situation and assume no responsibility.
- Dog owners are responsible for their pets. Why would he/she not be responsible to remain at the scene?
- Yes for the obvious reason that the owner / controller of the animal should be responsible for its actions.
- If a dog bites another person or animal, the owner has to take responsibility for it.
- We need a way to trace the owner. Contact info is very important.
- Especially with small [removed] dogs that get away with this all the time.
- I think it should be treated like a vehicle accident and the responsible party should be required to be held accountable for their actions
- Dogs are only vicious if their owners train them to be. Also some adopted dogs have come from very bad situations. It's not always the dogs fault and if it did bite the owner needs to be responsible and stay at the scene
- If someone's dog hurts another person or animal (when NOT instigated IE: a human kicks someone's dog and the dog responds aggressively) it is should be a common courtesy to see to it that they do what they can to make amends.
- I think its very important for an owner to be held responsible if their dog bites or attacks another dog or person. But to put an innocent animal in the same categorie as a vicious animal just because of its breed is very wrong and inhumane
- Responsibility and can clarify any misunderstandings
- I believe that the owner (not the dog) should be held accountable for the incident.
- Owners should take full responsibility for the actions of their dogs.

- If someone's dog had harmed someone or their pet. They should remain on the scene as long as necessary to ensure everyone is fine and if action needs to be taken they should be around. It should not be allowed to "bit and run". However if the party injured doesn't feel it's necessary for officers or medical personal to be involved then everyone can go home
- I work in law enforcement and it helps us to determine what went on and complete any necessary investigations. It also helps to show the owner is trying and cares.
- Our pets are the same as any other family member! If my son kicked the [removed] out of some other kid of course id wait til the officers showed up to explain the situation so should the owners of dogs involved in a bite attack, and if said owner does not stay on the scene it should follow the same as a hit and run
- If a dog bites another person or animal and breaks skin which causes injuries that will require another person or pet to seek medical attention, the owner of the dog who caused the injury should remain present at the scene to provide information to the enforcement officer so the case can be followed up on as there is typically 2 sides to a story. Thus in order to obtain accurate information to an incident, information of those involved should be made available. In addition, an injury is a serious case and the owners should follow up and determine the events that led up to the bite to learn how to prevent it in the future using the help of bylaw officers.
- The owner needs to be held accountable for their dogs actions
- If there is injury to the animal or person involved, the owner should stay. It is responsible. It is against the law to flee the scene of a motor vehicle incident and it should be the same for animals
- Aggressive dogs have NOTHING to do with the breed and EVERYTHING to do with the owners. Owners MUST be held accountable. There should be training for owners when their dog attacks. In some cases to dog feels threatened too, that has NOTHING to do with the breed.
- Dog owners are responsible for their pets and need to held accountable for their behavior. Of course they should wait at the scene and share their contact information if their dog bites someone!
- I think every owner should take responsibility for their dog, and especially if it bit someone.
- yes
- It should be law! You are responsible for the animal, you should be responsible for consequences
- They need to be responsible for their dog.
- Otherwise, how would you find where the dog lives?
- I believe both owners and parties involved need to be present if speaking to a enforcement officer is necessary. Important to gather both testimonials as well as report on the animals behavior, condition, environment, etc. All facts and perspectives need to be taken.
- If people are required to report traffic collisions, severe bites should also be reported.
- If the owner has to remain at the scene of the incident, they must take ownership of the dog and its actions. It is hard to find the dog or owner once they have left. Fines should be imposed if they leave the scene.
- It's like a vehicle accident scene, you are required to remain at the scene! However, there needs to be quick response time from enforcement officers for this to be practical.
- A pet owner needs to be responsible for their pets actions no matter the situation.

- Currently it is too easy for the owner to just walk away
- Less time between the incident and getting a statement, keeps the recount accurate
- if your dog messes up, it is YOUR JOB to take accountability
- It's always the owners responsibility, you couldn't walk away from a car accident that was your fault
- Dogs are considered property under the law and therefore their actions reflect upon the dog owner. Dog owners are 100% responsible for the behaviour of their dogs and need to be held accountable.
- The animal is the owner's responsibility period. OWNERS need to face more consequences. I'm tired of seeing stories of dogs being put down because they had the misfortune of being owned by irresponsible people.
- It is the responsibility of the pet owner to control their animal. Therefore, if there is an issue such as a dog bite, they should be required to be interviewed by an enforcement officer in order to properly address the situation.
- like any other incident such as a car accident
- Thus is the right thing to do but usually irresponsible owners will leave the scene to avoid further action
- My daughter and our dogs and I were attacked by 2 mastiffs, nothing really happened. Owner had his hand slapped, both dogs still viscous, worried one day they get out of the house and attack a child
- There must be accountability for dog bites, also to trace behaviour problems and possible disease.
- Your liable for your own dog, and should be held liable. The city should not be grouping dogs together but handling each case separately. Also, a rule should be enforced that kids are not allowed to run and scream in dog parks.
- Your dog your responsibility.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs.
- The owners of dogs who are more likely to bite are also less likely to remain. The behavior of bad pet owners should be punished.
- Many pit bull owners flee the scene of an attack or bite often leaving victims without justice or financial compensation.
- I do not support the enforcement officer apprehending the dog at the scene
- Common sense. If you're responsible for something; own it.
- These incidents should be handled on an individual basis. You should not be punishing an entire breed. Pit bulls are beautiful and gentle dogs. The ones that have issues are due to owners inexperience and mistreatment of the animal. The individual owners need to be held responsible not the dog!!!!
- responsible ownership
- If a dog is to bite another dog or person the owner should remain to explain the situation. There could be more to the situation that needs to be explained.
- Its the right thing to do...

- Too many times, the owners quickly take off with the offending dog. In cases where this occurs, the owner should also be levied a fine similar to that for not remaining at the scene of a motor vehicle accident
- There are 2 sides to every story, like what precipitated the attack. When a dog acts out of protection for its owner, this needs to be recognized.
- People should be responsible for their own animals and thus should be willing to give certain details if anything occurs.
- Nothing further
- This is simply logical.
- Just like a car accident, if damage has occurred to people, property or other animals the human (owner) should be held responsible
- If you hit someone with your car you would be required to remain. Your car is licensed to you. So is your pet. You are responsible.
- Responsibility of the owner should be encouraged.
- The Owner of the biting dog needs to be informed and take responsibility for the animal in their care. Biting incidents can be complex, and the more witnesses involved, the more clarity can be provided to authorities.
- "The same way you are expected to stay at the scene of a car accident. Also very important that witness' remain on the scene. Simply saying a dog that bites is at fault isn't always true. Was it instigated? by an other dog? by a human? or did it act out with vicious intent?
- The same principles of a car crash."
- If they leave how are you going to know who the culprit is
- Responsible owners don't need to be told to do this, they already do. Just like responsible drivers don't need to be told they can do a hit and run. So adding consequences to a bite and run is a great idea that targets irresponsible ownership.
- It is time owners are held responsible for their dogs behavior. And consequences should be severe.
- "Yes, When the skin is broken.
- If a dog or a pet bites, a person, and blood is drawn. The pet owner should remain on the scene. Clarify with enforcement personal and the victim the pet(s) Vaccination status (with all/any vet references, pertaining to the current status of the pets rabies vaccination, etc). Help address any concerns of infections and or disabilities (ie, nerve damage, etc) from the bite.
- [personal information removed]"
- I work at a vet clinic and the amount of people that walk away from a dog attack is ridiculous. They should have to give the peace officer their info and pay for the injured dogs vet charges.
- How do you identify the dog and owner later.
- Accountability is the only method available to decrease repeat offenses.
- An owner should stay to give their side of the story about why the dog may have bitten the person. It is a respect thing and we need to understand, dogs are part of someones family but also an animal.
- I agree.
- Answer questions for health, if skin is broken

- I agree, I think they need to share their contact information and such. BUT they deserve a right to explain the situation. Maybe the person who got bite provoked the dog, maybe the owner is the issue and the dog feeds off from that. Most dogs don't go out of their way to hurt someone unless provoked. I've got attacked by more tiny dogs than pit bulls and stuck. Most PITBULLS and other large dogs are actually not harmful. My friends owns one and he's actually the sweetest dogs I've ever met. I've never nor will I ever feel scared or threatened by him.
- A responsible owner should provide contact details as a way for enforcement to review the situation
- It would probably be hard to enforce but in a perfect world, this would make sense. It won't happen though because as soon as the injured animal/person is taken to get medical attention, the owner would take the opportunity to leave.
- It is the owner's responsibility to ensure the person or animal harmed is okay and to accept consequences.
- Of course if you dog bites or hurts someone else it is your do deligents to stay at the scene same as an accident it's your dog take responsibility.
- So pit bull owners can be held accountable
- Too often problem owners flee and then resurface in another incident. They should be required to remain on scene to identify when real problems exist
- Dog owners need to take the full responsibility of they're own pet & breeds actions. Nothing is different from a vicious pitbull & vicious chihuahua. Aside from personal judgement & influencing.
- I have heard so many stories of dog owners that provide false info and leave the scene.
- written testimony is important. Contact information makes enforcement easier. This should also apply to cats as they should not be outside without a leash due to killing wildlife on a large scale.
- The issue is how to enforce a person to stay at scene
- If a dog bites someone, they need to remain on the scene just like a car accident. Depending on the situation, the dog should be seized and the owner dinner right on the spot. That way officers don't need to spend time tracking down the dog and owner. If they do flee, it should be treated the same as a hit and run. Larger fines and possible jail time. People need to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- Owners need to take responsibility. They have a large role in the animals behaviour through training.
- When someone is bitten by a dog, it should be treated as a crime to leave the scene
- Owner needs to be held accountable.
- Full info needs 2 b given so the victom knows were they stand.
- Responsible & to supply any additional information required
- Just like any incident where bodily harm occurs, both parties should speak with the officers and provide contact information.
- Common courtesy
- There are too many incidents when a dog bites a person or other animal and the owner of the offending dog leaves the scene.
- What is the argument for a dog owner to LEAVE the incident site?

- Yes, but both sides of the story should be considered. Not all bites are the fault of the dog. A bite history should not be given for a bite that was caused by human's ignorance.
- Dog owner, yes. Dog itself, no. Dog remaining at scene could cause much more anxiety and tension to the incident and could reflect negatively on both owner and dog at large with increased tension being added to the situation.
- There should be severe fines for an owner that leaves the scene of a dog bite.
- If your dog, no matter the breed attacks a human or another animal; be responsible and exchange information with proper authorities. This will likely look more positive for whatever comes from the incident.
- If another person or animal is injured by someone's else negligence someone needs to be held accountable for vet bills and injuries.
- A person who is responsible for the dog that has bit a person or another animal MUST stay at the scene to exchange information like a car accident
- The dog is under the care and control of the owner or handler - if there is an issue or incident, there should be no question about who is responsible. Not unlike a car accident.
- Bylaw officers must be able to determine next steps. injuries might require responsible conduct from the aggressor dog.
- The owner should remain at the scene to prove that they are the actual owner and that they are not intoxicated or unfit to have the dog in a public space, or some other aggravating factor.
- There should be severe penalties including possible jail time to owners that leave the scene when their dog is involved in a dog bite.
- There needs to be more done to enforce responsible pet ownership.
- I completely support this as long as it applies equally to all dog breeds. I don't think it is okay to require pit bull owners to stay at the scene, but if a Maltese or a Chihuahua bites, the owner can leave because the bite "isn't serious" in terms of physical injury. The intent of a bite is the same regardless of the dog breed. That being said, this rule is a GREAT idea, as long as it equally applies to ALL dog breeds.
- They should give contact information but should be allowed to leave with the animal to avoid any further altercations if needed.
- If breed specific rules are going to be in place, the chihuahuas need to be included as I have been bitten many more times from them than a "pit bull". [removed].
- How else would any remedial process work?
- like any other attack, any witnesses should be present to discuss the scene with law enforcement
- a responsible owner would not walk away.
- General responsibility
- This would help ensure the owner takes responsibility
- Because the owner is the one to blame so they should be held accountable. Plus, if their dog was provoked, they should stay to defend it.

- "A dog bite is an accident and should be treated as such!! Like a car accident you would stay at the scene, but as with a car accident you don't have to worry that the police are going to take your car, unless you have driving restrictions or no insurance.
- But if your dog bites someone the main concern is bylaw will take your dog without investigating both sides."
- I had a dog shepherd type dog bite my poodle. I didn't get the owner's information. It cost 10,000 in vet bills. The owner new where I lived and never checked in on my dog. Never saw her again
- Same as a traffic incident, as long as the dog has calmed down and does not require being taken home.
- Dealing with the consequences of your animal's actions is part of pet ownership. Too many owners are oblivious of their own part in their animal's behaviour.
- This seems like an obvious requirement.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs in every aspect, whatever breed you own.
- If there are costs associated with the bite (such as vet fees), the owner of the dog that bit the animal/human should have to provide contact information and is responsible for those additional costs.
- It is like a "hit and run" with a vehicle. If the dog owner leaves, there should be additional consequences
- "Same as not fleeing the scene of a car accident.
- Either way, we should not tolerate dangerous dogs in our community."
- Accountability should lie with the owner not the dog.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their pet, and they should be there to receive consequences. If they leave it is like a hit and run.
- An accident is an accident. Everyone should stay until it's dealt with.
- If they leave they should be charged
- You dog bit someone and it should be any dog. Again we should be questioning the owner more and not punishing the dog.
- Remaining at the scene is the responsible thing to do.
- I find it ridiculous that people don't need to remain at the scene. The owners need to be talked to
- the owner is accountable for their pet's action / reaction, if an owner is held accountable maybe an enforcement officer can decide if it's the human's fault as to why the dog reacted the way it did
- Dogs are not the problem,
- It should be treated the same as a person attacking someone else. If someone's child bit or attacked my pet, child or self I would want them to be charged and take responsibility. With pets, there is added vet costs for the victim that the attacker should be responsible for.
- People are responsible for their dogs. They must take responsibility for any incidents.

- Dog owners have to be responsible fully for the dogs behaviors. A dog incident should be treated as the same as car accident.
- Owner must be accountable
- To help a victim obtain vet bill costs from owners, and so potentially violent dogs can be identified by the city
- Owners need to be responsible for their dogs. Need consequences if they leave.
- So ownership for the incident is taken
- You need both sides of the story, why did the dog bit, the other one?
- Owner should always be with their dog
- If a dog of any breed has bitten a person, a responsible owner should exchange information so that the dog could receive proper training, hopefully preventing another bite in the future.
- "If not it's like leaving a hit and run
- Owners are responsible for their dogs actions period"
- no explanation necessary for a ye/no question.
- I think the owner should be accountable for its dog. It's nature verse nurture with Animals much like it is with humans. A dog is generally not bad because of its breed. It's bad because of the behaviour it's own deems acceptable. Hold dog owners accountable by making it illegal for them to have one if they have had issues with their dog attacking an individual.
- No different than a traffic accident.
- But how do you enforce? All transaction need to be video tapped by the enforcer too. I can see power tripping here! Joke
- The owner has to take responsibility for their dog's actions.
- We should all be raised to be accountable for our actions and the actions of the ones we are responsible for! PERIOD. This should not be a question.
- Of course, it's assault.
- In clear cases of bites.
- It would facilitate the exchange of information.
- More information the better
- Taking responsibility for your pet is a must. If your child vit another child you would inform the parents, and come to an agreement. Same thing needs to happen with your dog. TAKE OWNERSHIP
- Seems logical
- Your dog bit therefore take responsibility.
- Responsible dog ownership
- Ban the dogs.
- Improve accountability for pet owners
- How else are they going to understand the consequences of their actions/inactions.
- I actually thought this was always the expectation.

- My daughter was bit by a dog in our green space. The owner left the scene as the dog had previously bit a neighbors kid. We had to track down the owner. The dog was dangerous.
- This should be treated in the same way as an auto accident. Proper licensing should be shared between owners and a fine applied if one is not apparent in addition to any ramifications stemming from the incident
- the owner should stay present at the scene of an incident such as for any incident to speak with officers
- Too many reports include details of owners leaving the scene. They should stay and give details to enforcement.
- The owner is responsible for the dogs behaviour and should be held accountable
- Toom any dog attacks are unable to find owners. We also need a map showing problem dogs to protect our children.
- Same as a car accident, you exchange info
- Personal responsibility in owning a pet means you take responsibility when it hurts another person or animal
- People need to be accountable and act responsibly to own an animal
- it is like an assault charge
- Responsible to give information and make sure shots are up to date
- Any responsible owner should be prepared to deal with the actions of their animal. This is their opportunity to ensure the enforcement officer gets "both sides of the story".
- To make sure all insurance or medical needs are going to be covered.
- Responsible need to be accountable
- So they can face the consequences
- Take responsibility
- The owner should be there to explain there side of the situation and be given the chance to both give more information but also defend themselves and there dog.
- I often see Dog owners who do not have control over the larger, potentially aggressive dogs. The dog owner must remain at the scene to take full responsibility.
- It is called accountability!
- There is no way that the owner should not be responsible for the actions of their dog
- "Too many individuals with nuisance dogs tend to flee the scene in hopes of not being reprimanded for their dog's behaviour; not sharing their own personal information or staying at the scene. Whether in fear of a fine, or the relinquish of their dog. Having an enforcement officer on the scene would also help the situation between owners.
- Possible Con: the wait time for an enforcement officer to arrive.
- Possible Con: ensuring that the owner of the nuisance dog remains at the scene and that the situation between owners doesn't become more volatile"
- If it is a serious bite or attack, yes the owner should stay at the scene. If it is a minor, provoked bite and both parties agree, then no.

- One of my friends was attacked by a dog and it was 100% the owners fault and she fled the scene, it was a hit and run and it caused so much more trauma and pain with not knowing who was responsible.
- Rabies needs to be proven and the person who is bitten should have the right to seek compensation for them or their animal.
- This should definitely be necessary.
- If any dog (breed should not be an issue it is the dog owner and highlighting certain breeds is ridiculous) bites someone that person is responsible for any costs and should remain onsite. There absolutely should be nothing targeting pit bulls or dogs like pitbulls. A friendly animal shouldn't have to be muzzled or restricted just based on breed. Bylaws should focus on making responsible owners with higher fines and restrictions on owning animals for people who's dogs attack any dog or human.
- If I ran into your car and hurt you doesn't fleeing the scene a procecuted offense
- Severe cases only hospitalization needed.
- There should be a fine if they don't. It is important for the person who is bitten to know information such as rabies shots, etc.
- The pet owner needs to be accountable for their actions and if they decide to leave the scene they should be charged with the fullest extent of the law. They should also be held liable for any bills for injury incurred to the victim's self or pets if applicable.
- I support the b idea; this is a minimum
- If your dog bites someone or another animal you need to be responsible for the consequences for example: vet bills for the other animal attacked
- Them leaving the scene in my view is a hit and run. It can prevent people from finding out if the dog has had its shots.
- I think if there is a bite or attack of any sort an officer should be involved
- The dog owners are ultimately responsible for the behaviour of their animals.
- The owner needs to accept liability for the dog's actions.
- the owner is responsible for the actions of their pet they must face the consiquences and provide what asistance and information they can
- of course!
- It is the responsible thing to do. Give your version of how things happened and officer can educate on next steps, etc.
- I have seen several cased where the dog owner quickly leaved the scene after an incident.
- Dogs shouldn't be allowed to attack and get away with it regardless of the breed
- But it shouldnt be automatic tribunal. They want to protect their animal's rights and if waiting tends to mean euthanasia and the animal in the shelter then no. Also owners should be investigated. If they treat their animal well and it bites the animal should remind at their home not a shelter. If they treat ot questionably or poorly then that animal should go to the shelter. Animal rights should also be considered

- If someone is so shady to not wait and give information and evidence then they shouldn't have a dog.
 - As pet owners we should be responsible for making sure that the victim is taken care of. If your dog bites someone or another animal it wastes valuable resources for officers to track someone down.
 - Responsible owners do this. I don't know how realistic this is.
 - The problem is, most owners would NOT stay with the victim to provide contact information or support. This is the way that dog owners are.
 - Owners should be held responsible
 - It should be like any other accident, like a car accident etc
 - Owners need to be held accountable for their pets.
 - "common sense
- NOT ALL PITBULLS ARE BAD! I HAVE SEEN SMALL DOGS THAT ARE FAR MORE DANGEROUS!!"
 - This is no different than a automobile accident. Where harm may have been inflicted due to the negligence of the owner. It is the owners responsibility to ensure their dog is appropriately trained and mannered. It should be the owners responsibility to pay any damages or related costs to the injury that resulted from their neglect (And not a result of the breed).
 - Owners tend to grab their gogs and run, flee scene of the incident. Those that leave and get caught need to be fined. Same aspect as leaving the scene of an accident.
 - This is a responsibility of the owner to take responsibility and represent their pet fairly in this situation
 - This will help make the bylaw more enforceable.
 - I'm not sure how else you would ever contact the owner if they are not required to leave info or contact with a peace officer. Seems like a huge loop-hole.
 - often the phone numbers that are provided by offending pet owners to those involved in incidents are fake and the offending owner can't be traced
 - Anyone with an animal that bites , especially pitbulls have to be held fully responsible for the animal and any damage the animal causes!!
 - People need to be responsible for the actions of their pets. You can't leave the scene of an incident, you shouldn't be allowed to walk away if your dog bites someone.
 - if they flea and run, they knew their dog was that way because they trained it.to.be. a responsible pet owner would stay at the scene
 - The owner needs to stay (as long as it is safe do to so) for accountability.
 - Similar to a hit and run - remain at the scene until the incident is assessed.
 - It is the owners responsibility to take accountability for their animal and the incident.
 - To remain at scene is the legal thing to do.

- Dog owners need to be responsible for their own pets. If they leave the scene of an incident there is no way of proving the identity of the dog involved.
- It's just like a car accident Situation
- Assault is assault.
- Tracking incidents like this is important.
- Accidents and incidents may happen but it is important for the owner to take responsibility y sharing vaccination history, and vet charges
- treat it like an accident, police always gather information at a scene.
- The biting dog and owner can become evasive and not take responsibility for the actions of their dog, leaving the victim at a loss.
- I can't believe they don't have to today!
- Yes, so the office can get both sides of the story.
- It is a matter of responsible ownership.
- Unless it is unsafe to do so with the dog in question. Contact information must be provided prior to leaving the scene.
- I think that it is important that all dangerous animals need to be identified and the mobility of people(and their animals) makes it necessary to have a means to find them.
- An owner is responsible for the actions of their pet. Biting is unacceptable behaviour at any time.
- Sometimes dogs get into a scrap. As a responsible owner, it should be your obligation to be prepared for any circumstances around this. Proper socialization and training of the animal(and owner for that matter) must come first. But given the fact that sometimes things happen, owners should be required to share information. This would help as if a vet visit is required afterwards, contact could be made with the "at fault" dog owner to establish if their animal is up to date with vaccines, as well as cover the vet costs for the other owner.
- It would require more responsibility of the the dog owner.
- If the owner of the animal leaves, how is one to identify that person? The owner should have to stay and provide their information.
- Absolutely the owner should remain at the scene unless there is a risk to themselves or others to do so. They should also be responsible to assume control of thief animal and engage other citizens to assist the victims. They should also be required to self-report the incident.
- Plus all dogs that bite should be put down immediately.
- Only to share information. In my many years in the city and having owned dog ant cat, have found Animal by law officers rude, unprofessional, and I do not trust them to be honest and fair. I have never had an animal that was in trouble, just lost. Always licensed.. however I have witnessed terrible unacceptable behavior that was never held to account. Are they not public servants ?
- Should be the same rule as a car accident. Get a ticket for leaving the scene.
- Officers shouldn't have to search for someone responsible for an incident they caused. If their dog requires quiet time away from the incident, they could give their info to the other party or someone else who will stay for the officer, and then the responsible person call the city within a short time frame, 1 hour?, to self-report.

- Just like any other accident ! Stay and tell your story
- This makes it easier for enforcement officers.
- Responsible ownership
- Need to do proper reporting and understand conditions for incidents
- Much like remaining at the scene of a collision, this is what separates responsible owners and irresponsible ones.
- Owner must be accountable!
- Vet information should be given (i.e name of vet). Additional info would be good provided the person bitten or the dog can be safely tucked away somewhere.
- I am all for holding the owner responsible for an attack on another animal or person.
- Dog owner is responsible for any dog bite and shall be prosecuted according to avoid any future dog bites and owner shall be restricted to own the pet for next ten years.
- As a responsible pet owner you should stay at the scene.
- I had no idea I could buy a pitpull, use it as a deadly weapon then flee the scene legally! Responsible people stay on scene and share their details, taking ownership for their mistakes. Responsible people don't own dangerous dogs, the demographic who do, are exactly the thoughtless and selfish people that would flee a crime scene.
- Just like drivers need to stay at the accident, so should dog owners after a bite incident
- I think all dog bites no matter the breed need to be addressed
- It is NOT the dog's fault, but a lack of training by the owner. DO NOT PENALIZE THE DOG OR TARGET SPECIFIC DOG BREEDS. IF I COULD MAKE THIS MORE CLEAR THAN MY ALL CAPITAL LETTERS, I WOULD.
- Owners need to be held accountable
- Within reason and to the degree that resources are available. Dogs will assert their own boundaries and need to be provided some leeway for behaving like dogs. That said, more serious incidents should absolutely require owners to remain present at the scene.
- It seems obvious - why would anyone leave the scene if their dog bites?
- Yes they should be held accountable
- People leave because they don't want to be fined. Have people use public dog parks scan a license - this does a number of things- tracks dogs coming and going, ensures licenses are up to date..
- Absolutely, this seems obvious and I'm surprised this isn't already a current law.
- The owner is overall responsible for that pet and should be held accountable.
- This is no different than a hit and run. They need to remain to give out information to the officers and to have the animal checked for rabies etc. An aggressive dog needs to be immediately taken into custody. Many times these people don't stick around and are not held responsible
- Similar to a car accident. Your dog caused an injury. Responsible should be taken.
- It is the responsibility of the owner
- Dog owners have to be responsible, same as vehicle owner who must remain at accident site!! I read too many stories where dog owners took off and the victim is left to suffer, this should stop.

- A dog owner that leaves the scene of an attack is exactly like a driver who leaves the scene of an accident: they both commit a criminal act.
- Because that is obvious. Biting and leaving is like a hit and run.
- The owner of the dog who bit is responsible for the dogs action.
- They need to act responsibly
- It's common sense. Just like a car accident.
- A severe bite to a human should be reviewed by a PO at the time of incident or during a follow-up.
- It's the same as a traffic incident, info should be exchanged in case the victim is injured
- Everyone should be allowed to speak their side of the story. A dog bite can occur for multiple reasons
- Owner is responsible for what the animal does
- Owners should take responsibility and provide contact information, medical information on the dog and insurance as required.
- What's to explain? If your dog bites someone or another animal, you should stick around and deal with the issue like an adult.
- You should do your part as a responsible pet owner
- for better investigations and enforcement of bylaws.
- Only if remaining on the scene doesn't put the owner or owner's pet at further risk.
- The dog owner should be severely fined. They need to be held accountable for their aggressive dogs.
- I would not support this if it meant only "pit bull" owners had to remain at the scene. It should be any dog owners.
- If they leave there is no way to follow-up and enforce accountability for the actions of their dog
- It is part of responsible dog ownership
- Listen, why can't you guys blame the owner and not the breed. If someone has or is getting a dog that requires more training, make it mandatory they take them to training. These bulky breeds have been abused for so long by bad people. It's not the dog. Chihuahua's and smaller dogs are far more dangerous in my opinion.
- But only if the dog is under control again.
- Like any incident whether an vehicular accident, or an OH&S accident witness's or owners of pets should remain to provide immediate statements.
- I mean, duh. We take responsibility for our actions, we learned this in kindergarten. That's what any decent person and responsible dog owner would do.
- One of my dogs had been bitten in an off leash area and the owner took off right away.
- Pet ownership is a responsibility not unlike vehicle ownership.
- Yes, it should be the same as a car accident. At any accident scene all parties should remain on scene until authorities show up.
- it's like getting into a car accident. you should have to stay and speak with people regarding the accident. Fleeing the scene should result in a major fine

- It's no different than a motor vehicle accident - if a bite occurs, the owner of the biting animal should stay and release contact information in case of complications with the bite.
- The ownerS of the dog (s) are fully responsible. The ones that run off are impossible to locate. Also, owners of dogs off leash in leash areas need to be fined, leashed dogs react differently to other dogs, especially if approached by an off leash dog, it doesn't always go well. These people are negligent owners are need to be held accountable. Stop punishing the dogs, target the owner and they will train the dogs properly.
- yes as a responsible pet owner they should.If they don;t when found dog should be removed from so called home.
- Pet owners need to take accountability for their dog so they need to wait.
- they are the owner and responsible for the dog. And should be present when officer arrives
- You are always responsible for your dogs behavior
- It's a no brainer, as with any other accident, of course they should remain on the scene. The animal should immediately be secured first though, whether in a vehicle/shed, etc until emergency personnel arrives.
- Contact information is a must for all parties
- That is just common curtesy, no?
- Just like an auto accident you need to stay at the scene till enforcement arrives
- Names and contact information should always be shared. Police report completed. The dog owner should have mandatory insurance to cover the cost for the victims. If people choose to have large vicious or unpredictable animals that are not leashed, muzzled, trained or they are incapable of handling or controlling they should be held accountable for their poor decision.
- The owner must take responsibility
- Should be treated the same as an automobile accident.
- Absolutely! Owners need to be responsible for their dogs instead of running away. If the victim is another animal, the owners should also have to cover the vet bills of the injured animal.
- It's the responsible thing to do
- For due process, it is important for all parties to at minimum exchange information. Similar to an MVA, parties involved must should be required to remain on scene or at minimum exchange information.
- Dog bites aren't necessarily culpable activity on part of owner and animal, but a record of such incidents would clarify whether or not there was a pattern.
- Responsibility for dog bites needs to be traced back to owners, and owners need to face consequences.
- So we can track them and fine them
- It is an assault, they are responsible for their dogs behaviour and the consequences of any attack. Unfortunately dog owners are frequently errant in their care for others.
- It would help make the owner more responsible for their dogs actions. Owners should be required to carry ID for themselves and the dog and share it with any injured persons or bylaw personnel.
- Forces them to be accountable

- It's akin to a crime. Don't leave the scene of a crime
- Dog owner should be accountable if his dog bites
- If your dog bites someone it's your responsibility to follow up and be accountable for their actions. Dogs aren't bad dogs...people are bad owners.
- To many poor dog owners who don't care or even go as far a thinking it is fine if a dog is aggressive to another.
- Every dog deserve someone to explain the situation and advocate for them. Officers should listen to the owner just as much as they listen to the victim however.
- Way too many owners flee after their dogs attack someone or their dog which could end up in a hefty vet bill. After a dog owner or their dog is attacked they may be too in shock to realize the extent of their injuries should be heavier fines for dogs walking off leash
- be responsible
- If you injure someone with your vehicle you have to legally stay at the scene, a dog is your property just as a vehicle is and if it inflicts injuries on someone, you should have to stay at the scene as well!
- Dog owner should remain at scene of incident as described in #5.
- Must take responsibility
- .
- The Calgary Model is about responsible ownership it's the number one animal control model because it addresses bad owner behaviour ... Don't change it
- Similar to requirements during a vehicle collision
- Yes
- In the case of a dog bite, both parties should remain, much the same as a car accident. Only with both parties input can the true facts be investigated
- All dog owners must take the responsibility of their dogs actions as they are the reason dogs act the way they do. Therefore if their dog attacks they should be paying for any doctor or vet bills that are incurred as a result of their dog. I have heard too many times dogs attack and the owners take off. Therefore payment for their dog's actions become the financial responsibility of others.
- It is the owners responsibility to remain there .
- If a person has been harmed in any format, the involved parties should remain at the location.
- Responsible pet ownership
- I am part of a community block watch and we often hear about dogs biting at someone and the owners walking off to avoid dealing with the situation responsibly. To note, not once has it been a pit bull, but labradors and smaller breeds.
- In relation to question 8 (there was no appropriate space for extra comments). I believe it is equally important to educate younger children to not pet other owners pets as well as for children to understand what the bandana means so they do not spook the animal.
- It is the owners responsibility to do so.
- Yes the owners shouldn't be allowed to flee a scene of an incident and should be fined more if they try to escape

- They run away and leave the victim of the attack to pay the bills too. They should be charged if they fail to stay at the scene where an Injury or death occurs.
- Some Dog owners need to be educated and learn responsible dog ownership
- As a pet owner you are and should be responsible for their behaviour and any results of their behaviour
- As long as there is a visible injury the victim should have a right to know the animal for disease purposes
- I don't believe that every scenario would be cut and dry or yes and no answer. But in most cases yes I would support a yes. My feeling is that in many dog on dog incidents the true aggressive dog may not be the one the city has issue with simply because of who made the initial complaint.
- Of course they need to share the information. Many dog owners seem to not take the responsibility and just leave the scene.
- The owner should be held responsible for their dog, not the dog
- It would be ideal for both parties, unless serious injury occurred, to be present for both sides of the stories to be heard and for proper judgment to be served.
- It's important that someone stays to share information with the other party, but I don't think they would need to wait for an enforcement officer.
- the owner of the dog owner is to remain at the scene as it is their responsibility of the dog's actions
- yes the party that owns a dog that has bitten should wait for authorities to arrive
- As any responsible dog owner should if there in an incident involving their pet
- It's the dog owner's responsibility to deal with the consequences if the behaviour of their dog gets out of hand.
- A responsible dog owner should always take initiative and ownership in such a situation
- Absolutely, if your dog attacks someone or something you should be held responsible for any medical or vet related bills that arise from that incident. I understand accidents happen, dogs play rough and one gets hurt, then stick around and decide with the other party involved the best action to take. There is no reason to leave, without at least exchanging contact info.
- Unless the offending dog is severely injured and requires immediate medical attention
- I've heard many stories of people leaving after an incident with no way to follow up.
- For proper assessment and first aid.
- This puts further accountability on the owner, and less on a frightened animal.
- Treat it like a reportable event. Both sides need to provide statements.
- Yes because the person who has been bit, is essentially a victim of an assault and thus the perp should remain at the scene or be charged.
- Take accountability for your dog. It's an extension of you
- All dog bites should be taken seriously. This will support if follow up is needed
- How else can pertinent data be collected?
- I think the owner needs to stay at the scene therefore he can take responsibility and work with enforcement individuals as requested.

- I don't believe any decent person would leave the scene without resolving the issue in some way first.
- Should remain on scene to ensure all precautions are taken and proper first aid is addressed. I do not believe the dog should be apprehended at this time.
- This needs to be explained? The dog owner should be required to stay and provide required information for incidents so the safety of the community can be restored in the shortest possible time.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their dogs behaviour.
- It's like a car accident where those involved are exchanging Information. It's about liability.
- This seems to force the owner to be more responsible for the behaviour of their dog.
- Just like any incident, a car accident or witnessing an activity that threatens good community and safety, a report should be given.
- you need to stay at the scene of an accident, how is this any different? An incident causing harm is an incident causing harm
- It's like an accident, you hit the person, you remain at the scene...
- It is the same process as with car accidents. Talking with an enforcement officer shouldn't result in any sort of arrest or detainment of the aggressive animal.
- This makes the owner responsible for the actions of their dog.
- Just as in any other accident or incident contact information is priority.
- You should be held accountable.
- No citizen arrest type situations. Swapping of info for sure; both ways, like in a minor accident.
- Duh it should be already
- I think people are responsible for their families. If an accident happens you should be there to make sure your pups side of the story is told
- It should be treated the same as an auto accident. If they leave the scene without providing documentation there should be a charge/fine for doing so.
- I believe that as a responsible dog owner you should remain at the scene of an incident.
- Everyone should be responsible for your animal. Especially if it bites someone
- Well why wouldn't they? This should already be law so they don't give false info
- Details around the incident should be shared and documented on all sides, as well as veterinary contact information in case any concern for disease from the dog may be viable.
- My large dog and I both have been attacked by a smaller dog. The woman was able to get away because she could pick up her dog and run.
- It's called be a responsible pet owner and being held accountable for your pets actions
- It's a serious incident if a dog bites someone, the owner must remain on scene so appropriate follow up action can be taken by bylaw officers
- If someone causes bodily harm to another person they would need to stay at the scene of the crime or be considered fleeing the scene of a crime. . .such as in a car accident. The exception would be if they are leaving to get medical care for themselves or their animal.

- Dog bites can be serious and the owner has full economic and moral responsibility.
 - This is common sense to ensure prevention of communicable disease.
 - Alternatively, it would equate to leaving the scene of an accident.
 - BUT IT CANNOT BE BREED SPECIFIC LAWS
 - Yes, your dog HURT someone!
 - "Definite yes on if bites a human if injury sustained (some tiny nips are common from herding breeds and don't necessarily cause harm).
- Unsure on if animal unless it's severe enough to warrant a veterinary visit."
 - owners need to take responsibility for the dogs actions
 - I assumed this was already a requirement. It is ridiculous it is not already.
 - Same logic applies to remaining at the scene of a car accident. Accountability
 - animal must be destroyed.
 - Just like a car accident
 - The same as a car accident.
 - Responsible pet ownership
 - dosent matter the breed if any incident occurs you should do just that
 - There needs to be accountability and responsibility on everyone in the situation. Dogs are not responsible for their behavior but would suffer the most under a lack of care, and training. If a person is required to exchange information, accountable actions performed by them can be enforced.
 - A bite is a serious incident and all sides of the story need to be full understood in order for the enforcement officer an appropriate decision on the course of action. This can not be done if one of the involved parties leaves.
 - Yes, they must at least exchange phone numbers, and stay if it is safe to do so. If th3 dangerous dog is not safe to keep around or the hurt animal or person needs immediate attention they can be in contact afterwards by phone instead.
 - they should stay at the scene with there under control
 - Not only does it not offer any kind of support for the bite victim but also prevents the owner of the dog whom bit/attacked from being held accountable. I'll
 - Its important to open the lines of communication if a dog bite occurs. In the event that medical expenses or lost income become an issue. And to better establish a record for repeat offenders. A responsible pet owner should be financially and legally accountable for the actions of their pets.
 - Owners need to be held accountable as well. Follow up information is necessary.
 - It's important that both sides are able to give their story and the owner needs to be held responsible if at fault. Pit bull type dogs are an amazing breed, but sometimes they are in the hands of bad owners. These owners need to be held responsible and the dogs need to stop being blamed.
 - Any incident should be discussed and follow-up care, expense decided between parties. If that cannot be decided an enforcement officer should be included

- Owners need to take responsibility for the action of The pet
- there should be an opportunity to explain both sides
- I support the rule that the dog owner remains at the scene when a person has been bitten. I do not support the rule when the dog bites another animal.
- Take ownership, show responsibility.
- Every biting incident should be investigated if there are injuries to other dogs or people
- Prove the dog is liscenced and up to date on vet bills so pet transfered sicknesses aren't transfered or made aware of
- Same as hit and run rules
- Yes, the owner of the dog that shows aggression is liable. Vet bills can be expensive therefore it should be on the owner of the aggressive dog to pay for and care the other dog might need.
- I think it is important for the owner to take responsibility for a dog bite. In addition, this should not be dependent on the breed or size of the dog. Small dogs can be just as dangerous and are not taken seriously when presenting aggressive behaviour.
- To make sure that- if there's vet bills it must be paid by them
- Accountability to be expected.
- Owners are completely responsible if their dog misbehaves
- Only if safe to do so though.
- They should share contact information, ideally remain at the scene if it is safe. But if they feel it is safer to take their pet back home, be available later to answer questions.
- One needs to take responsibility for ones actions
- Do I need to? Seems obvious.
- Both parties are able to express their version of events while still fresh in their minds
- Dog owners should be responsible for damage caused by their dogs - to people and to creatures.
- The owner is responsible and must be held accountable, therefore their identity must be made known to officials.
- Responsible owners should remain at the scene. It really is common sense. However there are many dog "owners" who aren't responsible so that's why this rule is being considered.
- This should all be case by case, I understand that is an abundance. There should be mandatory training when getting a dog, criminal background checks and home checks. These problems are caused by people, not dogs. The answer is to educate and train people. Everything else will fall into place after that.
- Just like a car accident
- Owner should take responsibility for not controlling their dog and cooperate as part of the solution
- People need to be responsible for the action of their animal
- This is a no brainer. My experience is that a very large proportion of dog owners do not have control over their dog and do not even seem to understand what that means. There should be some kind of test to even get a license. It's a terrifying place. I can't run there (John Laurie Blvd) any more and even cycling is sometimes dangerous.

- Would be needed for following up on the case and at the very minimum to allow for testing of the dog for health-related issues for the victim (ie. rabies test).
- People can't get away with being poor pet owners.
- Pet owners must be held accountable for the actions of their pets in cases of biting or attack
- The responsibility is on the owner.
- Potentially enough varying sources of review for a fair decision.
- Any breed of dog that bites or shows aggressive behaviour to another person, the owner needs to stay at the scene to speak with any given authorities.
- Owner should take responsibility
- An owner is responsible for their dog and must stay at a scene of an incident, if this is not complied with a large fine should be implemented.
- Individuals should be punished for being irresponsible pet owners. If someone leaves the scene of a bite incident, they should face fines or charges based on the severity of the incident.
- Incidences involving dog bites should be handled the same as car accidents where people are required to stay at the scene and exchange insurance information.
- If there are any medical/vet bills that are needed due to the bite the owner of the dog should be held accountable and to pay said bills, unless the dog was biting in defence of another dog or person trying to harm it.
- I think it's best all parties involved stay on scene and discuss the situation that unfolded with an officer.
- anything that can be taken off of the courts, and put into the hands of people with more specific knowledge is best.
- This would allow for nuisance dogs to be logged and ensure the health of both animals is up to date and alleviate the need for humans to receive unnecessary rabies shots.
- If necessary is important. Some owners misinterpret play and distance increasing signals. IE. if your dog is pestering my dog and you can't get it away from mine and mine snaps after telling it off more mildly and nicks the skin, I shouldn't have to stay at the scene and share contact info.
- Yes have to be a responsible dog owner, even the small dog owners!!!
- Too often the owner runs away rather than dealing with the issue. It should be same as leaving scene of an accident with matching fines
- I believe that a dog bites because of its training or lack thereof. And it is the owner who handles all training; therefore, it is the owner who needs to show up and work through whatever happened. The owner also needs to be there to handle questions about the dog's health and vaccinations.
- It should be considered the same as a motor vehicle accident. You don't drive away and wait for authorities to come find you. Your animal hurt someone so be responsible and deal with it. Enforcement should not have to track you down as this also leaves a greater risk of the offending owner & pet to not be traced if the injured person is unable to follow them or get info themselves. Then how is the offending person/pet to be properly charged?
- Only with severe attacks, not little disagreements between dogs

- I think it's the responsibility of the owner to be there and involved if their dog bites a person or another animal.
- Yeah if a dog bites someone they should stick around. If I accidentally run over someone I can't just leave. I see them as the same thing. And often dog bite victims are hysterical and you must hear both sides
- Similarly to a motor vehicle accident, we are responsible for the impact our behaviours / choices make on others. We owe it to our community to be committed to the safety of all.
- It makes sense to require responsibility, but I'm not sure how it would be enforced. You can't legislate stupid.
- By involving tribunal decisions it creates room for prejudice against a breed. If a dog bites another person (badly enough) for it to cause harm then the owner should exchange information with said person
- Owners are responsible for their dog's behavior. Owners should remain at the scene of the incident to share contact information OR provide that information to the injured party or witness so contact can be made with them (in case there's some reason they cannot stay (e.g. picking children up from school)).
- Because it's not always the bigger dogs fault. Quite often they are provoked by another dog and only the larger dog gets in trouble. If someone shows up at least they can get both sides of the story.
- responsible ownership, charged for leaving the scene
- If a dog bites someone or an animal the owner should be held accountable for vet bills, and should provide information to a third party if they aren't comfortable giving their information directly to the victim.
- They are the one responsible for their dogs behaviour and training and should take responsibility for their actions
- Unless immediate care is required for the animal. Just like a car accident info would need to be exchanged.
- Falls back to responsible pet ownership. Owners need to start being held more accountable for their pets. This includes staying at any scene .
- If there's an attack made by any dog in general I think the owner is definitely responsible and should be treated no different than say if it were a car accident. Any sort of accident the owner should be help responsible therefore remain at the scene of the incident and go through the process. This has nothing to do with pit bulls this is just general common curtesy that should be practiced by and responsible adult/pet owner/car owner/establishment or a anything like that.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of the dog and should remain at the scene to speak with the enforcement officer
- Presumably the owner is present when the dog bites. It would be common courtesy to talk to the victim/ whoever's dealing with the incident
- This is a no brainer.
- Pet owners of all types of dogs should be held accountable if their pet bites something else. In my opinion dogs are a result of how they have been trained and the environment they are in. They are like humans, who are taught to hate and to be racist, it is a learned behavior. This has to do with the pet owners, not the breed of the dog.

- This should include small dogs and minor bites/incidents as well.
- Responsible pet ownership
- Accountability
- Leaving the scene should be heavily penalized and viewed as an attempt to dodge responsibility.
- All dog bites should have responsible ownership
- This seems like common sense and general consideration to me. It's like a hit and run if you don't stay.
- It is important to take responsibility and to ensure that the person or animal that was bitten is taken care of.
- There are many irresponsible dog owners who flee if their dog attacks and the innocent victims end up footing the huge vet bill. The law should include: if your dog attacks another you must pay all vet/medical bills.
- My dog was attacked and the Owners could care less.
- My dog was attacked by a Great Dane who was running at large(my dog was leashed). Thankfully the owner shared his contact info albeit he refused to pay the $1000 vet bill. By law officers were able to find the owner and charge him which he refused to pay, so the case went to court. Ensuring the owner shared their info is essential
- Yes, however the owner should put the dog in a quiet place before more people show up.
- People need to be 100% accountable for the actions of their animals
- Even though dogs are animals and there's a level of unpredictability (besides some having traumatic backgrounds we can't fully understand), most of it comes to responsible ownership. This would be part of it.
- Transparency of the event is important as well this can serve to limit / penalize bite and run incidents
- This is responsible pet ownership
- They know their dog better than anyone and would be able to be able to tell what happened.
- A responsible dog owner will be willing to do anything in their power to make sure that their dog does not bite anyone again. To remain at the scene is the first part of taking ownership and a possible resolution.
- that is only common sense that they stay on scene.
- As long as there is proof the bite occurred, the owners should be held accountable. However, it's a slippery slope because if someone CLAIMS they witnessed a bite and it was actually an air snap or something they perceived to be aggressive behaviour or the person made the claim simply because they don't like the other owner or the other dog, this could end up punishing innocent owners/dogs.
- Makes sense for severe bites
- just like any other incident people should be waiting at the scene of the crime!
- The owner of the attacking dog should be liable to pay for vet bills
- Unless they need to get their dog out of there and then return? I don't really know

- No different it were a vehicle accident.
- Similar to requirements for automobiles. Proper and accurate reporting and documentation is required for record and analysis purposes.
- The same as a car accident, all parties should remain in order to have clear sides of the incident and to provide information to enforcement officers
- There needs to be a record of dogs that have bitten either children or other dogs.
- To track the dog
- The human is the one who should be responsible for dealing with consequences and making decisions on behalf of their dog.
- It's important for both parties to have an opportunity to provide their stories and accurate pictures / facts collected. However, there also needs to be a reasonably fast response - it wouldn't be appropriate to have to remain on scene for several hours waiting for an enforcement officer to arrive.
- I have seen photos of a dog severely injured by a dog in an off-leash park, where it was described that the owner took his dog and left. The injured dog required extensive vet care and the responsible owner did not allow his information to be collected. The owner of the injured dog had to crowd source information on FaceBook from anyone who witnessed the incident. I do not even know if the matter was ever resolved. I feel that is no way to let the traumatized dog and owner deal with the situation.
- The owner should be there to address any questions about whether the dog is up to date on vaccinations.
- I don't know how this will be enforced but I think it's necessary
- Of course they should stay to talk to bylaw. They are at fault, this is no different than a car accident.
- This seems reasonable and appropriate
- There is often no other way to easily follow up with the owner.
- it should be a persons responsibility much like injuring someone
- Well if a dog accack fit no reason then yes something should be done
- take responsibility
- The dog owner should take it's responsibility and remain at the scene. Also to help out the victim.
- The pet owner is responsible for the behaviour of the animal
- They need to be accountable for their lack of responsible pet ownership.
- It is like an assault, so info should be exchanged.
- Accountability and to lessen the chance of a future bite by the same dog.
- If your dog bites another causing injury, you should be liable for vet costs as you did not control your dog.
- I think it's necessary as it will hopefully increase responsibility.
- The owner of the dog is responsible for keeping the dog under control be it off or on leash so it is very reasonable to require the owner to share information and talk to By-Law if they are on the scene. Vet bills are expensive.

- The owner must provide contact information so that the authorities can proceed with an investigation and the hurt individual can receive remuneration (bills paid) for treatment/rehabilitation due to the injuries inflicted by the dog.
- It's responsible pet ownership (no matter the breed) to remain at the scene of an incident if the dog was involved in an altercation where someone else or their property or pet was injured or damaged.
- Get all versions of the incident. What was going on prior to bite, was there attempt to stop etc.
- I'm surprised this isn't already a rule.
- Just as when a car collision occurs, all parties involved need to remain on scene when damage is large enough.
- It is too difficult to identify an owner after the fact.
- The owner should be responsible
- If someone is involved in a car accident that requires police to attend they are required to wait at the scene. This should be the same in that if an enforcement officer is attending they should wait to provide information/ explain their side.
- Vehicle drivers are not allowed to leave the scene of an accident, so dog owners should not be allowed to leave the scene of an attack. It is a deliberate action on the part of the dog and the owner should be responsible for the dog's actions. Contact info would be needed in case of serious injury, infection, disease, etc. It's only right that the owner makes sure the victim is taken care of.
- IF any dog bites, the owner should stay. No where is it Proven that one kind of dogs bite more than another. The owners need to be responsible. I desperately wanted a pit bull to rescue. I am frustrated at the lack of knowledge. Just because they might bite (like any other dog) doesn't mean every "pit bull" should be banned.
- Absolutely, as long as the purpose of this is a dialog first, to help the owner understand what happened to provoke the attack. That information can be absolutely essential for the dog owners to manage and retrain the dog. If the bite is not severe, I hope this conversation would prioritize dialog and management over punishment (also see my comments to Q3). A dog may be caught up in a dog fight and a biting a human could be a complete, unintended accident.
- Mandatory
- Responsibilities of owning a dog include ownership of the dog AND owner behaviour. Only exception would be if the person bitten does not want to log the complaint.
- Anything else is like a hit and run. If an officer cannot respond in a timely manner, they should be required to share personal identification with victim or witnesses.
- It's just the proper thing to do, stay at the scene with someone who was bitten by your dog!
- Yes, owners should stay at the scene. Far too many people walk away after giving false information.
- They should be able to remove the dog from the situation but remain by to make a statement
- Just like a car accident if there has been an injury information must be shared
- People can sometimes be hard to track down when it comes time to be reimbursed for the veterinary bills of the "victim dog".
- To me this is a necessity to ensure that everyone's protected.

- I have a friend whose young dog was attacked by other dogs being walked on leash with a dog walker. The dog walker has been uncooperative & was reluctant to identify the dogs involved although witnesses gave enough information to identify them as the dog walker's own pets that she was walking with the puppy that was attacked & other dogs. Good Samaritans who did not witness the attack saw the young dog that was attacked in distress on the street i& took him to a vet.
- It is important for the contact information of the biting dog owner to be given to the victim dog owner so that veterinary bills can be send to the biting dog owner.
- Dog owners must assume responsibility for their dog's actions.
- Ultimately the pet owner is responsible for its pet's behaviour, so yes, they should remain at the scene. .
- Same as a car accident. Added penalties for leaving the scene of an occurrence. Added penalties for hiding an offending animal.
- You own a dog, you take responsibility for everything it does. They should be charged criminally if they leave the scene or refuse to provide info.
- Requirement to disclose all information and forfeit the animal
- People need to take responsibility of the pet they own and its behaviour. This way both sides of the stories are told upfront and can help resolve the situation faster.
- People need to take responsibility
- Been many cases of people running off with their dog.
- I feel that having the dog owner leaving creates an issue of trying to find the owner later on if further discipline is needed for the dog and it makes sense for them to have to directly report to an officer.
- Both sides of the incident must be presented fairly.
- An accident requires contact info to be shared
- We need to know who the dangerous dogs are and hold the owners accountable
- Dog ownership is a responsibility the citizen takes on as a personal choice. No one has forced them to be a dog owner. Therefore, just as in a vehicle accident, a responsible driver would remain at the scene of a incident to speak with city's enforcement agents.
- The dog owner is the real problem here and they MUST be held accountable for any/all injuries as a result of their dog biting anyone. Any second offense means the dog is seized and that owner and household loses the privilege of ever owning another dog again.
- The owner is responsible for the animal's behavior. Just like in a car accident the owner of the vehicle cannot flee the scene and needs to be provide contact and insurance information.
- Your animal is your responsibility
- I think owners who leave a scene after an incident with the dog should be held accountable and should have consequences
- If you are with your dog and it bites (human or animal) of course you should stay there.
- No different than leaving the scene of a car accident!
- makes sense, responsible pet and citizen behaviour
- Obviously.

- As long as it is safe for the owner/animal to stay at the scene. If safety is a concern, they should remove themselves/their dog for the safety of themselves or the public.
- Like a car accident
- Responsible for your dog that bit
- Similar to an accident involving a vehicle, persons and pets involved in a biting incident should be willing to take responsibility for the actions of their pet.
- As with any accident if people share their information freely then no need to wait for an enforcement officer. But like car accidents a report needs to be filled out by both sides so that owner can be tracked not just the dog.
- Provide essential information to officer
- Yes the owner of an attacking dog should stay. They need to be charged if not. Like a hit and run car accident is.
- People need to be accountable for their dog's behaviour. Just like in a car accident, they should be responsible for damage costs (if any hospital bills)
- There are 2 sides to every story. The owner should stay at the scene (unless medical is needed) to state facts if issue
- "The dog owner is responsible for their dog and should have to talk to enforcement if necessary.
- The only exception would be if the owner and/or dog were in a dangerous situation such as being followed, attacked, harassed, etc."
- the dog owner should be required to stay on scene
- Same as a car accident. Always two sides to the story and dog owner should take responsibility and be given chance to explain if dog provoked
- Owners need to take responsibility for their own pet
- A dog owner should take responsibility for their dog's behaviour, training, and action.
- Everyone needs to be responsible for their dogs behaviour.
- You are responsible for your dog. Period.
- The owner of the aggressive dog should have to pay the vet bills for the injured animal
- Dog owners are responsible for their dog's behavior
- In case of injuries which are not easily treatable that may arise from the incident, owners should be held accountable for any medical attention needed
- The owner is responsible and should pay medical bills if needed
- Absolutely. And vet care needed should be paid for by the owner of the aggressive dog.
- Only if the dog bites a person or causes serious injury to another dog
- The dog owner is responsible for their animal. All dog bites should be reported.
- As a responsible pet owner you should stay at the scene if an issue, be that your dog bites or chases someone, were to occur. I do not agree with the singling out of a breed of dog, yes bully breeds do have a stronger bite but "lock jaw" is not a real thing. This is racism in another form. BSL in other communities has proven not to lessen the number of dog bites. BSL in any form punishes responsible pet owners and paints everyone who owns a "pitbull" with the same brush and solidifies that all these dogs are dangerous, when this is far from true. I 100% agree with responsible pet ownership but do not agree with BSL in any way and I find it very worrying that this survey has singled out this breed of dog. Why just pitbulls? Why not rottweilers, mastiff, doberman pinchers, cane corso, etc. any type of guard dog? This is ridiculous! Just be a responsible pet owner.

- Yes, if the offending dog can be secured to prevent further harm.
- There is no accountability for owners who have untrained dogs at the expense of their community. Due to this lack of accountability, people can get away with having untrained dogs. Being required by law to stay after a confrontation would be a great idea.
- I live near Rotary Park off leash area. I can't tell you the number of times offending owners and dogs are gone before you can shake a stick. Meanwhile, the owner of the injured dog has to deal with sometimes enormous vet bills through no fault of their own. Make it a HUGE fine for not sticking around.
- The owner and the individual who's animal was bit should both stay on scene.
- These occurrences are usually the owners fault not the dog
- The owner should be held accountable. The dog doesn't necessarily know what it's doing but a person does and should be training every breed right that they own and ensure they are not training it to be vicious one day because we know better.
- It's being a responsible owner
- Regardless of the breed the owner needs to be held responsible for their dogs behavior.
- All sides of a story need to be obtained. A dog bites another dog. Why what was happening. Did the other dog keep pestering the one that bit? Biting a person. Was the person asked to leave the dog alone. Did they startle the dog. Was there provocation
- Any dog owner in such a situation should absolutely be required to remain at the scene in order to share the dog's medical history (e.g., are vaccines up to date, etc.); to provide insurance info should it be required for the person or animal bitten requires medical treatment, etc.; and to provide contact information as mentioned above for any follow-up required.
- If it is safe to do so
- It is an owner's responsibility to ensure that his/her dog is well behaved, and if the dog is not and does attack a person or another animal, the owner should be liable for their behaviour.
- The owner should be charged criminally if their dog attacks or bites a person. They should be charged criminally if they leave the scene of the incident. Their dog should be put down on the first occurrence of a dog bite.
- Absolutely! The owner needs to stay and be responsible for his dog and any damage that is done to an animal or human.
- I have been bitten by a dog while running on a pathway and the owner left without providing any info
- The same expectation as a car accident.
- This is what responsible owners already do.
- If any injuries do occur, the owner of the attacking dog should be held responsible.
- With the exception that if it is unsafe to do so. In that case, contact info should be taken (pictures as well, if possible) and followed up on.

- Not all bites are the dogs fault. The person who was bitten could have teased the dog, gotten too close to the dog, startled the dog, been perceived as a threat to the dog, or been scared or nervous. Dogs do not have the same brain as humans. We can't expect them to just know everything as humans do.
- Responsible pet ownership is a must
- we are responsible for our dogs and there's no exceptions
- Vicious dog attack with owner present is similar to a vehicle hit and run incident.....an escape from responsibility leaving the victim with no recourse for damages caused.
- Rules for remaining at any seen of an accident should be similar to the rules of a car accident
- Absolutely. If any other possession of yours unintentionally injured someone (ie. gun went off accidentally) it would be a felony to leave the scene. Owners must be held accountable for the actions of their animals if they choose to have those animals in public spaces.
- To ensure the identity of the dog owner is known and the necessary steps can be taken regarding the dog and the victim(s) can obtain redress against the owner.
- I have witnessed an off leash dog attack to an on leash dog and the off leash dog owner refused to provide contact information
- Owners should be responsible, but unproven or unsubstantiated accusations should also be fined/punished to dissuade people from bringing nuisance claims.
- Many just leave and then the owner who owns the bitten dog must pay the vet bill.
- There are often incidents where after a bite, the owner disappears and there is no recourse for the victim and they often end up stuck with significant vet bills.
- If the person shares there information freely with the victim family - then perhaps they should be free to leave. But, it should be an offense to leave without sharing info. as in a car accident.
- I don't understand why there would be an alternative. If a dog bites another dog or person, it is their responsibility to stay on scene, unless perhaps their own dog too was injured (dog fight) and needed immediate vet care.
- The more accurate the information - the better to deal with the situation.
- Accountability as a pet owner
- You are responsible for your pet, and its actions.
- It is the owners fault for not training their dog. The owner is responsible and should have consequences if they flee the scene.
- contact information
- Too often they disappear with the animal without sharing info
- But as mentioned when I've had off leash dogs run up to us and I've attempted to address this with an owner they ignore me and or walk away. It's an owner issue
- This is the only responsible thing to do.
- Same as a car accident. Dogs aren't the problem. It's the owners.
- An owner should be contacted if their animal injured another being.
- If it's a severe bite only. Not for play bites.

- It's basic pet ownership responsibility
- The owner is responsible for the it dog's actions
- It would be the responsible thing to do. The problem is how do you define a bite to be serious enough to warrant this? Is a small nip by a playful dog considered serious? Dogs are dogs and use their mouths to communicate. Besides which they may have been provoked to do so.
- Same as for injuries caused by vehicles
- either remain at the scene or have some process in which to follow up with Bylaw if remaining at the scene is unsafe. Further consequences for those that do not exchange information or follow up with Bylaw.
- Responsible dog ownership regardless of breed.
- How else will the city identify problem dogs. If the bite is severe enough and requires victim to make a claim against the dog owner, they must have necessary contact information.
- "To support contact and responsibility of dog ownership.
- To establish location(s) of potential "nuisance" dog."
- Story to be told for every incident.
- Its an offense. Yes, you remain at scene like a car accident.
- Only if the victim is also present and remains at the scene.
- I have personally observed dog owners leaving an off-leash park after their dog bit another one.
- It is the same as any other kind of accident. You need to provide your contact information and take responsibility for what has happened.
- People should be held accountable for the behaviour of their animal in public spaces. If the enforcement officer can arrive on the scene in a timely fashion, then this is a practical way to foster accountability
- that is responsible pet ownership and allows both sides to be heard by ems or police
- you must stay at a car accident and there is no difference - an accident is an accident unless the two parties agree and share info. A minor nip is one thing but a full attack must be dealt with. I need to make reference to the pitt bull questions above as you did not give us space for comments. I have a neice with a pitt bull and he is one who loves to sit on the couch and watch tv. My point is there are some very friendly and gentle pitt bulls as well as the aggressive ones as there are some gentle and aggressive poodles and other breeds. We need to stop looking at one breed and labelling them. The owners in most cases are ones that need to be trained. These people who train their dogs to act aggressive to make themselves feel big are the ones who should be addressed. I realize that is hard thing to do but we can't label all dogs with one brush. In most cases it it the owner that needs training not the animal
- It would save time in question 4 above and start a case file.
- The dog can't talk. An owner must be present to accept responsibility and provide contact info for further actions
- It is a privilege not a right to take a dog out where the public and their pets are vulnerable.
- To take responsibility for the actions of their dog
- Seen cases where the dog owner leaves the incident leaving the victim with no recourse

- why wouldn't they stay at the scene? It seems absurd that an owner would leave the scene if their dog bit someone, doesn't it?
- Accountability as a pet owner is important. I bet the dog has offended before and the owner just walks away to prevent getting in trouble.
- This should include ALL dog bites to humans and other dogs, even if it a bite from a small dog
- No explanation - absolutely imperative. A dog owner should be charged with leaving the scene otherwise, in my opinion. I also don't believe it should be a rule but law.
- Too many owners end up leaving victims (whether people or other dogs) to foot huge medical bills.
- If you're dog, regardless of breed, harms another animal or person the owner should be held liable for vet fees and/or medical expenses
- It is similar to a car accident. As owners of pets, the owners must take responsibilities of the pets (or in the case of the vehicle accident, it would be the car and how it's driven).
- There are often costs incurred with attacks, primarily against another animal and, by staying to share information, they would be easier to contact to share costs of damage/injury.
- Owners have to be responsible for their pets.
- Responsible pet ownership should always be encouraged.
- Yes - besides the physical damage of the bite, finding out about whether the dog has been vaccinated for rabies is essential.
- Possible fines to dog owner or for accountability
- If the bite has punctured the skin or coat of an animal or skin of a person.
- The owner is responsible for the dog's behaviour so absolutely must stay at the scene.
- If they leave the scene of a crime they should be charged for a crime.
- Owners should take responsibility for their dog's actions. If they cause damage to another person or dog all medical expenses should also be their responsibility.
- If it's serious they need to accept the responsibility and consequences
- To exchange information. To receive the fine for their offending dog. To get information to cover vet or medical bills.
- It will be like a car accident. All involved need to stay around to give the particulars.
- Owners are responsible for their dog(s) behaviour.
- Owners should be held accountable
- Unless that dog also needed care/attention and/or if the individual could not wait for an enforcement officer, they took some steps to reach out (ie, called 311 themselves to report)
- Just like a hit and run. The owner/operator/walker of the dog (or car) must take responsibility for that dog's behaviour because by having the dog in public/amongst members of the public, they are implicitly claiming that they have control over it.
- "Yes but only if necessary. I have been bitten by a dog this year and have discussed it with the owner.
- I would suggest calling enforcement only with a very serious bite and if I felt the owner was not interested in working on the dog's behaviour."

- The dog owner is responsible for the behaviour of their dog and should be held accountable for any incidents that come from nuisance behaviour.
- This would ensure an owner taking responsibility for the animal's behaviour, would it not?
- Take responsibility for your animal.
- It's no different than leaving the scene of a crime
- If the bite is severe it is important to get information on the dog and owner to allow for either reports/determinations to be made.
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog
- The owner is 100% responsible for their dog, regardless of breed.
- It is very important that laws are enforceable.
- It's being a responsible owner.
- It is the responsibility of the pet owner to cooperate in all possible ways.
- Can find out health information about the animal
- The dog owner should remain on the scene similar to a car accident to share details and information and take responsibility for their dogs behavior. There are not bad dogs, just bad owners.
- "If a person who owns an animal is responsible for it at all times

- A dog owner is responsible for it at all. Times

- responsible for it at all times"
- As with any other altercation occurring in life, both parties should be expected to step forward to resolve a dispute; however, there may be situations where immediately removing an agitated dog is the better decision, so I suggest the City consider including this aspect in a bylaw rather than applying a hard (black & white) ruling.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions, leaving the scene is a crime and harsh punishments should be handed down on the owners.
- If there is a dog bite. The owner should be responsible for the pets behaviour

- it is the responsible thing to do (like staying at a traffic accident)
- It demonstrates responsible pet ownership to take accountability for damages that your dog has inflicted.
- Owners should take responsibility for the actions of their dog
- Full information should be on the dogs ID.
- I have witnessed dog attacks in an off-leash park and the offending owner has left to avoid being accountable for their dogs actions.
- Pet owners should be held accountable for their dog's actions and should be able to be reached should further information be required of them.
- Only if there is a chance the party bitten could contract rabies or another disease
- As a pet guardian myself I believe it's important to stay and take ownership of any accident that occurs barring that by the owner and the dog staying t doesn't cause additional concern for any person or animals safety including their own. Sharing contact information in imperative.
- If the bite is serious it should be recorded for the fog or person so that if a pattern of behaviour is developing it can be seen.
- They are responsible for the animal and its actions.
- If the person shows remorse and responsibility then the enforcement officer should then look at the owner and whether he or she needs to learn how to properly care for the dog. If determined not then the dog should be taken and then trained and given to a proper home. This includes both parties. It's time owners be held responsible not the dogs.
- The owner/handler is the one that trains, whether intentionally or not the dog to behave in an aggressive way. They must be penalised for their behaviour. The big problem with this is having the owner and out of control dog that has just attacked, staying around the victim.
- People need to be held accountable to the actions of their dogs - I think the bite victim must also be held accountable. Were they following proper dog etiquette?
- If you are in an accident with your car, or bicycle or anything else, it is assumed that you will share contact information with the other party. I believe this should be the same in a situation with a dog incident. A share of contact information at the very least.
- It seems to work for vehicle incidents
- This reasonable of any responsible pet owner.
- This is difficult because you your pet did the attacking you would want to be able to remove your animal from the immediate issue. However, contact info still needs to be shared.
- Both Dog owners should remain at the scene of the incident to exchange contact info and talk with an enforcement officer if necessary
- Owners mist take responsibility.
- People have to be accountable for their actions
- It is an incident the same as a car accident and should be treated as such.
- Two sides of story should be heard and two animals seen by authorities.
- I would mostly agree with this rule, Sometimes its best to remove the dog from the environment in which it bit and as a owner that should be their right to prevent any further escalation. Having said that there does need to be a way to prevent owners bailing from the expectation of being responsible and taking ownership of their dogs actions.

- Same as witnessing an accident you shouldn't be able to have your dog attack someone and just run away
- Accidents happen just ask car accidents happen stay and figure everything out.
- Clarify situation.
- i say good luck though.
- Responsible dog ownership ownership includes being responsible to stay on scene period.
- The owner is responsible for their dog at all times and the consequences of its actions. Like any "accident" one does not leave the scene.
- Much like remaining at the scene of an accident, the owner of an offending dog should absolutely remain at the scene and be held accountable for whatever is necessary.
- Holds the owner accountable and provides the opportunity for education and training.
- Dog bites happen as a result of poor training and is the responsibility of the owner. It is not the Dogs fault.
- This is the only answer that makes sense in the case if a dog bite incident. The owner MUST remain at scene
- In case further action needs to be taken, owners should provide contact information
- They have to be responsible right?
- I would like to see a substantial fine imposed if a dog owner/ walker does not remain at the scene of a dog bite/ attack.
- No different than a traffic accident. All parties should remain at the scene and exchange relevant information.
- It gives them an opportunity to provide their view of the attack and take responsibility. After suffering a couple of dog attacks, one of which the owner ran away, its disorienting and scaring after trying to fight off the dog while making sure your animal is safe. Then to look up and see there is no one around and you have no idea who that person was or where they had come from.
- Yes but the cops better be coming too because most dogs that bite have owners that get elevated quickly.
- The owner is responsible to pay any medical costs plus dog's medical history re: shots up to date
- What's to explain? The owner of the dog thats bitten and animal or person, absolutely needs to stay there and be accountable!!
- Stop profiling pitbulls. You are all ignorant to the fact that Dalmatians and Rottweilers have been in more incidents than pitbulls. Also, it's the owner, not the dog.
- The dog owner must be held responsible.
- If harm is caused, it's the same as harm coming to a person. Nobody should leave until the matter is dealt with properly on everyone's side.
- It is easy for bad dog owners to just leave and not take responsibility for their pet. They need to be held accountable and should not be able to just leave if their dog attacks a person or another pet.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs.

- I believe the owner should take responsibility. That being said. Sometimes it's the other dogs fault too. Both owners should stay
- Responsible dog owners should & would.
- No different than a motor vehicle collision. There is damage to property, stay at the scene.
- They are responsible for the event.
- Without a doubt. It should be a crime not to.
- Such a rule would remind dog owners that they are responsible for the actions of their animals and that they are accountable to the victim and to City authorities.
- Too many valuable resources are being used to track down irresponsible owners in order to charge them days after the incident occurs.
- It should be like a car accident. If there is a nuisance dog owner that flees that owner should pay steeper penalties
- Both sides of the story should be heard.
- It's the right thing to do.
- People must be made to take responsibility for their pet
- The dog owner must be held accountable
- I relate it to a car crash- if the owner of the vehicle drove off, they need to accept similar consequences
- Will help to get info from both sides for later.
- Agreed, no one should leave a scene of an incident. If my child hit or hurt another child we would stay and not flee
- This seems like common sense. Just like any other incident where bodily harm or property damage occurs, it should be an offence to 'flee the scene.'
- Owner should be liable for damages and thus should be required to provide contact info and should've fined heavily if they do not.
- If someone can't control their dog, & it bites someone, it's an assault. The dog owner is responsible.
- Self evident
- The owner's contact information must be recorded - to leave the scene is the same as leaving a car accident w/o exchanging information.
- Dog owners need to take full responsibility and be held accountable if their dog bites someone
- Makes sense
- Owner needs to take responsibility for their animal's actions.
- as with any other incident involving personal injury
- I've heard too many stories about owners running off and not taking responsibility.
- for follow up with the owner - you need their info
- potential liability & care of injured parties
- If another dog bit mine I would require information to be given from the other dogs owner.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs, period. If a dog damages property or injures other animals or people, the owner must accept responsibility for their animal and it's behaviour.

- Bad dogs are from bad owners so it's their fault for the incident and should take responsibility
- The owner must take all responsibility for their pets actions.
- I believe if the owner leaves it knows it dog has a problem. They should stay till all the facts are stated
- may be a reason for the dog biting
- Depends, if the situation is too stressful for the animal(s), an exchange of information should be done before leaving the scene. Phone number, licence, etc
- "If a dog is loose the owner should be responsible.
- Even with best intentions and proper containment, sometimes a dog can escape and if the dog is involved in an altercation the owner should stand up."
- The actions of a pet are merely a reflection of the actions of the owner. A willful lack of training leading to any sort of altercation should be taken extremely seriously and owners MUST be held accountable for their terrible ownership.
- With a fine imposed if ignored. Provides better identification of the owner and the dog for follow-up and possible medical issues.
- I've seen just across the street from my residence an incident in which a dog attacked another, causing severe injuries. The owner of the aggressor dog intimidated bystanders who rushed to help with loud and very vulgar shouting and threats, clearly heard across the street, and soon walked away with on one knowing who he was or where to find him while others tried to assist the wounded dog who was bleeding from injuries. The owner of the injured dog likely had significant veterinary bills. The problem with this idea is that there is likely no one present at such an event who can compel the owner of such a dog to remain at the scene of such an event and there is an incentive for the owner to get away from the scene of the attack.
- How is this even an issue. Any responsible owner would remain at the scene; no different than a vehicle collision.
- If they leave the scene before an officer shows contact in the future may be impossible. Or they could provide false contact info to avoid dealing with the situation.
- It would be the same if there's a car accident, must stay at scene until enforcement officers show up.
- There should be full disclosure of the name and contact information for the owner of the offending dog. I do not understand why the owner should be allowed to walk away without providing this information. They cannot be trusted to own up to their dog's actions after the fact. Even if they leave their information with the owner of the dog who was bitten, the owner of the offending dog may lie about their name and/or contact information. It could be more difficult, and probably cost more money to identify the owners and find their contact information. If they need to wait for an enforcement officer, then the officer may be able to verify the information provided to them by the offending dog's owner.
- I do think it's important the information is shared (no bite and runs to avoid accountability) but dogs are often treated like family members. I would be concerned for the safety of the offending dog & owner if the other owner is in a high state of emotion. Perhaps the rule should be you have to call 311 and provide your information before you leave the scene, but may do so after if you feel your safety is in jeopardy.

- Owners must be responsible for their pets
- Because then the owner can have a say in what happened, and ultimately be proving responsibility.
- It makes certain that the owner of the animal that does the biting[unprovoked] is accountable for their animal's action
- Owners are responsible for their animals
- The owner is responsible for the dog's behavior in most cases
- Putting the onus on the person makes sense
- As a dog owner, I feel it is the responsibility of an owner to have control of their dog at all times both on leash and off leash. If their dog bites someone they should stay at the scene but also if their dog bites another dog.
- I believe the owner should act responsibly
- too many illegally off leash dogs create hazards for other animals and people, these owners should be treated like owners involved in car accidents - you leave the scene, you get charged over and above
- In case there are medical issues or concerns later they can be contacted and heard from.
- Owning a pet comes with responsibility and if your dog bites someone it is your responsibility to stay on the scene. Much like a car accident.
- the owner should be made responsible for action of their pet and ensure they are trained/supported to ensure they behave well in public.
- It would allow for the responsible party to be identified. Many instances have occurred where bites and injuries have been inflicted and the owners have fled the scene and left the other party with veterinarian and ambulance bills.
- The rightful owner has a responsibility.
- I answered this way as it may help to get the whole story right away
- So the owners of the pet can exchange information. The owner of the pet in regards to wrong doing or harm should pay for any necessary vet bills.
- One incident that I am familiar with which resulted in the death of a pet resulted in the dog owner to abscond with the dog.
- Kinda like a car accident, don't hit and run.
- Any responsible dog owner would do this.
- Ideally they should stay, realistically many won't
- The owner must be responsible for their dog's behaviour. They should make it as easy as possible for the enforcement officer to find them and discuss the situation.
- People need to be responsible and accountable for their dogs behaviour
- People absolutely should be taking accountability for their animals. Dogs are not inherently bad, humans make them that way.
- Be responsible for the behaviour and impact of the dog under your care and control.

- It seems no different than if you cause a vehicle accident you should remain at the scene until resolved.
- If a dog bites my dog, the owner must remain at the scene to determine if the dog has a history of attacking other dogs and to pay for vet bills if necessary. If a dog bites me, the owner must remain at the scene so the dog can be registered as dangerous.
- There are many factors that can play into a dog biting another dog, it should be necessary for all parties to stay and communicate the issue reasonably.
- Unlike a car, there is no license to write down and therefore locate the prep once they've left the scene.
- Responsible owners would be doing this anyway! We need to enforce laws strictly no warnings just fines, and removal of animal if necessary, especially if they are still acting aggressive with the owner present.
- safety and protection of victim
- Need clearer definition of 'bite'. Does it include breaking the skin and drawing blood? What is the difference between a 'bite' and what some owners call a 'nip' or aggressive play. My large, submissive dog was recently attacked by a pack of 3 dogs and one of the owners suggested that I should avoid bringing my dog to the off leash if she couldn't deal with the behavior of other dogs.
- Yes, however the officer also needs to recognize that often dogs only bite when attacked. The person or animal bitten also needs to be considered. If another dog was bitten it needs to be assessed if they were aggravating the dog that bit.
- I consider this is a serious matter.
- Absolutely! It is the responsible thing to do. There is a need to ensure that the dogs vaccination's are up to date. The enforcement officer needs to question the owner regarding any previous incidents. Also, if there any medical or vet bills due to the attack, the dogs owner needs to be responsible for these bills if found to be negligent.
- That is fair but i think that should apply to both parties if possible in order to ascertain why the incident occurred in the first place.
- Also, the dog owner to cover all costs associated with the incident for the person or other animal.
- I am hesitant on this. There are bad owners who should know better and end up with their dog biting and then some bites are the fault of the other person or animal. But this can become a finger pointing scenario and the blame usually goes to the dog who bit making it unfair.
- Yes but only if it's severe enough to require medical attention. Dog bites are not all equal and don't always require any type of follow up. For example, I was bit by a dog a couple years ago which broke the skin on the back of my hand drawing blood but it was not the dogs fault and it was not an aggressive dog. It was simply an accident and did not warrant any type of reporting or follow up so the owner was not required to provide me with any contact information. If it was an aggressive dog, than there should have been some type of follow up.
- It is no different than a traffic crash. You stay until the authorities can assess the situation.
- for law enforcement to be able to interview the owner regarding the incident
- To many dog owners who have an aggressive dog take off from the scene

- The incident can be resolved between the two parties and I don't think enforcement officers should ever be necessary, because it can easily be resolved by the people involved
- I believe the owner should remain at scene with the dog involved. The officer can then assess the situation more easily as well as the behavior of the owner.
- They need to at least provide valid contact information. Like in a collision
- There needs to be accountability from the owner and contact/contact info is necessary
- I believe there are NO BAD DOGS only irresponsible owners.
- It makes sense to know who owns a dog that bites people and other animals. If they leave the scene, they are taking no responsibility.
- If it's your dog you should be held responsible, considering it's your responsibility to ensure your dog behaves at a reasonable level
- It is difficult to find the owner and resources are spent unnecessarily
- dog owners need to be held accountable too
- both owner and victim should be there
- They need to stay in place otherwise no way to follow up
- It is against the law to leave the scene of an automobile accident, why should nuisance dog incidents be any different?
- in case the injury escalates
- Your dog is your responsibility.
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog, so sharing information about this incident is important.
- It is common sense and common courtesy. Not remaining at the scene is akin to a 'hit and run'.
- This would allow each incident to be reported and the behaviour of a recurring problem dog to be known.
- Otherwise they don't have to take responsibility. It might be difficult to enforce.
- I believe this would eliminate a lot of "he said, she said". No different then you can't leave a scene of a crime.
- This seems obvious, of course they should stay. They need to be fined severely if they leave. But figuring out who they are is not always easy.
- There have been incidents where a dog has bitten a person and the owner was not identified.
- Self-explanatory.
- No different than human-on-human assault.
- Contact information needs to be exchanged to enable follow up actions. Dog owner must also ensure dog is controlled and public is safe immediately following incident. This demonstrates the importance for required obedience training particularly for large or nuisance dogs.
- The owner is more at fault than the dog in my opinion and should take on that responsibility and share information like in any other accident situation
- As some people do not wish to be held accountable for their animal's behavior, they will not remain at the scene of an incident. Unfortunately this can cause problems for the victim affected (monetarily).

- People are crazily referring to animals as their children well if a human hurt another and flee the scene that's additional charges right? So treat it as such this should be law, not a suggestion. Shocking it wasn't already.
- Any responsible pet owner would stay to possibly state paying for vet bills or additional medical expenses if required. However, how do you enforce this rule if the person does not want to stay?
- People should take responsibility for anything there dog dose because if it misbehaves it is there fault for not training the dog properly.
- How else can bylaw get an idea of why the bite occurred and what the next reasonable step should be? Focus on harm reduction - training, classes, support for the dog and additional training for owner.
- Not different than two drivers involved in an accident remaining on the scene. Owner is responsible for his/her dog and may be able to explain how/why the incident occurred.
- The dog should be secured by the owner and kept under control until Bylaw arrives. Many dog owners do not carry phones with them when they walk their dogs so exchanging information is difficult. Also when someone is hurt the immediate need is to get medical support for the person and secure the dog. It is an emotional time for all involved and exchanging information between the parties is sometimes impossible or threatening. A Bylaw Officer can act as an independent third party in these situations.
- The circumstances of why the incident occurred are important to determine if the incident was 'forced' upon the dog by teasing etc or if the dog is naturally aggressive and unprovoked.
- Information should be exchanged when a dog bites. Too many people take off when their dogs have bitten someone. If it is safe to do so (for both parties), the dog owner should remain at the scene. If it is better for the dog owner to leave (dog has been injured or is not settling down, etc.) then the owner should at minimum provide the victim with all their contact information - including address, phone number and email so that they and bylaw officers can reach them. Should be a fine for leaving the scene WITHOUT providing contact details.
- I find that owners of these dog biters are illiterate and can't read a sign
- You should not be allowed to flee the scene if an injury causing dog attack any more than you would be permitted to flee any other accident scene
- I think it is equivalent to making drivers involved in accidents remain at the scene of the accident.
- Good luck with that. But I agree the owner must stick around.
- share contact information a must
- I think it makes sense since I would equate someone leaving as a hit and run situation. You stay at the scene and ensure the dog is secure. I've seen a situation where a large dog attacked a small one. The small dog was terribly injured and ran away with its owner pursuing it. Eventually the small dog died of its injuries. The owner of the large dog left the scene so there was no way for my neighbour to retrace that person to hold them accountable for the situation.
- They should share contact information if the victims of the bite deem it necessary because the offender should be held accountable in some way, sharing contact information or speaking with an enforcement officer should ensure that.

- This is no different than a car accident. you stay, swap insurance and contact information and speak with the police. Should be the same for all dogs
- Owners do take off with their dogs but they should be held liable and pay for vets based on the injuries
- The dog owner is ultimately accountable for the consequences of their dog's behaviour. This just seems like common sense.
- The owner should be liable for damages and distress resulting from the behaviour of their dog.
- Similar to a car accident, sharing contact info is necessary to hold the owner accountable and have each party's insurance (if applicable) get involved
- Hold dog owners accountable.
- It would seem the responsible thing to do
- Should be fined for leaving the scene of a crime
- The human has to be responsible so must remain at scene and provide information (with some leeway for getting their problem dog away from situation and returning immediately).
- There are some dog owners who do not accept responsibility for unwanted behaviour in their dogs.
- This could become an insurance claim and appropriate information needs to be made available
- Communicating the animal's vaccinations, history, and training is important. Also debriefing the events leading to the bite.
- It's like a car accident. Leaving the scene should be an offense.
- Same reason we don't allow hit and runs. If you are a responsible owner you will take responsibility for your dog. Real [removed] won't stick around.
- They should remain on scene as long as the animal is able to be confined during this time.
- It just makes sense. I was once attacked by a boxer. He was being walked by two young girls and ran on to attack me and my dog (my dog was on leash) not once but twice. The two girls left, never got their name. I was told by by-law that if it happens again that I am to follow the people home so that I can give their address.
- If an incident has occurred obviously all parties must stay and answer questions to determine how to protect society from either a bad dog or bad dog owner. A dog will either fight or flight. I've seen many owners of small dogs think it's funny to watch them bark or be aggressive to a very large dog. It's not always the dogs fault.
- This one is a no brainer. I've been involved in the threat of a dog attack and the women, despite my pleading would not put the dog on a leash and ignored pleas to control her dog.
- people should be fully responsible for their dogs.
- Its necessary for enforcement for fines
- After a dog attack to a person or another dog, having the contact information of the owner is helpful in case of medical or legal follow-up.
- It is not always the dog that is the problem but rather the owner so they need to stay to be the responsible one in the situation.
- It is comparable to other physical assault, so it requires clear and trackable followup

- Owners responsibility of owning a animal
- Committing any offence and leaving the scene is unforgivable and suggests that the party is guilty, and has no regard for the wellbeing of the affected party.
- It might be hard to track them down later.
- Need to take responsibility for the dog.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their dog and consequently need to remain at the scene
- I agree because I think that it is the owners job to take responsibility for the incident that it has happened whether it is to a person or other animal. There was this time that I heard about at a dog park that I go to where a dog severely bit another dog. The owner ran away from the scene with the dog and the victim dog ended up going to the vet and needed emergency surgery. Luckily the dog is okay.
- How else are we going to determine which dog (or dog-owner) is dangerous? A;though, if the dog is out of control, it might be necessary to remove it, so an alternative is to give some sort of identification to witnesses, then leave.
- It's the right thing to do.
- Owners must remain on scene, if not, additional major fines should be levied
- The dog owner has a responsibility for their dog and its actions and is accountable for it.
- I see it as the Owner taking responsibility for what his pet has done
- In cases that I'm aware of, the owner has walked away and doesn't care.
- Case by case, but if human is bitten, owner should remain at site.
- All owners need to be responsible for their pets behaviour, big or small.
- It just makes sense!
- This is an aspect of responsible pet ownership - you must take responsibility for the behavior of your pet and any consequences. Seems fairly similar to the idea of remaining at the scene of a car accident. Would need to account for the possibility that it may not be safe to keep the pet at the scene of the incident - perhaps the owner would be required to make arrangements for the pet to be safely restrained?
- The owner is responsible for the animal's actions.
- The owner is responsible for the dog and must take responsibility for any action of the dog.
- They need to be held responsible and if the pet bitten needs medical care the owner of the offending dog needs to pay the vet bills.
- Yes but the dog needs to be secured somehow. There should be penalties for leaving the scene.
- They should pay costs and be required to take training class
- If an incident occurs that results in injury, the offending party should not leave the scene.
- The owner must assume responsibility for the actions of his pet.
- If a dog bites a person or other animal and the owner is not required to share contact information, there is no access to a person for enforcing the law

- Dog bites can cause issues that may not be known at the time of injury. It is important that owners stick around and exchange information to ensure that, should any medical bills be required, that the owner of the aggressor be accountable and reachable to obtain compensation.
 - All dog owners should accept responsibility for their pets and their behaviour, as long as both are treated fairly
 - just like with car crashes - be responsible
 - Like in hit and run, leaving the scene constitutes an offense and should be punished.
 - Owner should be allowed to leave the scene to remove the animal to prevent further harm/trauma/stress but failure to return or exchange contact information should result in consequence
 - Both sides should have a chance to explain what happened.
 - If a dog bites someone, or even jumps on or charges/chases someone, it's assault by the dog and therefore assault by the owner. It's a terrifying experience for the person who has been bitten or otherwise attacked. If I were to punch a random stranger, the full force of the law would descend on me. I expect that the same should apply to dog owners, who have caused pain and suffering to the person their dog attacked. If a dog owner leaves the scene of their assault, they should be fined within an inch of their life or jailed or both. Why is this even under discussion?
 - Requiring the dog owner to stay at the scene eliminates the possibility of the dog owner leaving and not following-up with the incident and/or taking responsibility.
 - It's responsible
 - It would ensure that dog owners who don't provide proper training or socializing for their dogs would be more responsible for their pets behavior. Right now they know there aren't any specific rules so they don't care about the dogs poor behavior or the problems that result.
 - It's just the responsible thing to do
 - This should be true of all injury incidents (e.g. cyclists colliding with pedestrians).
 - The owner needs to be held accountable
 - The owner is responsible for the dog and it's behaviour. The dog owner should face consequences for their dogs actions, and if they don't remain at the scene the incident may not be addressed appropriately.
 - the person that was bitten needs to know if the dog had all it's shots etc.
 - because if they stay and explain what happened then they can take to time and discuss what they can do for everyone involved
 - "This is a tricky one.
- They should remain at the scene but at a safe distance. The public deserves more information to properly assess any actions to be taken."
 - Well obviously. They all run off anyways.. but higher fines and penalties if they leave the scene should be in place.

- The owner needs to be liable
 - I think the owner has a responsibility to stay at the scene of any altercation,
 - Same rule as vehicle collisions or people assaults
 - As long as the dog is now under control the owner should be taking responsibility and should support the person bitten or owner of animal bitten
 - Of course it is the owner's responsibility to ensure they have their dog under control and if they can't then they need to accept responsibility for the dog's actions.
 - Proper investigation requires all sides. If someone is not willing to stay, I would suspect they are at fault (them or their dog)
 - How else would the nuisance dog owner be charged? If they left the scene, they might not be tracked down, only to re-offend again.
 - Unless medical attention necessitates doing otherwise
 - It is the pet owner's responsibility.
 - "But should be limited to dog bites that break the skin / cause bruising
 - A scared Chihuahua nipping an ankle is not the same as a vicious dog attacking another animal or a human"
 - I agree you don't leave an car accident you wait for authorities so both sides can explain the situation.
 - The owner of a dog should always take responsibility when their dog bites and harms another person or animal
 - To leave the scene says that the owner is not willing to take responsibility for the dog's actions.
 - People just walk away and deny responsibility for the attacks so your review and revisions do nothing. Enforce the regulations and if you do that we will be just as far ahead without you tinkering. If you are not enforcing the bylaw in the books now what good is this tinkering?
 - Same principle/reason as to why the at fault party has to do so from an accident. If they don't it is a 'hit and run' which is how I think this should be approached. One must stay at the scene of the offence caused by them.
 - Dogs that are hurting others should have a 'record' so patterns can be identified and addressed.
 - "5. Absolutely. Any responsible owner already does this. The only time I can see where this may not be practical would be if their dog was seriously injured and needed urgent medical help.
 - I think, depending on circumstances, there should be a very high fine for not remaining at the scene of a dog bite incident, and providing relevant information.
- Because there was no comment section offered for a number of the previous questions in this survey, I have included my comments to several questions below.

- 3. Upon reading this question I find the format quite confusing. First, you refer to problem dog behaviours such as severe bites, but then in the next line continue with “nuisance dogs”, and then continue again on the subsequent line with your specific description of “pit bull”. Reading this gives me the very confusing impression that you don’t know what you want to say, by including problem dog behaviours, severe bites, nuisance dogs and pit bull dogs jumbled together.
- Please be far more clear when discussing these topics, especially when you are introducing them together, as these subjects do not share direct commonality. It would have been far more clear had you simply discussed one subject at a time. First, problem dog behaviours for all dogs, then nuisance dogs, then severe bites, then pit bull type dogs.
- I am also dismayed to find that you presented some type of factual information in the form of “pitbull’s strength allows the potential for a more severe bite”, and did not provide any evidence or cite any reference of this whatsoever. Without showing how this information was derived you are telling people to accept this as truth alone, only the words you provide that we are to trust whatever sources of information and data that you use. I must say I do not accept the way you have handled this information or this portion of the survey.
- Regarding the term “pit bull”, as you provide your definition of this term I expect that you are aware that pit bull is not a breed of dog but a type, and identification by phenotyping, using physical and visual characteristics is incredibly misleading and even more importantly inaccurate, which can lead to devastating outcomes for dogs and for people.
- You refer to the measures other municipalities have taken to reduce frequency and severity of dog bites, but are you taking into account how many municipalities have taken the measures adopted by City of Calgary Animal Services when the bylaw was previously overhauled? It is very interesting, and perhaps telling, that you have not included this information for all Calgarians, and everyone and anyone in the world that would like to take an interest and provide their feedback, that our city pet bylaw has been a model for cities throughout the world. There are so very many places where there are no licencing requirements and no rules of any kind regarding pets, their well-being or the responsibilities of their owners. It is truly astonishing. I think this information is incredibly important to share with all of our citizens so that they know that we are already doing a great deal to make our city safe, peaceful and friendly to its citizens, both people and pets.
- I am also very cautious about adding changes that specify any type of dog requiring harsher rules, and without an individual dog having done nothing to merit these consequences. How anyone, human being or creature, looks is not a reflection of their behaviour or their personality. Actions will always speak louder than descriptive words, or photos.

- Let us not punish or restrict responsible pet owners for how their dog looks. Even the thought of requiring an owner to have extra insurance because their dog looks a certain way is quite unreasonable. The only result of this type of action would be that irresponsible owners will still be irresponsible, and responsible ones will have to pay more, perhaps even more because of the irresponsible ones.
- Regarding owners of nuisance dogs being required to have additional insurance, you would have to present how that would benefit citizens including pet owners and their pets.
- Is this really considered a useful deterrent for irresponsible owners to take better care of their animals? Or would this have unintended consequences for other people that are not the target of this measure?
- Muzzling dogs that have not displayed any behaviour requiring a muzzle is ridiculous, especially when considering your idea of singling out a specific type of dog by its physical appearance only.
- How is requiring a muzzle for a nuisance dog preventing the dog from being a nuisance? If the dog displays behaviours that actually require a muzzle that would be an acceptable scenario. However the way you have portrayed this, it doesn't sound like it will have any positive effect. Nuisance dogs, from my experience, are directly related to irresponsible owners. Deal with these owners, even to the extreme point of removing the dog from their care and re-homing that dog, as well as providing training it may require to be happy and healthy.
- Again, you are restricting responsible owners when including all dog owners that must have only one pit bull type dog. Who would verify what type the dog is? Who will enforce the number of dogs? By licence only? By complaint?
- Any measure must be directly related to the unlawful behaviour of an individual dog or the irresponsible behaviour of its owners, period.

- I would truly love all pet dogs to have obedience training however that is a completely idealistic notion, as is obedience training for pit bull type dogs or nuisance dogs. Requiring such a thing for all of any type of dog is trying to find a “cookie-cutter” solution to a complex issue. Each individual dog owner with their dog is accountable, period.
- A separate idea would be to have the option to lower a high fine for nuisance dogs when the owners take them for obedience training with an authorised trainer - many dog trainers are not responsible themselves, this must be determined by setting a standard of quality.
- The only dogs that should not be at off-leash dog parks are those that...should not be at off-leash dog parks; those that don't interact well with other dogs or different types of people and kids, and those dogs with either irresponsible or inattentive owners (who are very close to being irresponsible in these instances).
- The problems with off-leash dog parks is there is no one there to keep dog owners accountable for their dogs. Many responsible dog owners no longer attend off-leash dog parks because of irresponsible and inattentive owners who either do not know their dogs well enough or do not take care of their dogs well enough.
- Higher fines for owners with nuisance dogs could possibly work as a deterrent but what is also needed is to have an avenue, or several, for irresponsible owners to become responsible owners.
- Education, access to quality obedience training and even dog owner meet-ups for them to learn what being a responsible dog owner means and how to use that to take better care of their dog.
- I will continue to repeat myself, the irresponsible owners of the individual dog displaying unlawful behaviour are the ones requiring consequences to deter their problematic behaviour.
- As well, answers to some of the questions after question 5.
- 8. A dog early warning system sounds like a good idea. But who will enforce it? It's voluntary so what do young children do about dogs that don't have bandannas? What happens when they fall off? What about when a good dog isn't feeling well or isn't having a good day. This type of measure is misleading in its simplicity and usefulness.
- Education is the best method to help in dog bite prevention. Providing children of all ages the information that they need to understand a dog's body language, asking for permission from the dog owner, and the dog, what a dog looks like when it's okay to approach and what the dog looks like when it isn't okay to approach. All of these important lessons are essential in preventing dog bites to both children and adults.

- Additionally, can we have this education for adults too? Too many adults don't know how to understand dog body language and dog behaviour. The phrases "there was no warning" or "it happened so fast" means that the owners did not see or understand the dog's communication that something was wrong.
- 9a. Fine increases to pet bylaw violations
- In most cases i would prefer the fines were increased only with the addition of avenues for irresponsible pet owners to lower the fines with improved responsible pet ownership, for example, obedience classes from a quality trainer, pay 2 years in advance for their pet licence for unlicensed pets, for animals at large providing better enclosures - if they animal escapes again then the fine cannot be lowered; etc. Depending on the dog bite incident (severity and conditions) dog and owner training could also apply here.
- 9b. It's hard to say whether higher fines for bites to children would actually help prevent bites. Unless these funds were needed to provide dog bite prevention education. Then I would support increasing these fines over fines involving adults.
- 10b. We want as many pets licensed as possible. This way the welfare of the animal and even their owner can be checked if incidents arise, and citizens are also protected.
- 11. I know that it can be difficult for non-pet owners to deal with all that can come with having pet neighbours, and I also know that restricting the number of animals per residence without the pet owners having done anything to deserve these restrictions seems arbitrary to say the least.
- I also know that we do not live in an ideal world where all pet owners take exceptional care of their pets and only have the number of pets that they can properly care for.
- I would be more supportive of a measure that would require the reduction of the number of allowable pets in a residence if there were incidents where this would be appropriate. Perhaps a partial measure that states that complaints regarding the welfare of these animals and the ability for the pet owners to care for them would mean a reduction in the number allowed. Some type of defined care standard and ability to care for the animals would have to be established.
- One of the main problems with restricting the number of pets per residence, besides punishing responsible pet owners, is that once a limit is in place, it can be continually argued that this new limit should be reduced, again and again. This has happened in many communities and I know we can find a better solution.

- It comes down to only restricting those pet owners that actually require it.
- 12. The more convenient it can be for licencing pets, the more pet owners will do it and keep both pet owners, pets and citizens safe and responsible."
- It's very important that the owner remain in the area as they need to be able to discuss plans moving forward, discuss the consequences for the dog and owner, and it makes it easier to determine the best way to continue.
- How to enforce this is the issue... but yes, I think it is necessary. I also think this should be treated as an accident, if a person leaves the scene of a crime, they are severely fined.
- Owner is responsible to give a statement
- The owner should be fully accountable for the dogs actions as they have taken ownership of the animal and should deal with any consequences as a responsible pet owner.
- You should stay on scene.
- Both sides involved in an incident need to remain at the scene to speak with enforcement officers.
- Just like your car, someone hits it, and needs to stay there, otherwise it's a hit and run and should have repercussions. The dog is the responsibility of the owner, they should stay and take responsibility or review who was at fault (ie) there are cases where people ignore the owners and approach their dogs regardless. This should be reviewed.
- Any decent person would do this anyway, but because people appear to be irresponsible, perhaps having fines for leaving without providing information would help.
- Yes, just like a car accident, you stay on scene unless medical help is needed.
- I have been attacked by a dog before., it would be nice to know the dog is getting a good home and proper training
- The owner is responsible for their dog's behaviour and therefore should take responsibility. The consequences of the owners actions should not be taken out on the dog.
- These situations are already so emotionally charged. The aggressive behaviour of all parties involved regardless of size or breed or ability to defend themselves must be taken into consideration.
- I think if you aren't in control of your dog, and it bites another dog or person unprovoked then you should stay and exchange information.
- Yes, within reason. Person can leave for medical assistance for themselves or their dog. Officer must arrive within 1 hour.
- Your animal is your responsibility and it's actions are also owner's responsibility
- It is important to receive the full story from both parties. In my experience both parties can have very different stories.
- It should be clearly understood by all dog owners that they are accountable for their dogs behaviour and must provide their contact in the case of an incident.

- If the party of the dog who was bite requests information so that follow up can happen the other party/ies involved need to stay so that can be collected. It's like two cars colliding - you can't just leave the scene.
- Had a husky bite my pit bull and it resulted in a $2000 vet bill for which the husky owner did not take responsibility for
- Own up to your dog and defend them. They can't speak for themselves
- Hard to declare a dog a nuisance if the owner runs away.
- Be a responsible pet owner, regardless of what breed you own.
- My view is that it is similar to a hit and run otherwise
- Owners should be required to share their dog's registration information and their own contact information, but remaining on the scene is likely too onerous, placing too much pressure on response times to events that are most likely to happen in the outdoors
- It feels responsible for the dog owner to remain at the scene, unless it is unsafe to do so (for instance if the dog continues to be violent). However, if the dog owner had to leave there should be a mechanism to ensure accountability and traceability of the dog owner.
- If the owner knowingly leaves the scene there should be similar consequences to that of a hit and run
- All parties can be heard
- If a dog bites someone a responsible owner should stay and talk with that person because it is the owner's responsibility to make sure that their dog is properly trained it is not the dogs responsibility to train itself
- They need to stay and be accountable for their actions and the actions of their dog if others have been injured. If they leave it is no different than fleeing the scene of any other crime, it's illegal.
- Dog human interactions can be highly confrontational and enforcement officers need to attend. As would be required by police to attend an assault.
- It's important to track these dog owners.
- It is the responsibility of the dog owner to remain just like it is the responsibility of a driver to remain at the scene of a crash. If for some reason the person couldn't remain, such as needing to seek care of themselves or the dog, then that should be taken into consideration.
- It's the responsibility of a dog owner to do the right thing
- A dog owner should take responsibility for their animal, though should a situation arise that makes it unsafe to stay (safety of the dogs involved, physical or verbal altercation with the people involved). Individuals involved should also have the opportunity to report the incident within 24hrs.
- Repeat offenders can be identified
- YOU MADE IT A "YES" OR "NO" QUESTION! IT IS ILLOGICAL TO ASK ME TO EXPLAIN MY ANSWER!
- The owner is responsible for the animal and its actions. Recently a dog attacked another dog in my neighbourhood a the owner fled thd scen. This action of fleeing should receive a steep fine.
- There should be consequences for assault.

- Owners should be responsible for their dog's actions. Just like you are required (or charged otherwise) to remain at the scene of an accident.
- It's responsible dog ownership to follow up with an incident. How will the victim know the dog's immunization status? If unknown - the victim will be immunized for rabies as a precaution- an expensive use of public health funds that may not be needed. Not every dog that bites must be put down, right? There can be extenuating circumstances? It would be better for everyone if the dog owner had access to resources if it helps dog and owner.
- Pet owner is responsible for the pet. Being bitten could be a traumatic experience.
- Dog owners should be accountable for their dogs actions all the time.
- the owners of pets are ultimately responsible for the actions of their pets.
- The owner should always be punished not the dogs.
- Information of both and dog owner and victim should be exchanged along with pictures. (a city of Calgary dog bite app would be a nice addition to be able to record all needed information for incident of both parties)
- If requested by the victim or animal victim, then maybe if it is severe bite?
- Owners should be responsible for their dogs actions and they should also be tracked in a system to see if they have a history of owning animals that bite. 1 incidents is a warning and 2 incidents you cannot own a new dog until you complete dog training or animal education of some sort.
- The person must remain, as there can be medical costs to be concerned about at the very least. Also, for records keeping of the owners of nuisance dogs.
- History
- The owner should be held responsible no the dog.
- A statement should be made by both parties
- It is the owners responsibility, and is no different than when a driver must remain at the scene of a car accident
- It's the owners responsibility to take action for their animal. It's the responsible thing to do
- The owner of the dog should be responsible for any vet/medical costs incurred
- To me, this is common sense—of course the dog's owner needs to be available for next steps.
- if possible yes
- If your animal has bitten a person or animal, you have a responsibility to remain available to provide details and of course, be accountable for any injuries your pet may have caused. As owners, the onus is on us to control our animals and protect others if necessary. The scene of an animal attack should follow the same rules (as applicable) as those that apply at the scene of an accident of any sort.
- It's a reasonable expectation of being a responsible pet owner.
- It is obvious that they should stay on site.
- Pet owners need to be held responsible, there are no bad breeds, only bad owners
- Be responsible
- The owner is responsible and should pay any costs incurred.

- The owner is responsible for the behavior of the animal. They should take responsibility, similar to leaving the scene of a car crash.
- Owners and insufficient training are the roots of these problems. Owners must be accountable for the actions of their pets.
- Owners should be responsible for their dogs
- If the bite is more than just a tiny scratch that didn't actually harm the person.
- The owner should stay and take responsibility for the pet
- They need to be there to help and give any information needed for the person or animal their animal bit.
- I only say yes if it is safe to do so. People can get very emotional in this situation and forget dogs react and can escalate when they are fearful or in fear for the owners safety.. I would support staying close by so the owner has the space to calm the dog. I just don't want to see mob mentality and the dog pay for acting on instinct.. they are not people
- Isn't that assault? So sticking around a crime scene is a good idea...
- That would be like the situation of traffic accident, the driver has to remain at the scene.
- That it be not unlike other offences causing injury, such as offences involving a vehicle.
- Accountability and ownership, neither is possible or easily deciphered without the offending dogs owner present or available
- Because the dog isn't to blame it's the owner and maybe how the dog or dogs are treated
- RESPONSIBLE OWNERSHIP OF YOUR DOG.
- This is basically the same as remaining at the scene of an automobile accident, even more so as in this case someone has been injured.
- The situation could be dangerous so leaving contact information should be an option where it would increase tension if they stayed.
- One should take full responsibility of their animal.
- If there was any injury caused, or risk of finding trauma after the fact, then there should be an exchange of information so that the dog at faults owner can be responsible for any damages done.
- Enforcement of responsibility.
- It is similar as not leaving the scene of a car accident.
- It is the owner's responsibility to look out for the safety of their own dog as well as other animals and people.
- If you do this to these breeds I want to see chihuahua's as well. They attack more than any other dog breed out there. But it's cute when they do it? I don't think so. Turn your brain on now, it's the people not the breed. In the 80's it was one breed then the 90's another and not it's the pit bull breed. Again THINK HARD about this one. And maybe slap crazy charges on people instead of this joke.
- It should be no different than if there was a serious car collision.
- I agree with this but do not see how this could be enforced. If a dog attacks a person or another animal, how do you make the dog owner stay at the scene. If the owner is a responsible person, they would stay. If not, they will leave without giving any information. I have seen it happen.

- The owners should be held responsible more than the dog. Mandatory training would be a wise option for ALL DOG OWNERS.
- We need owners to be responsible for their animals therefore they need to remain on the scene and be held accountable for their dogs actions.
- The owner of the dog that bites needs to pay for the vet bills of the dog that got bitten unless the other dog caused the dog to bite, such as behaved aggressively. People who have dogs that bite should put a muzzle on it or walk it far away from contact with other dogs.
- depending on the situation. Some bites are harmless or a result of a dog who gets anxious OR a result of people who don't understand dog behavior and put THEMSELVES at risk as well as the dog (ie: kids who chase and hug strange dogs-this is the fault of the parent, not the dog). Im not waiting around all day because a parent can't teach their kids to respect a living thing.
- need to ensure that owner takes responsibility (like being in a car accident) from issues resulting in a bite.
- If the owner does not stay they can be very hard to trace
- Common sense
- It's just like if your child bit or attacked someone.
- Responsibility is key , people need to be held accountable
- Yes just like in car accidents even though it was an accident it should still be dealt with responsibly.
- Owner needs to take responsibility
- As a responsible pet owner they should be expected to stay on scene.
- If a dog bite another and the owners are unable to resolve the dispute on their own, then authorities should be called and all parties should be accessible. It's not a good idea to keep either animal in the place of the incident, so I think both parties should have the option to return to their residences and wait for someone to meet with them there.
- Seems like common sense
- This is crucial REGARDLESS of the breed
- It can be a very challenging situation when a bite occurs and in an ideal world the owner would be responsible and remain at the scene.
- they should be responsible
- Yes, if the attack is severe enough to require immediate medical assistance.
- Why wouldnt this already be in place?
- The dog is under the adults responsibility they should be responsible for the after math too
- Onus should be on owners to await by law officer if needed. Owners need to know they must ensure both parties have access to personal information
- No different than a Vehicle Accident. Ownership of the incident
- I support this; however, it is highly unlikely to be effective. Having been bit myself at an off-leash park, and my dog being bitten at an off leash park, in both instances the owner left so they could avoid getting caught.
- Much like a hit and run. Beat to stay and explain your side of the situation

- I both have dogs and have been bitten by (other) dogs. A lot can happen and it's the responsible thing for both parties to remain at the scene and get care/support from bylaws, medical, etc
 - Your dog is your responsibility. The same concept as getting into a car accident, as long as the dog will not be mistreated or seized the owner should remain at the scene to exchange information, the same as any other accident.
 - Owner should take responsibility. Not the the dogs fault. No pet should be euthanized for these reasons.....so cruel.
 - The owner is responsible for the dog
 - If the dog draws blood or worse.
 - This is a tough one. It isn't always safe to stay at the scene.
 - Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
 - "However I feel that too much emphasis is placed on ""putbill"" type dogs, these dogs are actually quite lovely. I am all for a bilaw that puts the ownus on the owner NOT the dog. Registered the owner- do a background check, make the owner attend dog training. That would eliminate so many poor pet owners alone based on the comittment.
- Yet, there are numerous unfixed male dogs that show aggressive territorial behaviour of various breeds where the owner (usually a male) has opted to not have his dog neutered. This is a big problem and there is no reason to not neuter a dog.
 - Also, small dogs tend to have more biting frequency but seem to get away with it due to their size. A biting dog is a biting dog regardless of the size. A small dog can do large damage to a child. As a responsible dog owner I am sick and tired of the prejudice that automatically comes with owning a dog over 25 pounds in this city."
 - Yes, but only if they have some place safe to keep the animal so them staying does not put the public in danger of the dog biting additional individuals or animals.
 - It encourages efficiency and responsibility.
 - Dog owners are responsible for what their dogs do. If a dog bites another animal or person, then the owner must take responsibility for the action. Breed-specific legislation takes the ownership off the owner and creates the narrative that the dog is responsible for these actions. Owners must be educated on their dog breed and their capabilities, and mandated to train them accordingly.
 - Owners need to take responsibility for their pet.
 - The dog owner should always have to remain at the scene of an incident! This should be non negotiable. Leaving something like this would be like fleeing the scene of an accident and should absolutely be against the law
 - The pet owner should have a chance to present why this incident may have occurred in order to determine what action could be taken.

- It has been my unpleasant experience that dog owners that have been involved in any kind of illegal bylaw activity with their dog are often very hostile and abusive to other citizens (parties) but will not provide information about themselves or their dog(s) when politely requested to do so.
- If the owner leaves the scene, how else will information be exchanged or details of the incident from both sides be provided to any enforcement officers on scene?
- The injured party should be compensated aka vet bills
- This likely would be hard to enforce.
- The dog owner should be responsible for the actions of their dog which may involve fines, obedience classes, etc. Just like a vehicular accident, you should need to stay at the scene to determine next steps with an enforcement officer.
- "The owner of the dog can control his/her pet while an officer discovers the cause of the problem.
- Dogs will become more compliant generally when the owner is present and the officer does not intervene on his/her own."
- Many stories of dog park incidents includes the owners driving away and there is no way to determine who they are.
- If your child steals something and you drive them home knowing they did it, you're an accomplice. Pretty simple.
- Any person who owns an animal is responsible for that animal. The only reason that the owner should leave the scene is if the animal requires medical attention, however contact information should be exchanged
- If you own a dog, regardless of its history or breed, you should be fully accountable for all of its actions, good or bad. The dogs lack of training or socialization isn't the dogs fault, it is however the owners fault is they do not take the proper steps to insure a dog is safe to be around whether it be leashed or in an off leash area. If you hit someone with your car it isn't their fault or the cars fault and its illegal to hit and run, the same should apply to dog bites or attacks.
- People leaving before the conclusion of the matter should be treated like those involved in a hit and run
- Be a responsible owner.
- Just as in any other accident or incident, people need to swap identification.
- Pets are the responsibility of the owner.
- The owner is responsible for any bites, and should remain at the scene until enforcement officers have collected information.
- It's obvious - the dog owner must take responsibility for their dog's actions that harm others. They should pay vet bills, medical costs and time off work if necessary.
- Owners should be held responsible and be accountable for sharing their information with the other owner.
- Dogs behaviour is based on training not breed you [removed] idiots
- The dog owners need to be held accountable fir their dogs actions. Also contact information is necessary if the victim needs to press charges.

- Yes! So many times the owners DOES NOT stay at the scene. But There is no way to enforce this! My dad was bit and the owner was as vicious as the dog! If the owner leaves the scene, they should be charged an additional fine. But how can this ever be ligitamite. It's very unfortunate.
- Because any one can have their dog bitten I have seen fights between lots of small dogs
- too often we see the owner grab his dog and run
- Like a car accident, it should have proper documentation
- should be similar to any accident situation where persons in question should remain at the scene to talk with officials.
- All dog owner's must be present to provide all the facts.
- It's no different then a car accident
- The owner is responsible for their dog.
- depends on the severity of the attack
- It would help expedite the process.
- I believe this a good idea because there is always a reason for a bite. It gives the owners or persons a chance to address both sides of the story.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their pet, and need to be accountable (ultimately it is the pet owner and not the dog that is responsible for their pet's actions). This is no different than a driver who hits another vehicle or pedestrian who must remain at the scene.
- I only support staying if the animal involved bites a person or child, or the animals involved are severely injured. Playful bites misconstrued as attacks should be left alone.
- A responsible owner would stay & deal with the situation. The ones that take off are the problem.
- Both sides of a story are required to understand the event. As well as witnesses. Observing the behavior of the animal in question is also important. A bite or attack can be traumatic, but could also be a minor event.
- promotes responsibility and accountability on the part of the owner, and permits easier follow up if owner needs to be contacted later
- If my dog is attacked and needs a vet the owner of the dog that bite is paying the vet bill,
- Except when the dog has to be removed for the safety of others. In this case, the dog owner must return to the scene.
- it is important to have the information shared so that the enforcement poeple can keep track of dogs that have more than one incident. And also to educate the owner that they need to take action in respect of behavior training. I have seen many people shrug it off when their dog bites another dog.
- The owner is responsible for the dog.
- People bitten by pets require medical care which all of us pay for. That cost should be covered by the pet own.
- If they don't remain at the scene of the incident the dog might not be properly identified
- If you've got a [removed] dog (likely because you're a [removed] owner) you shouldn't be able to hit and run bite.
- Owners are 100% responsible and liable for dogs actions

- they are responsible for the dog, much like leaving the scene of a vehicle accident, the owner needs to stay at the scene of the bite incident
- It's the same as being involved in a car accident. Owners are responsible.
- It's similar to a car accident. Law abiding citizens will stay and exchange contact information or wait for the police to arrive in that situation and it should be upheld in other situations where someone could be hurt.
- Follow up medical care may be required and the owner should be aware of this.
- I do not believe this requires clarification.
- This is analogous to a motor vehicle accident. We do not allow drivers to leave the scene. You control a car and you control a dog.
- The dog could be sick
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs. The same rule should apply to cats.
- So the person or animal who was bit can seek appropriate medical care by knowing the dogs medical/vaccine history. Also, so the dog can be added as a nuisance and receive adequate support, training, & care and so the owner can be held responsible.
- Common sense tells me an owner should stay on scene and take responsibility.
- They are responsible.
- It's just fair
- Not doing so takes the accountability away from the dog owner
- Everyone should train their dogs and if they fail to and something happens. They need to be responsible.
- Ethically the right thing to do just as you would at the scene of a traffic accident
- So each party can present what happened and the officer can see the animals shortly after the incident
- Responsible pet ownership is being accountable in the situation if at fault, or not at fault.
- It gets rid of the risk of trading false information (i.e. phone number and name)
- Anyone involved should be required to stay at the scene, and if the person who was victim of the incident can speak they should. Both parties should be able to explain themselves without interruption.
- All dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs behaviour. This includes small breed dogs that are not under control and may cause inappropriate interaction if not managed properly by either party
- common sense
- The owner should be responsible if there is an injury to another dog-pay for vet bills or assist if a person received a dog bite
- If there is an incident both owners should be required to be present to discuss with officer. Exceptions may be required if one dog needs immediate medical attention.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their animals actions. Or be held accountable. Or be banned from having animals if they aren't going to be responsible for their animal.

- But how would you enforce this "hit and run". This happened to my brother and my dog when my pomeranian ended up in a chow chow's mouth. My bro was too concerned about the well-being of my dog to stick around and try to convince the other dog owner to give her information. When she refused and scurried off, he had no other option than to get to the vet asap and file a report once he was able to. Introduce a fine for failure to remain at the scene of an incident just like for a hit and run.
- While dog bites can be a very traumatic incident for both the dog and the owner, it is a pet owner's responsibility to stay on scene and be responsible for their pet, no matter the situation.
- This helps the victim and can lead to the owner at fault being charged
- This is just like remaining at the scene of an automobile collision, except there should be no ability for the dog owner to leave since tracking them down would be difficult. The term "if necessary" is ambiguous - delete.
- Many owners disappear and are only tracked down by license plates. Yes, they must stay or be fined for a 'bite and run'.
- while this may be impossible to enforce with some people it should already be a rule.
- same as a car accident, if the involved can exchange information and sort the issue out themselves there is no need for enforcement. It should be treated similar to leaving a scene if not.
- People should be held accountable for their pets actions
- Absolutely the owner needs to be held responsible for the actions of their pet
- Absolutely. If owners refuse to take responsibility for their dog's action, there should be further fines.
- Unless takes forever to get to the scene. (Time limit)
- I heard on the news about a dog that was attacked by another dog. The attacking dog and owner left. This creates more time and effort to track them down. They should stay.
- Yes absolutely must remain in scene unless one needed immediate medical attention
- they should give said animal's owner their info however not to an officer unless their animal is the one injured.
- You are responsible for what your pet does and there needs to be follow-up!
- The owner must be responsible for their dog's behaviour
- It's the right thing to do, especially if the bite injury is significant. If the owner must absolutely leave, I wouldn't suggest any punishment so long as the owner made sure that the victim is OK with it, doesn't need help tending to the injury, and the contact info they gave was accurate to resolve the situation at a later date.
- Yes, this makes the rule similar to a vehicle accident. If you are in a vehicle accident you are required by law to share your contact information with the other party in the event of injury or damage. The same should apply to your dog (your property) damaging someone else in a vicious manner. By adding this rule to the bylaw will help put more responsibility on owners to follow the rules.
- I think that the victim should get the owner's number in case any medical problems involving the bite appear but I don't think dogs should be euthanized

- If a dog is injured and the owner doesn't have pet insurance or the cost of going to the vet isn't covered fully by insurance the owner of the dog that bit should pay vet fees. If a dog bites a person and punctures the skin the person will want vaccine records and possibly get authorities involved.
- Owners need to be fully responsible for their pets.
- It's sensible. If it was a person to person incident, all parties would be required to stay to speak with an officer. Same thing should apply to animal incidents, dog AND cat.
- It's like any accident or incident requiring police assistance
- Good dog owners would have no problem with this.
- One cannot go away from the scene without giving details to the victim.
- This should be included in the bylaw. My husband and I have both been bitten when walking in Evergreen Estates and Fish Creek Park. This is unacceptable and there should be consequences for the Dog owner
- I am from a rural community and grew up with dogs. However, when I was a young mother on maternity leave I would be reluctant to visit parks here with my children without being in large group specifically because of reported dog attacks. One time my child ran through a park and a dog grabbed his mitten as part of a chase game. His hand was saved as it was my own large mitten. The owner was inexperienced and unable to control the dog. A different breed would have been better and she should have been vetted (for her ability, she was more upset than I was).
- A responsible owner would do this because the victim would not know if the dog had all its shots especially the rabies shot.
- If they do not stay then it is a crime and should be charged for leaving scene of a crime
- Often the problem with a dog has more to do with the owner than the dog. Owners need to be accountable for their pet's behaviour.
- I thought this was already in place as it is a common courtesy. The owner of any pet needs to be fully responsible and accountable for that animal. It's all about respect for one another. Dog owners are terrible this way in my experience. It's always your fault when their animal acts aggressively, and they rudely dismiss you when you ask them to leash their dog on a public street. I stay away from off leash areas and ask that you keep your dog on leash outside of those areas. Definitely don't dismiss me when I ask you to keep your snarling dog away from me. The animal is your responsibility, take care of it!
- Dog could have injuries and a discussion needs to take place
- However, this would require cooperation from the owner, which doesn't always happen, especially if the owner knows this could be the last straw before the dog is put down (or is not the first offence)
- There could be just cause that the owner should share their version of events. Was the dog provoked despite multiple warnings by the owner to the plaintiff?
- They are responsible for egos actions.
- That's just good pet ownership. It's the same for hit and runs.
- In case follow up is required post incident.
- They need to be take responsibility for the actions of their pet

- The owner is responsible for the behavior of their dog, they should do what they can to assist in the situation
- To hold owner accountable for their dog's actions.
- Obviously any responsible owner would.
- Absolutely yes, and I'm a little concerned this type of rule doesn't already exist
- Criminal offence if they leave the scene
- Is this not already a law?? Would this not count as fleeing the scene of a crime??
- If you were involved in a traffic accident, to leave the scene would be wrong, I feel that this is a similar situation
- This is common sense. My dog was attacked and bitten last winter by another dog in an off leash park, and we did not have any time to examine my dog before the other owner left. It ended up costing a couple of hundred dollars for my dog's vet bill as she needed a couple of stitches and medication. The vet costs associated with even a minor injury or trauma inflicted by another dog are substantial and not everyone can afford this.
- I believe animals are a product of their environment meaning if a animal bites someone the person who owns said animal must be held accountable.
- If I own a car and I injure someone, it's my duty to stay until a police officer comes, no?
- Yes, it is appropriate and responsible for an owner to remain at the scene to ensure that the circumstances are fully understood and the owner is identified and takes responsibility for the incident.
- More owner responsibility for aggressive dog behavior
- It's like any injury accident. All stakeholders and witnesses need to stay for veracity to be determined.
- Owners need to be held responsible. It should be no different than leaving the scene of a car accident
- That person needs to take responsibility for the action of their pet. Many times, it's not the animal's fault, it's the human's fault (they haven't trained them, use them for protection, etc). The person should be held accountable and not just the animal and should also pay the bills of whoever their animal may have injured.
- responsibility of the owner to be present to answer questions and to follow up with appropriate response to the situation
- Owner must be available for contact information take responsibility of medical expenses.
- As long as the owner can keep their animal under control, they should remain at the scene. If they cannot, they should give their phone contact to victim/witness if necessary.
- Health concerns and/or treatments should involve both parties to ensure all affected persons and animals are treated and the cost should not fall solely on a victim or victims owner.
- The dog should be euthanized. The owner should receive a criminal charge and severe fines.
- Often the owner takes off and should be fined for leaving the scene.
- The owner should take responsibility and share any information needed. Their dog could pass on an illness that the other person/owner would need to know about.

- The owner should be required to remain at the scene in case, eg, veterinary care is needed for the injured animal in which case the cost of such should fall on the offending dog's owner, and whether animal or person attacked the owner should be advised of possible liability issues.
- A tribunal could be biased on this issue
- Records of these incidents could help to keep an eye on potential problematic dogs, and get them and their owners the resources needed to begin rehabilitating the dog. I do not think a dog who bites automatically needs to be euthanized, but dogs can cause damage, even without meaning to, and a biting incident that causes bodily harm to another animal or person warrants further investigation.
- How is this not already a rule!??
- People need to take responsibility for their actions and their dogs.
- I do however recognize the need for an owner to remove their dog from the situation to prevent further challenges rather than remaining present. I don't think this is a either or situation.
- people need to take responsibility and give important information about the dog. Shits ect
- You are responsible for the situation
- Yes, an owner should have to stay at the scene especially if there are injuries. This gives enforcement officers a better chance of getting all the info they need to handle the situation efficiently.
- [personal information removed]
- We are dog owners and have seen incidents were there has been dog fights and the owner does not care or it is not my fault. They often are too busy on their phone and not paying attention.
- Unless self-defense.
- Need info about the dog. Should be recorded by bylaw
- It's a part of Responsible pet ownership.
- "It would be no different than remaining at the scene of a motor vehicle accident. The owner needs to be able to stay and accept responsibility or defend their animal.
- Having agreed to this, I also think it is imperative to remove the animal from the scene as there would likely be a lot of distress to both the animal and individual bitten."
- They should pay for the medical if one but this has to be a types of dog
- Owners should be responsible for their pets actions, and should remain on site when altercations occur (no hit and run incidents allowed)
- We require it for automobile accidents--why not for animals. My only reservation is that it might be necessary to get the offending dog out of the way fast.
- It is important to know the dogs history, has there been a past history of biting and are all the dogs vaccines up to date.
- This rule would hold the owner accountable to its animal's behaviour.
- Owners should be responsible for the behaviour of their dog, not the dog
- They aren't likely to stick around if they think their dog is going to be "arrested". The enforcement officer should provide information but not be a threat.

- I think this is important to have dogs prone to biting known. I think this is also important to reinforce with smaller dogs. In my experience smaller dogs bite more but because the damage is smaller people do not take it seriously. If a small dog bites a large dog and the large dog retaliates I feel the small dog owner should be held responsible.
- If your dog attacks another dog at an off leash dog park you are liable for the other dogs vet bills 100%
- Yes there should be an exchange of personal information. However, if it is unsafe to keep the animals at the incident they should be allowed to remove the animal from the situation.
- If they are not required to stay, many would leave, and we would potentially never get their name address etc. They could also be charged with leaving a scene.
- Take responsibility of ownership; if you own the dog, you're responsible for controlling its behaviour, so need to be accountable.
- the owner should remain on to answer questions. If owner does not wait then they do not seem like they are not responsible enough to own a dog. We have to be responsible for our own dogs.
- too many cases where the dogs owner leaves, thus requiring a search.
- Owner responsibility.
- How is this different than leaving the scene of a car accident? If something happened, the owner should remain at the scene if safe to do so, i.e. dog is able to calm down, no one physically attacks the dog owner in a fit of rage.
- Unless they need to remove the animal for safety
- If a dog bites a human it should be reported. If it happens again then there is a pattern and the dog should be put down
- If a dog bites they should absolutely be responsible for at least an explanation and required to share their information.
- Our dog had a side of his flesh bitten off by another dog at the off leash park, they were very apologetic but when we asked them to share the vet bill they denied it was their dog. This would have been mitigated if there was a clearer process of gathering information. We simply do not take our dog to the off leash anymore...
- Share info yes. Wait for a bylaw person no.
- This would benefit all parties. Communication at the outset would help to determine if the dog biting incident was a total anomaly or not, and the circumstances leading to the bite.
- I believe individuals do not report all dog bites. This is important to know that it is not just pitbulls. Just because smaller breeds have less of a mark doesn't mean it shouldn't be showcased.
- Otherwise it is too easy for the person to disappear and not be held accountable. Also if a child is bitten someone should stay with them. At minimum they should be required to show the victim official ID so information can be recorded.
- If someones pet causes harm it should be the responsibility of the pet owner to take responsibility and mitigate the consequences.
- It's the owners dog and their responsibility
- Same as any accident.

- It is important for dog owners to take responsibility for their dog's behaviour; talking to victim/victim's owner/enforcement officer would increase accountability in following bylaws
- Not necessarily they always have to remain on the scene (there might be circumstances where this is not possible), but definitely there should be a rule enforcing that the parties involved should talk to the enforcement officer whether at the location or somewhere else.
- That is just common sense responsibility.
- A responsible dog owner would be willing to do the right thing with the dog no matter the breed or size
- Dog owner should remain on scene to take ownership, give details so there can be disciplinary action.
- To keep the animal safe from unnecessary persecution
- Unless the dog needs immediate veterinary care (even if this is the biting dog) and the owner of the biting dog as well as the dog is not in danger of abuse by any bystanders etc the owner should be allowed to safely confine the dog and then be responsible to share their information
- Just like in a car accident, everyone who is involved should stay on scene and provide contact information to the other parties, and officers if applicable.
- Owners should be held accountable for the actions of the animals that they choose to be responsible for
- I think they should have to share their information, however if they dog is at large and does not have a lead - it may be a further risk to keep the animal near humans/ animals. It should be an offence not to leave your details to the owner of the animal your dog attacked - or the human it attacked.
- only if safe to do so. removing the dog from the site may be required to be safe for all in the area
- Yes because of a person or another animal is injured the responsible party should be held liable for medical expenses so you would need their contact information.
- Yes, otherwise owner can just walk away with dog and not be held accountable.
- This is proper owner accountability and the right thing to do.
- Unless an imminent injury occurs either animal or owner that needs immediate medical intervention
- The dog owner needs to be accountable for their dog's behaviour.
- This at least supports responsibility/responsible behaviour and expectations from the owner.
- "Just like a car accident, it a accident they happen. The owner needs to take responsibility of any incident that occurs.
- Just as parents are responsible for their children's behaviour, same rule should apply to the pet you have raised."
- Owners are responsible for their pets. It is necessary to get their information and heir side of the story.
- Yes, as long as the dog is at no risk of being put down.
- Just like in a car accident you have the right to take photo evidence and too get contact and insurance information.
- The Owner should be held responsible for such an event. These types of situations usually happen because of lack of training or poor training. This is the Owner's responsibility, not the dogs.

- I think it's crucial for the dog owner to remain at the scene, not only to take responsibility for their dog's actions, but to also give their account of events as sometimes non-aggressive dogs can act aggressively when threatened or under severe stress. It is important for all relevant information to be considered when dealing with such cases.
- The owner should face serious consequences if they leave a scene where their dog has bitten another dog or person without leaving contact information.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their pet's behavior - pay victim's pet bills, take obedience classes, etc.
- People just run away. I've seen it a zillion times
- Part of responsible pet ownership is being accountable for your pet's behaviour
- you can't make me
- If there is veterinary or doctor care involved, one needs the contact information. If my dog were to bite someone, I would want this information in order to follow up with them.
- I believe dogs that pose an obvious threat should be dealt with but bully breeds are targeted at disproportionate rates and as a dog groomer bullies are my favorite dogs to work with they are sweet babies
- Yes, remain on the scene after the situation only if it has been deescalated and there is no further risk of incident, ie they can remain a safe distance and the other party isn't engaging with them
- Depending on the severity of the bite. If there was little to no blood I don't think it should apply.
- This supports responsible, accountable pet ownership.
- I have been chased and bitten before. Dog owners need to know that they are accountable for their pet's behaviour.
- Responsibility of being a dog owner should be to deal with any issues that the dog causes.
- No different than a car accident. The owner needs to take responsibility for their (or their pet's) actions.
- The owner needs to take responsibility of their dog and its actions when something occurs, especially since many aggressive dogs were trained to be aggressive or were mistreated by owners. At a car crash, it's required that both parties stay at the scene to give information and their side of the story to police. It would be a good idea to enforce a similar rule with animal attacks.
- If the attackee was threatening the owner, they'd wanna be there to explain why the dog attacked
- Animal control must fine the offending owner & ensure they pay for any vet bills. Animal control to assess animal to prevent any further attacks, ultimately the offending dog owner must take responsibility
- It's just like a car accident. You need to preserve evidence.
- You have to remain at the scene of any other crime why not this one.
- The owner is at fault, as much as the dog. The owner needs to be held responsible for their dog, and needs to remain at the scene.
- If any accident takes place and the victim sees fit the owner should be willing to speak to authorities
- Similar to a car crash, remain at the scene.
- The owner should be held accountable if their pet injures someone or is poorly trained

- To provide info.
- Any dog bites from any dog can hurt so then if any dog bites someone and it breaks skin and they get a infection they can contact them
- Obviously, you wouldn't leave a scene of a car accident
- The dog owner must defend their dog. Innocent till proven guilty!
- Like with all accidents, they should have to stay until everything is cleared.
- It will help solve dog attack or bite incidents .
- i think they need to explain what happend
- The police officer should Not be allowed to put the dog down at this time.
- Responsibility.
- The owner needs to see the severity of the bite, and understand that their dog needs more training.
- If it was the owners fault I think they should if the other person was teasing the dog or hurting it / of the owner warns that it may bite I dont think they should.
- It shows a responsible Owner who is committed to the Welfare of theirs and others dogs by staying where an incident took place.
- If necessary makes the question a bit vague. But yes, loosely, a dog owner (guardian) should take responsibility for their dog's behaviour.
- I have a small, friendly toy poodle, and the amount of times aggressive dogs have cornered him, harassed him, or become more aggressive such as attempting to bite him occur on the daily whenever we go to the off leash areas. I am incredibly worried that he will be significantly injured one of these days, but the amount of owners that do nothing to stop their dog, recall their dog, or even address the situation is astounding. The most I get during these situations from the aggressive dogs owner is either an "I'm sorry" or nothing at all. I would heavily encourage a bylaw to enforce the exchange of information or the involvement of an officer during these situations.
- If someone dog exhibits violent behavior, the owner should be held responsible and provide contact information in the case that medical treatment is necessary
- They must be responsible for their pet, same as if they pooped
- This requirement supports accountability.
- The owner tends to be at fault when the dog bites. Either by training the dog poorly or abusing it.
- Definition of bite would need to be clarified
- Dogs do not bite un-aggravated - both the victims and the owner of the dog deserve a chance for the situation to be fully explained at the time of the incident
- similar to a mv accident, I would consider it, leaving the scene of a crime. punishable by appropriate fines, charges etc.
- This is responsible pet ownership
- The owner needs to be able to give context and also take responsibility.
- Of course they should stay at the scene, just like a car accident.
- To me it's no different then hitting someone in a car. Your dog is your property therefore your responsibility. I fully support having to remain on scene.

- Yes needs to be like a car accident. Both sides of the story are written down
- They need to be there in order to be able to pay for medical or vet bills if needed.
- The dog owner should be responsible for the pet fees. If no enforcement officer is there, the dog owner with the aggressive dog might not take responsibility
- Dog guardians should remain at the scene and responsible ones will, however it is the irresponsible ones that have allowed or trained their dogs, regardless of breed, to bite and they will run like the cowards they are.
- It is responsible and fair especially if the bite led to severe consequences (ex. Surgery or vet care).
- It's important to take responsibility
- Of course you need to do this in case the person who was attacked needs to go to the doctor. Owners need to be responsible for their pet's actions.
- Too often people run away. The same as an accident stay at the scene until police arrives or exchange information.
- As a pet owner you should be responsible for your pet.
- The owner should be able to plead the case of the dog if it were an accident or a false charge
- Yes treat it like a car accident scene.
- How else will the responsible owner/dog be identified? It also provides the owner with an opportunity to tell their side of the story
- Both parties must remain at scene. I have a large dog and had a small dog not on leash attached my dog. In my opinion my dog should have eaten the small dog because the small dog was the issue.
- But with understanding the owner may need to step away to deal with the animal but will return or information exchanged.
- This will hold the dog owner accountable should their dog bite.
- You need all sides of a story to make a well informed decision on what should happen next.
- If your dog bites someone you should be held accountable but the dog should not be but down for this
- The owner has to take responsibility and should be connected with appropriate trainers/vets and should be checked up on that they have.
- I think that they should
- There should be a report filled and a plan to be carried out for all involved.
- Dog owners are ultimately responsible for behaviour and should be held accountable
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- People need to be held accountable for what happened just like for everything else
- Feel like it's important as a dog owner to be responsible for your dogs actions
- Allow option in lesser incidences for the enforcement officer to deem it ok to contact both parties later.
- I don't see a problem with that as long as it is safe for the animal/owner to do so. Also, as long as the responding officer isn't going to cause harm to animal, example by gunfire.

- If this is acceptable in car accidents it should be with animals it doesn't Matter if it's a dog a cat or a pet rat
- It's common sense
- The dog is the owners responsibility and if it harms a person, it is responsible to share contact details.
- They can tell you about the medical history of said animal
- I would have believed this to be a rule (and common courtesy). Of a pet owner should have to stay!
- This should be law.. we insist on this for a motor accident.. if flesh has been torn, why would it not be the case to remain at the scene.
- The owner must give a statement to the police, so that if necessary a arrest of the person at fault.
- There should be a significant fine for leaving the scene. Not penalty now in place so many people just disappear.
- the parties to the incident must provide complete info to bylaw officer who will make a report tracking the dogs involved. If the incident is serious, insurance companies may need a copy of report. Only require a written report if blood has been drawn or one animal is severely injured.
- The owner must be responsible
- Yes, if your dog causes physical harm you should take responsibility of what happened and take action to resolve the situation. Similar to what you would do if you rear ended someone, you should share your information after you place your dog away in a safe place for both parties.
- I support the rule because I think it would be a good idea for the owner to stay at the scene to prevent any confusion and allow for further steps to be taken right away.
- The owner is responsible for the dog
- So many times it's a he said, she said situation. It makes it so much easier if the owner stays and actually understands what the issue has been.
- If necessary in my mind would mean that the wound would need medical attention
- I believe that dog owner, of ANY breed, should take responsibility for their pet's actions
- Sharing contact information with the person or owner of the dog that was bitten is appropriate and responsible owners would do so.
- No thanks
- It is the owner's responsibility to train their dogs to behave in public. A dog should not be held accountable for a lack of training by the owner.
- hold the owner accountable for the dog's actions
- Because it's responsible thing to do. On the other hand this must apply to all dogs not one breed.
- Same as hit and run. Why wouldn't offender stay put
- they should have to stay and exchange contact information if the other person wants to press charges
- It should be common sense
- The owner should stay at the scene! Most often, a dog is being prevoked, Be it a little child tugging on them, or an adult trying to get a rise of of them, but because the dog can't explain what happened, the owner should be able to explain his side of the situation. Maybe the prevolker should be fined!

- If I got bit by a dog that would be a result of poor training by the owner I would like them to stay and explain to the officer what happened
- Unless veterinary measures are needed for both dogs
- To explain to the acting officer what happened from their point of view.
- People need to take responsibility for their and there pets actions.
- To me, this is just as the same as a hit and run, which is not legal. Why shouldn't the same criteria apply to dog owners who have harmed someone.
- If a dog bites another animal or person, the owner who likely trained said dog should be held atleast partly accountable.
- In case victim wants to file a lawsuit
- Information may not be gathered otherwise.
- The owner should partly take responsibility for their dog, unless they cannot controll their dog
- Owners need to be responsible for the actions of their pets.
- Of course they should stay at the scene. This is common sense
- All kinds of dogs will scrap and nip at each other with no impact to either animal. Over zealous pet owners will bog down your system for no reason. People really have no business approaching other animals and they typically react out of a feeling of being threatened. responsible pet owners will be the only ones remaining on site. The ones who are dirt bags will leave anyways so the rule is irrelevant. Punish the extreme cases.
- It should be similar to a car crash that results in injury. In order to protect the victim
- It makes sense if someone was injured then the person responsible should stay and make sure they are all right and dog owners are responsible for their dogs.
- Only if necessary or severe
- But in certain situations it may be best for everyone if the offending dog is removed from the area immediately. At least leaving contact information should be a requirement.
- They should stay if its needed
- "Similar to a hit and run
- All parties and any witnesses should fill out reports"
- Vet records would be required for a doctor or vet.
- If it is safe for everyone to stay at the scene I support this, however, if it is unsafe for any party, contact information should be shared at the scene then later contact an enforcement officer.
- that is the right thing to do
- The owners must be held accountable as you would be if it was a car accident
- The owner is the only responsible for any incident. The animals are not aware of the laws, the owners are (must)
- Owners should be responsible for their dogs, even if the pet acts differently in public than at home.
- It's basic human respect

- Well if the person runs off then how's the person who got Attacked supposed to get compensation for their sustained injuries?
- If a person takes out an aggressive dog, or cannot get their dog under control they should be held responsible for their dog's actions
- To me this is obvious
- the owner is responsible for their dog
- A dog who bites someone is normally taught by owner. This shows the owner is abusive, and should not take hold of pets.
- That should be required as a responsibility of dog ownership.
- They were responsible for the dog and they may need to pay for any medical bills.
- They could possibly be put on a specific diet
- It would be like if someone was to get into an accident. Both parties should remain at the scene.
- Too many people take off when their dog bites
- If a dog bites then it should be reported
- "Last year I witnessed a pitbull attack a small dog, and then the pitbull went after its owner as it tried to pull the pitbull off the small dog. This was downtown, near eau claire on the river path. I called 911, along with other witnesses. 911 said they would send police and an ambulance as the pitbull owner got severely bit on the leg by his own dog. Neither the police nor ambulance showed up. I stayed on the line with the 911 operator (other witnesses did as well) and followed the pitbull owner, as he limped away from the scene and walked down the river path to flee the scene and yelled explicit words at witnesses. The small dog owner rushed her mauled small dog out of the park to take it to a vet. Nonetheless, the owner of this vicious dog left without repercussion. The city/911 operators clearly do not take such events seriously. The only follow up was a bylaw officer phoned me SIX hours after the event, asking for a description of the offender, which I already gave to the 911 operator. If the city will not send the police or ban vicious dogs (remember the Montreal lady who was killed in her own back yard by a neighbours pitbull?), the public should have the right to defend themselves against aggressive animals with pepper spray or other means.
- In addition, is the city liable for attacks by known vicious breeds? If not, perhaps our provincial government should look at making this a reality. It would put pressure on municipal governments to take firm action on protecting the public from such dogs, rather than appeasing to those who feel the need to own such an animal. Public safety needs to come first, no exceptions."
- The owners should be held accountable for the dog's actions
- The owner of the animal who attacked should be held accountable.
- Of course they should. And if the system in place is TRULY FAIR, then it should be no problem to do so.
- Logical and responsible

- Treat dog bite like any other accident involving two parties - both should remain on scene if injuries are serious ie emergency vet and share information including address, phone and drivers license
 - What's to explain? We do this with vehicle accidents - owners should be responsible for the actions of pets.
 - Prevents unnecessary testing a treatment for the bitten party.
 - If a severe bite has taken place, it is the owner's responsibility to remove the dog from the situation to prevent it from getting worse, but also to talk with the other party and figure out why it happened and what needs to be done
 - Those who flee the scene know very well that they have no control, and haven't made an effort to do any training, and will blame the victim. I've seen it myself.
 - Like in a car accident you need to give information to police or the victim for any necessary follow up.
 - Not only required to stay at the scene, but a charge for leaving the scene much like in regard to vehicle accidents. An incident occurs, all parties should be accessible to investigation and enforcement will be able to come to some conclusions as to what happened to the best of their ability.
 - I believe that everyone should have fair chance to be heard out
 - The dog owner should remain at the scene, so they can help with the other dog's injuries, by exchanging contact information with the owner, as well as helping to pay the vet bills
 - By remaining on the scene and sharing information, it could reduce a repeat occurrence. If the owner doesn't stay, there isn't any recourse in the future.
 - Not all dog bites are the fault of the owner or dog, the bitten person could be harassing the dog and having both parties remain at the offense location can prevent false spread of information
 - It should be like a car accident. They need to deal with the outcome.
 - "If requested by the person or other dog owner.
- Depending on severity of the situation."
 - To have insurance stuff and be in reach of each other so they can talk in court to see what will happen.
 - The problem is bad owners, not dog breeds.
 - Owners should be responsible for their pets actions.
 - It is the owners fault for the actions of their dog. They have full responsibility for the fees
 - .
 - It is important to share contact information so that the injured party can be assured that all vaccinations are up to date or for any other reasons/data that might help treat any injury. Speaking to an enforcement officer can be done separate from the scene if the officer cannot show up within a reasonable time after the incident (I.e. half an hour).

- Any pet that attack a person or other pet should be looked at to ensure that pet is being taken care of and trained. If the pet is aggressive and attacks something might be going on at home
- The dog owner should give their information but also be able to move their dog to their house or otherwise away from the scene.
- The animal caused damage to another party which is a crime therefore should be treated as such
- People should only have their dogs in situations that they feel the dog is under their control since they are liable
- The owner has to take responsibility on their animals actions as it reflects their ownership.
- People must be 100% responsible for the actions of their pets
- So they can pay for injuries
- It would prevent owners from ignoring the victim.
- This only makes sense. The dog should be identified if it caused the attack, and if it was provoked the owner should be able to make that claim.
- To explain how it occurred and to be responsible for side effects
- Its your dog, you should be held responsible.
- "There are many circumstances how a bite incident can occur. Both sides should be able to - Provide their understanding of the events including any flags they observed through their dogs behaviour prior to the incident. The dog victim could have been the instigator of the event, and the dog biter could simply be responding to that provocation."
- This is part of being a responsible pet owner
- This is part of responsible dog ownership
- Too many fleeing offenders never caught
- Remaining on scene is part of being a responsible pet owner, and if your animal is involved you should be penalized if you leave.
- I see it like a car accident. All parties involved should remain and share information. Accidents happen and yes sometimes one is more at fault but that doesn't mean the other party doesn't have a part.
- if a dog bites the owner should absolutely be made responsible for medical bills etc
- If a child messes up the parent has to take responsibility, same here.
- Dog owners must be held accountable. This applies for any and all breeds. Fines should be given where necessary, and mandatory training for the dog if it is assessed and able to be rehabilitated/if the bite is Level 1-3 on the Dunbar scale.
- Of course they should stay, that should be a given. If the person/animal who was bitten, the owner of the animal that caused the bite should be responsible for any monetary damages.
- Just as in a car accident or a public dispute, leaving the scene of any incident is like a 'hit & run'. They should be able to remain at the scene to both be able to convey their side of the story and face any consequences.
- The dog issue should be about RESPONSIBLE DOG owners not pitbulls. Punish the owners!!
- if the owner leaves its like a hit and run car accident. you must remain until proper authority arrives.

- We need information to be shared. However, if staying causes continued or increased drama, best to leave, but MUST contact bylaw within 30 min. Hard to police, but if two dogs have an altercation/ you may need to leave to diffuse situation
- In all breed instances I support this, but not in only the case of pitbulls. I have seen multiple bites from other breeds, golden retrievers, labs and other non-bully breeds.
- The dog is the owners responsibility, so if the dog does do something, the owner should stick around to make sure that all the information gathered is clear and correct.
- This would increase the likelihood of the owner being held accountable for their dog's actions.
- Of course. Do you want to be bitten by a random dog? This happened to our family and we had a very useful, courteous discussion with the dog owner. We needed to know if the dog was up to date with its rabies shots.
- This way the proper breed, owner information, shots, insurance, everything is recorded by a professional with a calm and cool head
- Yes and No. If attack is severe and injury has occurred an independent review and assessment of the incident should occur. If possible pet owners should be educated as to how to prevent incidents in the future. I have a dog that has food aggression. Years ago as new dog owner we didn't understand what was driving the behaviour and how to manage it. We had a couple of aggression situations after which we sought professional help to educate ourselves and our dog. We were able to understand what drove the behaviour, how to look for early warning signs, how to manage the behaviour and learned what situations to avoid. This is learning that we will take forward to future dog ownership and share with other dog owners. Since we sought help - we have not had any further issues.
- They should be there
- A dog biting another dog, or a person is a form of assault. As such, I think we owe it to the victim to treat it seriously.
- It is important to find out if this is a one-time event or if the dog has been involved in any other incidences. A repeat offender needs to be held accountable.
- Owner needs to be accountable. Often considerable costs are involved which owner of dog who has bitten should cover.
- It's the same as a car accident, if your insurance needs to get involved you should wait and share that information
- I agree with a caveat that upon mutual agreement the offending dog can leave the scene. If there is evidence of taunting or attack by the other party they should also stay at the scene.
- Owners that are involved in a dog attack should have to remain at the scene to supply information in the dog shot records. People can not leave the scene of an accident (otherwise called a hit and run). So animal owners should not flee the scene of an offence in case
- Because, they would be fleeing from a crime scene, after all it is their dog
- I have seen owners leave without providing any information after their dog has attacked and/or injured another dog.

- Remaining at the scene until a enforcement officer arrives provides an account from both sides with an impartial party.
- no
- It isn't fair to the dog to be held back for that. The other creature/ person must have done something to upset the dog:
- If a dog bite that causes serious physical or emotional damage occurs then the owner should take liability and come to an agreement with the victim
- No different than the requirement to remain on scene after any accident.
- This should be mandatory because there may be medical costs that should be covered by the dog owner and dog medical history may be required
- If the owners dog has bitten someone, they should be required to stay and take responsibility for the actions of their dog.
- 2 sides to every story, the owner of the biter and the owner of the bitten should remain on scene.
- People have to take responsibility for their animals' behaviour. If all dog owners had to get their animal trained before they could get a City license, we would have far fewer problems.
- I think it is important for a owner to stay at the scene so the responding officer can get the complete story
- I believe it is important that the person remain so long as it's safe to do so. If someone hit your car you'd expect they stay, this shouldn't be any different.
- If the bite is severe enough
- So everyone can share their side of the story and resolve the conflict.
- They should be punished for a dog bite, not the dog.
- Taking accountability for the poor training of the dog is ideal.
- Well the city is creating a completely opinionated bylaw for now reason. If a Pit Bull has to deal with this so should every dog there.
- Absolutely, too many owners giving bogus contact info to the victim- from personal experience
- It should be treated like any other scene of accident.
- And the owner must pay veterinary bills for bites their dog inflicted. Too often people flee the scene where their dog bit another dog, as they are clearly accustomed to the occurrence
- I think dog bites are the responsibility of the owner and NOT a reflection of the breed. This is unfair and unhelpful discrimination
- This should be another way to enforce responsible pet ownership
- I don't think it needs explaining
- No worse than leaving a car accident without sharing contact information. Someone was hurt you need to stay and ensure they are okay and deal with the responsibility of the fact your dog bit a person or other animal.
- The owner should be responsible for what their dog does
- If the dog bites someone and the owner flees, the victim may try to spin the story from what it actually is

- I do think that the owner should have a chance to explain/give information to the person who has been attacked by the animal.
- If a dog harms someone the owner must be held responsible
- Owner should be held accountable
- As the driver of a vehicle that hits someone, something etc you're required to stay as you're in care and control of the vehicle. As a pet owner you're in care and control, thus the same standard applies.
- More often than not the dog was provoked and a bylaw official can better explain
- Any good pet owner would stay where the incident happened to make sure the person was ok, an exception would be to put the animal in a secure place where it isn't able to attack anyone else
- People need to take responsibility for their pet's actions.
- Very necessary
- If the dog has bitten a person or other animal it should be looked into. They should remain at the scene to at least provide information and talk if necessary. If the incident is minor I don't think this is a requirement
- You don't have a clear policy and system in place to report now. Keeping people in pets in place in a high volatile situation can be recipe for secondary or ongoing incident. Who are they waiting for? What is the response time?
- At a safe distance, it's important to share contact info. They may need to take photos or video which should only be shared with enforcement officers. They may need to go home and talk to enforcement officer at a later time if they can't be contacted or arrive in a timely manner.
- It makes it more difficult to ensure that insurance would be exchanged and that matters were cleared up between the owner and victim if the owner can leave at any time.
- Owners need to take full responsibility for their pets, and not shrug off what might be a terrifying ordeal for the other party.
- It's being a decent person
- It is important! As a dog owner myself, I am responsible for it's behavior or any incident it's involved in.
- If a dog bites a person or another animal, the owner should be responsible for any payments related to injuries (i.e. vet bills, Physio etc).
- This will avoid the "He said, she said" issue. However, sometimes a dog owner does not discover that their dog was bitten until later. There should be a large fine if someone refuses to share information.
- If there is a vet visit involved the owner of the dog should cover the bill if their dog is at fault
- They have a right to explain what the situation was. Provide medical support to the other person/animal if needed. And promise to go to behavior classes for their dog.
- "Definitely so both sides of the story can be heard and also hopefully there would be some witnesses to see what happened. If the biting animal causes injury, their owner should have to pay for vet costs for the injured animal they bit.
- As well any damages if the dog bites a human should be paid by the offending animals owner."

- Best to engage owners about their dog and make sure they are accountable.
- Yes if there is a biting incident the owner and dog should remain at the scene and wait for authorities. This is responsible ownership
- Accountability
- Just like a car accident there is liability and responsibility. Allow a owner to leave to crate or bring home the aggressive dog but make him call the authorities or return to the scene.
- If an owner has not put in the training for their dog they are responsible for how it acts in public. It's the same as teaching someone to drive. You are responsible for them.
- I feel it would be best to have the owner there to explain. As no one knows the dog better than the owner
- Yes, provided there is injury.
- If they are required by law to stay at the scene, it will make it easier to access the situation.
- The owner does need to take responsibility for their dogs actions
- Should be common decency. Car accident you must remain so should this.
- ? Yes is self explanatory.
- if someone or something is injured, the owner o the dog should stay to be able to provide any needed information to police officers and medical staff. if the dog is up to date on their shots, has any conditions hey could give to others, etc;.
- Yes, but only if they are willing to press charges.
- Yes
- Can potentially shorten time needed for investigation
- The dog owner should remain, similarly to if they were in a car accident
- It seems only fair if the owner was irresponsible enough to not contain an aggressive dog (WHICH IS NOT DEPENDENT ON THE BREED, IT IS DEPENDENT ON THE PERSONALITY) that they should take responsibility for the damage caused.
- Just like a car accident people need to take accountability
- Yes like any incident the owner of an animal or person responsible for the accident should stay with the victim in case they are needed when authorities arrive.
- People are responsible for their animals and their actions no matter the breed.
- Responsible ownership.
- An owner needs to be responsible for their pet.
- You'd probably need to discuss what the recipient of the bit would want as well as your wants
- They need to be held accountable and so need to be able to be contacted/found
- Yes if the bite is severe
- Why would they run away and not take responsibility?
- "I think it's important to
- Get both sides"
- I don't see it as any different than if there was a car accident. The owner must stay and take responsibility/exchange information.

- The dog owner needs to be accountable for their animals behaviour.
- This is common practice in regards to other damage offences (eg. Automotive accidents, etc)
- I view it as no difference than a car accident
- The owner of the dog should have to be responsible to answer for their dogs actions
- If there is blood.
- Dog owners must be held responsible for damage inflicted by their dog up to and including financial compensation
- I agree with owners having to be responsible for their pets. I do not agree with breed specific rules etc. It is not the breeds, it is the irresponsible owners.
- But how do you plan on policing that? I have watched people run away and other chase after and not catch them - are you planning on having designated by-law officers at every dog park for 12 shifts to ensure this?
- Owner is accountable and should be held legally- therefore must be on scene.
- as a pet owner id want the person to stay, therefore I should too
- i dont think dogs should bite anyone but also people should not reach for a dog without permission or tease or antagonize any animal there for an animal will attack.
- A dog owner whose dog slammed into my dog (this was common at the dog park to people and other dogs as it was not under the control of the owner and was new at the park) Although others had tried to talk to owner he was not willing to take advice. His dog would run around slamming into people and dogs. The slam to my dog caused my dogs death. He immediately took off from the park. I found this dog and guy at another park 2 weeks later and got his plate number and reported plate at which time he was charged. He would not pay fine of 250. and 100. so I was supeana to court. In court he was a jerk and ordered to pay or do jail time. Had I had known his fine was only 350. I would have asked for my vet bill paid of over 1000. He should have been ordered as well to take obedience classes or surrender his dog to be adopted. This dog was not a pit bull. The dog was not a bad dog but was an untrained dog. At the very least he should have been ordered to take obedience classes with his dog or surrender the dog.
- Much like any other incident where physical harm was sustained, all parties should remain or face fines and charges for leaving the scene.
- The owner should have complete control over their dog and therefore are responsible for all actions
- Exceptions should be made for people who need to leave to care for their pet if injured or for other urgent reasons. They should be required to provide contact details to victims or witnesses in that case, or to officials by phone at the time of the incident (before leaving)
- They should be required to provide their information in case it needs to be investigated.
- Too many times their dogs do serious damage and the walk away taking no responsibility or compensation to injured person/animal
- If any dog is biting, it requires training and so does it's owner. Enforcement officers would be the first contact to document incidents as well as provide information to the owner regarding the need for training.

- People need to be watching their dog in order to prevent bites. You're responsible for your dog and it's actions. If there is an incident you should be present the entire time.
- Only if the bite causes severe enough damage that a doctor is required. A nip is not a bite.
- The dog owner needs to be there to give the information required
- Owners responsibility
- owner must stay at the scene unless it is unsafe to do so (dog or person requires immediate first aid or there are not adequate resources to keep the animal isolated and therefore others safe until an officer arrives)
- I think those who don't should be equivalent to a hit and run with a car. Its negligence.
- It is like remaining at the scene of an accident. Circumstances like if the dog could not be controlled or secured I think it would be okay for the owner to leave if proper identification documents are provided prior to leaving the scene.
- It shows responsible ownership and caring for everyone's safety
- I do not support BSL
- Must stay there. Same as a hit and run charge should be in place. For the victim and for health records of the accused dog.
- It is obvious. Responsible pet owners must be responsible for their pet.
- Only as long as doing so does not exacerbate the situation or endanger people
- They should also be responsible for any vet bills.
- All witnesses need to remain at the scene to give their description of the incident.
- It's called accountability. However, there should be no fear of the dog being removed from the owner's care. Treat this as you would a car accident.
- Similar to an accident scene
- The offending dog owner has a responsibility toward the injured victim & owner
- If the enforcement officer can be there in short time; I suspect this wouldn't happen. Perhaps the person bitten, or someone with that person get the dog tag information/name of owner to make a claim. Mind you, this could result in bad behavior of the dog owner and the bitten person may be too traumatized to stick around
- Obviously, if your dog is involved you should stay at the scene. This is morally and ethically assumed.
- The dog owner could provide insight on why the attack happened and the story would not be considered one-sided as both parties involved in the incident would be there at the same time to explain what happened.
- Be responsible
- This should be handled in the same way that traffic incidents are handled - if an individual's animal has caused harm, they should be immediately accessible to contact. However, there should be exceptions to this if the animal that caused the injury cannot be safely contained from the scene (e.g. in a car while the individuals are next to the car).
- It is the dog owner's responsibility to keep their dog under control.

- Any responsible owner would stay to make sure person/animal who is hurt in an incident regardless of whether police/bylaw has been called. Sometimes incidents happen irregardless if one or both dogs are "aggressive " onus also has to be placed on others sometimes though as not everyone understands that you can't just walk up to any dog at any time and expect it to be a love bug. Most aggression happens because dogs are not well trained...or are in the process of training and have asked the other person not to come near their dog and the other does anyway. Animal rights go both ways and not everyone is respectful towards a dog and owner as they should be. A lot of rescue dogs need a long time to be trained and feel safe and secure so people need to understand and respect that. Little dogs van also be very aggressive but people aren't scared of a 20 pound dog even though it can also do a lot of damage very quickly and in fact bite more often than large breed dogs. If any enforcement is changed it needs to be changed for ALL DOGS not just certain breeds of dogs. Discrimination against 1 breed will still bring on lawsuits against the city...who will lose because dogs have rights too and discrimination is discrimination it doesn't matter who or what you are discriminating against
- The owner is responsible for their pets actions
- Of course the dog owner should remain at the scene to explain their side of the story. There are 2 sides to every story and a dog 99% of the time wouldn't just bite for no reason. If the owner leaves the scene without giving a statement, it just makes them look more guilty of wrong doing.
- the first step in the consequences that follow unacceptable, dangerous or harmful behaviour (not controlling your dog).
- Exactly like a car accident. There needs to be accountability in respect to the incident.
- Pet owners need to be responsible and accountable
- Responsible dog owners should provide contact info and stay at the scene
- It is the same as a car accident. You must take responsibility for your pets actions
- Information in such an instance would be required in order to follow up that the owner of the aggressive dog is taking steps to help the dog be better socialized and trained.
- Should have accountability to the actions.
- These matters should be treated just as an MVC hit abs run are. If we don't start deterring these behaviours, they will continue and possibly worsen.
- It makes sense. If it was vehicle damage you have to stay so why not if a dog does damage.
- Both sides of the incident must be conveyed to a peace officer (with proven neutrality of opinion on breeds) as well as recounted by one or more witnesses.
- Pertinent medical information may be needed; owner of the dog needs to be responsible for understanding the gravity of the incident and their responsibility
- They should be responsible for medical bills.
- As in the case of any other injury requiring EMT/enforcement attention, the same applies to dogs and the person (-s) responsible for them.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to either explain why this occurred or info provided on training, or maybe dog is mistreated and that is why the behaviour not dogs fault.
- Same as as a car incident

- Dog owners need to take personal responsibility for their dog's behaviour.
- It is ultimately the owner's responsibility.
- This should be considered assault. That is why the dog and it's owner must stay. Be like fleeing an accident
- The owner should take responsibility for their pet. They should stay for bylaw and exchange information with the person who's dog may have been injured in the incident. They should assume some financial responsibility for the injury, too. Maybe not the whole vet bill, but a big percentage.
- If the damage is excessive
- Like any accident or incident there should be both parties represented & witness statements taken. There is always more than one side to a story.
- I think it's very important that both parties exchange info, just like a car crash. Parties must exchange information and stay if an enforcement officer is necessary. Although it's hard if an animal or person needs medical attention. So perhaps they could both be required to fill out a report at a designated office.
- Provided it is safe to do so (ie they have the means to control the dog on scene).
- Obviously, if a dog bites a person or another animal they should remain on scene and provide their information. I also believe that they should be (fully or partially) financially responsible for damages caused by their animal.
- Because the owner is more responsible than the dog.
- Too many people run away and leave the victims with the vet bills
- A dog biting another person or animal is against the law and it should be considered fleeing the scene of a crime due to that fact. Also if the owner of the dog that bites is at fault they should have to provide compensation to the person or animal that was bit for any medical needs.
- Owners should be responsible for dog behavior, and how they train, discipline and interact with the dog.
- Track the dog and the owner and be able to follow up
- Accountability for injuries
- If a dog can't be controlled by the owner and injures a person it poses a risk to the public (the dog is essentially an uncontrolled weapon) and the owner needs to be held responsible for the injury caused.
- The owner should be made responsible!
- I'm surprised to hear that this isn't already required. Owners should be responsible for providing important details (e.g. vaccination records) and able to be contacted for follow-up if there is an incident.
- Depends on the severity of the bite what penalty should be applied.
- The owner needs to accept responsibility
- The owner of the animal will always know their pet better than anyone else, and as such may be able to provide relevant/significant information about the animal - and it's behaviour/possible causes for its behaviour - that would otherwise not be available in these types of situations
- The owner is responsible for the dog and therefore should be available to give info

- Not remain at scene waiting for an enforcement officer. Just exchange info.
- One needs to know who the owner of the dog is.
- It would make them more accountable for the actions of their dog's behavior.
- no one would leave the scene if injury had been caused. Illegal for a hit and run, can't but and run
- There needs to be accountability if a dog bites another dog. The only exception would be if a dog requires medical attention, at which point owners should be required to exchange information.
- I think that both parties need to remain at the scene. The only way that I think it would be appropriate for a person to leave is if information was shared by both parties (much like a minor traffic accident) so that the enforcement office can follow up with both parties.
- Unless the bitten animal or person needs to leave to seek immediate medical attention
- Owners should be held accountable
- People should be accountable for their pet's behaviour, but there is a serious lack of enforcement for holding pet owners accountable at all
- Just for people, not other animals, to ensure rabies prevention
- I don't know how it could be enforced though.
- The dog owner has to take responsibility for the injuries to the victim. That can only happen if dog owner remains on the scene, helps the victim out and shares his contact information so he can take responsibility for the injuries caused to the victim.
- The owner needs to give their side of the incident. Some times it's the dog who was bit who instigates the problem.
- Yes, or at least must provide their contact information (so they can get problem dog out of area)
- It could be a rule but would be up to the person who got bit or whos dog got bit to call an enforcement officer, depending on the situation. This could escalate conflict between the two parties and it may not be practical to wait for an officer to show up.
- .
- Owners shouldn't just flee and say it was an accident, vividly explaining the situation could actually be more beneficial and understanding.
- Similar practice with motor vehicle collisions, makes sense.
- You wouldn't leave the scene of a car accident or a crime...
- Just like when you have a car accident you stay on scene- however the fog must be in control of the owner- otherwise an exchange if info would be the minimum.
- No one should leave the scene of a incident unless contact info was given and confirmed.
- I thought this was already the case.
- "If they don't, then it might make it impossible to track they down. However, I don't think the victim should need to stay. I was a bite victim earlier this summer and had to go to urgent care immediately for treatment.

- It would be great if there was a QR code on the dogs tag and an app that allowed owners to exchange license information quickly, via phone, so that being physically present at the scene wasn't required."
- Owner must be liable for their pets'actions.
- This i can support. Its the owners job to fall through if the dog bit anyone. It would also be their job to warn anyone if there has been a problem
- "Yes it is common courtesy. This is no different than a car accident. Remain on scene until appropriate help arrives. If the dog can not be controlled step away to a safer place out of the way and Wait for help to arrive.
- If this is not possible full disclosure of personal information for law enforcement to do immediate follow up"
- They should be responsible for their dogs behaviour and commit financially if there is a cost to the other person or dog owner for treatment.
- It is the owners responsibility to take action the moment the dog shows aggressiveness and must do the necessary steps to prevent dog bites.
- YES! all too often the owners leave or refuse to give their info which should be a crime. It should be treated like a vehicle accident. No one move until info has been exchanged. I think it would be ideal if all parties wait until an enforcement officer comes to the scene
- "Stop allowing inexperienced people keep larger so called "nuisance" dogs. The owner is the problem, not the dog. I don't understand why that's a struggle to understand. A dog isn't born aggressive it's either trained to be that way or not trained well enough to know the difference and listen to it's handler. Stop letting anyone who's anyone own a dog and put the bylaws on people not dogs. Larger stronger breeds need proper care and training by someone use to the breed and who knows what they are doing. You look at any animal abuse case across this province. In Calgary people leave dogs out in -40 weather, people have duct taped animals mouths and starved them in storage garages. Why is the city not monitoring who is allowed to care for an animal? Before you start blaming "nuisance" animals and putting a muzzle on them, look at nuisance Alberta residents who harm and mistreat them who like the idea of a "big tough dog" but haven't a clue about the responsibility.
- Shame on this province if they can't see that animal abusing evil people are the issue. Start a law that changes people's behaviour and prevents abuse and mishandling.
- An animal of whichever breed or creation will respond positively if shown proper care, training and love.
- I'm not saying there aren't aggressive animals out there but we all need to realize how our behaviour as humans effects everything."
- Yes that's common sense.
- Leaving the scene of a dog attack/bite/fight should be like leaving the scene of a car accident
- Like a car accident, stay and help if you can
- Accountability should be a basic expectation regardless of the offender's breed.
- Dog Owners must take responsibility for their dog's behaviour

- The pet owner needs to take responsibility, ensure that the victim is fine and cared for and that proper measures are discussed regarding the dogs behaviour (how to prevent a bite from happening again, etc). The public deserves to be taken care of and a dog that has several incidents like this should be documented.
- This is absolutely necessary in order to know the history of the dog plus to ensure the owner pays for all damage done.
- People should be accountable and a rule would be helpful
- They should stay
- Owners should be able to explain their side of the story as well as be held accountable for their pets actions
- disease concerns, liability economic, dog to be destroyed
- This would help identify irresponsible owners
- I can't believe that this is even a question. Pet ownership is a responsibility and if your animal bites someone, you should definitely remain on scene.
- If a dog bites someone or injures another dog, it is too easy for the dog's owner to disappear from the scene, leaving the victim responsible for all costs etc which can be considerable
- the owner is responsible for the pet's behaviour, just as an adult is responsible for a child's behaviour, or a driver is responsible for automobile related events.
- That should be common sense, just like for car accidents
- I do believe it would be unfortunate if my dog was attacked and the other party had left. I would want to be able to get some resolution (if any) out of the possible situation.
- Absolutely! This would be no different than swapping insurance at a fender bender.
- When I was living in BC, I was bitten once by a dog, and in another incident my dog was bitten by another dog. Both times the dogs and their owners left. I was unable to get any contact information because it wasn't required by law or bylaw.
- These people should not be allowed to just disappear. They have to answer for their dog's bad manners. They are the ones that trained or didn't train them.
- It's like hitting a car. You've caused damage with something you own/have a licence for so you have a responsibility to own up to it and deal with the repercussions
- "This seems equivalent of a hit and run. Owners/ person in care and control of the dog must remain at the scene, of present during an attack. If unable to stay safely at the scene due to the dog - must provide info prior to leaving? Arrange pick up of dog? Etc..."

- Hard to see how if walking a dog it would be safe to stay with the dog... bit of trouble here but I think you can figure it out."
- This seems totally reasonable. How else can the owner (and animal) be held accountable?
- You are accountable for your dog and the actions of your dog. Exchanging info in a pet incident would be similar to exchanging info after a vehicle collision

- Depending on the circumstances, the owner could be held accountable for the actions of their dog and need to remain on scene to allow follow up if needed and ensure that the other person or animal that has been bit gets the appropriate attention.
- Bite needs to be defined as injury. Not sure if appropriate between two dogs that nip each other.
- The owner of the animal that bites another animal or person should be held more responsible to the offence than the animal.
- Definitely. I am aware that most dog owners of problem dogs run off. We have to hit their wallets. I spoke with a dog trainer said their money is when they will finally learn their dog is an issue.
- Similar to car accidents. The responsible party should remain on scene.
- This is like any other 'accident' accountability is very important as well as responsible followup during the incident for the most clear statement/assessment.
- They should always stay
- However they should be able to put dog away somewhere first
- They should remain due to the injury inflicted.
- this holds the pet owner to their family members actions just like if a child got into a fight at school the parent would have to come and meet with the child and talk with the other guardian. pitbulls are the sweetest dogs, the dog should not be held accountable for being raised in the wrong conditions the owner should be held responsible. if a owner has multiple pet infractions (attacks, bites, destruction of property etc,) should hold jail time for the owner. just like a parent if they were not treating there kids in a responsible manner. social services would take the child away and the guardian could face jail time
- It is the only responsible thing to do
- I want to see pet owners taking responsibility for their pet's (and usually the owner's) behaviour.
- Information should be provided by both involved parties to enforcement officers to ensure the situation is assessed from all perspectives
- Without contact information how would you conduct enforcement or seek restitution?
- The owner should stay
- The logic in this is similar to a 'hit and run'.
- Just like leaving the scene of a vehicle accident - the owner and the dog should remain at the incident.
- People must be held accountable for the actions of their pets, otherwise, what is the incentive to ensure proper behaviour towards others?
- I have seen people whose dogs bite another's dog and just grab their dog and walk away. This leaves the "victim" without any knowledge of the attacker's vet and vaccination records, and makes it near impossible to find the owner to potentially take action against.
- There should be hefty fines for leaving the scene.
- I don't know how you would enforce this. But any responsible dog owner would stay at the scene or share contact info to begin with.
- It would put more accountability on the dog owner not the victim.
- Duh! They should be charged for leaving a scene!

- Dog owners must be accountable for their dog's actions but it's also necessary to get both sides of a story.
- There should be a bylaw and fine for anyone who leaves the scene of a dog attack with their dog.
- Requiring the owner to stay and provide contact info is necessary in case there is any follow up required by police or bylaw enforcement (similar to the need to stay at the scene of a car accident). An exception to staying at the scene might be if the owner had to leave the scene for safety reasons, e.g., to remove a vicious dog to a safe location, or if the safety of the owner was at risk, e.g., from angry observers of the incident.
- Yes but can't be enforced because most would just take off to avoid fines and vet bills. And folks that is reality.
- Well we need context about the bite, don't we? Is this not a bylaw already?
- There are no bad dogs; there are only bad dog owners. Nuisance dog behaviour is always a result of incompetence and negligence on the part of the dog owner.
- Yes. Leaving the site of an attack and/or not giving contact info should elicit a higher fine.
- Owner must take responsibility and understand the consequences of their pets actions
- If a dog bites, it's the owners fault, they should be held accountable
- A dog bite is due to an irresponsible owner. It should be considered "fleeing the scene", like a hit and run with a vehicle. The dog owner is responsible for controlling their animal and getting appropriate training, or a muzzle. There is something wrong with a dog owner who allows their dog to run freely and hurt someone. The human needs to be punished and there needs to be sufficient penalties to dissuade selfish people. A dog bite can cause lifelong mobility and visible scarring problems as well as emotional trauma. It must be more effectively avoided by owners.
- It is the right thing to do.
- The cost of surgery is often left to the owner of the injured dog, not fair. The person bitten has the right to know if the dog is vaccinated.
- Pet owners are responsible for the actions of their pets. To leave the scene would be akin to leaving the scene of an auto accident.
- Dog Owners should understand the importance of having their dog under control at all times and if a dog bites the incident should be treated like a traffic accident.
- Can't believe this isn't already the case... so a dog can bite someone, and the owner is currently allowed to flee... makes no sense whatsoever!
- give the owner a ticket
- If their dog bites someone they should have to stick around to accept responsibility.
- However, if the dog cannot be controlled or to de-escalate the situation, it should be sufficient to provide contact info to someone at the scene of the incident.
- Its the same as if you left any other accident. Its not acceptable to leave.
- A responsible owner should have to deal with the situation and not just leave. My thinking is it is like driving a car and having an accident, you do not just drive away you must exchange information and talk with law enforcement etc.
- The dog owner needs to be present to provide information as necessary.

- I would like the person who owns the dog to let the victim's owner have their info so that enforcement could contact them
- Need to ensure balanced context and understanding in any given incident.
- How is this even a question? If a dog attacks someone, was it okay for them to leave the scene of the crime before?
- Owners are responsible for their dog's behaviour. Any responsible dog owner would automatically do this.
- It is similar to leaving the scene of an automobile accident.
- yes and if a pit bull bites should be euthanized
- should be a fine if they leave the scene, same as leaving accident scene.
- I hear of too many owners leaving with their dog and they cannot be found after for proper education and follow up.
- It is extremely important for any bite victim to know the animal's rabies vaccination status. If unvaccinated, the animal needs to be quarantined if at all possible to reduce the victim's risk of rabies. Owners should be able to provide said information, and should be required to do so, as rabies is a lethal but preventable illness
- its no different then when a pedestrian is hit by a car. The person at fault need to provide a statement.
- Too many irresponsible pet owners need to be held accountable for their behaviour...more often than not they are the issue with the dogs behaviour..and not the breed itself.
- The owner must be contactable
- I think that is only fair to ensure due diligence is done.
- An account of the incident from the owner should be taken at the scene. All dog owners should take a statement to protect both themselves and their pet. It's also important to keep an account of the dog's behaviour in case it is in a one-time incident.
- This should be required as a bylaw
- There is no excuse for an owner of a dog who has injured another dog or human to flee the scene. Owners should be taking responsibility of their dog's actions whether they are a pitfall breed or not. If there are signs that the dog may cause injury to another being, a responsible owner should not be taking their dog to places where this could happen. Should the owner flee the scene following an incident, once they have been found, there should be an extremely large fine (much more than the $350 an individual caring for the dog was recently fined in a recent fatal dog attack case) as well as more involvement from the police, rather than simply the City of Calgary.
- I absolutely support this. Anytime a dog harms another animal or person, the owner needs to take responsibility for the incident and provide full disclosure of contact information as well as provide a full report of the incident to bylaw officers. This is important not only for the victim, but also for the future of the dog who did the biting.
- So the responsible owner can be held accountable so it doesn't happen to anyone else
- That's generally the rule for any altercation, is it not? The owner should be there to plead their case, especially if the bite victim is seriously hurt.

- Just like when you are involved in a car accident, you exchange information and discuss with officers if necessary. This should be same rules.
- Remaining at the scene ensures the owners credibility and allows for liability.
- No
- After a human bite it would be ridiculous for the owner to leave the scene. One would have to have a standard to define a dog bite on a dog. Cannot be just a nip.
- It's called "responsibility".
- Dog bites require more intervention with the owner, not laws against breed specific dogs.
- Yes this should be treated similar to a traffic incident
- Remain at scene if an EO responds in a reasonable time period. Otherwise the pet owner needs to supply contact information and pet tag number to the person/pet owner that harm was caused to and or the EO/PO.
- There can be so many factors that attribute to a dog bite, not because the dog is a nuisance. Dogs don't bite without being provoked, so what was that reason.
- This is in regards to Question #3. This question is insulting in its inference that pit bulls are dangerous dogs. They are not dangerous and like any other breed of dog, they are the result of their owners and training they have or have not received. I own a pit bull cross and she is the sweetest dog I have ever known and would not hurt anyone. I have volunteered at numerous humane societies for many years, where most of the dogs are pit bulls and other such powerful dogs. Very few of them were of concern and the ones who were had been mistreated and abused by humans, used in dog fighting rings, or been owned by owners who had no business owning such a breed. Owners of any breed of dog should be licensed and should be required to attend mandatory dog ownership classes and pass a strict exam prior to being allowed to adopt a dog. Dogs, no matter the breed, are not the issue. The owner is the issue, the glamorization and so-called social standing of owning a bully breed is the issue, abuse and neglect of animals is the issue, and illegal dog fighting rings are the issue.
- If an injury has occurred, for insurance purposes. If no injury IE: bleeding has occurred than no.
- Why wouldn't they?
- They should stay close by but at a distance where everyone feels safe.
- Seems fair to make things right
- It is completely unreasonable and cowardly for someone to flee the scene when their dog has injured someone/something. It shows their inability to be responsible for the animal and as such the animal should be taken away from that person.
- Just like being in a car accident, they should stay until authorities arrive
- Yes they definitely need to stay and provide their contact information if their dog is responsible for the bite they should be responsible for the cost of care of the person or animal bit
- It is your responsibility to remain at the scene when involved in a car accident- your dog is solely your responsibility, thus you must be accountable in case of an incident
- Then information can be gathered quickly. This would only work if an enforcement officer didn't take very long

- Just like in car accidents, this would encourage more responsibility for pet owners. A fine for those that leave the scene should be held accountable just like with car accidents
- It needs to be determined what caused the bite and an impartial third party (officer) I see as necessary
- Yes, but...in some cases the dog may be so agitated that remaining at the scene may cause further issues. I think the owner should ensure that the dog is removed to a safe place (that could be distance, car, or home) but that they should return or call the city.
- I think any responsible pet owners should stay on scene.
- This is responsible pet ownership.
- Our one year old Sheltie was attacked severely by a pit bull in a dog park. The owner responded with profanity, took zero responsibility and exited the park quickly. We were left with a $2,000 vet bill.
- Just like in a car accident, info should be shared.
- No different than at a car accident. Must remain on scene.
- same as a road accident - parties need to remain on scene until proper documentation is complete
- As long as the situation is safe. It may be necessary to leave to de-escalate.
- Just like a car accident, exchange information.
- The owner MUST be responsible for the actions of his dog!!
- By staying on the scene it allows for the potential to resolve the situation in a more positive way.
- Would give the owner a chance to explain what happened and provide their information, rather than it only coming from an injured party in a high stress and emotional situation.
- If circumstances dictate, the owner may need to leave and then return to the scene. Example: securing the aggressive and/or agitated dog at their home or in a vehicle, and if small children are present, would suggest taking them away from the scene if it is traumatic.
- The owner is liable and should not flee the scene of a bite
- If the owner leaves, treat it like a hit and run vehicle/pedestrian accident. Owners must be responsible for their pet actions.
- This should be mandatory should either party involved want an enforcement officer to be come to the scene.
- I see no difference in this in the same way you are required to stay at the scene of an accident. Injury to a pet or the owner must be addressed.
- I am surprised they are not currently required to provide contact information. There should be also be a severe punishment if the owner of the vicious dog leaves the scene of an attack without providing contact information.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- Dog owners should be accountable for their dogs
- Sometimes there are additional circumstances leading up to the incident, for example, the dog may have been defending itself (bit before being bit) or someone was asked by the owner to stay away from the dog and did not.

- If there are any vet bills or other costs incurred, it is necessary to be able to contact the owner of the nuisance animal.
- If the incident is serious, then yes. Dogs are animals and all of them have the potential to be aggressive towards certain people or other animals. The size of the dog does not matter. It is up to an owner to have control of their dog. Owners of animals that are attacked by any dog and respond to defend themselves should not be penalized for doing so.
- As long as it is safe to do so, I feel if an attack takes place distancing may be necessary.
- It's like a hit and run.
- It's not the animal who is to blame all the time.. owners need to take responsibility so breeds of dogs aren't labeled as dangerous.... like pit bulls, Doberman's or Rottweilers
- Of course they should have to
- This is no different than a car accident. The owner needs to be responsible for their dog's actions
- I think it is important for the owner to remain at the scene to ensure safety moving forward.
- I have observed many owners in the off-leash park in Varsity who walk far ahead of their pets, almost ignoring them and this gives the dog lee-way to "do its own thing" and the only responsible ownership would be to constantly supervise what your dog is doing at all times and stay with it and then you are on hand to observe exactly what happened, plead your case, if necessary, or provide the required information to an enforcement officer if necessary.
- If the owner needs to remove the dog from the situation to then return to assist/share information, they should be permitted.
- Like a car accident a person has been harmed so you should share details
- A dog owner is responsible for its dog. They need to be consulted when an incident occurs. There may be reasons, not the fault of the dog or the dog owner, that need to be explained.
- Any time there is injury involved a proper investigation is necessary. If offenders and there owners can walk away freely this hinders the investigation. Also many dogs mimic there owners behaviour, so if they are aggressive there a fair chance there owners are as well. Having the law simply makes it easier.
- Just like anyother offence Identification is required
- An owner who takes off after a bite has ocured is, in my opinion, no different than someone fleeing the scene of a hit n run.
- I would expect everyone to be accountable for their animal, I would alsoNexpect the enforcement to appear in a timely manner... not hours after the incident
- Well if a dog bites my dog I would want information so they can pay the vet bill.
- ALL dog owners regardless of type of dog should follow this. However there have been many instances i am personally aware of where a small dog bites but the owner brushes it off as not a big deal and walk away. The current preposed legislation doesn't cover those people because its too focused on boxer breeds and would effectively give such people the excuse of "but mines not a boxer breed so it doesn't count"

- Yes to share contact information only, not necessarily to wait for an officer as I'm not sure how long this would take and could escalate the dogs behaviour. Best to remove the dog from the incident as soon as possible.
- within reason, again I don't know how you would enforce such a thing or know which dog was the agressor if they both bit someone or each other.
- Yes, if it safe. If victim attacks owner or dog they should be allowed to leave. Should be dependent on reasoning as to why the dog bit and how severe.
- If a dog is causing problems, the owner needs to take responsibility and pay medical/vet bills for the other person/dog if needed. The info is also needed to determine if this person/dog is a repeat offender.
- If it is a serious bite and the dog was aggressive.
- Our dog was bitten by a neighbour's dog - they didn't speak English and we weren't sure where on the street they lived. They didn't appear to understand the severity of their dog's behaviour. We tracked them down and they seemed oblivious. It was an awkward thing to do with a neighbour. If we were to exchange information, an enforcement officer could explain the issue (and maybe have someone obtain interpretation). People should not have dogs unless they agree to a set of rules such as this.
- Of course. Responsible pet owners should.
- It's our responsibility as pet owners to be responsible for our dogs.
- ONLY if blood is drawn/there is serious injury to owner or dog. Being around dogs (in dog parks etc.) means that you accept the risks, including that a dog will try to play with you and your animal.
- Responsible pet owners engage with community
- Within reason. Sometimes it may not be safe for one or both parties involved.
- I believe this is a no-brainer for responsible pet parents.
- They need to be responsible owners, and both sides of a situation need to be heard by the officer. The victim's side and the other side.
- Pet ownership is a privilege not a right. Driving is a privilege not a right. We make drivers wait around after accidents and swap info.
- They need to be held responsible
- The owners need to be held accountable for their dog's behavior.
- Leaving the scene of an incident is irresponsible and brings into question an individuals' fitness to own and care for a dog responsibly.
- Responsible dog ownership dictates ensuring the offending animal is represented and ensure entire story is clear from both sides ! We have had far more small dogs try to attack our large dogs then ever a specific breed ! It's unacceptable no matter the breed ! Just because it's a 5lbs fur ball doesn't make it acceptable !
- They should provide contact info to either the other person involved or to the city official.
- Any dog which attacks another dog or person needs to be assessed and sent for training or intervention.

- This is not a bad idea. However, there will be cases where both sides will not be the same. Possible witnesses may be needed. The dog that bites isn't always the problem dog.
- It's only reasonable if u are a responsible pet owner u would stay then both sides of incident are explained at same time
- Owners are ultimately responsible for their dogs. They need to be held accountable if their dog bites another dog or person.
- the owner should take responsibility for the dogs behavior and should know the dogs triggers and not expose the public to problem dogs.
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- There may be extensive medical and veterinary bills which are only discovered later, The perpetrator needs to stay on scene until all contact / insurance details are recoeded as in a traffic accident. If the victim is satisfied they have all the information they need then the perpetrator can leave the scene.
- this should always be the case
- If it was a person to person incident both parties are required to remain.
- Without contact details how else can a bylaw officer follow up on the incident.
- Owners are the problem not the pets.
- Only information should be shared with an officer and not another person. People have tried to steal dogs.
- If the victim / complainant / their guardian or representative chooses to escalate the process, the owner of the dog which did the biting should be asked to either share their contract information or remain on the scene until a bylaw officer arrives
- If a dog is biting, there is a reason and more often than not, that reason is poor training. It is important that owners of aggressive or reactive dogs are being held accountable.
- Owners of animals who cause personal injury need to be held accountable for the behavior of their animals.
- Why would these people be allowed to leave the scene? It should be law that they stay like a car accident.
- No different than leaving the scene of an accident.
- If a dog bites somebody, the information is needed to be shared, the owner is responsible for any damages that a dog caused.
- there have been many similar incidents reported where it was difficult or impossible to determine the owner of the problem dog or even to locate the problem dog.
- the owner is the one responsible for controlling their dogs behavior. Bad owner means a bad dog. Dogs however can be retrained
- Person yes, other dog no unless it's a severe bite.
- Dog owner is another witness to the event and thus a better understanding of BOTH sides of the story.
- "For health of person bitten.
- To create a record of the dog's behaviour.

- To identify owner for investigation and financial responsibility."
- They share responsibly
- Should provide information and obtain witnesses, this applies to the owner and the person bit as this could protect the dog as well especially if attack was provoked. Exception would be if the owner was trying to defend themselves for example against an assault to themselves or the dog that then results in the dog trying to protect the owner
- Pit' and runs are far too common and irresponsible owners deserve punishment, as well as victims deserving fitting compensation or justice
- Yes of course. It's just as if you got in a accident with your car. You not gonna just run away
- The owner needs to be held accountable and the circumstances need to be considered.
- I view it as being required to stay at the scene of a vehicle accident. Too many people just run off and there is no extra punishment for trying to avoid being responsible.
- It is a persons responsibility to remain at a scene if someone is hurt and that should include a dog owner.
- Yes the owner should be at the scene if it cause my a pet.
- Humans are responsible for their pets.
- An owner with a very aggressive dog should NOT be in a dog park in the first place. If the dog is too aggressive and may be biting more people or dog, perhaps it is best that the dog owner leaves the scene.
- Dog owners have to be responsible for every action of their dog. Leaving the scene after an incident is akin to a hit and run with a vehicle
- All owners should have the expectation of answering questions and advocating for their dogs should there be an incident. This should of course include sharing contact information for follow-up.
- It will never happen but it should so issues like rabies and other shot history as well as being able to recoup vet or medical bills.
- Seems like this might be hard to enforce. And how significant the issue of owners leaving the scene is. I believe that fines for leaving the scene are appropriate.
- Owner needs to take accountability and provide proper support to victim.
- This should be treated exactly like any other incident - all parties (including witnesses) remain on the scene to provide statements.
- As with any incident requiring authorities to be called, both parties should remain on scene. No different than a car accident.
- Otherwise it would be a bit and run. However, staying on scene with the dog may not be possible as containment could be difficult. May need to be discussed in case by case.
- I think the ownership of the dog is essential to know. If the dog bites, this means it needs further training. If that human cannot provide the training, then the dog should be relocated to someone who is willing to educate themselves and train their dog. Every dog needs training, and it is not their fault if their owner lets them down.
- they need to stay at the scene, but a nonresponsible owner will not

- Having had my dog attacked twice by the same dog at an offleash park and the owner does nothing to keep his dog under control, I am totally for this.
- Stay if it is safe to do so. Alternatively, confine the dog and contact Bylaw officer.
- Leaving the scene of a car accident is expected, a dog attack is no different.
- Treat it like any accident. Always remain on the scene
- My true answer is maybe. This also requires more information. I have witnessed very abusive and issues of bullying at the dog park. If someone was feeling at risk then they should not need to put their own safety at risk.
- I feel like they should be fined because they need to control their dog
- Well any kind of dogs are not bad including pit bulls
- I believe the owner in most cases bears that responsibility
- It's like getting in a hit and run accident. You should always stay to make sure everyone is safe.
- It is important to have a person to contact regarding follow up.
- Poor dog behaviour falls on owner training and should be the responsibility of the owner.
- If vet costs occur because your dog bit another dog you should be responsible to pay for those costs.
- This is a reasonable requirement and ensures the owner is held responsible.
- They need to be held accountable for what their dog has done & if they are there, the needed information can be gotten.
- It should be no different than a motor vehicle collision. Those involved should remain at the scene to speak with the authorities.
- I think it is vital to have the offenders talk to the police and share contact info as they would then be easier for the police to contact/find.
- We have to do the same if there is an auto accident. Scene of the crime.
- Nenshi is a Muslim faggot
- It would be necessary to have the dog and owner identified for further investigation into the severity of the incident. The owner must be held responsible for their pet's behaviour.
- Unless both parties agree it's not serious enough to pursue
- If the incident is reported then both sides need to be heard.
- Biting is a crime, and people should own up to the offence
- Just think it's being a responsible pet owner.
- Owners should be responsible pet owners, it isn't the breed of the dog, it is the owner that needs to take responsibility
- A dog owner is expected to be in control of his animal at all times. Similarly a vehicle. If you lose control and cause damage, you are expected to remain at the scene of the accident to provide the necessary information to the other party and police if they are involved.
- Proper thing to do and if the 'victim' was causing havoc to the dog then this needs to be dealt with as well. Possible consequences for them as well
- Take responsibility for your dog's lack of training and care.

- Common sense and common courtesy for the well being of all involved.
- Contact information should be necessary otherwise it's like a hit and run
- Bad pet owners will run away every time.
- The owner must bear responsibility for any actions of the dog
- Whomever gets bit needs to know if the biting dog has had its shots, especially rabies.
- Common sense should apply
- If your dog bites someone should stay pretty simple
- It is like leaving the scene of an accident.. it's common sense..
- If they flee, increase the penalty.
- This should always be the law, always remain at the scene! Heavier fines if they run and animal should be removed from the owners!
- It's like a car accident - remain at the scene unless things can be dealt with easily between the parties
- Owning and controlling a pet is a responsibility. (like driving a vehicle) It is a reasonable requirement.
- A dog who bites/attacks a person or dog (with intent to harm, not playfulness) is a potential danger to society and safety hazard. It should be treated like workplace or public hazards - reported and dealt with accordingly
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their dog and that includes providing contact info to enforcement officers.
- They have to explain so they have to stay
- Owners need to be held accountable and responsible for the behaviour of their pets.
- I support owners taking responsibility for their dogs actions. This should apply to all breeds. Anecdotally, I have seen multiple cases of small dogs biting someone and their owners simply picking them up and walking away without giving their contact information or the dogs vaccine history.
- No different than a hit and run!
- Owners should take ownership for their animals actions and be responsible for their animals actions
- This way, the owner can be held responsible and help the person that their dog injured/hurt.
- The victim's owner can take a photo of the attackers and give it to the police if they walk away. Walking away should result in the most sever of consequences.
- It is very irresponsible of a person to leave the scene of a dog bite not to mention the cost to the city to try to find the dog & owner.
- All pet owners need to be responsible for their pet's behaviour and it is common courtesy to take responsibility if an incident occurs. The owner is responsible to ensure all parties are ok and do the right thing.
- If they can safely restrain their dog. Otherwise leave contact info.
- People often leave without giving contact info so they don't have to pay vet bills
- This will facilitate a quicker resolution to the issue.

- Owner should take responsibility, unless both parties mutually agree to leave the scene because all applicable information has been shared.
- People must take responsibility for this. People turn dogs into aggressive animals. It is almost always the human's fault.
- Like a hit and run people should stay on scene to exchange information
- Otherwise very easy to avoid any consequences
- There needs to be accountability by the dog owner.
- People should be held accountable for a nuisance dog
- How else can corrective action be taken
- Part of being a responsible pet owner.
- Any dog that bites should be euthanized.
- If the bite results in broken skin then absolutely the dog owner should remain at the scene of the incident to share contact information.
- "Every Situation as a different context to consider
- Case by case is the way to move forward with this"
- The animal owner must assume responsibility for the situation, just as an automobile driver must.
- it should be no different than a car accident. You stay at the scene.
- So the owner is educated on the next steps
- This is responsible ownership
- Dog owners must take responsibility for their dog's actions
- Provides accountability and people can't just leave before they're charged.
- It can be a serious incident and information should be shared.
- If people are allowed to leave the scene, then they can just disappear without being held accountable for their dogs actions. Also would force them to give personal information in case they need to be sued.
- There are too many cases where the owner leaves and is never found again with no repercussions.
- There is no evidence for breed specific legislation
- The owners info should be available so they could be fined, and animal control can follow up
- I think the owner is responsible for damages to the bitten animal/human and they should not be allowed to just leave the scene.
- Just like a car accident, compliance from both parties - and a third party- should be necessary to ensure that the proper steps are taken.
- be responsible
- The same reason a vehicle owners is required to stay at the scene of an accident
- Take responsibility for it plain and simple should your dog be in the wrong
- it is the same as hitting someone with your car, you just do it for common decency.
- It should be treated like any other assault. Bystanders should be asked for their version of the story also.
- Absolutely that's the responsible thing to do and important that it's done

- Opportunity to deal with effects of situation. Exchange of personal information
 - A bylaw officer only needs to be called when a vicious attack occurs on a person. If a minor dog fight occurs and one dog bites another, there isn't any reason to involve an officer.
 - Ultimately an owner must be completely responsible for their pet especially when something harmful or worse has occurred. Contact info is a must and an enforcement officer may be needed and should be available in the case of poorly behaved humans.
 - The owner is responsible for the actions of the dog.
 - The person has to be responsible for his/ her pet and the actions of it.
 - Contact information is important for the person injured or for coverage for the injured dog. I do see a problem if it is difficult to contain the biting dog.
 - Owners must take responsibility for action of their animals. In addition it ensures both sides of the story are presented and the accurate one reviewed
 - This is no different than a Hit and Run driver - owners must take responsibility for their pet's actions.
 - The dog owner should be held liable for the injuries caused by his dog.
 - It would be the same as remaining at the scene of any accident or incident, especially if insurance is involved. It would also be helpful if witnesses remained at the scene as well.
 - A dog bite is an injury to a person. If a person is injured by an automobile, the driver doesn't get to leave the scene like a coward. Why should a dog owner get to do so after their animal has bitten someone?
 - Like any accident, it's illegal to leave the scene.
 - "That person needs to be identified in case there are lasting effects of the bite, where the victim (human or animal) could seek financial compensation for consequences and/or collateral damages as a result of the incident.
- Also, the owner would want their statement logged in case there are mitigating circumstances (ie: the dog was provoked etc)"
 - Yes, often a bite requires a doctor or vet visit, often incurring expenses. the owner should be held accountable.
 - To accept responsibility - Apologize at least
 - Larger dog bites can be as dangerous as an attack with a weapon, and as such there should be a strong obligation for dogs owners to act both responsibly and with full respect for public safety. It should not be legal for them to simply walk away if their animal has harmed the public.
 - Owners must take responsibility and be accountable for their dog's actions.
 - Dog owners are responsible for the actions of their animals, so must stay and be accountable...as long as the offending dog is removed far enough away from the victim.
 - People need to be responsible for the damage their dogs do

- Yes I understand that if an incident occurs, it is important that the owner share information so one knows that all needles are up to date, this needs to be shared so the vet knows what he is dealing with or the doctor knows if it is a person.
- These should be treated like crimes, requiring officer involvement.
- The dog owner should share his/her contact information with the victim and the enforcement officer and receive charges on the bite.
- It is critical to obtain accurate contact information and proof of ID from the owner.
- Common friggin sense
- it makes the owner accountable
- It qualifies as a "hit and run"
- If there is a need for an officer to attend the offending owner should provide information or stay
- It can be easy for someone to say they will deal with the situation and take contact info, but then never contact the injured person. If you have to wait for bylaw, at least someone is there to write up a report.
- "They dog is under theie care and therefore they are responsible. This is what it means to be a responsible dog owner.
- I have a beautiful BorderCollie x Boxer dog. She is extremely well behaved. She would fit the profile of physically like a pit bull. I also know many amazing owners here in Calgary with understand there is some strong feelings toward pitbulls and therefore make it a point to ensure their dogs are always extremely obedient and wellbehaved. This isnt right.
- What about husky's?!
- Invest in training. Even if its mandatory!!!!"
- Common courtesy, what more can one say.
- A dog's behaviour is most often a reflection of their owner's behaviour and therefore the owner needs to be responsible for their dog.
- Same responsibilities as if involved in a car accident.
- Good people take responsibility.
- This requires no explanation
- Common sense
- Responsibility is
- accountability.
- Needs to be held accountable
- It's the only satisfactory way to ensure identity and keep track of witnesses.
- That way no dog is neglected from receiving proper training to reintegrate into dog society...all dogs found to be perpetrators need mandatory recertification by a specialized school/trainer that works with nuisance dogs specifically.
- We would need to determine the health of the biting dog in case our dog gets sick. The biting dog owner should assume vet bills. Therefore, contact information needs to be shared.
- Bad owners will just leave otherwise. Add an additional fine if the owner leaves the scene.

- It's just like a car accident where both parties exchange the pertinent information. However, in this case the enforcement officer should be taking separate statements from each of the parties, and any witnesses to the incident.
- If an officer is to be called the owner should have to stay or provide information before leaving.
- Unless the offending dog or the owner needs medical attention
- Same as leaving a scene of a vehicle accident
- I have had a dog bitten and had a dog bite myself. I would have appreciated some sense of responsibility other than " he's never done that before."
- An owner of a dog involved in an attack should absolutely remain on scene until an enforcement officer arrives on scene. This is a crime scene as serious as a physical or lethal assault.
- Ultimately the dog is under the responsibility of it's owner, therefore the owner must be there to defend the actions of the dog and offer their stated opinion of the incident.
- This is assault and owner needs to be accountable
- dog owners need to be responsible.
- If there was a dog bite or attack to another dog that is very minor - more of a touse that went too far, then probably the dog owners can settle it without an enforcement officer. A serious dog bite or attack that leaves a dog injured should require that the dog owners should remain at the scene to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer - or owners should at least share their contact info if the dog has to leave and go for Vet. care immediately - with the understanding that the enforcement officer will be contacted A.S.A.P. regarding the incident. Ditto for a dog who bites a human. The owner of the offending dog has to be held accountable and "Dog (HUMAN) Training Classes" should be mandatory. So often, at "Off-leash Parks" the dog owner is so far away from their own dog that he/she isn't there to intervene. People who attend "Dog Parks", or walk their dog in public places should be very aware that their dog must be under their control at all times, and that the owner must be near enough so that he can voice a recall to his dog, or be near enough to take control.
- Does this really require explanation that I would expect somebody to remain at the scene of a crime to give contact information? You gotta be kidding me.
- I thought the legal code covered this. If it doesn't, then I support including this provision.
- These owners always seem to leave the scene. They must be accountable for their animals actions
- Because it's their responsibility
- It's pretty traumatic to be bitten, the owner should understand the seriousness of it.
- Owners need to take responsibility.
- Absolutely! Incident/Accident/Damage/Injury you stay at the scene.
- I have been bitten at a dog park in Ontario. The emergency dept reported it to Public Health and I had to return to the park the next day hoping that the two dog owners would be there and that I could have them contact Public Health. It was traumatic and inconvenient for me.
- It's the same as a hit and run - you should stay and share information.
- Wouldn't this be common sense behaviour for most individuals?

- Remaining at the scene is responsible dog ownership. People should be educated that it does not mean they will necessarily be penalized or their dog euthanized.
- if the bite is serious enough for medical attention, contact information should be shared for insurance purposes.
- Owner is responsible and liable for their pet's behaviour
- The owner is the legal guardian of the dog and is responsible for any of its actions. They must therefore stay and supply any information required by the enforcement officer.
- We must know who owns the dog and where the dog resides so that the animal can be specifically identified as a nuisance animal and the owner can be identified in order to be fined, sued by the victim/owner and or determine if the dog needs to be euthanized.
- Because their dog has been involved the owner is responsible for remaining at the scene.
- Dog owners are responsible for their animals. Leaving the scene should constitute a criminal offence.
- Because that what a responsible person should do
- My dog was bitten by another dog and the owner ran off while I was attending to my dog. I worry that it has bitten other dogs or people. My dog was also injured and I was also saddled with a very expensive vet bill. I'm not sure a bylaw would help in this situation, but it wouldn't hurt.
- owner should be responsible for any vet or medical bills
- As soon as a person is responsible for injury or damage to another person it is common sense to stay at the scene and offer support, be responsible for its actions and provide identification for the injured/damaged person to follow up.
- It is no different that having a car accident. If a person is bit or a dog attacked then the owner should be required to remain on the scene. If they leave they should be fined! Kind of like a hit and run accident
- One is required to stay at the scene of other crimes and misdemeanors, I don't see why this should be any different.
- to expedite the investigation
- Owners must be responsible for their dogs. Awaiting an enforcement officer is the same as awaiting the arrival of police at a collision. If appropriate detailed information on the owner and the dog could be provided this could potentially make it possible for the dog owner to leave.
- Too many bad owners run away because of fear of fines The dog gets bad rep. when it is the duty of owner to control the animal
- they are responsible for their dogs actions and need to man up instead of running away
- If the owner does not remain at the scene, especially if there are no witnesses, makes it difficult to identify the dog in question.
- The dog owner may not be a responsible owner. Enforcement needs to know who the owner is.
- Dogs should have proper training and the owner should be responsible just like a driver would be responsible for a car collision.
- Injury has occurred- the owner needs to take responsibility. That would include remaining at the scene.

- Yes if there us a bite of a person. This would be very difficult to manage / enforce. Who would make sure that person stays? How long would response by bylaw be? Better to have a requirement that requires (for a bite resulting in injury) that involved owners must exchange information. This would still be hard to regulate but not as difficult as trying to keep someone at a scene until bylaw arrives. Also, this doesn't preclude people getting their injured dog or person to safety or medical aid if needed.
 - Owner or designate is ultimately responsible for the animal.
 - Owner(s) MUST both be held accountable, AND, identifiable....
 - Just like a automotive accident, people must stay on the scene of the incident.
 - Determine whether the animal bites repeatedly.
 - Too many irresponsible dog owners dismiss the severity of a bite.
 - Only in a severe bite cases, meaning broken skin.
 - "I think the owner of the dog should pay for the damage, if any.
- And it's the right/responsible thing to do. If my car hit another car - I'd have to exchange info or wait on scene for police. If I didn't, it would be hit and run."
 - Take responsibility for your pet and its actions. If you don't want to be held responsible, don't own a pet. Pretty easy.
 - Leaving the scene should be the same as leaving the scene of an accident. Same penalties.
 - I have seen it where another dog attacks a dog and the offending dog owners just walk off and don't even see if the other dog is ok. I think if there is a puncture or other issue arising from an attack both dog owners should stay and submit information.
 - Owners who leave the scene of an incident should be treated like drivers who leave the scene of an accident. Leaving the scene of an incident without providing contact information is cowardly and irresponsible.
 - Removes any doubt as to which dog it was
 - It is absolutely that owners responsibility to make sure the other party has their information and follows up with financial support (vet visit, medical costs, etc).
 - This will alleviate any concern that the victim(s) may have and it will also help in the quick dispensation of justice for the victim(s).
 - There could be serious injuries that the biting dog's owner should take responsibility for ethically and financially
 - Dog owners must be held accountable for the actions of their dog and be censured accordingly with tickets for bylaw infractions AND financial responsibility for damages ie vet bills for treatment of injuries inflicted - hence why many owners flee the scene.
 - no explanation necessary. |Remain at the scene of your dogs transgression. be responsible pet owner
 - "I support it if a dog bites a person.

- BUT if a dog bites another dog in self defense, I am not sure. Little yappy dogs often attack larger ones, and the large one is blamed wrongly. (I do not have a dog myself, but I have seen it happen many times)"
- This would be a part of being a responsible pet owner. Of course they need to take responsibility for their dog's behaviour in public, unless the owner specifically indicated to others that the dog was not approachable. Unfortunately this would result in a "he said, she said" incident.
- This is common sense.
- Because it is the responsible thing to do, DUH!
- The owner is the one who is responsible for dog behaviour, he/she should definitely stay at the scene
- There have been situations in past where an owner of a dangerous dog has fled the scene, with the dog, after an attack has occurred an another dog or person seriously injured. The owner must shoulder the liability for possessing such an animal.
- The owner must be made to take responsibility for their pet!
- People have an assumed liability as an owner of their pets. This is no different than a car accident where the owner is legally obliged to provide the information.
- First aid and sober questions
- If my dog or a family member is injured by the behaviour of another dog I would want to know how to contact the dog's owner and to be able to ask them to cover any related vet bills. (I would be prepared to do the same if it were my dog causing the problem.)
- If an enforcement officer is called then the person should remain at the scene. At minimum the owner of the dog that bites should have to send in a pic of their dogs tags plus their personal contact info along with a brief summary of the events to the bylaw to a provided link so an investigation can occur to determine if an investigation is necessitated.
- I support this but it will be hard to enforce. It would be better to simply limit off-leash areas to areas that are more conducive to being used by pet-owner - ie not the entirety of McHugh Bluff for example.
- In the event vet bills are incurred and a lawsuit is needed by the victim to recoup the costs of the dog bite, the owner of the aggressive dog should be required to remain on the scene and provide contact information.
- Ideally, people would take responsibility, however, enforcement could be an issue.
- All owners should be accountable.
- The dog owner is responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- It is imperative that the owner takes responsibility and is accountable for the offending animal
- Sharing info allows info regarding dog health and vaccination confirmation to have bet outcome for both parties.

- There is a difference between a vicious bite and a bite that may occur while two dogs are playing together. If one of the animals is injured due to the incident then the owner of the afflicting animal should be required to take responsibility and share information as might be necessary.
- As with vehicles, dogs have the potential to cause damage to other beings. The owner is responsible for controlling their animal and should be held accountable (similar to a accidents involved with a vehicle).
- Of course the dog owner should stay - information is needed such as if the dog has had its rabies shots, who will pay for vet bills if required, etc.
- It's the only decent thing to do. What if the dog had a disease or is sick.
- Common courtesy.
- Ultimately the owner is responsible for the dog so needs to communicate ownership details in case of a problem
- This is no different than a car accident or any other type of damage caused by inattentiveness. The Dog owner should be responsible and provide contact information to the injured person.
- Good idea - helps to track nuisance dogs and demands owner responsibility.
- How can their be any accountabilty for the dog owner if they don't do this?
- The owner should be held responsible for their dog's behaviour, behaviour which may cause the need for medical or veterinary attention, legal action... The owner must provide their contact information for follow-up, unless both parties agree that it is not necessary.
- Much the same as an auto accident, people should be held accountable to remain at the scene.
- Should be the same as vehicle incident in case insurance involved
- Their identification is necessary.
- Take responsibility for the behavior of your pet. Isn't this just common sense?
- This should be mandatory
- The dog owner should be held responsible to answer questions if required.
- Owners are responsible for their pets. They may need to discuss the training they've taken in handling the dog, provide contact info to the person or other animal's owner whose been injured and also be issued appropriate fines if applicable.
- A dog bite should be considered a serious incident and it should be mandatory to share contact information and report the incident to proper authorities.
- As in car accidents, It is better to collect information and reports at the scene of the incident before time has passed and the story has changed or emotion has set in
- This is like anything else where a person inflicts damage on another they should remain on scene and share contact information
- Remaining at the scene is the moral and legal action a responsible owner should be doing now. Those that don't, whether in fear of legal action or the loss of their pet, should face stiffer fines. It should be made clear that by staying at the scene it could go a long way in their favour.
- the owner must be held accountable
- We had a severe bite, the people of the attach dog left, we were charged a huge vet bill to suture the damage

- Nobody should walk away from an incident
- The offence is the responsibility of the pet owner.
- They have to take responsibility.
- It only makes sense that the owner should remain and be accounted for the incident.
- The owner is responsible for the dog & like traffic accidents must remain at the scene. Too often they take off & a lot of work goes into finding them & the animal in order to resolve the situation & determine penalties.
- This includes SMALL dogs whom may not be able to do much damage, if any at all, but are still dogs and should be treated the same as larger dogs.
- "I have had two incidents,
- I was bit by a dog, on leash, and
- My dogs were attacked, while on leash...
- in both incidents the owners took off refusing to supply me with info."
- The owner should take responsibility.
- make sure everyone involved is ok, for actual bites, not dogs being dogs. People need to understand the difference.
- Yes, it's the same as a hit and run accident.
- It would expedite all proceedings.
- You are responsible for your dog and its actions.
- It's no different than a vehicle accident- accountability is required.
- The person bitten, or the owner of the animal bitten, needs to know the contact information in case a lawsuit might follow or charges might be laid. The contact information could also be needed to be able to trace any previous incidents that the offending dog might have been involved in.
- that is absolutely the decent thing to do. Running away and avoiding the problem is not acceptable.
- "It helps to identify who the problem dog is. It may be that the dog that bit was teased into action.
- There are always two sides to the story."
- Some incidents involving a dog can be very serious and I think the enforcement officer should decide what is a minor or major incident and the dog owner should be present at the scene to share his or her contact information.
- Owners must be responsible for their pets behaviour
- It's the appropriate way to handle these situations.
- Yes, too many stories of owners taking off.
- Owners should be held responsible for the actions of their dog, therefore, they should be present to speak on behalf of the dogs actions. It is not always the dogs fault.
- I believe cases have been reported when the owner (s) of dogs that have bitten have left the scene.
- I believe every dog owner should take responsibility for their dog regardless of the breed.
- Any responsible pet owner would remain at the scene. If they don't remain, they are not responsible and should not have a pet.

- I wouldn't want this to be held up for an unreasonably long time waiting on a bylaw officer. Consider FaceTime or equivalent as acceptable alternative for bylaw officer to be engaged remotely
- Seriously? in my mind a crime has been committed
- An exchange in contact information is valuable in situations where medical attention is required. Also, it is a way to track reoffending dogs.
- "absolutely, what if the other dog attacked first and then was severely injured. I want to hear both sides of the story before jumping to conclusions.
- And if the dog attacks a person, they should always remain at the scene, just like a car accident. What are you hiding if you run away."
- Both sides of the story need to be heard to be sure the dog won't be killed just because the person the dog bit doesn't like the dog for whatever reason or to make sure it's a just case, example: I had a dog who was murdered just because he bit a kid, neither him nor the kid he bit knew each other and she smacked him in his face, he was defending himself, the kid wasn't mauled or disfigured but they killed my dog anyways, didn't have a vicious bone in his body at all but he would defend himself and his loved ones!
- Absolutely otherwise false ID /contact info could be provided and person avoids responsibility for pet attack
- I feel responsible owners already do this. It's the irresponsible owners who try to get away with not taking responsibility for having control over their animal that leave a scene. However, I'm not sure how enforcement of owners that don't remain at the scene can be done as the victims are likely dealing with their wounds or wounds of their pets during this traumatic event.
- No different than a traffic accident in my mind. Stay and provide contact info so that authorities/victims/owners can do follow up tracking of the incident to deal with any subsequent fallout.
- It's obvious - they must take responsibility for their animal
- Within reason; if we are talking about a sever bit (dog has broken skin) and aggressive behaviour. Sharing information or having a conversation, yes. On the other hand, I would hate to see a by-law so strict that people become fearfully about owning a dog.
- It isn't any different than requiring a car driver involved in an accident to stay at the scene. If a dog does something wrong (against a bylaw, like biting), the owner should be required to also 'stay at the scene' to assist with any investigation.
- Dog ownership means taking responsibility for how your dog is behaving.
- No different than hit and run incidents, people need to take responsibility
- for sure, they should remain until the officer arrives and discusses the situation
- leaving the scene of a dog bite is like leaving the scene of a vehicle accident. A responsible pet owner must take responsibility for their pets actions.
- Contact information should be shared like a car accident.
- of course the owner needs to stay at the scene to show responsibility for an untrained animal
- Sometimes at off leash parks - owners seem oblivious of their dogs behavior and will leave after an altercation.

- Only if the bite is severe and requires medical intervention.
- I believe it is the responsibility of the owner of a dog who has attacked another animal, child or adult to remain at the scene...provided the aggressive dog is safely contained and unable to cause further harm to anyone.
- I am opposed to anything that hints at breed specific legislation and I think it is shameful that this is even being considered. Most people can't properly identify one breed, let alone lumping in a dog that has the "appearance" or "characteristics" of one. How the hell do they know what the characteristics are or are supposed to be? I attended a seminar several years ago from noted Norwegian dog behaviourist Turid Rugaas, in which at least 2 members of Animal Bylaw Services attended. The takeaway was that in her entire lifelong career she has only experienced one dog that needed to be euthanized - the rest were successfully rehabilitated. If an owner can't control a dog that has been deemed dangerous, then the dog should be turned over to a rehabilitation person - NOT euthanized - and the owner should be banned from owning any other dogs for a period of up to 5 years, AND until it has been proven that the owner has enrolled in, participated in, and graduated from an accredited training school.
- I don't think much of an explanation is needed....it's illegal to leave the scene of a car accident. People should be responsible and do the right thing or face a fine.
- Dog owners should be required to remain at the scene in order for the incident to be properly investigated.
- It would seem to be the moral and ethical thing to do.
- "I had my dog attacked"
- It cost me thousands of dollars in vet bills and the guy just walked quickly away without even saying sorry. A couple years later I had a small dog which was killed by a dog whose owner was letting it run free he also took off. Too many owners take their dogs to these free run areas and let their dogs do whatever even though they haven't been socialized with other dogs."
- This is tough to enforce. You want to remove the dogs from each other and you don't want angry confused and scared pets and owners arguing. But information has to be shared by both parties like in an accident.
- The owner had to take responsibility for how they are allowing their dog to behave.
- I believe that we should all take responsibility for our actions or our dogs actions so if our dog bites someone or their dog we should stay to speak with an enforcement officer.
- Contact information is needed in case there is any injury which requires a vet or doctor.
- Because Pit Bull owners run away after they attack
- This should be treated no different than a traffic incident.
- The dog owner is ultimately responsible for their dogs behaviour. Therefore they should be required to provide contact details at the scene of any incident where their pet has harmed another pet or person.
- If a dog bites another dog or a person, then the owner should remain at scene to give details to enforcement and person who has the injury.
- Responsibility for any damage due to bites rests with the dog owner

- I don't have experience in dog parks or with dog bites but it sounds like a reasonable expectation.
- The negative encounters are caused by a lack of proper handling by the owner/handler. Education is essential. If a dog is biting there is a reason, fear, anxiety, or surprise, among others. Consistent education by the by law officers is needed, so they need to be properly educated first. Slapping fines and removing dogs is not the answer. The owners will find a way to own another dog, the dog will suffer. Please find ways to educate, not litigate.
- How do you prosecute a person that has left the scene?
- If a dog injures a person or other dog the owner should be responsible for any medical bills.
- How are we to verify the breed, responsible owner and up to date rabies vaccine if the culprits leave?
- If a dog bite is indeed an offense, then the perpetrator would be required to be identified. The human companion would represent the offending animal.
- Owners should absolutely be held responsible not only for contact information but also medical costs and lost wages
- For what part of yes do you require and explanation?
- It should be treated just like a car accident
- This should be an incident similar to a car accident and exchange of information should be mandatory.
- I believe it's is required for appropriate follow up/ insurance if required.
- It shows responsibility for pet activity and concern for others involved
- Too often, and owner leaves the location, and makes it necessary for allocation of resources to be put to task to find the owner / animal. Significant fines should be issued for owners or handlers who leave without providing verifiable personal information.
- The owner should be held responsible for any damage (lost wages, medical bills etc.) My daughter was bit a few weeks ago and the dog owner just left the scene. I wonder how many times this dog has bitten someone else?
- All stakeholders need to remain on scene, including witnesses. As well an impartial, unbiased, investigator needs to attend the scene, to arrive at the truth.
- This should not even be a question. It is no different than hit and run. If a dog bites somebody, the owner has to take control over the dog and remain at the scene until the bitten person has been taken care of and an enforcement officer or the police or in charge.
- owners should be penalized if their dogs bite and they leave the scene
- This would be part of being a responsible pet owner, if the owner were to leave the scene I would suggest fines and / or dog seizure be a consequence
- It should be similar to an automobile accident. if a dog bites another dog or a person, the owner must give their contact number and wait for an enforcement officer if the person who gets bit or owns the dog that gets bit asks for such.
- If the owner stays at the scene then the tax payers are not pay to track a person down if required. Or there needs to be a city call number to leave a report for an officer to follow up on.
- Offender should always remain at the scene

- If they get away, they are gone for good. He says...she says...
- Whether the owner or handler remains at the scene of an incident they should be required to provide their contact information by showing valid government id to those present.
- To attain both sides of the story.
- Any responsible dog owner would support this. How do you screen false accusations though ?
- They should stay and be responsible for the incident
- The more information to determine the best outcome for the dog the better.
- If there was a health issue that would involve an insurance claim later on it would be important to be able to get back to the owner.
- Similar to a car accident, all parties should remain to share info and make proper statements
- This is common sense. Any person or animal that injures another should be held accountable therefore would be required to provide details to an officer. You Should not leave the scene of any accident or injury before speaking with an authority or providing identifying information.
- In case of injury or death to the animal or person. To me, it is like leaving the scene of an accident!
- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions AE ALL TIMES
- Unprovoked and/or provoked attacks also need to be assessed for possible rabies prevention. Owner needs to be present.
- Otherwise how would you locate them
- Dog bites happen and are more likely when uses are not separated properly; like runners next to off lease areas or in off lease areas. The owner should be responsible, but there needs to be information provided on any changes through licensing.
- If the owner leaves, the victim or victim's owner has no way of knowing vaccination history of attacking animal.
- Because the City is then aware of this dog & can monitor it in the future.
- That's obvious, same as a hit in run in traffic. Common-sense...
- Owner or caregiver of the animal must show responsibility. Maybe the owner is more dangerous than the dog ?
- The dog may need tested for rabies.
- Dog owners should be responsible for their dogs behaviour regardless of the breed. If there is an injury they should be held accountable for that behaviour.
- They need to provide more details about a dog, and what THEY are doing to prevent such dog behavior.
- If your dog bites someone you need to take responsibility for your animal.
- Too many dog bites have occurred in the City where owners of the offending animal do not remain at the scene. They know their animal is dangerous and do not want to face the consequences. This needs to have harsh consequences just as it does with not remaining at the scene of a vehicular accident. At least vehicles have plates to ID them. Not so with people and dogs. Remaining at the scene would demonstrate Responsible Pet Ownership By-Laws.

- If the owner is a responsible owner, this should be an automatic response on their part. It is also a way to ensure that the owner is responsible and following the City's pet bylaws.
- It's important for follow up.
- To me it would be considered assault. As a result they should remain.
- This should be treated almost the same as any accident. You are required to stay & give information to authorities. If the dog owner flees the accident it is similar to a "hit & run" car accident & increased severity of fines should be reflected.
- the problem of this is that many dog bites occur when the owner is not around.
- Same as remaining at the scene of an accident
- Ultimately owners are the key to a dog's behaviour
- Any details of the pet can be shared.
- Exchange of information necessary for any type of follow up.
- Otherwise how could the identity of the offender be established?
- No different than a car accident involving personal injury - it should be a pet owner obligation to do this
- This does not require an explanation. If your dog injures someone, the same protocols as a car accident should apply.
- Should be required to share contact information, but not necessarily remain at scene to talk with an enforcement officer.
- Is this a serious question? of course the owner needs to stay at the scene. there are hit and run laws in place for a reason.
- Owner is responsible for their dog; they must remain at the scene when their dog bites a person or other animal.
- It would probably be best so they can share their side of the story.
- The dog owner needs to be responsible and extra resources and time should not have to be used to track them down.
- It's not the dog that needs to be punished, it's the owner who has not taken the time to teach the dog basic manners. The dog owner needs to be on site and responsible.
- If a dog bites someone or another animal a centralized record should be kept to catch repeat offenders.
- It's important that evidence of what occurred be gathered.
- For all other kinds of accidents, it is a requirement to remain at the scene. This should not be any different.
- It's important to understand both sides of the story.
- Yes it is only common sense. The owner should also have to pay for any bills for the person or animal hurt.
- same as a car accident, allows authorities to gather the facts at the time and place of the incident vs tracking down days later.

- If possible in regards to safety of other people or animals, the dog owner should stay on site and share information. If the dog needs to be removed from the site, they should leave their information with a designate who can remain at the scene.
- Just like a car accident both parties need to swap info.
- Too many times the offending dog's owners walk away.
- Because any dog owner should be responsible for the dog's behaviour and the resulting pain, expense of any injuries caused by the dog.
- I would only support this if the "enforcement officers" being dispatched to these events have appropriate training and understanding in animal behaviour. This system will not work if the individuals called in to make assessment have the same breed biases/assumptions that support BSL legislation.
- Kinda like an injury car wreck. This speaks to taking responsibility, ensuring harm mitigation through administering first aid, offering help and even mobilizing EMS.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their animals.
- Being a responsible pet owner you should remain on scene to own what your animal did.
- yes, absolutely. If your dog is involved in aggressive behavior, you and your dog should be held accountable.
- The owner should be responsible
- The dog owner is responsible for his/her dog's behavior and must be accountable to follow through on all follow up.
- Why do we not consider a bite a scene of crime, this is a reasonable expectation when one harms another
- You would do the same thing if you were driving with your child And they got into a car accident
- It's like a traffic accident, you can't leave the scene. Not sure why this isn't a rule already.
- If they do not have control of their dog then they should leave and the police can follow up later.
- It's no different than remaining at the scene of a car accident. Forces people to take responsibility for their vicious animals.
- you should not be allowed to not be responsible for your pet. If your animal hurts another you should be required to pay for vet bills, damages or other.
- Just like a car accident, it seem reasonable to ask them to stay until everyone has had a chance to talk.
- It's important to hear both sides. For example if a dog is being attacked by someone and defends itself by biting, the person attacking is more responsible than the dog.
- It's the only decent thing to do. I can't image why it wouldn't be a rule already.
- The owner of the dog should prioritize gaining control of the dog to mitigate further damage and return to scene and/or contact an enforcement officer immediately after the dog is secured/under control.
- They need to stay on scene so that vet records can be confirmed for rabies, it can be determined if there have been more than one incident. That person may be liable for damages.
- They are responsible for their dogs actions.

- Dog bites are damaging and traumatic. Dog Owners should be responsible in a hit and run fashion if they leave.
- Accountability
- It's no different than an accident or an assault. Information should be shared in case future concerns arise. If your dog bites my dog and passes along a virus or disease, both dog owners should be aware so they can take appropriate steps with their vet. A pet owner is responsible for every aspect of their pet.
- A dog attack is an assault on a pet or human. Provided the dog is under control and poses no further risk to the victim, the owner should remain at the scene.
- Owners would most likely try and cover up an incident if given opportunity
- Only another person.
- It's' no different than a car accident. It's the responsible thing to do and shouldn't have to be mandated.
- It's like a car accident. Ideally a report would be taken at the scene or information exchanged.
- More accountability on dog owners is a more common sense approach than victimizing specific breeds
- It's important to take responsibility for your animals actions. If the fines are to great and the risk of putting an animal down I don't blame owners for leaving.
- No different than hitting someone's car. Your dog is your responsibility
- It's about being a responsible pet owner and doing the right thing
- Pet ownership accountability.
- The dog owner need to be responsible. His information is required so that the enforcement officers can do their job as well as the Person affected has the information to sue the dog owner for any damages.
- Absolutely. The dog should be removed from the area to calm it but the owner, much like a person involved in a car accident, needs to exchange info with the victim to ensure accurate vaccination record history and for court records if necessary.
- For the same reason someone should remain at the scene of an accident one should remain at the scene of a bite.
- yes - people should be responsible for the pets and the injuries that they may cause. if the dog bites, the owner should have to provide their contact information at minimum, likely dependent on the serverity of the incident.
- Dog should be put down if it bites person or animal
- Situation. You need to understand the entire situation to best determine the proper outcome.
- If bite occurs, need owners AND injured party to be present. UNLESS need to put aggressive into secure place, injured party need attention
- Absolutely. Owners must take responsibility not the dogs. Its the training not the breed.
- They MUST remain on the scene and MUST pay any expenses related to said incident
- Owners are responsible for injuries caused by their dog. Similar to traffic laws, leaving the scene should be considered an offence

- No different from a pedestrian and/or vehicular accident, all involved must stay at the scene to be processed
- If the attack draws blood from an animal or a person, all involved should remain at the scene.
- Only to talk with an enforcement officer unless the bitten person becomes aggressive
- Owner should be liable for dogs actions no matter breed or size
- As long as the offending animal can be separated sufficiently from the scene
- "I think this is the optimal solution- no bite-and-dash. If the animal was legitimately being harassed by the person they bit (because some people are jerks) the owner has a chance to articulate that to enforcement. If I tap someone's car, I have to stay and exchange information. If my pet hurts someone, why should that be any different.

- The bite should need to be visible for this though.
- Otherwise I see opportunities for pet and owner harassment. ""Your dog bit me"" claims when the dog never did, or only snapped but did not bite at a person who was harming it."
- At the very least if they have to leave or remove their dog from the scene they should give their ID to the other party to record their info to pass on to enforcement as I'm not sure how long it takes them to arrive on scene.
- What's to explain? It should be like an accident in a car. No bite and runs. Every bite big or small this should be mandatory.
- It's no different than staying at the scene of an accident. The owner, however, has to control their dog at the same time.
- "Yes and no on this answer.
- If there is more than one person walking the dog that attacks another person or dog, the dog should be removed from the scene by one of those people. Another should stay on scene to exchange information. The dog who caused the attack would be a stressor for the other owner/dog if it was continuing to be aggressive. They cannot leave the scene without giving the other owner contact information at a minimum though."
- We need to ensure the owner and dog are properly identified, and the incident is officially recorded. Without this process in place, owner accountability is somewhat nonexistent.
- If someone has been bitten/hurt, the owner should be responsible/forced to provide information to an officer.
- Same rules apply when you damage or harm people or their property in other circumstances (e.g. cars/driving)
- Support an exchange of pertinent information as long as victim and their dog is not traumatized by their presence
- It should be required to stay at the scene of an incident for both parties so that problem owners/dogs can be held accountable and increase safety for others

- It's similar to if someone hits someone with their car. Sometimes animals fight and get aggressive. That's normal and should be anticipated. When your dog is off leash you or norm you should be monitoring your dog and be ready to intervene. Should your dog become violent you should stay to not only support your animal but take accountability of its actions.
- You might never see them again.
- I have had more issues with aggressive little dogs AS PER THE ABOVE RESPONSE than PIT BULLS
- all pet handlers should remain at the scene just as in a car accident
- Ppl need to be responsible for their animals
- These events are scary and there are many uncertainties and variables in each event. It is appropriate that the owner provide appropriate information similar to a car accident.
- The owner must be held accountable for the behavior of their pet.
- Animals disposition may change once it has left the scene of offence
- If an injury happens then the owner of the dog is responsible and like a vehicle collision should remain on scene
- Don't know where to write this, but the discrimination against 'pitbulls' is wrong. You cannot discriminate against a specific breed. I have had a rottweiler, who was the biggest baby, but I've seen small, miniature dogs that are more scary than any pitbull and who bite. Absolutely ridiculous to discriminate against 'pitbulls'.
- the owner of the dog that attack should give their personal information and should pay vet bill if applicable. that way you can track how many time this happen with the same person / dog. plus its a way to make sure the dog is register.
- This should be required and there should be a heavy fine for those that leave. It should not be a case of 'hide and seek' to identify the owner of a dangerous dog.
- I think it's only common sense for the owner to remain at the scene if an injury occurs, same as vehicle drivers
- They need to stay in order to assess the incident. As it was their dog that bit. The dog that Infact bit maybe larger but did not initiate the fight and the other dog may have bit them first but would have been smaller.
- Pet owners & pets should be held responsible and not be able to leave the scene without being made accountable.
- A dog owner should be held responsible if they leave the scene of a dog bite incident. I have heard multiple cases of a bitten dog owner having to search for the owner of the dog that bit their dog, because they left the area.
- Attacking. Dogs and victims should be separated immediately.
- Owners of the vicious dogs are seldom present and avoid any or all accountability.
- A dog bite should result in fines and / or charges. Attempted avoidance by the owner should be met by at least a fine.
- If a dog attacks/bites someone it is not the animals fault. Somewhere along the line it has been trained to do this by the owner or someone close to the owner. This is the owners fault. A car doesn't hit another car the person driving the car hits the other car so you hold the driver accountable not the vehicle. This shouldn't be any different than a pet owner having to take accountability if their pet causes an injury.

- Owners need to be 100% liable for their animals.
- it's important to find out ASAP of vaccine records so precautions can be taken if the animal can transmit disease.
- its important that the owner remain so that it can be understood what caused the incident and what if any further action needs to be taken.
- If the incident is significant enough to warrant an enforcement officer then parties involved should have to remain at the scene.
- Having the dog owner wait at the scene will ensure proper disclosure and record-keeping of the incident.
- Owners need to be responsible for the pets. Regardless of the situation. If your dog has hurt someone, you need to take responsibility.
- I know of too many cases where dogs have attacked other dogs and the owners of the dog that attacked have left or fled the scene.
- Unless the dog is still going crazy post attack... In which case the owner can put it away at home/vehicle or leash it to a tree/sign... Then return to the scene.
- the suspect can't flee the scene, simple as that.
- There is no such thing as a bad dog, only bad owners. If such an incident occurs, the owner needs to be held accountable and enforcement shouldn't have to take extra time out of their day to track them down to do it
- They should remain at the scene only if they can do so without making the scene less safe. If they need to go because their dog is getting more aggressive or agitated, they should not face punishment for deescalating the situation.
- Any dog owners whose pets are involved in an incident need to stay on scene if an enforcement officer is required. No exceptions.
- Not for a minor nip but yes if there is an unprovoked bite.
- It's important to get the owner's info so that he/she can't just leave without taking responsibility.
- Often the owner leaves the scene, and there is no recourse for the victim.
- It is like a car accident - the parties must remain at the scene until resolution.
- Why wouldn't this already be required?!
- As long as the dog can be safely removed from the situation if it in an excitable or agitated state. If the owner is by themselves they should be able to leave with their dog, but also leave their contact information.
- The owner should be there and be responsible. They should cover the vet costs of the other animal or person.
- Staying on scene only makes sense, whereas leaving the scene is like a hit and run. You must be accountable for your animals actions.

- Just like a car accident, people must remain at the scene until authorities arrive unless medical attention is required immediately.
- Hit and runs are illegal bite and runs should be too.
- Of course you should stay at the scene if your dog attacks another animal or human. Its the responsibility of the owner to difuse the situation and make sure everything possible le is done to aid the victim.
- No one will remain on the scene after their dog is involved in an incident anyway. By "requiring" them to remain on scene you can levy a larger fine against them once they are identified.
- The dog owner must be responsible for providing any compensation necessary for the victim to be made whole.
- My niece was knocked over by a big dog in an off leash area and she was carrying her infant son. In order to protect him she fell and damaged an elbow. The damage has required several specialists operations and has impacted her lifestyle. The dog owner fled.
- I'm surprised this isn't already a requirement; this should be mandatory as expenses may incur due to a bite or attack.
- If a person or kid is pestering and bugging (pulling) and not listening to the owner. The owner has a right to defend its pet! Not all animal attacks are the animals fault
- An owner should always be responsible for the actions of their dog.
- Its the moral thing to do...
- Yes, because otherwise it's like leaving the scene of a car accident. The person who was bitten will need the vaccination history of the dog as well.
- Owners are responsible for their animals actions. They should be legally required to stay on the scene of an incident until the proper authorities arrive or face further fines
- Much like traffic accidents, contact information should be provided. Remaining at the scene would be dependent upon whether the dog's caretaker is able to keep the dog under control at the scene. Remaining at the scene may create further issues or danger.
- Yes we should be exchanging information; however, the magnitude of bites needs to be clearly defined... We should not be exchanging information if it is not an intentional attack, sometimes dogs play fight and tell each other when it is too much, some people panic and take their pets to the vet for no valid reason and could expect others to cover this bill.
- "It's an act of violence and should be treated the same as if a person injured another person. There may also be vet costs incurred to another animal that the offending animal's owner should cover and therefor the other person is required to legally record the incident.
- If a person flees there should be consequences such as financial penalties and record in their files for future animal procession."
- I would agree. A problem could be if the owner was close to home and taking the dog home is the best way to calm the situation. Either way, information should be shared first.
- There is currently no effective means to ensure an offending owner and their dog will stay at the scene, allowing some to go uncharged. If notable damage is caused the offending owner should face added charges for fleeing.

- The exchange of contact info is very quick in the day of cell phones, and helps for the safety of all animals/people.
- In my opinion, dog attacks should be treated like car accidents, going through insurance (which I believe should be mandatory for ALL dogs) and being kept on record. Dogs/owners involved in multiple incidents should be required to do classes (like a drivers safety class).
- Would help to identify potential "nuisance" dogs/owners.
- "My dog was attacked by a vicious dog that was illegally off leash. The owners left and I had to take my dog for surgery.
- The owners didn't provide their contact info and therefore didn't help pay for the very expensive vet bill...or the huge trauma we endured. And are possibly re-offending :("
- severe bites to track if a dog does it often. and also to make sure that it wasn't 2 dogs involved and are both at fault.
- The owner should be criminally charged.
- Owners need to be socially responsible, and information about both "sides" of an incident needs to be available to enforcement personnel.
- Depending on the severity of the bite. There are different levels. I'm on the fence with this one. However, I believe it will help more than hinder. I believe many owners flee if their dog bites, and that does not help anyone or the dogs from both sides.
- No explanation needed. If your dog causes damage, you have to stick around and be responsible, like with anything (car, etc.)
- Offending dog owners should be required to stay at the scene of the incident and provide contact information, to consider splitting or paying for vet bills.
- So police or bylaw officers can note what happens in case of injuries, possible legal action against dog owner
- No explanation needed that's what a responsible person/ dog owner would do
- If the dog bites a person or animal it is likely to do it again and if the owner needs to leave information or talk to an enforcement officer the information is there for any further problems.
- If a human attacks a human, the offender is expected to stay to talk to law enforcement and thus it should be the same for dog owners.
- Yes, this is a no-brainer. A bite causes damage to another person or animal - the owner is responsible and liable for their pets' actions. It's all on the owner, every time, all the time.
- If you are a dog owner you need to be responsible for everything that happens with your dog, especially if the dog bites a person or animal. Dog bites should be dealt with like any other incident with a fellow citizen (ie. car accident). Owners should follow up with the victim and ensure that it doesn't happen again! Also, for pet owners who do not pick up dog feces in off-leash parks/neighborhoods, there should be a better way to deter this behavior. Citizens who observe this occurring should be able to report this to the authorities so that they receive a fine or warning without having to record the incident happening! More needs to be done about this, as it is happening far too often, especially in Nose Hill Park (ie. more garbage cans distributed throughout the park may help).

- It is an assault. The owner should be criminally charged for assaulting someone. And there should be an automatic forced payment to victims for any type of injury. Start at 5000$
- It should be treated the same as a hit and run. If you or your animal cause harm to another animal or property it should be considered failure to remain at the scene of an accident and carry a charge.
- As with any accident or injury of a human or animal, bystanders should assist unless they are in danger or remaining would put others in danger (remove a dangerous dog but should return to the scene to provide assistance). As a responsible pet owner, you should be responsible for your pet's actions which includes waiting for enforcement in the case of an incident.
- Just like in any other accident or serious incident (car crash for example) sometimes responsibility must be taken.
- For veterinarian purposes
- I believe a dog attack should be treated similar to an assault. If the dog owner flees the scene of the attack, they should be ticketed additionally.
- The owner of a biting dog should remain at the scene, the dog apprehended and a fine issued to the owner.
- Too many offenders flee. An additional, separate fine may act as a deterrent
- All dog owners should be responsible for their dogs. If their dog bites (no matter the size or breed) staying to exchange information/deal with the consequences is the responsible thing to do.
- To my understanding, many dog bites go unreported. Whether it's a small dog or a big dog, poorly behaved dogs should be held accountable for their actions. Thus all owners should be required to share contact information, and talk to an officer if necessary.
- A dog owner should be responsible for its pet's actions whether good or bad. They should be responsible to take action and help correct the behaviour.
- The owner of a dog that bites likely needs to be contacted after the damage has been assessed so they can reimburse the injured party. Also, the owner may have to surrender the dog so they need to be found.
- Absolutely. They should also be responsible for the vet bill of the attacked animal.
- If there is an incident where your animal causes damage to my animal, family or property then it should be treated the same way as car insurance as if your car hit my car. People need to be held accountable and take responsibility for their animals.
- It's an assault to someone (dog or human) and if bylaw is to be called then all parties should stay to exchange info if possible.
- I do support this, in the event that it is safe to do so. More often than not at off-leash parks, both parties have to remove themselves from the situation as quickly as possible to de-escalate and information is not exchanged. I don't believe it's fair that I would have to cover the full cost of any vet bills if my dog was the one that was attacked.
- They should remain as it is the owner's responsibility to ensure the dog is well trained and is safe around others. It would happen again if it occurred once already, so to further prevent it, action must be taken on the owner
- So the dog owner can give their side of the story of what happened

- Any dog that bites another dog or person should automatically be euthanized.
- Of course owners must take respon
- A responsible pet owner would not flee the scene.
- The owner must take responsibility which includes addressing the situation with those involved and the implications of bylaw enforcement. This will also act as incentive for owners to ensure dog registrations are valid and up to date with the knowledge they can be fined for leaving an incident. Without requiring them to stay at the scene, bylaw enforcement will be much more difficult and lack effectiveness.
- As long as the victim(s) are safe while owner remains at the scene
- The dog's owner must take responsibility for the dog's actions.
- Absolutely the owner needs to be fully responsible no matter breed or size
- as a dog owner you need to be responsible for your animal. If they bite someone you should do the right thing as long as the dog doesn't automatically get put down.
- Owner needs to take responsibility
- Otherwise it's like a hit and run
- Should be treated like an accident. Owners who flee should be punished as well.
- Dog owners should be held accountable if their dog bites a person or another animal
- There needs to be accountability.
- In a word, responsibility.
- Should be treated the same as a traffic accident.
- owners of the attacking dog(s) should, of course, remain at the scene. Fleeing the scene of an attack should be an offence for which a fine is levied, unless there is a very good reason for not remaining.
- The enforcement officer should have a full and clear explanation from both sides and make a decision based off that, as emotion can influence exaggerated and far stretched versions of what happened.
- We expect this with vehicle incidents even if our only damage is property. If a body is affected (ie bite) we should expect no less than that of property.
- Incase the dog needs to be taken from the owner and so the owner is also held responsible for any action the dog has done.
- If they flee the scene there should be harsher penalties
- Sometimes it is not the dogs fault when it bites someone, that person could be provoking it and I think it's unfair the dog is blamed. I also think owners who would leave show fault immediately and they should have to stay so the proper fines can be attributed
- Helps get to the root of the cause
- If a dog was to bite your kid and the owner took off how would you feel? Also it would be like some one hitting your car then looking at the damage then running off with no information.
- This is a crime and you should not be allowed to leave the scene of a crime

- Absolutely, its your dog, which makes it particularly your mistake and incident, do not leave feel scene.
- If the bite is serious enough to incur a vet and/or medical bill, the nuisance dog owner should remain at the scene in case charges are laid in which the owner of the nuisance dog must subsidize the bill.
- If the dog needs to go to the vet the owners should be responsible
- Owner must take responsibility.
- They are legally responsible. No different from a hit and run
- It's less work than trying to determine who owns the dog.
- to allow assessment of the type of dog, training, recidivist
- The Owner of such Dog must assist the Victim in every way , and call in Police or appropriate Authority . Dog bites unnecessary and should not be tolerated at all .
- Yes off course!!! But Do not blaim just the pit bull breed!!! I do not own one my self but know many that do. They are the most love able ever.Do Not blame the breed blame the owner!!!!!! Period,
- Owner is responsible for pet and should pay the consequences. Not the pet.
- I think dog owners should be fined if they don't remain at the scene. My dog was attacked at a dog park and the other owners left before I could get their information so I was left paying the $1000 pet bill.
- That's just responsible dog ownership.
- Must remain at the scene until teport made
- Yes the owner needs to be a responsible owner and take accountability
- Contact information is so hard to obtain in these situations and so if it is a a rule than it can be enforced.
- They should be responsible for all vet bills associated with the attack
- It is part of the responsibility of a dog owner. Makes dog owners accountable
- No explanation required
- The pwrson must be held responsible. If they leave the scene they might disappear and never be held accountable. Flip side, who is going to make them stay on the scene. Bitten pwrson or dog will not even be at the scene. You think they arw going to hang around until someone shows up?
- I think that it's part of being a responsible owner and being a member of a community.
- Our pets are our responsibility. Staying and speaking with an enforcement officer immediately commences a process to resolve a situation. It is more likely to work if all parties can be heard and opportunities for correction rather than loss of the pet or enormous fines incur.
- The victim needs to know if the dog has been vaccinated against rabies, or has shown signs of other zoonotic diseases. Also need to know name of dog and owner if bite is severe, as charges could be laid, euthanasia might be required, etc. It should be illegal to watch your dog be vicious then leave with your dog and not take responsibility for what happened, whether to another person or to another animal.
- I support this. My concern would be that the offending dog may need to removed from the scene. Not sure how practical it is to remove the dog and keep the owner on scene.

- Yes if both parties can remain safely in the area.
- It's no different than an Owner of a vehicle staying at an accident scene
- Common sense
- It's only fair to all involved.
- If the victimized party wants to involve an enforcement officer.
- this is basically like a hit and run. It's illegal to ditch the scene when someone hits your car. It should also be illegal if your dog bites another dog and you run.
- I think irresponsible dog owners should take responsibility - this could mean required obedience courses or fines.
- or charge them if they leave!!! Higher then 350$
- The dog is ultimately the owners responsibility. The owner needs to know this. Many do not seem to want that responsibility or care about others.
- The main goal should be to train the owner on how to respond to these incidents. Not to fine people.
- Any dog owner in a biting incident should face a fine for leaving the scene without sharing valid contact information.
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- In my opinion an offence needs to be addressed. Without this requirement the dog and owner may not be traceable. An fine to leave the scene similar should result in an additional fine that is greater than the offence, sine the offence was not on purpose whereas leaving the scene would be on purpose.
- Communication between owners is key in understanding how the incident happened and potential future interactions.
- Like a car accident. Owner or person responsible for dog shall stay at incident location to explain what happened.
- If the dog owner can gives information to someone on site it might make sense in some circumstances for the owner to remove the dog from the scene.
- It is reasonable to expect the owner or handler of a dog to remain on scene in the event of an incident, no different than the highway traffic act, for the same reasons.
- i cant believe this isn't the law already. yes please make this a law.
- I agree that they should have to stay on site, it is the right thing to do, it is their dog so their responsibility. More still needs to be done to make sure that the humans are held accountable, it is humans who train their dogs to be mean or do not get their dogs proper training and don't correct behaviours. A dog will do what it is taught and if it is taught to be aggressive or aggressive tendencies do not get corrected so that they will learn that is the owners fault
- If a person is injured by a car the driver must stay. Same goes for dogs.
- Not taking responsibility is not an option. It is no different that leaving the scene of any other crime.
- Ensures issue is resolved properly
- There are too many cases with pit bulls attacks - we need to tighten the law to prohibit pit bull ownership in Calgary.

- Absolutely this should not even be a question
- to take accountability
- If medical attention is needed for an animal, a mediator might be needed to make sure that there is a shared responsibility for medical costs.
- of course, this is reasonable, but we do know that most people are not willing to take responsibility for their dog's actions and will leave the scene asap.
- If the owner can safely segregate their dog (like in a vehicle or with another individual that can take the dog home) then yes.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs. They should show responsibility by remaining at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer.
- They are responsible and need to remain until bylaw officers arrive and deal with the situation. They also need to pay for the other person's vet bills - period!!!
- I would like the dog owner to stay at the scene if needed
- Common sense.
- Owners with a dog who bites should not be allowed to flee the scene.
- The owner is responsible for the actions not the pet.
- Just like in a motor vehicle accident same law applied
- Human yes. Dog depends on severity.
- Sharing contact information is important, just like when there is an automobile accident. The victim also needs some compensation in the event that the aggressive dog caused injury requiring medical attention.
- This should be common sense.
- It might be easy for the owner to leave the scene and not be found.
- Fleeing the scene should be seen the same as fleeing an accident.
- Same as a vehicle accident. If someone is injured because of your dog then you are responsible for said injuries.
- The owner deserves a chance to have their side of the story heard.
- The response of the enforcement officer must be reasonable. I would suggest that it must be under 30 minutes.
- The owner needs to be responsible to share information and take responsibility for the actions of their pet.
- Boils down to responsible pet ownership. I have seen a dog attack another and then the owner leaves the scene as he clearly wants to avoid responsibility for his pets actions.
- It should be a criminal offence same as leaving the scene of an accident
- Owners of attack dogs almost always leave the scene and blame the attack on the victim. They owner has committed a crime and should stay until authorities arrive to take their dog away. The only exception is if the dog owner leaves and proceeds immediately to the police station to report their crime

- People should be responsible, it's sad that animals pay the price bad owners. Please make the owners responsible.
- Handler of the biting dog needs to take full responsibility - owner or handler
- All pet owners should be required to take responsibility for their pet's actions when there is a serious incident
- most Pitbull owners would not remain at scene anyway, seen it many times. Those dogs should be illegal to own
- It seems appropriate that a dog owner should provide contact information to acknowledge their responsibility for public harm and danger.
- "It's difficult to find the animal if the owner and the animal
- Runs away. Easy for the offence to happen again"
- The owner must stay to provide contact information and veterinary info if their dog has rabies vaccinations or other medical info, and proof of vaccinations.
- If you own a pet you are responsible for all of its actions.
- They are responsible for their pet and need to be responsible for their pets actions.
- the offending dog must be reported
- If they leave it is not always possible to identify the dog owner.
- People should be accountable when their animals act out, and the other person should be able to contact them, seeing as a bite can lead to other problems.
- like a car accident.
- It is analogous to a car accident and the owner has liability for damages caused by their pet
- Owners are responsible for the animal's behavior and should be held accountable for their action and any expenses incurred
- Be responsible for your pet! Not all dog bites are from bad dogs, I made a wrong move near a Friends nervous dog this summer and got nipped, my fault not the dogs. But if your dog runs after and harms something or someone, stay and face the consequences, or face a larger consequence later when found.
- The owner must ultimately be accountable.
- The owner is responsible for the behaviour of their dog. It is an animal and should be treated as such. We cannot tell what is going on in their minds.
- That seems to be a 'no brainer'. How else can you find out if shots are up to date and handle the vet costs?
- Just like any incident where a third party has been effected by damages like a car accident for example. It should be illegal to leave the scene. Dog attacks are a form of assault.
- Of course, all people involved should remain at the scene.
- Just like a human or car accident.
- This is a crime, intentional or not, and should be treated as such.

- The owner should remain on scene to provide the second side of the story. There may be a large chance that the offending animal was provoked by either the human, animal or both that it had bitten.
- I'm surprised that it's not required. Why do you need an explanation anyway?
- Often dogs causing problems are off leash whether it be an off leash area or not. It's too easy for owners to be 'absent' and just call their dog(s) away and walk off.
- Too often owners simply walk away from a problem their dog has caused. This is totally irresponsible and such owners should be required, at minimum, to remain at the scene and follow-up appropriately (e.g. pay for vet bill if dog injured)
- "Yes however wrong doing needs be litigated in court. I have seen animals as the aggressor not come out as the "winning" animal in a spat between dogs. Guilt is not as easy as whom sustained what injury. Why did it happen?"

- My Grandmother's dog bit a man who tried to mug my Grandmother. Needless to say the victim of the bite did not stay on scene but Because the fog defended her owner in that manner Police had extra info to help locate a suspect possibly seeking medical attention for a bite wound by a Llasa Apso."
- I think that pet owners need to be held more accountable for their pets actions.
- Common sense- they may need to cover vet expenses.
- how's that different than hit and run?
- Yes if it's a serious attack
- There would be need to know if the offending animal is fully vaccinated, any diseases etc. As well as the need for potential bills placed upon the victim
- Your dog, your responsibility
- Owners need to accept responsibility for pets behaviour and any resulting damage.
- Any attack is serious and should be treated as such. To leave the scene after an attack is the height of irresponsibility, and disrespectful to the community. Pet ownership is a privilege, not a right. Losing control of your dog is bad, but animals can be unpredictable. Leaving the scene, however, is controllable, and indicative of a decision to either avoid accountability or stay, and show concern for all parties.
- It should be like a car accident where those involved exchange contact information.
- We should treat dog bites like a traffic accident.
- This is no different than a hit and run. After a collision, you must remain on the scene
- These types of incidences need to be treated the same as a car accident where injuries occur. The owner of the dog needs to assure that help is called for the injured party, both sides of what occurred needs to be assessed to determine what is further required.
- Those owners who own these types of dogs should have a good idea of how they act. If the dog can be put in their vehicle safely, they should most definitely stay on the scene.

- see previous responses
- depending on the situation obviously if it was a minor incident, no. In the case of a more severe bite that could be necessary. I also feel as long as the person gives their contact information to the other person and is cooperative, an enforcement officer could call them after. Its not always a good idea to stick around after a dog fight or dog attack and wait for enforcement, that could cause even more tension and the potential for another incident.
- Same as a vehicle accident or incident.
- The owner of the offending dog should be responsible for the care of the injured person or pet, be responsible for medical bills incurred, offer all information about the offending animal including up to date vaccinations.
- I have heard of too many scenarios where the owner of the attacking animal has left (often angrily) the scene and is never to be found again.
- Of course owner is responsible
- Owners need to be accountable for their dogs actions
- All dog owners must take responsibility for the actions of their dog and provide all relevant information to the affected parties. Additionally, the party causing harm to another should be responsible for any vet bills associated with an attack.
- There should be a rule that you must remain on site for enforcement OR call 311 and self report within 2 hours so that responsible people involved in incidents can secure their animal or seek vet care
- I believe that when a dog bites someone, it is a crime, and shmpiuld be death with in that manner.
- I feel some dog owners have blinders on, don't believe their precious pooch is a nuisance. Also, in some cases, an abusive human has caused the dog to have anxiety, and hopefully an officer would be able to ascertain the situation, and help the dog. IE: humans screaming and yelling at their spouses constantly.
- They need to be held responsible
- Only a lowlife leaves the scene after his dog kills another dog. How sad and very cowardly
- It is important to have follow-up with the animal owner following a biting incident to determine what occurred, if the dog has been vaccinated and if this is a recurrent issue.
- I cannot believe there is not already a law for this. It is shocking and disgusting to me that someone can leave the scene and get away with it. Absolutely there should be a law forcing people to stay at the scene and a harsh penalty if they leave.
- Owners must be responsible.
- Failure to remain at the scene is a crime in vehicle accidents and should be a crime in an animal attack.
- Similar to the law about sticking to those you discover need emergency care. I can't remember the "law" that is called, but people are required to aid those in life threatening condition (so long as not jeopardizing their own health and well being.). They should have to stay if for no other reason than to care for an injured human; plus to be accountable for their dog's behaviour.
- It is important to hold pet owners responsible for their pet's behaviour.

- No different from fleeing the scene of a car accident.
- It is no different then fleeing the scene of a car accident.
- Although I recognize this could cause additional distress or trauma for the victim, particularly if the animal's handler failed to respect the victim's requests for space or quiet.
- Because is required all the version and all information of the vaccine.
- Yes I think that's part of responsible pet ownership
- It is all to easy for a dog owner to remove themselves and their dog and so not be held accountable.
- Both sides of the story need to be presented. It is possible for the dog or person to have provoked the other dog to bite. We have had a German Shephard that was always provoked by very small yappy, barking dogs that always seemed to want to nip at others. Owners of these very small dogs seem careless as to their dog's behaviour.
- The dog's medical history needs to be known
- As a responsible pet owner they should take responsibility for their pet and the actions of the pet. This should happen when they take the animal into their household and say they, the pet, is now part of their family. Unfortunately problems happen when the animal is not cared for properly and the owner does not seem to care. If you want a pet then the responsibility comes with the pet.
- Accountability for damages, history on dog to be recorded. Really these dogs should not be allowed in the city.
- It should be treated no different than a vehicle accident, with fines or punishment for leaving the scene or failure to provide contact info.
- If an owner isn't legally required to stay on-scene then there is no way actions can be taken with the owner (fines, seizure of animal) and no way to record incident allowing officers to track dogs behaviour through proper record keeping
- The human is responsible for the dog's behavior and should pay for any damages.
- Just as with a motor vehicle accident
- If you get into a car accident you have to remain on scene. It's the responsible thing to do.
- My dog was viciously attacked once and there was no way for my to assure that the other dog's owner faced any consequences.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the dogs behavior
- To many times the owners are not held accountable for their responsibility(as a dog is defined as property and ownership according to the law) therefore the owners should be responsible for anything that happens. A kid bad at school mean to another kid gets suspended. Ie. you run over a dog & flee the scene. You should be held responsible, what if someone ran over your child. On a side street in a residential street.
- Why should this be any different than a car accident.
- Too many people leave and avoid responsibility
- The owner of the animal that bites needs to stay and the animal be taken and evaluated we can't have animals that are dangerous to public in public
- Dog owners should be responsible for their pets.
- If a dog bites a person, it has behavioural issues that need to be addressed.

- My niece was bit by a border collie and I couldn't find the owner after reporting it. Bylaw officer was able to find her
- The dog owner's name and contact information is required to determine if the dog's immunizations are current.
- All owners are responsible for their dog and how they are treated/ trained. And the owner should be responsible for paying for any expenses related to the incident (vet or hospital bills)
- Owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their pets no different than any infraction.
- Absolutely if your dog bites another dog or vise versa . Information needs to be exchanged
- Just like a crime or accident owner should remain at the scene
- Aggressive dog owners should be responsible for reparations.
- It is up to the owner to ensure that their animal is under control and does not harm to anyone/anything.
- I think this would be hard to enforce. but it is like the scene of a car accident, you can't just run away. if a dog hurts someone or another dog/animal they should be held accountable in this way.
- It's the only humane thing to do, you don't leave the scene of an accident, someone is injured either animal or human it involves attention, medical or otherwise.
- Police and by-law officers should not have to waste time tracking down offenders.
- I think this important to ensure that injured parties get contact info but also that they have the opportunity to provide their statement of events as well.
- It's the right thing to do
- Not staying is similar to leaving the scene of a vehicle accident. Owners should stay until an enforcement officer arrives on the scene.
- It is a crime. Fleeing a crime scene should be penalized.
- I can't believe this isn't a requirement already
- Because the offending dog owner must be held accountable.
- People need to take responsibility for their dog and need to remain on site for Bylaw officer questioning.
- Anyone involved should remain at the scene or at least protective area and able to file an incident report
- That is just what you should do. It also means that you dont have to look for someone if they need to answer questions
- Yes I supported 100% cause I think that person should be held responsible for any medical or anything to do with the incident that there pet did, on top of been fine as well.
- I had a dog that nipped at another dog even though that dog went at my dog first. I gave my contact info, it's the right thing to do.
- Dog bites cost money to fix properly, the owner of the dog should be responsible for their dog and expenses caused by their dogs actions.
- The owner/guardian is responsible for the dog's interactions with people and other pets.
- As an dog owner you should be responsible for the bite/vet bill

- If the owner does not stay, how would you contact the owner??
- They had to account for their actions
- It's a crime, isn't it? So, yes, the owner of the nuisance dog should stay at the scene of the crime and provide their contact info to the police. They ought to compensate the other party, as well.
- Drivers must do it. I can't believe this isn't a requirement already.
- Why wouldn't you? Unless it would require waiting for an unreasonable period of time.
- People must take responsibility. Just like a car incident.
- They must take responsibility for vet fees and to face their dog being labelled a nuisance to which they have to follow a process of testing their dog for aggression.
- This is a cornerstone of responsible dog ownership.
- There should be stiff penalties for a dog owner who leaves the scene of a dog bite without providing contact information to law enforcement.
- Yes, it at all possible. If the animal is out of control then the owner may need to remove the animal to put in a vehicle and return home, but should contact the appropriate authorities within 1-2 hours.
- They should remain at the scene, but definition of "incident" must be very clear.
- This may be hard to do if the dog is out of control. As long as the owner comes forward within 1-3 hours to police that would be acceptable.
- Seems just like a car accident.
- If you own a dog you are responsible for its conduct - this includes taking responsibility if your dog attacks someone. The owner should be liable for such attacks and should be punished for leaving the scene
- A responsible dog owner (regardless of the dog's breed) would (should) want to be responsible for the dog's actions.
- DOG OWNERS ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR THEIR DOGS. IF THEY LEAVE THE SCENE IT MAY BE IMPOSSIBLE TO TRACK THEM DOWN.
- They need to be present so they can be held accountable, and possibly provide compensation if the situation calls for it.
- This is the responsible thing to do if you own a dog
- It is the best way to ensure the owner of the offending animal is identified and held accountable
- If you assault a person or animal, not staying at the scene is... frowned upon. If you have trained your dog to assault people or animals, it is the same as assault with a weapon, as that is what you trained it for.
- As long as the enforcement officer can respond quickly - some situations may escalate quickly to human conflict
- The person with the nuisance dog should be liable to pay for vet bills of the injured dog.
- The owner is always at fault.
- same as a hit and run. If it inflicted damage to a person or animal they should be held accountable

- My friends 14 lb dog was attacked by an off leash out of control Saint Bernard. Came off a school yard field, shook her dog out of its harness off the leash and three surgeries later, my friend is still dealing with complications. The other dog has had no repercussions.
- Be a responsible pet owner
- If you are involved in an incident with your vehicle you are required to stay at the scene and share information. I think the same should be true if your dog is involved in something. Perhaps fines could be imposed for leaving the scene if your dog is involved in an attack or something as it causes police or bylaw officers to spend extra time to track an owner down if they leave the scene.
- I feel like there should a record for the history of not only the animal, but the owner as well responsible for any incident reflecting current and pass incidents involving their animal(s)
- Of course. I cannot believe this is not already a rule.
- Do the right thing not be a coward
- Too many owners don't take appropriate responsibility for their dogs behaviour, and this would mandate them to do so.
- It's the right thing to do. No bsl
- Too often owners take off, trying to avoid responsibility for their animals behaviour.
- That would be similar case to #hit and run# in which the car driver hits another car and drive away or to other criminal case in which someone hits other and run away.
- the owner is responsible for any incident involving his/her dog and therefore must stay at the scene and provide info to the enforcement officer
- You guys are retarted for continuing to use pitbulls as the poster dogs for "vicious behaviour"
- they need to be held accountable and deal with their irresponsible handling of their dog
- If the dog owner of the aggressive dog doesn't remain at the scene, the officer doesn't have ability to find the owner and follow up on the dog's behaviour.
- Treat it like a hit and run. If their dog bites... they need to be there to give their account and take ownership if deemed necessary.
- It is similar to remaining at the scene of an accident or crime scene it is a serious incident someone or something was injured or killed as recently seen when a Labradoodle was killed by a loose dog owner took off with the offending dog upstanding citizen Not!
- If situation is severe and warrants authorities to be contacted then, just like in a car accident, all parties should remain at the scene until situation is dealt with.
- Too many irresponsible owners are not held accountable because they leave the scene and then not penalized adequately.
- Similar to a car accident where you must remain at the scene till Police arrive (or are contacted). Too often the irresponsible owners take off and there is no proof as to their identity. In addition there should be an additional fine if you leave the scene of the crime (so to speak).
- Yes, or otherwise it is considered as a hit and run in my opinion
- The owners should also be responsible for vet Bill's etc.
- Their should be high fines for someone whom leaves the scene.

- They should have to explain themselves. They should be responsible for all vet fees that their dog causes to another Dog
- Yes, it would help make owners take responsibility for their pets behaviours. Injuries can be serious and costly, and are no less important than if it was a vehicular accident.
- IF it is possible . If the owner needs to get the dog out of the situation they should be able to do that, and then return to the scene.
- Because too often the victim is traumatized and not thinking clearly enough to ask for the contact info. Or, the dog owners of the attacking dog flee the scene leaving the victim helpless.
- The offending dog should be contained first
- Absolutely owner is responsible for the dogs actions.
- Owner has responsibility for the incident and must act accordingly. Same as a hit-and-run situation.
- It's just like a car crash for liability.
- A person with an animal (ANY size or breed) that has bitten a person or other dog needs to be 1) able to explain if this is an isolated incident which they would address 2) held responsible for their dogs behaviour.
- As mentioned above, enforcement is key as well as accountability of the owner or whoever is in charge of the dog. And this should not be limited to bites but to other physical attacks.
- we do the same activity when we get into a car accident, it seems to make common sense when damage is done to a person or pet from another person's pet.
- "If they r able too.
- Information should be shared but take care of the dog first."
- Need take responsibility. Cannot avoid issue
- It's the responsible thing for the dog owner to do as he is now representing the dogs interest.
- no getting away with it nonsense
- Shots up to date; extenuating circumstances
- Yes if any breed has a bite incident not just a certain type of breed
- Same as staying at the scene of a traffic accident
- It is illegal to do a hit and run with your car. Leaving the scene of a violent attack your dog caused us the same
- Owners are responsible for their dogs, and should remain at the scene of an incident. Failure to do so should result in an additional bylaw violation.
- In most cases leaving the scene is just trying to avoid prosecution.
- As long as the dog can be secured, they should stay at the scene, or at a minimum exchange contact information with them and the dogs license number
- The owner Must Be Responsible for their dog, "leaving the scene of an accident/attack" should result in jail time!
- Anyone taking an animal out in a public area is accountable for the behaviour & actions of the animal.

- unless the offending dog owner needs to remove their animal from the area for the safety of others - it's rather case dependent
- This is a liability issue and the pet owner should be responsible for their pets behavior.
- They must bear responsibility for their pet. If they flee the scene they should be fined.
- The dog owner is responsible, they should be punished, fined, and held responsible for all losses suffered by any victim. It's no different than a car accident if an injury is involved. Dog owners must be held responsible!
- They are responsible for the care of my animal once their animal bites my dog. I need to know where to send the bill.
- Take responsibility for your dog
- Owners should be held responsible for their pets and allowing people to freely leave is irresponsible
- If your dog hurts an animal or human or breaks something you should be held responsible for it
- obvious.
- Repeat or serious offences or malicious complaints can't be addressed properly without an owner & dog being identified. This may be the best way to address that problem.
- If the owner of a dog has not put in the required care and training to ensure that it will not attack another dog, they must answer to their shortcomings as a pet owner. I also believe that the owner of the dog that started a confrontation should be the one to answer ie. If a small dog attacks a larger dog but is injured because the larger dog is defending itself, the large-dog owner should NOT be held responsible for their dog defending itself. If small-dog owners cannot control their animals, they should have the same repercussions as those who own larger dogs.
- Only if it is a serious bite that draws blood.
- If i hit someone with a car i have to stay on scene as i am responsible, as a dog owner same difference i am responsible and should have to stay.
- The enforcement officer should take away the dog and hefty fine given to the owner. Later the dog should be put down.
- As a dog owner, you are responsible for your pet. You should be required to remain at the scene of the incident and take responsibility for the actions of your dog.
- Responsible pet ownership
- It drives accountability for pet owners.
- Just like any other kind of incident, must stay at the scene.
- Why would they leave? The dog should be seized in any case.
- If the bite is large enough to require a vet assistance, yes. If it's just a superficial wound, then no.
- Owners must be the ones held responsible for a dog's behaviour. If the dog has received negative training (encouraged to bite or attack, trained to growl at certain people and animals, etc.), or has received inadequate obedience/household training, that responsibility rests with the owner, not the animal in question.
- The owner is the person responsible, not the dog. Negligent ownership is the problem. These dogs suffer because of their owners. They lack training. Owners should 'own up' to their dogs poor behaviours.

- Too many irresponsible dog owners who take off instead of accepting responsibility.
- I have personally been involved in an incident where the owner and pit bull that injured a dog simply left the scene
- If the dog owner leaves then they avoid all responsibility.
- Be responsible for your pet.
- It is the mature and responsible thing to do.
- Yes if the bite is severe but stating 'any bite' can be blown out of proportion by the general public. Dogs nip and mouth during play, they also snap and correct each other when one steps out of line. Many owners do not have control of their dogs, especially in offleash areas and do not step in to correct poor behaviour. Many owners are not even within 100 feet of their dog in these areas, its seen as a free for all babysitting service while they chat.
- Their should be fines or payment for injury's to the party hurt so they need to stay and give their contact info to the officer
- Seems similar to a car accident -- if the parties decide it's not a problem for either, they can walk away. If there's an issue, then they could share contact info or wait for an officer to assist.
- I feel like this is pretty common sense.
- Pet owners are legally responsible for the actions of their pets. If you are involved in a automobile accident it is illegal to leave the scene. A dog attack should be treated in the same manner.
- They should have to stay because they should be legally responsible to pay the vet bill of the injured animal.
- This is no different than staying at the scene of a car accident in order to ensure the details of the incident are properly documented, and the party at fault is held responsible.
- I have report dog bite attacks to City of Calgary but no action taken. No fines. Poor or no communication from city planners and bylaw as to making changes to on lease areas in parks.
- Irresponsible pet owners often leave the scene of the crime. They should be required to stay or face additional fines if they leave.
- This is a HELL YES. Just this week a dog owner left the scene after their dog attacked and killed a smaller dog. It should be mandatory the owner of the vicious dog pay the vet bills for attacked dog and their owner
- Pet owners have a responsibility for their pets and should be willing to be held accountable in the event their pet is found to have been involved in an aggressive incident.
- Exactly like a traffic incident - all parties must remain at the scene or addition criminal charges are laid on the party that leaves without providing accurate contact information. It's a hit & run.
- We need to be able to track the dog, hold the owner accountable and be able to track down the owner if compensation is due for any damage.
- it is not the dog you would punish it is the owner, I myself have been bitten by a tiny dog and yet I have met the nicest Pit Bull. so the owner must make sure he/she trains the dog
- Dog attacks, where the owner and offending dog leave, should be treated the same as a hit and run vehicle accident.
- Owner has to take responsibility and public safety is important.

- Absolutely!!! It's the same as fleeing a car accident scene or anything else - you must stay and answer to what your dog has done because you've let it.
- Large vet bills and the offenders owner should be responsible. Easier to locate owners
- Being a responsible pet owner demands you remain at the scene of any incident involving your pet.
- Just the right thing to do
- If an officer is require and they flee there should be a fine for fleeing
- This is no different than a car accident there are potential liability issues involved so obviously the person needs to stay.
- DUH!!!!
- This is the same logic as remaining at the scene of an accident.
- why waste resources on tracking down the individual
- Like a road accident, culpability and responsible behaviour required of both parties.
- Dog owner is the responsible party and needs to stay and deal with the consequence of an incident.
- Yes. Be accountable
- I agree with this statement because it ensures that the owner is held accountable for their actions regarding that dog. It is important the owner remains at the scene to not only acknowledge the actions of their dog, but also let the officer/victim know of anything their dog might have that could be life threatening (if the dog has or hasn't had its rabies vaccination). Going forward the enforcement officer can assess and advise the owner on potential options for obedience training or other behavioural improvement options.
- it same as a driver must remain on the scence after causing car accident
- The person must be held accountable and face the penalties for having such a dog and damages done. The dog could do further damage if not apprehended.
- So often people dismiss incidents such as knocking someone over with I'm so sorry he's usually so friendly (likes it's the victims fault). Having to stay and give info would prevent downgrading the incident esp for biting.
- Isn't already enforced? The pet owner is responsible 100% of their pets actions and should face all consequences like it was done by themselves. Pets must be considered an extension of the owners will.
- It is necessary for the dog owner to remain onsite in order to address the situation and coordinate action plan, including the expenses associated with the attacks.
- This can help with determining rabies status of the animal.
- I've had numerous friends who had encounters while their dog is leashed, had their dog attacked by the off-leash dog (one incident was quite brutal), and then owner of the aggressive dog leaves the scene (a bite and run, if you will). But seriously, I don't see this as overly different from the vehicular concept of hit and run. If your dog attacks another person and/or their dog, it's the owner's responsibility to assist in rectifying the situation, such as remaining on scene/sharing contact info/enforcement officer discussion.

- At the very least, it is damage to property and it would be criminal to leave the scene in any other instance. For example, someone cannot hit a car and leave the scene which would then be considered a 'hit and run' and is a crime.
- Of course! It's illegal to leave the scene of a traffic accident so of course the owner must remain at the scene if their dog attacking a person or animal. It called being a responsible human.
- How is this not already the case. This seems like the common sense answer.
- Hold the dog owner 100% responsible remove the dog and prosecute the owner in the court.
- It is the owner's responsibility.
- It should be a crime to flee.
- If your dog bites a person or animal you should be legally responsible for damages unless there are mitigating circumstances.
- What a "stupid" question.. whats wrong with you people!!
- It's a type of crime the owner needs to be responsible not run away like a criminal
- There is no way to force someone to stay on scene after a dog attack, and keeping an aggressive dog around may lead to more attacks or violence. Cell phone pictures and assistance from other people near the attack may be the only way to capture the owners information (ie licence plate, vehicle etc) .
- If you flee the scene of an accident in a car, it's a crime. Your animal attacking someone shouldn't be any different.
- Yes, but there's no reason they should have to wait if they can share with an authority over the phone and pictures can be taken.
- Similar to a hit & run situation.
- If your dog bites someone you need to stay and face the consequences except for cases of self defense
- An incident should be treated like an automobile collision - exchange personal information, call an enforcement officer to confirm that the information given isn't false information.
- Allowing a dog owner to leave without sharing contact information or speaking with an enforcement officer only increases the risk that the dog involved will offend again, that the owner will not take any significant steps to curb the behavior, or that the owner will try to shield a dangerous animal from consequences. The required sharing of contact information and speaking with an officer could be modeled after laws regarding car accidents.
- It's their responsible to remain at the scene like a car accident. And also to be responsible for costs associated from the bite or attack
- Pretty self explanatory. You have to remain at the scene of a car accident regardless of injury or death, so you should have to remain at the scene of a dog attack if your dog, of which you are ultimately responsible for, is involved.
- Yes, the pet owner should have to stay and be held responsible but only if they are able to de-escalate and calm their animal to prevent further trauma.
- Enforcement officers are able to see if there was a 'trigger' for the bite, how the animal is currently acting (tail tucked between legs- afraid), get accurate owner information and to potentially seize the dog if the owner cannot control them or the animal appear abused or in pain. Also was the person who was bit at fault? Did they threaten to the dog owner and the dog was protecting, were they warned not to approach the dog? Blame cannot and should not be solely placed on the dog.

- It can be difficult when your dog has been attacked to insist on getting contact info. A by-law requiring owners to stick around would help.
- There are few bad dogs. There appear to be owners who are irresponsible owners...people who don't realize that owning a dog is a commitment and significant responsibility. Implement practices that are time and cost effective to administer. And that make owners responsible for their dogs behaviour.
- If the owner is present and sees what happens then you might be able to get a full story and realize the dog may have acted out of self protection
- Why not?
- Yes, they should be identified so that they may be held accountable.
- The dog owner has a responsibility to the injured party for the incident, and should remain at the scene if safe to do so (i.e. dog under control). Enforcement officers should not have to track down the dog owner.
- "It's a dick-move if the owner of the offending animal were to ditch the scene and run-off.
- If any occurrence of this were to happen, it would be ideal to punish the runner as if they were a driver committing a hit and run."
- A dog bite is essentially an assault. A person who flees the scene of an assault faces additional penalties, and because the owner is responsible for the dog a similar standard should be required.
- Negligent dog owners losing control of their dogs should be there to take ownership of what their pet did to someone else that could cause physical and mental trauma. Bylaw officers shouldn't have to track these type of owners down. If they fled the scene, the fine should be even higher.
- If you're required to do it for a car accident, you should have to do it for a dog accident.
- They should definitely be required to remain at the scene and they should be required to pay for any medical bills for the victim, be it human or animal.
- Most people handle dog bites/dog attacks with the owners of each dog. Therefore treating it more like a car accident has officers see if the dog (that bite the other) has previous bite history and either declare if the dog is a 'dangerous dog' under the bylaw or not.
- The owner is the one who should be held responsible for the behaviour of their dog. The owner is the one who should take care of the entire situation and suffer the consequences.
- How is this not a rule already
- It is the responsible thing to do in any incident.
- I think it's necessary for dog owners to be accountable to an injury caused to another person and follow the same protocol as they would if they were to cause a motor vehicle accident, for example. I say this particularly because pet owners' behaviour is largely the reason for their animals' behaviour, and thus the onus is on the pet owner, not the pet, if their pet acts aggressively.
- unless they need to get the animal to a veterinarian. Then they should not face fines for leaving
- Another dog biting, is like a hit and run with a car. Damage can be small or significant.

- It is like leaving the scene of an accident.
- Similar to a hit and run if someone leaves the scene of an incident they should be charged.
- Unless the dog is still a hazard when leashed and owner present
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour
- I believe that the dog owners should be held accountable for their dog's actions.
- Seems like common sense especially with earlier case this week of an irresponsible pit-bull owner fleeing the scene after his vicious dog mauled and murdered someone elses non aggressive dog.
- so there's 2 sides to a story always
- I feel the owner needs to take responsibility and potentially make restitution for damages caused by their pet. Similar to motor vehicle accidents they should be required to remain at the site and provide their contact information.
- Harsher fines and penalties for offending dog owners
- Hit and run already illegal this is dog version
- An attack incident is no less serious than a vehicle accident. Hit and run is illegal.
- I think that the owner should be held accountable for their dogs misbehaving.
- 10x the fine for leaving the scene and requiring the police to spend time and resources in finding them
- They should also be responsible for veterinary bills if they inflicted injury on another animal.
- Really- this actually needs an explanation [removed]!! Ban pit bulls now [removed]!!!
- Keep them accountable
- Because someone who can't bother to train their dog probably can't be trusted to do the right thing when they're off the scene.
- Owners should have to stay at scene as one would in an accident and failure to do so should lead to charges
- Absolutely. This is necessary to ensure the dog has necessary shots as well as if there are any complications that occur after the bite. The dog owner has to be held accountable and is responsible for their dogs behaviors
- The owner of the dog should be held responsible for the dogs actions. Maybe we could have the dog owned declared a nuisance and prohibit them from owning dogs.
- it can be a very hard thing to enforce. People can be flighty. I do believe they should stay. It is just like a hot and run if they don't and it should be treated as such.
- I support this but it is a bit tricky to define a bite. Dogs bite when they play. Sometime there is an altercation between the animals but the bite wound isn't discovered until later.
- Too many owners excuse their dog's aggressive behavior....he is excited...he has never bitten before etc but owners MUST be held responsible.
- It should be a crime to have your dog injure a person or pet and not stay on the scene
- Responsible dog ownership requires taking responsibility for the actions of the dog. If both parties agree that bylaw does not need to be called then the matter ends that point (yes there are cases where dogs bite and parties mutually agree to move on). If one party wants to call bylaw then the other party needs to stay. Of course if one party needs to get their dog to a vet that gets tricky (is the other to follow them to the vet?). As well, it is not unusual for the owner of the aggressive dog to themselves become aggressive. There cannot be a requirement that the victim be required to stay in the proximity of an aggressive owner of a dog who has just attacked the victim or the victim's dog.

- As an owner you are responsible for the actions of your pet. It should be clear though that staying doesn't mean they will take and then kill your pet. There needs to be confidence that there are steps before euthanasia.
- If you are required to remain on scene after a car accident, a dog attack is no different.
- Too many times dog owners walk away with a dog that should be reported
- If they leave then the fine should increase and be enough to cover a vet bill as if the animal has died. Ex. Fine $350 person leaves, 10 times that amount.
- This should be required and is the right thing to do in any situation where an incident occurs.
- The owners need to stay to talk to authorities so they are accountable and part of the 'process' of sharing information with the officers. The owner is responsible for the dog's actions and needs to be accountable to the other people and or pets involved. The rights of the dog owner must never come before the victim's.
- Finding an animal after the fact that was involved in something can be way too difficult, especially if those around aren't versed in breeds and such. If somebody asked me to identify a dog that attack another animal and then took off, I would absolutely not be able to provide a shred of useable info other than the color.
- Because it is very important to record all the facts of any incident at the time it occurs, And to ensure the offending dogs owner is identified in case the victim requires it for legal purposes and to ensure the offending dogs owner is identified in case the victim requires it for legal purposes
- Absolutely yes. We have laws against hit and runs, why should it be different with a bite and run?
- This all falls on the owner. Do not punish good dogs for not being cared for properly.
- My dog was bitten by another dog at an off leash park. The same dog also tried to bite me. The owner saw it all and made no attempt to help, or apologise. I quickly checked my dog over to see how bad the damage was, and in that time the owner and dog had disappeared. I shouldn't have had to be responsible for the $600 vet bill, especially since the owner witnessed the incident and knew his dog was in the wrong.
- If a dog bites someone the owner should remain at the scene and provide there info and depends on severity and reason why dog attacked. The dog should be muzzled until further notice
- No difference than a hit and run
- if the dog owner does not remain at the scene of the incident there is no way of tracing the dog and dealing with the problem.
- otherwise it is a hit and run and should be treated as such, the only reason to leave is if the dog needs to be brought under control but in that case the person needs to leave full contact information and also make sure the person or other animal has help before leaving.

- Dog owner need to show they are responsible for any actions their pet is involved in just like the driver does in event of injured during a car accident involving injuries.
- No hit and run scenarios.
- I've been bitten and the owner and dog took off because they can. There is no consequence therefore no incentive for irresponsible owners to train their dog.
- You cannot do a hit and run with a vehicle, so why allow owner/dog to bite/kill and run?
- A lot of dog owners are declining responsibilities
- You'll never be able to fine them or take their dog if you can't find them when they escape.
- Seems obvious. Owner must remain on scene to provide contact details. May be liable for attacked dog's Vet bills.
- Not remaining at the scene is similar to a hit and run
- Objectively, this situation is property damage. Subjectively, I doubt that a person who has not demonstrated the required responsibility to dog ownership, could be counted on provide any restitution required as in vet bills, etc.
- it should be dealt with right away. I would not want offenders to disappear.
- It is the responsible thing to do
- I absolutely think the owner needs to remain on the scene, as one would for, say, a vehicle accident. However, I think we need to be mindful here of the victim also. If having the owner and dog remain in the same location will cause further trauma to the victim and/or hype the dog up to the point there remains a danger, we need an alternative option. Further, if I play this scenario out, it's possible that both in heightened states, victim and owner may become emotional and exacerbate the situation, so I think we need some guidance here as well.
- The owner should be responsible for the dog at all times. If the dog injured another person or animal it is irresponsible to leave the scene and the person should then be held accountable
- its just like a car accident , if another dog is injured they should remain at the scene and share information for futher vet vills , charges etc
- The dog owner needs to be responsible for the actions of his pet.
- Requiring the owner to remain at the scene of the violation results in the owner being held accountable for his/her pet's actions. Why would any thinking person vote "no"?
- Be accountable for your pet behavior
- Owner must be responsible
- Leaving the scene of a dog attack is not different than hitting someone's vehicle and not leaving contact information. It is akin to leaving the scene of a crime and should be treated as such.
- If your dog bites someone you should wait. You would hope that's common sense but it's not
- The event of an attack should be seen the same way that a car accident should, i.e. both parties should remain at the scene until it is assessed by an enforcement officer. However, if both parties present agree this is an unnecessary step (e.g. if the severity of the incident is minimal) then it should be acceptable to forego the involvement of an enforcement officer.
- It should be like a car accident where both parties have to stick around until an officer arrives on scene and makes a decision on what needs to occur.

- Yes its an offense to leave the scene of a crime and if your dog hurts another one you need to remain there and deal with it or you deserve a ticket for that as well.
- The dog owner cannot be allowed to just walk away, shrug their shoulders, and say "Oh well, these things happen." Support the victim.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for any harm caused by their dogs, and anyone who doesn't should be fined in addition to their other charges.
- We have witness owners walking away from a scene. It's like walking away from an accident
- you have no way of proving any kind of insurance is carried. I am sure bylaw hasn't any time to be checking up on loose dogs and cats. We have 1 owner and 2 dogs always running at large here, nothing is ever done.
- Absolutely. My sister's dog was killed in a public park this summer. The owner of the vicious mastif fled the scene and would not have been found without the help of witnesses. He got away with a slap on the wrist.
- "Take responsibility if their animal
- Is involved"
- I have witnessed the damage a dog can inflict, owners must stay on scene
- It should be against the law to leave the scene and if one does they would face fines and criminal charges.
- No different than a hit and run.
- It's part of being a responsible pet owner. It's like staying at the scene of an accident - promotes accountability.
- This is 100% the responsible thing to do. If someone leaves the scene and is located, they should be fined just as they are during a vehicle accident.
- It's similar to remaining at the scene of an accident
- This rule needs to apply to all dog breeds. I have been bitten and scared by a chihuahua, all dogs can be dangerous.
- Owners should be responsible and held liable for the behaviour of their dogs
- The owner is responsible for the behavior of their pet.
- Same is expected of people involved in an assault or a motor vehicle accident.
- If any dog attacks another dog or a person, the owner must accept full responsibility for the animals actions. Therefore they must remain at the scene, and control their pet
- Owners need to be held accountable.
- If hit and run is not okay for a car, why should it be okay for an aggressive dog?
- It is the responsibility of the owner to answer for their animals actions. By being required to stay on scene owners may be more vigilant in preventing situations or incidents from occurring.
- Owners who do not remain at scene usually never get held accountable
- Injury from a dog but does not show up for 30 minutes or so. We didn't see blood until we got home and went to the vet to find out dog needed stitches.
- Accountability for your dogs actions must be enforced.

- Dog ownership comes with many responsibilities and that includes accounting for your dog's actions.
- There should be a significant fine if one does not remain at the scene to leaving the scene of a car accident.
- You cannot leave the scene of an accident, this is similar.
- The dog owner must be held responsible for injury to another including inherit costs
- Just like a hit & run road incident. Owners can be difficult to locate.
- If possible. If the dog is too out of control and needs to be restrained back in a car or a house the ownership then follow up with the city of Calgary or return to the scene once their dog is secure
- An owner's dog who has harmed another animal or human should be responsible for any medical bills. They should also be identified as a nuisance or aggressive dog
- too many nuisance dog owners run away and have to be tracked down and penalty is not large, owners need to take responsibility for their pets
- Less resources to search for an owner
- The non responsible owners must stay on site. Saves time looking for them later with. Fines should be much higher.
- Their dog, their responsibility. Much like a car accident.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets
- Offending dog owner should remain to provide info and face repercussions.
- Incidents should be viewed as a criminal offence and treated as such. This is not the early 1900's. Some dog breeds are trained to be overly aggressive, intimidate or are raised by people who have anti social personalities and the animals are ticking time bombs.
- It's like a car/bike/pedestrian accident, law requires you to remain at the scene this isn't much different especially if injuries to person/animal occur
- the owners must be responsible for any medical cost.
- I believe it should be considered similar to a "hit and run" incident if an owners dog causes damage and does not remain on scene
- It doesn't seem practical vis a vis the ongoing availability of enforcement officers.
- Owners must take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
- Information needs to be shared in an attack situation
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their pet.
- The owner of the offending dog must take responsibility for the dog's behaviour
- However, the owner should be able to secure the aggressor dog in a safe place, which may mean temporary leaving scene to secure dog and returning to scene.
- As long as the dog can be restrained and there is no danger to people and other dogs the owner should remain at the scene
- A dog owner should have to take full responsibility for their dogs actions. Including paying for any treatment. The owner should be charged if there are injuries.
- Any attempt to flee should be taken into account and result in more severe penalties.

- people should take responsibility for their pets, which is difficult if contact info isn't provided
- I am surprised this is not already the law!
- Like a vehicle injury accident, priority must be to immediate health and safety of bitten animal but license of offending animal and owner needs to be identified for liability for medical bills and identifying problem animals
- This is ideal in case there are complications or further incidents with the same dog. However, I feel like irresponsible citizens won't stay even if there is a rule
- Responsible dog ownership dictates that this is the reasonable thing to do. Unfortunately, creating a law will not solve the problem, but it will give the city a course of action should an identifiable owner leave the scene.
- it's about responsibility and accountability, something a lot of dog owners lately don't seem to have.
- People need to be accountable for their pets actions as they are responsible for them
- To get information
- The owner should arrested and charged with endangering public safety immediately after the bite occurs. Should include jail time (6 months min) and fine minimums of at least $10,000
- As long as their animal is under control and not going to cause more harm.
- It's not different than an accident.
- Yes for a severe enough bite or if the injured party requests it, and a reasonable amount of wait time. That's being responsible even if your dog reacted out of character.
- Documentation, tracking is important
- Like any accident, the person should remain to share their contact information
- The dog owner should be accountable for their dog
- "Bites dog on dog no unless is severe
- Bites on human yes always no matter the age"
- Human decency. It is the least the dog owner could do in this situation.
- Dogs are a reflection of the owner. The owner should be liable for any attacks that their pet is involved in.
- It is the responsible thing to do. Medical information, vaccination records, etc may be needed.
- Taking responsibility for events that have tranpired.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility
- too many irresponsible owners flee the scene after their dog attacks, there definitely needs to be consequences for leaving just as there are consequences for leaving a crash scene.
- Yes, this needs to be a requirement. Owners must take responsibility and know that that they must be able to control their animals at all times. If there is an incident, the absolute least they need to do is remain at the scene.
- Owners should be held responsible for actions committed by the dog as if committed by themselves, penalties of up to $1000 should be established to ensure enforcement.

- Owners need to be responsible for the actions of their dog. Ultimately they put the dog in that position. If both parties work it out between themselves, to each party's satisfaction, then bylaw does not need to be involved. If not then definitely both parties need to remain at the scene.
- Accountability is key! Any dog is capable of biting. It is the owners' responsibility to know their dog, ensure they have the correct training and keep them out of situations that may trigger the dog. If something was to happen it is on the HUMAN to take accountability for the dog's actions similar to a parent with a child.
- That is responsible dog ownership. Safer for the dog. Only concern would be for the victims- especially if the owner is not cooperative.
- Take responsibility and don't hide.
- The owner is responsible for the dog so they should have to answer for any incidents involving their dog
- People need to be responsible
- But I don't see how this is any more enforceable. There seems to be a trend of people running away.
- It's important for the enforcement officer to hear the information from all sides. If the dog owner leaves, it's not possible to get the information at that exact time.
- The owner is responsible for their pet
- It is too difficult to locate a person after the incident.
- But who is going to enforce this "Rule" when it happens. There is no one stopping someone from leaving. It's like asking a bank robber to wait with the money while the police arrive.
- Both parties should have a chance to explain to the officer what happened. If the dog is at fault (regardless of breed and size), owners should be held accountable for their dog's behavior. Pet ownership should not be allowed by the city to be taken lightly, all dog owners should properly socialize and train their dogs so they can be a part of the community. However, people and especially children should also be educated on how to interact with dogs and they should NEVER approach dogs they do not know in on-leash and off-leash areas. Part of making our community better is to make sure pet owners are responsible caring and training their pets but also non-pet owners are responsible and understand how to interact with pets.
- Too many times after an aggression takes place, the owner and aggressive dog leave the scene. People are left wondering about shots it may or may not have, history, owner information, etc.
- It should be treated like a scene of an accident. If I bite a kid and walk away I will face penalties. Why wouldn't it be the same for a dog.
- Everyone is responsible for the behaviour of their clients or dog.
- Owner needs to be responsible for the actions of their dog.
- People need to be accountable for their pet's actions.
- People must take responsibility for their pet's behavior and be accountable
- "Similar to a car accident the owner should stay and be responsible for their actions or their animal's on action's. so if an animal attacks another dog or person and the owner a
- links away or hides that is wrong and shows no accountability."

- As a dog owner it is my responsibility to exchange information and pay any vet bills if my dog injured another dog. This should be a bylaw here in Calgary!
- "Similar to vehicle accidents, owners should be required to stay until the situation can be assessed by authorities, and contact information should be shared regardless of fault. Therefore if further action needs to be taken (removal of the dog, required rehabilitation or training, etc), the owner can be contacted or the city can follow up with the owner.
- Witnesses should also be encouraged or required to wait for officers to give statements and contact information as well."
- Too many people try to avoid responsibilities this should be mandatory and fines should be levied for owners who do not stay. This causes more expense in looking for them as well as the chance they can hide their dog from authorities Also makes it more difficult to prove it was their dog
- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions. just like a person is responsible to stay on scene for something they've done
- Too many times pit bull owners specifically run from the scene of an attack and hide their animal which leads one to believe this has happened more than once with their dog.
- there should be some sort of contact. It is the owner's responsibility to make sure their dog is trained not to bite. If this is not possible there should be a muzzle and it shouldn't be let off-leash in any public area. If an enforcement officer if necessary 1 they must get control of their dog and 2 deal the consequences.
- It should essential they remain at the scene and take accountability for the situation
- Yes, the dog owner must take responsibility for their dog's behaviour. However, this should only be the case for severe bites that cause injury. 'Dog bite' needs to be clearly defined as there is a difference between a playful nip and a bite that causes injury.
- Depending on the severity of the bite and the situation that dog owner could be responsible for the vet bills of the other dog.
- It's the only way to be able to track these incidents
- My dog was attacked when he was on leash - and the other dog owner just left with his dog, and I was left with a scared dog and a vet bill. Unfortunately, we can't always count on people to do the right thing.
- I think that animal behaviorists need to be part of the conversation. I don't think bylaw have enough training to know when the issue is with the dog and when the issue is with the victim or when the issue is with the dog owner. It's easy to blame the animal but often times they are the primary victim.
- Similar to a car accident, all parties involved should be required to stay until due-process has been completed. Parties who leave the scene should be charged with a "hit-and-run" fine as well
- Should there be a rule, like the bite must have caused the victim to bleed? Just worry about disagreements over what constitutes a bite... puppies like to "nip" for instance.
- The victim shouldn't have to track the perpetrator. It's like a hit and run.
- In case the owner of the animal isn't up to date on his/her shots and rabies vaccine. At least the person bit can ask the owner which shots they have had and if they need to seek medical attention.

- The requirement should be the same as for a person causing a car accident. (Possible exception would be to allow the owner to leave the scene to secure the offending dog if it poses a further hazard to people or other pets, but he or she should be required to return to the scene forthwith after doing so.)
- The situation can be highly emotional for all involved. Exchanging contact information would be preferred so that the situation can be deescalated by removal of the dog from the scene in a timely manner. Not able to predict time of bylaws response.
- Absolutely a person should remain at the scene in case additional information is required or medical attention is advised. People need to be held accountable for the actions of their dogs by being responsible dog owners.
- Dog owner to take responsibility
- Yes, just like the scene of an accident. How can the owner be responsible for expenses related to the incident that just happened if the injured had no contact info? City bylaws state that owners are responsible for damages caused by their pets.
- Responsibility is always on the owner
- It's just like getting into a car accident and getting the other drivers info
- Yes as long as the wait is a reasonable time. Otherwise leaving contact information with the complainant would suffice.
- Dogs that bite are a huge danger - yes the owner should have to stay at the incident. It's incredible to me that they are even given a second chance.
- If the owner of the dog leaves then he or she should also be charged with an offence.
- The dog owner is responsible for looking after their dog while on walks and on/off leash dog parks. If you see the dog is stressed and uncomfortable with other dogs running up to it and wanting to play, maybe take your dog out of the situation so an incident does not occur. I've been to many parks where the owners are doing their own thing while their dogs are running around and not playing nicely.
- All incidents need recording so problem animals/owners don't just go to different parks/trails.
- Similar to hit and run collisions. This would give enforcement some information to locate dogs and their owners, or give grounds to penalize owners for non-compliance.
- Yes, my son has been bit by a dog (not pit bull) and the owners were a neighbour who never said even sorry to my son. They blamed my son who reached into a tree at the fence line and tore huge scars into my sons arm who still has ptsd. That same dog attacked another kid not even a year later almost making him not walk.
- If you pet attacks another person or animal unprovoked you should be responsible for paying for vet bills ect
- Otherwise it's basically a "hit and run" and the dog and owner get away with the behaviour. Also the dog owner should assist the injured person.
- The owner of the dog is responsible for his/her animal. Should stay and assist the authorities.
- All people should take responsibility for a dog attack

- Absolutely! The owner is certainly responsible in some way and must remain at the scene unless emergency circumstances (such as getting the dog away from the victims)
- I support this so long as it makes sense for the owner to remain at the scene. For example, if their dog bit another dog or person out of fear and needs to be removed from the situation to avoid further trauma, then the owner should definitely provide contact information but still leave the scene. Could make it a requirement that the owner return once dog has been taken home, picked up, etc.
- Responsible ownership should include taking responsibility
- To create accountability from the owner
- If it is not taken to extremes (eg. for a chihuahua). It would save time and money locating the dog(s) in question for a health assessment and possibly confinement
- My dog was attacked by two German Shepherds in Shouldice Park, each dog was on a leash. The two German Shepherds were able to pull their owner 50 ft across the grass to the path I was walking my dog on with my husband. We were extremely fortunate that our dog survived and only needed stitches at the event. This whole ordeal made me realize how quickly things can get out of hand when someone has more than one dog, even when they are on a leash. Luckily the owner of the dog gave me her contact information, although I took a bunch of pictures of her instead. It should be the offenders responsibility to pay for any cost associated with their aggressive dogs, and these dogs need to be monitored in case these are not solo incidents and then dealt with accordingly.
- Yes, they should have to stay.
- Necessary for follow-up and punitive actions following the incident
- Yes that's the responsible thing to do and expected
- Responsible
- Just to know if the dog has been vaccinated and depending how severe vet bills
- It is an ethical responsibility to remain accountable for your actions or those for whom you are liable.
- Any dog that bites a person must be put to death immediately.
- You can't take off from a car accident, or from an assault, or accident that involves bodily harm. Why should this be any different?
- Same as all involved in a car accident.
- Or in a close by location away from the victim to not cause further problems
- I believe dog bites essentially constitute assault, and should be treated as a crime of that severity, including more leniency if this is an isolated incident i.e. no prior history of aggression.
- If it's a seriously critical bite that could incapacitate the other animal, there's reasoning for the owner having to be there. Moral reasoning above all.
- Good luck getting them to stay.
- A dog bite is similar to an assault; it should be handled with the same degree of CRIMINAL seriousness. A dog owner running away is similar to a hit and run injury accident.
- The owner is responsible for training their dog. They are at fault if a dog bites another animal or a person as much as the dog is.
- I have dogs and I take responsibility of their behaviour 100%. Owner should stay if there's an incident

- There should be some judgement applied to avoid bylaw officers issuing fines for trivial matters/disputes between dog owners.
- Dogs who bite other people are generally doing it to protect the owner. Many cases a dog will bite a stranger if the owner is being threatened. The enforcement officer needs to know from both sides why this happened.
- A dog showing aggressive behaviour is due to lack of training from the owner. It's not the dogs fault.
- I figured this was already a rule.
- It's the owners fault, they should be punished not the dog
- You are responsible for a hit and run. And you are responsible for your dog. If your animal (or car) has injured another, then you must remain at the scene.
- Too hard to trace if not done at the time
- This is only logical.
- Pet owners need to take responsibility for their poor or unsafe decisions.
- I know someone that not only had their dog bit by another dog, but the owner of that dog beat my friend up..no reason or grounds to do it.
- If another dog randomly attacks then consequences need to happen
- People need to take responsibility for their pets actions, regardless of breed. The dog owner and the person/dog they bit should be required to remain at the scene.
- All aspects of an encounter need to be doc, assessed and interpreted by an independent panel with no stake in the outcome. Owners as well as those impacted shouldn't be able to avoid accountability . We assess this in vehicle pedestrian accidents and same approach should apply. There is a % attribution to dog owner and victim that should be considered.
- It's an attack. A crime. Of course the owner should remain at the scene.
- They should stay and state their case
- Within reason. Some people think a cattle dog nipping at heels is 'biting'. The 'bite' has to have either drawn blood, or the dog did not release right away. Then Bylaw should get involved
- The owner must take responsibility for the dog's behaviour. If the victim (bitee) forgives the human and biter, then I would say no.
- It would ensure that owners are kept responsible for the event that transpired.
- The owner is responsible and liable for animal behaviour and incurrent costs for outcomes of an incident.
- <https://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/calgary/calgary-dog-attack-bylaw-rules-1.5712902>
- just like a car accident - must remain at scene
- There is always 3 sides to a story the left, right and the middle. The only right thing to do is to get the 2 sides to get the most accurate explanation of the events. Many of people will leave out of fear so having a rule may help with assuring that all parties stay at the scene.
- Information should be exchanged for future reference to the bite but it should not involve the dog being taken away from the owner or any other harsh pentaly other than a fine.

- If someone was to hit your vehicle they are required by law to give you their information. Thus, if someone is to damage you or your dog (your property) they must take full responsibility for their actions
- I feel an owner of a vicious dog would flee the area. There must be a way to make these owners accountable.
- The owner needs to be held accountable for its dogs action, no matter what breed. This is all under the assumption that the dog is in under control when the exchange is taking place and hasn't or isn't running around the area.
- any dog that has an issue with another dog or owner should have to stay and deal with the situation, similar to a car accident
- Your responsibility
- This a tough on to vote on because any individual can claim their pup was bit just to cause issues to another owner. As long as there is enough evidence to prove a bite was done by the dog in question, this would make sense.
- If a n incident occur it's the same as drive a vehicle. Information my be exchanged so a proper investigation can take place.
- It's responsible and if it was a joint fault it seems a good way to share your side or the storey.
- Part of responsible pet ownership.
- The pet is your responsibly and any trouble the pet causes is also your responsibility. No matter the breed.
- because it holds the owner responsible for the action of his or her dog
- If a dog owner is held accountable for the actions of their dog and is legally expected to remain at the scene and deal with the consequences, they may be more likely to go to the effort of making sure they don't have an aggressive dog in the first place. Pair this with training programs, more canine behaviourists, a push to license pets and increased education on pet ownership, and I think you have a far better solution than discriminating against bully breeds.
- Owners need to be fully accountable for their dogs behaviour. The only time it would acceptable to leave would be if the dog was still not fully under control or exhibiting aggression and the owner was on foot or in a situation in which the dog could not be safely confine while information was exchanged.
- Owner must be responsible for animals behaviour
- Owners should stay and be responsible
- This only seems responsible
- Owners must be held accountable and responsible if their dog harmed someone.
- This would be the same for any accident causing damage or injury, why different for a dog bite/attack? Responsibility needs to be taken.
- The victim (person bitten or handler of animal that is bitten) should have the discretion of allowing the person to leave, but they should be required to share their contact information before leaving.
- They should share contact information but it may not be possible to remain at scene for long if someone requires care.

- So many dog owners flee the scene to avoid repercussions. A responsible dog owner would remain at the scene.
- I've heard of too many stories where people and animals are bitten by off thrash dogs and the owners run away
- a dog attack is the basically along the same lines as a car accident, it is illegally to hit a and run. The offending dog and owner should be responsible to pay for injuries if any that were sustained, attacks should be recorded and if it's documented then its easier to determine if the dog is aggressive.
- Have to gather the facts of the incident with proper authority.
- Same as the scene of a car accident
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their pet. But the severity of the incident and frequency need to be taken into consideration. Some dogs nip other dogs as a play gesture, for instance.
- This is only is it is serious.
- owners obtain pets and should be accountable for training and behaviour of their pets
- The owner of the dog that bites has to take responsibility. It's the owners job to train your dogs. It's irresponsible pet ownership.
- The owner needs to take reponsibility
- Depending on the severity of the bite
- The dog owner is responsible for the injury that was caused. They would be negligent for these damages.
- For safety and mitigation
- Dogs are only as good as the owners
- I don't think it's acceptable for dogs to display malicious behaviour
- The owner is ultimately responsible for their dog's behaviour and needs to be accountable.
- The owner is responsible for their dog, if it has caused harm they are responsible to be part of the solution.
- if information is not shared, responsibility can be abdicated by the offending owner.
- It is a crime and should be investigated
- As a dog owner you have the responsibility to help in any way when a dog bites.
- The dog owner should stay at the scene to share contact info due to the fact that the incident is equally the fault of the owner. No dog should be punished without the owners being punished as well.
- An owner should be concerned that their dog is biting and be prepared to explain any extenuating circumstances, I.e. if the dog was injured or teased before incident.
- The chances of enforcing this are slim.
- Info from the owner may be helpful to the person / pet owner bitten. Ideally the enforcement officer would collect info about the biting animal i.e. immunizations . Officer may be able to provide resources for training the animal as well.
- An owner should be required to remain at the scene of a dog bite incident so the owner i held accountable and the biting dog is monitored and dealt with appropriately.

- An incident as such a scenario is the responsibility of the owner. Just as a vehicular collision often involves an enforcement officer, a dog bite that breaks the skin should be reported.
- supposedly the owner can control the animal to prevent escalation/furthering of incident
- Owners are responsible for their dogs, just like they are responsible for their children. The City is all gungHo on enforcing animal bylaws, perhaps bylaws for kids running wild, causing disturbances etc should also be enforced!!
- Biting dogs can cause serious harm, but at present it is easy for an owner of an aggressive animal to simply walk away from any incident they may have caused.
- Treat it like a car accident
- Your dog is your responsibility and you must at all times be accountable for the actions of your dog. If dogs have the proper training and socialization and an incident occurs you need to remain at the scene of such an incident, the same as you would be required to do if you had an accident in your vehicle. Police and by-law officers should not be expected to use their resources to spend time locating owners involved in such incidents.
- If there is an injury. I don't want people to call if dogs are play fighting. and there are no injuries
- It is simply responsible pet ownership, akin to staying at the scene of a motor vehicle accident in which you were involved.
- I think it is reasonable for an owner to remain at the scene of an incident or at least provide contact information so they can be easily reached. There may be situations where it is better for a situation to be diffused as emotions and tensions can run very high. Space is often a good way for this to occur. However I would not want people to disappear.
- Scene of an accident.
- Be a responsible owner.
- The owner should stay to explain the circumstances of the incident and take responsibility for their pet.
- Provided the offending animal can be controlled. If not ID should be exchanged.
- this makes total sense to me
- The person supervising the animal should be responsible for the animal in their care.
- Important to get contact information in case follow up is needed
- "Owners need to take responsibility for their animals. It is important that pet owners ensure proper pet maintenance, socialization, and ability to take control of the animal is out of sorts due to aggressive dispositions of other animals and people.
- UNLESS the other attacked first ...then animals , same as people should have the right to defend themselves"
- This would be simple common sense, and would be similar to leaving the scene of an accident
- They are responsible for their dog so they should stay and make sure everything is done properly
- The owner needs to be responsible for their pet's actions
- Sometimes people do not listen if the dog owner says please do not startle my dog. I am training it to not be afraid as it was attacked awhile ago and I want to take this fear away but it is still learning so please leave it alone for everyone's safety

- It would help insure that due process takes place.
- It's responsible.
- Without a question! The owner is responsible for their dogs behaviour. If there is damage whether to a human, animal or property, we as owners are liable. It's no different than your kid.
- "Just like a vehicle altercation; owners are required to stay at the scene
- So the same should apply to animal altercations"
- They should be charged if they leave the scene
- Hold owners accountable for their animal's behaviour.
- Often dog attacks are like hit and runs, where owner are nowhere or hidden at the scene of their aggressive dogs and difficult to connect dog to owners after the fact
- Dog owners must be accountable for the behaviour of their dogs.
- It should be mandatory to wait at the scene for CPS/Bylaw to attend for all dog bite incidents.
- it makes sense
- Yes, I can't believe that this is not already a rule.
- This way there is immediate sharing, no looking for the owner.
- It's usually not the dog it's the owner
- The owner of the dog is responsible for the dog, else there's no accountability for the dog's actions/behaviour.
- It's the same as stay at the scene of a collision or medical emergency and common decency.
- They need to advise if the dog has had all their shots and what exactly happened. Sometimes dogs are provoked so much that they have no other option but to snap. This should be clarified to the officer as it isn't fair that a dog should be blamed for a person being rude or disrespectful to a dog.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets. Too many pretend it's not serious and just walk away.
- Dog owners should never leave the scene of an incident, must be held accountable, especially in case of injury or property damage.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs behavior and the enforcement officer needs to get both sides of the story.
- Too often irresponsible dog owners get away from paying in all ways for not properly training and controlling their dogs. Dogs and other people pay the price.
- "I would absolutely support this if was possible. From my experience bylaw is unable to respond to incidents in a timely manner and all parties often leave before bylaw arrives. Unfortunately some irresponsible owners leave and refuse to take responsibility for their dogs actions by not sharing contact information.
- If bylaw had a consistent presence in at (least) busy parks such as Sue Higgins, River Park, edworthy, bowmont ect...owners/handlers would be forced to have control over their dogs and or be educated first then ticketed on major or numerous offences. With their regular presence in parks the likelihood of them being available to attend an incident in a timely manner could be more possible. The current bylaws are great, they simply need more effective enforcement through education and presence."

- If your dog bites someone, it is your responsibility to remain at the scene and cover any financial costs to the injured party
- Owners need to take responsibility for their animals both good and bad
- The owner needs to give information to the officer about the dog's vaccination status. If the owner cannot be found after the incident, doctors will make the most conservative assumptions: that the animal is unvaccinated and a rabies risk. The treatment for a person who might have been bitten by a rabies-positive dog are much more intensive and invasive than for a person bitten by a fully vaccinated dog.
- Owners are ultimately responsible for their pet's behaviour.
- Unless the owner/person responsible for the dog needs to leave for their own safety, they should have to assist the people their animal has injured. There should be consequences for someone that causes injury to another.
- I think there is very important information that can be gleaned from the owner such as vaccinations as well as the overall health of the dog, all of which would be very important to treat the victim. It would also be important in order for the pet owner to provide required information to authorities such as their address and other contact information for further follow up.
- Except if they need to seek emergency medical attention for their own animal or a human
- It is the owner's responsibility to care for their animal if their animal gets into an incident the owner is 100% at fault not the dog
- If necessary.... If the two owners or person can handle it themselves let them.
- An incident causing harm to human or animal needs to be reported to enforcement officers to address the owner of the offending animal with education and/or penalties.
- Any dog, of any breed that bites a person, handler should be responsible for any medical issues resulting in the bite. ALL DOGS CAN BITE. ALL handlers should be held equally responsible for their dogs behaviour.
- Be a responsible pet owner!
- it's similar to a hit and run, it's nice to share if the dog is up on the rabies vaccine and find out if medical is required.
- Just goes along with responsible ownership
- Was this not a law?! If they don't it should be treated like a vehicle hit and run.
- Yes, in case the damage is more severe than originally thought, also so the city can track if this is a reoccurring issue
- People need to take ownership
- There could be vet bills and that person should pay. We also need to know if it is a pattern.
- Leaving the scene is not appropriate - it suggests irresponsibility
- Otherwise, it is like a 'hit and run' traffic incident. The dog-owner needs to accept responsibility.
- Owners need to be responsible for their dogs.
- The owner is to blame for their dogs behaviour.
- I don't think anyone should bite and run

- It would be similar to a car accident where you exchange contact information like you would insurance information.
- The owner needs to be held accountable as well as share his/ her side. This especially fits for hard mouthed breeds such as apbt breeds as they are way to often stereotyped.
- This should already be required- owners are legally responsible for the actions of their pet.
- The dog owner has a responsibility for their animal and what their animal does. The owner should secure the animal and then stay on the scene. Similar to when there is a car accident.
- If the attack requires medical attention or is a serious attack. Yes, they should be required to speak to police.
- I want all information necessary if my dog were to be victim of another dog's attack.
- Dog bites should be documented to determine what happened and if the dog (no matter what breed) is dangerous. The owner is liable for the things that their dog does
- I have had to write down the license plate of an attack dog owner in order to file a complaint with bylaw. It is a very stressful situation; I asked the owner for their address and they refused to provide it.
- No different than a car accident. The dog owner must take responsibility for their and their animal's actions.
- It seems reasonable to force a person to stick around if their animal hurts someone. Leaving would seem to be similar to the idea of "fleeing from the scene of a crime".
- If the animal is a cause of damage to another person or animal they should provide information so they can be contacted if the severity of the incident warrants it.
- Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their pets. There are no bad dogs just bad owners.
- A person should stay on scene with ANY incident.
- I think an owner should stay, their dog is their responsibility. If they don't stay at the incident they should be fined if found out who they are. A dog attack could lead to a death of the victim. They should also have to pay for medical cost for the victim.
- Dog owners need to be held responsible for the actions of their dogs, and this is difficult if they are able to leave the scene of an incident without repercussions.
- I would associate this to a hit and run and they should be dealt with in the same manner
- It's basically a "hit and run" if you don't remain on the scene. Sad we have to legislate common human decency but there you go...these are the times we live in I guess. Sigh.
- They are responsible for the dog and thus should be responsible for the repercussions
- and if it is proven that the dog was in the right (harassed, teased, agitated by the bitten) there will be no action taken on the dog or the owner. and they bitten will be held accountable.
- If a dog bites a person. And it would need to be a significant bite not the playful nip of a puppy.
- If an incident happens both owners of the dogs should discuss and make plans to solve what happened. If there is a vet bill because of it they need to work together and figure it out, be responsible.

- Common sense
- It's your dog! You are very much responsible for anything that happens.
- This is fair - and if they flee the scene they may face a monetary Penalty for fleeing the scene of an accident. Similar to a hit and run vehicle accident
- If their animal was in an altercation I would want both sides of the story to be told. Maybe the person reporting who is not that dogs owner will paint a picture that is not true or accurate
- It should be treated like A hit and run. There should be fines for not staying at the scene of the incident.
- I think that a dog owner should show responsibility and be part of the solution if their dog bites a person or animal. There could be many factors surrounding the bite and all parties need to be heard.
- Dogs bite and everyone reacts differently. It should be treated like a car accident
- Both party should remain on scene to discuss injuries to evaluate the situation and if necessary law-enforcement can be involved to dictate fault. If at fault they are responsible for all that bills and examinations for that dog.
- This will help ensure that the owner is identified ASAP and the vaccination records/information for the dog is obtained as soon as possible
- Then nuisance dogs could be specifically tracked and taken care of.
- Yes, because some owners leave and the owner is often notinvestaged, so this would make it a law that the owner would have to stay and talk with the enforcement officer.
- Just like an vehicle accident, a dog fight or dog bite owner and victim should both be required to wait to speak with enforcement officers.
- But the person with the offending animal should also keep a certain distance afterwards as the person/dog that was bitten would be traumatized and should not have the further stress of the offending animal close to them.
- 100% yes.
- As a person who has owned "bully" breeds, but that bully breed was attacked by a random dog unprovoked and the owner fled and left me with the hefty vet bills. Yes I believe if you dog bites another dog or person you stay on site until information is exchanged
- This is the responsibility of a dog owner
- It should be illegal for a pet owner to leave the scene of an attack. Not only should a rule be set in place, but hefty fines should be added for any pet owner leaving the scene of an attack their dog took part in.
- If the owner doesn't remain, they should be fined
- Responsible behaviour is an expectation of a community's members. The only responsible behaviour upon one's dog causing harm to a person or animal is to remain at the scene.
- It's like a hit and run. You can't just leave the scene of a crime. There should be time and opportunity to work towards acknowledgement of the damage/injury/stress inflicted, future prevention and resolution.
- Leaving the scene looks like a way to escape from responsibility

- A dog attack (on a human or animal) can be MORE dangerous than a hit and run! If we treat our vehicles with such respect (in fender benders), we have to treat our humans and pets with such.
- dog owners should always be responsible for their dog's behavior
- Many things can cause a dog to bite, and it's important to determine if the dog is actually placing other dogs and humans at risk, or if it was a fluke situation.
- Yes; however, this rule would need to very explicitly define what a "bite" entails. And that definition would need to be explicit, reasonable and enforceable. Do you mean a nip with no skin break? Dogs nip each other as part of play and communication. Or, do you mean bite with skin break? Or bite and shake? Does the definition differ if it happens to another dog, or a person? The general public has a very poor understanding of normal dog behaviour and dog communication. Dozens of times, I've heard people say their dogs were attacked; however, they had poorly behaved dogs and other dogs were simply telling the offending dog to back off. I am concerned that uneducated people would try to enforce this in inappropriate situations.
- It's important for owners to take responsibility and share information such as dog vaccination etc.
- It is the right thing to do.
- I'd like them to be required to share information, but not necessarily to stay; the dog owner will probably stay with the dog, and if the dog just attacked someone, it might be better for them to leave.
- Yes the owner should stay and provide all necessary information
- When my son was young (11) and he was walking his dog, another dog owner (Adult) walking their dog had attacked my sons' dog and left the scene. My son did not know what to do and carried his bleeding dog home and was crying. I believe all dog owners should stay at the scene, especially in case their dog has disease that no one is worried about or in my case leaving a child with an injured animal does not know what to do.
- Info should be shared with victim owner or enforcement officer. Having to wait for an enforcement officer (several hours) is not reasonable. No different than being involved in a vehicular accident!
- The victim needs to talk to the dog owner to ensure rabies is not a concern, and to enable reporting to officials.
- Assuming that it can be responded to in a timely manner (under 20 min) or provide online reporting software so both parties can share details
- The dog needs to be recorded and described.
- Same logic as the driver of a car remaining at the scene of an accident.
- there are bad owners more than bad dogs. penalize the owner. NOT the animal
- Pit Bull owners usually run away after their pit bulls attack
- I know someone whose dog was killed by a pit bull and the pit bull owner ran away like the cowards they are.
- It may be more difficult to locate the dog owner after the incident.
- However, I believe that the animal should be immediately contained in a safe environment (vehicle, backyard, house, etc) so as to reduce further stress, to all involved.

- Leaving the scene of an accident is not responsible behaviour in this situation, the same as a traffic incident. If possible/necessary, the dog could be taken home by a friend or family member if it is continuing to be aggressive.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs. Some incidents may be minor and not need an enforcement officer but for a serious situation the owner should be required to share correct contact information.
- I support a rule that requires dog owners to remain on scene after an incident if it is warranted. I would equate it to a car accident... if the dogs are not injured or not seriously injured, the owners should be required to exchange info, work it out amongst themselves and potentially file a report over the phone/internet. If injury occurs, then an officer would need to get involved and owners stay on the scene. Obviously an incident that requires immediate medical attention owners and dogs should exchange information and continue to vet or hospital. Bottom line, common sense should be used.
- to hard to track if they dont stay on scene
- Need owner to provide details on dog's health record in case of problems from bite
- But how are you planning to enforce that?
- To avoid miss understanding, false blame and/or 'disappearance' of the dog's owner
- It's like a car accident - you should not be leaving if your dog causes injury. The burden of proof should not be left up to the bite victim. They are traumatized and may not be able to process what just happened, let alone get photo evidence of the offending owner/pet. The more that pet owners understand their responsibilities of pet ownership, the better our citizens can get along. With increased pets in city comes increased responsibility.
- If the victim resides to persue the owner at fault should have to provide information, or face more charges
- the owner is responsible for the actions of their pet. As much as the pet has a level of free will, the owner should be aware of cues in their pet in new situations.
- similar to car accidents, involved parties should be obligated to remain at scene.
- This allows communication pertaining to the incident, causes as well as positive decision making
- I believe it to be very similar to a vehicle accident and see any accident where a dog bites a person there could be liability on the pet owners part and information should be shared.
- There have been many instances just this summer of people trying to identify a dog's owner who has left the scene after a fight or bite.
- No different than a hit and run.. you don't leave the scene if YOU were involved
- NA
- This should be deemed the same as an an accident. If you get in a car accident you exchange information.
- There are no bad dogs, just bad owners, or inexperienced. Owners must stay at a bite incident to talk with officers.
- If I hit a car I need to stay, same if my dog bites someone.
- A dog bite is essentially assault and therefore is no different than leaving the scene for other infractions. It gives the bylaw officer an opportunity to get both sides of the story and also for additional education to happen. I also wonder why only bites are being explored here. I have often had dogs jump on me and this also causes distress and indicates that the dog is not under control (against the bylaw). Trauma can linger much longer than the wound (whether there is a wound or not). There should also be more parks and open spaces where pets are NOT permitted, on leash or off. And fines should be double for altercations with off leash pets in on leash areas.

- Similar to staying on the scene at a car accident..
- Pit Bulls in this City are out of control - please do something!!
- If you own a dog that bites a person or another dog you should be held responsible for the dogs actions and record the incident.
- Fine the owner, dog bites are the owners fault, not the dog. Breed specific legislation doesn't work.
- Basic responsibility of ownership
- Having a dog owner remain at the scene is important. I feel that most people's response when their dog does something bad (biting a person or animal) is to flee with the dog. I had an incident a few years ago where a dog attacked my dog and I had to chase the person down to find out if there were any health concerns in their dog I should know about. This is not the way it should happen. But how can this be required?
- Pit Bull owners tend to run off when their dogs attack someone or another dog. Show what kind of low lifes they are.
- In past incidents of this sort, i have not received accurate contact information from the owner of the aggressive dog.
- Absolutely the owner NEEDS TO STAY however how will this be enforced?
- I think until the severity is determined both parties are to remain at the scene
- Duh!! Just like a car accident, you need people to stick around so the full story of what happened can be understood. Plus if the dog is a nuisance, you may not be able to identify the owner if they leave.
- Well it would be the same thing with your kid if your kid badly hurt another kid you need to wait it out and make sure the kid is fine
- The problem would be timely arrival of bylaw. People won't wait.
- This way the victim can have peace of knowing that the situation will be fully handled with. By keeping the owner of the dog at the scene, you are keeping and holding them accountable for their dog's action. There are far too many times where dog owners don't care or bother to put in the time when their dog has gone out of line.
- I feel dog owners are solely responsible for how their animal acts. I feel this is no different then remaining at the scene of an accident. Owners need to remain at the incident and take responsibility.
- Tribunal only if non breed specific adjudicators are on the panel
- Common sense and courtesy.
- I believe in responsible pet ownership.
- Own up to issue, be responsible.
- It's the responsible and moral action.

- It's not ok to not be accountable for your pet
- The owner should be required to take steps to address the dog's behavior problem.
- How would the dog be held responsible if the owner doesn't stay on scene? How can you identify the dog without this in place?
- My dog has been attacked at the dog park and the perpetrator and their husky/GSD left. I was unable to get contact info for vet reparations. It would be great to hold people more accountable.
- If a dog bites a person or animal, the dog owner should be required to share contact information with the affected individuals. As a former victim of a dog bite, the owner of the dog who bit me did not provide any contact info or vaccination status info for the dog. This led to me requiring extra vaccinations and months of worry over a potential rabies infection. If the owner had been required to share contact information, the vaccination status of the dog could have been checked.
- Better chance of owners being held responsible.
- it would be akin to remaining at the scene of a car crash or any other incident involving an injury
- In case the dog has an infection, it would be good to ensure that they stay at the scene
- Yes. If you fail to properly train your pet you are the on responsible when an accident occurs.
- The dog owner should be responsible for vet bills and legal action
- I think that all people involved in the incident should have to remain at the scene. People assume its the large dog that is always the problem. Often, small, yappy dogs instigate many instances but don't get blamed because of their size. Having any specific legislation against any specific breeds is absolutely ridiculous. Owners of all dogs should be held accountable but it has nothing to do with breed.
- I support it.
- The same as a car accident or any incident where there is a damage to a person or pet
- Yes, the owner of the dog that bit another person or animal should be responsible for this behavior and should stay at the scene.
- All dog owners are responsible for their dogs and their behaviour. If they cannot control the dog, they should not be in charge of one.
- Owner should be required to pay expenses resulting from his /her dogs damage
- Just makes sense.
- It's no different than the requirement to stay at the scene of a car accident.
- Owning a pet means you accept responsibility when it misbehaves. Should your dog bite, the owner should be there to provide a statement and contact details.
- I agree with this, but I doubt you could enforce it. There are never enforcement officers around in the parks, so the dog owner with decide what they will or won't do. Decent owners will stay and deal with the situations. Jerk owners will just leave. If they leave and the person or owner of a dog attacked, is able to somehow identify the aggressor, that person needs to be charged and fined for leaving.
- I think having the pet owner remain at the scene is just common sense. Information and feedback from the pet owner would be crucial in making decisions about each case if they went to a tribunal.

- I totally agree in the sense that it is the owners fault at the end of the day. I do believe irresponsible owners should be the ones penalized for their animals actions.
- Yes and witnesses may be asked to stay as well. To protect the breeds you are vilifying from being victim to prejudice if the other animal has instigated/antagonized
- Unless there is a need for an emergency vet, I think it only makes sense for both parties to exchange information just like a traffic incident
- Don't leave the scene of an accident nt no matter the type.
- I suppose, I just hope that this doesn't make people make things appear worse than they were.
- I think absolutely nessary to enforce owner of dog that bites to remain and do the right thing to prevent alot of unacceptablity and reduce reoffencesive
- Yes, everyone need to be responsible for their or their pets actions.
- In the event of injury the owner should be required to compensate the injured party if necessary.
- It no different then an accident where one person is a fault and they need to provide info.
- Kind of like a car accident. Makes sense.
- They need to be there to assume responsibility.
- It's important to find out crucial information like vaccine history of the dog who did the biting.
- Part of being a responsible pet owner
- The owner needs to take responsibility and work with an enforcement officer to find the best course of action.
- The owner needs to be 100% responsible for their dog.
- 100 % owner needs to take responsibility of the actions of their dogs behaviour
- I like the idea of a tribunal but it needs to have mutilple individuals with a unanimous decision
- A response of 'no' to this question would create a double standard for dog owners and imply that they are not fully accountable for the actions of the animals they keep. The onus should not be on the victim to ensure that an offender doesn't leave the scene.
- It's important to get contact information and perhaps vaccination history from the owner in case the bitten person/animal requires medical/vet attention.
- Why would this not be a given responsibility of a dog owner?
- A dog's owner is responsible for the dog's behaviour in public spaces.
- There needs to be accountability for animal behaviour, and that accountability rests on the shoulder of the owner.
- It is too easy for the offending dog owner to simply walk away.
- Although I support it as frequently the owner is not present, I am not sure how this could be enforced
- That's a courtesy. Otherwise it's like a hit and run
- of course! if they leave how does the officer know anything
- Anything but staying at the scene of the crime should be akin fleeing the scene of a crime.
- I'm surprised to learn this isn't already a requirement.
- Treat it like any accident. It's a hit and Run if they leave without sharing contact information.

- A dog owner allowed to leave the scene of an incident can be difficult to trace. At least with a rule to stay at the scene there is some chance of reconciling the incident with those involved.
- It depends on the situation. If the dog actively looked to attack another pet or person, then the contact information should be given to an officer to keep an eye on the dog in case it is vicious. If a person or animal provoked the dog into defending itself, then it should not be necessary, as self-defense is not the same thing as viciousness.
- the obvious accountability that's required
- The owner needs to be responsible for the animal in their care, whatever type of pet animal it is.
- no need for an explanation it's just the right thing to do. And if you don't know that you shouldn't own a dangerous dog
- Responsible dog ownership should be mandatory for all dog owners regardless of breed
- Sharing of information should be required. Only if other commitments eg. child care, are not negatively effected by waiting for enforcement officer.
- no different than remaining at the scene of a vehicle collision
- As long as they leave there information before they leave
- Seems sensible.
- This is a similar approach used for vehicle accidents.
- If I am required to stay at the scene of an auto accident, this seems reasonable as well. Simply a matter of personal responsibility.
- Just as with a human incident/accident where it is a responsible behavior to stay and report an incident or accident.
- Pending on sevaritu not a nip and. Not an over embellished case of some one looking for a hand out or pay day !
- It is as much, if not moreso, that the responsibility should fall on the owner of the dog to have control on their dog in public. To make sure all parties are safe, so such incidents do not repeat in the future.
- Similar to vehicle accidents the owners should be held responsible.
- I think if a dog bites, they owner is responsible for the situation.
- Failing to provide important information by leaving the scene of an incident puts victim at greater risk.
- All pet owners are responsible for their actions as well as the actions of their dog. If their dog has injured a person or another dog they should ensure their contact information is shared in case the injured party requires medical attention.
- The owner should be present to exchange information with by law officer and those impacted.
- Many owners take off and leave the victim or other animal hurt.
- Why wouldn't they have to?
- This is still an assault and needs to be reported appropriately.
- All pet owners are responsible for the actions of their pets and must not be allowed to walk away from the incident.

- I have had my dog bitten and the other dog and owner fled the scene leaving me with a $1000. vet bill.
- The dog owner takes responsibility and should not be allowed to leave the scene of the crime.
- Gee, that's just consideration - - but, the officer needs to listen to the dog owner and be reasonable too. Otherwise, no-one will stay.
- This would show responsibility as a pet owner as well as towards the victim in a serious incident.
- It's similar to a car accident in that people should exchange info and wait for the police
- It is similar to a hit and run situation. They shouldn't leave the scene.
- Just like in a car accident, the harm caused may not be reveal right away. In addition, now that we know covid-19 can infect dogs and dogs can infect people, this can be the only way to track covid-19 spread.
- An incident like this is traumatic, but it is taken to the next level when the dog owner disappears. I consider it akin to a hit-and-run accident with a vehicle and pedestrian.
- The owner is at fault, not the animal.
- Been involved in a few incidents where another dog bit my dog and the owner refused to acknowledge/stay there to resolve the issue.
- They are responsible for their dog and should be accountable for its actions and make sure they are available to answer any questions or respond to any concerns.
- I think any responsible pet owner would voluntarily stay at the scene of an incident to exchange info/make a statement, but there are jackasses out there. Unfortunately we have to pander to them.
- This requirement would place more responsibility upon the dog owner. In such an instance as described, if the dog owner were to leave, then it would very much be a "hit and run" with a motor vehicle. How many of us have had "dings" in a parking lot without anyone owning up?
- It is very easy for a dog owner to walk away and how would you ever find out who he was or track down the dog
- Entirely irresponsible for an owner to leave the scene.
- Part of being a responsible pet owner means taking responsibility for your pet and their actions, therefore you should be willing to provide your contact information for follow-up when there has been an incident involving your pet
- We want to discourage the immediate instinct to hide your dog and deny that it was your dog, if found.
- Veterinary care for the victim should also be the responsibility of the owner of the animal that bit.
- As a responsible dog owner, I it is important for the owner to stick around, same as if it were a car accident.
- No different than a driver leaving the scene of an accident. Dog owners should be exchanging information in the event of an incident (excepting an owner that has to race their pet to emergency care). Owners who leave or refuse to provide truthful information should be fined.
- The person needs to take responsibility for the actions of their pet.
- if it is severe enough
- It's the correct think to do

- This is needed for owners to take responsibility for their animal in SEVERE cases, but what about minor bites?
- ONLY if the dog bites a person. Dog fights and bites if they are at a dog park is a risk you are willingly taking if you go to a dog park.
- It is important to know if the offending dog is up-to-date with Veterinary vaccinations. Also the victim should be able to bill the Offender for any medical or vet costs. And is this the first time or one of many?
- Bites should be tracked to determine if a particular dog has a history of biting.
- only to make sure the information of the incident and personal information of the dog owner is given rightfully to law enforcement, the victim should not be bothered beyond reasonable time
- Owners are responsible for their dogs actions
- This seems obvious? If someone assaults someone else and the police are called they need to be restrained until the police arrive.
- if I get bitten at a park and the owner and dog walk away, I have no recourse, and the incident could happen again
- dogs can't talk
- Must take responsibility but also to so the enforcement officer may hear both sides of the story. It is not always the dog's fault and there must be an investigation, not just a fine.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their pets behavior
- Owner should be expected to take responsibility for their pet.
- I hear too often of people or pets being bit and the other person leaving
- My dog was once bitten and the owner offered to pay the bills. Later I heard that the biting dog had a history of biting. This policy would alleviate the likelihood of multiple bites through record-keeping and possible fines, training etc
- A person is responsible for their pets actions.
- For a dog biting a person I believe the owner should have to stay at the scene.
- I think it is comparable to a car accident. Whether it is minor or major, If the damage caused by the pet are severe enough that follow up information or care is needed the victim should have the information from the owner who had the aggressive pet. during an attack or incident the shock can stop people from thinking clearly and the situation cannot be dealt with properly.
- Obviously to be available for next steps in process and to take responsibility
- Dog bites are serious and should be taken as seriously as a car collision. This is REGARDLESS of breed. Small dog bites can become severely infected and cause serious trauma as well.
- People need to stay at the scene of a car collision, they also need to stay at the scene of somewhere their dog caused a problem to better track nuisance dogs and to better ensure that impacted people/animals are getting adequate help.
- contact information shall be given to the injured party if injury occurred
- Absolutely owners need to be responsible no matter the size or breed
- Other incidents, like traffic collisions, require the parties remain at the scene, these incidents should too.

- Accountability/responsible pet ownership.
- "Yes to staying on scene if the owner is around to exchange info. Not if a person has to wait around for a bylaw officer... should be able to - Report that day."
- The victim should know the history of the dog and be able to seek compensation from the owner. The owner needs to be fined.
- Responsible pet ownership means taking accountability.
- Too many incidents where dog bites occur and owners do not take responsibility and leave the scene without identifying and contact information!
- Need all the info for bites.
- Follow up will need the exchange of details
- You are responsible for your dog. It would be no different than leaving the scene of an accident or crime.
- This sounds like common sense!
- Any incident where there is a question of liability, parties involved in said incident should remain on scene if authorities are required to be called. Except where medical care is required or a party is leaving in order to gain control of their pet. (I.e: chasing a loose dog to prevent other incidents)
- liability, learning from the past.
- It is the respectful thing to do. And you can see what kind of person the owner is.
- absolutely the owner is responsible for their pet if your dog bites someone you better be staying there to talk to the police
- Owners must be identified in case charges must be laid
- If my dog had bitten someone or another animal I would surely call police to report the incident and I would stay there so I could explain the incident. That way no one can lie.
- They have the responsibility to stay and share as much information as they can.
- I think both parties should remain on scene. Not just the dog owner and the dog who bite someone or another animal.
- Owners need to take full responsibility of their pet, no matter what! If a dog bites anyone, it is the owner who is accountable.
- Owners must be made accountable for the actions of their animals.
- a dog owner should be held responsible. And also both sides of the story should be taken. Not all bite cases are one sided and this should also be taken into account. What if a dog is leashed and is walking and a dog off leash is running and the dog on the leash bites because they feel threatened. The owner with the dog off leash should also have to answer to this.
- No different than any other assault. Contact information needs to be supplied for legal and/or medical issues.
- People need to be accountable for their dogs behaviour

- If a dog bites a person, yes. If a dog bites another dog, it is a bit more of a grey area. Was there a provoked attack? was there no injury? seems like this might be very hard to enforce and have clear guidelines.
- To many people run away to avoid taking responsibility of the actions of their dogs and them selves
- The owner is responsible for the dog or whatever animal. They have a ethical and vicarious responsible to remain at the scene of the incident. Significant fines should be imposed if they do not.
- Any reasonable pet owner and considerate human being should absolutely stay at the site of an incident!
- Ultimately dog ownership is a responsibility and if your dog has harmed another animal or person then you need to be held responsible for a lack of training/supervision. Being available to confirm information is the least that can be asked.
- Yes if the person who is bitten would wants them to
- It's not always the dogs fault they bite a person or another animal. The "victim" could have done something to that dog or to it's owner. If we won't put murders, rapist, and molesters why are we putt down dogs?
- Owner needs to be held accountable
- I would hope the owner would be responsible and want to assist with whatever else may be required. If my dog bit someone, I would definitely want to make sure that person is ok and if not, provide any help/information they may need.
- It is necessary that the dogs vaccination and/or health record be available
- Owners need to stay and provide all the information regarding their dog
- The owner needs to be able to provide contact information and health information for the dog (vaccinations, etc.). If they don't do so, the health of the bitten person or animal is at greater risk, and this is unacceptable.
- Dog bites are a serious matter, however they reflect the environment of the dog and not the breed. In my experience, most dog bites are smaller breeds (chihuahua, terriers).
- I think this can be hard because it is also nice for everyone if the dog leaves asap. However, most important is that the dog owner takes responsibility and discusses with the victim what is best.
- The dog must be found and the owner sued, so you have to know who it is.
- Having a dog in the family is serous and a responsibility, and as such people need to treat their dog with respect and accept the responsibility it involves.
- If a person or pet is injured, there should be means to contact the owner of the animal responsible.
- For bites on people or their pets, I believe this would be a good rule, but not for all animals such as squirrels and birds.
- There has been many times I have seen owners walk away from their animal biting or attacking others, and have refused to give a name or even accept responsibility for their uncontrollable behavior. At least if there is a responsibility to remain on scene, the attack could be recorded, and the behavior (in the owner and pet) can be addressed. I would only see this as a determent if the enforcement officer cannot be on scene in a very timely manner. A park is easy enough to walk away from, and no one is going to stick around for more than two minutes.

- Yes absolutely the owner no matter the breed or size should be held 100% responsible
- Sometimes that dog is an asshole because it's not trained properly . Ideally, this sort of intervention would encourage the human to train the dog.
- As a veterinarian, I commonly see dogs bite (even kill) other dogs, or bite people, but the offending dog's owner leaves which is disgraceful. Make it an offence for anyone to leave the scene of such an incident.
- The owner should be held responsible for what their animal does and should therefore be mandated to provide the necessary info and documents
- If their dog bites a person or more likely another dog the circumstances could dictate that they are responsible for vet coverage.
- The owners are often the root of the problem & they must speak to the officer with all the pertinent information given to the officer
- There needs to be accountability in the incident and the owners need to be documented if required.
- I've been bitten and the owner disappeared sharpish before I could ask for ID.
- I support this unless it is necessary to remove the dog from the scene to de-escalate the situation or reduce fear for the victim. In this case, the owner should provide full contact details for follow-up by the bylaw officer or call in the leave contact information prior to leaving.
- Owner needs to take responsibility, otherwise it may occur again.
- It's the same as an automotive accident or if two persons were involved in a fight you should remain at the scene until statements and contact info can be given to police.
- Responsible and respectful to stay
- The per owner is equivalent to an Auto driver at an accident scene.
- An decent dog owner would stay behind to make sure the other dog / person is okay and provide necessary support / help if needed. This shouldn't need to be a rule, but I completely support it.
- It would depend on the severity of the bite.
- Getting the offending animal's information is critical for ensuring people/pets who are bitten, know if they are at-risk for communicable disease. Additionally if the bite requires the city intervene, it might save city resources (or allow a mechanism to recover costs) locating an animal no longer present.
- The owner is responsible for the boundaries of their own pet. They should be the ones to take the blame and be there if enforcement is necessary.
- Just like a vehicle collision , both parties are required to provide all pertinent documents so continuity can be established
- A person should have to stay to provide contact information so that bylaw could follow up and provide warnings or tickets as needed.
- Your pet your responsibility.
- It's just a matter of being. A courteous dog owner
- Yes and No. It depends on the severity of bite and the circumstances behind that bite.
- How else would they be held responsible if they can just leave.

- In the event of a future lawsuit, personal information on the dog owner is necessary.
- "It's like a car accident.
- You need to exchange information - not just walk away.
- However, their dog may need to go in a car or their yard to prevent further incidents."
- If they left, it would be like a hit and run.
- My daughter has been 'assaulted' (not bitten) by aggressive dogs and the owners just slink away. I'd have no way of contacting them if an injury is found.
- This allows enforcement of the above measures.
- Responsible pet ownership involves being responsible for your pet. You are required to stay at the scene of any other injury accident and this should be no different. With the obvious caveat that the offending animal has to be under control and not causing further harm potentially.
- A dog owner should take responsibility for the actions of their pet.
- Dogs are an increasing nuisance and danger in Calgary. Owners need to be held accountable for their animals.
- Similar reasoning as not leaving the scene of an accident/crime.
- A responsible dog owner would stay at the scene
- the owner must be held responsible, and
- Yes, absolutely. Owners must remain accountable for their dog's actions. If your car caused an accident, would you flee the scene (hopefully not, as that would be illegal) ? By everyone being upfront with the incident, it hopefully brings out the truth in the incident and causes all parties involved to look at their actions that may need to change in order to avoid the incident again.
- The owner should be able to tell their side of the story, like if their dog was being hassled or teased by someone before that person was bitten.
- Damage to property or person has occurred. I see this as no different than a hit and run in a motor vehicle.
- It's obvious, no enforcement can take place if there is no information.
- Absolutely!!! One dog bit my dog, and the dog walker just walked off and said "Not my dog" like they didn't care. I found out she was walking her daughter's dog. It took me 6 weeks to track the owner down.
- It is common courtesy!
- All sides of what happened need to be documented. A friend daughter was bit and she had to post on facebook to find the owner.
- If a dog attacks owner should be responsible for any medical bills. STOP BULLYING PIT BULLS, they are not the most violent dog, it is disgusting that you want to hurt them for no reason.
- The officer should be able to hear both sides of the event
- If the owner is not responsible enough to remain at the site of a dangerous incident to explain the situation to law enforcement then they are already exhibiting irresponsible behaviour that will likely lead to another incident in the future.
- Leaving the scene of an accident is a crime. Why should a dog attack be any different?

- to verify and observe the animal at the time it happens can make an assessment of situation at that time.
- I have had a personal experience of my dog being attacked by another dog and the owner leaves the scene with the dog
- It is similar to a car accident - both stories should be gathered.
- Responsible pet ownership.
- How on earth would this be enforced?
- I've been at the dog park multiple times and my dog has been attacked (thankfully nothing severe) and the owners of said dogs didn't even come check to see if my dog was okay, or tell the dog he was wrong for attacking my dog therefore reenforcing the aggressive behaviour. I believe this will help keep owners accountable for their dogs actions
- It's an accident and the owner should be held liable for damages.
- good time to educate owner and assess the dog behaviour and what led up to the incident. Increase dog ownership responsibility. Testing for disease
- The owner of the offending dog needs to be required to proffer identification so that follow-up can be exercised!!
- Dog behaviours are trained into or out of. Responsibility falls onto the owner.
- No different than a car accident
- I don't think this is a yes or no answer. It depends on the situation and the situation can be assessed by the owners and then a determination can be made if law enforcement would be required.
- A description of the incident (at the site of incident) should be mandatory by all involved parties.
- Just as in any incident where an injury has occurred, the parties involved should be required to exchange information for future needs
- If the dog is attacking others, it should be recorded, including information from the dog owner.
- The owner of the dog needs to be responsible for any costs involved in treating the bite. A bite may seem initially minor but can easily become infected. Also, the incident needs to be on record and if this is recurring behaviour for the pet, bylaw needs to further address with the owner.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs actions. Both parties involved should stay at the scene to answer questions by-law may have. This will also help eliminate 'he said, she said' and hold owners more accountable.
- If there is any kind of altercation or attack involving two humans or a dog and a human, it is basic human courtesy to exchange information. This will ensure that the injured party is not left without help.
- All vet bills must be paid by owner of nuisance dog
- It's the appropriate behaviour for any responsible and mature adult
- How can we follow it up otherwise
- It's the equivalent of a traffic accident
- As a responsible pet owner you need to stay and exchange information. Be responsible.
- Especially in a dog park, dog and owner anonymous and quickly disappear

- People should be responsible for their pets. If you were in a car accident, you would need to stay at the scene, I'd think a dog bite would be similar. Provided it doesn't create more trauma for all parties involved.
- I think this is similar to a traffic incident. All owners need shared information. This is also necessary for health risks.
- Self explanatory - just like a car accident, you remain at the scene and exchange information.
- It is the owner responsibility for the dogs action. Bad dogs are almost always bad owners.
- Be responsible and provide both sides of the situation
- Without staying at the scene, how would the offending party be charged with an offense properly?
- Owner should be held responsible
- It's important they take responsibility.
- A bite can happen with any dog if it is scared or surprised. The owner has a responsibility to stay to help
- Owners should stay at scene to provide information on the health of the animal, i.e rabies, distemper, etc.
- Pet owners must be held accountable. You shouldn't own an animal if you cannot control it.
- Of course people need to take responsibility for any injury caused by their pet(s).
- A person's property (dog) has injured another person. If it was a car accident, you have to remain at the scene.
- Not to be harassed by any parties, including officers obtaining information. Simply there to exchange information with parties involved.
- Similar to any accident particularly involving an injury, you should exchange information to place an insurance claim
- The dog can't explain to the officer.
- I think that's good etiquette, if the bite is serious enough
- I think it should follow the same idea as cars- if there's serious damage (or in this case a bite) that requires a large number of stitches or surgery then yes. But a nip or a small bite, especially if the person wasn't properly interacting with the animal, shouldn't require enforcement officers
- My dog was attacked by a pit bull puppy and the owner disappeared with his dog while I was left with a bleeding badly damaged dog and the by law officers could not find the owner or the dog.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs
- dog owner responsible for dogs behavior
- This is most crucial and important for all involved! One that does not stay on scene is fined heavily and/or loses their dog (not by euthanasia unless in serious cases)! The dog owner must know/provide all recent information on vaccinations etc. via their veterinarian office, not just in person. Yes, all parties information should be exchanged just like a vehicle accident.
- It is unacceptable that a dog owner should be allowed to leave the scene of their dog's bite incident without sharing their contact information. That would be similar to drivers being allowed to leave the scene of a car accident without reporting the incident or sharing their contact information.

- It is important to get all sides of the story and for declarations to be recorded by an enforcement officer
- A dog owner is responsible for his animal's behaviour! Avoid bite and run incidents.
- It's like the scene of an accident you were involved in - you don't leave, it's just not right.
- Of course why would they be allowed to leave? How would you be able hold the owner accountable? Shocking this was not LAW or mandatory already.
- Process becomes hindered or rendered useless if the offending pet owner/pet leaves the scene of the incident
- Owner must be accountable for the dogs behavior
- Absolutely. Responsibility must be taken for the course of action. It is like a car accident. Leaving the scene is kind of like a hit and run.
- The owner of the dog is responsible for its behaviour. It is important to have the owner's perspective, as well as those involved in the incident.
- Similar to a car accident, we do not want “dog hit and runs”
- It's like a car accident. It makes sense to exchange information and ask for witnesses. It helps both the victim and the offender
- If your dog bite someone or another dog you should share contact info or talk to police. That way you can inform the officer what happened. I.E was your dog provoked.
- If you dog causes injury to another you have to fully pay the vet bills.
- Owners should shoulder the accountability and be mandated to accept responsibility and additional dog training.
- Same rule as traffic incident. Staying at the scene and providing contact info seems basic common decency.
- To ensure the owner of the animal takes responsibility for the animal.
- Very important to understand if the dog is vaccinated against rabies. Owners must be responsible.
- Every person is responsible for the actions of their animal.
- There are too many irresponsible dog owners who thinks it's okay to off leash in parks. I got experience bitten by a dog but the owner didn't seem to care.
- The owner is the responsible one. The victim or officers should not have to find them. Isn't this obvious?
- Dog owners need to be held responsible for their pets. Just like a driver involved in an accident has to provide their contact details, so should dog owners have to do so.
- I think it's important to be held accountable and to make sure that it is clear about an animals history with the authorities
- "If possible, the owner should remain on seen. The owner should understand that there are 2-sides to every story, and they are the voice of their dog. A dog does not attack or bite unprovoked. If the dog was provoked, it is extremely important to outline exactly why the attack/bite occurred so the party responsible for provoking the dog is dealt with in appropriate fashion.
- There are a number of reasons why a dog and owner might leave the seen if a bite has occurred. The main, would be the safety of the dog and surrounding people. If a bite occurred, the dog may be stressed out and/or nervous. Remaining on scene with the dog could pose further risk of incident. If this is of concern, the owner and dog should leave the scene, and return once their dog is safe.

- As a pet owner, your main responsibility is your dog. You must do what is necessary to keep your dog safe, which in this case may be to leave the scene."
- Regardless of the breed, I think it's the right thing to do - as the owner of the dog you should remain at the scene of the incident. If someone or an animal is injured by your dog it's your responsibility to share contact information and take to an enforcement officer if necessary.
- Owner's are responsible for their dog's actions and should be held accountable when injuries/attacks occur.
- "All witnesses should remain at the scene including the owner.
- This way all statements can be recorded and the facts will determine the true sequence of events."
- This is no different than a vehicle hit and run. If they do not remain, especially if a human is bit, charges should then be laid under the remain at a scene scenario.
- The owner is responsible and must be present.
- Accountability of ownership is needed. Poor ownership is the reason for dog issues. Abuses to animals needs have higher importance. It's too easy for anyone to get a dog or cat.
- Only if one of the dogs or people has an injury that may require stitches or a trip to the vet for assessing injury(s)
- Owners should be held accountable
- If a dog bites a person or other animal the owner should share contact information in case bites lead to further complications for the human, other dog or the dog itself. Example: infections
- Dog owners should have to exchange info by law, not stay on scene.
- No different than a car accident. Having the owner remain on the scene will help ensure the incident is correctly reported and assessed.
- Also the victim and bystanders should stay too
- A dog is a possession and if a possession causes damage, like a car, the owner is accountable. Leaving the scene should result in an additional fine.
- It is simply responsible dog ownership. But it has to be a purposeful bite, not a playful nip. Dogs often play by mouthing. But if it is an intentional dog bite, the owner needs to be accountable.
- 100%
- They absolutely should be required to stay at the scene. A guilty party will run away from the scene right? They should be there to give their side of the story, same with any witnesses.
- There are instances where the dog was provoked by someone, often a child. The owner has requested that the people stay away from their dog and are ignored. They can explain their actions to the officer.
- owners are and should be held responsible.
- Your responsibility is to stay.
- The Owner is responsible for their pet and needs to be held accountable for all actions. If they can't deal with this, they should not be owning an animal.
- The owner needs to be responsible for their dog's behaviour.

- So many times I have heard of owners running away and then the owner who has experienced the attack has no recourse and the dangerous animal continues to roam. Frankly, I'm surprised this is not a requirement already.
- The owner needs to take responsibility. Leaving the scene means that owner potential has minimal or no consequences.
- Without this rule, a dog owner has no responsibility for the dog. Unthinkable!
- Just like a car accident, a dog is only as bad as it's owner. It's the owners fault not the dogs.
- I have had a dog owner give me a bogus phone number after their dog bit mine and mine obviously required stitches.
- If the accident occurred, the person involved should have to give statement.
- Yes if safe to do so (nobody is injured or an animal is out of control and needs to be removed from the situation). It Would help gather information on repeat owners and dogs as well as if they have other animals. Also allows for responsible parties to be held accountable and/or the situation to be investigated. And any medical history can be provided.
- Deterrent for irresponsible owners to leave the scene without providing information. May expedite the resolution of issues and prevent them from going to court down the road if an enforcement officer comes to the scene.
- If they leave they should be fined
- Yes, being a dog owner means that I am responsible for their actions. No dog needs to be euthanized however for actions like this. Use training instead of euthanizing several dogs.
- There needs to be accountability by all parties. So all parties should be required to talk with the enforcement officer as soon as makes sense.
- Dog owners shall be responsible for the actions of their animals
- Dependent of severity of bite and circumstance. Example; nipping vs. Biting intending harm. And dog feeling threatened or defending its self against another dog.
- No different than the rule regarding hit-and-runs in the Traffic Act. Stay and report.
- This is just common courtesy. But it may not always be possible if the owner is the only person with the dog. The owner may need to leave to secure the dog somewhere away from the scene, then return.
- Often incidents happen and the victim has no way of identifying the dog or owner if that info is not shared. A bite could lead to serious infection/health issues that would require such identity. Many owners just walk away from an incident. We are not allowed to do so following a vehicle accident and dog bites could be just as serious. Owners need to start taking a way more responsibility for their actions as owners. Things are getting ridiculous in Calgary. I often do not feel safe walking on paths in Calgary, because animals are so out of control. How can an animal stay to right on path when the owner uses their left hand with the leash?
- If the incident escalated beyond the two parties sorting it out. Have them call a bylaw officer.
- May it law, not a rule, for those dishonourable people who will not automatically stay as a matter of course.
- The context of the event is lost if they are allowed to leave the scene of the incident.

- This should already be a rule
- Owners must be responsible for their dogs.
- If a dog bites someone one time, accidents happen. If a dog constantly bites, then it is a nuisance, and one way to confirm repeated offenders would be by having the owner share their contact information/talk to an officer (especially if it's a bite that requires medical attention).
- This is imperative. Dog owners must take responsibility for their pet and accept the consequences if their dog bites another person.
- If people or animals are hurt because of a dog in your possession why wouldn't you stay to provide your information and side of the story.
- Its the responsible thing to do.
- My friend was bit by a dog and the owner picked the dog up, walked away, and said nothing. Owners should have to take responsibility of their pets actions. Exchange of information is necessary in case of later medical problems or anything. Enforcement offers don't necessarily need to be involved, the victim can decided if they feel like they need cops involved. But for the most part they should at lea set be required to exchange information.
- As an owner, they should be responsible for their dogs' actions, so they should be at the scene to deal with the repercussions such as provide support to the victim.
- That person is responsible for any damages occurred during an incident. All parties involved, and witnesses should have their information and statements taken for future disputes over the incident... Just like a car accident.
- Otherwise the owners run away with the dog and you have no idea who they were or where they live. How can you take any legal action if you don't know the owner?
- A dog Owner should be available to provide a statement and accept full or partial responsibility as ruled by a tribunal) in regards to medical costs and restitution etc.
- People should be responsible for their animals and take accountability for their actions. If an attack was provoked or was not the fault of the animal that should also be taken into account as they have limited defenses available to them.
- If the bite is serious, and if the person bitten/guardian of that person or owner of bitten animal wants them too
- The owner absolutely should be required to remain at the scene to ensure proper processes are followed and take responsibility for the dogs actions. Additionally, there are usually 2 sides to every story and the dog owner should be allowed to state their view of what happened.
- If there is an incident where someone overreacts, this could be a good way to properly assess the situation.
- Do not understand why they would not be required to remain at the scene of an incident where someone or another animal was injured.
- Owners should be accountable for their pets.
- "Would depend entirely on the people involved and severity of the situation as well
- If it's not something that requires medical attention then it should just be up to the parties involved."

- Only Yes if the owner is able to. In some situations it might be better to remove the dog(s) and have information relayed by another person
- Seems like a common sense measure. If my child attacked someone I would be expected to do the same.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions . . . no matter what type of pet it is.
- Both parties should remain at the scene and exchange information like they would if it was a car accident. It is incredibly stressful for any person to endure an attack on them or their pet. This is a minimum courtesy.
- If the owner will not be discriminated against based on their dog's breed and if all factors surrounding the bite are taken into account, including the 'victim dog's behaviour and owner's behaviour...yes I believe the person whose dog did the biting should remain at the scene but if staying means a witch hunt and an unfair and discriminatory trial, I could see why someone might leave the scene.
- This would indicate the owner accepts responsibility and hopefully make resolution to the incident faster
- Better tracking for problematic owners that don't properly care for their pets.
- It is similar to hitting a car as you have caused damage to someone or their property. as such there are certain steps that need to be taken to ensure that the issue is resolved
- Taking ownership of your dog and your actions regarding training, unhealthy environment where its raised, etc. is the sole responsibility of the owner. The dog only knows what it has been taught, which is to be aggressive. The owner needs to be held accountable for the actions that occurred.
- It is only common sense and the actions of a responsible citizen and pet owner (or the care giver assigned to the animal in question)
- Unless immediate medical attention is needed for a person or animal they should remain at the scene.
- Dog owners are responsible for the actions of their dogs, so they must remain at the scene of an incident to provide whatever information an enforcement officer needs.
- This would increase owner accountability and ensure that the appropriate measures are taken swiftly.
- Owners must be accountable for their pets!
- It would be like a driver leaving the scene of an accident, they most certainly should remain at the scene.
- A qualified yes, as it may or may not be better to actually create some distance to facilitate treatment or to remove the dog to prevent additional problems.
- If someone's dog injures a person or another animal, they absolutely need to take responsibility and face consequences.
- The owner of the dog that attacks another dog or human should always remain at the scene and pay for any vet/medical costs. It's the moral and courteous thing to do. If they don't stay, they should be fined.

- It's a common courtesy. Sometimes because the affected may be upset and one or more parties may need to leave the scene, it is important to provide contact information to bylaw/authorities for further communications.
- They should remain at the scene of the incident or face a fine for leaving.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions. Part of this responsibility is remaining and explaining, advocating, apologizing and accepting actions required.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for his pets actions.
- Dog owner is responsible for his dog he should take accountability for his dogs behaviour
- Humans must be fully responsible for their pets.
- It is their animal and should be held responsible.
- How are you suppose to find someone who takes off during an incident like that? We have to stay after a car accident, same should go.
- Should be current practice
- Only because, from my experience, the larger animal is always to blame when they did not instigate confrontation were merely defending themselves. Human passerby need to understand how to approach and greet dogs. See a lot of people rush up or make quick movements getting around dogs which startles them. By sticking around the 'scene' the owner can atleast explain and defend their side of the story.
- Yes, assuming the aggressive dog is not in range for a second attack.
- To resolve any conflict
- More information can be obtained to better track nuisance dogs and bad owners
- Shows owner responsibility
- Innocent until proven guilty, most of these incidents seem to be caused by the other parties bating the dog or not controlling their little dogs that go crazy at other dogs, because small dog owners seem to think that little dogs don't need training.
- If there is a history of the dog biting people, any new bites can be properly recorded.
- I support this except in the case when the animals require immediate veterinary care. If a dog fight has occurred and the animals need care, an exchange of information should be sufficient so that the animals can receive treatment.
- I have been attacked by a dog before, the owner brought me to the hospital but there wasn't any exchange of information afterwards
- accountability
- I'm surprised this isn't already the law. You should have to stay if you dog bites someone until they say it ok for you to leave.
- I have heard of numerous incidents where an aggressive dog attacks another dog at a dog park, then just leaves without taking responsibility for the aggressive dog or the damage/injury.
- There have been incidents in the past when we were children where myself or my siblings have had our own dog attacked by other dogs while walking, and a number of their owners have been of the mindset that clearly it's not their fault and just leave, leaving us with an injured animal and no idea what to do from there. (One incident had myself at 14 and my brother at 8, what asshole decides these weeping children trying to help their dog should be told to get over it and leave?)

- If their dog bites a person or animal, remaining on the scene to give contact information or talk with enforcement officer is essential if say the bite causes the affected person an injury (ex: rabies) and that person with the dog needs to pay for the injury caused.
- More emphasis needs to be on the dog owner not the breed. If people were screened prior to getting a dog, less incidents would occur. Not the dogs fault if they were not trained.
- Owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their pets and there are always 2 sides to a story
- I support this if it's a serious bite. If it's only a nip and no blood drawn then I don't see a reason for this.
- This should include small dogs as well!!!! I have had more small dogs attack my large breed and never a large dog.
- I feel that the officer needs to take a witness statement from both parties. The statements can also serve as a record for any future incidents involving the same dog. The officer should also follow up with both parties to ensure that the owner of the dog that was attacked was reimbursed for any vet fees.
- Dog owners should be held liable for the actions of their dog.
- The owner is responsible for training a dog and keeping them under your control in public. Any behavior of the dog is the owner's responsibility.
- All dogs, it just breed specific
- Mandatory for sure
- As long as this applies to ALL dogs not just specific breeds.
- Bites that break the skin and cause bleeding or damage to a person or pet should stay at the scene.
- Any owner should be responsible for their dog biting. Regardless the size of dog.
- if necessary, if pet owners are involved in an incident then they should be neighbourly and come to a resolution together. If they don't or can't then they should remain on scene until a bylaw officer is called.
- Absolutely
- Sometimes the owner can help investigators with details they might need.
- Treat it like a car accident. Involved parties must remain on site.
- If the dog actually bit another animal or person hard enough to draw blood.
- As long as the person in question wants to have a report of the dog bite, they should be under law to stay and give their information. If the person that has been bitten does not want to move forward with a complaint than no.
- Responsibility of owner to take control of dog's actions. More training required for fierce or insecure biters.
- Dogs are not the problem. Bad owners are. They should be fined to the limit, have a criminal record, banned from ever owning another pet, and the dog should be rehomed and retrained. NOT euthenized!

- Yes all owners no matter size or breed should take full responsibility
- This way context can be given. Not all dog bites are due to the biting dog's aggressiveness.
- They shouldn't be able to waive their liability by leaving.
- It is no different than a car accident. You still need to give your information/statement or whatever is needed during that time of when the incident happened. I 100% agree that the owner needs to stay n give their information if requested by a enforcement officer only
- "It's not always the dogs fault. Some times the victim aggregates the dog. There are no bad dogs, just bad owners and unfortunate circumstances.
- Remaining at the scene decreases the chance of it seeming suspicious."
- The owner should undertake a role of responsibility for their dog's behaviour and be accountable for it. The dog may have been unjustly provoked so hearing the owner's side of the story is important.
- Accountability for ones pet is a key part of the responsibility of pet ownership. These need to be addressed with behavioural supports for both the owner and the pet. A new owner for example may not understand what is available for mitigating the reactions
- The owner is responsible for socializing the animal, if the animal bit a person, the owner failed and should be held responsible.
- My dog was just chased off by two dogs today. It took us 3 hours to find her and strangers swam into the river to save her. The owner of the dogs took off. I think she should have been held responsible if anything were to happen to my dog as it was her lack of control that caused it. Again, I don't think breed is an issue- it's training.
- Similar to a car accident it should be the owners responsibility to ensure everything is in order. This should apply to everyone regardless of dog breed.
- Yes, as a dog owner, I feel it only prudent to deal with a dog bite, especially if it was my dog biting. I believe that there are good dog owners and bad...not the dog..but the owner's fault and responsibility!!
- The situation should be discussed with the enforcement officer as soon as possible
- The owner has the civil responsibility to stay and offer help and give the support to the victim
- I would also hope that the officer would perhaps be able to provide that owner (of the dog who bit) with information on training/help to manage the issue with the dog. It is not the dogs fault, but the owner's.
- The owner should take responsibility to make sure the person/animal is in a fit state and does not require medical care
- The owner needs to take responsibility.
- The procedure should be no different than an automobile minor accident.
- I feel that if an incident is serious enough to warrant someone wanting to talk with an enforcement officer, then everyone should stay at the scene. First that could help owners of nuisance dogs take their dogs actions more seriously. I also believe that it would be a good way to collect proper and potentially crucial information such as vaccination records on the offending dog (rabies) as then treatment could begin to be administered immediately.
- to make sure this has not happened before and to ensure the animal has had all its shots up to date

- They should be required to provide legitimate information to the victim, but exception should be made if the owner needs to return the animal to a nearby home or vehicle if they lack the ability to safely restrain the animal (such as leash or kennel). If they do choose to remove the animal from the scene additional fine should be placed if they remove any evidence of the attack before an officer can detail it (ie: wash blood off of dog's coat).
 - I do agree you should remain on scene to explain the situation. Because somebody could have invaded your personal space and the dog attacked the person invading your personal safety so I think the dog owner should remain on scene to hold idiots who try and pet your dog without permission accountable.
 - The owner is responsible for their dog's actions and should be required to take ownership of that responsibility in any given situation.
 - Contact information needed for follow up and to record the incident.
 - Helps hold owner accountable
 - The owner should be held responsible for their dog's behavior.
 - It should be obvious that a dog owner needs to remain at the scene, no different than a hit and run.
 - Dogs are dangerous and if they hurt someone, the owner should be held accountable.
 - Yes, same as any other incident, an owner should be present to provide a report
 - I believe the owner should stay on scene I don't believe that it is necessary to wait for enforcement only unless there appears to be a dispute between both parties.
 - This also allows the injured person to commence legal action.
 - They need to take ownership of their pet
 - Owners should definitely be accountable for their dogs and the behaviour of their dogs. Preemptively muzzling all dogs that resemble a pit bull is unnecessary.
 - Yes, the owner should stay. I have seen too often where dog owners leave the scene of the incident and then they cannot be found later. And try to hide from the victim so they don't have to be responsible for any part of the attack from their own dog.
 - "It is about being responsible for your dog; your training or lack of training of your dog.
 - My Wolfhound was bit in the lip by a Terrier while I was getting a coffee. The owner saw me watching and instead of talking to me, he and his dog fled. I had no way of knowing if his dog was up to date on his shots, etc. My Wolfhound didn't do anything except sniff the Terrier when his owner walked up and approached my dog with him.
- What will you do when another person threatens to kill your dog because they are "one of those breeds?" I no longer use the 14th Street off leash part because a dog owner of (2) Golden Retrievers has threatened to kill my dog, including telling me if he ever found her alone, in my yard or tied up while I am getting a coffee he will take her and kill her. Explain this to me? Explain how this is what Calgary has become? My dog is NOT a pitbull which wouldn't matter if she was but an American Bulldog."

- 100%
- Many times when a bite happens so much anger from the person dog that has been bitten that no one wants to talk with a clear head. More worried about the dog. But just like a car accident information should be shared with all parties involved. Instead he said she said
- The owner of the offending dog must be held accountable for their dog's behaviour including paying for any vet bills incurred by the victim dog's owner.
- Rule should be for any personal injury
- The dog (pet) is the owner's responsibility.
- The City needs to keep a record of dog bites for future reference in determining problem dogs.
- More responsibility from dog owners is a good thing.
- Owning a dog is big responsibility and a lot of people think they can put in little to no work and don't understand why people are upset when their dog is vicious.
- The human should take responsibility of his dog and he should be obligated to consult a professional dog trainer to help his dog.
- This way both sides of the story are met. This is important as it may come down to vet bills or hospital bills if necessary. I don't think it should be narrowed to just Pitbulls as any breed of not raised appropriately can display these nuisance behaviours described. This involves toy breeds as well which often gets overlooked and this is an unfair result. This knowing all angles in decision making is important to determine who antagonized the situation whether it be the other dog or the other person.
- Only if it was an actual dangerous situation.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets.
- If your dog causes injury, you should have to be present to talk to law enforcement. If you flee the scene, there should be a fine.
- Medical information should be required from the owner for shots etc
- Of course. They should have to explain themselves, and if necessary be held responsible for the incident .
- the same should apply for a Dog incident as a car incident.
- This is essential for accountability and for needed medical followup information.
- It's like a remaining at the scene of a car accident. There was damage and information needs to be exchanged
- Even minor dog bites can be serious (infection, trauma, fear, etc.) or in some cases, people have provoked an animal to bite
- The bite victim needs to know medical history of dog (i.e. vaccinated against rabies?). Once contact information has been exchanged, then both parties can go their own way unless peace officer has been called: then should wait.
- Get more details from both sides.
- If the owner cannot restrain the dog sufficiently to maintain safety, the owner must then leave full contact information prior to leaving the scene.
- Why are you even asking this---it's a No Brainer!!!!

- I think this is just common sense
- It is part of the owners responsibility to take responsibility for their actions. No different then if you were involved in a vehicle accident.
- This should be a law already if the authorities have been notified
- Many times people are in shock and so worried about their pet, that they miss the opportunity to get information from the other pet owner.
- Again it is the responsibility of the owners to protect is dog and others around is dog. If a incident happened the owners responsibility is to be sure the other life who is affected by the incident is taking care of .
- people should be required to stay at scene of a bite and exchange info like a car accident. If they leave the scene things like license plate or description should be used to track them down same as a hit and run car accident
- Much like car accidents, the party at fault should not be able to flee the scene after their dog attacks.
- The only time this should ever be an exception is in a dire emergency medical situation. This is without question the what a responsible pet owner should do.
- Spending longer in a shelter will only hurt the dog. The faster these can be resolved, the better
- Dogs are products of their environments. Their owners are the reason the way they are. Period. Don't. Blame. The. Breed.
- Only if it is safe to remain. If they are able to control their dog, on a leash, at the scene, they should stay. If not, they need to take their dog home or to a secure location and then return to the scene.
- Pet owners need to be responsible
- The dog is the responsibility of his/her owner; therefore, the owner should take the necessary precautions to prevent their dog from biting a person or another dog. If a bite occurs, the owner should be expected to speak to an enforcement officer if needed. The owner, though, should NOT be required to give their contact info to the person who was bit.
- This seems like a no-brainer. I frequently get harassed by off leash dogs while out running. A person who is bit needs to know who the owner is so that they can sue the owner.
- There can be expensive vet bills associated or therapy for people that ha d been bitten so knowing contact info can help with insurance claims. Also it is easier then for bylaw to process incidents if the "perpetrator" info is known.
- Just makes sense to remain at the scene.
- Owners must be responsible
- Unless a person saw the incident the true details of it are not necessarily available.
- Yes, but ... how is this enforced if a victim has to leave immediately for Emergency treatment?
- I feel this is apart of the responsibility of the owner to exchange information and hold themselves accountable
- I would consider it like a hit and run. Both parties should remain at the scene and provide contact information for follow up.
- Dog owners need the obedience training

- If the owner is irresponsible they should be held accountable, if the attack was provoked the person that was bitten should also be held accountable.
- If there is a risk or the dogs keep going at each other they should exchange information and attend mediation.
- This way the 'victim' can't paint the dog in a poor light when they were antagonizing or torturing the animal
- Too many pet owners do not take responsibility for their pet's actions.
- Your property has caused personal damage to someone, and you're responsible for it, like in a vehicle accident.
- Dog bites/attacks can cause substantial damage to humans, other animals and properties. There should be a way to get a hold of the owner in order to ensure they are aware of damage, the costs and this would also allow information to be easily distributed.
- Just like a traffic accident, all parties should remain on scene or at least close (as long as it is safe) to speaking with an enforcement officer.
- 100% yes! This is no different than having an accident in a car. If your dog bites it should be mandatory to talk to the other party involved and share your information if they want it. There should be huge fines for leaving the scene if ALL parties involved don't agree that it's ok to leave. Running or fleeing the scene should have a "hit and run" style charge.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dog's behavior. I see too many dogs that need obedience training and owners that cannot handle them.
- I feel a dog bite situation is similar to a car accident. If a dog attacks another dog or a person there could be injuries that the owner of the attacking dog should be responsible for financially and a statement should be taken by enforcement so there is documented proof of the incident.
- I feel that dog owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their dogs.
- Yes, the owner must be held responsible and in the case where the victim has no insurance, the owner of the dog that bites should be forced to assist financially.
- Any dog owner is responsible for their pet any breed any size any physical characteristics it doesn't matter, Owner is responsible for his dog period
- Unless both parties agree that the situation does not require intervention, both should have to remain so the situation can be explained by both parties
- This rule makes perfect sense. However, I don't know how it would be enforced. Generally, when a dog bites, the owner is quick to take off.
- If a dog of ANY breed harms another dog or another person, it is the human thing to do to stay. This goes for all breeds.
- Its same logic as leaving the scene of a crime. One caveat I would add is that the dog in question would need to be appropriately restrained to prevent further injury.
- I think this rule is proof of a responsible pet owner. Accepting responsibility of what your pet or the pet you care for has done. Also allows the pet owner to enlighten the authorities to the specifics of the dog and situation

- Dependent on the level of injury to person/other animal. A small scrap between two dogs does not require an enforcement officer.
- Accountability should be taken when pet owners do not have control over their animals. It happens and it's a scary thing, however, it is still their responsibility to remain at the scene of the incident to explain their side as well as any underlying causes.
- All parties should remain at the scene to provide the proper information with the law enforcement. Not all parties are always willing to cooperate and will need an officer to mediate the situation.
- The owner should be able to be contacted to pay fines, pay vet bills
- It is an injury issue and information must be made available.
- It would be safer for everyone that way. A mediator is needed in these kind of instances.
- When there is an incident involving a dog it is difficult to find the owner or personally identify the dog after they have left the scene. Similarly to a motor vehicle incident.
- Yes absolutely then owner should remain at the scene no matter the size or breed of dog
- A person could be severely hurt from a dog bite. Just like it's considered a "hit and run" in a vehicle incident, it should be considered as a "bite and run" if the dog owner runs away knowing that their animal injured a person.
- No different than hit and run.
- Pretty much common sense
- Owners of dogs who bite should have to share contact info with victims at the very least.
- No different than leaving the scene of a vehicle accident.
- I hit someone with my car I need to stick around. Same dealio here for me. The OWNER is usually the Where the problem and main correction lie, NOT in discriminating against certain breeds.
- It makes sense and it holds people accountable
- Responsible behaviour
- It is important for owners to be responsible and provide necessary info such as a proof vaccination if an injury has occurred
- Hold owners accountable they have allowed the dog to be that way
- Pet owners are responsible for their pets and it's actions no matter the breed or size and we should be held accountable for training our pets properly
- Same as vehicle collisions. It may be difficult for enforcement officers to find an owner if they leave the scene.
- This speaks to being a responsible dog owner. If you can't control your dog, you should not have one.
- Yes, the victim needs to be aware of the dog's history and shots
- As any assault, remain at the scene.
- How would you know who they are otherwise? I was bit by a dog, I'm lucky to still have my face... it was a nice dog normally, but even a nice dog can bite and in my opinion those dogs need to be taken care of. If the dog needs to be put down, so no one else gets hurt, then the police need to know where to go, if medical and therapy bills to recover exceed what a bite victim can pay, Then the dog owner's insurance should pay - just like a car accident victim.

- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions. The owner is responsible for the cost of medical treatment if required
- dog owners must take responsibility for their pets.
- If the bite is severe enough yes it would make sense for The proper information to be gathered
- It's the decent thing to do. Vet bill costs if incurred can be discussed between both parties.
- It's part of the responsible ownership
- There is a liability issue, also there are additional costs to the victim (meds, psychological impact etc) which need to be addressed by the owner of the pet.
- Seems like a reasonable thing to do.
- Hit and run is never acceptable.
- wherever harm occurs, both sides must present their experience of the incident as there are two sides to every story. sometimes critical factors can be glossed over by either party. (escalation factors, not asking to engage with dog, harm mitigation/reduction not addressed (dog not wearing 'do not approach -- in training' vest and muzzle).
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- BE RESPONSIBLE. EXPECT RESPECT.
- Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their pets
- It helps enforcement officers and victims to communicate.
- as a responsible pet owner it is the right thing to do. We are responsible for our pets - and if there is a risk of them biting - have the brain to muzzle them and perhaps some training for the dog is in order.
- "So the responsible owner is present when/if authorities are
- Called. Only exception should be if the offender dog requires urgent care. In those cases the victim/a should be allowed to check the dog tags and if they don't have tags a photo of the dog's owner and their license/cc etc."
- The owner of a dog that bites needs to be held responsible for their dogs actions and an enforcement officer should be there to make sure that it happens so the "victim" of the attack doesn't only left with the financial burden aswell as physical
- Yes. Of a dog bites another person the owner should certainly speak with the victim after the incident, if that is what the victim wants at that time.
- I believe dog owners are responsible for their dogs.
- The opportunity to discuss both sides of the story must be available.
- Of coarse. It's the responsible thing to do anyway.
- This is common sense.
- responsibility in case of further complications, liability, etc
- Prevents irresponsible owners from running away and hiding
- Obviously the owner should stay around to provide contact information.

- Sounds reasonable
- If the behaviour is concerning and /or bite is severe. Witness statement or contact info as well.
- Pet owners are responsible for damages their pets create and contact information can be used to ensure they take full responsibility.
- Every owner should be held accountable for their dog
- Absolutely and it must be made mandatory to pay for veterinary visit
- All pet owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour and as such should be required to participate in all investigations required.
- Why not, if you're in a car accident where someone is hurt you would stay there
- Can't believe one persons story. Gather as much truth as possible.
- Minimizing trauma to all parties is important.
- If a person or dog is injured, the owner of the dog which carried out the act should be held accountable.
- I believe the owner should exchange info in case the bite is severe.
- How else do you track the dog which is an issue
- There has to be some flexibility in this. Some dog bites are defensive nips that cause little damage and are not a sign of a "bad breed", but I can see someone making a mountain out of a molehill because they got a defensive nip. Would I stick around in this situation, I ask myself? I don't own a dog currently, but a carte blanche for a rule like this would be worse than no rule at all.
- There are 2 sides to every story, if police will listen to each persons account with empathy than yes the owner should remain on scene if another person or animal is hurt.
- I think it is good for the enforcement officer to be on the scene of an incident. I think they can help deescalate the emotions of the victim(s). Also to enforce the seriousness of the event to the dog owner. That also gives each party the chance to hear the same information from the officer.
- "This would be ideal, however, as is often the case, a person who owns an aggressive dog, is not a responsible person. Unfortunately, it is often the owners fault a dog is aggressive.
- Each case is individual and must be reviewed carefully. I know from experience, my previous dog was toy aggressive, if another dog would go for his ball he would not stand for that. I would avoid playing with toys when other dogs were around to prevent problems. Each owner needs to know their dogs and how to avoid problems."
- Similar to how I would appreciate all assaulters remaining at the scene for the same
- This should be obvious. It's their dog, their responsibility. Just like if you hit someone with your car you would need to stay at the scene or it would be considered as a hit and run. Its the same. It should definitely be a bylaw.
- Responsible dog ownership
- It's just common sense.
- "1. The owner is responsible for any medical costs incurred
- 2. Ensure their animal was up to date with vaccines

- 3. There is a history of the dog which caused the injury so there is a database and so innocent dogs are not unfairly blamed"
- The owner will be able to better describe the incident
- Have respect and stay if your animal bites another
- It would be the dog owner's responsibility.
- Only to share contact information, if dog is upset it would be best for them to go home. Sometimes it is the person who was bitten who first provoked the dog.
- If an attack happens then of course information should be exchanged. And if its serious then an officer should be call just like a car accident
- It is important to know the vaccination and behavioral history of a dog that has bitten a person or animal
- A person is responsible and liable for actions taken by their animals
- seems reasonable
- Only if the person affected or the pet owner of the animal affected deemed necessary.
- Yes, but it might be better to remove the dog from the situation and secure it's / victim's safety first. So remaining on the scene might not be best. Phone in to report within 24hours perhaps
- All too often they leave and there is people or dog injuries
- Person needs to be held accountable
- If course I support a pet owner staying after an attack. Pet owners should report when there dog attacks
- I believe that sharing contact information is a responsible behaviour which should be required.
- The owner is responsible for their dog. Speaking with an enforcement immediately after a situation happens allows the information to be shared sooner. I think this is extremely important. It also allows the opportunity to share if the dog was provoked by a person and any witnesses can share what they observed as well.
- If your dog inflicts harm on another person or animal you must be a responsible owner and deal with the consequences.
- A responsible dog owner should remain at the scene if any officials are contacted regarding the bite unless otherwise instructed. This way the incident can be dealt with efficiently and officials can determine cause and severity of incident.
- An owner should stay and take responsibility, not just take off.
- If my Dog were to bite somebody I would expect to remain to administer first aid, to provide information regarding vaccinations offer to pay medical expenses.
- Only if injury is more than a mild wound. Depends on what caused the dog to bite in the first place.
- The owner is responsible for any medical costs associated with injuries or medical attention required by the victim. The health information such as vaccinations being current and up to date should be made available to both parties by exchanging information. Finally, if a dog has shown a history of aggressive behaviour that information is important in order to make decisions such as whether the dog should be considered a threat to others as a 'repeat' offender

- Calgary is a hot bed of irresponsible dog owners. Just go to any park in Calgary (especially Sandy beach and Lincoln Park). Off lease area ignored and pit bulls running off lease.
- pet owners need to be accountable. (Like an automobile)
- As the owner of the animal you are responsible for it's behavior and should have to stay at the scene of the incident, the same as a car accident.
- Owners need to be held responsible for the actions of their pets
- If there is a dog issue, there is an dog owner issue and that owner must take responsibility for the dogs actions by staying with the animal and talk with an enforcement officer to ensure prevention of future incidences from both owner and animal.
- All dog owners should take responsibility if their dog is involved in an incident. This action does not reflect guilt in an incident as we all know there are many factors that lead up to a biting incident. All parties involved should share information.
- The answer doesn't require further explanation.
- It's a crime to have your dog bite someone. You should've known that your dog had a temper and it should be wearing a muzzle
- A responsible pet owner would not leave the scene of an incident with their pet.
- "Taking responsibility for their pet
- Informing of any potential diseases the pet has
- Any previous offences, first time etc"
- Seems like a reasonable request
- The owner of any small or large dogs who cause any lasting damage by being the instigator in an attack on any other pets or people should be held accountable for their pets actions.
- Hard to enforce by-laws without the proper information.
- Officer or bylaw should never be aloud to take your pet if you stay and do the right thing.
- Dog bites have potential for long term damage/injury. People need to be held accountable
- The owner needs to be held responsible for the actions of the dog.
- Absolutely. Tracking and monitoring of a dog's aggressive behaviour must happen to reduce the prevalence of bites in the future and rectify the damage done.
- Yes, I have been bite by two dogs different dogs while jogging through the dog park. One was by an old mangy dog whose, owner was old, there with an oxygen tank and clearly could not handle his dogs (he had another one there too). It was very tramatic and I didn't know what to do at the time. The dog jumped up and bite through my jacket. The owner took no responsibility for his dogs action. Another time, I was nipped by a big poodle dog, who jumped at me and again the owner did apologized or discipline her dog. Very bad pet ownership. I own a French bull dog and I am very cognizant of the dogs behaviour and I pick up dog poop dutifully! I wish all dog owners could be as diligent with their dogs behaviors.
- Just like if you hit someone with your car. You have to stay at the scene.
- Recently witness a dog attack another dog. While the owner of the dog on the receiving end of the attack was in shock and trying to help their injured dog the owner of the attack dog put their dog on a leash and walked off.

- Owners should be liable no matter the size or breed of dog
- people with bad dogs leave
- It is important for the dog not to disappear from the scene and it would be important to know who was responsible for the dog when an incident occurs.
- It is always the owner's responsibility to manage his/her/their dog.
- Well not exactly. I support a requirement for the pet owner (not just dogs) to remain at the scene, OR to provide accurate contact information to the victim or associates, with the exception that the owner may leave the scene to contain or restrain the animal safely.
- within a reasonable amount of time...eg 1 hour
- Opens communication between parties effected
- I think it is important that the situation be resolved in the best way possible for everyone involved, the dog included. Having everyone remain at the scene to discuss and understand the incident and find a resolution is an good step in that direction.
- It's like fleeing the scene of an accident.
- Pet owners need to be responsible for their pets
- Fleeing the scene should be discouraged with a fine for doing so.
- Owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their pets, particularly when someone/something is injured. Victim should have the ability to properly report to Bylaw/Police before offending dog leaves
- Not staying for an animal accident is like doing a hit and run with a car .
- This is no different than any other accident
- Dog owners need to take responsibility and be criminally charged when their dog causes physical harm. If they don't remain present at the scene then they're admitting their irresponsibility. This should be no different than the severity of a hit and run.
- A responsible owner should care about the welfare of the parties involved.
- This is no different than remaining at the scene of a car accident.
- It's the least that the dog owner can do.
- Yes it's the dog owner's responsibility, it's not a breed specific problem, tiny Yorkies bite it's just not severe because of size , it's dog owners who don't put in the time for proper training and teach pit bulls to be aggressive for their protection
- Yes because there are two sides to the story and if a responsible pet owner you take responsibility for your pet
- What happens if you dont remain at the scene of a car accident hmm
- Your protection your own animal by explaining what's happened, maybe it's not your animals fault.
- Just like with car accidents or the scene of assaults, owners need to be accountable for their dog's behaviour. That means remaining at the scene until law enforcement arrive.
- The only concern is that staying at the incident scene can conflict with removing the dog in order for other dogs to calm down
- the owner should be held accountable

- Because there are too many incidents where the owner and dog get away with bad behavior, and there are no consequences
- So they can provide their side of the story
- To ensure the owner takes responsibility and the dog can be known.
- depending on wait time for bylaw officer
- It's like a car accident. A dog or cat bite can be an accident so the owner should not be afraid
- It is important to provide contact info/stay to provide medical assistance just like in car collisions. However, if the dog is at large and the person/animal bit is ok or cared for the owner should leave to contain the dog.
- Absolutely, the owner should remain just like we would expect a person who was involved in an incident to remain
- Unless both parties agree to settling it without bylaw officers
- If the incident is bad enough to engage with an enforcement officer, the owner must stay at the scene
- But with the exception of minor bites, similar to how minor vs major car accidents are handled
- Especially to talk with an enforcement officer. I feel that this is important because it would allow for owner accountability for their dog's actions, and assist in getting the owner/dog the help and resources needed to prevent future occurrences (i.e. mandated training classes). Similar to liability / responsibility of individuals involved in car accidents.
- It should be seen in the same way as a car accident. This would ensure that the owner is known, and that mandated obedience classes can be enforced.
- To be held accountable
- The "bite" on another animal might not require exchange. I'd say has to be severe. Any bite on a human must exchange info.
- Yes, provided the dog has been caught and brought under control.
- I think any pet owner needs to take responsibility for their pets behaviour. This includes sharing insurance coverage and dog tag # with the injured party. It also means they need to cover the costs of the behaviour.
- Some dog owners will refuse to exchange identification information to avoid taking responsibility for their dogs actions.
- Two incidents in the last two years. In one, our 30 yr old niece was bitten by a dog and she was so shaken she did not ask the owner's name. He disappeared. The other was a similar incident with an older lady -- I think the owner finally came forward, but she should have stayed to help the victim. If people need to be told to help, it is sad. But I guess we need laws to support the obvious.
- Owners need to be held fully responsible for the actions of their pets
- Owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour and should assume the risk of that dog. Owners are the problem when dogs misbehave. Not the dog.
- Need the contact info
- Often owners take off and are never located.

- I think that the owner of a dog involved in an incident may need to be responsible for the costs if necessary, however, the injured person or owner of the injured dog perhaps can not wait as they may require medical attention as soon as possible.
 - This would encourage more responsible animal ownership.
 - You are responsible for your dog. Therefore responsible for damages or medical
 - The owner needs to be held accountable, as long as the dog is removed from the scene immediately.
 - Just like a car accident, there was an incident with the dog so the owner should be responsible and stay at the scene.
 - The owner must take responsibility
 - Well duh
 - My dog was attacked by a pitbull back in 2016 and the owner tried to hide the dog instead of paying for the fine and vet bill. I don't want others to deal with the same situation
 - It should already go without saying that it should be law for the owner to stay onsite
 - details on the animals health MUST BE provided.
 - Under ideal conditions the owner would be around and leave contact info before leaving
 - Absolutely they must be responsible for their dog that has bitten and cooperate with authorities to collect proper information so can be handled properly
 - If an incident occurs then information for both parties should be shared, just like in any other incident cases.
 - "If the dog and owner leave, the probability of that dog being found and checked for rabies, distemper, etc would likely decrease.
- However, if this law is put in place, specifications would need to be made as to what constitutes a bite. Nipping while playing usually isn't a problem, but a healer chasing a kid on a bike and biting the tire could be (some herding dogs hate wheels)."
 - Treat it similar to a car accident. Serious consequences if someone just leaved the scene
 - The owner should be present to hold them accountable, look into their history (previous criminal charges involving animals, unpaid fines regarding the animal)
 - I can't imagine leaving a scene where my dog bit someone
 - Remain at the scene, yes. But enforcement officers should ensure that the full story is heard, e.g. if a person was taunting or provoking the dog or if the other animal was unlawfully roaming (dog off leash when supposed to be on) then those factors would need to be considered before any enforcement action is determined.
 - Not taking responsibility for the action of your dog is unacceptable especially if bad damage was done
 - People should be accountable for their pets.

- If there is a serious injury, like in a vehicular incident, the owners should decide if they need to exchange information.
 - They need to be accountable for their dog. Any kind of dog.
 - There could be other reasons why the dog attacked.
 - The dogs owner could explain some information about WHY the dog attacked the person.
 - The person is ultimately responsible for the dogs behaviour. Would a person who commits a crime leave the crime scene? That would be a bigger crime then right. Same should be for bad owners.
 - Two pit bulls bullied me and my then 1year old golden retriever golden . The owner said that he was going to put them in his car and come back to talk to us. Before we knew it he sped away .
 - They should be there to offer the dogs health information. And to make sure the person or pet is okay. But not to be taken from the owner.
 - "There should be sharper penalties placed on the dog owner, not the dog. Consider mandatory pet training or education courses. Theres no such thing as a bad pet, only bad pet owners. Education should be priority
- NO TO BREED SPECIFIC LEGISLATION"
 - absolutely yes. too many people just walk away & try to avoid responsibility; its no different than a car crash. 8f you are found walking away from the scene of a dog bite, & your dog was involved, you should be criminally charged & your dog should be seized.
 - It would be helpful to assess the capability of the owner to handle a dog
 - If the dog can be controlled. A dog may bite because the owner does not have dominance over the dog. A dog may also bite if provoked or if it feels threatened or if it feels their owner is threatened. Too often an owner does not understand the natural instinct of a breed and may not understand how to deter that instinct. An owner may also intentionally raise a dog in a manner that encourages a natural undesirable instinct.
 - Accountability needs to be taken by the owner for the actions of their animal/pet/family member.
 - It's common sense to hold those accountable for the accident so long as it's NOT based on BSL
 - You would be able to better rule out which dogs are nuisance dogs.
 - I think it depends on how severe the wound is, and potentially for what reason the dog may have bitten, which I suppose would be helpful to explain the owner's end the case to an officer.
 - A collie bit my pitbull left blood all over his nose. My dog literally just backed off and growled at him. Luckily my daughter's friend is a vet she told us how to treat the wound. The collie owner acted like nothing happen and just walked away. Clue in, and stop this bs focus on pitbulls. Like I said I'm a teacher, and a home owner in Calgary, and I would move (Airdrie, Cochrane, Strathmore) before allowing my dog to be treated with such inhumanity as to have to wear a muzzle. Also, maybe you could put out a warning to people who think it's a good idea to stroll though offleash dog parks who literally know zero about dogs and are surprised when big dogs wrestle with each other. They think it's scary and violent. They bark and growl and people think they are being violent. It's like they expect the dogs to recite the Iliad. Put warning signs up so people understand that yes you could actually get bumped by big dogs that are playing. Yes dogs do play in the dog parks especially big dogs! Also in Edworthy dog park I've seen old couples who shouldn't be there, if they get bumped they are going to get hurt. Get some warning signs up, big dogs are at play! Then the city wonders why people call 311. Signs should encourage people who are NOT dog owners to attend places where dogs are on leash. Big dog owners go to off leash areas to allow are big dogs to wrestle and blow off steam. Get some signs up and get the 80 year old couples with no dogs out of off leash dog parks! It's like they threw a pair of skates on strolled into the middle of a hockey game and are shocked when they get hit by a puck. Jesus - your the city it's your job to Educate the public - I do it at work all the time. Get some Signage up! btw same goes for people who bring their toddlers in and let them wander aimlessly. I've made my point. Take care have a good day and please stop the insanity. (don't punish my pitbull for people who are irresponsible dog owners)

- That's responsible pet owning 101
- This is very reasonable, but will be difficult to enforce.
- Accountability is paramount. Those whose dogs have behaved dangerously have missed something in their own or their dogs' education, or they are out of their depth and need to seek professional training/behaviour therapy help. It is our responsibility as dog owners to do everything we can to ensure our dogs are balanced and protected so that they do not need to resort to violence.
- So long as it is safe to do so, though I am fine with the owner sharing contact information if it is not safe to stay at the scene.
- Because they are the owner and have legal documents!
- Both animal and owner are responsible. If the dog bites or attacks, it's the owner responsibility, not the dog.
- The owners of all dogs involved should exchange contact information, as well as any witnesses to the incident.
- There have been incidents where after an attack or biting, the owner has grabbed their dog and left, leaving someone or another dog injured. Seems to many times a little old lady is left. Also owners of offending dogs should have to help with the vet costs, which can be in the thousands.
- The owner should be held accountable and possibly charged/fined
- It's the animal version of a hit and run. Obviously the owner should remain on scene. Unless the owner isn't present, in which case it's a run away dog
- Too many incidents involving nuisance dogs result in no action taken because the owner walks away without disclosing any contact information to the injured party. This encourages repeat nuisance dog incidents because the owner is never held accountable.
- Owners with problem dogs should be held accountable to possible injuries or damages, so yes I think that's fair.
- Anyone involved in any type of incident including animals should have to stay at the scene to exchange info or until authorities arrive.
- Owner must take responsibility.
- If they are not required to stay you may never see them again

- Bad dog owners should be held responsible for their dogs behaviours
- Since a majority of people, sadly, don't wish to take responsibility for their actions there should be consequence for abandoning that social responsibility and leaving the scene of an offence.
- unless immediate danger for any parties to stay, information is to be exchanged. Hopefully honest information. I have seen false info in past at an incident.
- They should always have to stay and there should be penalties if they don't.
- If the dog has bitten, the owner should be held responsible and the bite should go on record in case of further incidents
- Because there are many dogs other than pitbull type dogs that do attack humans or dogs. All dogs that attack should be treated the same.
- You cannot leave the scene of a crime
- Other wise people lie. They also, change their mind, and will not file a complaint.
- It should be a law not just a rule, vet bills are not cheap and everyone knows that, so a bad owner would leave the scene.
- The owner can then explain why the bite occurred if the animal has up to date shot etc
- Individuals need to be held responsible
- If they don't stick around the dog could hurt or kill someone else.
- I am less concerned about this rule for bites to other animals, but certainly if a dog bites a person that is an assault the owner of the uncontrolled dog is responsible for. If the bite-ee was provoking dog, that side also needs to be told. Reasonable wait time needs to be considered if eg outdoors in winter. Could also require reporting in person to animal services enforcement within 24 hrs?
- Common Sense
- It is their responsibility to remain at the scene and provide the required information
- This is required for evidentiary reasons - very often, it is very hard to prove damage (injuries) against a particular dog owner precisely. A responsible dog owner has to "step up to the plate"- it is his or her animal that caused injury / damage.
- I'm shocked this isn't already required.
- People should be responsible for the actions of their pets
- If the dog is able to be calmed down, they owner should have to stay at the scene and exchange information with the victim, however, if the dog cannot be calmed down it should be taken home by the owner who should then return to the victim and exchange information and talk to law enforcement if necessary.
- However, it may be difficult to get the dog under control while waiting, so alternatives may need to be provided.
- Taking responsibility for your pets actions.
- It is the responsible thing to do. However, if the owner/guardian knows the only result is the death of the dog, they won't be inclined to stay. A fair system would encourage them to stay
- this would be the responsible thing to do. If they need to leave the scene they should provide the dog license, verified by their own ID or they will be subject to additional fines

- since I've supported insurance premiums for nuisance dogs it flows naturally that just like in case with car insurance - dog owner should remain on the scene and provide information in case insurance company should be involved etc.
- The owner must take responsibility for their dog.
- self explanatory, stay at scene state your case.
- The owner is accountable for the dog
- It is essentially like fleeing the scene of a crime if your dog bites someone
- How else will you be able to follow up with them? If a dog bites someone or kills another animal, then they should stay, otherwise it's no different than let's say a hit and run.
- A responsible owner should also provide vaccination information that may be relevant. Also puts responsibility of cumulative cases on an owner.
- It should be the same or similar to fleeing the scene of an accident.
- yes because it will show both sides of the story if the dog owner is at fault it allows them to pay for any damages if the person bitten was at fault it keeps the dog safe from repercussions
- The responsibility is to the owner and the same rules are applicable when in a car accident.
- They often don't
- all parties should be involved and share information in case follow up is required and should the animal or owner be involved in multiple incidents it is easier to track.
- I believe that if someone's dog causes a severe injury to another person or animal, for that person to leave the scene before exchanging information/speaking to an officer, would be the same as if they got in a car accident and left the scene.
- Citizens do not have the right to demand contact information including name and bylaw may not be able to find the dog owner without it.
- dog owners should be held accountable for their dog's behaviour.
- Just like a hit and run, the owner is responsible and should remain at the scene. Locating the owners maybe a difficult process.
- Similar to the law that you must remain at the scene of an accident, I feel that pet owners whose dog bites another person or animal should be required to stay at the scene and provide all necessary information required for follow-up on medical/veterinary bills or for legal purposes. Far too often, these owners get away without consequence, and these dogs need to have extensive follow up done to ensure that they are not an ongoing risk to society.
- My dog was bit a year ago at a local Calgary dog park and the owner ran away.
- "The dog owner needs to take responsibility for what their dog has done. It may need to be registered as a vicious dog or they could be required to pay for medical treatment for the other person/dog.
- Hard to achieve those if the dog owner leaves the scene."
- Dog owner would be the best person to contain or control their dog.
- It should be treated like a "hit and run" type scenario if the owner leaves the scene
- [removed] its not always the dogs fault

- Owners must take responsibility
- it really all depends if the person is in a rush to get somewhere Etc then I don't think so or if it is not that severe people should no do not approach a dog when it is on a leash Etc. But if it is a severe situation yes.
- I do believe the dog owner will be required to be there to share their side of the case, it would also make a positive impact to have both sides when engaging to an enforcement officer regarding these cases.
- The dog owner should be held responsible for the incident.
- Yes because it's the owners fault not the dog
- It's the owners fault if the dog is biting other animals or people
- There should be a standard of contact in the case of a bite, especially a severe one.
- Only if it is really severe and needs be called
- I do not think breed specific bylaws are necessary.
- The owner to be held accountable for their pets behaviour.
- We need to treat this seriously, as many owners don't. But, there would need to be an education campaign to explain play-biting or mouthing other dogs vs aggression.
- It is the dog owner's responsibility to take ownership of what their pet does.
- Owners of vicious dogs tend to flee the scene asap.
- I think it makes sense. A person or animal could be injured and it is important to stay there until the issue is resolved with an officer. Owners need to be held accountable.
- It seems like this should be treated the same as an accident that caused damage to another person's vehicle. Why should a bite be treated differently?
- It's fair.
- Responsibility is a part of ownership
- Dog owners need to provide information about the dog's current health status. Also, if their dog causes injury to other dog they should be responsible for vet bills.
- Yes, this is ethical and the owner of the dog should show some responsibility for their dog.
- This ensures fair compensation/negotiation for all parties involved
- Is this seriously a question? Of course they should absolutely be expected to remain at the incident. This is no different than leaving the scene of a car accident.
- responsible pet ownership requires that you take ownership of your pet's behavior good or bad
- This should always be the case.
- a dog bite is similar to an accident, it shows responsibility for your pet if you provide your contact information. particularly if a disease is identified, so the owner of the dog can take appropriate action to treat the dog.
- No different than fleeing the scene of an auto accident.
- Increase the level of responsibility
- I think this would cause more dog owners to understand the gravity of having a dog that is not under control. There's a difference between having a nuisance dog and having a dog that is not under control. Dog owners should understand what having a dog under control means. If sticking around after an incident is required, perhaps more dog owners will be educated in appropriate dog training and behaviour.

- This is just what's right. Bet, the majority of cases will be chihuahuas and not pit bulls...
- Reports should be made to a dog obedience service. I think officer involvement should be minimal and only to keep peaceful relations.
- A friend of mine and her (leashed) gentle dog were attacked out of the blue on a city sidewalk by two pit bulls on the loose. She was knocked down and hurt, and her dog had to be rushed to the vet. The owner of the pit bulls showed up and said he "would just put his dogs in his car and then come back." Of course he took off and she was too afraid to call the police. Pit bulls SHOULD BE BANNED COMPLETELY!!! They are much too dangerous and the owners are almost always bad. They WANT a vicious dog.
- All dog owners need to take responsibility for their animal. Any dog can attack, not just pitbulls. Owners of other breeds need to be held accountable for their pet's lack of training too.
- The owner should be held responsible for the actions of their dog, as proper training would significantly decrease dog attacks.
- Yes so it can help more better with investigations and serve the justice to victims
- It should be like a car accident. Because thats what it is.. an accident!
- Dog owners know they are mostly anonymous if they walk away. This is required to be able to identify the dog and owners.
- The owner is responsible for their animal.
- Same as determining responsibility in a car accident. People wait for appropriate authorities. This depending on severity and the mutual owners agreements on sharing information/legal id if not waiting.
- Any person present at the scene of an incident should be required to exchange information with other individuals & if bylaw or police are called should remain to provide details
- I think people should take responsibility when an incident occurs however, i can understand why owners flee the scene, dogs laws are very prejudicial towards certain breeds and law enforcement do not tend to look into why an incident occured. They only look at the animal that attacked, not the reason behind the attack.
- If a dog bites a human or other dog. It is like a car accident it is our responsibility as a mature productive citizen to stay there and exchange information regarding the incident.
- Too many incidents seem to occur that the owner leaves. There is no sign in or sign out of parks. This would assist in keeping the general public safe and following up as necessary to incidents.
- Everyone needs to take accountability for their dog and it's actions and keep their dog and others safe.
- It depends if there is another dog involved and if they are at right of getting into a fight then both parties should part and do separate police reports. Whenever it is safe, both parties should remain on scene

- If it were me , I would like the opportunity to explain what happened before it's plastered all over the news as an unprovoked vicious dog attack and have my dog seized. It could be a one time thing with a valid explanation. Not all dogs are mean and nasty. All breeds can be aggressive. The behaviour of any dog is the responsibility of the owner.
- The owner can give personal information and say what happened.
- Owners should take full responsibility of their dogs actions.
- I think it's important that the bylaw officer talks with the owner as well as the victim. If they can't stay I'd at least like to see them leave their contact information (e.g. if they need to remove the dog from the scene to calm down the situation until the officer arrives).
- If the dog can be properly controlled while remaining at the scene, otherwise they must report it. If a dog is hyped up and the person who was bit is excited that energy can pass to the dog not allowing for the situation to de-escalate
- The dog owner is 100% responsible for any incident that may happen. Dogs are animals that requires a responsible owner.
- Owner is responsible for their animals. If the animal commits an offence, the owner shouldnt be allowed to just walk away and go home.
- No different than a hit and run if the owner leaves the scene of the accident
- In theory, a good idea. Fully Support more accountability for dog owners. But how to enforce? Owners of a dog that bites or attacks generally want to get out of there ASAP, often to avoid this exact scenario. Worried they will be fined, have to pay for expensive vet bills or their dog might be labeled dangerous. Victims are often too worried about their own dog/selves to get contact info of offenders. How to ensure you're getting their proper info? People don't have license plates on their person, so identifying can be difficult and lead to confrontation.
- Owners are responsible for training and controlling their dogs and should be held accountable for any incidents.
- The dog owner is responsible for the actions of their dog. If the dog is prone to biting, this should be taken into account and acknowledged prior to the outing.
- Yes!!! Common decency and sign of responsible dog /pet ownership is to take responsibility by at least staying at the scene and exchanging information - this should not be an assumption of assuming vet bill cost if any
- I think the "if necessary part" is important here. If the owners can manage and come to an agreement on their own, then it shouldn't be necessary to involve an enforcement officer but if the bitten person/owner of the bitten dog can't manage then absolutely the offending owner should remain at the scene. That is a responsibility that we take own as dog owners.
- It is simply the responsible thing to do
- I like this idea because it makes the owner responsible for what has happened. It's not the dogs fault it's the owners
- Just like a car accident, information needs to be exchanged to ensure both sides can explain what happened, especially if it is a severe injury.

- Yes, the owner should have an opportunity to explain the circumstance and be held accountable if necessary.
- Yes!! I've been attacked by dogs while riding my bike and the owners always blame me.
- Absolutely all owners of all breeds need to be responsible at all times
- ALL owners of aggressive dogs want to be away from the scene of incident as quickly as possible so as not to be found. I have first hand experience with this. City officials have told me there is nothing they can do if they don't have the aggressive dog owners name.
- Bad dog behavior that causes harm to people or other animals should require the owner of said dog to be held accountable.
- I think it's like any other accident. Of someone is hurt it is your job to be responsible & discuss it & exchange any important information. Just like you would if you read ended someone or clipped their vehicle in a parking lot.
- It is illegal to leave the scene of a human on human assault, so it makes sense that it should be illegal to leave the scene of an assault caused by your property (dog, in this case).
- Only for proof of story. Both sides to these stories are important since the person whose been bitten, could have been antagonizing the dog. Majority of the time, it is not the dogs fault.
- Like a traffic accident we have a public duty to remain on the scene
- If a bite occurs it is resonance to ask that they follow similar protocols to any car accident
- How is this not already the law?
- its important for bylaw to be there and have all the information so they can respond properly.
- Owners should be held 100 % accountable for the actions of their animal no matter size or breed.
- Yes, because it's only right to take some responsibility, BUT dog owners need to feel safe with staying (I.e., their dog will not be taken away from them and instantly punished if they stay at the scene). As well, both sides of the story need to be fairly heard (e.g., maybe a stranger cornered a dog and the attack was provoked). It can't just be victim statements. I understand there are irresponsible dog owners out there who would lie or refuse responsibility, but I consider myself a responsible dog owner who wants my dog to live a full and happy life and will always want the opportunity to be heard and my dog's story to be heard.
- A responsible pet owner, includes ensuring the safety of those around them. If their dog bites, they need to be held accountable if injury is inflicted on someone.
- Unless the dog poses risk to others. In that case, they should have to pose/provide a snapshot of their drivers license, themselves, and their dog
- you wouldn't walk away from a crash would you?
- Otherwise it may be difficult to provide enforcement.
- I believe a complete report including both sides of the story is necessary.
- Is Like any other kind of accident, if something happens be responsible and stay there share contacts
- It should be treated as a car accident

- Owners are responsible for any damages and injuries caused by their pets. Animal attacks are caused by negligence of training and supervision. All involved persons in any animal attack should remain on scene to assist with any investigation.
- If the dog bites for whatever reason (provocation, fear, self-defence) and the owner bolts, the owner does not deserve to have dogs at all. If the dog was defending himself, the owner needs to be the dog's voice in the matter.
- It is morally the correct approach
- There is no way to identify the dog otherwise. You are not going to lean over to read the dog tag number after a bite scenario. The owner has no reason to provide valid information or any information.
- I agree with this, as it's the same idea as a hit and run.
- It's being a good responsible citizen and dog owner. The rules we have our kids abide by should be the same for dogs
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog's behaviour.
- I believe an owner should have to remain at the scene of an incident, if it is safe for them to do so and remaining there does not pose a risk of another possible incident. If the animal in question can be properly secured with no further risk to the public, the owner should stay at the scene. Otherwise they should have to leave contact info and remove the nuisance animal from the situation. If there are multiple owners at the scene of an incident, one of them should have to stay.
- Because the owner is either an idiot and no training or the dog has been mistreated or such
- As the owner of any animal you are responsible for that animal and need to take responsibility for the actions of said animal
- Owners should be held liable for the actions of their dogs. If injury is sustained by an animal or person and medical assistance is required, the onus should be on the owner of the offending dog to provide financial aid for all medical treatment. Therefore the owner should remain on the scene to provide their contact information to the enforcement officer.
- The owner is always responsible for their pet and their actions.
- If the bite is an actual bite, not a dog to dog play. Also, only if it can be ensured enforcement officer will arrive in a timely manner and not be biased
- "Yes, unless they or the other party, human or animal, needed to be taken for medical care and they were assisting with the transfer.
- Also depending on how long authorities were going to take to get to the scene. There are many different reasons as to why the party may not be able to stay at the site."
- All parties must remain otherwise this rule would not apply
- Too many times the owner of an offending animal disappears never to be seen again. Just as you wouldn't leave the scene of an accident, nor should you leave the scene of an incident. This would allow both parties to be heard so there is not a rush to judgment.
- Just to inform an enforcement officer of up to date shots if nothing else.
- Responsible Ownership, which is what Calgary is all about. Not BSL but responsible ownership.

- In cases of dogs or people being injured by aggressive dogs, there have been many cases reported in the news recently of victims having to turn to social media to try to get justice (i.e., to identify the owners of aggressive dogs to the police/bylaw or to receive assistance in paying for vet bills for injured dogs). Owners of dogs who injure others should not have the option of walking away from the consequences.
- Should either owner feel bylaw needs to be called both should stay at the scene so all proper documentation can occur.
- I believe anyone with any breed should be required to provide contact information if their dog bites.
- It's the right thing to do. Owners are responsible.
- Responsible dog ownership requires the owner to be responsible and accountable while remaining on the scene of the event
- Again not all bites are a form of aggression! The owner has a right to relay his dogs side of the story not just remain there for punishment
- It is an owner's responsibility to ensure that the person or other bitten animal is safe and able to get the care they need.
- It's not fair for a dog owner to flee the scene when damage has been caused by their dog. Fleeing the scene should result in jail time.
- Seems like it should be the same as any other incident such as a collision or assault
- Victim should be able to receive contact information if needed
- If someone's dog bites anyone or animal it is still an accident and you should talk to someone as people can get upset about their animals and if the situation was severe it would be best with professional help to solve the problem.
- Just the law
- As there could be a risk of rabies, it is very important for the owner to share information
- Owner accountability and proper investigation
- People need to take responsibility for knowings dogs temperament - including third part Care. Such as dog walkers and sitters
- A responsible dog owner would be accountable and also a point of contact for resolution (whatever that may be)
- Depending on the severity of the bite I think this would be a reasonable action.
- Dogs shouldnt bite. End of.
- Should be treated similarly to a hit and run. If the owner leaves the scene additional fines should be placed.
- Similar to a car accident, you must be able to exchange information, so long as the dog would not become more aggravated Or stressed for staying there.
- A dog is the owners responsibility and the owner should be liable for their dog. Dogs are reactive based on their owner and how well they were trained and how much time an owner spends with their dog. An owner is responsible over the dog.
- You should have to speak for the dog and offer support to right the situation.
- As long as their animal can be controlled at the time they should be there

- Who is going to enforce this?
- Pet owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions.
- It depends on the situation, if the dog is under control after the incident, then the owner and dog should remain at the scene. If the dog continues to show aggression he dog needs to be secured in a safe place for both the dog and surrounding people.
- This falls under owner responsibility and human decency.
- we have hit and run laws for vehicles why not the same for dog bites? police time shouldn't be wasted as many people in these circumstances can sort it out between themselves
- Rule just insures both dog owner and victim each have documented contact info and documented record of biting incident. Enforcement Officer may be required to settle disputes at time of incident or ensure appropriate bylaws are followed at time of incident.
- This is reasonable for any dog (not breed specific), if the bite was unprovoked.
- It is important that contact information is shared and the full story is kept on record. It is also important that the victim and the aggressor are treated promptly as often it can go both ways (ie. both dogs are bitten). One party of the incident leaving the scene prematurely can cause the story to change and untrue information being published/shared.
- That's the right thing to do.
- The person at the scene with the dog is responsible for the dog, regardless to the ownership of the dog.
- They have to take ownership
- Much like the scene of the collision, it is imperative that dog owners are held legally and ethically responsible for the actions of their dogs
- Or provide contact information
- There is always 2 sides to a story and both sides need to be present and any witnesses as well.
- Both sides need to be heard
- Absolutely this should happen!
- The dog is the responsibility of the owner and I see it in the same way as if one human had assaulted another, therefore, they should have to remain at the scene of the incident.
- Please have the number of dogs being walked by one person (professional dog walkers) to be no more than three or if more be sure to be on a leash and dog walker should be licensed. Example one dog walker in our area walks sixteen larger type dogs at one time with no leashes. It is very frightening to encounter these dogs and single walker who seems to have an attitude.
- Absolutely owners need to be the ones being held responsible when their dog has behavior issues. It's not the dogs fault!
- As a responsible pet owner, I would expect the dog's owner to wait.
- responsibility is on the owner
- That is a logical and responsible action a dog owner should automatically gravitate to
- Exception to take dog to vet if injured in the altercation
- Or owner provides contact information and allows the victim to take a photo of owner & dog.

- It's the right thing to do I.e. taking accountability for your pet
- I think this is necessary if it is a serious attack
- I have had this happen and the owner left and still walks her bite risk dog (her dog bit my dog through our backyard fence. I felt powerless (after vet fees I had to pay for) and I still see her walking her dog past my yard. Frustrating. The bylaw officer did nothing after I requested him to.
- If necessary, it's fine
- As long as others are not in danger. However a picture of the owner/handler's ID and the individual and dog might be a way to get the dangerous and agitate dog away from others.
- It's the se thing if you are involved in a car accident. If there is injury or damage done, the dog owner is at fault and needs to take responsibility.
- Absolutely! They should be responsible
- I absolutely agree and believe if your dog is involved in an attach your should have to be around to answer any questions to law enforcement and not just leave.
- As a veterinarian, there are many cases of owners who are left a paying often costly vet bills even though they were at no fault! Too many people do not accept responsibility for the behavior of their pets in public.
- Best to hear both sides in incident.
- If a person is harmed by an animal, the owner is responsible but the dog should not be euthanized or seized - there should be a fine given to the owner and a demand that the dog be taken to obedience class.
- The responsibility of the incident is on the dog owner, much like you would expect the drivers of a car in a car crash to stay at the scene of the incident.
- People should be responsible for their pets actions. You train the animal, therefore, you are liable.
- Owner should be responsible
- If injury to the victim is deemed serious, the dog and the owner responsible need to be present.
- Vet bills are expensive and the owner of the attacking dog should be held accountable.
- I would like to see laws about hit and run applied to dog bites
- I have been bitten 3 time in my life: Mauled by a Saint Bernard, and still have scars 40 years later. Attacked by a Pomeranian and still have scar 30 years later. And have been repeatedly charged at recently by 2 shih-tzu that escape from their yard. None of these owners, were or are, being held responsible for their dogs actions.
- 100% their are always 2 sides both must be heard. Its like leaveing the scene of a crime and ought be dealt as such. Weather it be to be issyed a fine or medical expences or making sure both sides heard.
- Absolutely necessary, especially if this is not the first time the dog has been involved in an incident.
- It forces the responsibility onto the owners.
- There should be a record of all bite incidents involving all dog breeds. Dog owners need to be held liable for the violent actions of their pet. They should also be required to pay for any damages caused by their pet.

- EVERY dog incident that involves an injury should have some mediation. However, a lot of folks overreact when a dog nibbles another dog. If there's no damage to anyone or anything, the case should not be elevated. There are dramatic people in Calgary that are also opportunistic, and will use mild incidents to promote their agenda. This needs to be a focus point for law enforcement. Just because someone complains, doesn't make their concerns valid. This should be at the judgment of a mediator, not the whiny person trying to create a scene.
- It should be noted if dogs are vicious or aggressive towards people. Clearly that person needs help with their dog, and they may need professionals stepping in so that they see that fact.
- just as any other incident, you have to remain at the scene until its properly dealt with by authorities.
- When an incident occurs it's important to get all the necessary supporting information, and the dog owner is responsible for supplying that. The dog should not be taken from the owner pursuant to investigation without permission by the actual registered dog owner.
- Most times when a dog lashes out it is something that the owner has or hasn't done for their dog and should be held responsible.
- The owners tend to flee the scene and claim it never happened.
- It forces accountability and a responsible pet owner shouldn't have an issue with it. Unless the owner can't control the animal and staying would pose more of a threat.
- 100%, I was bitten by a dog (small terrier dog) for absolutely no reason at all. They decided to walk ahead of me and while they were passing the dog snapped and the owner begged me not to call city of Calgary because he risked being euthanized. After explaining that my leg hurt and that I thought it would be in my best interest, and the best interest for his dog to call someone, they ran off. I have yet to see the pair ever again. There should be laws protecting civilians from animals of all breeds, of all stature... dog attacks, both big and small should be allowed to call 911
- If I hit someone accidentally or not I have to stay on scene to explain the situation, I don't think asking responsible pet owners to do something similar is asking too much
- Provides Responsibility and accountability.
- The human should be held accountable for their dog. A dog is taught behaviour same as children are. Aggressive behaviour on the dogs part is a result of failure to train appropriately.
- Often times aggressive behavior in a canine is a reflection of its owner. All pet owners are responsible for the conduct of their animal and the consequences of its actions. If an individual knows their dog is prone to aggressive behavior they should not put the dog in situations in which it will become stressed or aggravated and act out. There are plenty of dogs of a "more aggressive" dog breed that have zero issues when at off leash parks/ public spaces. It is the owners responsibility to understand how their dog behaves and act accordingly.
- This should not even be a question. If a dog bites a person or other animal they should not leave the scene until their contact information has been shared with an enforcement officer.
- I believe that all owners should be held accountable as it is not the fault of the dog but in fact a result of poor training
- Dog owners need to be held responsible for their actions, no different than parents are liable for their children's actions.

- But only if the owners can safely calm the dogs down to exchange contact information and no animal is critically injured.
- Because some people just leave after an attack and never found
- Should be responsible for the dog's behaviour for costs associated with any injury.
- As an owner of the animal who committed the attack it is their responsibility to be present in the event of such an incident. An extension of ownership is that they carry a responsibility for the animal, as a result they carry a portion of blame in regards to the attack.
- It seems difficult to enforce, and it assumes that the officer can attend the scene in a reasonable amount of time. However, it is important that the owner of the dog make themselves available to share contact information, discuss vet bill payments and other remedial actions.
- The owner is the legal party and should be the one responsible.
- A dog's behaviour is a result of its training and upbringing by the owner. The owner is more responsible for negative incidents than the dog.
- Absolutely. Same as leaving the scene of an accident, as a decent human you should stay until there is a resolution
- A dog can bite for many reasons. Having a detailed witness account from all parties would give more insight regarding the situation.
- Difficult to hold the dog or owner responsible if they don't.
- Yes because sometimes people claim not to own the animal
- common sense
- Have witnessed dog fights with injuries and people walking/running away
- Just seems like common sense, like being involved in a fender bender. If the person or owner of animal that was bitten isn't seriously hurt and is fine with the offending dog/owner leaving then that should be acceptable.
- my sisters dog lost an eye to a German Shepard and the owner just ran. This should be a chargeable offense
- This should be done anyway, but I support a rule enforcing this.
- If it is a serious bite, the owner is the animal's guardian and is responsible for the animal's behaviour.
- Just like causing damage with a vehicle, if your dog causes damage or injury you should be required to provide information and/or remain on scene.
- Yes. Just like during in an auto accident the person is supposed to stay on the accident site, the dog owner would be remain on the site if the dog bites. This way, insurance information is shared for medical expenses and bylaw's can be enforced.
- The person is then held accountable. It's their fault if the dog isn't trained properly.
- It will help to get a better sense of the dog and it's home life, how it was trained if at all, and the personality of the owner.
- Certainly. The owner of a dangerous pet must take responsibility for the behavior of his/her dog.
- They should have to remain on the scene, similar to a car accident. The injured person may be entitled to reimbursement of expenses and would need their info

- I think it's important to have this apply to all dogs, not just "pit bull" type dogs. I'm sorry there wasn't space after question 3 to note this. Too often pitbulls are labelled as the bad guys for biting when it's other dog owners who are irresponsible about having their reactive dogs off leash or in dog parks.
- Yes, absolutely to sharing contact information. Waiting to talk to an enforcement officer might not be practical
- Some people train strong dogs specially for attacks. Those people won't stick around to speak to an officer, likely because their using that dog as protection for illegal activities.
- Must be responsible
- DO NOT RESTRICT PIT BULLS THEY ARE FAMILY TOO
- Taking responsibility shouldn't have to be enforced. You are responsible for your dog. If something happens be an adult
- there are no bad dogs, only bad owners, as such, the OWNER should be punished, and the dog assessed for personality. Upon character defect the dog should be rehomed, or stipulations put in place for owner training (dog obedience training is for owners, not dogs)
- As a pet owner, you are held responsible for them.
- Yes it's important to gather all the information on the incident in order to accurately assess the situation and the appropriate measures
- If a dog injures another dog then the owners of both dogs should stay and talk with an enforcement officer and they should also decide if they are liable for any vet bills. Plus the dog that has caused bodily harm needs a record started to monitor behaviour problems.
- I believe the owner is ultimately responsible for a dogs behaviour, when owning any dog it should be taken very seriously and ALL dogs need obedience.
- "walking a dog is like walking a ""bit machine"" dog owners should be responsible of how to walk that dog and for the behavior of the dog.
- anything to prevent people from keeping dog off-leash anywhere that is not on-leash...i am sick and tired of people telling me ""my dog is friendly"" when i don't want close any dog ...friendly or not I don't want to be touched / sniffed by any dog!
- also i am really sick and tired of people telling me that ""my dog followed you because of the way you are dressed!!"" that's when i am wearing a hoodie!!!
- and ""dog can sense that your scared of them then they attacked you!"" really????!!!!!!"
- Helps to hold owners of all dogs that bite accountable.
- If my dog were to bite another dog or human I would gladly wait at the scene until an officer showed up. Same goes for witnessing a car accident. It should be law for people to stay at the scene so they can both tell their side of the story and share their necessary information. People need to be held accountable for their own actions, and their pets .
- Unless the situation is dangerous. Removal of both dogs (involved in fight) or the offending dog must be the priority, then the owners can exchange info.
- It is important for everyone to remain at the scene of an incident and file the correct paperwork and ensure correct actions and follow up actions are completed by those who are to be held responsible.

- Same rule should apply for owners of animals that owners of vehicles have (if an incident occurs, owner of vehicle remains on scene).
- Depending on severity of bite and/ or response time from officer
- Accountability. It's like hit and run.
- If the individual doesn't remain at the scene I would consider the individual not a socially responsible dog owner...and unfortunately there are many of those;
- I believe the owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- but they should also have the option to call 311 to report the bite and give contact info (in case it is cold out or an officer can't get there in time)
- Sounds like common sense to me.
- I am shocked that an owner of a dog that just bit someone/another dog, would leave the scene if a by-law officer had been called. How irresponsible and rude!
- Are criminals ever legally allowed to leave the scene of a crime? Pet laws are so backwards
- they are responsible for their dog and the dogs behavior.
- As long as the other owner is not belligerent; which they often are. Otherwise, a person should be allowed to leave the scene for their own or their pet's perceived safety, and contact Bylaw Services within 24 hours.
- That person might be responsible for the person or dog's injuries. However investigation needed, my on leash dog was repeatedly body slammed by an off leash dog in a area where dogs are to be on leash. My dog bit the other dogs face to get him away and then it's owner blamed me for having a vicious dog. My dog is elderly with chronic back pain and was defending himself. The other dog was rudely demanding rough play and owner admitted he can't have the dog kn leash or she gets pulled over.
- Similar to a car accident both parties need to be around otherwise it should be considered a hit and run.
- This should be a criminal offence to leave the scene where a dog causes broken skin to another animal or human
- Accountability is key!
- Pet owners carry the responsibility of their pet and should be called upon to give their statement to the authorities if necessary. A pet owner who leaves the scene of a bite does not sound responsible and should be reprimanded.
- Like you do with car accidents
- Absolutely. They must remain with the injured party.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the dog.
- I've seen too many bad owners run away from a scene because they are afraid their dog will be taken away and they do not want to be responsible for the vet bill of the injured animal. These are the same people who are creating the problems with nuisance dogs in the first place.
- My dog has been attacked on trails, at dog parks and have caused injuries to me or my dog and the owners have ran off. I think if your dog attacks another dog unprovoked(due to dog aggression or lack of training etc) this is a damage to property and should be dealt with as such. I have had to rush to the vet and it cost me a lot of money to fix him up due to an aggressive dog. If a dog is a nuisance dog there needs to be better rules so people are more responsible. As dogs are powerful animals. My dog is a large breed, so when he has been attacked he was usually the large dog and so the damage was puncture wounds and scratches but for a smaller dog these kinds of acts of aggression could be fatal.

- If owner remains at scene the type of dog will be known and owner will be present to describe the situation of what happened. Because the incident may be due to the other animal present every owner and animal should have the legal right to defend themselves in court not to be unjustly punished just because of the dogs pedigree.
- Owner must be able to show they can keep control of their animal at the scene or the pet is confiscated. The owner should be able to move to a safe distance but not leave the scene.
- The situation should be assessed to determine what caused the situation and if it's a one off occurrence or the start of a problem
- Its do different than a car accident. its part of being a responsible citizen.
- It is unfair if an owner of an animal that bites does not provide contact information to the authorities which can then make a reasonable decision as to future actions that need to be taken.
- There is always two side to the medal. Both parties should explain the story from their point of view so the law enforcement can make an unbiased decision - regardless of dog's breed or look
- Your pet is ur responsibly
- Hit and run is illegal, why would other injury causing activities be exempt from similar?
- I have been bitten twice and the owner left both times. I was left to handle all costs and trauma alone.
- As with any accident, both people involved must stay
- It's like any other accident and should be dealt with properly
- Depends because severity needs to be a factor. If both parties stay and an outside person can come to investigate, presumably they can gather a more accurate understanding of what happened. As opposing parties may have differing views. If it is a bad attack, witnesses would help because maybe the injured party will need to leave to seek medical attention immediately.
- Seems like the right thing to do.
- I believe that if your dogs bites someone or my dog gets bit then staying at the scene is the right thing to do
- Because it is your responsibility since it is your pet to resolve the problem.
- If someone is bitten a dog's medical history is necessary for proper treatment of the person bitten.
- It's no different than a human on human crime. They need to stay and accountable
- so it makes it an easier situation for the dog and owner of the dog. Actually hearing a story may help the situation because witnesses can help too save a life.
- It is common decency to remain at the scene (a "bite and run" is not acceptable).
- If your dog injured another dog or human, it is your responsibility as their owner to be in communication with the person you injured, and if necessary, pay for any vet bills. As well as speak to bylaw in regards to your animals behaviour going forward.

- I believe the owner must show responsibility for the animal by remaining at the scene and not trying to avoid law enforcement.
- This is the right thing to do.
- Owners should take responsibility for the action their pets take, so in case of an incident there should be someone representing the dog.
- There are no bad dogs only bad owners
- I believe that an owner should stay. My dog bit a lady who hit me after my dog only approached her dog. The lady hit me when I pulled my dog away from her dog .. she was trying to HIT my dog, but hit me and then my dog bit her ... This lady should have had TRAINING on how to handle another dog approaching her dog .. if she did not try to hit my dog (hit me instead) she would have never been bit. I called the City and reported the incident and I stayed while SHE left .. the officers understood that my dog was protecting me .. but MY DOG should NOT have had to go thru that .. if every dog owner had to go thru training on how to handle their own dog in different situations .. my own dog would have NOT experienced this terrifying incident that the irresponsible dog owner created
- Owners responsibility
- Depending how bad the incident was
- For follow-up and to track repeat offenders
- Much like vehicle incidents/hit and run, people need to take responsibility for their dogs' actions.
- Dogs that exhibit violent behaviour toward people and other animals need to be known about -- the more documentation, the better their case can be assessed. Too often, owners will shrug off the actions of their dogs that may have harmed others.
- Does "personal accountability" sum it up?
- Pitbulls arent any stronger or more likely to bite than any other breed.
- Owners are still responsible for damage/injury caused by their animal, its a criminal offence to leave the scene of a car accident without at least exchanging information first, should be the same with an incident with an animal too.
- There is a good chance that the owner either won't stay or the information they provide could muddy the situation.
- Zero chance of identification and prosecution of the offending dog and owner if the owner does not remain on scene
- For the same reason people are not allowed to flee the scene of a car accident or a crime.
- This is common logic. The dog needs to be removed from scene, however the owner needs to be at the scene at the time of event, just like a car crash.
- The owner should always stay at a accident.
- It would be ideal, but perhaps difficult to enforce. Perhaps attach an appropriate fine to "leaving the scene"
- Some dog owners may deny being at the scene if allowed to leave. This would also mean that the response time must be in a timely manner.

- Treat it like you would any other accident, whether it be a car or otherwise. Swap contact information, and assume the responsibility.
- Similar to a car accident, the owner of the animal should remain on scene to exchange the appropriate information, barring extenuating circumstances such as the pet having gotten loose and owner needing to find the pet, or the pet being too hightened to remain in the immediate vicinity, at which point a primary phone number should be provided and followed up on.
- Any dog owner should remain at the scene.
- I think this is the right thing to do. We should stick around at a car accident, why should it be any different that an incident like this.
- not necessary to explain
- As long as the bylaw enforcement office is not biased towards "pitbull" types breeds, or other large breeds. As a large dog breed owner, many smaller dogs initiate attacks/fights, and unfortunately end up being injured more severely. These cases need to be handled with caution and care so as not to put 100% blame on large breed owners when their dogs are only defending themselves. Having a witness involved would be beneficial as long as they are not associate with either party.
- i think that's the responsible thing to do
- The dog is their responsibility, it is no dissent than an automobile collision.
- To get information on the dog's health, vaccination status, etc
- The owner is accountable for their pets actions.
- Owners are responsible for their pets actions, and should be held accountable.
- The dog owner is responsible for the training/handling of the dog, and should be held accountable for it
- but needs to control the dog first. and if injury of either dog, that should be seen to first so a better method of identification should be applied rather than the above as enforcement officer may not be quick. and if minor injury, becomes a training problem, for both dog and owner.
- Dog owner needs to take responsibility
- Because lots of ppl just walk off with their dog and then you have to try and locate them if there are injuries, etc.
- This is a no brainer. How can an investigation happen if the owner takes off? Same logic as a hit and run accident in my thinking.
- I agree with this
- Dog owner needs to take responsibility for there dogs behavior.
- the dog owner is 100% responsible for the dog's behaviour therefore he needs to be there to respond to a law enforcement officer.
- We should get information and make the owner of the dog responsible legally for vet/medical bills but we shouldn't rush to put the dog down and we shouldn't do this at all
- Most dog attacks are provoked. It is important to have both sides of the encounter.
- Because it's the right thing to do!
- I do think the owner should stay at the incident. However since all the dog bites and attacks I have witnessed in Calgary were done by every other type of dog except bully types maybr the city should check themselves on trying to attack bully types. My friends dog was attacked by a german shepard last week. Stop going after bully type dogs!

- Staying at the scene of an incident to share contact information seems like the responsible thing and reasonable thing to do.
- The dog is their responsibility
- As long as it is within an appropriate time frame. Making the individual wait more than 1-2 hours at the scene of the incident is unreasonable.
- To ensure the dog has all its shots up to date, and to be responsible for injuries caused.
- I think all dogs are capable of biting people and other dogs if they are not properly raised, I do not think this is limited to just pit bull breeds.
- The owner should be familiar with the offending dog's personality/body language and should be able to provide an accurate account of the event to the enforcement officer
- If a dog bites a person or animal, yes, the owner is responsible and should stay on the scene to provide information, This should also pertain to small breed dogs which are known to be aggressive and bite.
- Yes they should remain, unless they need to take an injured animal or person, theirs or someone else's for medical attention
- if you dog bites someone you need to make sure that never happens again. Take responsibility and deal with the consequences.
- Information should be exchanged in cases of injury resulting in veterinarian care.
- The dog owner needs to be responsible, many dogs get bites at dog parks and the owners of the biting dogs just Walk away, not taking responsibility.
- "Dog are family and should be treated the same as a person in this matter.
- Medical bills can be extremely expensive."
- Common sense
- Too often dog owners blame the victim for somehow 'inciting' the dog to bite or otherwise show aggression. They then feel blameless and free to walk away from the incident.
- It's only considerate and responsible ALTHOUGH it may not be possible if the dog needs to leave the scene for safety reasons and there is no vehicle/ home for them to be placed in.
- It's similar to a hit and run. If your animal is causing harm, both parties should stay and fill out an incident report that can be on record somewhere. This enables the authorities to follow both dogs in case of another incident.
- Is this not already a bylaw that owners are expected to follow? Pets are personal property and it seems reasonable to expect that owners, or caretakers acting on behalf of owners, would be required by law to exchange information in the event of a violent incident between pets, just as a driver would be expected to exchange information in the event of an incident involving their vehicle.
- This is like a criminal assault. If they leave, they should be heavily fined and the animal removed from their possession. They should also be prohibited from having another dog.

- Information sharing should be mandatory between those involved, however I am not convinced about waiting for an enforcement officer. More clarification about the need to wait for them would be required.
- although "if necessary" is vague. i believe most responsible owners will stay anyway
- Owners should be responsible for the dogs actions not to dog and definitely not the breed of the dog.
- Fault or non fault, all parties should stay in the area for proper reporting.
- ALL dogs should be held accountable. Not just pit bulls.
- Of course if an incident happens all parties should stay and speak with bylaw.
- There is already I law in place where you cannot flee the scene of a crime/car accident, therefore why should it be any different if your dog bites someone else.
- It is the responsibility of the owner for their animals behaviour.
- This is absolutely necessary. Bites can happen for so many reasons. Information about the dog, veterinary history and information about the owner can all be collected and assist in providing a full picture and highlight opportunities for remediation.
- Similar to if your car is in an accident. Should apply to dogs caregiver if different from owner at time of attack.
- Depending on the severity of the bite and circumstances.
- YES as I said earlier it is not the breed of the dog that concerns me it is the human behind it and people need to understand that it is their responsibility to socialize their animal with people and other animals. therefore yes the person whose dog bit someone or another dog should stay and give not only their name, but also the name of their vet so that the officer and the other person can get information on the dog's immunization records.
- if and only if they dog bites
- If you have an animal it is the owners responsibility for all that happens to and from that animal. It's not the animals fault, punish the owner.
- To get name of person responsible for pet.
- Have everyone and everything present at the scene if at all possible;
- your dog, your responsibility
- The owner needs to be accountable
- If you cannot handle your dog, on a leash, then you should not have one.
- Its the dog owner who is responsible for their dogs actions and needs to be there to help .
- When my dog was younger, and not much younger, a man surprised him by talking to us, and then breaking out into a jog right beside us. The dog jumped and nipped (no bite, grabbed coat, didn't rip coat) we told him our dog would've thought you were friendly and playing, and he seemingly understood but was unhappy. This was in an off leash park.
- It should be no different that a car accident. Information should be exchanged and the person with the dog responsible for the bite should have to pay for the other dog's vet care if needed. Also the dog that bites isn't necessarily the dog that starts the fight between dogs. More dog owners should be educated in dog language and the signals they give off and what is appropriate engagement and 'play' at dog parks.

- Both sides should be heard and this would help. It would also help people take accountability for their pets.
- Dog owners should take responsibility for their animals. It is their job to train and take responsibility.
- ownership.
- if they are there, a record can be taken and possible replacement of the dog if needed. Plus if the person or dog is injured, the owner should be responsible to pay the medical/ vet bills required.
- Just like with drivers of cars are to remain on the scene of an accident, so should dog owners when an incident occurs.
- It's an assault. And I think small dog bites should be considered a behavioural issue and owners should require obedience training.
- I've had my dog attacked and the owner of the other dog run away from the scene.
- I think any responsible pet owner should stay at the scene. The caveat is if their animal has been badly hurt and needs immediate vet attention
- Dogs are rarely bad or aggressive by nature. Aggressive primarily happens for one of two reasons, A) If they have been hurt (ie kids throwing rocks at them) or because B) their owner trained them that way. In either case the owner should be present to explain the circumstances. If the dog was reacting to pain then the owner should want to be involved to protect their dog, and if it's because of how the dog is trained then the owner must also be involved as they are really the one at fault not their dog.
- I believe that we have the right to defend ourselves in court and by talking to the enforcement officer you would be using the system that is in place for us as citizens to get a fair and just trial in the court of law. An example being I'm walking my pitbull and someone's chihuahua attacks my dog when walking by so my dog reacts and grabs the chihuahua it gets hurt. Why should my dog be the nuisance dog and I be the one charged for owning the animal that reacted to protect itself. Not only that but it would cut down on the number of attacks in the unknown breed category involved in attacks.
- Owner should pay for vet bills
- I have heard of people leaving the scene so they don't have to pay vet bills of the other person
- As above, I personally strongly believe that the owner of any dog bears a high degree of responsibility for said dog's actions. It should absolutely be a crime to flee the scene where your dog bit/attacked a person. If we don't hold owners responsible for their dogs actions, then they have no incentive to be responsible dog owners.
- That's assault. The owner is responsible for the dogs behavior and if he is known to be aggressive, he should wear a muzzle or not be brought to a dog park.
- Dog owners should take responsibility for their pet's actions if an incident were to occur
- It is important that dog owners take responsibility for the actions of their dog. In order to do that, they may need to provide contact information and other details so that appropriate actions can be taken.

- The dog could be sick and victim needs to know, the dog owner needs to cover financial cost to victim, dog and dog owner needs to be assessed to see if they are safe or if it was a one-time thing caused by unusual trigger, etc. It is like a hit and run if they don't stay. Fines should be higher for those who run away.
- Only if it's a serious bite (the person or other pet is seriously hurt/bleeding)
- People have been really hurt before or there animal has been really hurt and owners of other dog leave the park and other owners are left with the animal and medical bills
- If there is a bite by ANY dog, NOT JUST PIT BULLS, the owner absolutely needs to stay on site.
- That's the respectful thing to do. The owner of the aggressor should be allowed to defend their dog, but shouldn't be able to get away and disappear if something happens
- Just like a car accident, if there is an incident there should be no running from it
- Yes, if a dog hurts someone their owner should be there to exchange information
- It's an attack. Similar to hit and run idea. Be responsible.
- responsible guardianship is key to the Calgary Model

Responses below include those that responded 'No' and provided an explanation.

- Enough laws already.
 - depending on the circumstance, maybe the victim is afraid, might increase he/shes anxiety, maybe the dog isn't comfortable, ie too hot/ cold out. lots of variables
 - Depending on the what the bite severity is obviously, but a lot of dog bites require zero medical attention.
 - "Yes, if a dog attacks a person and the person requires medical assistance.
- No, because people have a different levels of what is acceptable dog play and what is aggressive. How would you determine the type of dog on dog bite requires law enforcement?"
 - What if it was a wild bird or rabbit. I wouldn't stay at the scene. If it was a person yes. But pending that may not be the best idea to keep the frustrated dog at the scene either.
 - I think the dog should go home and the officer can go talk to the owner there. No need to put additional stress on the animal
 - I don't think people would follow it.
 - An exchanging of information between the involved parties should be required
 - They should have to remain only if there is damage from the bite. Most dog bites are warning bites and don't cause (or cause very minor) damage and shouldn't require involvement of an enforcement officer
 - You cannot expect to wait for an officer to show. What if you have other pressing commitments (pick kids up at school/daycare)

- This sounds dangerous and potential for a further altercation. The owner should have to give contact info and be allowed to leave. It should be another infraction if they refuse to give info before leaving though.
- How long could this take for an enforcement officer to show up? Owners, dogs and victims are shaken up and scared, I'm sure most will do the wrong thing in the heat of the moment. A cooling off at home period should be allowed. The threat of death, fines, and serious restrictions will limit the number of people who get help for their dog.
- Someone unfamiliar with dogs may just claim a bite to be intentional or vicious, when in reality, some dogs are triggered by certain things. A person may have instigated or approached a dog without speaking with the owner, putting themselves at unnecessary risk (ie. Did not take responsibility for their own actions and so full responsibility should not be assumed by the dog owner)
- I think the 2 parties should just share information
- There should be an information exchange but some situations may become worsened by the remaining presence of the dog or involved parties
- As adults we should be able to deal with this matter before bringing the law into it.
- Don't get close to a dog's face unless the owner says it is safe to do so.
- Let's say a dog got out bit another dog. The owner was able to stop the dog but was so exhausted and told the other person to run away so that they could escape and eliminate the situation by removing one of the dogs. The last thing you want to do is try hold back two dogs or more that are fighting and keep them all together in that situation. But there definitely needs to be a way to contact each other after just like a car accident. Not always necessary to have the police involved.
- Dogs bite sometimes. It's not fair to punish them because most of the time it's the other people bothering them or wrong treatment of them. Not everyone cares if they get bit.
- So long as both parties share information and the incident (based on severity) is able to be handled between owners, police don't need to be involved.
- If a dog has been involved in an incident such as a dog bite. The dog more than likely is scared. Feels threatened. And should be removed from the situation to cause less distress to not only the dog or dogs involved. As well as the victim of the bite would feel more comfortable I'm sure being away from the dog and owner that is responsible for the incident
- What if the person bitten was being a jackass and caused the incident? What if someone is lying? No. This will be abused. Are you guys bored or something
- Depends on the severity.
- Waiting for an officer with dogs who got into a fight would make matters worse
- I believe people should figure this out without wasting police/bylaw time
- It would be more important for the owner to remove the dog from the stimuli, especially if they are having a difficult time controlling the dog. Working through process would be challenging when all parties are stressed and worried.
- Owners can swap information just like a car accident, no need to involve law enforcement, they can be doing better and more useful things.
- Doesn't seem necessary.

- not for all bites, but it would be reasonable in the case of severe bites or injury
 - situation dependant. Perhaps for major bites/causing actual injuries.
 - If a dog bite takes place it is most likely due to the dog being triggered by something that it is fearful of; the dog will need to immediately be removed from the situation to prevent the dog becoming further stressed or agitated and for the safety of others
 - The dog or owner could be injured as well and may need to visit a vet or hospital.
 - At times it is nessisary for safety for the dog to be secured elsewhere while law enforcement is called. I've also seen witnesses grow violent. The law should be mandatory contact with enforcement after the incident, but not always on site.
 - If there are injuries involved, I would support it. However, I have seen multiple incidences at dog parks in which one party is very dramatic when there are no injuries even involved. This would allow those people to put "nuisance" labels on dogs who do not need the label
 - How much sense does it make to keep an allegedly aggressive dog in an escalated situation? If safety is the main concern, then shouldnt the dog be removed from the area?????? Common sense I would think.
 - Need to de-escalate the situation.
 - "This is dependent on the case. If both parties are in agreement that enforcement is not needed, they should have the right to settle without enforcement involved.
- Where parties cannot agree and the incident is severe, it would be more mportant to involve enforcement."
 - Animal could hurt other people if they are left in the area where the attack happened
 - Calgary should provide more options and support for dog training - prevention over punishment
 - I was bit by a dog that attacked mine and had to rush to emergency to get my hand stitched up
 - Remaining at the scene with the dog may increase the tension and cause the situation to be more dangerous and traumatic to the victim. They should provide their information and be able to leave. This rule does not differentiate between minor and major incidents, which should not be treated the same.
 - Often a dog that has bitten is extra excited, hurt, and needs to be removed from the scene to calm and be able to be examined for injuries. They should be required, like a vehicle accident, to share contact information then leave.
 - If the dog is put into a situation where they do not feel safe they may bite. It is not a good idea to keep the in that situation chancing that it may happen again if the dog is uncomfortable.
 - No as I feel necessary is a very ambiguous term, as well as the care of some animals may require rushing to a vet, and waiting for an officer is not an option, as long as information is shared between injured party and dog owner that should be enough.
 - Lot of bite incidents are result of improper behavior towards the dog.

- If you have worked it out with the other person there is no need to remain on scene unless other party wants it
- Any dog bite is provoked. It is the persons fault. Not the dogs. Why are dogs not allowed to defend themselves if a stranger rushes at them? Hmm?!
- No. Because dogs also bite when they are playing. There is a difference between play biting and biting to kill/injure. A lot of people don't know the difference. Lots of people are naive when it comes to this.
- Remaining at the scene could only inflame the situation
- I think if there's already been an incident the best course of action is to diffuse the situation. As long as they leave information or the other person has a picture of their id the owner and animal should be able to return home while the investigation continues. Forcing them to stick around just adds to the overall stress of the environment.
- The owner should be available for questioning, but to have to sit at the scene and wait for someone to arrive when the person bitten or the animal would have probably gone to the hospital or vet clinic is a bit absurd. Maybe the owner should have to bring the animal home or placed with someone while they attend the hospital or vet clinic with the victim, and wait to be questioned at that time. Depends on how long it takes for officers to respond to that sort of thing and how they prioritise it as well.
- I do believe that contact information should be necessary, but the animal should be removed as quickly as possible to mitigate further harm.
- It doesn't not suggest the severity of the bite. I do not believe accidents or small bites are worse enough to risk the owner being fined and losing their dog. If they are responsible enough and the bite is severe, they should stay and work it out with the other owner or person.
- You need to have a better definition for severity of bit and what if necessary means
- The dog should be immediately removed from the situation and taken home, therefore the owner must take it there. Information should be exchanged first between involved parties before the owner departs.
- it depends on the severity of the attack. I would say yes only in the case of severe bodily harm I.e. requiring EMS.
- I feel its the right thing but not necessary
- The owner and dogs are likely stressed waiting for a call to be placed and arrival can be traumatizing and make a stressful scene worse
- This will be very hard to enforce.
- In some cases, the owner staying on scene could further increase the stressful situation on everyone involved. It is best that the owner removes their dog from the scene to safely contain it.
- Responsible people will stay. Irresponsible people won't stay even if there is a bylaw. They don't care about bylaws and won't change their behaviour just because there is a bylaw.
- I support it for dog bite human not for dog bites dog. Dogs are dogs and they tell each other of when it is necessary: severe mauling is different story.
- Case by case. Sometimes dogs fight and removing a dog as quickly as possible is most effective.

- It completely depends on if there was serious injury to the animal, or any injury to a person. Dogs will always be dogs and will settle their differences on their own.
- I don't think this rule would be feasible to enforce, especially in the instances where the owner is injured during the altercation to the point of needed medical attention.
- I don't believe there is any way to effectively and properly police this
- It is the same thing if you are involved at the scene of a car accident.
- That is not fair why attack a single breed
- If there is a problem, the dog should be removed from the area before things escalate more.
- I don't support the idea of punishing the dog whose owner is not educated enough to train the dog. And I don't support punishing a dog if it was teased, abused or threatened by a person or another dog who is further perceived as a victim. The existing system doesn't investigate the cases enough, therefore I don't support remaining on scene to get your dog killed at the end.
- If a person is bitten, they need to seek medical help. They should get the info from the owner, and be free to leave, so too should the owner.
- Impossible to enforce. The people with the real problem dogs because of their own lack of training the dog or otherwise, won't stay regardless of the rule so it won't result in fair consequences.
- The owner should provide a way to contact them and take their animal to be secured not to remain in a dangerous situation that often escalates.
- If an incident occurs the owner likely needs to de-escalate the situation and deal with the dog. Contact information should be exchanged. However, this could end up being false information given. So, maybe? As long as it's safe for everyone.
- They can provide the information to the owner of the dog that was bitten. It is better for the dog to be removed from the situation to calm down vs. remaining in the area & continuing to get stressed.
- If it's self-defence for owner, or a dangerous situation for someone to stay in (if a dog bit an attacker in owner's self-defence)
- Exchange of contact info and availability to speak to enforcement but at times to separate parties would be best to de-escalate the situation.
- Owners need to get their animal out of any situation that has caused high stress. A dog bite is a high stress situation.
- If a dog bites a human it should be mandatory but dogs often bite other dogs for a myriad of reasons some legitimate. Let's focus on the serious cases.
- Yes owner information should be given but I believe the animal in question should be safely secured on or off site
- Sometimes if there is a dog fight, the best thing is to remove both dogs from the situation. Owners should have to exchange information, but waiting for an official could lead to increased agitation to one or both animals and their owners.
- I strongly believe that if a dog bites another person, it should be investigated as to why the dog bit the other person. Sometimes it is the other person's fault or the owners. I do not believe the dog should be penalized for this. I think the owner should be held accountable. Not the dog.

- I would support this rule for severe bites requiring the person or dog to visit the hospital/vet. But as it's difficult to define what's severe and what isn't I don't support such a rule as I wouldn't want a dog who isn't aggressive, violent, or a nuisance to be labeled as such because of an overreaction, and by requiring an owner to stay at the scene and share contact information you're leading small incidents towards being blown out of proportion.
- The whole situation will be full of tension, anger, fear, shock. It might be easier to exchange phone numbers or at least agree to meet without the animals at a later date or time pending injuries.
- I do not believe this would be effective at dealing with the situation. They should be required to give contact information, not to remain at the scene
- If a dog is in an aggressive state and has already bitten a person/animal, it is in the best interest of the dog to remove it from the situation to an area where it is able to calm down. Requiring a dog to stay in the initial area would increase the stress and subsequent level of aggression in the dog.
- I do think that the owner should have to share their information, however if there's a reason that their animal is being reactive it is probably best that they bring their animal back home and out of that situation that way nothing else unfortunate occurs
- If it is a serious incident most people would stay on site anyway.
- I would support this rule for severe bites requiring the person or dog to visit the hospital/vet. But as it's difficult to define what's severe and what isn't I don't support such a rule as I wouldn't want a dog who isn't aggressive, violent, or a nuisance to be labeled as such because of an overreaction, and by requiring an owner to stay at the scene and share contact information you're leading small incidents towards being blown out of proportion.
- In an attack I think it is best for the owner to give a number and then leave scene for the safety of the person that got attacked and the aggressive dog to leave scene and go home and be confined there until matters can be taken care of
- I do not think this is always necessary, for example if an off leash dog approaches an on-leash dog, in an on-leash area, if the off-leash dog is bit by the leashed dog, it's still the off leash dog owner's fault. It's usually the right thing to do, but every case is different.
- This can be traumatic for the owner, victim and dog. I agree details need to be swapped but waiting around for god knows how long will only exacerbate the situation
- Sometimes failing to remove the animal from a situation will result in further negative interactions. However, I feel the owner should be required to remove themselves only as far as is necessary to calm their dog and no further.
- It should be required to provide information to other parties involved, but not to wait to talk to an enforcement officer. It is safest to get the dog to a safe location, instead of waiting around. If anything needed to be clarified, a phone call should be sufficient.
- I find this problematic for certain situations, such as no damage was done to the person or animal; or in the case of two dogs who both were responsible for a fight with one another. Minor incidents for level 1-2 bites can easily be resolved with just the owners.
- It might be in the best interest to separate in order to de-escalate the situation.

- An agreement between the two parties could be met. Also, I'm fearful that this decision would make people more likely to flee for the safety of their dog. Also, cats who are roaming at large can present issues for dogs who are non-aggressive but who have a prey-drive. Of course owners do their best to prevent anyone's pet being harmed, but if a cat was roaming, hiding under a car or in some bushes, a dog owner might not be able to catch their dog in time.
- Difficult if owners need to remove involved animals from situation. The question does not provide adequate detail of proposed rule to appropriately answer.
- I do believe most people should stay the scene and try to give and get contact information, however, I vote no because sometimes the person who was bitten may leave upset and this could then turn into blaming the other person for "leaving" when in reality it was the other. These situations are stressful and may cause people to act out of character and not think clearly right away.
- This makes it difficult for owners to take their dog out of stressful situations and calm them down. There are not always two people walking a dog
- Owner will have to deescalate the situation and staying at the scene could make that difficult
- I don't want a stranger having my private contact information. Exchanging that type of information isn't even required for a car accident. Is the City of Calgary going to be liable if the other party starts harrassing me? What if the other party is lying and causing a scene...and now they have my phone number. It would be extremely inappropriate for City Council to impose a bylaw that forces me to hand over my phone number to private citizens.
- I think the priority should be removing the nuisance dog so the owner should stay to exchange info but not necessarily have to wait for bylaw.
- How is an enforcement officer going to enforce that? You're just asking for trouble between the two owners. They should be required to report their dog bite but not remain at the scene.
- Not if it bites another animal only if it bites a human
- Depending on the situation and who is at fault
- Tired of living in a police state
- depending on the situation. If someone's dog attacked mine first or a human did or was attacking me, any dog could bite.
- The dog and owner would already be stressed enough, there may be many causes ending in a dog biting another dog or person. Removing the dog from that situation would be better and for the owner to meet up with the enforcement officer at home or wherever suitable.
- "If it's a bully breed it'll already be a one sided story.
- So many other breeds are more violent"
- I think the owner should be able to leave the scene but must provide identifying information so a report can be made before doing so.
- In some situations the dogs would need to be separated and removed from the situation, the owner should give contact info but not be forced to keep dogs in an unsafe environment which could make the situation worse
- The remain at scene escalates the problem, doesn't allow dog to be handled safely

- Having consulted on hundreds of dog bites in Calgary over the last 8 years, I have found that people are varied in how they want to follow-up from a bite. Some people just want their animals to the vet or themselves, some people become angry and or violent in defense of their animal. I just think "the owner" is unclear language in yet still other cases where two dogs have been in a fight and in an attempt to break them up, both owners blame the other dog. I still find that the rate of reporting is quite low in the community and I just don't see this being a viable mandate at this time. It could be, but I believe a period of targeted campaigning for increased or mandatory reporting would need to proceed in order to be effective.
- "As long as information is exchanged. Provided there is consensus between the parties. Then these matters can be handled between individuals.
- HOWEVER. If the opposing party declines to exchange information. Then enforcement is required. And should be treated as leaving the scene of an accident. And be tracked down as the same
- Though the definition of bite must include the breaking of skin . As dogs in play often look as if they are fighting. But there is NO hostility between them. They just don't have hands. And have you never accidentally bumped into someone making them stumble?
- Please remember animals are not people. Even we'll trained animals can react in unexpected ways due to stimulation we do not understand."
- You can do it all by phone and email.
- Depending on the severity would change potentially change my response . Does law enforcement really need to be involved with something the individuals can potentially come to an agreement on?
- There's always two sides to the story. A little dog might instigate or even bite a larger dog. If the larger dog reacts they will likely have more of an impact, though it was the smaller dog that bit first.
- Sometimes dogs bite because they are in danger. If a dog bites someone because that person is being aggressive to the dog (and people have more sense than dogs) then it is not the dog's fault and is best for the owner to take the dog to a safe location.
- In most situations this is sensible but what if the situation is aggravating the dog? It should be compulsory to identify oneself in these situations.
- In some cases it is best to just get the dog out of there, so that should be allowed.
- No, because the owner needs to get the dog home as quickly as possible to calm the dog down.
- Typically a dog bite is not a result of the dog and more result of bad handling. I don't ever believe that a dog should be punished for the owners negligence.
- Bites happen. People should be responsible

- Dog's adrenaline is elevated, only more harm can come to the dog and possibly others. Dog needs to be extracted from the situation ASAP.
 - They should share contact info, but the situation may be that it is better for the dog to be removed from the situation and put some place safe while the owner deals with the aftermath.
 - In some cases the dog needs to be removed from the situation to a calm and secure place. Exchanging info is necessary though
 - Libertarian
 - Dog and/or people will be in a heightened state of anxiety. Keeping the dog in that environment is not healthy or potentially safe.
 - only where bites are serious
 - It depends on the situation. If you have a hysterical third party and the situation could escalate both human/human violence or agitation of the animal could occur. Some people consider playful interactions an act of aggression, as many people do not understand full dog behaviour but are still passionate about their beliefs. Certainly if a serious incident occurred, an enforcement officer should attend to take statements.
 - These situations can be very traumatic and emotional for both the people and dogs involved. Staying on scene could also cause another incident especially if it was due to gear failing (leash, collar, harness, etc)
 - Remaining at the scene with a dog that bit is inadvisable. There's a reason the dog bit, e.g., fear, and getting the dog out of there quickly is important. I think the dog owner should quickly provide information to a nearby person then leave to a safe distance.
 - If the owner remained so would the dog and potentially could bite again. Would be better to have to share contact info (ie cell phone number to be tested & answered on the spot)
 - "Bites and attacks can be an extreme source of trauma and forcing the victim to stick around with the dog is troublesome. Keeping the owner there will ergo keep the Dog on scene
- Instead, have a hit and run type bylaw where info legally is required to be given (including drivers licence information, dog registration info, etc)"
 - The dog is obviously agitated & needs to be removed from a stressful situation, the owner is the only one who can move the dog to a place where there is no longer a danger
 - People panic. It is natural.
 - I would not support proposed rule.
 - Sometimes it makes much more sense to get the offending dog home and away from the stimulation.
 - "If they have provided contact info to the other person, it is best to remove dog immediately from the situation.

- I agree with a law that says contact info must be shared with those impacted"
 - Provide details but do not make them stay. Staying increases risk of interpersonal conflict and the dogs need to be removed from the situation asap
 - Leaving information and being available. But returning the animal home to avoid additional trauma is reasonable
 - "Removing the dog from the situation could be necessary to calm it down to avoid further issues. If the owner of the dog is there alone (and required to stay), the dog would be staying in the stressful situation that caused it to bite in the first place.
- Exchange information: yes.
 - Required to stay: no."
 - If a dog bites a person, yes. If a dog bites another dog, no.
 - Well because for whatever present situation, that dog was agitated enough to bite. The SAFEST thing is probably to isolate the dog from the situation IMMEDIATELY. Staying in a situation/set of circumstances with said animal after the incident seems reckless and foolish. Since that exact situation was already proven to be an adequate recipe for a disaster. After the altercation most likely emotions will be higher and odds things will continue to slide sideways... very high.
 - These events are traumatic and getting all dogs involved away from the scene is critical. Waiting around lends itself to additional problems.
 - If a cat or a dog bite...its because the animal is in distress and something has triggered the fight or flight response. Get the animal out of the stressful situation don't perpetuate the problem further.
 - This depends on the severity of the bite and whether the victim received / listened to the animal owner's warnings. Yes if the victim is severely injured, no if the victim got nipped while playing with a dog and the owner asked them not to.
 - The owner should leave contact info and remove the dog from the situation asap.
 - The situation has already escalated and to remain on scene does nothing to calm or decelerate the situation.
 - The animal is already under stress. Give your information and leave. You aren't required to wait at the scene for a fender bender as long as you give the other party your information
 - I think it should be an offense to leave the scene without exchanging information but remaining could be unsafe for the victim, the dog, the owner and could escalate situations. However, for legal and civil purposes, information should be exchanged.
 - Certain dogs bite because they were mishandled or cornered or scared. Not all dog bites are malicious and shouldn't be treated as such.
 - People over exaggerate all the time. The city is full of Karen's. PIT BULLS ARE NOT VICIOUS KAREN GO HOME.
 - Because people lie and officer give out tickets.

- That then requires said dog to stay on scene, which could cause more distress to all animals and people involved.
- Best to get the dog home and away from the area that can cause further stress
- I wouldn't want a dog that bit mine still around me and my dog for however long it took an officer to arrive. The people should exchange numbers and pass along to the officers
- "No, because we are all responsible for our 'children,' while you might disagree they're our children if my HUMAN child bite another HUMAN child I wouldn't have to stay there for to share information.
- Yes if it was severe enough for stitches/hospital visit."
- "It is important to note that while pit bulls are not involved in more bite incidents than other dog breeds, the reason they are listed here is because a pitbull's strength allows the potential for a more severe bite." This is completely false and who'm ever put forth these certifiably false claims on a government website should be let go. All I can say is, this had better be changed because it's 2020 and bigoted government wont be tolerated.
- I would support it if it had a stipulation about the owner being allowed to leave if they were unsafe in the situation. Ie: if the dog bit an attacker
- Could aggregate the animal further depending on the environment (dog park or similar stimulation)
- An owner should be required to provide contact information however there may be legitimate reasons for needing to leave the scene Dash for example obtaining veterinary treatment for an animal in the case of an altercation were multiple animals were responsible for bites
- How can you get this to happen when hit n runs with vehicles are so high still?
- Person should be required to share contact info (drivers license, phone number, etc) just like at the scene of a car accident. Owner should be required to call and report incident to bylaw via phone afterwards. This is because otherwise they'd be at the scene all day waiting for an enforcement officer to appear on scene.
- If an incident has occurred it is best to remove the dogs. Staying there could lead to further issues.
- Only if they are able to control their dog or remove it from the situation.
- Support exchange of contact information only.
- It really depends on the context. If its a violent attack, yes. But some dogs 'mouth' as a means of exploring the world
- That won't solve the problem or make people more accountable
- Normally i would say yes. And it should be mandatory to give contact info but if the dog is still aggressive or hurt, the owner should be able to at least take it away/put it in the house/put it in the car and come back.
- Sometimes bites happen in confrontations and the accused dog may also be hurt and require medical attention.
- "most attacks are from dashaunds and chihuahua animals..
- please use real science instead of whatever this is made from."
- If the person or other animal sustains a significant injury then yes, they should stay. Otherwise the owners should be able to work out next steps, such as exchanging information in case something develops later.

- It would likely be better for everyone involved if they took the offending dog home and spoke with an enforcement officer there.
- Unfortunately there is no way to enforce this since dogs don't have visible licence plates like cars do
- Likely better to de escalate an emotional situation
- "No. They're dogs, it happens sometimes. My dog gets nipped at in the park often and she puts the dog in their place and everyone moves on. So many people aren't easy going like me and are going to call the cops or bylaw everytime one of those dogs comes around and nips their dog.

- And DO NOT do that to all the sweet pitbulls out there. What about German shepherds, Huskies, shitzus, chihuahuas, labradors, doodles, malamutes, ALL the other breeds that I have personally witnessed being aggressive.

- There are so many pitbulls around this city that don't deserve this. And neither do their owners.

- I'm ashamed of this city right now."
- No because not every situation needs police assistance, and it will just tie up resources better used elsewhere.
- Bites need treatment, rule may require contact information to be shared but waiting while bitten seems silly.
- If both dogs are injured, delaying medical care and the ability to seek it would be detrimental to the health of an animal potentially
- Because people are hysterical morons about dog behaviour.
- The dog needs to be removed from the situation immediately.
- There may not be an officer immediately present to assess the scene, especially availability on weekends.
- People get very heated when incidents like this happen. We can't give a guide line like this because no incident happens the same and you don't want to risk anyone's safety. Please contact me to consult on this project. I'm a science based dog trainer. My name is [personal information removed] and you can contact me at [personal information removed]
- I believe many dogs on leash bite offleash dogs and this should be an offence by the owner of an offleash dog!
- They should be able to take the dog home/away.
- "It is possible the dog
- Was provoked - would be better for them not to remain at the site.
- This could be confrontational... better to part. Leave information with the person bitten. (swap info like a car accident)"

- I think it's best to remove the dog. However it should be necessary to provide owner information
 - This can be a horrible time, a rule holds any party at fault for leaving the scene when they should be seeking even minor medical attention for them selfs, others, or their pets. Would be a hindrance more than it helps.
 - I dont think it is reasonable for the owner with the dog involved to stay in the scene as it may not be safe
 - It may not be safe for the owner to stay at the scene with their dog, as it may further escalate the situation.
 - Contact information needs to be given to the appropriate authorities for later questioning. It is not necessary for the owner and dog to remain on scene.
 - Law enforcement response times are poor. Let people work out the problems. If a person flees to avoid accountability, encourage reporting. Requiring people to stay at the scene will not hold serious offenders responsible. They will still leave to avoid consequences and you will just tag another charge on them should you ever find them.
 - Exchange info but owner must be able to leave with the problem dog in order to deescalate the situation and not drag out an unsafe situation.
 - The dog is obviously stressed and needs to be removed from the situation
 - The person should be able to go (to get their dog out of there) but with the condition that their contact info be given for follow up from the By-law officer. I imagine if the dog attacked someone it would be difficult to keep the dog under control with the situation being very elevated.
 - only if safe to do so. Sometimes it is better to separate the dogs/owners I think information should be exchanged and officer can contact both parties.
 - How can this be done when the dog is at large and unattended? Otherwise, yes, vet Bill's apply.
 - it's not practical, the owner may be required to go to the vet/ hospital as well, depending on the nature of the incident
 - If the dog owner stays, chances are the dog stays. That would do nothing to de-escalate the situation and could lead to more problems. Humans are much less predictable and more aggressive than any animal.
 - The dog should be removed and isolated from a situation immediately.
 - they are responsible, but removing the animal from the stressful incident is most important.
 - Impossible to enforce
 - "Biting a person and biting another animal are 2 completely different scenarios that should not be in the same question at all.
- Biting a person - yes exchange information and be available to talk to an officer.
 - Biting another animal - totally dependant in the situation."

- While “dog bite” seems obvious, in reality when dogs play at a dog park there are occasionally nips and some owners over-react. Creating an enforcement process around vague “bites” seems onerous and serves to increase the reporting of non-incidents.
- I was recently involved with a dog bite incident where my friend was bitten quite severely by a foster dog we were meeting to photograph. I knew the foster parent and asked them to leave with the dog as I knew how to get in contact with them. I really think it needs to be a "situation" base.
- As a dog aggression expert, it is usually more important to get the dog out of the area first to prevent further incidents. This may require that the owner leaves the scene. There should be a way for the owner to self-report after the incident with no penalty.
- Often it’s the humans trying to break the fight up that causes damage to the dogs and it’s not always clear who is to blame. Sometimes it’s best for people to sort these issues out themselves rather than involving an officer.
- Similar to a car accident, everyone involved should share their information. But if an animal is hurt and in distress, that person needs to get their animal home immediately.
- yes and no, you would want to get the dogs in a safe environment for them to cool down. Obviously it should not be a hit and run scenario so there must be a way for them to contact or leave contact information before going to find a safer place.
- Isn’t it already required and they still dont.
- Separate the dogs
- Everyone will have a different definition of a "dog bite". Forcing someone to stick around or share contact information could create issues between the two parties, especially if someone considers a warning a "bite". I would focus more on canine communication at place where situations could arise (like an off leash park) so people remember that dogs are dogs and not all dogs are going to like each other, get along, want to play, etc. Teach owners the importance of knowing their dog, their limits and over all canine communication.
- Typical “Karen” people will exploit this
- I think they should be allowed to leave their contact information with the other person and be contacted later
- I think the information should be exchanged, ie, contact info, etc., or call 911 if severe injury but I think the offending dog should be removed from area which means owner takes it away not remain at scene and cause more stress to others
- If a bite has just occurred it would seem to me you would want to exit a potentially volatile situation for everyone’s well being. Could the dog owner and the enforcement officer not connect after?
- It could take hours for them to attend the scene
- If medical attention is needed for animals or humans it takes priority.
- Dog owner remaining at scene means the dog is also remaining at scene.
- Not black and white. If a dog bites another dog to protect himself from an attack, that should not be the same as a straight attack. Be very careful with how you word this bylaw. You may cause innocent dogs and their owners a huge amount of stress, grief, and you may cause a dog's unfair death. A big dog defending himself from a vicious small dog, does not deserve to get the blame. The small dogs are the worst, but are never controlled (by the owner or by bylaws)

- May be better for the situation to be diffused by everyone separating
- I think it should be no, if the bite is minor. Most of the time, dog bites happen because the dog is fear reactive. However, if the bite is more serious (only), then under certain circumstances it should be yes.
- I don't think so. It all depends on the situation.
- I think information can be collected anywhere and sometimes it would add heat to the moment if everyone was required to stay.
- While I would like to agree with this rule, it may not be safe to keep a dog that has just been involved in an incident such as a severe bite at the scene without the situation escalating and becoming more dangerous. However, I believe that owners should be legally required to exchange information, and if there is a refusal to do so then they must stay put (or somewhere safer nearby) until bylaw arrives.
- There is no way COC could manage the volume.
- Exchange info yes, wait for an enforcement officer no—that could be all day
- Who determines "if necessary". Dogs will tussle once in awhile and end up with a scratch. That can have an owner upset (and, boy, can that escalate). People without medical training of any sort will often think a scratch is severe because they dig through the fur and find a spot or blood or their "pride" is hurt when little Fluffy was the problem and got put in its place. Requiring staying for by-laws will be used unnecessarily.
- Yes, but oftentimes the victim of a bite needs to leave immediately to receive medical attention, or the owner of the offending dog needs to get to an area where the dog can safely be contained. It's not cut and dry.
- They should share the correct contact information with the victim.
- I believe the person should be required to provide contact information to the injured party and when possible to remain at the scene. If it is necessary to leave the scene to remove the animal from the location (for the safety of the individuals and the animal) then I think it should be ok for them to do that once contact information is provided. (As an example, I would not support having to place an animal inside a vehicle in the summer just to ensure you remained on scene until an enforcement officer arrived.)
- Too dangerous.
- remain at scene or provide contact information for later discussion. Cooler heads might be required, and people have commitments
- Sometimes the best thing to do in these situation is to separate the dogs, so this isn't always practical. In an ideal world owners would exchange contact details and connect after with each other and if necessary enforcement officers without their dogs.
- I fully support contact being mandatory after such an incident, but staying at the scene can be too difficult. I know this makes it harder to enforce, but I feel being able to meet with an enforcement officer after the situation has calmed down would also make for a more productive engagement.

- There could be extenuating circumstances around the bite that would make keeping the dog at the scene more dangerous than removing the dog entirely.
- These are high stress, emotional situations that can be made safer by allowing people the freedom to leave
- I think that removing the dog from the scene so that no further injury happens is a good idea. Hanging around with a stressed dog and person that is injured can be a nasty scene. If possible yes stay.. but if creates more trouble then no. Need to make it mandatory that the person provide contact info and picture taken if possible.
- I find that little dogs are more aggressive and bite than larger ones, but owners do not take it as seriously because they are small. This seems like a great way to ensure a conflict between owner and victim, no matter the size of the dog. Who is supposed to ensure a person remains at the scene?
- Severe bites: yes. Nips or barely draws blood: no.
- If the dog is nuts, staying at the scene would be dangerous. I suggest ppl give their gov ID to the victim to take a photo of or record along with phone number and email.
- There should be allowance for contact info to be shared by phone, since waiting for bylaw can take a long time and might interfere with other necessary events.
- This idea supports the expanded role for bylaw officers so in theory YES but the practicalities would need to be thought through to be to implementable and effective. It is more important for the person or animal bitten to seek medical help immediately.
- A person agree to the liabilities and risks when attending a dog park. Dog flights are most often a he said she said account of the incident and there is no need for a person to provide their contact information.
- "If the dog is over threshold or extremely agitated. Keeping them on the scene makes things worse (science has shown us this).
- Owners should exchange information and parties should be separated."
- Removing the dog from that environment is critical. It's obviously in a stressful environment and could hurt others
- The owner may need to secure the dog, get medical or veterinary treatment. The owner should have to leave contact information if they have to leave.
- I think it should be required that they provide contact information, however in an incident where a dog bites a person or an animal, it is often a high tension situation. Remaining in the situation with either dog (the biter or the bitee) is extremely stressed/ reactive because of the situation could lead to more issues, and be a dangerous situation for all involved. Sometimes the responsible/ safe choice is to remove a dog from a situation and you shouldn't be punished for that as long as you have done due diligence to reach out to animal control or provided your info to the other party.
- To much of an honour system
- "Weather extremes. If enacted bylaw services should be liable for injury to the animal if they were unable to attend the scene in an appropriate time. What response time is acceptable for +30c or - 30c with strong windchill, or a thunderstorm or tornado warning in effect.

- Then consider the situation where two dogs have attacked each other, is it really sensible to keep those dogs in the same space."
- This is a "no but" no. No, because it is unenforceable, and impractical to wait for a bylaw officer. However, sharing information should be required.
- "I say no, only because there will be times when the safest thing to do is to remove the dog from this situation. The owner may have to walk their dog back home and away from the scene to calm the dog and prevent further reactions.

- Not every situation is going to be black and white. Many dogs that bite are doing so out of fear. Keeping them in that moment does more damage to the dogs mental stability and cause the dog to react further.

- Isolate the danger then return to the scene or contact bylaw. That should be the rule."
- Information should be exchanged (along with any potential witnesses.) Photo's etc should be take as evidence.
- I think it's about being able to followup or contact the owner about the incident - if a pet has been involved in an incident it may NOT be wise to keep them at the scene
- If a dog defends its owner in a dangerous situation or altercation, they should not be subjected to the same rules as a dog who randomly attacks without provocation.
- People can sort this out, this about responsible guardianship.
- We don't have a problem with dog bites. We don't need more restrictive laws about dogs.
- As long as valid personnel information is provided they shouldn't have to remain on scene.
- I have seen people bitten at off leash parks because they have kicked or abused another person's dog. These confrontations are tense and emotional, people should not be forced to continue to engage when the situation is heightened and unsafe
- Enforcement officers are out of control many times - they do not use common sense and are full of their authority and power - their egos are so fragile that they cannot handle pushback without going on a major offensive and exercising their authority in an over the top way.
- I support this, but think an "incident" should be defined - if dogs are playing and one nips, or play gets a bit rough, I don't think an owner should have to stick around for who knows how long before an officer arrives. Maybe even some requirement that the owners call a number to provide their contact information would be better.
- Because 'another animal' would include things like birds, squirrels, and other small animals the city kills en masse anyways.

- This can increase anxiety in the dog and owner - it can be very difficult on the dog to remain in this situation, although I'm not sure what the alternative is - maybe just exchange information as easily as possible and quick follow-up at a different site/home by enforcement officers.
- I feel this is too vague. What if a dog bites a wild animal? Or a dog bites a cat that's running at large? Most responsible pet owners will use their judgement based on the situation. Remaining at the scene could amplify the situation. There should be options for people - ex. go home and phone in an encounter etc
- Perhaps the dog was triggered by its surroundings and circumstances, you could be stressing that animal out further by forcing it to stay in said situation with its owner, which could possibly lead to a preventable incident.
- The individual should share contact information with the affected persons. Remaining at the scene could be problematic for the animal
- They could provide identification to the other owner & remove their dog from the park (avoid other incidents/ dog in hot/ cold weather or car)
- Dog might need to get out of the situation; human/other animal bitten may be in need of immediate medical attention
- While responsible ownership should make this a good idea, keeping the aggressor at the scene isn't necessarily wise.
- I don't agree with having to talk to an enforcement officer but I do agree with having to share info
- There need to be a consideration to get the animal to a place where they are not in heightened aggression mode. Keeping them in a situation where they have already attacked seem like it would be inviting further violence
- The dog should be taken away from the area to prevent further stress or harm
- If there dog has bitten a person I think remaining might cause some stress or chaos... they can get the info of the offender and deal with them at their residence.
- Its common sense that one does this.
- There absolutely needs to be contact information for the owner. However, if the dog has already been involved in a biting incident, keeping the dog at the scene may only escalate the issue. Follow up is essential but so is ensuring everyone involved is safe first.
- I don't want people trapped by strangers
- Response times for bylaw is brutal.
- Some situations require separation to de-escalate it. Provided the individuals contact the authorities to deal with the situation
- I believe that contact information should be explained, however the dog should be removed from the location, as you want to prevent the situation or the animal to escalate again.
- Because photographs and other testimonies and even videos can be taken on location. So long as that is done it isn't necessary to wait.
- If an animal is in an aggressive state you should remove the animal from the situation to prevent further contact with animals until they can relax
- If it can be resolved between the person's involved it will save time and resources.

- Sometimes dogs fight, it's a natural instinct. Doesn't mean they always come out hurt. If a human is attacked, wait for authorities and make sure you consider what happened for the dog to attack, and also consider the age of the animal. Is it blind or deaf and didn't know what was coming it's way etc.
- is NOT a NAZI state YET.
- Most situations can be handled privately
- Obviously the animal is distressed for whatever reason. Keeping the animal there longer would likely result in more stress on the animal. I think a phone number would suffice.
- My problem with this is that there is more to it than just the biting. If the bite clearly causes an injury, e.g. blood, bruising, than they should be required
- The dog owner may have to leave an escalated situation to safely contain their dog.
- Is the one that was bitten going to remain at the scene of the incident or will they go and get medical attention? Trade your information and go about your business, the bylaw officer can locate them at their residence.
- Not if the dog or person is injured and needs medical attention
- I have a large breed dog and have done extensive training with her due to her size. Often we run into people with small dogs that have received zero training. She has gotten prey drive before based on being given an aggressive social cue by a small dog that was not socialized Or trained properly which ended in her pinning/ nipping the smaller dog. Many dog owners don't recognize this as their untrained small dogs issue and the big dog always gets blamed. If anything there should be more fully fenced dog parks with a big dog/ little dog section (like the one in Whitefish, Montana).
- Contact information should be shared, but better trained officials should be called. For example, medical professionals for both humans and dogs if necessary
- I think the focus should be primarily on removing the aggressive dog from the situation, as keeping it there would heighten the anxiety in the dog and may cause it to attack again. Also, the victims may need urgent medical care. However I do agree that there needs to be some way of getting the owner's information to hold them accountable
- The dog may be somewhere it could cause more harm if it had to remain in the area with its owner.
- I don't think this is a bad idea per se except that it seems to take awhile for bylaw to arrive at times. Especially if its a minor incident I don't think its fair to force people to wait long periods of time for bylaw.... however they should be forced to provide all necessary information before leaving.
- Sometimes if a situation has escalated it isn't safe for anyone to remain in place.
- Collect contact info rather than stating at the scene.
- The person's own dog might need medical attention. Plus an environment that caused injury will probably escalate if iwner (and dog most likely) needs to remain on scene
- Responsible people can use their problem solving skills and come to an agreement. Keeping the bite victims in the same vicinity as the dog that bit will cause stress on the people and the animal.
- "That person should remove the dog from the situation and take it elsewhere for safety.
- Also, the victimized dog and its owner should immediately seek treatment."
- The owner should only remain if the animal is a known nuisance or has cause harm to person or persons property. The culpability is on the owner not the animal.

- I only believe this should be answered as a yes if there is blatant evidence that the damage done by said bite was severe. Puppies nibble on things they shouldn't, are you saying that a puppy who might accidentally bite another animal at the park should be forced to undergo what could be a traumatizing situation?
- This leaves too much room for someone to claim and exaggerate a bite or attack that was merely a nip or didn't happen at all. Many people do not know or listen to dog owners for proper introduction etiquette and having this rule could put many undeserving dogs at risk, in all breeds. If a bite results in serious injury where medical attention is needed, it should be called on spot and in which case it would make sense to have a rule the dog owner must stay on scene then.
- That pup needs to be taken out of the situation and to some where he/she feels safe. The situation can be dealt with from home.
- As someone who has been bit by a dog at a city dog park, there are times when accidents occur due to human negligence. I fear that this requirement will increase tensions and aggression between people and dogs. Also, as a pet owner, my dog growls and plays rough, dogs bite each other in play. I have more of a problem with off leash dogs running up to mine on paths than anything else. If my dog grows and bites a dog that run up to me, after communicating that my dog is on leash and needs distance, that is the other owners fault entirely.
- Owner should leave contact info then get the dog home so there isn't another incident
- not if it is unsafe for them or the animal to do so in the example of mob me tailing and taking the "law" into one's hands
- To share info yes but not remain at the scene as it might be more stressful for both dogs and people
- The owner is like to be anxious, frantic and/or scared. This is felt by their dog also which may escalate the situation. The dog can continue to act out of nature if kept in an uncomfortable atmosphere. One needs to remove themselves and dog from the situation before it can be analyzed effectively. Name and number quickly exchanged agreed.
- They should, but this is not necessarily safe for the dog, other dogs, or people.
- Just because its a rule doesnt mean it will be followed. How would it be enforced?
- As you would want the dogs to be far away. But people should be required to share there info.
- Personal/contact information should be shared, but injured/agitated animals should be transported to vet/safe environment
- I'm not sure... maybe?
- What is "necessary". Who decides? Based on if skin is broken, situation leading up to it?
- I don't want my dog taken away
- It's not necessary to bring law enforcement to a situation like this. In some cases, maybe. But I would rather see qualified individuals, not police officers.
- An owner should provide personal information but needs to get the dog out of the situation as soon as possible. Waiting for an officer can increase stress for animal.
- Accidents happen. Sometimes a small, excited dog, like a Yorkshire Terrier or Shiba Inu may escape from someone's house and playfully nip at someone. This is an accident and nobody really gets hurt. Neither the dog owner nor the dog should get into trouble. People need to be understanding and know that there is a difference between a dangerous dog attack vs a minor play/nipping incident. People need to be reasonable and fair. No dog should be unjustly in trouble or euthanized or fined for a minor accident where nobody was truly hurt. People have the right to settle/forgive situations on their own that are harmless. People should not be forced to press charges. Accidents happen. People need to have the option of working things out by themselves.

- Go [removed] yourself [removed]
- It can't be enforced
- If someones dog bites me it's between me and them. It has nothing to do with a cop or the city.
- If my dog bit someone, I know have to remain there with both my dog and the person my dog bit. This is asking for a disaster. What happens if it's +20 celsius out, or -20 outside, and by the time the officer gets to site it's now 30 +degrees outside. Sorry I wont be sticking around.
- The situation would most likely escalate and it would not be a good idea to have the parties involved try to work it out and not have a neutral party involved.
- the owners should be able to come to an agreement. Law enforcement officers are unnecessary unless you have an uncooperative person.
- No if a dog bites a stranger it means you royally pissed it off so you can kick rocks let the dog be a dog
- No- Dogs bite and play rough all the time. Especially for young puppies who are NOT NEUTERED, lots of adult dogs will snap or bite to tell it off. Thats how dogs work...
- Stop German Shephards.
- At the very least an exchange of information to pay vet bills etc
- If it's a minor incident then no. If it's a major one then yes.
- Pit bulls are not the problem!!!!
- If a dog is aggravated or aggressive, it seems stupid to keep them there as something more could happen
- There are too many scenarios in which there is room for interpretation on what happened and assumes the the animal is in the wrong
- If the bite draws blood, my answer is yes. If it doesn't not draw blood or puncture, I believe it's under the discretion of the people/owners involved.
- This is common decency. A person that wouldn't stay won't be inclined to because a 'rule' is made by the City.
- Responsible dog owners do stay and work with the victim
- response time is prohibitively slow for this kind of rule. Sharing contact information, vet information, etc with the impacted parties is sufficient. No one should be standing around waiting for hours when their own animal may also be injured. (Consider a fight between two dogs. with this rule, both parties would need to wait for an officer. Bylaw can take HOURS to respond to requests. This would be hours in the heat, cold, etc waiting for bylaw.)
- Yes, and no! I think for safety reasons, it might be best that the suspect leave however, they NEED to contact Bylaw ASAP! I suppose you could say they need to stay on scene but, in their vehicle or in a safe place and not causing more issues for the victim.

- Owner's should be responsible for disciplining their animal. I.e. proper training
- I agree with the sentiment, but in practice, if a dog just attacked someone, that dog should probably be removed from the situation before it does any more harm.
- If there is a conflict, the last thing you want to do is have the involved parties stay in the heat of the incident. The parties should exchange info and handle the matter as adults.
- The dog needs to be removed from the situation quickly. I think it's important to let them know where you live and to meet up without the animal to discuss. Or put the dog in a vehicle to allow communication without further stress to the victim
- I've been bitten by a dog before but I don't see how police or enforcement officers have anything to do with it and aren't necessary.
- People have brains, freedom involves disputes without a governing party that feels authority should be inserted into any dispute. Let the people decide on a per case basis. Severance Or fines should not have a place in these disputes. Mistakes happen when you try to live a free life
- Involving bylaw enforcement officers in dog bite incidents introduces the possibility of unnecessary escalation, disproportionate force against minorities, unfair treatment of dogs owned by minorities, etc.
- Takes to long..
- I feel that this is too generalized an approach and does not take into context the severity of bits or when to talk to an enforcement officer.
- A 'bite' is not always an obvious thing and can be very subjective...what if a dog playfully without force 'mouths' a child in an off leash park....and open to abuse by the "self righteous", "we will police you" crowd. We see this already with the 'you can't leave the dog in a car" tonthe point where I won't leave my dog even on a sunny winters day...and yes I have been accosted by someone in that exact circumstance...
- Enforcmnt is usually biased, unfair treatment.
- This should be determined by severity of bite or wound
- It may be imperative to take the dog away from the situation to avoid further escalation, thereby putting a person into contravention without intention. Contact information is a must, however staying at the scene may not be possible.
- I don't think they need to stay there if they've already exchanged contact info.
- I would like to say yes, but there has to be enough flexibility to account for extenuating circumstances
- It is a personal situation, law informers should not be involved
- Way too many variables. It is time consuming for law enforcement agencies and it doesn't solve symptoms of the problems
- If there is an incident where the animal was stressed out enough or felt they needed to react in this way, it is irresponsible to require the animal and/or person to be forced to stay in that environment without being able to leave.
- information can be exchanged without waiting for enforcement officers to arrive. If the incident is severe enough then the officers should be required to be on scene immigration/ASAP.

- Like any animal bite go and get checked out and if the dog is feral then look into the case and blame the owner not the dog
- There is too much fear of losing a pet. The system is so flawed. Accidents happen. I have had my dog bit by a German Shepherd. Dogs get jealous and accidents happen. Had I reported that incident there is a chance my friend would have lost her German Shepherd.
- In an ideal world staying at the scene would be perfect, but if the animal is in a high state forcing the owner and most likely the "nuisance" animal is unsafe to all parties involved. Get the animal to a safe place first to reduce the hazard.
- We don't need more laws/bylaws. Period!
- The owner of the dog should have all responsibility to report to an appropriate location with details themselves as keeping the dog in an area it has already proved nuisance may encourage other attacks while waiting.
- As long as contact information is available the dog should not have to remain at the scene as it may cause more issues.
- Owners are fully capable of getting contact information on their own. Make it bylaw that you must show identification to other dog owners in case of accidents and they should also be responsible for filing reports about incidents.
- Contact info should be exchanged between parties. Requiring a dog/owner to remain on scene can escalate the situation.
- Seems difficult to enforce. Especially in an off-leash park. Different owners will have differing opinions about what actually happened.
- If the dog is violent it's likely the owner is as well. And how does one person actually have the authority to make another stay? Wouldn't that be considered unlawful confinement? It's not a motor vehicle accident. People should be trusted to figure this one out.
- That could take a long time. I think the owner of the offending dog should have to provide their information and/or contact the enforcement agent later or immediately by phone. Pictures can be taken as evidence, but sometimes medical care needs are immediate.
- The majority of time (in the off-leash areas) small dogs running around are aggravating other dogs and owners. When told to call off these small dogs, the owners are not able to get their dog to respond. If those dogs get bitten I don't think the owner of the other dog needs to remain at the scene. Therefore I would not support this rule.
- Oftentimes that person needs to leave with the animals to deescalate the situation. That being said, they should self-report right away. And if they don't and they are found out (never underestimate social media community groups) they can be charged.
- If you have exchanged information, you could scale it down so cops aren't racing down streets to get there, or they can go to the police station if needed
- What happens if your dog bites someone attacking you!
- If the bite was caused to a stranger getting too close by no means should the dog owner need to be there

- As long as the Owners contact information has been provided, there's no need to stay at the scene. Best to get the dog away from the area that induced enough stress to bite
- I believe that the owner must provide contact information and proof of identity but should not have to wait for an enforcement officer especially if both dogs or the person and dog have to stay at the scene as this could be dangerous for the owner of the dog that attacked because emotions would be high.
- Some people over react to a some dog disagreements. What one person may deem a bite could just be playing hard and this is a way to criminalize the owner.
- Information should be exchanged, but animal should be taken away from scene
- How would you know that they didn't stay at the scene? This could be a he said she said situation where by-law is taking the side of the person stating that their dog was attacked by a bigger dog when the truth could be a smaller dog attacking or biting a larger dog. I've personally experienced this scenario.
- Clearly information must be shared but the animal should be removed from the area as soon as possible to prevent an escalating situation. Dogs pick up on their owners emotions and a reasonable owner would be upset that their dog was involved in this type of situation, therefore causing the dog to be increasingly so. Exchange info and have the dog leave ASAP. Owner can return in a reasonable amount of time. I can't imagine that an enforcement officer would be there any time super quick.
- Enforcement officers do not need to be involved in these sort of situations.
- Remaining at the scene of incident to give you information implied that there is some fault on behalf of the owner and the dog. This is not always the case therefore I cannot support this.
- Dogs, however well trained are still wild animals. All dog owners should understand that potential (though differently if frequent and encouraged by owner) bites as part and parcel of animal ownership. Dogs are sensitive creatures and are not inherently evil or aggressive. Circumstance, fear and owner engagement shape dogs into aggressors. I think owners, not dogs, should be penalized for incidents.
- It could take too long for the officer to arrive. If under half an hour response maybe but the victim should be taken care of rather than waiting for someone. Instead information should be shared like at a small car accident so that the owners can then talk to the officer that day.
- Tired of the City trying to enforce common sense and the ever increasing nanny state surrounding us.
- Details of owners should be there exchanged
- Exchange info with the other party and work out the vet bills between yourselves
- Owner and dog should leave contact info, but it seems unsafe to stay at a potentially volatile scene.
- My dog is a staffordshire terrier. He has never bit anyone or any living thing in his life. He does better off leash than on leash in any place. He's PETRIFIED of men. If he were to ever bite someone, it'll either be out of protecting me or himself from someone trying to hurt us. I would never stay on site to accommodate the person who tried to attack me or my dog.

- I feel they should exchange information, but the situation would get worse if the dog can't be removed to a safe location. In those cases, the owner needs to get the dog somewhere safe so no further damage can be done
- Incidents like these are extremely traumatizing for everyone involved, but also the animal. To have to stand there and wait for an extended period of time may not help with all that.
- Most of the times my dog has been attacked it's been by a dog that's running around the owners property unleashed.
- The animal should be kindly removed from the situation.
- The owner should be able to remove the dog from scene and return to prevent further incident.
- If a little dog attacks a big dog and the big dog defends itself. The owner of the big dog is already at a disadvantage due to the prejudices against the big dog. No sense sticking around for a biased, possibly trigger happy, enforcement officer to come around. If you have an animal, you should be an adult about it and two adults should be able to sort a situation out without big brother getting involved.
- This does not happen with responsible dog owners.
- as long as the owner and victim can resolve it there should be no reason to stay at the scene, if the owner is being non compliant and thinking it's no big deal, they should face fines.
- just don't make this yet another thing under the police umbrella. When redistributing police funding, make sure it goes to the appropriate organization that deals with this. I only say no because there's situations that could become worse by staying. I do feel people need to be responsible and stay when it makes sense to and is possible to, but you can't penalize people for acting in a way to protect others.
- People have lives, can't wait for officer. Police have more important duties
- The person with the dog that has bitten may just be trying to get their dog out of the situation
- In the circumstance of a dog bite the public and authorities will always rule on behalf of the 'victim' as history has determined. If my dog were to have bitten someone I know it would be out of poor judgment or care of the 'victim' so I would not stay to be questioned and accused and based on how others answer the [removed] questions higher up potentially euthanized, I would leave and deny to protect my baby. So no. I do not trust your system based on what you are trying to do to bully breeds.
- It is a highly charged situation that may increase anxiety and stress in people and animals that will make the situation much worse. While I agree that the situation needs to be dealt with, there has to be a safe way to de-escalate.
- dogs have a natural heirarchy. they are not to be punished nor their owners. this is completely ridiculous
- absolutely not ! DISAGREE
- When an incident like this occurs there is going to be a lot of fear and panic from every party involved (including the animals). People should have the option to retreat to safety rather than a legal obligation to stay in a "hot-zone".

- this is an open concept. The owner never knows how long they have to wait or if officers were called. Too many unknowns.
- Little dog nips are common, large dog attacks are uncommon. To require all dog bites, regardless of their severity is extremely restrictive, not necessary and a waste of resources.
- Contact information should be shared but the dog should be removed asap from the situation to calm down. Situation may escalate if dog is in a high stress situation.
- When a human being is in an accident that requires EMS does that individual wait at the scene to talk to an enforcement officer? Or do we remove the victim to EMS to ensure that the individual is on way to recovery? If an animal or person is injured in anyway that could lead to either option to bleed out/fatality THEY should be taken to a hospital/vet for medical assistance instantly.
- I don't see why law enforcement needs to step in. Person to person conversation on what to do is enough.
- If a dog will have aggressive behavior and will attack a person or another animal unprovoked... I completely agree, but if a dog will bite to protect itself or accidentally, I completely disagree. Not all pets have obedience training and most are extremely spoiled.
- at least give information to the other person so that things can be discussed at a later date. It may be more harmful for the animals involved to stay in the area when tensions will surely be high after an incident.
- Yes and no depending on the situation. If two dogs had a fight it makes sense to get them away from each other as soon as possible. Little dogs are provocative too, larger dog is still just an animal with instinct to protect themselves and owner from any threat. It happened several times that when I had my pitbull leashed in the dog park we would get approached by unleashed small breed dogs and they would bark and growl at us continuously and owners wouldn't do a thing to stop them. Both parties must take responsibility for their dogs behavior. Not just a dog that reacted to aggression with biting. If a leashed dog was provoked to bite by an unleashed dog no matter the size, owner shouldn't be punished with fines or lose his dog.
- bites can range from severe to minor. This is too broad
- yes contact information should be shared however the dog/cat owner should remove the animal at once because emotions are heightened in the people which can add to an already stressed animal
- I believe that that person should be able to leave with their dog, to get that dog away from the situation. However, once the dog is back in a safe space (ie vehicle), then they should have to stay to share contact information with the victim.
- In some cases it may be safer for the dog owner to provide his/her contact information and leave the scene.
- unlikely that an enforcement officer can get there in a reasonable time. also need to define a dog bite. a nip in play is much different than an aggressive action. you need to define your terminology
- As responsible owners you should be able to handle the matter individually in a respectful manner.
- It may be safer to remove the dog from the situation first, (take it home, place it in a vehicle,) before returning with information.

- Because staying at scene could increase trauma. But information should be shared and reported to authorities within 24 hrs.
- "Very difficult to enforce, your stats dont justify this - focus on your licensing and your officers investigation skills
- Why would you put a subject dog owner and victim owner in this predicament - where things are likely to escalate."
- In the event of a dog bite, I think it makes sense to remove the dog from the scene as quickly as possible. The owner can provide contact information, but to reduce tension they can leave the scene.
- Often dog bites are the result of the dog protecting itself or it's owner. Forcing the owner to remain on scene forces the dog to remain on scene and may colour the bylaw officers opinion of the issue as the dog is already full of tension and adrenaline.
- There are far too many nuanced circumstances. I have seen cases where a person reaches down to pet dogs that are mingling and get a nick on their hand from a tooth. No one is upset, it happens. Technically, what is a bite? And why is biting the only form of injury being explored here? Dogs have knocked people over, legs get tangled leashes, etc. All kinds of injuries can happen. People need to take some personal responsibility when walking in parks, in areas where there are other people and animals around. If an injury occurs, my first instinct would be to separate the dogs. Rarely is one dog solely responsible for injuring - dog behaviour is complex.
- How will that calm the situation, please stay there with your dog does not make sense.
- Leave this up to personal responsibility.
- Sometimes in cases of "attacks" it's better to remove the dog from the situation so it can get out of the headspace that it's in. Many cases of fearful or previously abused dogs who lash out on a trigger that the owner may be training out; will benefit more from being able to go to a safe place.
- it would depend on the severity of the bite. at a minimum the dog owner should be required to share contact information with the person or owner of the animal the received the bite
- I believe it would be more appropriate to separate the dog from the scene of the incident as fast as possible. Perhaps a rule requiring the dog owner to leave contact info would be an alternative?
- The dog may be agitated and most people who have been bit would be as well
- Need to cut costs of program and less enforcement officers are needed.
- too many variables. officers do not work 24/7 and may be, even during working hours, not able to attend in a timely fashion. too difficult to enforce.
- the dog may be im distress
- Often, the majority of dog bites are not serious. If a person is bitten, then contact information and vaccine status should be shared, this also applies for serious dog bites involving another animal. Smaller incidents should be sorted out between the owners.
- This rule implies guilt on the part of the dog and/or owner, so its ridiculous to require that. It also sounds like you're trying to create new opportunities/ways to fibe people. Quit trying to impose rules on citizens and leave us be.

- The dog is most likely unsure of the issue. They are innocent animals and the owner should be persecuted. The dog could be being abused by the owner. We need to protect all animals
- How do you enforce the infraction? Raise the infraction into a misdemeanor or outright charge the individual with fleeing a crime scene. So that what you crowd the already overcrowded court system? You change a bylaw into a police matter? Sounds like inventive busy work, would not solve any currently existing problems. A more sound idea would be to use bylaw officers to check up on households that are reported to have problematic pets and offer courses that the owner can be enrolled in.
- Both the dog that attacked and was attacked need to leave the situation. Information must be exchanged to properly deal with damages but it is not always realistic to stay at the scene of the incident until law enforcement arrives. (For example if a dog is still acting aggressive/fearful or needs medical attention)
- Yes for contact info, too long to wait for an enforcement officer
- the best thing you can do when a dog is stressed enough to bite is get it out of there. Making them stay WILL make the situation worse. Let's use our brains here
- I agree with sharing contact information, on the off chance the person/animal bitten needs stitches or any other medical attention. But I do not agree with needing to talk to an enforcement officer who will likely escalate the situation more than necessary.
- This is for the protection of all parties involved. Specific scenarios could have taken place to encourage an altercation and statements should be mandatory from both sides via enforcement officers contact of both owners.
- The dog needs to be removed from this situation immediately for everyone safety, including the dog's.
- Information can be exchanged after parties disembark. Most important is getting care to the animal or person
- If a dog did bite another animal or person I presume that person and animal would be taken straight to the appropriate hospitals. What would the point be for the owner of the dog to stay. By law should be in place that contact information is shared immediately just like car accidents.
- Yes if it bites a person, no if it bites another dog unless that dog becomes severely injured. I often find at the dog park that dogs will give a "warning snap" to other dogs who are overbearing or playing too aggressively. Defensive biting is just that, defensive, and the owner shouldn't have to stick around waiting for by-law to explain that their dog was defending themselves
- The offending dog may have sustained injuries.
- current system is sufficient, we don't need more regulation
- The owners side of the story needs to be explained, but what if the dog is protecting the owner from an attacker? Why would you stay near the attacker? That would be my only stipulation.
- if a dog has just bit someone, the first priority should be removing the offending dog and the victim of the bite. This sort of thing makes sense after a car crash, but an aggressive dog is less likely to wait patiently for a bylaw officer or exchange of information

- Severity, causes and variables leading to a bite vary. A large majority of small bite incidents can be settled between involved parties with out the involvement of officials who may have not actually been witness or in attendance to the incident. Bites happen for a variety of reasons and it's not always the animals fault. Any animal can be pushed to the point of reacting or defending its self
- It may not be safe to keep the animal in that area, so I dont think they should have to remain but should provide their information. Honestly resposible owners would stay regardless.
- At the desecration of the person/animal involved. Similar to a fender bender, if its just a minor nip or something, exchange information and move on. If there is blood, gash, etc,. call a officer
- This would further agitate the animal, being forced to stay at the scene. Especially if it's at a dog park and there's so much chaos. Exchange contact info, yes of course, but it shouldn't be required to remain there. Take photos. Take a video. We all have a camera in our pocket.
- Leaving the scene may be the best was to de-escalate a volatile situation. As long as as both parties exchange contract info they should be able to leave the scene.
- If the dog is worked up and stressed out keeping it in that situation could escalate the problem. Information should be shared and the dog should be brought to a safe space where it can calm down and realize its mistake.
- It may not be required at all times. If it's a serious injury or a repeat offence then yes.
- Yes and No. If there is serious injury, then absolutely. If someone runs up to a dog and sticks their hands in a dog's face, and the dog nips their hand, then that's a learning opportunity for that person. I have older dogs that are less and less inclined to be manhandled and get scared easily as their eyesight deteriorates. I have to be vigilant as an owner and more protective of how they are approached. They are great dogs; but if you surprise and scare them, they can nip - though never aggressively and never drawing blood. Where is the line on dog bites/nips?
- I think the owners can talk through it just fine.
- Contact information can be shared if necessary, but it is better for the dog (s) involved to leave to scene to calm down and prevent further incidents.
- "Rules are not always the answer and shouldn't always be the go to.
- unfortunately in cases like this, the problem is often false accusation that we need to be concerned with, a rule will give individuals who like to cry wolf over every little thing even more power.
- Lets face it, if something truly happens responsible people will try to help and stay and talk things out as expected, a rule won't change that, and those who are unethical won't stay regardless of a rule.
- Rules don't change things, fostering respect and engaging people to make change changes things..."
- Information should be exchanged. It is in the best interest to remove both animals from the scene right away.
- Animals run on instinct you can't punish an animal for acting as they should
- Because most bites are a redirection of fear and anxiety. Most of the time animals snap at the air and we get caught in the middle. Unless it's life threatening the dog and owner should be able to go about on their way

- Removal of the dog should be priority. People can return to the incident after taking the dog home. Or leave a phone number.
- I think it is best that the owner leaves as they would likely need to remove their dog from the situation to keep everyone safe.
- If it is not serious then it should be left alone
- This rule could easily be abused by people who want to harass dog owners, with little accountability on the plaintiff's end.
- Making bylaws against a certain type of dog is the same as making bylaws against a Person of colour. Just because they're born a pitty, does NOT mean they'll injure more than a golden retriever. The dog isn't in control of what breed it's born as. It's bad owners, not bad dogs. Shame on you Calgary. It's things like this that make me disappointed in living here. I should not have to vote on why it's horrible to pin all bad things on one breed of dog. What are we, Quebec??
- This squarely blames the owner of said dog that bites. Often dogs have to defend themselves with unruly other animals that may bark or be physically intimidating to other animals, because owners don't take care of their own dog or don't know how to manage their own animals.
- I think if that occurs one must do what it can to calm an animal. When it's upset, the owner is upset as well as the person that was involved then the animal can't regulate.
- Getting the law involved in a situation that has zero reason for being there seems like a waste of time and taxpayer money.
- Dogs often attack at a moment of danger and look for the safety of themselves and their owners. Choosing to euthanize or punish a dog purely on their breed instead of looking at the owner and how they trained the dog is wrong! A breed doesn't define how every dog acts smh
- Too many variables. Hostile third party, emergency situations, timing of bylaw.
- It's not always the dog's fault in these incidents. While if it is, I think the owner should stay and be responsible, if it's defensive I think that both parties need to be present/contacted.
- Dogs are animals. Sometimes unfortunate things happen.
- If the dog is aggressive, the owner has to do their best to get the dog out of the situation before they hurt anyone else and to calm the dog down. However, after the dog is secured, I think the owner should have to reach out (maybe through some type of hotline) to talk to an enforcement officer and/or the victim and sort out what needs to be sorted.
- People's interpretation of a bite or reactive dog can vary. I see this fuelling a lot of unnecessary calls to bylaw. If someone doesn't give another person their contact info, they should take pictures of the person, dog and location of the incident and report it to bylaw.
- There would need to be a more clearly defined line for what constitutes a serious enough bite before I would support this rule.
- Dogs don't react without being stimulated. If a dog bites someone it's because they saw it as a threat to themselves or their owner. The person being bitten is usually the cause for getting too close/personal. Therefore the dog owner shouldn't have to stay put for enforcement officers to arrive.

- A lot of times it is just dogs being dogs and people blow things out of proportion. Cases need be dealt with singularly and bylaw needs to be doing better checks for unlicensed dogs. This way dogs can be better pinpointed and the owner dealt with. It's not dogs or breeds, it's bad owners. Dogs licenses should be attached to car licenses so that information can go hand in hand for better reporting of problem owner/dogs.
- Information should be shared with both parties and dogs returned home in secure environment
- "Rule should be that owner must provide their info to the victim OR choose to wait at scene to provide their info to enforcement officer.
- If forced to wait at scene, likely aggressive animal is kept at scene as well/not contained."
- Most dogs dont bite people for no reason. Maybe we need a program that teaches people how to raise their pets safely
- If the pet owner shares his/her info with the victim, then the enforcement officer can contact via the reported incident. Forcing a dog that is already under duress to stay at the "scene" is deplorable.
- Responsible owners will stay to provide information, having a law won't stop the irresponsible from fleeing the scene.
- Sometimes you need to remove your dog for everyone's safety. Yes leave contact info but if you need to put the dog away that should be exempt.
- When you own a dog you should be aware that sometimes something just sets your own or another dog off that you can't expect. Dog owners should know that they are responsible for dealing with these situations and that they can happen from time to time. I don't think we need to bring in law enforcement. I think people should be capable of dealing with this on their own and not use law enforcement resources.
- I think this requires a stronger definition of a bite - if two dogs are playing rough and one nips the other would you have to remain? If a dog mouths you and does not break skin, do you have to remain? For serious bite incidents something should be done to ensure the information is processed, but keeping two dogs involved in an incident in close proximity also keeps both in a state of stress, which is not ideal for anyone handling them.
- Because that may just escalate the situation if the dog who bites is reactive. I think they should be required to leave contact information when asked for it.
- I think that contact information should be required to be shared, however the owner should be able to remove the dog from the situation to prevent a bigger issue from occurring.
- In the event of an extreme incident, staying at the scene could inhibit medical care needed to both the pet and/or human. It should be required that information is exchanged, but not required to remain at the scene if those involved have severe enough injuries that a hospital/vet visit is warranted.
- I don't believe an enforcement officer is necessary. There are bigger problems that tax payers money can be focused on.
- As long as they exchange information with the other party.
- Most bites are nips and such and rarely serious or life threatening. As long as information is exchanged between parties, I see no reason to remain at the scene.

- you are asking a dog or other animal to remain in an unsafe situation. Best to de-escalate the situation and deal with it later when tensions are not as high
- I think they should be required to give their information to those involved/contact enforcement officers etc. But having to keep the dog in the area may be a difficult on all involved
- I want information to be exchanged but the right to leave for vet/medical attention. With the exchange of information the enforcement officers (if necessary) can attend the homes of those involved
- Some dogs play which looks like biting. A person should only stay if there was an actual issue at hand.
- Dogs get excited and sometimes biting is a way they play. It is unfair to single out these “bully breeds” because whoever is reading this is too scared to be around them long enough to get to know how sweet and gentle these breeds actually are. Whoever created this bylaw is a coward and guarantee they’ve never been around a “nuisance” breed and quite frankly this bylaw is a nuisance.
- The dog owner may feel like the other person is at risk, and instead would like to get their dog in a calm environment
- I think depending on the severity of the situations it can be handled without the need of an enforcement officer.
- Its not so black and white. You should get the injured away and investigate the issue, was the person/ other animal threatening? Approaching a dog that was not their own or suffering from trauma? Like wake up.
- This can’t be enforced in any practical way.
- I agree with sharing your info but what's best for all animals involved is removing them from the scene.
- A large majority of dog bites are caused by the victim themselves as they tease and threaten the animal.
- Yes leave contact information, however staying in the situation will only upset the dog more because they react to the emotions of the people around them and the energy they are given. Best thing for the dog and victim is for that dog to be removed from the situation.
- Because this may stress the dog and the victim more.
- I think sharing contact information is important, but also I think the dog should be removed from the situation as soon as possible. I think that would be hard to do if the dog owner has to stay.
- if the dog is such a threat it must be removed from the situation, keeping it in the situation without further incident would prove it was a "one off" happenstance and perhaps both parties are to blame, or the "victim" was at fault for unbecoming behavior towards the animal
- I think they should be required to leave their contact information and return to the scene as possible. But their priority is going to have to be to put their offending dog away. So if they need to walk home or go to their car, that should be done after they’ve given their info. Then they should return to the scene.
- Often times there is more to the story than a one sided testimony of a historical person

- The dog just bit someone you need to take he or she home. Keeping the dog on the scene isn't going to help the situation at all
- Sometimes animals are in defence or taunted. So their only defence is this. It could cause conflict between the two people.
- This is a difficult one. In many instances, dog owners are responsible, and would volunteer their contact information to the victim. In that case, having everyone wait around for an officer seems unfair to all involved. However, in the case of an uncooperative dog owner, such a rule may sound good, but then there is the question of how to enforce this? It is that uncooperative person who would ignore the rule and leave. Those that would follow the rule and wait are probably ones who are going to “do the right thing”, whether there is a rule or not.
- If a situation arises where there is serious injury, the owner of the dog will likely not wait, regardless of if it's law or not.
- depending on the situation
- Only if it is severe
- I think if they leave contact information that's okay.
- In my experience, most dogs react with members of the public approach or harass dogs (even if the owners intervene), however the bylaw officers will always default to blaming the dog. In many cases, the dog may have reacted because the other party was aggressive or harassing their owner and this bylaw would force the owner to stay in a potentially dangerous situation.
- Sometimes, depending on the situation, its best to remove the animal from the situation and have someone come talk with the person with the dog away from the emotions and stress
- I support but also see how difficult it would be to stay at the scene of the dog was with you. If something like that happened to me, I'd want to return the dog home and then come back to give details.
- Only if the victim requests the person to remain. Minor incidents between pets walking Can often be resolved privately and amicably without resorting to City officials.
- I think the owner should have to talk to a bylaw officer however remaining at the scene with the upset dog could instigate the situation. Also the owner should not have to share there address with the victim as this is confidential.
- If a dog bites a person or dog, the logical thing to do is remove the dog from that environment. This is likely what a pet owner will initially do. Requiring them to remain at the scene while the dog may still be agitated is not a good idea as this may result in further injuries.
- Too many people are aggressive about this and it could become a problem to make both parties wait together.
- This seems excessive
- Too many circumstances that lead up to a dog biting. I've seen people antagonize a dog and then they get bit...that would not be the dogs fault in my opinion.
- Only if the bite was severe and was considered an attack.
- Yes they need to provide contact info and insure the victim that their animal is up to date on vaccines but they also need to get the animal away from what is triggering it. If the owner is alone they should be allowed to remove their animal from the scene and return if necessary but they must provide a way to contact.

- "While I do feel that a person should be required to provide their contact and residential information, I do not feel that keeping and agitated animal at the scene of an incident is safe for the animal nor for other people present.
- Bite situations become very emotionally charged especially when there are bystanders who are uninvolved in the situation, and I have personally witnessed on more than one occasion, bystanders who have physically confronted owners, attempted to take possession of or injure the animal in question, make threats towards the owner etc."
- People can bend stories in their favour and you never know the actual facts of a situation. People should deal with the situation appropriately by yes, sharing contact information, but enforcing an officer is one step too far and can lead to unnecessary judgment calls.
- I think the information should be shared and yes the owner should be there, however to de-escalate the situation it is probably best that the dogs is removed from the situation (taken home) prior to this happening.
- It could take to long for a officer to arrive. And could lead in to more aggressive behaviour from animals and or owners. A picture of the owner license and or dogs license should be exchanged and possible witnesses contact information.
- Mostly because taking the dog home to calm down should be the main priority.
- I support the requirement to share contact information. I see no benefit in requiring engagement of enforcement.
- I feel like removing the dog from the situation would be best. Get some type of ID/Dog tag information to give to the Officers.
- Not sure. There are many reasons a dog bites. Unfortunately, there is discrimination against larger breed dogs. Dogs could be legitimately protecting their owner. They could also have been unprovoked by a "nuisance" dog. I could support the requirement for an owner to stay at the scene if officers are non-biased. Unfortunately, as you have written this engagement survey so far, I cannot support much of what you are proposing because you have already shown discrimination by specifically naming Pitbull breeds. Shame on you Calgary. Do better.
- I think that the dog should be removed from the scene, but contact information left at the scene or reported into enforcement immediately after
- I believe that should be the responsibility of the dog owner and the other human involved
- If a dog bite has occurred and the owner is the only one with the dog, it may be safest for everyone to get the dog out of the situation immediately in which case the owner would have to leave the scene to get the dog contained.
- too long to respond by by law. Greater education is needed by by law services
- "CUae everyone is heated , people will automatically put blame on the dog and not even Consiser that a human action cause a dog to react / hitting it etc.

- Let both parties go home calm down"
- This "biting" could be very subjective and a rule like this could be abused by someone overreacting to a situation. Our law enforcement should surely have more important matters to attend.
- If the dogs are injured and require medical care emphasis should be on saving the animals life.
- If a dog bites someone, you would want to remove the dog from the seen asap.
- Depending on the severity of the bite and individual circumstances the owner of the bitten animal and/or a bitten person may need to seek immediate medical attention and cannot wait around. Under this circumstance the owner of the offending dog may be left alone at the location, possibly not remaining there. In the event of a bite the owner of the offending animal should provide the tag number of their animal for further contact by authorities.
- Dog parents can be absolutely crazy at dog parks. I'm not going to stand around and wait because they felt my dog "attacked" their dog if my dog was being terrorized and simply standing up for itself.
- They should have to give their information but it could be dangerous to have the person wait around as if their dog just bit someone they clearly have no control
- Depends on the severity of the situation. Not a one size fits all rule.
- Some individuals could place unnecessary blame on animal and owner that would not be justified
- If they need medical attention they should be able to leave. I support it unless medical attention needs to be given
- Bite is not defined and dogs nip each other a lot at dog parks where they never draw blood or break skin and are just playing. This could be used to harass vulnerable people with dogs.
- People often do not listen when asked not to pet a dog.
- they should leave this contact info for a later discussion
- There isn't rampant bite and run activity so why create more rules for the sake of rules?
- Owner has to remove aggressive dog from the scene
- Getting back to their house allows the pet and owner to calm down and become safer as it is in an environment that it's comfortable in.
- After an incident, it's best to remove the problem dog from the situation. The owners info should be given so they can be contacted after.
- Things could escalate for the animal. It is not a way to diffuse the animals anxiety or behavior.
- If both dogs are injured they will need to leave and go to the vet. Or if one is agitated I wouldn't want it staying out on the street.
- I want to support this, but considering the danger of police to Black and Indigenous people, I cannot support it
- I think it is fair that information should be shared between those involved in the incident but not required to go to law enforcement
- Dogs don't bite for no reason. They only attack if they feel threatened, or if they have had a traumatic past with other strangers and animals. If the dog were to bite due to past traumatic events, the person should understand. Just like humans, animals have dealt with much trauma and fear. If the dog bites another person or animal, the owner of the dog that bit than animal or person should apologize and provide them with whatever care is necessary due to how severe the bite was.

- I believe an owner should not have to wait for enforcement but should still ensure the well being of the victim
- Sometimes in the event of an incident removing the dog is a better alternative then waiting. But the dog owner must make contact with the enforcement office within 6 hours to be accountable and responsible
- Depends on the situation.
- A person yes, another animal no. That is between the owners
- "With how some people react I would want the dog to be safe. Most times they bite when threatened, uncomfortable or can't escape. Most times the person receiving the bite is in the wrong, and the dog needs to get somewhere safe. Forcing them to stay is counterproductive towards this.

- 99% of the time I've seen a dog bite could have been prevented by the person that got bitten or the owner of the pet that got bitten. We punish the dog that reacts while not charging the owner or person that assaulted the dog that did the actual biting. We allow a plea of self defence for humans but don't seem to have this consideration for animals."
- both parties should be required to stay at the scene not just one as there are always 2 sides to the situation and both need to be fairly investigated
- Remaining at the scene is not always a safe situation nor is sharing contact information. Unless you have a permanent enforcement officer at the dog parks, this could be a very dangerous situation.
- "It ask depends on the situation. My dog was playing with another dog at a park in the winter a number of years ago and a chunk of ice got stuck in the other dogs paw. Although playful biting the dog started yelping due to the salt and ice. The owner demanded my information to which I would not give once i saw the dog was fine after the ice fell out of the dogs paw. She was still very insistent even after our dogs continued to play.

- On the other side, my puppy was used as a rag toy by another dog on leash in the street and he was hurt but not life threatening. The owner ran away as fast as they could using something about how they couldn't give the dogs information anymore."
- Sometimes the most important thing to do is remove the animal from the situation. Why would you require an animal that is acting aggressively towards an individual to stay at the scene? They should be required to report the incident themselves or provide contact information to the affected parties at the scene, but after that, they are free to go. You can't hold someone at the scene.
- Calgary is not a police state. Stop acting like one
- An enforcement officer is not trained to deal with a dog bite, a vet or a doctor would deal with that. Issues regarding the incident can be dealt with person to person and the decision can be made to involve an officer
- This is wrong and you don't know if the person was aggravating the animal to make it act like that.

- I feel that this could lead to heated altercations between the dog owner and victim. One of the parties should report, including the names and numbers of each party and then the enforcement officers could follow up afterwards.
- In the interest of avoiding situations becoming violent I believe it would be better to exchange information, and then let an enforcement officer contact each individual.
- Depends how the dog is acting. Staying at the scene with a dog still at a level 10 could cause it to bite or be aggressive. Best to remove from the scene and place in a quiet location
- ONLY if serious injury has occurred, a lot of timid dog owners or people timid around dogs make situations out to be worse than they are.. Unfortunately not enough dog owners understand normal animal behaviour and react to displays of dominance as if the dog be submitted is dying. More likely than not the animal is fine. PEOPLE NEED TRAINING in these situations, not the animals.
- Because it may cause to more stress for all parties involved
- Discrimination is alive and well with canines. If a pitbull bites a human that was provoking it, the situation will become a "he said, she said" scenario. The owner and dog should not have to prolong themselves to that scenario. If the dog is well trained and the bite was deserved I'm sure the owner will leave their information anyway.
- Not practical. However, info must be shared with person who was bitten.
- Let the people involved exchange info. People don't want to wait around for hours for the "enforcements" to show up for an incident report.
- Up to owners to decide
- As long as the offending dogs owner is compliant and provides contact information to the victim
- I don't agree.
- It might be prudent for them to take their aggressive dog away from the scene. Perhaps some sort of insurance or licensing information could be exchanged? I suppose it also depends on the severity of the incident (like car accidents).
- Dogs at off leash areas will do dog things. My female dog has had to run off "frisky" male dogs.
- I think it's a decision that who was hurt has to make, if they want their contact information or not.
- Only should occur if severe injuries are sustained to humans or dogs
- Only acceptable in serious situations in which blood is drawn.
- Lots of the time if a dog bites another dog it stems from playing that got too aggressive. There should be no rule enforcing that the owner should remain at the scene. If a dog bites a human most of the time it is because the human triggered the dog in a way that could have been prevented.
- Most bites are handled by the owner and the person or animal that was attacked without needing police intervention. If someone's dog is aggressive to the extent that the owner declared unsafe to others, the owner should be left to handle the situation. Police don't need to be involved in everything, just because they can, doesn't mean they should.
- It should only be required if the injury is serious, or if witnesses believe the owner to not be in control of the dog. Fear biting could be taken as a misbehaved or viscous dog when in actuality, the situation was probably caused by mishandling by the owner, an uneducated stranger attempting to interact with the dog, or both.

- People are liars.
- In cases where the person bitten was attacking the dog's owner/companion, it forces the victim of an intentional attack to remain in a dangerous situation.
- Time limits required
- Only if damage is severe
- Depending on the severity of the bite. If it is a serious Injury the owner of the dog should be held accountable. If it does not break the skin and the dog is under control then the owner should be allowed to leave.
- If the dog(s) have calmed down and are no longer a threat to those around them then this could work. However if they are high energy or still angry/acting out, I feel like it might not be the best idea to keep them in the current situation. If the owner is alone with said dog and needs to get the dog away from the situation that might be the best option at the time. I think there are too many grey areas here.
- Unless it's a severe accident and unprovoked they should not have to remain at the scene as most things can be dealt with between two people.
- I don't believe that is fair as the situation should be assessed on a case by case basis
- You typically want to remove the dog from the scene otherwise they don't calm down.
- I think it depends on the situation
- This may not always be possible, for multiple reasons the person may need to leave the scene, mainly to prevent further issues if they need to calm their dog down. Other reasons may be that people involved may be confrontational or threatening in a high stress situation and it may be safer for everyone involved not to directly share information.
- If an animal does bite a person there is usually a reason (although this is not always the case) - dogs often need to be removed from the situation that caused them to bite. Keeping them at the scene may be a stress on the animal and a public safety concern
- Enforcement should be last resort not primary interference when parties might mediate between themselves!
- The offending pets owner gives their contact info.
- Often the dog is continuing to be aggressive and there is already a problem with control. The dog would have to be secured and safe for this to happen.
- Not all cases should require this but in larger cases where there is severe harm, the owner should be required to stay and exchange information.
- At times it is not possible due to aid being needed or to control the dog which bit. Contact info should be given, and an easy way to do that would be a good alternative.
- Cops are sketchy , trigger happy cops will often shoot the dog on scene . I wouldn't stay and wait around for the reason alone
- I would like to think we can act like adult guys, and don't want to over regulate everything
- Staying might further traumatize the victim. Require sharing of info, not remaining to wait for officer.
- People's dogs bite my dog all the time- specifically Poodles. I think it is up to individuals to assess injuries and accept that sometimes pets get injured, and it is important to understand how to assess an injury if you're going to be a pet parent. This all sounds like Big Government getting involved in things that should be settled by reasonable adults making discretionary choices on how to handle situations. I see a dog get bit or scratched every other day in Crescent Heights. Are we really going to start focusing on spending time and money on punishing dog owners and their pets?

- Keeping everyone in a volatile situation is not a good idea
- It would be complicated to enforce this as the degree of bites that happen at these parks are challenging to regulate, who's to say what is deemed as a "serious"• bite and what is not? Maybe if that is clarified then sure but this seems too broad
- Dogs bite each other as a normal part of their behavior. Only if severe injury occurs that requires medical attention should the owner share information and even then its dependent on the situation. If the dog who bit the other party was provoked, was protecting their owner or felt threatened then no as the fault is on the other party.
- Sometimes it is not only the dogs fault why a stranger got bitten. Sometimes people provoke other people's dogs and do not listen to the dogs owner when they say the dog isn't friendly or whatever warning they have.
- Dogs play with one another, there might be a small incident that is not even a bite and then authority must be called, this will lead yo inefficiencies. I believe that if there is a bite incident, parties will exchange detail on their own.
- Removing the dog from the scene to prevent more injury or trauma for anyone involved in the event should be a priority.
- This rule could be abused by some dog owners that may overreact to or misinterpret certain circumstances. For example, another dog owner may mis-interpret playing for biting, and then insist that the other owner stays at the scene when it is not necessary.
- Often they need to deescalate The situation and seek medical treatment for animals. The animal control folks do not have time or resources to attend to every dog scuffle.
- Enforcement officer sometimes can't get there for hours. People exchanging info should be good and follow up by officer can be done after.
- Probably safest for the individual to leave their contact info and remove the dog from the scene as something has caused the dog to act out.
- it may not be safe for the owner to remain, however they should try when possible or be able to provide their contact details. any case involve a fatality or serious injury they should stay. I want to be mindful that one dog bites may also be a result of other people, not the owners, causing the problems, and no where in this is there a clause that can hold others accountable for instigating a dog bite or attack, or not listening to the owners direction leading to a bite or attack. Majority of dog bites are fear based, and irresponsible people can be the cause of a dog bite, not necessarily the owner. (I've had many people refuse to not pet my fearful foster dogs, or bring their strange dog close to mine saying that dont worry, their dog is friendly. I have to be extra diligent around these irresponsible people to make sure they dont get bitten. It's very challenging!
- Way too vague. What does "if necessary" entail? Who decides what is necessary. The potential for abuse of this rule is too extreme.

- Please just enforce the current laws
- Why? It's a dog, an animal, they can bite for a lot of reasons for which we cannot always explain why. What will the enforcement officer do after the dog has already bit someone? Obviously make sure that person is ok but what is a bite? To draw blood or to nip as to warn someone to stay away. I think these are huge differences as a dog may be protecting their family and people tend to approach dogs when they shouldn't. People of the public need training and understanding of animals.
- Sometimes people or their pets provoke other animals and it's not fair to the animal or owner defending themselves.
- Situational. if you're dog attacks mine for no good reason and my princess defends herself and kills yours well sorry maybe you shouldn't be taking your dog out that going to be confrontational. [removed]
- Dogs that are panicking/being aggressive/being defensive need to be secured and away from the scene before considering anything else. Juggling a panicking dog while exchanging contact information or waiting for an officer in a high stress situation is just another follow up incident waiting to happen.
- if a person is coming up to a dog or letting another dog attack them, why should they have to stay and have their dog put down for protecting itself?
- Dogs bite when they feel threatened. Forcing an owner, and therefore the animal, to stay in an area that has already been assessed to be dangerous/threatening is likely to result in further issues.
- I think that if a dog is injured a delay to treatment puts them at risk
- Because sometimes there is a reason why a dog bites another dog and it's not being it's acting mean, it's because it's acting like a dog. Dogs bite each other when they're upset. It's what a dog does to show its behaviour. What this world is turning to? Trying to form a dog to what we believe is right.
- "The owner should give his name, phone and address but can leave to get the dog home.
- THIS SURVEY IS BIAISED FOR THE FOLLOWING REASON, IT SAYS ""It is important to note that while pit bulls are not involved in more bite incidents than other dog breeds (...) SO WHY DO YOU WANT TO DISCRIMINATE THEM????? (...) the reason they are listed here is because a pitbull's strength allows the potential for a more severe bite - MORE SEVERE BITE THAN WHAT???? IT IS SCIENTIFICALLY PROVEN THAT THE POTENTIAL STRENGTH OF A PITBULL BITE IS ACTUALLY LESSER THAN OTHER BREEDS. THIS STATEMENT IS DEROGATIVE, BIAISED, UNSCIENTIFIC, AND FALSE. THEREFORE, THIS PART OF THE SURVEY REFERRING TO PITBULLS, OR THE WHOLE SURVEY, SHOULD BE NULL AND VOID."
- Most dogs do not bite unless provoked. My dog doesn't not get along with other dogs. He was abused and I will not muzzle him because of that. If another dog should come up to my dog after I warned the other owner my dog is not in the wrong to protect himself. Dogs do not think like humans and rationalize
- If medical help is required for animal or human, that is a priority. Not to stay and wait.

- The person or dog injured need to leave quickly to get treatment, the dog who attacked needs to be removed from the situation to deescalate their aggression. Contact info is a must though. An easy way to obtain - say taking a picture of the dog's license?
- The person or dog injured need to leave quickly to get treatment, the dog who attacked needs to be removed from the situation to deescalate their aggression. Contact info is a must though. An easy way to obtain - say taking a picture of the dog's license?
- Dependant on bite and person who was bit. If they aren't concerned about it, then you shouldn't have to leave information.
- If it was a stressful incident why keep the dog or dogs at the scene of the incident any longer than needs to be? De-escalation can happen if the owner and pet walks away. However, a rule saying you must exchange truthful information may be best.
- Unless the bite is severe or fatal, this doesn't seem necessary.
- The priority should be caring for the person and the animal in the situation to eliminate further harm.
- Unless the situation is really bad, I feel like the owners should be responsible to exchange contact information between themselves, it is the owners responsibilities after all.
- Seems too broad- dogs bite other dogs often at the dog park, usually in play.
- Often dogs bite as a means to protect their owner. Remaining at the scene with a threatening individual seems unwise and dangerous and could result in escalation.
- Contact information should be provided, but people should not have to wait around for four hours until you can get around to them.
- An owner removing a dog from the environment to limit further damage could be a good thing. Leaving contact information should be appropriate
- Contact information could be given but it's not always practical to remain the scene until an enforcement officer is free.
- I was bit and my dog was attacked I don't believe this being mandated would have changed the situation. The other owner wouldn't have stayed at the scene and I needed to leave to tend to my dog and my wounds.
- I do feel that owners should share contact information with the victims owners if necessary and speak with an enforcement officer, however I do not feel that requiring them to remain at the scene of an incident with their potentially worked up/stressed out dog is helpful to preventing further incidents or in the best interest of the dog. Owners should be required or allowed to take their dog home before returning to speak with an enforcement officer
- How long does someone have to wait for an officer? People can exchange information without an officer there. Same as a car accident
- "No.
- People are irresponsible, they don't use leashes and when a bigger leashed dog bites a
- "Nice" but unleashed dog when it wanders over,
- A person shouldn't have to then stand there and explain that the bitten dog should have been on a [removed] leash"
- Depending on severity of bite, if needing medical attention then yes.

- I support contact information to be exchanged. Dog's often bite because of an incident that traumatizes the dog and the dog may need to be placed in a calm environment, which would not be remaining at the scene.
- If my dog was not the instigator then I should not be legally bound to stay and talk with law enforcement.
- Dogs sometimes lightly nip each other while playing, normally not meaning to cause harm
- This is not a black and white scenario. If there are small kids running around a dog park (which there often are) and a dog who isn't used to children sees this as a threat or opportunity to play and bites, I would be very upset if I had to wait around to talk to an enforcement officer. The parents of the kids would be completely in the wrong for allowing kids to run around at a place meant for dogs.
- It can be unsafe to remain at the scene. People involved should self report to 311. However when an honest citizen participates willingly they may open themselves up to legal harm whilst the dishonest people are free to go about their day with no repercussions.
- I would support this for biting humans but not other animals.
- Not all dog bites are harmful, dogs are animals and dog bites (for the most part) seem worse than they are.
- The severity of it would need to be clear.
- Dependant upon if someone is hurt- if there dog who bite was provoked and is hurt they should be able to go to the vet
- If it is a case of the dog protecting the owner from an aggressive or potentially aggressive interaction, it is unreasonable to expect the dog owner to remain in a dangerous situation.
- NA
- Often dogs involved in incidents like that are over threshold and significantly distressed. Making the owner stay at the scene makes it impossible to remove the dog from the stressful situation and increases their distress and the likelihood of further harm (to the dog and other people).
- It depends on the severity of the incident. A lot of the time it is better to get the dogs out of the situation because the dog is over stimulated and could lead to further injury to any of the involved parties
- It could be a dangerous situation for the owner and attacking dog to stay at a scene and traumatic for the attackee
- People lie about dog bites
- The owner should be contacted by bylaw
- The owner likely needs to get the animal out of the situation that caused the bite. Hopefully some exchange happens or they can come back after. But the animal requires care at that point.
- Most people do this anyway. If they don't it's because they don't care and will avoid this process anyway.
- Awful idea. Have them go home and take their dog home. Call them it's not serious enough to need to stay it's not a car accident.
- Its interesting to hear it the dogs bites, there r ppl who do agitate a dog....so it should discussed any situations where a animal was harassed, and then did the biting

- What if the dog was just defending itself because the other dog or person lunged at it first!
 - Good people already do this. How do you fine someone who runs off before you can report it anyways? Are you going to start following our self taken pics of offenders to post online to find them?
 - Depends on severity. Case by case. If bleeding then yes.
 - "This is a very biased questionnaire. However..."
 - This is not a safe procedure, just use your heads for a minute and think about it.
 - It would likely cause escalation between parties.
 - The problem people would simply ignore it.
 - A concerning number of owners can't tell between playing and injurious biting between dogs.
- A better way would be to have some sort of smart-phone usable registration system that allows someone to report a pet of issue (Dog, cat, pig, goat, anything that could attack someone and is found outside)"
 - "1. Enforcement officer is extremely unlikely to attend in timely manner.
- 2. Between dog owners there are vastly differing opinions of a "bite". Some consider anything that draws a yelp to be a vicious bite while others consider anything less than a severed limb to be "playing". This leaves the definition of a bite as one more ambiguous thing to be argued over.
- 3. This potentially puts a dog owner who is accused of having a dog who has bitten someone in a dangerous position. As an example, I was at Sue Higgins dog park when a mid 50s man tried to grab a ball from another dogs mouth. Prior to this the man had been aggressive, loud and disruptive with other dogs and owners. The man loudly accused the dog of biting him and began screaming profanities at the dogs owner. The dog owner, and other bystanders, expressed concern that he had been bitten and offered aid. It turned out the man had no broken skin, no any redness or visible skin impression. Regardless the man continued to scream at the young female dog owner who was there alone. Along with several other owners I ensured that the young women was safe and able to leave the area as there was a very real possibility the man would become violent.
- In this situation forcing this young women to give her contact information to this man would have been dangerous. Likewise, requiring her to remain in the presence of this agitated man would have placed her safety at risk.

- Please note that my dog was not involved in this altercation."
- I believe that both parties of an incident that results in a bite by an animal to be present and BOTH PARTIES should be responsible for their role in the interaction. People should not have a bypass for teasing and agitating an animal.
- It depends on the severity, and what happened.
- There is plenty of cell phones, cameras etc now days. It's easy to share info and process later on
- What triggered the incident? Often people will twist the stories to play the victim.
- I think it is best to remove everyone from the situation.
- This is the most stupid idea I've heard. Every dogs energy is different, dogs get in arguments just like humans. They're living breathing creatures. Not a car.
- It's better if the owner takes their dog to a controlled environment (such as their home) to prevent further potential negative actions / stress on the animal
- It depends on the situation so difficult to put a rule in for something that depends.
- The priority should be removing the animal from the situation immediately. If the owner is alone, they must be allowed to remove their dog from the situation and this may require leaving. They should come back after their dog is secured to share contact information.
- THIS IS A SLIPPERY SLOPE TO BREED DISCRIMINATION FOR FINANCIAL GAIN, DO BETTER ELECTED OFFICIALS.
- dogs can bite for many reasons. Train the person not the dog
- I don't think it's logistically possible to require an owner who is trying to manage a dog who has just bitten someone to remain there and thus keep the dog in that high stress situation. That is placing undue stress on the dog and potentially putting more people at risk, hypothetically.
- That could be a very stressful situation. I believe responsible pet owners would exchange such information regardless. People who cannot be responsible pet owners should not have an animal.
- Why is this being considered a major issue? How do you define a bite? How would this be enforced? How would an incident be mitigated if one owner considers it a bite and the other does not?
- If their animal is injured it may require immediate medical attention.
- This does not allow for de-escalation of any situations. While i support the exchange of information requiring all parties to stay in a potentially hostile, escalated situation can make everyone involved more stressed than they need to be.
- It depends on the severity of the bite.
- I support the owner being required to provide information, however I feel this can be done away from the scene. Emotions are heightened with dog bites and I am concerned that these situations can escalate, resulting in further harm to both dogs and humans. Perhaps a 24 hours reporting window could be mandated, with calls going to 311.
- Adults handle it on their own. Enforcement officer only needed if it escalates .
- If dog bite on human enforcement should be involved. But animals get into shuffles occasionally and owners can handle themselves

- I think contact info should be shared but waiting for hours with an upset dog does not work. So like car accidents why not require info to be traded and parties to get in touch and report after the fact.
- This seems difficult to enforce and that it could lead to escalated violence between the people involved.
- Studies have shown that a significant amount of dog "attacks" have been caused due to other people coming up to the dog without talking to the owner prior and ensuring it would be okay. Majority of dog "attacks" are a fear and stress response caused by unfamiliar people. It is typically not the dog or the owners fault, but that of the person who approaches the dog and fails to ask permission.
- Unless the dog is now calmed down by the owner, the owner should take the dog away from the situation.
- Seems untenable to enforce.
- If a person decides to pet a dog without asking the owner if it's okay and they're bitten, they invaded the dogs space, same goes for a person that decides to let another dog interact with your dog without asking if this action is okay
- Dogs will snap at each other as a communication process. Too many people don't understand this, or understand canine behaviour. There are too many "Karen's" around that create problems for us all.
- As long as they have provided their contact information it is best for all dogs/people involved to get away from the stress of the situation
- Both parties stay or no one stays . I also believe that people need to keep their hands away from animals and stop assuming they are in a good mood animals have emotions like people and u don't see us require muzzles or licensing to have children. Start fining people for touching with out asking
- If the situation is critical to health authorities will be involved. If it isn't reports can be made as soon as possible by one or more parties.
- If the dog bit die to stress, staying on scene, possibly surrounded by more people or the trigger of the dogs aggression could make things worse. Ideally the person should leave a contact, but then be free to go bring the dog home.
- "A) potential physical or verbal conflict could ensue between parties
- B) often a dog bites another animal only when provoked. I have called animal control / bylaw officers numerous times on a dog in a downtown dog park who often provoked my dog (who is a 25lbs ESA/therapy dog and has his good canine certification, which means he is literally the most stable version of a dog you can find) to snap at the provoking dog. My dog had clearly told that dog numerous times that he was not interested but that dog continued to bark at, paw at and hump my dog. Unsocialized dogs often cause the bites. They are just as likely to cause the bites as they are to bite themselves."
- Depends on the situation. If two dogs were playing and it was consensual but got out of hand, the owners should have a discussion and figure out the best course of action. If a dog bites a person...Did the dog get off leash and attack someone or was it a dog whose owner was being harassed and the dog reacted?? Obviously some reporting is needed but case by case is appropriate. I also don't know that The City has the personnel to dedicate to this sort of enforcement activity.

- If the dog is stressed and out of control the safest course of action would be to remove and secure the dog in a safe location. Ideally, yes, the owner should remain at the scene, and contact info needs to be provided, but I'm not sure this is practical.
- How long will it take for an enforcement officer to arrive? We know how slow CPS can be to arrive to a non-emergency. Will this be the same?
- There are two sides to every story. 90% of aggression is fear
- What's to explain?
- Discussion can happen over the phone. Dog owner may be under high stress after the incident, therefore perception of the incident may be screwed. It's also a very traumatic moment for the person/dog, so being in a safe place might reduce long term traumatic effect on the owner.
- There are extenuating circumstances that make it better that sometimes the parties involved go their separate ways
- Making two dogs that got into a fight stay together for a longer period of time and bring out more aggressive behaviour!
- A lot of smaller dogs are aggressive towards bigger dogs and it's not their fault that they retaliate.
- Because this could be abused in instances where a person/animal is bite but not bleeding. If you say when necessary, what does necessary mean? It's very vague
- I feel that dogs should not be punished for their actions and neither should the humans, if they are aware their dog will cause harm they can take the easy step and leave their dog at home
- Because mitigating circumstances are not taken into consideration.
- This is a waste of bylaw resources.
- Exchange information, take photos and remove the animal from the high stress situation.
- No, often hostile environment and need to look out for safety of humans and dogs.
- People should just do this. Moat will.
- PEOPLE need to be held responsible. But it is not always the dogs fault they were reactive depending on the situation, it may not be helpful to keep a reactive dog on the scene.
- Forcing the person to stay at the scene would not allow the person to remove the dog from the aggressive scenario and I believe would lead to more biting incidents. They should exchange information and then be able to remove their dog to their home for seclusion. Also, this does not protect the dog owner from persons wanting to make false reports with malicious intent towards the dog owner.
- I think that it is ridiculous that people are singeing our pit bulls they are amazing breed of dog
- Too many people don't understand dog behaviour. Some dog scraps are just that and may result in minor injuries to a dog, to ya e to wait until bylaw shows up will clog up the system. It is better to have an education system in place to educate people on dog signals, calming signals and normal dog behaviour.
- I think these situations need to be on a case by case basis. I have seen dogs that are playing that accidentally knick another dog with there teeth. I think it should be situation dependent.

- The biting dog may have been provoked or bitten first etc.
- I believe that if the owner is not willingly giving out information than an enforcement officer can or should be involved to diffuse the situation. If the owner is providing proper information I do not think this is necessary.
- Unless it draws blood or breaks skin.
- I think it must be mandatory to share contact information, however if a dog is in a heightened state they should be removed from the scene. If contact info is shared, enforcement can contact them in a timely manner
- I only disagree if the bite is life threatening or severe to the human or animal they need to get medical attention first but I still think the story should be figured out because good behaved dogs don't bite for no reason
- Define "other animal" . Can't leave this open to interpretation.
- Exchange information and leave
- The dog owner must share contact info with the other person involved.
- I doubt enforcement would respond in a timely manner and dog bites are debatable. There is a big difference between a "dog bite" and a "dog that plays"; the majority of people making complaints do not likely have dogs and could consider a dog's play as aggressive (some people approach a dog without consent)...I understand that working dogs do need this extra training but when they are puppies you can only control the brain to a certain level.
- There isn't enough animal education any more. I can't even count on my fingers and toes the amount of times both children and adults have run at my dog without putting their hand out for the dog to sniff, and my dog has backed away and perceived these people as a threat. Education of the public is where we should be spending money. 9/10 it's human stupidity.
- "Depends on the situation. Was it aggressive? Play gone wrong? Wrong time and place?"
- Protective? Called for (ie: someone was harassing the owner and the pet took it on) not saying that is good but I have been harassed by very altered people downtown and although my dog has never bit any of them, she certainly keeps them at bay."
- I think the basic info should be shared but the dog should be taken home or out of the situation immediately.
- I believe in this situation keeping a scared/easily excited or aggressive animal at a scene where there is going to a lot of commotion and stimulating energy is not going to help.
- Because even in this questionnaire there is threat of euthanasia. In a perfect world sure but not in this one.
- Lots of situations can be turned into a complete bias with this. If you have an aggressive chihuahua and a tame pit bull looking from an outside perspective 9 times out of 10 people will assume the pit bull is at fault. This may be the case sometimes but not always. This leaves a lot of room for an officer or an outsider to make assumptions. If this were to be a bylaw, witness should be NEEDED to move forward unless visible damage is done of course
- Up to the people involved
- It's the owner not the dog!!!!

- This has nothing but potential to hurt the dog and the people. Yikes.
- Dogs feed off of people emotions and after an incident emotions will be running high in a negative way. This could result in another incident between the parties involved.
- More likely to judge a dog by breed. Law enforcement not required for every incident.
- We're adults..
- This is not always necessary and would likely cause a back log for officers
- Dog owner should exchange information with the victim, enforcement officer doesn't need to be involved unless escalated
- I say no only because it may cause the situation to escalate further - the dog may need to calm down elsewhere if it continues to be a risk or to be protected from possible retribution.
- I have had experiences in the past where people have said they got a "loud neighbor's dog" euthenized as revenge for something the owner did by lying about being bitten by the neighbors dog. Every dog owner I have met is responsible enough to know when a statement is necessary without law enforcement
- I think a person should have to stay if the dog bites a person but not another animal.
- If a bite is serious the victim will need to get emergency help, ambulances are not sent out for animals.
- It is between them what they would like to do, just like everything else in life
- What is a bite? How do we measure that? Incidental mouth play?
- Take the dog home first
- Should be common sense, if injury's permit you shouldn't leave without contact information.
- They should have to exchange their information with you in case there is a medical issue that arises from the incident but I don't think they should have to stay unless an animal or person is seriously hurt
- Treat it like a car accident. Exchange information and remove the dogs from the situation so there isn't more unnecessary trauma for the victim OR attacker. Sometimes things happen and the context dictates the behavior instead of the nature of the animal.
- It may not be safe for the owner to remain, either due to need to restrain their dog or seek medical care for themselves or their dog or because the other parties may be escalating the situation.
- How long might someone have to wait for an "enforcement officer" to arrive? There could be inclement weather or it could be too hot outside to wait for any length of time in the elements...
- Myself and my dog have been bitten at dog park before, and because my dog was larger and theirs was smaller we didn't even get a "sorry" they just walked away. I think depending on the severity, environment, and scenario of the incident should play a huge roll in determining if law enforcement or information exchanges should happen. But usually it's pretty minor and not a huge deal from what I've seen.
- This would cause vigilante justice, attacks on the owner by third parties who were not involved and have no knowledge of the situation.
- The offending animal should be removed from the scene as quickly as possible.

- The owner should give contact information but not stay at the scene because if the animal is aggressive it could become violent again
- This is [removed]
- How are you supposed to remove an aggressive dog from the situation and remain at the scene at the same time?!?
- If dogs are 'playing' with other dogs, and an incident occurred, it would be one person's word against the other. Most responsible dog owners would do the responsible thing. Don't establish a rule that inappropriately affects all, because of a few
- If a dog owner is a good owner the dog will not bite randomly
- I think they should go to the persons home. This gets the dog out of the situation. Keeps the persons involved safe and the dog safe. It can also show how the dog interacts at home and how the home owners are looking after the dog
- Animals may need immediate vet attention and it might not be possible to remain at the scene. I'm fine with the exchanging of information but waiting for an officer to arrive won't always be possible.
- A lot of the time when a dog bites another dog. It's the dog that got bit's fault, a lot of small dogs aren't trained properly and act aggressive towards bigger dogs. It's not their fault that they are defending themselves
- Only in the case where the severity is high when the owner remain at the scene IF it's SAFE to do so
- Sometimes dog owners don't follow the rules and let their dog off leash. My dog is sweet, but if a dog comes out of nowhere and invades his space, and bites the dog off leash, why do my dog and I get punished for it?
- If it was a dog biting a human. Perhaps. Dog on dog bite usually occurs because one owner does not respect dogs and their space. If you pass this BOTH parties should be involved. It can go both ways.
- This question is vague - what kind of bite are we talking here? Small bites or nips between dogs should not require an enforcement officer to attend.
- Define the severity of "bite" please.
- I believe owners can take the correct steps. Only in certain situations should enforcement officers be needed
- Sometimes the best thing is to remove the dog from the situation and let everyone calm down. Staying at the scene does not allow the dogs to calm down. Keeping two owners together (who are not seeing eye to eye) for an extended period of time will probably just escalate the situation!
- Sometimes dog owners (usually small dog breeds) are overprotective of their dogs and make false claims that their dog has been but or injured when they clearly have not.
- You cannot make 'rules' or 'bylaws' strictly singling out any kind of breed or dog. It's disgusting and I'm quite disappointed in the city for even doing this. As a pitbull owner myself it's extremely offensive and disrespectful.
- Only because people get so angry and emotional I think the circumstances can be enlarged and lies. If a dog bites, it can often be from fear because a human does not respect the dog.

- If someone is hurt very badly or an animal is seriously injured then someone should stay but minor things happen and no need
- The person or dog might need medical attention. The victim might be scared or threatened of the other or dogs people on scene. After a negative experience a dog will need to be removed from the situation to calm down.
- The dog needs to calm down, and be reprimanded at home, where the animal is safe and comfortable in their environment.
- Dogs bite while playing all the time, and if your sticking your hands near a dogs mouth you shouldn't be shocked if it bites you
- Who knows how long it would take for someone to show up
- The first priority is for the owner to remove the dog from the area and to secure it for the safety of others. I would support a rule that the owner must contact an enforcement officer within 24 hours if remaining on the scene is unsafe (no one else to take the dog, no vehicle to secure the dog in, etc.,)
- remove the dog from the incident
- Sometimes the dog that bites someone is not the aggressor. I've seen multiple scenarios where a person's dog starts the fight but is the only who gets seriously bitten in self defence. It should be up for discussion by the owners instead of law enforcement.
- Information should be exchanged at a safe time. After an attack the animals and individuals will be extremely agitated and the situation could become worse. Also there may not be time to wait if an animal has suffered an injury. The time waiting for an officer to arrive could mean an animal dies there instead of being rushed to a vet. I agree information needs to be exchanged in some way but sitting and waiting is not the answer.
- Removing an angry upset dog to prevent more damage is better
- I think it depends on the severity of the situation.
- dogs bite if provoked. people need to stop being idiots and blaming dogs when it was probably their fault anything happened in the first place. dogs shouldn't be blamed. blame the owner not the dog!!!!
- In a bite incident removing the animal from the scene to avoid further issues or potential escalation is more important.
- There would be conditions to this I'd it's a pet and the other animal is in the area. The person might need to get their pet away from the area. The other animal could have run away
- Not only would the animal(s) be a pain for the owner to sit and wait for an officer to show up, I do not think it is a good idea to stay at the scene if a dog, or multiple dogs, have already been aggravated. Not separating the animal could lead to another incident.
- I cannot fully support this as a small bite between dogs is normal. A severe bite is something else but we have technology to follow up with these situations. You will have people running around all over to complaints that may be erroneously made. My puppy got a small bite on her face when she was six months and is fine. It happens, they are dogs.
- This can be handled without an officer.
- they must leave it with someone, if they must leave to remove the dog from being a further danger.
- No, I don't feel like city resources need to be used this way.

- Their information can be taken and bylaw can go to their house.
- In the case of any altercation, the best course of action is to often get the animals away from the scene as quickly as possible.
- I believe humans in general are good in nature. If this unfortunately happens it'd be on my way to a vet with the affected party. Not waiting around for a bylaw to hand out a ticket while an animal is suffering needlessly.
- Depends on situation
- How long does it take for an enforcement officer to arrive? The parties involved need to exchange information and get names and contact info from witnesses. This is a traumatic event. If bylaw does not arrive within 30 minutes, people should not have to wait if they have exchanged info.
- Situational, if there is medical attention needed yes but blame should not be put immediately on the dog
- If the dog aggressively initiates yes. If it's a minor dog fight and provoked by the other dog no
- I think it depends on the situation there are many people and situations like where people over exaggerate and this would lead to many people making phone calls that would be in needed.
- If the bite does not warrant vet examination, move on. Animals communicate with their mouths and teeth.
- I would hope that if in fact in incident occurs both parties would exchange info and deal with it accordingly. I do not think we need another "rule"
- Dogs bite sometimes... what are you trying to enforce here?
- If a dog bites a person or another animal it's because it felt unsafe or provoked. It's entirely the fault of the person that got bit.
- What if the other person instigated the dog and then causes the bite? Lemme guess, still the dogs fault? Quit punishing innocent animals for dumb animals mistakes (humans)
- This is vary vague on what constitutes a 'bite' if a dog were to nip at another dog for disrespecting boundaries, being dominant, etc there should be no reason for contact information.
- I think it depends on if the dog is provoked/unprovoked/situation Ie on leash park where someone has their dog off leash and that dog gets bitten by another dog due to them being uncontrolled and running up to the other dog, etc
- The circumstances may be unsafe for the owner and the dog to remain at the scene. It may be better for both parties to return to their home (safe space) and have the enforcement officer speak with them there.
- I think it can be handled with the other owner to exchange information If needed
- A lot of people overreact when their pets or their loved ones are involved. So there will be a lot of incidences When the dog didn't really do anything wrong but there still expected to stay and talk to an officer. The dog will still be in the unknown agitated state at that point so you're putting more stress on the animal. As well as all the people Involved
- If the dog is not under control at the scene it is usually safer to remove the dog and report after the dog has been contained.

- If the dog was provoked or is agitated by the individual it would not be a good idea to have them together.
- Its a loaded question..I was bitten by a large poodle breed,the owners acted as if it was my fault,then they took off..I left soon after..I prefer to never involve the legal system,it makes things worse...Punishing dogs for poor human behaviour(lack of training and knowledge)There is no justice, and the animal, who is like a child,suffers the worst..its never the animals fault..Quit targeting bully breeds they are beautiful dogs.And you state,.. they bite no more often than any other breed..
- Dogs may bite people for a number of reasons. If someone provokes a dog to bite them the owner shouldn't have to remain at the scene.
- Only because if there is a person or other animal injured they they should leave to get proper medical attention
- I am not sure an animal bite should be treated the same as a human bite.
- Why not speak with an officer at home?
- People will consider a small altercation a bigger deal than it may be.
- The dog Shld be removed from the situation immediately and the person should either call 311 or leave their information if possible
- If the dog was triggered by something or someone at the scene, remaining at the scene would prove more dangerous. The dog should be removed from the situation to maintain safety.
- I agree that accurate information should be provided, but assuming you were alone with the dog, how could you keep the dog at the scene if they were being aggressive?
- Not always the owners fault, could have been provoked.
- Emotionally overwhelming for the owner as well. Also muzzles on pit bulls? How about the city decides to actually solve the problem by educating rather than muzzles. The ignorance and stupidity in this city regarding pit bulls it's awful. Do the research, any dog is aggressive when the owner is awful. Provide educational programs, assistance. Claiming that pit bulls are too strong that's why they need a muzzle? Pit bulls can be as gentle as a lab if the owner is good. You guys are ridiculous with that. Maybe don't let every idiot be able to own a dog and have more regulations on the BREEDERS.
- Perhaps the dog needs to be taken home first or placed In a safe Area
- Unless it is severe
- Stay unless both parties involved agree it is not necessary.
- If a serious bite were to occur, I believe it would be prudent for the owner to take the dog away from the scene to minimize the chances of escalation.
- Dogs shouldn't be held accountable for bites only the human is responsible. People take things too far when half the time it was someone else or someone else's poorly trained dog - human fault- for bite incidents.
- I believe it should be a rule, although insuring the safety of all involved should take priority. (Getting the dog removed from the scene)

- Any dog bite should require the owner to exchange contact details with the person, waiting around for an enforcement officer to come may escalate the situation with either the owners or dogs, some of which may need to seek medical assistance.
- They should be required to provide contact info - what is the response time of the enforcement officer??
- This is not descriptive enough. A nip of the shirt to the wrong person could result in a poorly managed situation with a requirement to stay on scene.
- It is best to remove animals from the situation.
- I agree in an exchange of information. if an incident were to occur, to avoid stress from both parties (dogs especially) they should be separated/ confined immediately (back in a secure area/yard/kennel/vehicle etc.) This allows all parties to come down from the adreneline rush that usually occurs during these high stress type situations.
- Information should be shared between both parties and then depart. Keeping g the dogs close can cause stress as well as another bite.
- That would already apply if harm was done. Dogs bite eachother at parks all the time. Unless harm is done it is not an issue.
- If it's safer for everyone involved to not wait around, this rule could put more parties in danger. However, the intent behind the rule (for people to responsibly stick around to resolve an incident) is good.
- "This is a vague question. When did the animal "bite." Has there been canine dental taken to prove it was this dog. It's their word against whom?
- Animals have natural instincts what is being don't to protect them? This is deplorable!!"
- I think it depends if the person or animal that was bit is hurt
- Bites a person yes, bites another dog no
- It is reasonable for dog owner to provide verified contact information and they should ethically offer assistance to victim. However it may be more prudent to provide contact information and remove self and dog from the area, for the safety and well being of all parties involved.
- I would imagine a bite incident would be highly emotionally charged & keeping the dog at the scene could exacerbate tensions. Return to the scene should be appropriate, once the dog has been removed.
- What defines a bite? Does blood have to be drawn? If one dog plays rough and the other nips back, now they have to wait for an officer? Seems like people could easily abuse this rule, and that those who can afford legal counsel will always come out on top.
- I don't see any reason for this, especially if the guardian is still with the animal in question. In my opinion, they should be required to provide their information, but allowed to leave with the animal to prevent further stress or violent behaviour from the dog.
- Sometimes when dogs play they nik each other and sometimes they bleed a little. A bite needs to be defined
- Depends on the bite to be completely honest. This is vague and stupid like the rest of this [removed] survey

- I would say Yes, however, if staying there at the scene causes more aggression or concern I don't think that's safe for any person or animal in the vicinity.
- It could take hours for animal control to show up.....was told that when my dog was attacked by another dog. So doesn't seem practical - People enter dog parks and interact with other animals at their own risk. They assume the liability that they may be harmed while using the park.,
- This could stop the owner from getting the pet out of the area and cause continued danger.
- my dog doesnt bite. so if he ever does, it means he was violated. we all have a right to protect ourselves, man or beast.
- This is no different than a car accident ... the person who is bitten should also be there. But it should not be forced by law, only in the event of serious/life threatening bites. Many superficial bites by people who fear & harass/tease dogs are over exaggerated & those would be a waste of the enforcement services time! The dog should also not be forced to remain in conditions that could cause it undue harm - the cold, the heat ... dog should be treated like any other citizen and given the opportunity to have access to the necessities that it needs to be comfortable
- If dog senses danger to the owner and protects it, last thing anyone would want to do is stick around.
- Only if it is serious. Dogs play around, sometimes nips happen. Also, this should be applied for small dogs as they are usually the aggressor since their owners don't take the time to train them.
- I support providing and exchanging information. However, to deescalate a situation, leaving with the dog is often necessary.
- If the dog is not getting along then you leave if the bite does occur give them a number
- I think this question is loaded and very poorly worded, the term "bite" can cover a broad spectrum. the wording needs to be defined more clearly. i don't think someone should have to wait for an officer is the dogs get into a little spat but if damage is done or it was unprovoked that is a whole different case.
- The vast majority of incidents in which dogs are aggressive are instigated by a person or child not treating the dog with respect. Parents should teach their human children who are more easily trained, how to approach and interact with dogs instead of blaming the dogs.
- bite needs to be defined appropriately before I would support this.
- If it was a severe bite which requires hospitalisation, yes. Dogs play with their mouths and some owners may consider that a "bite" even if its just play and not aggressive.
- Often the dog will be stressed out and the best thing would be for the owner to get it home to its safe place then focus on the reports.
- I believe it would be best if they were allowed to take their dog away from the situation but legally required to file a report.
- If the dog bites another person they may be under stress. Moving the dog from the scene could prevent further injuries.

- The rule as stated is not clear enough. I assume that you are not seriously suggesting that dogs biting each other while playing (without causing injury) would trigger this rule but without clarity this is exactly what a malicious actor could cause to happen.
- If a person runs up to your dog and tries to pet or engage with your dog without asking the owner if it is ok, it is their fault for being bitten by the strange dog.
- My dog has been bit a few times by other dogs who were just telling him they wanted space. He was not seriously injured and no blood was drawn from the bites.
- It would make more sense for the owner to remove the dog from the situation first by appropriately containing them. Then a follow up should occur once the dog is appropriately contained either at home or in a vehicle.
- Exchange information. No need to get an officer there unless one party is not compliant.
- Impossible to reinforce.
- They may need to get the dog home to prevent other issues.
- This is a loaded question. What is the definition of a bite. Some people consider play fighting an attack. Some consider a hyper, jumping puppy an aggressive dog. When dealing with the public, the subject can be widely misconstrued or exaggerated. Certainly in the case of a severe injury, where purposeful aggression was the cause, there needs to be intervention.
- No
- Depends on the situation. What's the severity of the attack, are parties disagreeing on how events occurred, and are witnesses present. What would be an acceptable response time of authorities if they are expected to remain in the area. Is it safe for the dog to remain or do they need to be brought to a familiar place to destress or become calm
- Information can be shared to each party similar to a minor car accident.
- The situation and area is already high stress for the animal allow the person and offending animal to leave the scene as long as info was gathered.
- Staying at the scene can lead to further issues and would be emotionally difficult for the animals owner.
- Depends on the severity of the bite. Dogs get in spats often, and I think some owners will take this too seriously
- This puts added stress on the animal. Get info and address it at home
- Yes, but only if it is safe. If the dog continues to be a threat they should leave with the dog.
- If a person is attacked, the attacker is not required to remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer. An animal has animal instincts, therefore holding them to a higher standard of morality than we currently do for actual humans is simply unjust. I also do not believe that an enforcement officer is the correct person to respond in this type of situation. We should be funding people and not-for-profit organizations who know and work with animals so that they can respond accordingly.
- The dog is the responsibility of the owner and the owner gets to decide the action taken against the dog if an incident occurs
- If I dog bites a person/animal they are agitated and need to get to a familiar place to calm down.

- Only if absolutely necessary. If there's any loss or damage, exchange contact. Otherwise, it can be handled at the scene.
- The animal should not remain on scene, causing further aggravation to it. Information should be exchanged with victim or authorities via phone
- Depending on the severity of the bite, as dogs do use biting as a form of play with other dogs. If the bite is significant and not in human error then yes. Some dog owners would abuse the power of this enforcement so i have answered no
- A stressed or aggravated dog needs to get home where they feel asap. Contact information should be shared quickly so the dog can get to a safe place and the victim of the bite to get medical attention. Waiting for an enforcement officer could take WAY too long.
- With the tension and adrenaline involved in a bite incident, the aggressive need to be made safe for others in the area, which may not be at the scene of the incident. As long as someone at the scene has the owner's information, whether on camera or written, the dog owner should be allowed to make sure the aggressive dog will not injure anyone else.
- I think would be sufficient to exchange information ie) photo of drivers license and get their contact info
- The animal would have to stay at the scene too, which could stress the animal even further and potentially causing the animal to lash out again. The animal needs to leave to allow it to calm down.
- Take pictures of the bite (s), dogs involved and ID of the dog's owner/manager, have an online submission form. There is zero need to waste anyone's time waiting around for what could be hours for an officer to show up.
- Most times when a dog bites, its because it feels threatened. Best measure would be to remove the dog from the environment.
- It's [removed] should be all digs then I've seen way more bites and attacks from small dogs
- I do think that information should be exchanged, but I feel that it could make an already tense situation worse.
- If a dog is provoked by another dog, the owner has not provided consent for that person to pet the dog, etc this is another way to discriminate against "problem breeds"
- If a dog is becoming uncontrollable, staying at the scene means you have to stay at the scene with a dog that needs to be taken out of the scenario.
- The dog should be removed from the situation ASAP. Exchange contact info with the person who was bit
- Only if severe bites to other dogs. Dogs get in scuffles once in a while and typically looks and sounds worse than it is. They have their own social system and figure it out. Some people overreact and would insist the owner stay behind for insignificant bites. Biting people is not acceptable though by any means.
- I dont think you should limit this to one Breed TYPE, this question should be used in any and all breeds
- Too many variables for a black and white answer

- There is too much grey area around a "dog bite" - people who have a dogs teeth contact but not break skin could take this way out of hand.
- Remaining at the scene with a highly stressed / reactive dog just involved in an incident could be the worst thing for all parties. Owners should provide contact info / dog license info and be free to do what is necessary to remove their dog from the situation (into a vehicle, at home, etc.).
- The dog should be taken back to their home after sharing contact information with with the other owner
- I think they should absolutely exchange information but be able to leave to diffuse the situation.
- if a dog bit someone or another dog, keeping the dog on site would only stress it out further. Number should be exchanged for contact by authorities
- It happens. Just like fights with human. You should not have to call the cops and exchange information unless it causes damages that would cost vet attention
- That could take forever. A follow up or online complaint reporting process might be beneficial with follow ups.
- A dog will only bite if they feel threatened.if you dont want a dog to bite do not go near them or ask to pet them.by asking to pet a dog you are risking being bit, no matter what type of dog it is
- If someone comes up to my aggressive dog with warning this is their own fault.
- If the dog is behaving aggressively, it should not remain in the location where it can do more harm. The owner should be held accountable, but should be able to secure the animal for everyones safety
- depends on situation, talk to person without getting friggin law enforcement involved.
- Often can turn into a hostile situation. Best information is exchanged like in a car accident.
- You need to deal with actual problems in this city. Cut the [removed] budget, fire half of the staff, and deal with the drug crime.
- Contact Information should be shared at time of incident but if enforcement officer takes a long time to get there or if medical attention is required, the animal should be removed (ie. taken home) from the situation to prevent further incident and officer can go to owner's home for further information
- In the case of a dog walker or trusted friend this does not make sense. I also don't think bylaw needs to be involved in every situation, only extreme cases.
- This cannot be enforced and most dog owners are normal people who would stay and exchange info
- if the dog is stressed, making the owner (and therefore the dog) stay in the situation does not seem like the smartest move
- "No only because if the dog bit someone or another dog, keeping them in that situation will only make the dog more anxious and aggressive.
- Let's say I'm walking my dog alone, and my dog gets freaked out and bites another dog, what am I supposed to do with my dog when I need to exchange info with the other owner? The dogs need to be separated, and that is difficult if you need to get close to someone to exchange info.
- I do think that the dog owner should be responsible for any bills due to the attack, but I think it's ignorant to assume keeping a possibly aggressive dog at the scene is going to be productive. I think if the dog is too worked up for the person to stay there, then they should have to call into bylaw or 311 and provide their contact information for the victim."

- It's the responsibility of each owner to handle the situation. Bringing officers into the mix when they could be solving other issues is not efficient.
- For minor scuffs and aggressive dogs, often the most effective solution is to separate and leave. In more severe situations, I think contact information of all parties involved should be shared so they may speak to an enforcement officer but they should not have to remain at the scene.
- There should be a rule that the owner has to share their information with someone at the scene but as its usually a high stress time and environment the best course of action is to get the dog contained, if possible in a vehicle nearby but if unable than away from the scene is best.
- It's a bite get over it animals are animals...
- Severe bites Yes. But dogs will bite either too defend themselves or because they were prevoked or a clash with another dog. I do not believe a bite in itself equals a dangerous dog. There are so many other factors to take into consideration it is absolutely NOT black and White!
- I've seen many "bite" or aggression incidents at offleash parks and emotions and tempers flare wildly. The threat of violence seems to escalate very quickly and heatedly and often times the best course of action is immediate separation of both parties. Hanging around the scene waiting for police to arrive for what often amounts to a very insignificant event seems like forcing escalation of conflict. Sharing information or giving a license plate and allowing parties to separate and then police to determine intervention is best. I've also seen many bite accusations that have no blood or physical evidence of a bite, and requiring staying at the scene of an accusation seems counter productive
- "It depends on the situation. It may be better to get the animal contained or treat any injury immediately (in the event of a dog fight for example).
- For a person, I would agree, owner should remain at the scene, but another animal I don't necessarily agree with..."
- I believe it should be able to be agreed by both parties that law enforcement is not needed. It should be required if either party wants enforcement involved
- I agree that this should be the case if the dog severely bites a person (the bite needs medical attention) however, in less severe cases it is more important that the owner is able to quickly remove their dog from the situation to avoid any escalation or further injuries.
- I don't think 'remain at the scene;' rather an alternative such as report it to 311. Reasons being bitee might require medical/vet treatment immediately and also bitee might be too stressed if bitor remained on scene for fear of another attack. I think parties should be separated asap, with requirement that within 24 hrs. the bite is to be reported. Bitee can take pics of bitor owner and bitor and be able to submit them with report. Also having to remain at scene might take too much manpower on an emergency basis. Different subject, but I think license fees should be zero but that animals must be 'registered' with the City.
- numbers should be exchanged. The dog needs to be removed from the situation asap. Some peoples fear would make a unnecessary stressful impact.
- They should have a period of time to contact enforcement. When there is a dog incident, some people and pets will not be able to remain calm while waiting for enforcement.

- Having the owner remain at the scene so long as contact information is exchanged puts a higher risk that the dog may attack again and/or will not deescalate any emotional response by the owner, victim etc.
- Would you really want a dog and it's [removed] owner to remain at the scene to keep yourself in danger? Use your head
- I think it should be reported for sure but the scene of the attack could increase aggression in the dog. A nearby area, less populated, would probably be best
- If a dog bites another person or animal they are likely highly stressed and should not be made to remain in the stressful situation. Contact information should be shared and then the dog owner should get the dog home to calm down.
- People commit hit and run with vehicles all the time and that is certainly illegal. Time could be better spent on other initiatives.
- This leaves them 100 percent at fault. Dogs don't attack unless provoked. ~Dog trainer [personal information removed].
- Emotions are high. Information needs to be shared but the dog should not have to stay. Stress needs to be minimized
- It depends on the situation. Sometimes people get bit by dogs because they are not being respectful of the dog or situation. People should be as responsible as the dog and owner. If a dog bite is truly unprovoked the two people should discuss this issue without formal enforcement.
- If a dog is the aggressor, sometimes the safest next move is to remove the aggressive dog from the situation. I believe it should be mandatory for the dog owner to return to the scene within 30 minutes to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer.
- Enforcement of this would be difficult, especially if medical care is required for animal or person bitten.
- If my dog with no history of biting was protecting me from a bad actor I would want to get away from them.
- I would be concerned that the situation may be made worse by this rule. I support the intent of the rule (ensure contact is made with enforcement Office) but would be cautious in the implementation of the rule.
- removing the animal has to be a priority, allowing the owner to take the dog home before being questioned removes the dog from the situation to help calm everyone/thing involved.
- It should be decided between the "victim" and the "offender" whether or not they involve the authorities.
- If a dog is put in a situation where it feels the need to be protective, then it's for a reason.
- If the dog can be tamed in the situation. Many times it will be a single owner and the best situation is to remove the dog from the situation but that isn't possible in Thai scenario.
- Removing the dog from the scene is more important to safety than waiting on a civil servant.
- "If someone attacks me and I'm with my dad I'm not staying around after my dog bites them and makes it possible for us to get away from an attacker.

- NO I do not agree with this one"
- People are stupid and prevoke the dog bite
- If the dog is enraged, it may need to be taken from the scene, but there should be a clear way to get in contact with the owner. If the dog is not enraged, yes, they should need to remain at the scene.
- Will enforcement officers be able to come in a timely matter? Does playing and biting count?
- I think I information should be shared and animal should be taken home away from further confrontation
- Information should be shared but the owner should be removing the animal from the area to reduce the possibility of compounding the issues.
- An exchange of information between the owner and the victim or owner of the victim is sufficient
- I think information should be passed on, but waiting for An enforcement officer is ridiculous.
- Maybe the dog was protecting their owner and the dog could have been the victim too.
- Maybe we need to ask WHY the dog bit another person or animal. Dogs bite when they feel threatened. If a dog bites a person because they're causing the dog stress that IS NOT the dogs fault, it is the person who was bitten.
- Criminalization of any dog orndog breed is not axceptable. If a dog bite happens it should be the responsability of the owner and not a city official.
- Focus on real issues in the city. This is an absolute waste of tax payer dollars and I am ashamed to call you my city councilors.
- The burden of proof is on the crown. If an assault is committed, that's on you guys to go find them.
- Generally people are bit because they do not respect the dogs distance. Eg hands in the face without and intro. Some people want to take advantage of people at the cost of a dogs life and a huge lawsuit. I don't agree that my dog should be held accountable for being attacked by a stranger.
- Because it's up to the owners.
- I know of a case where an offender just gave a fake name and address and could never be contacted again. You can't MAKE a person stick around or show you I.D. Also I don't think we are required to carry I.D. at all times so the bylaw officer would have to follow the offender home. If you had to wait for a bylaw officer it might be -25 or +30 degrees.
- This is NOT enforceable.
- Because the term "bite" is subjective to an individual's interpretation. A playful mouthing of a dog may be addressed as a vicious bite. This is not as black and white as a vehicular accident.
- Exchange information and seek medical attention. Make a report later. This is not an event an officer needs to be on scene for unless there are bigger problems at hand
- Response time could be an issue and the victim would potentially need to seek treatment
- Dogs usually bite for a reason, ex. If they are provoked or feel threatened. If it bites for no reason- that it for the owner to train or seek training for their animal.
- No
- Because that's wasting time money and effort on more important matters.

- Dog bites are almost always caused by the person who is bitten antagonizing or attacking the dogs. Legislation like this is unfair to good dog owners.
- waiting for police can cause trauma for those involved as police may take a while to arrive. It can also increase tensions between both parties which can increase the tension the dog is feeling and increases the risk of another attack due to stress. I agree information should be passed, but waiting for police should be done in separate locations
- Removing the animal from the situation is the safest action.
- The dog should be removed from the area, and contact information should be left with the victim.
- This rule is too generic and sweeping. Was this suggestion based on an isolated incident? There is no room for discretion here. It is wide open for abuse, over-reaction, etc.
- It depends on the severity of the bite. If the bite breaks the skin or otherwise injures the animal or person (e.g., broken bone, strain or sprain, etc), then yes, the owner should stay, provide contact information and speak with an enforcement officer. It is generally courteous and ethical to check with the other person to ensure that they or their animal is OK, that they can access medical assistance if necessary, and assume responsibility for the vet bill.
- Why would you require a so called dangerous dog to stay at a scene yes exchange contact info make sure they can be contacted by forcing them to stay at a possibly bad situation makes no sense
- if a dog is an issue and can't be restrained after causing a problem, they might create further problems
- If the bite is severe contact information should be given
- I do, but only for human bites
- Human yes. Other animal no. Dogs who bite are not necessarily the instigator
- Dog may be aggressive and need to be removed from the situation, may not be that person's dog, that person could leave information to be contacted at a later date.
- No. Because in a lot of situations these are hear say scenarios. I'd also hate for the situation to be escalated as I don't believe enforcement officers would be there in a timely fashion.
- Hard to enforce and may not be safe to stay put if an injury or aggression is taking place
- The priority should be making the area safe for everyone including first responders. Get the dog out of there and secure. Contact police to report where you are so they can come to you. If you do not contact police then fines are issued.
- The dog should be removed from the area as it will be on high alert and anxious. Place the dog in the vehicle or walk it back home. The dog would have been triggered and needs to be brought to their safe space.
- Sometime a dog bite in self defense if the dog or the human is being assaulted there should be no obligation to stay in a dangerous situation both the dog and the human deserve to feel safe
- It depends on the severity of the situation. But the law enforcement does not need to be involved in every single case.
- Dogs bite other dogs all the time. - Dog owners know this. Wasting the time of an enforcement officer to come down to analyze that a dog was displaying dominance? This is a natural thing that animals do. Or a person giving a dog a treat and the dog accidentally nipping at the hand - The owner should wait around to report this? No. I think the laws are fine the way they are and work well as these things don't happen often enough and if they do happen it is easy to report.

- Keeping the owner at the scene means keeping the dog at the scene which could be a bad situation. I would support the owner needing to leave contact information before leaving the scene.
- Dogs just got in a fight but you want them to stay together and wait? Recipe for more dog fighting
- I think this could cause more issues than it would cure. Keeping victim and dog at the scene while waiting on the city to respond could cause more harm.
- The dog would need to be taken out of the situation that has led to the aggression. They should exchange info before leaving if possible.
- That means the dog must also remain there which could be stressful for those involved and the dog. I would support necessary follow up.
- Sometimes if a dog bites it's because another dog has provoked it or they are protecting their owners. You should not have to stay if another person's dog has caused the incident to happen.
- I think contact information should be shared, and if necessary an officer may get involved after the incident, or the victim may file a report.
- It's not the dog
- I understand wanting them to take accountability but also if your dog bites someone, you should probably remove your dog from around people.
- I think it depends on severity. If a bite is hard enough to seek medical attention, absolutely.
- Emotional situation and could escalate even more. Give all contact details and wait for enforcement to go to owner's residence.
- If the dog attacked somebody he's clearly agitated and staying at the area would further aggravate it
- If the dog is injured they don't have time to sit and wait.
- Both parties should be required to exchange contact information and take photos if the incident is minor and the victim should contact bylaw to report while the other individual takes their pet home to de-escalate the situation and wait for bylaw to contact. If there is severe injury/violence requiring an ambulance or police to be called, then the owner of the offending pet should remain until emergency services arrive to give a statement and contact information.
- I think it's best to remove the aggressive dog and de-escalate the situation. Leaving a dog in an already uncomfortable scenario you risk a second bite.
- What happens in the case of a dog walker is in custody of the animal, does the owner then have to come out to the scene of the incident?
- The first job of a dog owner whose dog had just bitten is to remove it from the situation to stop any further aggression.
- If the bite or attack is bad maybe
- Removal of the animal to prevent tension and stress in animal and people. Provide contact to be followed up with. Keeping people and animals in high tension situations is not setting anyone up for success.
- I think this depends on the situation, information should be exchanged, however the dog will most likely be scared and staying at the scene could exacerbate the situation.

- I agree with everything except having to talk to an enforcement officer at the time of the bite. If officer needs to step in, i believe it should be after the fact. I don't trust police officers can make best decisions for dogs however.
- In many cases a 'victim' has not exercised proper etiquette with a dogs owner. They ignore the owners warnings and touch or approach the dog when told not to. And then they use bias against a breed to have it wrongfully charged when something happens to them because of their own actions. The most dangerous and angry dogs are usually little breeds yet because they don't have the power to do real damage they're laughed off and ignored when they attack.
- Bc yhey would seize my dog
- It should be treated like a motor vehicle accident. If personal information was exchanged, there is no need to wait for an official.
- After a dog a bite the dog needs to be removed immediately. If a dog bites one would assume the dog is asking for space from the situation, if they do not get that immediately one could presume the next interaction of that type may be more severe. If a situation allows a dog to be separate while the owner stays then fine, but that is not always going to be possible. If two dogs are lunging at each other in a park how are the owners to stay and wait for an officer and keep the dogs separated while they continue to escalate and not expect worsening behaviours
- "I think it depends on the situation. If it was a minor accident that was out of the owners control and the victim is okay, they decide it is okay, I don't think further enforcement needs to come into place where a dog is taken away from their owners for a minor accident.
- If the person is in obvious pain, then the person should wait around until there is bylaw."
- I think that dog bite incidents can become chaotic and leaving the scene can be the best/only way of de-escalating a situation. The owner of the dog should be required to exchange license & contact information before leaving.
- It's the owners responsibility to exchange information the city and bylaw officers don't need to be involved
- how do you currently enforce the requirements in this situation - how would you enforce this that doesnt create conflict between citizens?
- A lot of times, from what I have witnessed, in public places the dog has often been provoked or his space not respect resulting in a bite or something similar. It's not the dogs fault and often people do t listen when you ask them to stay back or give space. They insist their dog or child is friendly and just wants to say hello and that is where the problem lies. If you can't respect space when asked to stay back then the owner shouldn't have to stay behind or give any information. Everyone should have the right to use outdoor spaces regardless of any issue an animal may have as they could be using the outdoor space for training and therapy reasons and it can be done if people respect boundaries
- Information can be provided in other ways, animal enforcement wait times are long.
- If a dog goes to the extent of biting it is best to remove the dog from the situation ASAP and go home. Staying when a dog is in a scared state can worsen this.

- I believe the person should provide drivers license and phone number to persons involved, allow their dog and their own picture to be taken for information purposes, however they should be bringing the dog home so as another person is not effected.
- Cuz everyone is going to fight/escalate; get your information from the other person and get out.
- Sometimes it's best to remove a distressed pet from the situation. As a responsible pet owner 1 , you should be offering help to the injured party, 2, provide your contact info for follow up 3, remove your pet from the environment where the incident occurred
- If an animal attacks in a place its probably because it felt scared or threatened in that area. Why would you keep the animal in that situation
- "My answer is dependent on the situation:
- No: If the dog is protecting its owner from someone threatening them, they should be allowed to seek immediate safety.
- Yes: If it is an unprovoked bite, it could be a symptom of a physical or behavioral problem so in that case my answer would be yes."
- Share info with endorcement officer yes but not with other party to remove harrassment or reprisals. Not fair to animal owner to have to remain at location if dog will be seized.
- If the person or animal that was bitten doesn't have to stay at the scene of the incident, I'm not sure there's any reason the dog owner cant be contacted at a later time.
- It is important for the owner to regain control of the dog and sequester it. As long as they leave contact information and make themselves available later that should be fine.
- This goes against the fundamental rights and freedoms in the Canadian Bill of Rights, which is a far higher authority than any statute you can pass.
- How the hell would you enforce that?
- "I want to say it depends.

- If there is a fight between dogs and it's no big deal I think both parties should be able to leave. If one dog viciously attacks another dog I also don't think they should stick around or the incident will keep happening."
- I could see why a dog owner would want to remove the dog from the area if it were to bite. To prevent any further harm to the dog or person that was bitten. Also, the "attacking" dog could have also been provoked and led to it defending itself.
- The owner should provide contact information, but not be required to remain at the scene of an incident until and enforcement officer arrives
- Both the dog and the owner would be stressed and more likely to escalate. They should be in a controlled environment at least, but required to report the incident.
- Sharing of contact information if important if vet fees are required.
- If it's life threatening go to the vet and exchange information
- It may be a matter of continued safety for the owner, the dog, others involved.

- If the owner is present, I would support it, but in my experience it is more often the case that the owner is not present when an incident occurs.
- Removing the dog from the situation to ensure no one else is hurt is important. Forcing the owner to stay may force an out of control dog to continue to be in a situation where others or the dog may be injured.
- A human is smarter than a dog, as an owner of such breeds, I believe that if a person who is scared of dogs like that should take precautions to not engage with them or the owner in any way and should respect the animal's personal space and not provoke them in any way. These animals require special care and needs more than other breeds or species and should be respected and not tampered with. I believe that all bites and attacks occur due to poor human understanding of such animals and stupid human actions. People are the problem, not the dogs. The people should be trained and taught that not every dog has such a happy personality and that not every dog wants to say hello to them or be pet by someone who is not of immediate family. Again it is the people that are the problem, not the animals.
- "it depends already of the bite. Example: dog nips at his mother dog not causing any damage= no
- Dog shreds skin of a child= yes"
- Info should be shared but if the dog is aggressive it needs to leave the area to decompress, not stay where the stressors are.
- I have heard of instances where a dog has scratched another dog in a play fight and then tries to bill the owner for vet costs unrelated. Some people abuse these situations.
- If a dog has bitten someone you need to remove it from that situation. However I do feel like their contact information should be available if the damage done to the other animal or dog requires a vet bill so that it will go on their insurance.
- People should be responsible for damage their pet causes. But if the damage is minor i don't see the need for an enforcement officer.
- If the dog bites a person, yes. If there is an altercation with another dog I do not think so, unless it is a serious incident. Our dog has been bitten at the park before and also bit that dog. Both owners worked to separate the dogs and leave immediately. There needs to be a clear definition of when you stay for bylaw and when you don't. There also needs to be onus put on an owner that is not minding their dog. If their dog is not under their control and they are not nearby and that dog instigates an altercation, that is an issue, especially if it means that their dog is the one hurt in the altercation. They were not minding their dog. I have seen this so many times at off leash parks. Personally, I can tell you that I would not wait for bylaw due to the fact that you have BSL language used in an above question which furthers the public's misunderstanding of those breeds and spreads fear of them. If I'm afraid that my dog could be targeted or seized due to their breed, I will not wait for bylaw and I would not allow someone to take my dog. BSL has been proven to be ineffective and is ridiculous and I can't believe that the city would consider this on any level. The language should reflect that of targeting irresponsible owners regardless of breed.
- Wouldn't you want to get the dog out of there?

- Dogs bite to play, and communicate. It should not be the owners responsibility to wait for a by-law officer if another dog owner believes "play" is an aggressive behavior. Further, this would simply become a he-said-she-said situation as both parties will have different opinions about the situation, should a bite occur.
 - I think most people would be afraid their dog will be put down or declared vicious even if there were extenuating circumstances and would flee. Trying to enforce this would be difficult and rather pointless.
 - Having them stay together doesn't make sense, there's clearly been an escalation and often the safest thing would be for both parties to leave the area and deal with it afterwards.
 - Within reason. A dog is not a car, so for the dog's safety and well being it should be taken away from the scene by the owner. But the owner should stay close enough to be able to report at the scene if necessary. Exchanging information with the effected party should be enough.
 - It would depend on the incident. If an owner's dog accidentally bites a dog who has been persistent in displaying annoying and threatening behaviour to your dog, given warnings and the other dogs owner has neglected to take control of his/her dog and has received a nip or bite then No. If a person or dog (other than circumstances previously stated) and certainly requires immediate medical or veterinary attention then Yes.
 - Some issues and bites are extremely minor and this would be a major waste of resources and time
 - If it is minor I do not feel that sharing contact information is necessary
 - "I believe it is important to share contact information. However if not a major bite I feel it is just added stress/work on the law enforcement system to come to the scene quickly for non-urgent cases. If no urgent medical attention is required I don't believe it is necessary to wait at the scene.
- In addition in the case of a small child/person with a fear of dogs it may cause more trauma for the person to remain so close to the dog after the incident. This is ONLY if it is not a major incident."
 - If it is a minor bite then no. If it is significant injury all information should be exchanged so when an investigation is done then they can talk with an officer. If it's a heated arrangement staying around will only upset the dogs involved and owners.
 - There is not enough information about this proposed policy to possibly support it. What is the purpose of making the dog owner stay? What happens? Are victims required to stay as well? Witnesses to substantiate the claim? How long will this process take?
 - just share info with the involved party. Same as a traffic incident.
 - depends on the context. Why the dog bites.
 - Dogs need to decompress away from the incident. The owner should be accessible, but keeping everyone together will result in another incident. Maybe they separate but remain in the area?
 - Depends on how the dog is reacting, it can be worse for it to stay
 - Why keep the dog at the scene, which would be stressful. Instead the owners should have to provide their information to the necessary person & be allowed to move their dogs away from the situation.

- Cyclists are not required to stay at the scene when they cause an accident or damage. Why would pet owners be required to?
- Leave their contact info so they can remove the animal hastily
- That can cause more harm than good how would u feel if a dog bit your dog it would start a scene of vigilantism, vindication, and violence sometimes owner vs owner
- Bite is a very general term and can include near misses and air snaps - this is very vague and could result in owners being less likely to walk their dogs or have them interact with others / socialize / get exercise (for fear of repercussions) which could actually increase the instance of negative behaviour because the dogs would not be as well socialized. As well, biting is often the last step after a series of calming signals (warning signs that the dog is uncomfortable) are ignored. Therefore, requiring the owner to stay would not reduce bite incidents - the focus should be on education rather than enforcement. Most owners will remain if the bite is serious.
- Sharing contact information is fine, but they shouldn't need to wait for an official
- Sharing information should be the extent that is required by the owner of a dog that has bitten a person or animal. The person who had been bit is not always in a mindset that would be safe to continue spending more time with for the dog owner that has bitten the dog or person.
- They should be required to share their contact info with the party involved to be included in the report for enforcement for follow up.
- How long would they be required to wait? There needs to be more information.
- If the dog is already agitated it is not prudent to make the owner (and consequently the agitated dog) at the location where drama is occurring
- I have been bitten by dogs - I didn't understand dog etiquette and it was my fault. Others who have been bitten may not be so gracious. There's an assumption that dogs that bite are problem dogs. The dog that has bitten is not necessarily the only problem. There are a number of reasons a dog may bite a person or animal. If the dog is provoked to bite, the dog is still considered to be problematic even if it may have been provoked to do so by, for example, a poorly behaved dog. The scene of the incident may not be safe for the dog owner. Accusations may escalate and the situation may grow heated, resulting in further conflict.
- it is more important to get the animals separated therefore it should be the owner that would have to take it away.
- Define "if necessary" and then maybe. Must be clear cut situations in which this rule would apply
- I think it is best to remove the dog and owner from an emotional situation and give everyone the space needed to calm down
- If the two owners have exchanged information that should be enough. The officer can contact or meet the owners if needed.
- Because if their dog has not calmed down yet, how do you expect it to wait for the appropriate measures to be taken. Give your information and leave, wait to discuss further measures when the dog has been taken home.
- The information should be given to the victim

- Dogs bite and play all the time. If this was to come into effect, would a person be expected to stand in -30 waiting for a bylaw officer to come and decide that what happened wasn't that serious? If an incident is serious, a person could take out their phone, take a picture of the dog and the owner, and post it to a park specific city board to file a complaint and report an incident.
- "These are animals, not children, animals. They bite, bark, run, and play but they don't know that it's wrong or bad most of the time when they do bite usually they do because they are 1. Protecting 2. Playing. 3 confused . 4. Scared
- The owner should be able to look at the situation and decided what the next best option is."
- "As long as you've spoken to everyone involved. There's no need to call police. That's ridiculous and a waste or resources.
- Trying to have restrictions on pit bulls is completely bull.
- Get ready for a rage"
- The person may need to remove their dog for the safety of others, but could return after that.
- It may be very difficult to keep the dog in a situation for a prolonged period of time where tensions will likely be high. Dangerous
- The best way to defuse a situation is often to leave. It seems perfectly acceptable to exchange basic information and leave to safely secure animal.
- "Because 99% of issues are non-issues. We don't need to waste resources on this! Exchange numbers if necessary. Or
- Grab their drivers license number."
- Contact information should be shared and the animal removed from the situation to avoid further aggravation.
- Put simply, enforcement of this just doesn't make enough sense to me in all cases.
- If anything, information should be reported and an enforcement officer should go to BOTH parties houses and see their living conditions to see if they are actually fit to be taking care of animals
- There is no clarity in "a dog bites a person or other animal". There are disagreements at dog parks, and I know my dog has gotten scratched and bitten - but I'm not going to make the other person hang around for a minor incident. There were times we didn't even notice until we got home it was so minor.
- Depends on the severity of the bite. You need better survey questions because these questions are far too open ended. Dogs sometimes play bite with other dogs and people without hurting them. These incidents are subjective and should be treated individually.
- People are bullies and mean. I would be supportive of the owner providing their contact information and then removing their dog from the scene, as people feel entitled to attack the perpetrator, and that increased state of upset can cause a dog to become more reactive as their owner's anxiety increases. For victims, education about what to do, possibly getting a license plate, photos of the offender, dog description would be helpful.
- Way too broad. I find that these bylaws will be used to demonize dogs. What stats are there to promote such changes?

- Information needs to be shared however the dog that bites should be taken home where it is potentially more calm
- Dogs get stressed. There's a huge probability that staying at the scene would make it worse. Just like humans needing a break/breather, removing the animal from the area is the action.
- No i dont think they need to stay at the scene but they do need to provide contact information.
- It could become unsafe to remain at the scene. Both people and the animals involved could escalate further resulting in more injuries. Between weather, traffic, and aggressive dogs it is better for the people involved to get somewhere safe. Information should be exchanged.
- I have had a dog bite me at a dog park. Waiting for enforcement officer would be waist of my time and the officer's.
- Both parties may need to attend to their animals or themselves. It should be sufficient to share contact information with each other and, if phones are available, pictures of dog, owner, injures.
- If alone, the owner would need to remove the animal to a safe location.
- Less govt rules mind your own damn business.
- Keeping the dog at the scene will cause more stress on the dog and other dogs there. They can pass info on, or witnesses can call them in next time they see them.
- They will have the dog present with them. Share information and take dog home. Then have enforcement officer involved.
- depends on severity of a bite. if someone approaches your dog without permission I do not feel it is the dog or owners responsibility to ensure the uninvited guest does not approach.
- If the dog just bit someone (no matter what breed) you should remove them from the situation
- Only if necessary not all dog bites require a big scene
- N/A
- My answer is yes and no depending on the severity of the bite, if it's just enough to break the skin or less then no. They can exchange details if need be but there is no reason if the person or animal that got bit isn't seriously injured.
- I'd the animal is angry enough to bite, the situation likely requires that the dog be removed to avoid further issues.
- I literally cannot believe you guys are even considering this. WHY do we pay taxes to you [removed].
- This is ridiculous. HOW WOULD YOU CALM A DOG DOWN AFTER AN ATTACK AND WAIT FOR AN OFFICER? Remaining at the scene increases the chance of another attack and increases the liability for the owner of said dog.
- Depends on how severe the situation is. Dogs shouldn't be judged and owners should know how to handle their pets.
- Share contact information but to force them to stay will only cause the people involved as well as the dog(s) involved more damage than good.
- It depends if the individuals involved can resolve it on their own
- They should separate the animals immediately and then get info traded.
- Enforcement officers have little to no training on the issue to begin with. They are not equipped to mediate situations between a heightened situation

- These incidents have a huge potential to escalate. Also the dog could still be agitated.
- It would be safest for the dog to be brought home but I believe information should be exchanged so they can speak with enforcement officers afterwards.
- The owner should be required to provide all personal information required but should not be expected to stay at the scene. It's a very emotional Adrenalin inducing experience, the owner should be able to go somewhere safe and private.
- I believe exchange of information is necessary, however, when there has been dog aggression it may not always be possible to "remain on the scene" in a calm and safe manner. I would support a By-law that requires owners to exchange information with each other as well as with witnesses if necessary, but tensions can run high and may cause further escalation between humans and animals.
- People have lives to live. The person or animal that was injured can exchange information and then carry on their day if a by-law officer needs to inquire more information they can contact the owner via the other person's contact.
- "This is murky water. Because if someone's dog nips a person and the person says everything is fine. Generally you would want to get the offending dog away from that person because it's something about them the dog doesn't like. Just to have an officer knock on that person's door a few hours later with a fine over something that was a non-event."
- On the other hand. You can't just have people leaving if they have an animal that is going around seriously injuring people.
- It's a tough call because you know some people will take advantage of the system no matter what you do."
- I think you should provide your information and bring your animal directly home. The animal may have bit due to distress?
- Stop bullying dog owners and stop making up new rules and regulations to justify your jobs and increase your bureaucracy
- Situational
- If the intent is to get the dogs away I don't think staying at the scene is the first priority.
- Waste of city resources
- I think it would depend on the bite; was this a little nip or a large bite causing harm to the dog/person.
- The dog should be taken somewhere quiet - maybe put in a car (if available). Reactive dogs are often traumatised by bites too, so removing them and allowing them to calm down is probably safer.
- Depending on the severity. If it is a small nick that just scratched the surface and was provoked, then no. If it caused significant damage to the person or dog, then yes, but that does not mean they deserve a fine if they don't.
- If medical attention is required information should be swapped and the due process handled after treatment received. Health and safety over fines and punishments.
- Exchange of information is sufficient.
- I think they should be able to go secure their pet somewhere then come back

- Pass information along. Remove dog from the scene and make sure all parties have seemed medical attention
 - Could lead to many false calls of bites if someone is just upset at a dog.
 - Why are small dogs not being considered. They're worse than any big dog
 - If a dog has bit someone, it should be removed from the scene so that it does not continue to be a threat. The owner should leave with the dog and return, call in to 311 to advise where they will be, or leave information at the scene with their details.
 - I believe its best to share information yes however, getting the person and dogs out of a volatile situation as fast as possible is best. if enforcement is needed they can come to the parties involved
 - Take the agitated dog away first but yes, must share info.
 - An owner should be held accountable however, its often in the best interest of the dogs to separate them right away to prevent further issues. This may require leaving the scene.
 - "If a person that is not the dogs owner is trying to play with a "dangerous" dog and does something to the dog that the dog doesn't like and the dog then bite the person to defend itself, I don't think the owner of the dog needs to give any contact information. If a person is scared of said "dangerous" dogs, than that individual shouldn't interact with any dogs.
- If the bite was meant for harm, the owner of the dog knows how society views their "dangerous" dog and will act according."
 - Grown adults should be responsible enough to exchange contact information on their own and don't need an enforcement officer to do so.
 - Life is rough, people get bitten by dogs, if it's that bad then you need to go to the hospital and not get that person's contact information, and I'll wager it was the person who got bittens fault and not the owner, and if it is a "feral dog" that's real worrisome there isn't going to be an owner to harass for contact information
 - Could be dangerous with humans being capable of escalation as well. Trade information though!
 - I think we have enough bi-laws & rules in this city. I give people the benefit of doubt that they'll do the right thing without Big Brother's assistance.
 - This is not a criminal offence - could lead to potential safety issue for both dog owner and victims - other means can be used to obtain dog owner information
 - Many dog interactions are situational and one off situations. Unless unprovoked. The police do not need to be involved in this.
 - This will allow citizens to "Detain" other citizens and will further allow the police to abuse their power, they arent regulated to begin with. Please try to extrapolate the results of a bylaw. IS this your first bylaw?? Damn.
 - Removing the dog from the scene of the accident may be the only thing that can calm them. Why keep them in a vulnerable position?

- People would use minor nips from a dog that cause no actual physical damage as an excuse to have someone charged or investigated. Resulting in the dog being at risk of seizure and owner getting fined with restrictions put on said dog for no real reason.
- How long would you expect someone to wait around if no one is available exchanged information if there is a person present who is not bylaw
- I do think it depends on the severity. A couple of my dogs have been bitten over the years in a minor scuffle that was broken up immediately with no long lasting damage or vet intervention required.
- If it is safe for the animals and owners to do so Yes they should stay at the scene. IF the animals or person needs medical attention they should seek that then file a report.
- no no no.
- a responsible person would. do really think that a loser that has not control over his/her dog is going to stick around because there is a by-law that says so? There needs to be a huge penalty if they do not,
- It not always safe (especially for women) to be required to stay on the scene.
- Most dog owners will stay but rules regarding that are too dictatorial. Dogs are like kids. Is there a rule that when 2 kids have a squabble that everyone waits for police? I have seen too many times - people over-reacting to an incident and grossly exaggerating the incident. A man claimed to be attacked one time by a pitbull when actually the tear in his pants was from one of the dog's claws...he got jumped up on by two dogs (his and another) that had a squabble. It was a non-incident but the owner of the pitbull stayed and the bylaw officer was threatening to take her dog! It was absolutely ridiculous! I saw the whole incident and it was nothing! The guy made it into something just because his pants got ripped.
- They should leave contact information but remaining at the scene especially if the dog is still with them seems inflammatory
- In theory, yes, however I don't trust the judgement of the Calgary SPCA staff.
- If you are a responsible dog owner, then you need to provide that information, however, being on the scene could cause other issues that could escalate into violence.
- Taking information should be enough.
- Most dogs that bite other dogs are playing or if there is aggressive behaviour it should be dealt with, between the people present, bringing more chaos to a chaotic scene is stressful for animal and owner and may cause more issues that could have been avoided entirely. I do believe that in some serious situations that you should meet with an officer outside of the situation.
- it would depend on the situation. I think if owner information is exchanged that is OK. This could problematic in real-life situations. What happens if the person or animal have to go to the hospital? What if its 100 degrees outside, what if it's after hours? What if all by-law officers are busy? What is the expected response rate for officers? What if there is no damage cause by the bite? Say, torn pant leg? We dont require people to wait at the scene of an accident for minor incidents as long as the information is exchanged, how can we expect people to wait for response for bylaw??? And in the case of a bad bite that person or animal should be seeking medical attention as soon as possible.

- If the dog has attacked it may be difficult for the owner and dog to stay in one place until someone arrives
- They need to get the dogs away from doing anymore harm first then return
- This is not necessarily realistic as when dogs play there are different degrees of biting (Ex: nips). Hard to enforce.
- This should be between owners. If the bite is severe enough to require medical attention for either person or animal, then it should be necessary.
- owner needs to take responsibility, no authority needed
- I support this, but I think it would be very hard to enforce.
- That person and/or their dog might be a danger to the victim if they have to stay on scene. Some instances might be better for the victim to get away asap.
- It is likely that if the owner remains, so does the dog. After a biting incident, the stresses, screaming, crying, etc is not going to remove the tension from the situation
- The owner should give information, but it might be hard to remain on the scene with the dog.
- If a child misbehaves in public and creates a fool of them selves are you going to send them to obedience training
- No
- [removed]
- There is no reason to remain at the scene when they can be contacted.
- If a situation of human biting occurs the trauma to all parties is severe, and to calm down and bring the dog back safely it's best to leave for a safe place (home) and keep the dog and others safe.
- If the people involved sort it out there is no need for bylaw involvement .
- I think the most important thing at that point is to remove the dog to diffuse the situation. This can't always be done by waiting at the scene.
- Only if it is a severe bite.
- Keeping the owner at the scene means keeping the dog at the scene, which could result in another attack. The dog should be removed from the situation
- It is possible that the owner, seeing that they are possibly the cause of the problem, can escalate the problem. This might be unsafe for others involved. It might be safer to follow up when the opposing parties are not at the same location.
- This question seems like a trap ... if the dog became "œvicious" because it first was attacked (eg. Dogs at a dog park are interacting aggressively with eachother and a human who is trying to break them up gets bitten) the dog may need to go to an animal hospital for wound treatments and the owner should be allowed to go with their pet. I do not understand why an owner would leave the scene unless absolutely necessary
- The owner has a responsibility to remove the dog from dangerous situations. Remaining on scene would require, in many cases, the dog to be on scene as well - which could severely worsen the situation.

- If time does not allow. (I.e. they have to get to work or an apt) They can have the other party involved take down their contact info. (Take pic of drivers licence) and have bylaw officer call them later
- I have a reactive dog. Although he has never been involved an incident that required an enforcement officer, if something did happen I would want to take my dog home. I often walk my dogs alone so having to deal with the dog while waiting for an officer would be very stressful. Would make more sense to leave contact information and follow up without the dog present.
- I do not think that OUR city has the best interest for our animals. *(obviously with the pitbull questions you guys are literally on some REALLY good [removed]) THE peace officers that I have encountered ALWAYS demonize dogs and cats. They ALWAYS will take the side of the person who got bit. It will not matter if the said person is beating the [removed] out of the dog as long as the human is safe that is all that matters. You guys have [removed] lost it.
- Because people lie about what dog bit them, and people do not understand that just because a dog is big and black doesn't mean it's a dangerous dog.
- This type of enforcement officer intervention is often not needed. Dogs and people work it out more often than they don't. I understand that there are a number of serious 'bite and run' type incidences in the City each month, but it is not the norm and we should not build our system around the smallest number of incidences.
- Keeping the dog at the scene could escalate the situation further. Requiring the owner to stay would mean the dog would likely stay too.
- Information must be exchanged like a car accident thats under 2000.
- The owner should be required to pass on all contact information to the victim. Keeping a victim, the dog in question and that animals owner in the same location with heated tensions could end up causing far more issues. And I'd assume would be very unnerving for the victim themselves.
- It's up to both parties. If both parties would like to share information or not. Let the people involved make decisions.
- How is that helpful? Leaving both parties on site including the animal that is likely upset and distraught and unstable. Dumb question. Get the information from the party the same way you would in a car accident. Both parties aren't required to wait on scene.
- The best thing to do at the time may be to put the dog away and locked up safely, It would be difficult to stand there and hold a dog whose lunging and wanting to attack Kama that could lead to the dog getting loose again and continuing the fight.which means the person would have to leave the scene but they should not be allowed to leave the scene without giving their contact information,
- Because many years ago I was forced to wait for 4 hours in the dark and cold sitting on the grass alone and I was a young adult. Crying waiting for 4 hours for the Calgary police to show up!!! It was traumatizing and awful! Leave your info with a bystander and get the animal home. Or call it in with your address and have the officers meet you at your home..this was such a disgrace when it happened to me.
- Contact info should be required however in an attack situation you may need to leave to go to the vet etc and not have time to wait for an officer

- Any jerk can claim anything if they don't like the look of your dog. My neighbor yells at me that it's illegal to let my dog pee at the park (where she can see from her deck). I can't trust people to not lie about getting bitten. People are prejudiced against pit bulls.
- Share information, yes. Remain at the scene, no. That's a waste of time considering the response time is never quick.
- I believe the dog owner should get the animal into a safer location, then come back to discuss/ deal with issue.
- If a dog bites a person yes I agree. However My own dog was bit by another dog. That's where is disagree. My dog missed body language from the other dog asking him to not bother him. He corrected my dog, and we moved on. It depends on the bite. If they bite the backend it's a warning and basic body language for dogs. If they go for the underside of the neck however that aggression. People need to be educated. Otherwise you will have a thousand calls a day from noisy neighbours who think a dog is aggressive when they are just playing or teaching their fellow dog manners.
- Response times are atrocious already in Calgary, when a bite occurs the dog is usually in a very high mental state and remaining there isn't going to help calm the dog down and could lead to further incidents. Share address and have the officer meet them at the safe place instead.
- I believe they should share the information but not have to remain on scene until bylaw arrives. The dog should be removed from the situation as it is likely wound up and could be traumatizing to the victim or result in more bites.
- If there is an incident. It makes sense to get the offending animal away from all interactions that may increase risk of further problem.
- The dog that has bitten someone may be very agitated and should not remain close. The owner should exchange contact information but not stay to wait for an enforcement officer. The office can call the owner.
- They should have the freedom to leave if it doesn't cause damage. Too many people would use this as an excuse to keep owners there for no reason.
- A dog bite situation could quickly escalate if people stay at the scene. Better to exchange information and talk to each party independently.
- Person yes but not animal as it could be in defence.
- Often it is best to remove the dog immediately from the situation to prevent further escalation. Regardless of a provoked or unprovoked bite. For example, if a dog bites another dog, both dogs need to be removed from the situation. The bitten dog (if minor) will continue to feel vulnerable and may become defensive to other dogs. The dog that has bitten would also need to be removed from the situation otherwise they may stay in a state of mind (fearful, aggressive, unsure/insecure, etc) that could lead to another attack.
- This may cause more stress for the dogs if they are unable to be removed from the situation.
- The owner should be responsible but sometimes its in the best interest of everyone to leave/remove the dog from the scene.
- Could you provide clarification on what "necessary" means?
- If someone is bitten they were most likely in the wrong

- I don't think that bylaw will get there in a effective amount of time. Also if the animal is severely injured it's best they they go to the vet and many good owners would opt to follow the victim to the vet. I think the goal would be to share contact information, not stay at the scene.
- All scenarios no. Some people are bad / antaganoize dogs and dogs may bite as a warning signal but not actually to bring pain. This causes the pontential for a he said she said situation and the person bit can say whatever they want with no proof. People should be expected to leave dogs who are not theirs alone. If everyone has their dog on leash and people understand STRANGERS boundaries no one would get hurt. People should not believe any dog is theirs to pet, people don't try to play with strangers kids so people should not try to play with strangers dogs.
- Depends on severity of bite. Dogs do play bite.
- Contact information must be shared, including handler information (ie dog walker or owner), and license number of dogs involved. If there are witnesses to the incident (including animal behaviour prior to the incident), their contact information should be obtained. If medical attention is required, after the information is exchanged, the dogs should be assessed by a veterinarian immediately, if necessary. Staying on scene for an enforcement officer isn't necessary due to the dynamic situation. There is potential for a second incident or human altercation if people have to remain in the same area until enforcement arrives.
- Call me and find out.
- I feel that the laws expect dogs to be perfect and humans to be able to do what they want and have little to no understanding of the creatures they live with. If a human tries to touch a strange dog without the owners permission, the responsibility should be on the human not the dog. Dogs are held to a higher standard than humans. Not all dogs love being touched by strange people! I would support a law that included more responsibility on the humans that also included the above. Dogs should have more rights and protections. They are animals and not toys.
- Sometimes it is best for everyone including the animal if they are removed from the situation. If I was bit by a dog who was acting aggressive I would not want to wait with the dog for an officer.
- I support this in theory however would worry that the interpretation of some might extend to incidental behaviour while playing so the bylaw would need to be very specific.
- Dog should be removed However information should be shared.
- I think people dont always need an officer involved. in minor situations people can handle it on there own. if some one is refusing to provide info or refused to be accountable then call an officer
- I would not want that rule to interfere if the dog also needed medical care
- Depends on the severity of the bite and the response of the owner.
- There are cases where a dog is truly protecting itself. There have been times where the other owner is being careless.
- Rule wording needs to be modified. Giving contact info should be mandatory but leaving may be the best way to diffuse an emotional situation.
- The enforcement officer should meet them at thier home
- I believe owning dogs are similar to having kids. If kids were to get into a brawl, parents talk it out and figure it out. Not call 911. Vicious dogs shouldn't be in off leash parks.

- If a dog is exhibiting that behaviour, it is stressed. It should be able to go wherever it feels more comfortable.
- I think it dependant on the severity of the bite. If not vet care is required o do not think this is nessecary.
- Because the system is not fair right now. Especially for some breeds that are miss understood
- Sometimes the owner must leave for the safety of others. They should make their best effort to provide contact information. But to ask someone to stay put in a situation where they have an agitated dog, may actually cause further harm to bystanders.
- This is extremely subjective obviously if a dog injures someone wait for the police but I've seen dogs get into small squabbles a hundred times at off leash areas it would be impossible to regulate. Most of the time people are pretty darn responsible.
- I think it would be up to the owner of the dog and the person it involves. If contact info needs to be shared it should be shared. But say if the non owner of the dog provoked the dog then that is on the non owner to get it fixed and shouldn't involve the dog or dog owner at all.
- As with a minor motor vehicle collision both parties could swap info and move along. I don't see people standing around perhaps for hours waiting for a bylaw officer.
- They need to share their information to be contacted and also take their dog out of the situation.
- "Kind of a loaded question. I do support this, however I also think that enforcing a person or animal to stay at the scene and not taking either away to a safe space could extend the traumatic experience. I would support the exchange of information,
- if it is possible to do so without being in each others space, but I think everyone needs to get home or to a hospital, safe space, asap. Speaking to enforcement can happen after the fact."
- Exchanging information should be sufficient; as getting the dogs out of the situation is a priority. Attacking a human might be taken care of differently
- Unless someone else can remove the dog from the situation I do not feel that is a good idea. The owner can provide their contact info and someone can follow up with them after.
- It could already be a hostile situation so staying could mean more harm.
- This can only increase the anxiety to the animal who may have only bitten because of the situation. If information is available for contact getting the dog out of the situation may be the best.
- Most dogs only bite when attacked to protect themselves or their family and staying in that situation is only going to cause more issues and potential danger.
- If the dog is out of control, the dog should be removed. It could also escalate the issue if the owner, victim and dog(s) had to stay. I think common sense should be used when dealing with this situation. I think there should be rules if there aren't any that require the owner to contact 311 to notify of the incident. Bylaw can then follow up.
- Yes there is insurance. But I'm not crashing a vehicle.
- Yes it's fair
- Until I can believe that this will be fair to the dog and owner, I do not support this. There are so many situations where the "victim" is at fault, but that would not be listened to. Approaching a dog improperly and without asking, scaring a dog, etc.

- "As this is singling out ""pit bulls"" it is prone to misuse and overhanded enforcement.
 - The truth is, a good ""pit bull"" should never bite anyone for any reason. Back when they were fought for sport you couldn't have a dog bite a person even when it was worked out. Dogs that bit were called curs and were euthanized. Now, no one culls and pit bulls are being crossbred with other dogs. This crossing increases the propensity a bite occurring. If you truly want to stop ""pit bulls"" from biting the general public then perhaps you ought to look into controlling crossbred mutts before you disparage a breed that is meant to be bred to avoid biting a human at all costs."
 - It's unfair to ask any dog owner whose dog has just bit to remain at the incident. If the dog has just bit the mindset of that dog and likely owner are not going to coincide with remaining calm and waiting in an unhealthy environment for an officer. It's u reasonable to even ask.
 - Not necessarily. The owner might need to remove the dog from the situation. The owner should then return or make other arrangements to meet law enforcement .
 - Need to ensure the dog is quickly removed from the situation.
 - It is not always safe to remain (but they should remain and exchange info if possible). But they should be required to contact the authorities within a set amount of a "grace" period.
 - Unless it is a unprovoked bite or attack, understanding the way animals communicate would help situations like this alot
 - If you are dealing with the situation and have a dog that you are trying to get undercontrol the last thing you want to do is have the dog remain there with the owner. There needs to be allowances to remove the animal from the scene.
 - "The dog needs taken home immediately, all contact info should need to be given immediately and help should need to be called but the dog should be locked up in a home first. Law enforcement should go to the persons house so that the person bite is not further traumatized.
- My brother in law was had his ear by off by his childhood dog and could not see him because he was literally traumatized. So imagine the dog that just bit you hanging out 20 feet away from you. It would not help the victim."
 - Well if the incident happened they should still provide info but obviously remove the dog from the situation to prevent further issues. So sometimes maybe they can't stay at the scene
 - Animals act in instinct . Animals act upon reflection of their owners behaviour.
 - If the rule cannot be applied to children it should not be applied to dogs
 - Ppl can work together to resolve issue without a third party getting involved.
 - I a green in the exchange of contact information, but if a dog bites they are in a high stress environment, which it is better to get them away from. Or in the case of a fight, seek medical care.
 - If contact information is shared bylaw can contact the owner after.
 - Unless a dog or person was severely injured it's just a dog bite, keep your dog in check if you know they're not good around other dogs.

- I support the idea in the case of a severe bite (torn flesh, significant bleeding or obvious signs of new disability) but do not support it in the case of dog on dog bites. Who is the judge at the time of whether the bite was in play, or an aggressive act? Dog on dog play can get out of hand and nips are exchanged but rarely are there enduring problems beyond hurt feelings on the part of the dogs.
- in a case like that the owner of the dog may need to remove the dog from the situation as well as help the victim with hospital concerns
- If an animal has been distressed to the point that it feels threatened (and must defend itself) it does seem to me that you would want to remove that animal from the threatening environment and return it to safer, more comfortable, surroundings (ie. it's own home)
- Dogs may be injured and require medical care. Owners should have to share contact information.
- It depends. The person must share contact information but the safest thing may be to take the dog home as well. How do you manage that?
- Contact information should be sufficient. What is likely best for the dog in that situation is to remove it from the setting, and take it home. Keeping everyone together will create more stress and tension.
- If a party is seriously injured it is a social duty to remain. However I can see this "rule" becoming a problem with small minor issues that could be settled on their own instead of paying officers to enforce this, which will cost us more money and take officers away from larger issues that should be focused on.
- It is not always the dogs fault. Have basic education for those who walk in dog friendly parks to not approach dogs without communicating with the owner first.
- I support this much more for biting people. I think dogs biting other dogs can occur far more easily and is only an issue if it's severe.
- I would alter that to provide contact information and/or require them to call 311 to report the details. If the dog is agitated, sometimes the best thing is for the owner to take the dog somewhere private to settle the dog. I don't want to see dog owners punished for doing what is best for the dog.
- The dog is clearly reactive. Keeping it in a stressful situation is only going to make it worse. I get that it's important to keep people accountable for their pets, but you would only be asking for more hurt on the people and animal if the owner has to stay and doesnt have a way to remove the dog from the situation
- This should be figured out the the parties involved. No need for an enforcement officer
- The city needs to stop over regulating. Start subsidizing humane society's so they can train the dogs in the shelter more efficiently.
- Would make more sense to remove the dog from the scene to avoid triggering it more. Personal information considerations - FOIP Act
- Unreasonable people would abuse this over minor incidences. Too many irritating overreactors around for a rule like this.
- I think that should apply in the case of a severe attack.
- A lot of the time bites are provoked. I dont trust that there will be fair reporting and no bias.
- Often occasions, people are not following on leash rules and may approach a dog that is skiddish or unfamiliar with other dogs.

- Dog play bite all the time and often times when people are involved they didn't respect the dogs space very rarely is it the dogs fault.
- Dogs often nip and snap at each other, and sometimes at people, without doing harm. I suspect that such a bylaw would immediately become a source of time-wasting, melodrama and attention-seeking behaviour. People would waste each other's and officers' time over non-serious incidents.
- The dog would need to be removed from the situation - sometimes requiring the owner to leave
- Logistically, their focus should be obtaining and maintaining control of their dog. Recognizing that this may necessitate leaving the scene, I suggest that the provision be re-drafted to mandate an exchange of contact information.
- This can't always be the case. I think exchange numbers but if I was in that situation I would want to get my dog out of the area and then come back. Perhaps they could follow and then exchange numbers. I have a dog who has extreme trauma and fear, I want to keep her away from all dogs at any time so my main focus is to remove her from those situations as it causes further fear and bad associations.
- Having law enforcement can increase the tension in a situation, considering they arrive after the scene and cannot fully comprehend the situation.
- Because a police officer is likely to shoot the dog and that I am not in favour of
- Incidences can be random. Unsubstantiated claims and over reactions at off leash dog parks are not uncommon. Waiting for dog police and red tape bureaucracy is taxing. User beware. Caveat emptor.
- Slippery slope. Are you going to penalize some one who goes with the other owner to the vet to pay the bill? Technically leaving the scene of incident. And if you implement a bylaw like this, are you now taxing the police services when bylaw is done for the day and something happens off hours? How long are you expecting people to wait?
- Do you think the irresponsible owner is going to follow this rule?
- "A dog biting a person could be the persons fault. In the case that it's not the human's fault then I support this suggestion.
- A dog biting another dog is NATURAL. It's absurd to punish a dog for hurting another animal. We don't punish human beings for hitting dogs with cars. Be realistic."
- I think sharing information is very important so the incident can be followed up by the necessary parties. But for an animal in distress the owner should be allowed to leave in order to separate and reduce stress
- the words "if necessary" are far too vague and subjective.
- depending on the severity, authorities are already busy enough. both pet owners should exchange contact info/vet bills
- If it's safe then yes but obviously the most important thing to do would be to de escalate the situation and remove the aggressive dog from the situation.
- Except in rare circumstances, some bites/ incidents are very minor in nature and this could possibly be a huge waste of time. I think common sense should rule.

- They should remove the animal from the situation. They should contact the enforcement officers, but requiring them to remain onsite heightens risk.
- "When my dog was attacked the owners and 2 friends. 2 girls 2 boys could care less that my dog might die. And acted like that was everyday life. Last thing I would want is to hang with these a-holes.
- Having said that. The attack was at a prov park so cops and everyone were useless."
- Dogs only bite if approached by strangers. Never approach someone else's dog without permission while out walking
- In a case a dog is experiencing high anxiety it is best to get out of situation. Get immediate medical care for victim (if required) but leave scene after sharing contact info
- If you have a stressed upset person and require a stressed upset dog to remain in the scene both dog and person are experiencing more trauma.
- Providing info was exchanged, it may be best to get the dog away from the stressor and environment . The bylaw officer can contact late-night necessary.
- Animals interact and bite each other often. If major harm occurs, of course the owner needs to stay.
- In situations that are high tension, especially those involving animals, distance is best for all parties to calm down and prevent it from escalating.
- dogs may bite for protection, fear or they werent trained otherwise...if my dog protected me from another dog or animal, its because he is protecting my family from what he thinks is a threat. If i cant handle his actions i shouldnt be a dog owner
- Yes swap details, cops aren't needed it's just extra tension and aggression
- When a dog bites, it was provoked. It is not the owners or the dogs fault.
- They may need to get their dog out of there if they just bit someone... a rule that requires exchange of information without the need to stay makes more sense
- the owner should take their dog away from the scene to reduce the chance of another incident
- If people can work the incident out amongst themselves without sharing contact info or talking to an enforcement officer they should be free to do so.
- If a dog bites someone else, that dog needs to be removed from the situation to ensure no other harm comes another person or animal.
- No, they need to remove the dog ASAP, but should leave contact info or call in.
- Personally, I think if a dog bit an animal or another person the authorities shouldn't get involved unless it was life threatening. Regardless of the breed, an animal will always have animalistic instincts and when provoked will resort to their instincts no matter how well trained the dog or any other animal may be.
- I want you all to realize it's not the dogs fault.

- The dog may have bitten the person because they were threatened or injured. I do think the person should remain on the scene but don't know if this is practical in all cases . Allow for a system similar to car accidents where exchange of information can occur
- You want to remove the dogs from the situation. They do need to give information but only once the dogs are safely away from each other.
- In some cases it would be best to remove the dog and owner especially if provoked
- There are many reasons why a dog may bite and it does not always indicate that the dog is a danger. Owners should be required to give contact info but should have the opportunity to remove their dog before anything further occurs.
- Share contact information, yes. An enforcement officer can follow up later.
- I think they should only be required to stay if the bite is bad enough that it is clearly severe and needs medical assistance, but they can go if they can organize and make amends with each other by themselves.
- In non serious cases, this will be used to target specific breeds/people, in cases where serious injury does happen, police would already be called and they would have to stay/be contacted regardless
- But the dog shall be tied away or in vehicle. This could be increasing danger by making owners afraid to flee the scene.
- This past weekend my 6 month old pitbull puppy was attacked and latched onto by a shitzhu. He was ok, and the owner apologized. I think depending on the severity of a situation an owner should remain on scene.
- If the dog had just attacked/bit, it might be safer for the people involved and the dog for the dog to be removed by the owner. Taking the dog to calm down. Information should be exchanged before any party removing themselves.
- Depends on the scenario and severity. Owners can discuss and exchange necessary contact info. It could be dangerous to keep two reactive dogs in the same area waiting on enforcement officer.
- If a dog was upset enough to bite, they should not be required to wait around while information is disclosed. Dog owner should be free to take their dog home to calm down immediately.
- If there is a dog bite that is between animals then the enforcement officer was not present to see the incident and it is very likely that the bite was provoked and this method makes it so that the biting dog is automatically the guilty offender. I believe if it is a minor incident and the parties can work it out themselves then that is acceptable. If it was bad enough that someone runs away, everyone these days records things on cellphones anyways. I think this would be overkill and a waste of resources for small incidents.
- If the dog bites, it may need to be removed immediately from the situation so that those impacted can receive treatment. It makes more sense to share contact information with those impacted to then share with enforcement as soon as possible.
- Leaving the scene may be the safest option so long as the parties involved share information, similar to in a vehicle accident and then go to enforcement on their own
- What if the owners dog was also bitten. What if medical attention is needed.

- Because you should be able to exchange information with the other party that was involved without including enforcement officers
- Bite severity can differ from one person to the next.
- This would require the offending animal to remain at the incident and could pose further risks to the public instead of immediately removing them from the situation.
- the dog should be removed from the premise immediately, not made to stay at the scene in an elevated state.
- A photo and information exchange should be sufficient. Tempers flare and forced restraint of either or both an animal and owner can escalate.
- Stop wasting people's time
- They shouldn't have to stay there with their dog who is clearly already in a state of stress as is everyone involved and I feel it would be more likely to cause another incident. The owner should be required to provide contact information and if possible some sort of ID so they can be contacted appropriately
- If it is minor and no dogs or people were badly hurt in the process and everyone is okay then no, but if there is an incident where one was badly hurt then yes
- It is important to get the dog to a place where it can be contained so it does not hurt someone else.
- This would likely mean the aggressive dog remains in an environment where it may bite someone again. They should be required to provide contact info and then ensure the aggressive dog is taken away from the area as quickly as possible
- Leave your information, go somewhere the dog and human aren't threatened or triggered. Assess the situation. Why provoke more?
- "Don't feel
- The need to get an officer involved if a bite hasn't punctured the skin . If either dog needs medical attention then an officer should be called."
- Very vague question. Where did this occur? What's the "other animal"?
- Should be necessary to exchange information as per a car accident. Staying at scene dependent on situation/severity/circumstances.
- Staying at scene may be unsafe or not possible If an animal requires care. I support the exchange of identifiable information such as dog license number, drivers license number, license plate number or any other number that can identify the parties involved to authorities with out disclosing too much information that jeopardizes any party.
- There will always be exceptions to this rule, where the owner will need to take their own safety and their pet's safety into account. There may be situations where it is in the best interest of the people and/or animals involved to leave the situation. It can not be a hard fast rule when this could lead to potentially even more dangerous situations.
- No different than an accident. Mutually exchange info. [removed]
- Decrease interactions with law enforcement. These interactions lead to disproportionate impacts against people of colour and indigenous populations.
- If there has already been an incident, emotions are high and things could progressively get worse.

- I don't think both parties will want to wait, particularly if it is winter. Perhaps a hotline would be a better alternative.
- depends on the situation.
- Dog should be removed from the area.
- The Enforcement officer will simply ensure the dog gets put down, it has happened many times even if the person who was bit does not want it. So, the owner shouldnt not have to wait at the scene given that this is a likely scenario.
- Not every situation can support people (and dog/s) waiting an undetermined amount of time for officers to attend the situation. Eg; exposure to elements, further trauma/discomfort to the individuals involved.
- There are times if a dog is protecting its owners that it may not be safe to "wait" around.
- "I think they should be required to remain at the scene and share contact info, if the dog bites another dog, in case vet care is required. but not have to talk to an enforcement officer.
- If the dog bites a human, also contact info etc but also enforcement officer if necessary."
- If a dog has bitten it needs to be removed from the situation. Both owner and dog are at risk if they are required to stay on scene. There should be a duty to report to the police station or the city at a later date or later that day. Also if a bite is sever the victim will need to leave too.
- Could cause un needed added stress to the dogs and the escalate a situation that could've been prevented if they were allowed to walk the dogs away from eachother.
- I believe that is you are in an area with multiple animals you have to expect there will be scraps. They're dogs. Do your kids fight with their friends? Probably. So do dogs. But if the owner is properly trained they will know what to do in these situations. If there is an altercation with an individual and a dog or two dogs it should be able to be delt with between the parties involved. I believe law enforcement should only be contacted if an animal is unaccompanied .
- Sometimes removing the animal from the situation is safer for those involved. I am in favor of them requiring to leave contact information.
- In the majority of cases when a dog bites someone it is because the dog was provoked. Punishing and animal and it's owner for someone elses bad behavior is a horrible practice.
- The owner should be allowed to leave to remove the dog from what ever the stressor is to prevent further issues. But the owner is required to give the victim a name and phone number to be reached at.
- Only if it is safe to do so should the dog and owner be required to stay at the scene
- Just provide information to the persons involved and let the paperwork be filed after. Remain in scene of medical attention is required.
- The owner MUST provide contact information. If possible, he or she must remain at the scene. I answered no out of concern for the victim, dog, and all involved. Remaining on the scene with your aggressor can be traumatic. In some situations it may be best for the dog to be completely removed from the scene. Ultimately, the owner MUST provide contact information.
- No definition of "incident"

- Remaining on the scene could result in further problems. Person should be required to leave contact information, ie. name, phone number.
- Prolonged chance of human to human conflict
- If someone has a dog on a leash that has just bitten someone or something.... that dog should not stay on the scene. That scene and dog need to be removed from each other. There needs to be a better way for the humans to resolve this.... than to keep the dog in a situation it isn't comfortable with! Honestly.... the suggestion to all remain there to exchange info..... makes me question the knowledge of dogs at all, if this was a considered suggestion. You need to remove the dog from the place it felt it needed to attack.
- a responsible pet owner would already do this to ensure said person who was bit knows that the dog has been kept up to date with all of its vaccinations.
- No, because you might need to leave in order to calm your dog down and to de-escalate the situation. But you should have to leave your name and number, if remaining there is not a safe option.
- Ideally they should remain at the scene, but it might be easier for everyone if the dog is removed from the area promptly.
- Should be handled between owners .
- Dogs may need to be removed from the situation for medical or to cool the situation. Number exchange should be required, and photos should be allowed.
- They can be reached at a later time.
- For the same reason as above; I am leery of giving power to anti animal advocates. Biting people is one thing, biting another animal – there are too many variables and extenuating circumstances to require someone to share their info etc. Dogs get upset at each other for different reasons; as long as the owner has taken all reasonable steps to control and avoid a conflict, I don't think bylaw should have the authority to force someone to remain. There are also privacy and jurisdictional issues with this proposal.
- This is challenging. While of course you want the contact information shared, safety in this situation is paramount. It may be safest to return the dog safely to its home and have the conversation after, as long as contact information can be shared in another way.
- It may not be safe for human or dog to remain. A risk of the dog reoffending.
- Of course an owner should stick around, but minor dog spats do happen. If the owners are satisfied and agree on a resolution why is it necessary to bring in an officer? Don't they have enough to do already?
- Firstly separate them. you don't know what happened, the two parties should exchange information and from there deal with it with both animals/people in their own safe space.
- Because in a self defense situation all cops do is charge the good guy. If a dog protects someone from an attacker I would not want to subject them to BS with cops and courts.
- People should be responsible enough to exchange numbers. Our police and bylaw officers have more important things to do than show up for every bite.

- Info exchange is a priority, but if there's an incident - it would be less traumatic for everyone to vacate the area as soon as possible.
- You're going to cause more stress for the dog. Information should be exchanged and the owner can be contacted at their house if needed
- Things happen. The animal owner should be responsible enough to talk to the other party without spending tax dollars to wait until an enforcement offer if called.
- How is a bite defined? in the most simplest of terms, if its a bite like a nip and no injury or blood is drawn, why? what is the need. In the event that the bite causes severe injury and draws blood, then i could see the need for enforcement and incident debriefing.
- Because the other dog might attack again
- "People can make up up stories about whose dog bit who, and make the person stay when maybe there was no incident. I dont think the power to drain people should be put in the hands of someone claiming that something happened. Unlike a car crash they there is sometimes no evidence like let's say a warning nip if a kid gets in a dogs face but the dog doesnt burst skin and the parents shouldn't let the kid get in a strangers dogs face for example again I dont think this should allow people to forcefully detain others. If there was severe injury then they'd should call the cops and give a description and not follow the perpetrator with a dangerous dog.

- I agree with the tribunal and I think there should be more information and awareness about calling immidiately if a dog attacks not necessarily bites or every bit BUT ATTACKS , that you should call the authorities and provide the number as soon as possible.
- I didn't know this I had a child attacked and by my mother in laws dog and I called later and showed pictures to animals services officer, the dog was detained and then there was no record held on that dog, at some point when i called back after years of the other family calling my crazy for bot letting my kids around that dog.
- I own three dogs i love dogs big and small. I am at dog parks on and off leash all the time, I grew up around dogs and would dogs and pits and every and many many other breeds among my extended family and our many visits, sometimes sharing a property where all the dogs would become a big pack in the summer and kids everywhere with a private beach on inveremere... anyways I have a fairly good understanding of dogs and dogs behavior and I like to as a hobby study humans and their psychology and behavior as well."
- I support sharing contact information, but not remaining at the scene. Tensions may be high and it may be more beneficial to give space and allow follow up with an officer afterward as well as opportunity to remove the dog from the situation and allow the victim to seek medical attention elsewhere if necessary.
- take photos, get witness info, and let the owners get the dogs to a safe place. Keeping the animals still in that environment is less than ideal. Everyone should be held accountable but this rule would only lead to more trouble between the parties involved.

- Dogs fight all the time no matter the breed, if you cannot control your dog they must be required to take obedience classes. Perform background checks on dog owners before allowed to adopt for criminal history and violent behaviour.
- Only a bite that is severe enough to warrant this should have the person required to stay
- Owner should remove their dog from the scene but still leave contact information and be reachable
- Remaining at the scene is likely to cause more issues and confrontation. There needs to be communication with an enforcement officer or sharing of information
- "If the dog is stressed out from the incident it may be better to remove the dog from the situation so more incidents do not happen at the time. However, I do think contact information should be given at the scene, and if there is a safe place to put the dog (ie vehicle) then they should stay."
- Very traumatic. Need time to think and process
- In the event the owner does not recognize their dogs behavior or they themselves become indignant, the situation could escalate.
- Some people do not listen to other owners, so they end up getting bit. My dog is great with kids and other animals but when it comes to men, if you put your hand over his head instead of under, he gets nippy. He's a rescue and was abused.
- I don't believe that the city can enforce
- People become irrational very quickly. Remaining on site with the canine present only serves to escalate the scene. However if they choose to leave, they must provide contact information and identification before leaving otherwise its a whole new crime...
- Yes if dog bites a human. No if dog bites another animal. Depending on the severity of the bite ;No outstanding injuries from bite, no further action. Dog and other animals are just animals they will bite, they will get in fights.
- I've witnessed dog bites/attacks in off leash parks, and the majority of the time both parties know that they must exchange phone numbers and other pertinent information.
- Because people are basis and don't know the dog breeds
- It should be dependent on the severity of the bite
- A reasonable person would share contact information freely. Nanny state legislation will not encourage people to do the right thing and will criminalize good people with reactive dogs.
- If you honestly believe that those who are irresponsible enough to walk away when their dog attacks another will stick around waiting for an officer just because there is a bylaw, you are kidding yourself.
- If your dog bites someone, you probably should get it away from the person. So leaving contact information would be adequate.
- Share quick information yes but they should be able to take their dog home and away from the situation to de stress so nothing further happens.
- Depends upon the severity and situation in which the bite occurred.
- Owners priority must be to remove the dog from the situation
- The dog should be removed from the situation to prevent further damage. The dog owner can't necessarily stay while keeping their dog separate.

- If both parties agree that it is a non-issue then there is no need to use law enforcement. If it is severe or there is an injury that needs to be addressed then it is up to the person who was injured (or their animal) to determine whether or not law enforcement should be brought in. Then, and only then, should law enforcement be called.
- not all dog bites are severe enough to warrant sending an enforcement officer to the location.
- Is this not normal?
- What if it is a small bite. An officer may take hours to arrive. I am ok to share information with the other person if we need to.
- Are you expecting someone to do a citizens arrest?? How do you expect to enforce that rule An honest owner would already stay and those that wouldn't will just leave or give false information. A rule in paper will not change anything.
- I would support this for human only bites. In many incidents dog fights begin when both dogs engage. How are you supposed to identify who's dog instigated a fight or bite when it is one persons word against another.
- The dog needs to calm down and not removing the dog from the situation (where there are other dogs or people who are not calm - who may be raising their voice) may make the entire situation more volatile.
- Owners should exchange information, conflict can be dealt at a time that does not inconvenience any party
- The owner may need to remove the dog from the situation.
- like i said you arent the law, you arent god!
- What if emergency treatment was needed ?
- they should legally have to exchange information not wait at the scene. if an animal or person is hurt they should go to get medical care not wait around for an officer.
- I believe contact info should be exchange in an immediate fashion so those involved can remove themselves from the intensity of the situation. To wait for an officer I believe would create more stress for those involved
- Depends on the circumstance. Some situations can be made worse by a bad owner staying around.
- That's a loaded, and [removed] question. Was the dog being tormented? Attacked? Etc is that person in fear of their safety? You guys are absolute morons.
- To share their contact information, YES, absolutely. To remain on the scene? Not necessary & may cause more duress to those involved.
- Bite severity can be too vague. Perhaps define a bite in this case to only those times when blood was drawn. Prevent frivolous abuse or attempted shakedowns of dog owners by the victim when no visible injury occurs. Dogs can bite with varying force. A grab may be interpreted by a victim, as a bite.
- if the dog or victim needs to be taken out of the situation, the owner must be able to have the flexibility to leave. Remaining on the scene may just lead to further harm to everyone involved

- Many variables. I have kids and dogs. If I had to run out of my house in a panic because a dog attacked mine, or something of that sort, I wouldn't want to be in trouble for not staying there while my dog was hurt and I had kids in my house.
- If a dog bites a person or another dog it had a reason and most likely felt threatened. It is the owners responsibility to be in control of their dog and if there was proper training that is mandatory for all dogs, there would be way less attacks.
- Remain at the scene does not address the reality that the dog should be immediately secured, and the victim may require treatment. The requirement should be to provide information and present oneself to/contact the bylaw or enforcement office within 24 hours. The goal should be to ensure identification, not require waiting for an enforcement officer to attend.
- Information can be exchanged. No need to sit there!
- Only if they bite another person that draws blood. NOT if they bite another dog as dogs rough house regardless and some owners have zero idea what a real fight or rough house looks like so they would blame any dog that bared teeth or growled. The owners will always blame the other dog even if their own dog was annoying, jumping on, or trying to dominate the other dog. Bottom line, they are ANIMALS. And they scrap from time to time! It's how they communicate. They are not humans and do not reason!. But a dog biting a human or child is not good and so when that happens they should wait for an officer to come by.... only if it draws blood.
- Don't get bit by a dog. It's called natural selection for the [removed]
- Civilians should not be used as law enforcement
- I don't know how this could be enforced and may lead to physical altercation between dog owner and other people
- This is definitely an issue of severity and circumstance as dogs can be cruelly provoked and then blamed for their reaction. Taking a dog out of that situation can be better for the animal instead of forcing it to remain in the stressful situation. Sharing contact information to reach out later when the dog has been returned to a home and a conversation can happen effectively would be best
- Depends of severity of the situation. Similar to a vehicle accident or incident.
- It should be on the owner to control there dog.
- This allows for anyone involved in an incident to plead their case with the officials however if two dogs are trying to hurt eachother, keeping them right beside each other is never a good option, no matter what breed or size they are.
- If the dog shouldn't remain at the scene it should be taken to a safe place
- It always takes along time.to have anyone attend this could increase stress for all involved
- If the dog needs to be removed from the situation to prevent furhter incidents then the owner cannot be expected to remain there for an indeterminate amount of time. They should of course be required to provide contact info.
- I fear too many people have unfair bias against dogs especially certain breeds and I am uncomfortable giving these people the power to influence the dogs future.
- If someone was attacked and their dog saved them, would you fine them for running away from a potential murderer?

- What if it's a small bite that caused no harm, puncture or anything other kind of damage? Got to be more specific in this wording. Maybe for a bite that causes damage or harm.
- Many people behave inappropriately around dogs. Remaining at the scene may put the owner or the dog at further risk
- This is so broad. What if a person was being abusive to the dog and they were defending themselves? What if, while playing, the mouthed a person or another dog and it was misconstrued as a 'bite'?
- Do we have enough enforcement officers to make this work? Will people be waiting around for hours? Should be the same as car accidents - exchange information and go.
- I think that you should have the option to get the offending dog out of the area as soon as possible to prevent another attack or bite. A responsible option would be to exchange information if the dog could not be secured properly
- I think it would take too long for police to respond - people wouldn't wait. Animals and humans could also be hurt and needing medical attention while waiting - and sometimes it's better to remove the animal from the situation. Someone who doesn't share information should be fined when found - so many people have phones for videos and people it should be easily to locate someone fleeing the scene.
- This should only apply in the result of blood drawn. Animals play and nip. One sensitive dog owner could claim another owners dog bit their dog simply because it yelped. Unless clear damage (blood) it would be a he said/she said situation.
- I think it would be very stressful for both the victim, owner, and dog involved to be kept on location. I think that the animal should be allowed to be taken out of the situation and back home to avoid anymore issues and allow them to settle down. The owner can then come back, or have the officer come to the house in order to share all the contact information and details moving forward.
- Dog bites between animals can be a result of play.
- These incidents should be reported but it's unreasonable to expect dog owners to wait at the scene for a bylaw officer and unfortunately I can't see the dog owners waiting
- Yes if a dog bites a person, no if a dog bites another animal. We as humans have no idea what may have been going on between the two dogs to warrant a bite.
- This just seems like common courtesy, however, if one or both parties need medical attention this rule is much more of a hinderance than a help.
- "Two reasons. First, if the owner has to stay, the dog has to stay. This creates an extremely dangerous situation for all parties. Exchange contact information and part ways.
- Second, Covid. Keep your distance."
- Not all cases of dog bites need to be addressed by law enforcement. If the owners talk amongst themselves and determine an appropriate way to deal with the issue, that's all that should be needed. Why burden law enforcement more with many minor issues.
- I don't solely because if a dog bites a person, the dog likely needs to be removed from the situation immediately. Clearly the dog was experiencing some sort of stress or duress that led to them biting, they should be pulled out of that stressful situation to prevent further harm. I understand why you might want them to stay, but a different solution needs to be figured out.

- It depends, if it's safer to remove the animal they need to do that first. As long as they identify themselves as soon as they can, they should not receive additional fines for leaving the scene. It's not black and white
- I think every situation is different and it is up to the people involved in the incident to decide how best to handle it.
- How do you enforce that?
- If a dog bites someone and the owner has to stay at the scene then that means the agitated dog also has to stay at the scene. The animal should be removed from the scene as quickly as possible and brought back to their home where they can calm down. The person should absolutely have to give their information but to stay on scene puts other people in danger.
- Provide information but obviously with a bite - the dogs need to be separated. Only stay long enough to exchange information.
- After an incident, it can be tough to contain the situation. Especially if involving untrained dogs, emotional humans and/or children. I believe it would be a crime to pretend the incident never happened especially if physical injury occurs. Instead, I believe that the owner of the offending dog must provide a contact name and phone number, but is allowed to leave the scene and be willing to follow up later with enforcement officer. After one offence, if your dog is considered dangerous, you must carry with you a contact information card to hand out to the victim/victim's owner immediately if another incident were to occur.
- Remaining at the scene could cause more stress to an already stressed animal. Contact information must be exchanged, then removal from situation into neutral territory.
- I don't think it's necessary
- Unless the bite is serious and caused damage/drew blood then it's not
- if a dog is aggressive, the owner should leave contact details as quickly as possible and leave the situation before it escalates. IF they flee the scene without contact details, they should be charged as such.
- Suggests they should stay but there shouldn't be law against
- If it bites a person yes, if there is a vicious dog on dog attack yes, not for minor instances, dogs can bite a little even when they're playing without hurting each other
- Because if you were to keep an animal that was just attacked near the dog that attacked it. The dog would have a lot of prolonged issues dealing with dogs. As the same as the person. When I was attacked by a dog I didn't want to be anywhere near it and the family gave the bylaw officer the contact information along with their address and was asked to stay there until a Officer came by to check on both parties.
- There's the potential of too much he said she said. Because you're already trying to unnecessarily label these dogs as bad, even though the vast majority of them are very mild mannered, I'm concerned that it would be a very one sided story that is believed by bylaw.
- Conditions that qualify as "necessary" are undefined

- Dogs bite each other all the time. Unless a dog draws blood I don't think you should have to wait for law enforcement
- Too much potential for he said she said finger pointing
- I think there needs to be an exchange of information but keeping the owner (and consequently offending dog) at the scene could result in a dangerous situation for the public and dog.
- Its best for dogs to be removed from the situation and each other if there has been a fight or bite. How long would it take for an officer to come?
- If either dog needs to go to the vet then it could impede on care. Also if its a minor inccedent the option to just walk away is best.
- A officer can be biased towards dogs so no
- There are too many other high-risk or more severe incidents happening city-wide that enforcement offers should be attending too. Worrying about dogs possibly biting other people should not be a top priority. This is not a criminal offence, nor should it ever have to involve enforcement officers at scene.
- Dogs may need medical attention right away and enforcement can take too long to show up for the animals to get the treatment they require on time.
- [removed] if 2 dog get in a fight yeah it [removed] but that what dogs do, if two stray got in a fight no one would know it's called life it happens, Banning pit bull (like) dog it's absolutely ridiculous, it's not the dogs fault how it acts ITS THE OWNER. I have an American bully he's the best freaking dog you could ask for, he loves kid and other dogs because we raised him right I had a blue nose pit bull when my dog was a baby and he learnt most of his behaviour from him, stop banning and killing dog, punish the owner
- You want to exchange information but remove the animal(s) from the scene as quickly as possible for medical attention or other reasons. In most cases a bite is defensive behaviour and the animal will be stressed and situations can escalate between animals and or people who may have instigated with or without knowing and continue to do so.
- There is already so much trauma at the event, the dogs and owners should be removed immediately to calm down the situation.
- They need to share their information and talk to authorities, but if it's safer to remove the dog from the situation, the owner might also have to leave.
- Why put more people in harms way unless the animal can be temporarily be but into a vehicle at the scene
- The owner needs to give contact info, so they can be reached for information. In the event of an incident the dog will be stressed and should be taken home to a stress free familiar location.
- Definitely need to be able to reach the responsible adult; however, I believe there are often very high tempers and injuries on both sides.
- They would only need to stay if the dog is the aggressor, owners usually issue warnings that the other person should back up because their dog does not like it. And the other owner should know better either way.
- This can be dangerous for the animal or people involved.

- Overly broad of a requirement - too vague and almost unenforceable. Not to mention could be a violation of charter rights. Not to mention- the circumstances under which this scenario would arise vary greatly— unfair to owners not at the scene at all at time of incident. Plus charter violation. Give your heads a shake. Some of these suggestions in this questionnaire are borderline offensive and truly ignorant in where they are going.
- This whole questionnaire is geared towards more enforcement not less. Entirely an over reach and clearly the department who created this decision process is disconnected from the population. The sad part is, only those who have issuance will fill out your survey. What's more the survey leaves little room to contest increased enforcement. Whoever made this should really reconsider their approach.
- This is a problem between individuals and should be resolved by them, not by law enforcement. If damages occur it is up to the victim to sue the owner. City should not be involved at all.
- Too hard to enforce, too hard to decide at the time if required, too easy to abuse as just an 'add on' charge (not convinced it would change any behaviours)
- I'm concerned keeping the owner at the scene will often necessitate keeping the dog at the scene, which could result in a more unsafe environment than if the owner left with the dog.
- Another incident may occur if the offending dog cannot leave the situation. There may be instances where the dog would not be able to be put in a vehicle or crate and the owner may need to get the dog home to a secure location.
- Keeping the dog at the scene may encourage them to feel they did the right thing by biting and reinforce the behaviour. They could be biting because they are scared and keeping them in the same place would only make the feeling and resulting behaviour worse. You have to snap them out of the environment.
- The first thing you would want to do is get the dog out of there. The dog and the owner would be scared/shaken up and should be allowed to return home to process.
- Yes they need to leave contact information, but it is potentially more risk to have said animal remain in the area. It would make more sense to take the animal home or if required to a veterinarian to receive care.
- Sometimes these instances can mean their dog is injured as well and being a responsible means getting your dog out of that situation. They should be required to leave their licences or something but not necessarily stay on scene.
- Share contact info yes, remain at the scene no. If there is an incident, keeping the animals near each other is a bloody awful idea.
- If a dog remains in the situation it was stress in more problems will arise. They should be allowed to return to safety indefinitely
- A responsible pet owner will share contact information and then remove the animal from the situation before another incident can occur.
- Actually for the most part yes I would support that. They may need to go home and secure the dog. They should provide contact information. How long does it take an officer to show up?

- If the dog has bitten a person or other animal I would want that animal as far away as possible because I would be concerned that the dog would attack again
- I fear that no does creation will be used. An incident would be terrible to be involved in. Some people may flee out of fear.
- This depends on the severity of the bite if it is very minor or a scratch then no but if it is sever one absolutely.
- If a dog bites someone, their dog may still be elevated and scared. The people should exchange contact information, put dog in secure location and discuss after
- I agree with sharing contact information and talking with enforcement but it would be best to take a stressed animal or person away from the area so they may calm down.
- There should be a couple options here. If a dog becomes provoked/aggressive and there has been a bite, sometimes the best option is to remove the dog from the situation. That would be difficult if you were required to wait for an enforcement officer.
- Not all dogs attacks are the dogs fault, if people get to close or try and pet a stranger's dog and get bit, then I feel the dog owner has the right to walk away.
- The dog owner can give their information to the officer, but the owner and dog should leave the tension of the scene and go home. This is basic common sense when dealing with behavioural needs in all animals. If the animal remains at the scene of the trauma, their fight/ flight instincts kick in. Likewise, if they feel that their owner is in harm because of the stress coming off of them, they will protect their owner. This can all be avoided by leaving the location of trauma and going to a safe space (ie. home).
- Animals are animals. Leave it at that
- A dog only bites someone because he feels threatened of scared. If you are to keep a dog where he just bite or attacked someone that dog will continue to go insane and will continue to get worked up. This dog is scared. do not continue to torture it. Dogs are not humans.
- My answer is yes and no. If a dog approaches my dog(who is a pit bull) and attacks my dog and causes damage, then yes that owner should have to remain on site. If someone reaches for a dog without permission and gets a bite(not using my dog as an example because she LOVES people AND dogs) then I don't think the owner of the dog that bites needs to remain on the scene. There needs to be more clarification on the city's definition of a bite. Does it cause damage? Was it a fight? Was it an accident? Was it an escalation in play? Was it in an off leash park or was the dog at large? So many scenarios to consider.
- I agree they should exchange information. Waiting at the scene could be difficult if it takes too long.
- Dogs will play bite all the time and owners will take a nibble too seriously. People overreact all the time, dogs don't deserve to be put in that kind of stress for no reason. Also people who stress out other people's dog and get bit is their own fault.
- Maybe figure out what provoked the bite, it's not always the dogs fault
- I support the owner being required to provide contact information with picture ID. However, it may be best for the dog to be removed from the situation which would necessitate the owner taking the dog away.

- They should exchange information. But waiting for an enforcement officers is too much. It takes way too long.
- In cases of severe bites I think an owner should exchange contact info with the other person but for the safety of everyone in a bite incident the dog must be removed from the situation immediately and not wait around for an officer. Dog behaviour can be hard to read and dogs can growl, snarl or fake bite as a defensive tactic. Because many people don't know the difference between these I would specify that I'm cases where blood is drawn an owner must provide contact info to the person or owner who has been bitten.
- No, the dog owner should go home after swapping information.
- If the person has to remain on scene, so does the dog. It would be best to get the dog to a place where they won't be stressed and possibly hurt someone else.
- Dog bites are often extremely circumstantial. If there is something in the area that is triggering that dog to act out, it would be dangerous to have them stay at the scene. If the dog can be removed without the owner leaving the scene, then yes, this would be a great idea.
- This is going to use up a bunch of money and resources that are not needed. If you don't have to stay at the scene of an accident that has minor damage, why would you have to stay for a bite if it's minor? For serious bites, sure, but definitely not for every bite.
- The owner should be allowed to remove their dog from the scene to reduce the risk of antagonizing the situation, but be required to return to give a statement. Perhaps owners should be required to carry some sort of identification/contact information that they can quickly leave with someone in case of an incident to insure they don't just disappear.
- I'm uncertain as to what the procedure normally is. I'm selecting an answer because I have to. My immediate thought is that if removing the animal immediately will prevent further damage/injury, there should be a workaround.
- If there has been an incident it's apparent the owner has lost control over the dog, and both animals need to be removed from the incident. Full names should be given, once there is a separation, each take a photo of the other and a number where owners can call report the incident along with name of the other person.
- People act stupid around breeds they think are dangerous. It has nothing to do with the dog. I witnessed a lady throw her phone at a pit bull one time because he barked. Once. And then he destroyed her phone and she tried to sue and the whole thing went to court. A family almost lost a loyal and loving pet. Three small children lived in fear for weeks because a grown adult didn't have any common sense.
- Must leave contact info but get animals out of stressful and potentially dangerous situation.
- If a dog bites another dog it is not necessarily that dog's fault. A dog can display a range of inappropriate behaviors without biting first that might antagonize another dog. For instance, if someone is being responsible and has their dog on a leash, and an off-leash dog runs up with an aggressive stance, would the fault be that of the dog and the owner's? Why should they have to take responsibility for this?

- If they are alone with their dog and they can't leave- that means the dog can't leave either. Often dogs need to be taken away from the situation in order to de-escalate
- They need to bring their dog home, and they are the culprit. As long as they have shared their info or given contact information they can go. It won't be dealt with any more timely if they find themselves waiting with a group of anxious people
- So long as contact information is shared between the two parties.
- I think a picture of id is sufficient as the situation needs to dissipate. Officers can follow up with owners post incident and bring police if necessary
- It would depend on the situation. Perhaps there is a dog fight and both dogs require vet attention
- Exchange information and allow dogs to be removed from the stressful situation.
- If a dog bites he is extremely emotional (scared, anxious, insecure, possibly angry, but most likely defending himself/his owner) and NEEDS to be removed from that situation. Information needs to be exchanged but dissolving the situation that led to the bite is priority
- They need to provide quick information but often they need to get their pet off the scene. If they must stay that creates conflict. They must provide a phone number, license plate number and government ID to the other person on the scene quickly before being allowed to leave.
- If a dog is BITING, for WHATEVER reason, then said dog needs to be removed from the scene IMMEDIATELY and appropriate measures are taken to calm all affected beings...
- I think contact information should be given by the owner to the other owner/person. In most cases, if the injury is severe enough, the person or animal will need medical care. And unless enforcement can get out fast, I do not see anyone waiting at the scene.
- As long as contact info is exchanged the offending dog shouldn't need to stay at the scene making things worse.
- as long as proper information is exchanged why keep an already agitated animal at the scene. De-escuoate the scenario and take the animal out of the stressful situation.
- If someone is injured then yes but dogs are pack animals so sometimes small scuffles occur
- To stay for a period of time with a distressed dog does not help de-escalate the situation.
- This really depends on severity if the bite. Has an injury occurred? Was it accidental (someone grabbed the dog from behind and scared it?), was it playful and being misconstrued as vicious? If the incident is serious enough, most people try to get their dogs and themselves AWAY rather than stick around.
- People should exchange information and interviews can happen in a less stressful environment for everyone. The are 3 sides story and reality often lies somewhere in the middle.
- You cannot legislate morality.
- "It may not be safe to keep the owner at the scene with their dog if a dog needs to be removed from an attack and safely secured. The wait time would also be an issue. It should be a requirement that people carry and provide proper ID and contact information in the event of a bite or attacks.

- I also STRONGLY OPPOSE breed specific legislation. The current legislation is fair, science-based, and holds owners accountable. Other cities such as Edmonton, Montreal or Quebec as a whole, or even cities in the USA have tried to use Calgary's animal control bylaw to develop their own. Calgary is an example to other jurisdictions when it comes to breed restrictions and fairness and there should be NO change to that aspect. Again keep owners accountable. Laws should only be to make better pet owners, not to punish good people with good dogs because
- Of how they look. Breed profiling is the same as racial discrimination, which is rightfully condemned in this city and Country."
- Dog specific legislation is completely unnecessary and ignorant.
- As a responsible dog owner would already exchange info with the other party. No need to involve an enforcement officer. Sounds like fear mongering.
- Some bites are harmless and people will still try and get the dog euthanized/taken away for a small harmless nip. If they are given the authority to always be in the right, dog owners will be the ones who suffer.
- Contact information should be shared and a statement given if necessary. However if the dog owner still has the dog who has attacked with him/her they should safely remove that dog from the scene so as to not cause more trauma to anyone involved.
- They don't need to stay on scene, as long as the proper information has been exchanged.
- Share contact information and get the dog out of the environment that cause the incident. By allowing the dog to stay at the scene you're risking aggravating it more. I believe everyone should be accountable but we also need to trust that owners know what their dog needs to diffuse potentially more situations.
- As long as both parties exchange information this is adequate similar to a car accident
- The dog should be brought home as to not have an option of this happening while waiting for bylaw
- Only if they bit another animal. Otherwise, why should they? Dogs only bite humans when provoked. I was bit by a dog badly and I realize this, so should everyone else. Learn to respect animals.
- Sometimes removing the dog from a situation is the safest for both the dog and victim. There should be a way they can get in contact after though.
- It may be unsafe for the owner to do so.
- "No for minor nips or bites. Most times I've witnessed, teasing, annoying or irritating the dog causes the bite.
- Yes for major bites or attacks."
- No, any reports that need to be filed can be done at home.
- In some cases the dog may have been provoked and remaining at the scene may cause further harm to the victim and or the dog. I believe there should be mandatory reporting by the owner to bylaw services; Similar to a hit and run.
- No.. that's a weird situation.
- Not unilaterally. The dig may have been protecting its owner from a legitimate threat from that individual.

- This is a highly emotional situation...the dog needs to be removed, they sense tension etc and it will only exacerbate the situation. I feel work needs to be done to help the person that was bitten also. There should be a program that reintroduces the person the was bitten into the dog community and educates them on dog behavior and interaction as well. Some people have worse behavior than dogs and cause these events.
- After an attack information should be shared but often the injured dog will need to be rushed to an emergency vet
- I've had people complain about a dog bit several hours to months after and didn't even know it happened or wasn't told. If its serious enough and there is a severe injury then yes. But if the person continues to go on there way then how am I supposed to know it even happened. This has happened several times now. All of which were provoked bits, such as sticking their hand through my fence, taking away a ball that the dog wanted thrown and not throwing it so the dog took it back, feeding my dog at the dog park (that's a big NO, especially if you don't know the dog). All these were provoked and all of these I didn't find out about until a day or in the case of the fence a few months after (so not sure how true the fence one was then, I have my doubts it even happened because bylaw was never involved).
- Often the dog needs to be put away in a house or car. Making it remain at the scene only prolongs the problem while bylaw isn't always able to arrive for a long time.
- The person may have caused the dog to bite them. The owner should not have to stick around when the dog was defending them or itself.
- Enforcement officers are overloaded. There is no way that someone is going to wait outside in -20 for hours with a dog for them to show up.
- Often when a dog is being aggressive, it needs to be removed from the environment in order yo calm down. If the owner remained at the scene with the dog, it could worsen the situation. The owner should be able to leave the scene, calm the dog, or put the dog away (in a vehicle or building) and return to the scene.
- The owner staying at the scene means the dog is required to stay at the scene and further incident may occur
- I can see the two owners being together waiting for an officer causing an even bigger fight between the people and causing more unnecessary stress on the animals who should be taken out of the situation to calm down
- The owner of an animal that bites should exchange all contact information with the victim. The owner should also remain if the situation warrants it, i.e. the victim requires medical assistance, or the attack is severe.
- It's best to get said animal away from the scene to prevent further attacks.
- Regardless of what actually happened the dog is always deemed at fault.
- That puts both the dog and the owner at risk for a further altercation with the other people involved in the incident. Alternately, if somehow they did not know of the 'bite' (possibly a puppy nipping a child) and it was unreported to them it is unreasonable to expect this.

- If the owner can effectively keep his dog under control after the incident, then staying at the scene would make sense. If not, and if there is a long wait time for authorities to arrive or if medical attention is needed, then if personal information is exchanged between parties, leaving the scene makes sense
- Only should be taken to this level if the bite is more of a wound than a scrape, responsible dog owners will ensure it is handled on their own
- The 2 parties talk it out and see where it goes
- "Treat these as vehicle accidents
- If police are called all parties involved stay...,if no law enforcement is called it is a private matter between the effected parties"
- You don't know if the dog was already beaten, you don't know if the stranger came up to pet the dog without asking. Dogs on leashes prevent this.
- If the dog is protecting its owner, the owner should legally be allowed to leave. Dogs only bite when provoked or when they feel their owner is in danger. Requiring the owner to stay puts the owner in legal trouble for fleeing a dangerous scene.
- Responsible owners should be able to take care of things by themselves without getting a paid officer involved- other things are more urgent I'm sure!
- The victim of the bite human or dog may have antagonized the dog to the point of biting. The scene of the bite could continue to be too stressful for the good dog. The owner should be asked to contact enforcement but they shouldn't have to wait at the scene.
- When dogs play even small ones they can play bite, as well as accident bites where the dog went for a toy and accidentally got a person's hand. Exchange of information should only occur for severe issues that occur
- I believe they should have to discuss it with law enforcement however you've just had a dog bite someone. The dog needs to calm down and sitting and waiting for more people to show up is asking for a repeat offense. The dog should be taken home and the dog owner should be contacted for questions
- Owner should give contact info and remove the dog from the scene. The dog will already be stressed and if people are arguing it won't calm the dog down.
- The dog should be removed from the scene to prevent further confrontations. Obviously if there was a biting incident the dog felt threatened or was trying to protect its owner. The owner should remove the animal from the situation and be required to call in and give a report.
- Not sure an enforcement officer could get to the scene in a timely manner.
- Something like that would need to allow for them to remove their dog from the situation immediately and/or take them to their veterinarian for treatment of injuries if necessary immediately.
- I think this is a very vague question as it only gives yes or no options without further going into detail. Was a child pulling a dog's tail and after multiple warnings the dog snapped? Then no, I do not think anything reprocution should be had to the dog as the child and the child's parents so clearly lack intelligence but because the dog can't say anything you automatically assume the dog has anger issues and must be put down? Do you put children down for biting other children???

- the dog is stressed, it will be more stressed with officers around. Horrible situation for everyone. Let the owner go home and speak to them where you can't just take their dog
- Requirement should be to give contact info to other owner unless severe issues caused. As we know enforcement officers do not always come/cannot come in a timely fashion
- Removing the dog from the situation immediately is safer for everyone to prevent further bites.
- While this situation is ideal. The best thing for safety is to remove the animal from the scene as quickly as possible to limit future damage.
- not unless it is a severe bite.
- Sometimes owners need to leave to avoid escalation and violent retaliation aimed at them and their dogs even for as little as a nip or a scratch
- Dogs get into altercations occasionally. If it's short, minor and dealt with by the parties involved why add extra layers and create a problem when there isn't one.
- It is not a big deal unless the bite did serious damage in which case yes, the person should stay to make sure the injured person or animal is okay.
- Exchange information and go home, allowing each party to de-escalate and/or seek medical/veterinary attention.
- I would say yes, if it were rephrased to say "if a dog bites a person, or other animal causing injury". Sometimes dogs nip each other during play, and no harm is done. It would be a waste of resources to have to have an enforcement officer come out for such an event.
- If someone is injured maybe, but if both parties are fine then nothing should be held against the dog and the owner should take liability.
- It is important for people to accept their own risk when going out in public
- Are we going to require this for every dog bite? I've had more small dogs bite me or be aggressive than big ones ever have. You need to get a clue about pit bulls. It's absolutely ridiculous
- Contact information should be exchanged but getting the aggressive dog away from the situation should be priority
- The situation may be such that remaining at the site could result in a dog becoming more distressed and attacking again.
- It all depends on the severity of the bite. If it was a minor one that caused no injury i do not see why we should waste both parties time including pulling an officer to the scene.
- Only in cases of severe injury caused on propose. For any other reason we do not know if the other animal instigated something , or if the dog in question bit to defend oneself.
- The owner should share contact info with the person involved and both can agree to stay if really needed or discuss later.
- People fighting other people find conflict resolution. so do dogs. If they don't, it is an owners responsibility to understand the nature of their dog and avoid situations that may cause a violent attack.
- In my experience, dog bites are ALWAYS due to the behavior of the person. Whether they did not understand the way the dog was feeling, or they caught the dog unawares. I've been bit plenty of times, and it has NEVER been the owners fault, nor should they have to deal with the repercussions of ignorant strangers.

- Information must be, at minimum, shared with the victim. If refused, must wait for enforcement officer.
- places to be sometimes. Dog bites are not crimes, people need to just avoid animals if they dont think they can protect themselves.
- The aggressive dog being removed from the situation should be the first response, after that the owner should make every attempt to provide contact information.
- Needs to be defined more clearly, as to the severity of the bite. Dogs often nip at other dogs while playing, or wrestling, or chasing each other.
- "Yes because there needs to be accountability for dog bites and for the safety of the one bitten. Contact exchange is a MUST.
- No, because of a dog has gotten so anxious they're biting/being aggressive, that dog needs to go home or away from the stressful environment - for the safety of EVERYONE involved."
- The owner may need to remove the dog from the situation asap due to the over-stimulation. I agree info needs to be passed on, but it may be traumatic to the people onsite, the victim, the owners and the dog to be forced to remain on scene to talk to an enforcement officer directly.
- I do agree that the owner of the offending dog MUST give their contact information to the person injured (or owner of the injured dog). I don't think remaining at the scene is always necessary and may sometimes be bad (offending dog needs to be removed from area)
- People need to take responsibility for their children- walking up to strange dogs, sticking hands in their face etc- the blame and responsibility should not all be on the dog owner
- Unless they need medical attention, no. It's between the two people and how they want to deal with the situation. If they feel a officer is necessary that should be there choice. It would just waste peoples time.
- It is better if the owner removes the animal from the scene immediately to prevent further injury.
- I think leaving information is good but they should be allows to remove their animal to a safe location to keep the incident from escalating.
- Dogs sometimes injure each other yes. Perhaps the dog that got bit was the problem and not the one biting. Dogs need to learn how to read when a dog isn't happy with them and when to back off.
- It is often the person bits fault but no one will believe that anyway
- If there are no serious injuries no enforcement is necessary. Minor incidents happen.
- Exchange of information would suffice.
- Often can be resolved talking to the parties involved
- I think the owner should leave their personal contact information with the affected person. I think it is safer for everyone if the owner promptly secure their dog back at home rather than waiting for bylaw to show up. The information obtained can be given to the bylaw officer to follow up. Staying at the scene with the animal could make the situation more unsafe.
- This won't help those who wouldn't stay anyway. Anyone with any morals would stay and exchange info anyway.

- Cause maybe the dog did it because it was unsure of a situation or wasn't comfortable with a situation so the best thing wouldn't to stay there it be to take the dog out of the situation
- A dog owner can offer his help to a person or his dog and provide it.
- If I am bit by a dog or my dog is bit by another, I can handle it myself. I do not need an "enforcement officer" to be dispatched. Furthermore, this could result in the need for more officers to be hired if this becomes legislation and who will have to pay their wages? Me. I do not feel like paying another government official's salary through my taxes or potentially seeing increased taxes to accommodate that change.
- Depends on the situation and impact of the bite, if there is an injury then yes for sure, if a minor graze or no sign of anything then no
- Sharing information should be sufficient rather than having to also stay and wait.
- Depends on severity
- Let me outline this scenario: if a dog is acting aggressive towards my pup (pit-bull lab mix) and is not leaving us alone due to the lack of training on the other owners part, and their dog bites mine, then mine bites back in defensive, you're telling me I have to stay on scene regardless of the incident not being my doing nor my dog's? Rather than seeking medical treatment if needed or leaving the situation to prevent further escalation? If an "enforcement officer" come to scene after such a situation, how is there to be a fair decision? The officer wasn't present during the incident & in my experience, people lie and begin twisting events once law enforcement is present to sway favour in their direction. I see this going only one way, the dog receiving the short end of the stick due to lack of evidence or facts and potentially being labeled vicious, unpredictable or a nuisance. Let's say a chihuahua and a American Pit Bull Terrier are involved in an altercation, the stigma regarding bully breeds will unnecessarily be dragged into the situation and now we will already have the cards stacked against us. In the animal kingdom touch is used as a form of communication between dogs, whether its a nip, a bite or a paw swat. It is used to say "whatever energy you're bringing right now is not calm and controlled enough for my liking." And the worst culprits for chaotic energy are puppies who have not yet learned discipline, commands and calm energy. So the best way for dogs to communicate is through their touch - they can't talk, so they may nip to correct another's behaviour. Even mother dog's can bite their pups to correct their behaviour and snap them out of their bad forming habits. So if this were to be legislation, and for example, a crazy, untrained, wild energy puppy or dog comes around me & my dog and my dog nips him without harm, you're telling me I have to stay on site and talk to an enforcement officer? When all my dog was doing was correcting another dog's unstable behaviour and snapping them out of a chaotic state, and now we have to talk to an officer? I would rather leave the situation so both dogs can be separated, not drag out the situation if no harm is done.
- I would support it if the bite resulted in obvious injury
- I feel like maybe exchange information similar to a car accident. But if there are medical issues that need to be seen, I rather have the owner take the dog to the clinic.
- Sharing information should be required but the victim should not be forced to have prolonged contact with the dog.

- I agree if a dog bites someone or another animal then definitely the right thing to do is cooperate with the other owner and enforcement officers... but I don't necessarily think this needs to be made into a law. Sometimes both parties are fine with not going forward, sometimes it's only a little altercation and not a big deal etc. But maybe something involving serious altercations only would work?
- Dogs are animals. Biting is a natural way of communication for them. This would make the way that dogs interact a legal issue and to me that is unacceptable.
- If the dog is provoked, then staying at the scene will make it more stressed and increase the severity of the situation. If the owner could return home with their pet then the animal can calm down before being looked at by officers. There should be an exchange of information, but then they should be allowed to part ways.
- That would prolong the trauma to the bitten person. I would support a rule that said they couldn't leave until they provided contact info and a photo.
- That could aggravate the dog and make them seem more aggressive
- I support the mandatory exchange of information but provisions need to be in place to limit the victim's exposure to the offending dog.
- I support the mandatory exchange of information but provisions need to be in place to limit the victim's exposure to the offending dog.
- Unless there is a standard of immediate response this is not a good use of resources.... Better to have a standard format for exchange of information - and signage that makes the general public aware of the information needed to trace and follow up. Such as picture of the dog tags with numbers and the driver's license of the individual. Put the onus on the dog owner to properly provide that information and to report the incident. That ensures that the victim does not have to stay exposed to dog that is a concern.... AND forces the accountability of such reports on the responsible party...
- No because the situation could escalate, instead information should be exchanged and the situation should be resolved when owners are hands free
- Remaining on site with an agitated dog is not a good idea, and there needs to be a de-escalation of the situation. Otherwise the dog is likely to continue showing aggressive behavior which makes the situation worse.
- Dogs when playing xan nip but I don't really think that counts as a bite so I think a lot of scared people will be reporting stupid [removed] and wasting everyone's time
- "Person yes another animal no
- People in dog parks over react and freak out when dogs are just playing. Accidents happen dogs get excited it's the nature of pet ownership"
- Just be honest and level headed with person and swap information why get an "officer" involved.
- Only if it's safe to stay. But they have to give their contact info
- Some times people just think they can come over and touch your dog it's not always the owner responsibility
- I don't think the dog should stay at the scene

- Too few enforcement officers for this to be timely and therefore realistic expectation.
- Dog might be hard to handle and could potentially harm someone else. Maybe require personal information to be given so police can follow up.
- If the dog requires medical care or needs to be removed from the situation for the safety of others then I don't the owner should be penalized for that.
- Depends on the severity. If it's at an off leash park there is some inherent risk in being there. If someone/ animal is obviously injured then yes.
- The severity of bite would determine if staying at the scene were necessary.
- Leaves grey area. Is the bite minor? Do we really have to stand around awkwardly if our dogs were smelling each other then one nipped the other and we both talk or say sorry and everything is dealt with? I think it would be a no, but the rule as stated says incidents. Is it against the bylaw/law to walk away and will the people be held accountable for a mutual agreement?
- There's just not enough information. How long would it take the officer to arrive? What if the weather is horrible and staying in it for an indeterminate length of time could harm the dog or owner? What if there is a hostile crowd and they don't feel safe?
- Absolutely not. It is unconstitutional to require any person to speak to an officer.
- I think this should be based on severity of the injury. I also think that this would create staffing issues for bylaw officers if they are required to respond to all incidents especially if they are minor. As a responsible pet owner, I believe it is your duty to exchange information (just like in a car accident). If a person or animal is severely injured, I believe bylaw officers should be contacted.
- Unnecessary.
- Who's responsibility would it be to enforce the dog owner remain at the scene?
- The victim will only see the dog attacking. The owner will see everything, including whether or not the victim drove the dog to attack.
- I work with dogs on a daily bases and I have learned body language and behaviours of dogs I am also working to become a fearful and reactive dog trainer "aggressive" if an incident was to happen it most likely happened out of fear from the dog so keeping the dog in the situation would make it worse. That is my professional and knowledge based opinion
- I do not support requiring someone to remain "at a scene" for what could be a minor incident or one triggered by another. I do support required exchange of contact information. That should be enough. We don't require drivers to remain at the scene of an accident if no injuries or damage above a certain amount. Minor first aid could be a guideline. Heavy bleeding wounds, broken bones or ambulance being called should be requirements for people to stay at the scene.
- Despite your desire to rid Canada of the Charter we still have the right to not incriminate ourselves.
- Question is unclear. Define "if necessary." Rules are not meant to be left at discretion of enforcement officers. When it comes to biting it depends on the situation. If a dog is protecting against violent assault, they should not be made to remain at scene of incident.
- Unless extenuating circumstances present, such as seeking medical care for human or pet. But must provide contact information to someone at the scene, or contact bylaw within 48 hrs of the incident

- NOT ALL BITES ARE FAULT OF DOG.
- It's simply the right thing to do. If people are going to leave the scene I'm not sure a law would change that.
- I don't think that you should be forced to give out your personal contact information with a stranger for safety reasons
- It may not be positive to keep and agitated dog there
- Some incidents can be trivial or a result of play behavior, and this rule is very susceptible to overreach. This would be too complex to manage & enforce.
- The offending dog may need to be contained if it is in an frenzied state.
- Dogs bite each other, it's not always an 'incident'.
- As an individual who has been attacked by a dog, I think the most important thing in such an event is to ensure the safety of all involved. The 'nuisance' dog should be removed from the immediate scene, which in many situations requires the owner to leave as well.
- no
- Yes, but they do need to be allowed to remove the dog from the scene and place the dog under control. Medical treatment for human or dog may need to be sought first. A requirement for sharing contact information should be all that is necessary.
- Pitbulls are not vicious. The owners are the issue. I can't believe you guys are even considering these options about innocent breeds. Shame on you
- if people can sort things on their own why does there have to be a rule. People instigate problems
- I don't support this because the priority would be removing the dog and deescalating the Immediate situation which I believe in most situations would require an owner to leave with and tend to the upset dog. A follow up system/protocol could be explored instead.
- Stressful for dog, unfair to keep in stressful situation
- I don't agree with this at all for the simple fact that usually when a dog bites someone/animal it's because it was scared hurt or antagonized..... and if a dog is aggressive towards another dog it's because it wasn't socialized properly
- If the people exchange information that should be sufficient. It can take a long time for someone to get there
- Share contact information yes but if whatever caused a dog to reach the point of a bite I do not think it is wise to keep the dog in that situation for any longer than absolutely necessary.
- A dog that just bit someone or another animal must be removed from the situation immediately. I think it's fair to say that they must return their dog to a safe place then come back, but it is important to remove an animal from a situation that induced enough fear for them to bite first.
- It should be reported and there should be contact information shared. It should also be possible for the owner to remove the dog from the situation to prevent any further issues.
- Dogs can be scared or feel threatened in an unknown place. A home visit would be much more appropriate. Then you can asses the living quarters and life style of the people who own the dog.
- Just get a peace officer give them a job
- Give information and leave. Situations continue to escalate.

- Just exchange information
- honestly, I don't trust bylaw officers and worry that they would apprehend and punish a dog that may simply require some behaviour training, or that may have been provoked or triggered in some way before the bite
- Not always possible or necessary
- Privacy
- Support mandatory exchange of information but do not support prolonged exposure of victim to offending dog.
- I think if the dog has bitten it may need to be taken home as to not be aggravated more and as long as someone has the contact info it can be followed up with
- I don't agree with police getting involved in something so trivial. Unless the dog kills someone or another dog there is no need for an officer.
- Based on other parts of this survey, it seems possible that an enforcement officer could seize the dog, require euthanization, or have breed-based prejudice. Dogs need love and care in order to not be violent, and the measures an enforcement officer could take could make things worse for the dog rather than better
- If authorities are called, sure it may be a good requirement. Some people do not press any charges, so what's the point of waiting around
- would support exchanging of information but the victim of a bite should not be submitted to longer exposure to the offending dog then necessary, this would be very traumatic to the victim.
- I don't think the enforcement officer is necessary. They can exchange info if necessary and not be required to remain at the scene until an officer arrives.
- Sometimes it's safer for an owner to remove a dog from the situation. Requiring them to stay if they can't control their dog in the first place could force them to choose between getting a ticket or risking the repetition of the aggressive behaviour.
- I feel like they should provide their contact info but if it is safer to remove the dog and the owner with the dog then they should not have to remain at the scene. As long as they have their contact info to ensure proper follow up and tests.
- I would rather that contact information is shared and that the dog is taken home to prevent further incidents. If a dog was stressed/scared enough to bite, it's not going to help to keep it in that situation longer.
- If there has been an incident - I think it's better for the owner to be allowed to leave to take the animal home and de-escalate the situation immediately.
- Some scenarios only require a 'sorry'. For 'attacks' yes. Most dogs that bite only bite because they were provoked by the other person.
- Some dogs nip when people invade their space. I've had runners for example waving their fingers in my dog's face as they run up to my dog... if she was to bite in that situation it would be a nip to tell whoever's she doesn't like what is happening. Should I spend time waiting around for someone... no. If it draws blood then I would stay and report.

- I would support this if there the language was more specific. I do not think it should be necessary for nips and small bites that do not resolve in injury.
- Not if the dog bit a trespassers or was protecting the owner in a volatile situation.
- There needs to be a better definition of “bite” before enforcing a rule like this (e.g. caused visible harm) in order to prevent prejudice (people calling enforcement for a fake or exaggerated incident because they don't like dogs or the owner).
- No, sharing of information should be between the people/animals involved in the incident to decide the outcome. No involvement of an enforcement officer should be required.
- Often in these situations, when dogs are involved in an altercation, the dogs need to be separated and removed from the scene to calm them down. I would be concerned that being required to stay on scene for a long time could bring some stress to the animals.
- Depends on the situation. There are reasons dogs bite..
- Dogs only bite if they feel threatened or were trained badly. Don't stick your hand in front of a dogs face if you don't know that dog.
- This should not be required unless the bite is so severe that it requires emergency medical attention
- The owner should be allowed to get the dog out of the situation.
- depends on what happen and the pet owner should be at fault not the animal
- Contact information should be exchanged. The victimized dog may require immediate attention and the owner departs the scene. As such, who is holding the aggressor accountable to stay on scene.
- Check what you did wrong and what the other person or dog did wrong.
- because if a dog is biting they are exhibiting a stress response, likely caused by the person they bit. They need to be removed to a calming environment.
- As long as the dog leaves the scene then the owner can stay.
- As long as the dog owner's contact information is passed along so that an enforcement officer is able to contact them, in certain situations allowing the owner to remove the dog from the situation may be the safest action.
- Tough one. I think that when incidents like that happen everyone involved is highly emotional and I can see it deteriorating to fighting between owners. I don't think they need to remain but they absolutely need to share contact information. There should be severe penalties for providing misinformation though.
- There is no way that it can be enforced. By law officers will take hours to get there. The Police will never show up. This would be waste of City tax payer resources.
- If an attack requires emergency care or if the animal was acting in defense of their owner, this rule could leave victims or at risk parties in peril. (le delays in medical care being received, lingering in unsafe area waiting for bylaw officers)
- That could create a situation that could escalate even more. The owner should remove the dog from the area, however should be required to call to provide necessary information or have someone remain back at the scene (if an option) to provide that information

- I think the person should be accountable, but if the dog just bit someone, it's probably stressed out. I guess giving contact info should be mandatory, but staying and waiting for cops will make it worse and lead to more bites.
- Unless the bite requires hospitalization of the individual the dog owner should be free to continue. Especially if all parties are present in a location where they know dogs are.
- While it is important to share information. I think it is much more important to remove the distressed animals first. To prevent further harm from occurring
- If the dog is in a frenzied state and there is no way to contain the dog, other than returning home, they should be directed to return as soon as possible though.
- There are many situations where the owner may need to leave the scene of the incident, such as to find the dog if it's run off or to take the injured to the hospital, etc. The owner should be responsible for regaining control of the dog (back on leash), getting help for the injured (calling 911 or assisting in transport to a hospital), and for reporting the incident to the police (even if the incident has already been reported by the victim or victim's owner)
- It would be better to leave ID or contact information so the dog can be taken safely home and away from the bite victim.
- I support it being necessary to share information
- This event is traumatic for both the owner who's dog has bitten another, and the victim. The dog owner may often need to remove their dog from the heightened state of that incident for the safety of everyone, and the wellbeing of that dog for what may have triggered them to react that way. The dog owner should provide contact information to the victim, and be able to be contacted by an enforcement officer, should that person deem reporting necessary. It should not be a detriment if the owner needs to take their dog away from that environment.
- If a dog bites a person, the owner should be able to be contacted later, but they have a agitated and upset animal to attend too. Dogs don't bite for no reason and keeping an owner and an agitated pet at the scene doesn't sound smart
- Too stressful for animals involved
- The animals may need to be removed from the situation ASAP and could get worse if they have to stay at the scene
- If the dog is acting up, best to remove from the scenario as soon as possible
- its to general if a dog bites a person then yes other dogs no that's not uncommon in dog parks each situation is different a blanket statement is to broad
- Dogs will occasionally bite/nip each other and half of the people around can't tell the difference between play, warning for nuisance behavior, and actual aggression. Every insecure pet owner will be calling bylaw as soon as two dogs start playing/wrestling and wasting bylaws time. There has to be a better/narrower classification than "bites a person or other animal"
- It would be best for owners to share information and bylaw officers to meet with all parties after the animals and victims safety can be insured. Long waits for a bylaw officer in a place that is away from home is not appropriate. This could further traumatize both the victim and/or animals involved.

- Why do you instantly assume it is the dog who bites fault? Most dogs who bite do so because they're stressed or scared.
- No info on how long an enforcement officer would take, no info on what would happen to human or dog involved, there needs to be a set and clear process so that everyone knows what is going on - and no wonder people would run if this happens
- Law enforcement do not act responsibly and there is a reasonable chance they would provoke the dog, and/or shoot to kill the dog or owner. This isn't a job for the police. The dog needs to go home after an incident like this. Not stay in the park with crowds, blood, yelling etc. (I'm concerned in what ways your research for these proposals has been balanced)
- They or injured party may need to go to Vets or hospital. They should however give their details to the other party. Enforcement officer may not arrive for an hour or more.
- I think the queen is stupid
- This opens the door for bored, agitated dog owners to start calling every time their dogs are playing at an off leash park, as dogs often play with their teeth.
- [removed]
- No
- Some people are nasty and judge dogs on breeds, like yourselves judging pitbulls with this survey which can I point out is disgusting and ignorant, and no dog deserves to be put down, which some people would ultimately try to push for out of spite.
- This one's not as simple. Situations like these can become challenging, especially if it isn't clear who's dog was at fault or if both dogs were fine in the end. An owner may have to leave the scene quickly if their pet needs medical assistance or they may not have time to wait around for bylaw to arrive. Furthermore, if the other party, human or dog, is (still) confrontational, then this poses a risk to those in the area and it would irresponsible not to remove the aggressive dog from the scene. It would also be difficult to police a situation like this as every time a fight or dog disagreement happened, emotions run high, defensive mechanisms kick in, and people want to protect their pets. Forcing people to stay could contribute to further issues.
- PIT BULLS ARE NOT A BAD BREED
- I don't believe this is a black or white matter. It's subjective and every situation is different.
- If the dog needs to be removed from the situation, the owner needs to be able to get the dog away from the scene to prevent further attacks to people or other animals.
- Sometimes taking an upset animal away from the situation is the best solution.
- In some cases animals are provoked. An animal that it taunted and then bites is displaying a reasonable reaction. It is a case of he said she said and often the dog will lose out.
- Owner may/should stay & speak with Bylaw Officer only if the dog has a history of aggressive behavior. Also, Not a rule of law but case by case.
- it should not be necessary, and this bylaw is not necessary either.
- I think it is important to be able to get information from the person, however if their pet is still being aggressive it could be dangerous to do so.
- Only if safe to do so

- If this situation happens I feel both parties involved can work things out by themselves. If that can't happen in a civilized manner then you could involve an enforcement officer.
- Leave to de-escalate the situation. Then converse at a calmer place
- the dog could have been provoked by the person or animal. dog's do not bite simply for fun
- In theory the owner should stay on scene, but if a dog bites/attacks, the owners first priority should be removing and securing the dog. Next step should be to Formally report the incident.
- The dog doing the biting is likely heightened and is a continuing risk to others and should be removed from the area. A phone number should be given though.
- How do you distinguish between a predatory bite or a superficial play bite?
- As long as adequate info is exchanged between dog owners (ie, proof of phone number working and pic of ID or address) then owners can separate and talks with the enforcement officer on their own.
- Only if a dog bites a person. This is because dog to dog interactions may be hard to determine exactly what happened and what the severity of the incident was.
- I can see this becoming an abuse of power. People will wrongfully accuse owners, especially at dog parks if your dog is not close.
- Sounds like it could be opaque. Also not a good use of enforcement time and money.
- Bites can happen for a multitude of reasons. It is not always the dog doing the biting that is at fault.
- This rule is ignorant and misguided. If you expect the dog owner to remain, that means the dog remains as well. A large number of "dog attacks" stem from a dog feeling threatened or feeling their owner is being threatened. Sure, let's make them remain in an unsafe environment. Good work Calgary, really looking out for the safety of your citizens!
- Depends on the situation. If a dog that wasn't leashed approached a dog on a leash and was attacked I would blame the owner for not having control over his/her dog. If it is a serious bit that requires stitches absolutely but if it's a child or an adult that petted the dog without seeking the owners approval or teased the dog then I don't think it's necessary.
- I have a dog who was legally identified as violent. I keep her on a leash at all times however there are idiots who leave their dogs off leash no matter the location and if they ever approach my dog, she will kill them. I will not waste my time to stand there to explain my dog's behaviour when other people are irresponsible.
- It's rarely necessary. If Everytime a little dog bites an ankle you have to wait for bylaw... That would be ridiculous.
- "I actually became involved as a victim in a situation involving an uncontrolled dog.
- Having the owner stick around any longer would have made things worse because they didn't acknowledge their dog had an issue in the first place. For safety issues, I think sometimes it's best for victim, and dog/owner to go separate ways. This is a difficult question though, because if they are not obligated to share contact information they dog/owner might "flee" the attack, and leave the victim without resolution. I'm not quite sure how you would problem solve this. In my case, my family contacted the police department afterwards and filled out forms describing the event. I am not sure what happened to the owner/dog.

- This next comment pertains to 8) "Bandana Program":
- If a dog is at a park where children are expected to be present it needs to be trained properly. End of story. This proposed "Bandana Program" is a disgusting idea. I will tell you why. It places responsibility on children to monitor dog behavior, rather than the dog owners. In addition, a dog is either a) safe to be around or b) not safe to be around. Having "bandana colors" creates the idea that there is a gradient of what is deemed to be safe. Safety is one of the few things that is not a gradient. Whoever came up with this idea should be given a swift kick in the behind. Yes, I am talking to you."
- Owner should leave contact information & remove the dog from scene to a safe, secure location. Location of dog & owner needs to be left at scene as well.
- This will only escalate problems. Allow people to proceed away from each other and remove the dogs involved to a safe location. Then, allow for a peace or bylaw officer to examine the facts in a deescalating manner.
- The environment they are in could be what is causing the animal to be aggressive. I think it would be better to let the dog be in an environment where it feels safe before a stranger approaches them
- Depending on the severity - more severe should be required to stay if necessary.
- If serious enough a enforcement officer should be involved if not the owners should be able to exchange info
- Only if the bylaw officer can arrive within 15 minutes.
- I say no, hoping that for the most part people are able to work out the issues with their dog. Depending on the severity and the type of incident bylaw should be involved. I honestly don't think bylaw officers would be able to decipher the breakdown of a dog fight anyway. Unless they're properly trained in dog behaviour.
- Minor bites don't warrant this but severe ones do.
- This could take way too long. What if the officer doesn't show for 3 hours or something?
- I think it should be required to share contact information, but not require the dog to remain at a scene as the dog may be dangerous in the case of a severe bite, or simply highly stressed/defensive/reactive in the case of a minor bite (which could have been provoked unintentionally through someone approaching and reaching in on the dog without permission). Best for the owner to take the dog home and debrief with enforcement officer at home or over phone.
- I agree that information should be shared, but I feel that it would be safer for everyone to remove the dog from whichever situation or stimuli that may have triggered the aggression.
- Exchanging info's will be sufficient
- The dog bite may have occurred due to an attack on the owner or the dog themselves, in self defense. Having to remain in that dangerous situation does not make sense. They should absolutely be responsible for following up with an enforcement officer at a time when it is safe for all parties involved.
- Dogs will bite. Get over it.

- City must really be hurting for money since covid, eh?
- There are some 'victims' that over dramatize the event and cause unnecessary stress to the dog and the owner of said dog. Also, if the dog bit out of defence or terror it's on the 'victim' not the dog or the owner.
- At the off leash animals bite other animals in play. Bites are not always vicious. I think if a dog bites an animal or human in an act of aggression then the owner will and should take the responsibility and ensure it is dealt with.
- Encourage exchange of information, but don't believe the victim of a dog bite should be exposed to offending dog longer than necessary. That dog should be taken home/to safety as quickly as possible.
- Unless you can guarantee the dog wouldn't be taken away on the spot and that there would be no more than a 30 min wait. I feel like an exchange of information would most like suffice.
- I think it is responsible for them to provide contact information and talk with an enforcement officer, but staying at the scene may put them or their animal at risk and should not be a requirement.
- This seems like a no brainer that the answer would be yes, however, continuing to expose the dog to the stimulus could lead to further bites or harm. This could in fact be more dangerous to the people, animals and dog involved.
- [removed]
- Sometimes it may be necessary for an owner to remove the offending dog from a situation for the safety of other people/pets as well as their own safety.
- It doesn't need to be law but it should be done.
- May be best to take the dog home and meet w/ the officers later that same day.
- Depending on the severity of it and also the situation. What happens if a dog attacks another dog but the dog who did nothing gets blamed because of its breed. I see it on the daily with pit bulls. Someone's dog will bite a pit bull and walk away without a scratch and still try and blame the person with a pit bull simply because of their breed when the pit bull literally did nothing and tried to run away. People are very extra with things and there are way too many people who just like to complain over nothing at all. Why should someone lose their dog because an ignorant person just had a bad day and wants to make other people pay for it.
- Contact information needs to be shared however I think the dog should be removed from the situation which is not always possible if the person is required to stay while waiting for an enforcement officer
- Does not always work (eg. animal needs medical attention). I feel that others will abuse this policy.
- If it was just people I'd say yes but you are grouping both together and I think two very separate issues.
- "This rule relies far too heavily on the character of individuals. Those who are law abiding and 'consciously good' citizens will stay with or without rules present, as in auto accidents. There is no need to enforce rules that come with potentially serious charges upon good citizens, and make a stressful situation even more so. The presence of enforcement officers should only be required if the humans involved become confrontational.

- Those few individuals who will “run away”, are akin to those who “hit and run” in auto accidents - you can impose rules and fines, but they care little."
- If someone was messing with your dog and got themselves bit, that shouldn't interfere with your whole afternoon waiting on useless police to show up
- It could be in self defense. Many people walk their dogs off leash, and if that dog approaches mine (which is always on leash), mine will likely bite out of defense. My dog and I are not at fault because the other person has no control over their dog. No leash, no control, no right for me to explain why my dog may bite.
- I think it is common decency to remain at the scene with your dog and to exchange contact info, etc but enforcing that by law would be tricky and is I think unnecessary
- Absolutely not. They should have to disclose name and contact information, as well as dog tag information, however they should Be able to remove the dog from the situation to ensure the safety of the animal.
- As long as all information is exchanged if owner is not comfortable sharing with victim or family then wait for officer
- ONLY if it is a bite as some dog are mouthy and use their mouth to direct and it is not a bite
- "Contact information for the owner of
- The dog who bit will be taken and an officer will contact when appropriate. As a veterinarian, leaving the dog to wait will set the dog up to bite again if it's still near it's trigger for biting in the first place"
- What constitutes a bite to one person is a playful nibble to others.
- What about if a kid fights another kid, or a person scares another person. This is negative IQ.
- Just like an a motor vehicle accident it should be required to exchange info and complete a report. Also with an MVC the officer completing the report should not be the one deciding fault (in an MVC police complete the report but do not decide fault - insurance companies decide fault)
- "They're animals. Bites are going to happen.
- If the event causes immobility or the dog requires serious surgery, yes. Similar to how we file an accident report when the damage is beyond a certain threshold."
- The dog should be taken home away from where it is causing problems.
- Sometimes it is safer to immediately remove the agitator to a safe place, then return to give info.
- I would say if a young small pup nipped another animal, or a minor skirmish between dogs the owner should consult with the other owner and if they agree everything is okay, fine. If any injury warranting treatment to a human, by law officers and possibly police should be brought in depending on circumstances. The owner should definitely remain at the scene.
- If a dog bites someone or an incident occurs, the dog is not in the right frame of mind to stay around the people involved.
- "I believe that the animal(s) should be removed from the scene as to not escalate the situation. Dogs can feed off their owners energy. If there is heightened emotions and/or voices, this can cause another incident to occur.
- An exchange of information needs to happen and enforcement should be notified as soon as the situation is deemed safe."

- Provide contact info, yes. But may need to separate the dogs for safety reasons.
- No because the number one goal after a dog fight is to get your dog away from the other dog
- Other animal is too vague
- having the animal present may cause more trauma for the victim
- If the dog bites, the dog needs to be taken home and not left to stay and possibly cause further problems. Common sense.
- Dogs often play fight at off leash parks. Owners sometimes get in the way unnecessarily, or in an inappropriate way. There would be a lot of calls for very minor bites or scratches, and it would be a waste of resources to have an enforcement officer come out every time.
- Remaining at the scene after a bite incident could further escalate the situation or put others in harm's way.
- But must provide contact information to other party
- It might be necessary to seek immediate medical help for the animal
- they should give their info yes but if they have a vicious dog they should immediately remove it from the situation.
- Separate the animals and have bylaw contact each owner separately
- Yes and no. If it's for the safety of others I think the dog that has bitten either a person or another dog should remove the dog from the situation and take them home immediately. I think if another dog was attacked the owner of the attack dog should be responsible for vet fees if the dog requires medical attention. If the dogs were play fighting, as they do, then both owners should be responsible for vet fees if required.
- People could abuse this rule and say that their dog was bit with no evidence as to the perpetrator
- Let the owner go home and get their dog settled but they must share their contact info with someone to pass onto By-law and they can go to their house. Can be a heated situation when this happens
- Must normally stay on scene if not threatened. If threatened, or feel unsafe, must go directly to police station. This rule should also apply to traffic collisions, to prevent vigilante "justice".
- People will take advantage, causing more harm. It also puts people at risk of being harmed by the person that claims to have been bitten
- No it is more dangerous for a dog that has already attacked to stay at a scene for bylaw to arrive as risk is higher for another bite
- Depends on the situation - in some situations, the offending dog should be removed from the scene as soon as possible so no further aggression occurs, in which case the owner cannot stay
- "Dog bite when the play"
- One needs to know the difference between aggressive behavior and playful."
- I think law enforcement is busy enough without adding this problem to their list.
- At large dogs in an off leash area can aggressively approach packs being walked by responsible business owners. Should a pack animal defend the pack by biting an aggressive, at large dog, the business owner should not be required by law to remain at the scene. This could impact owners and walker's schedules alike.
- I support the rule if a dog bites a person, but not if it bites another animal.

- get the information of person and dog. it can take a long time for an enforcement officer to show up. and another thing, enough on the 'rules' I am so tired of this..just more tax money being spent in areas not necessary.
- I think that it's fair to require owners to provide contact information, however it could be the case that it might not be safe to remain at the scene. I.e. an agitated dog might need to be removed from the scene of the event (example, bite incident at dog park, unsafe to remain in the dog park, but would rather need to go to the parking lot or a quiet space away)
- If it is serious then yes, an owner should clearly remain or hurry to provide contact info but it's important to note an owner would also be responsible for removing the dog from the situation as quickly as possible and in the moment both the dog owner and the person/owner of dog bitten may also wish to remove themselves from the situation (de-escalate). It would be one person's word against another re who left or fled the scene, and it would be difficult to determine without willing witnesses. It is easy to demonize a dog/owner for behaviour and important to remember that many good dogs can react due to another person or dog's behaviour. I've seen incidents at parks in which someone's dog was the problem dog but another dog was blamed when it escalated. So it's often best to leave when there is a non-serious situation.
- If an animal has been in that kind of an incident sometimes the best thing is to take the animal home instead of keeping it in the environment that escalated to a bite.
- The dog should be removed from the situation and taken to a safe place - ideally put in a crate/kennel. Leaving them there in a high emotion/stress situation is a recipe for disaster.
- in recognition of the inequity surrounding the safety and welfare of racialized calgarians already at risk from inequitable police enforcement, it must be allowable that if someone's pet defends their owner's safety, they are not under pressure from police or the city to prove their victimhood in a situation.
- Take the dog to a safe place so no more incidents happen then wait for an officer
- Support mandatory exchange of information but do not support prolonged exposure of victim to offending dog. Staying at the location would only escalate the dogs and not provide a quick deescalation of the situation.
- It should be like any type of accident, information should be exchanged and any witness info as well but I don't feel you have to wait you could be waiting for hours
- If you have any experience with animals a dog bites because they are scared or hurt. Staying at the scene would not diffuse the situation. The enforcement officer should be met or go to home of attacker you discuss and hear what happened.
- Support mandatory exchange of information but do not support prolonged exposure of victim to offending dog.
- Is a dog bite from defending the owner or is it from defending itself. Dogs bit not only because they are bad animals it can also be a reaction to a bad situation. There can't be an automatic assumption of a crime or bad behavior if a dog bites back. I have seen many times where informed people know how to approach a new dog while others just jump in and scare a dog when greeting it. Like a vehicle accident. Take down information and proceed as necessary. But a blanket rule cannot be enforced.

- Most incidents are caused by the person or other creature that entices the dog to defend themselves
- I have owned, rescued and trained dogs, never a bite. The person bitten and dog owner can work things out (medical / vet assistance) and reimburse costs. If not, the person bitten can call police or bylaw to report it. People are the problem, rarely the dog unless cause (to protect owner, invasion of their space, prior abuse). Potential dog owner needs to invest time to get right dog breed for them. Public needs EDUCATION and respect boundaries (permission to touch owner's animal, stay out of fenced backyards, keep their dog on leash away from another dog, don't get upset at owner when told to not touch their dog). Any dog is capable of biting due to fear, skittishness and protecting owner from another person or dog. Most dog bites are from small breeds' anxiety when large breeds bite it's due to interpreting a reason (threat). Responsible owners know their dog's limits, walk and control them on a leash. You see many people walking their dog without and letting them stray into situations. Uphold the dog leash law and provide a Education Program: Understanding the Different Dog Breeds and How to Find the Right Dog for You. Education is badly missing for the public and you have to dig to get the right information.
- It depends on the severity and circumstances. Law Enforcement are not called to minor traffic accidents (fender benders) The same thinking can be applied here. If enforced both parties must remain and any witnesses to avoid bias against breeds.
- I think they need to share information however it is important to get the dog to a calm space so that another incident doesn't occur while waiting for an enforcement officer.
- Dogs may be provoked into biting, dogs may be legitimately defending their owner.
- We are not a police state. Respectable people and owners will voluntarily stay on scene and provide info.
- They had done so because of a reason. And thus it could be a mistake. So having such drastic measures such as contact info over a bite is a bite too much.
- It may be best to remove the offending animal from the situation for their safety or others.
- Can be done by telephone
- Time. What is the response time going to be in regards to these instances? Is the other party required to stay as well and any witness to occurrence?
- If the dog is injured then yes, if not no.
- "As a physician, I have to deal with dog bites and the reporting paperwork.
- I have 1 suggestions because staying on location is not always appropriate or possible for either party. Similar to exchanging details after a car accident, if a dog owner involved in a bite can provide their contact details/area in which they reside and verbally confirm vaccination status, that is all we need. Contact details get forwarded to public health to follow up on the dog. Vaccine status and area of residence help us decide whether or not they come from a higher rabies risk environment. This then helps us decided if treatment with rabies immunoglobulin is required or not."
- I think a responsible owner would take responsibility for the actions of their dog and willingly supply contact information. All dogs bite; what does the city classify as a bite? (ie. dog mouths another animal or person, dog breaks skin of another animal or person, dog bite requires medical attention etc.)

- If an altercation between dogs and/or people occurs there are usually high levels of arousal in both the dogs and people involved. It is best for everyone to exit the situation to allow emotions to de-escalate.
- The owner of the offending animal should be able to get their animal to safety to prevent further attacks. They should be able exchange information and leave or call bylaw after the fact
- If the animal is violent or agitated, the owner should probably take it home to avoid further risk of injury. This question proves to me that the wrong people wrote this questionnaire.
- Calgary enforcement officers a indecent people, we have seen how they handled the pandemic and I would avoid them at any cost.
- sometimes the best option is to remove the dog from the situation to prevent further issues
- Dogs bite all the time, different breeds for different reasonings I.e) anxiety, people will take advantage of it and use discriminatory reasons to stay there against people or other dogs, or not understand what the offence means and go overboard.
- A nip does not break skin. There is no need to stay
- The information could be exchanged between citizens without waiting around for bylaw to attend...this extended exposure could make things worse.
- In order for this to be enforced there must be a degree of severity associated to the bite. In my experience any owners I have encountered when an incident has taken place has been generous to share their contact info and have followed up to know how the victim dog/person is doing without requiring a law to govern them.
- Unless the bite is unprovoked there should not be a reason to have to stay on the scene if the animal is protecting itself or it's owner
- I dont trust you or your enforcement officers.
- In the case of a separate emergency going on at the same time which might require the owner to leave the scene.
- I feel this could create conflict between people perhaps even start a physical altercation.
- They should give information but should not have to remain at the scene, they should remove their animal from the scene as quickly as possible as to not escalate the situation. The officer can follow up once the animal is back at home and detained and the situation is diffused
- Not if staying would continue to agitate the situation
- If the dog had bitten something then the owner should be allowed to leave to remove the dog to keep everyone safe, as it could still be highly aroused. Owners should return without the dog to talk to the necessary people
- I agree that information should be collected but having the dog and owner stuck waiting around puts everyone at risk because the dog is most likely going to be stressed and fearful therefore could bite again. Holding them there to collect information puts owner and dog in an unsafe situation.
- I think depending on the severity of nip or bite there should be different avenues taken.

- Animals may require vet attention. Eg dog to dog fight may produce two injured dogs. It might not be safe to keep the offending dog at the location of the fight (Eg off leash park or pathway system where there are other people/pets). It seems odd people would need to stay on scene until a bylaw officer arrives. There should be an online reporting tool for both parties to exchange information, maybe even upload pictures, and have authorities follow up.
- It wouldn't be effective. More often than not the owner of the dog doesn't stick around or runs off.
- When I dog is so upset that he bites, space is needed for the dog to calm down. The truth of the situation will not be found until all have calmed down.
- Often owners are not near the scene. Dogs sometimes fight each other or bite each other in play. Some people see this and think it's an attack.
- Support mandatory exchange of information but do not support prolonged exposure of victim to offending dog.
- If the dog is under stress he may be hard to control, and an enforcement officer could take time to arrive endangering others. I support sharing contact information.
- In theory I would say yes, if you're pet bites someone/animal you should stay to a) ensure they are okay, and b) follow up. However, there can be cases where a dog may have not because they are you were in danger. I have had many encounters where my dog has growled and barked at men who have approached me walking at night, in a manner that made me feel uncomfortable and unsafe. He has never bitten as he is trained, however if he did, I would have a proem with a law expecting me to wait in. Situation where I feel unsafe.
- Dog owner needs to deal with the dog. Remove it from the scene to discipline it.
- Up for abuse on small bites or ones where the sink is not broken
- The wait time for bylaws can be unreal, which could be unsafe for the dog if it's hot and without water which owners may not plan for if they're going on a shorter walk. Just as with a small car collision, the people involved should share contacts, get any witness numbers, contact bylaws and meet at their home.
- The owner should take their dog home and meet with the officer in a more appropriate location and at a more appropriate time. Dogs bite when distressed, keeping the dog in the spot where it felt so distressed that it bit for extended time will do nothing but exasperate the situation.
- Not enforceable and will likely result in further conflict
- They would need to take their dog away from the situation, so couldn't stay and risk it happening again.
- The animal is in distress the owner needs to share their information and remove their animal from that location. The amount of stress coming from everyone involved is affecting the animal and potentially setting you up for another bite situation if the animal Feels it can't get itself to safety
- I understand and agree for humans. But there's no guarantee that it was your animal if someone just walks up claims their dog got bit
- It's not really yes or no but in such a tense situation it's important to de escalate so for example if two dollars gas are involved on a fight and they're both staying there or worse a person has been attacked and the dog remains there it's not helpful but it is important to share information speak to police etc.

- If that information is already communicated to the other party, why should someone need to stick around, instead of removing their dog from what was clearly an anxious scene and continue letting their dog over process...they can just be contacted via phone.
- Law enforcement is not qualified to handle this task
- I'm attempting to open a new business in Calgary and hire a lot of people.. we have changed our mind as our family is no longer welcome in the now NDP state of banning dogs.
- What would be expected turn around time?
- "If an on leash dog bites an off leash dog that has ran over from its yard, the on leash dog owner should have zero liability.
- Way to many dogs run off yard to me and my dog. Over ten incidents each summer minimum!"
- For medical reasons; owners should provide vaccination reports to the other person/animal. They shouldn't have to wait for law enforcement, as regardless of the reason for the bite, the dog will get taken away, which is unacceptable! Again, incidents like this happen because of the environment and uneasy/uncomfortable position the dog is put in.
- believe this is unnecessary
- a responsible owner should be responsible for their dog and provide their info to the victim/other animals owner.
- It may be best for the owner to remove the dog from the area. But contact information should be left with witnesses or victim.
- In theory this is a good idea but I am concerned the rule would be abused
- I support this if it is a severe bite. However, what constitutes 'severe'? Or can a citizen demand an owner remain on-scene for any level of bite? This needs to be figured out first. If a dog bites but it doesn't do any damage (for example, if it is a small dog) do you need to wait for law enforcement? What about a big dog if they bite but leave no mark? The rules need to be clear when a person has to stay on the scene. Also, if there is no bite mark left behind it is tough to say what even happened.
- I think leaving contact info is important but it might be more important to remove the dogs and de-escalate the situation.
- It takes too long for peace officers to get on the scene. As well everyone thinks they are in the right. So there will be fights. Giving people time to come up with new reasons to wrongfully accuse bully breeds or others because the dog is bigger.
- Unenforceable if you the dog owner simply denies the existence of the incident or denies they saw it
- enforcement officer is not necessary but sharing contact information should be required
- What if the dog owner is not at the scene of an accident because the dog was in the care of a dog walker? How would this nuance be addressed in the rules?
- Bites are a relative term, dogs naturally nip at people or other dogs as part of their play rituals or as a warning. Some could misinterpret this as a bite.
- If there is an incident the dog should be removed from the scene to calm the situation
- UNCONSTITUTIONAL

- Not necessary to have others involved
- I don't support any measures that violate charter rights, including but not limited too, unlawful detention/detainment.
- No, I think in this situation it's best to get the bitten dig to a vet and the buyer away from the scene. The people should exchange info including the dog license number. The bylaw officer can followup.
- "A, enforcement seems difficult
- B, sometimes for safety, it would be best to remove from the situation"
- The requirement to talk to an enforcement officer is contrary to Canada's constitution.
- Requiring anyone to talk to an enforcement officer is unconstitutional.
- An exchange of identity and contact information should be suffice.
- Depends on the situation and what is classified as a "bite" if no skin is broken then no.
- I agree with the dog owner remaining on the scene to exchange information but not the involvement of the Calgary Police or enforcement officers.
- "There is currently no leash law in Calgary which is wrong .
- Another large non pitbull breed off leash attacks me and my dog and my dog defends me . I am liable 50/50! . That is wrong. This has happened to me already . Now under your new law my dog would have to be muzzled when that big dog off leash comes around. (not in a dog park) And THAT is wrong. Someones dog is off leash . Attacks mine who is on a leash . AND mine can be destroyed. Under your current and proposed system. and THAT is wrong"
- This logistically doesn't make any sense. Additionally, too often people do not respect a dog's space. A dog cannot tell you with words that they feel uncomfortable.
- It's a stressful situation for the animals and people. The proper information should be traded and they should all go home and be in contact.
- In the age we're in, we do not need more law enforcement running around the streets. Let adults handle things like adults.
- Should exchange information but not remain at the scene after.
- Waste of their time
- I think just as long to attain information. If there was an incident between dogs, I feel it is important to tend to the dogs needs primarily. Leaving a situation to calm down or go to vet.
- It is better that the people and animals are separated as these incidents often escalate. The requirement should be to call the enforcement officer, not share information unless it is voluntary.
- If a incident happens with the dog, it is best to get that dog out of the situation as quickly as possible. By making both parties wait, we increase trauma for all parties. It would be best to share contact info and later be followed later up by an enforcement officer if necessary
- When a dog bites, don't you want to remove them asap from the scene? If the owner does this, but the rule is that they remain on the scene, then they would be breaking the rule, right? So, is there some other way to get the info?
- If a dog attacks a person the owner must wait for an enforcement officer. All other incidents the owner is not required to be at the scene.

- If the dog has a behavioral issue, waiting around for me people to come might be more stressful to the person/dog. Leading to more aggravation etc.
- In general I support sharing info and responsible dog ownership.. And abiding by the law and waiting for enforcement officer if one can show up in a timely manner. Less than 45 min..
- Staying in the immediate area could be very stressful to both dogs and possible the owners and whomever got bit. Way to many Karen's out there escalating things without cause
- If the other dog was the aggressor, my dog could have just been defending itself.
- There is too much gray area with this question. Yes they should wait if there is a serious bite to a person. But minor dog nips happen in dog parks and if you open the line for everyone having to stay around when this happens this would become a nuisance. Some people don't understand dog behaviour and can make a bigger issue out of a little nip. Also, sometimes their dog instigates it and it may be better for the two parties to separate it and handle it on their own. I think everyone is taking some risk when they are close enough around other animals to be bitten (not the case if the animal is off leash and uncontrolled in a non-off leash area). So everyone should deal with that risk on their own should something minor occur.
- If there's a dog on person or dog on dog attack, I think most important is to quickly exchange contact information, but then get everyone to a safe place. Making both parties stay in place (which could be an arbitrary street corner or field), could leave both parties at more risk for violence/fights/attacks with people or animals. Increase the fine if they take off without giving contact information, then allow people to go home.
- As this can escalate the situation between the owners and between the dogs. However, contact info must be exchanged.
- This needs to be case by case. Contact information should always be exchanged. If both parties involved agree that there has been no serious harm than no authority should be contacted. Why bog the system more while Kenney keeps cutting?
- I feel the dog training and tribunal efforts will avoid the bites in the first place. Being required to remain at the scene could cause more confrontations, as well as a person or dog being automatically seen as 'guilty' of an offence.
- Pit bulls should not be treated differently then other dogs there is no such thing as a bad dog including pit bulls only a bad owner.
- Remaining at the scene can just escalate tensions rather than de-escalate which can lead to more serious outcomes
- Assuming the bite is serious, and the victim requires medical attention, information should be exchanged if further action is required.
- A small nip where some fur is gone is not worth this and may be accidental while dog playing Although it is a warning for owner to train dog it is not worth a police record
- Dog bites happen, and when they do the owners often stay to ensure both dogs are okay. People do not flee the scene, or at least not that I've seen. I don't feel an enforcement officer needs to be involved unless the owners are unable to deal with the situation themselves.

- if the dog is in a state of distress i would recommend removing the dog from the environment . But to provide the victim with contact information so the matter can be resolved safely.
- I think they can provide their information to be contacted but then should be able to take their dog/animal home and away from the scene, for safety and privacy reasons.
- Depending on how severe the bite is. Sometimes dogs playfully nip eachother and this rule would be unfairly used against large dogs while smaller, more aggressive, dogs would not be held to the same standard.
- The owner must take responsibility for the action their dog, and then hand over the dog to by law until the investigation is complete.
- Dogs play bite all the time. Sometimes they draw blood. Consider the severity and magnitude of the bite first before getting law enforcement involved. A dog should be taught to not bite hard on people and dogs but every case should be evaluated based on maturity, level of training, etc. It is a waste of law enforcement time and taxpayer money to make a case out of every nip
- If your child walked up and grabbed a dog because they love them and the dog is frightening or injured , nips at the child. This could raise a very heated conflict that would be better addressed later.
- Tough call - I guess you said "if necessary" so that suggest that if there's a gathering at a park with people and one person's dog bites, then the people (all associated) would make a decision to severity... don't want it to become a have to do every single snip. Could waste a lot of enforcement officer time and cost and stress if it was a very marginal scene. Understand though that owners should be respectful and accountable for their dog just like we have bylaw that they should pick up their animal's poop.
- I think the two parties should exchange information but not have a enforcement officer because adding another human the animals don't know can escalate the situation
- There are many situations where this would put both the dog and owner at risk.
- While a good idea in theory, much like having to provide details following a car accident, I don't see any way this could legitimately be enforced.
- I think it is important for people to be accountable but feel like the people involved can make the decision whether or not they want to involve law enforcement.
- Ideally they would stay but realistically they should immediately get the dog put away safely first. Also most in situations there will be very emotional people involved, so it may be best they are not left together, waiting for an officer
- Only for significant bites. Also keeping the animals together would not be a good idea after an altercation.
- Because it could cause the animal and people around to be more anxious.
- Because this can be expedited by making it mandatory to report it online. Having to wait for officers to arrive to the scene sounds like a big waste of time for all parties.
- There are enough rules in this city and I bet that the majority of people already do stay and discuss. This is just another form pf policing and it's unnecessary. The more you make "rules" the less people of going to abide by them. This is a stupid study.

- to vague - "bite" is not specific - sometimes dogs might tell each other off at the park but it is not a bite or attack...
- If a dog bites after having been approached unsolicited by a stranger, they should not be subject to punishment. Especially if it is a teething puppy.
- The dog owner and person who suffered from the bite should try to resolve the situation first. If both parties cannot mutually leave in peace then I would suggest both parties to remain at the scene of the incident to talk with an enforcement officer.
- The police can't even police the city. How's a dog cop going to arrive on the scene of the crime?
- This should not be criminal on the dogs part. And people won't listen if you get law enforcement involved regardless. If they cannot train a dog it is animal abuse and should be handled as such. Situations require specialized care for animals. Leave it to the trained professionals. Or refer pet owners to them
- The stress while waiting could lead to escalation of the issue after the fact with the people involved.
- If the other dog antagonized first the dog is allowed to defend itself if it uncomfortable.
- A rule is fine, but not enforceable. Only responsible dog owners would stay and most likely will even without a rule
- The dog owner should provide contact info or can call 911 to provide their contact info but they need to remove the dog from the scene immediately and contain it at home in a crate or room. Having the dog remain at the scene is a terrible idea.
- They should be allowed to take their dog away from the scene and then return promptly.
- If a dog is escalated by the environment the best situation would be to remove the dog from that environment. The owner should definitely provide their contact information but I don't agree they should have to stay at the scene.
- Dogs are animals. There are many reasons that a dog may bite a human, they could feel they are a threat, could be territorial, or just weird with people. This is not the dogs fault removed] This whole survey is a farce, pitbull are an amazing dog who are completely misunderstood & persecuted for no reason.
- It opens the door to very small accidents (90% of them) being treated like big ones
- I agree with sharing contact information but the rest can be followed up on by the enforcement officer. Leaving the scene of the incident can allow the dog which bit to be safely returned to a secure location to help prevent further attacks
- I support mandatory exchange of information. I don't support requiring the dog owner to remain in place until an enforcement officer arrives. This prolongs exposure between the victim and dog in question.
- "Remaining at the scene with animals can increase the chances of additional incidents. Removing the animal from the scene should be priority and identifying parties as the second.

- Much like accident scene triage, people should not be legally burdened to remain in danger simply to fulfill an administrative step. Remove the danger, then deal with the scenario."
- As long as an agreement can be reached between the humans involved (ie paying vet bills) I don't see any reason to involve an enforcement officer
- A dog walker or relative might be at the scene of the incident. In this situation the owner should just be called and info should be exchanged over the phone.
- It depends on severity.
- Sometimes it is necessary to remove the animal from the situation if it is unsafe. I do believe that the owner should be required to provide their information for follow up.
- This is not a straight yes/no answer. A bite might not be unprovoked
- i think a person could give their info and they may leave and take their animal home.
- I think this should only be under extreme circumstances sometimes other animals and people can provoke protective dogs to defend their owners.
- Dogs nip and are mouthy when they play. What definition of bite should be used?
- To ensure safety, sometimes it is best to get the dog(s) out of the area
- The owner may need to take the dog home. Standing around waiting for an officer increases the chances of conflict escalation with others involved. Everyone's emotions will be running high. Knowing the owner's contact information should be sufficient - maybe verify by seeing the owner's photo ID to make sure they're not lying, and get the pet ID number of their Calgary license tag.
- Must of the time if a dog bites someone it's either because that person was teasing him or their owners, which could be a case of a dog protecting their owner and could be because immediate danger that the owner it's supposed to go away ASAP
- This would be very difficult to enforce. My dog has been bitten twice by a neighbors dog that gets loose from its yard - but this dog is a 5 pound Yorkshire terrier. Will the same rules apply? Technically it is an aggressive dog though no one seems to care because of its size.
- If it is a minor event an exchange of information is acceptable. If it is a major event you should wait for authorities to arrive. Treat it the same as a motor vehicle accident.
- Dogs often play bite when at the dog park, this would create too many complications if one owner thought their dog was non-aggressively biting and the other owner disagreed.
- keeping an agitated animal somewhere they feel unsafe or where they are misbehaving is poor practice. Providing contact information via telephone and meeting at their home or elsewhere would be better.
- Bylaw enforcement takes too long to respond to complaints. Unless an officer can attend immediately, it isn't reasonable to expect a dog owner to remain at the scene for hours.
- What if the alleged victim is actually harassing the dog owner.
- Exchange of information required but owners must be allowed to seek veterinary or medical treatment if necessary.
- The information should be shared with the other person/dog owner, but to wait on site for an officer to arrive is likely unreasonable and not a good use of police officer time unless the incident is serious or fatal. Similar idea that you don't have to inform police of a small fender bender on traffic if the damage is less than $2k

- Unless the pet owner went out of their way to use the dog as some sort of weapon, there is no reason for the owner to be punished. They are simply Animals and the way we as people treat them as a family member in our homes will determine their lethal-ness. NOT because of their Breed.
- While I believe that a responsible pet owner should share their contact information, requiring people to stay at the scene could create an unsafe situation for the people or animals involved.
- This would be a complete misuse of tax dollars and really not have much if any of a benefit
- It depends on the severity, if a dog is hurt badly, I would want to take it to the vet rather than wait for an authority to get there. If a dog bites a person, then yes, I feel it is important to contact authorities.
- I don't think that establishing additional "rules" is really going to help the matter. Instead, focus on education and what must be done in the case that an incident occurs. Educate for responsible dog ownership, not coming up with more rules. What additional benefit does having a "rule" bring? The only impact that I can see is that if the offending owner leaves, there is an additional penalty because a rule was broken. This doesn't really help the situation in the end and just adds more bureaucracy.
- Usually the aggressive dog needs to be removed from the situation asap. Waiting for enforcement officer or to exchange info is extremely difficult. I do think info needs to be exchanged but if the aggressive dog needs to just be removed from the situation, that is the best decision.
- I don't think this on necessary and I believe this creates a window for abuse on authority and prejudices. There is already quite a bit that citizens can do that require a little bit more time when a bite occurs.
- This one is difficult because people interpret bites differently. I've had people accuse my puppy of biting because he jumped and touched someones fingers as he walked past them. I think if someone believes their dog has been attacked, they should take photos, try to get information, call bylaw and give bylaw all the information they have on the attack. Bylaw should be taking the reigns on this one vs leaving it in the dog owners hands.
- Some people may overreact to a situation and waste time and money for an officer to respond.
- Sometimes dog interactions are complicated and require the removal of the animal from the area. At times the owner of one or both dogs can really complicate matters. I think, similar to a vehicle incident, information can be exchanged thus that bylaw officers can then address the parties involved outside the situation/environment at hand.
- Deal with your own [removed]! You should be adult enough.
- I imagine it would be difficult for all parties to stay at the scene if a bite has occurred in order to access medical attention or remove the animal from the situation where the bit occurred or otherwise. This would result in an escalation of behaviors from both the parties involved and the dog.
- "Only if it's a person.
- Individual circumstances should apply."
- A person yes, another animal no. Some bites are provoked by other poorly trained animals

- The dog would still be at a heightened state and may be anxious and more likely to attack again. The dog should return home. Contact info should first be shared and then the owner should contact the enforcement officer
- The owner should provide their contact information with the person calling bylaw, however keeping a potentially aggressive animal on scene would increase trauma for a victim (pet, child, etc).
- It should be treated similar to a vehicle incident. Dog license and owners contact information should be shared with the victim. This information could be shared with CPS or Bylaw over the phone so that the attacking dog can be removed from the situation to reduce the chance of more trauma to the victim. If I was bitten by a dog, I would not be comfortable waiting around for CPS or Bylaw while the dog was in the same area, even if it was placed in a vehicle or other containment while we waited. I'd also want to be able to get to a hospital or vet, depending on who/what was bitten, to have the injury looked at.
- Contact information should be left. However it may be best to remove the dog from the situation asap.
- I believe the owner should be able to remove the dog from this situation. Kinda hard to do that if you have to stick around and swap info. A responsible owner would return after ensuring that the dog is secure.
- The definition of what constitutes a bite would need to be clarified. What one person thinks of as a playful nip might be considered an aggressive bite by another ..
- It can take a while for the officer to show up. Simply providing contact info to the recipient of the bite should suffice
- The dog may continue to be a threat to others, or become more agitated due to uncontrollable factors in the area. It may be safer to move the dog to another location, where the environment might be calmer or safer.
- Keeping an aggressive or injured dog at a location is not only not safe for others in the area, but not safe for the dogs involved
- What's wrong with the way things are currently done? No trust in human kind anymore
- The owner has a right to remove the animal from the situation to allow safety for both parties. Most dogs don't bite unless they have a reason or they are improperly trained. Owners MUST provide their legal ID and contact information to the victim party for legal actions to be followed.
- It may not be practical to wait until the arrival of an enforcement officer. Parties involved can exchange contact information and settle among themselves for minor incidents.
- Who defines a bite? Playful, minor or even imagined.
- that is the risk you take with any animal.. any wildlife on hikes or anywhere in the city. the dog could've felt threatened and is just doing its job. lots of rambunctious dogs are the cause of many incidents simply because they're full of energy and the owners can't control them. but they get bit and its the other dogs fault... it ends up being a he said she said event.
- The owner should take the pet home and then return.
- If a dog has shown aggressive or scared behavior and acted out the owner needs to get the dog back to a safe environment where it can calm down.

- People yes other dogs no. Some people are snow flakes and freak out when dogs are playing.
- Dogs usually bite out of fear. Removing it from the situation is best to calm it down. It de-escalates the situation and prevents further potential injuries to humans and dog alike.
- "Intensity, strength, and emotional response to a bite can be subjective and may result in a disagreement over the severity of the situation between parties.
- Contact information should be exchanged but remaining at the scene seems, to me, a disproportionate response to the situation."
- Depending on the circumstances, dogs are animals, sometimes dog play gets a little rough but a quick correction (used with being properly trained human and dog together) then there would be no further issue. Simply like when a child accidentally hits another child or slips and hurts someone. You can't identify a situation with dogs without the proper education and without that. This is where you are getting all these misunderstood dogs, and unknowledgable owners with situations that escalate out of their hands. Training for humans with their companions is key!!!
- "I selected no in the event the dog bit another human they saw as a threat. Or if this was a dog fight situation and the dog bit the human on accident.
- Removing yourself from the situation before it can escalate further would be my first reaction."
- Depends on the severity.
- As long as it's non lethal. Otherwise share your information, get witness statements and go about your day calling the authorities if it has drawn blood
- This is all ready a high stress situation. Bring police into the equation increases stress levels even more. Take contact information and allow dog to be returned home
- "Bite" is not clear cut - dogs nip one another playfully often. Puppies "mouth" harmlessly as well - fhis rule is highly vulnerable to abuse. I would only support this if the definition was amended to the effect of "a severe biting incident" where severe is specifically defined as "causing physical bodily injury to another animal or human which requires immediate medical care"
- It is unreasonable to ask a citizen to remain at a location for an indeterminate amount of time.
- it depends on the situation.
- Some people and their dogs are unsocialized it instigators that cause a scuffle.
- Not necessary
- Dog bites can happen because of other dogs being untrained and having lacidasicle owners. I feel this situation would poorly protect those whose dogs are biting in self defense
- A bite isn't always agression based.
- Depends on the context.
- My dog was bitten at an off leash park on her ear and was bleeding. The owner gave me her phone number and proved it was her by texting us and said she would pay for vet bills. Since it was a fight over a ball I was fine with just taking her info, as that's normal between dogs, and my dog didn't need stitches or anything so it was all fine. there is no need for an officer to come for this type of situation if a proper exchange of info is done between parties.

- There will always be, he said she said. Many small breed of dogs initiate a conflict. Many get bitten because of size difference. Everyone will be biased against a bigger dog / pitbulls. Unfair conditions already.
 - If it is severe case because people make up false accusations against people and I'd only like it for legit claims
 - A bite is very subjective, some people are just scared of dogs.
 - If a dog needs medical attention they should be allowed to leave for this reason. When a dog is being aggressive they need to remove the animal from the scene
 - I think it is appropriate to have a bylaw officer attend the person's residence to receive their statement. Keeping a dog that may be experiencing behavioral issues in a stressful environment does not seem productive or helpful at all.
 - "Yes and no. Not every "biting" incident is such simply because a person calls it that. Different dog breeds exhibit breed specific behaviours not necessarily understood by a lesser educated dog owner or passerby; for example herding behaviours, including nipping. This is particularly problematic in multi use areas where there aren't only off leash dogs.
- Having said that, where there is actual harm done and the incident is obviously severe in nature, I believe it is appropriate for the owner to stay at the scene and this should be a requirement."
 - I think the situation could escalate if they remain on the scene. They should be required to give all contact info to whoever is there & provide proof of residency & ID before leaving the scene.
 - Animals bites can vary DRASTICALLY. Some bites are accidental, and those need to be taken into consideration too. I think people should be able to settle things between themselves without the need for a rule about contact information sharing, most people are old enough and mature enough to be able to decide whether a bite is severe or not.
 - Only if the two parties cannot come to an agreeable solution is an enforcement officer needed.
 - Get the dog somewhere safe.
 - Where is data that supports this possible change
 - Depending on the situation the dog may be defending someone in danger. Making them stay would put them and the animal in greater danger.
 - If there is a case where the dog is exhibiting violent behaviour, the owner should be getting the dog away from a scenario where it could cause more damage as quickly as possible. If the dog is able to be adequately restrained, then it would be good to have an exchange of information to allow for follow up on training needs, etc.
 - Give number and address and let them go home. [removed]
 - I don't want a dog to be euthanized for biting someone.
 - I believe the dog owner should only remain on scene long enough to exchange information so law enforcement can follow up. That way the dog can be removed from the scene reducing risk to the dog and the public around the dog.

- Staying there could increase the risk of escalation and increase emotional responses. Information should be exchanged but they should be allowed to go.
- You cannot expect the situation to remain calm. Emotions would flare leaving pet and owner at risk.
- If dog needs to be separated or is aggressive, staying at the scene will only make matters worse. Need another way to track down owner to take responsibility.
- We do not know if the dog bite because the dog was antagonized.
- For bites that damage another animal, the owners should exchange contact information and the incident should be documented with photos/video, etc. to ensure that reports of injury are accurate.
- It should be handled on a case by case basis, as if the incident is a result of the dog, owner or both being at risk, it makes no sense for them to stay where they would continue to be at risk.
- Too volatile of a situation. Will lead to greater trauma or violence.
- It is better for the owner to be able to take their pet home after a traumatizing incident to reduce further stress.
- As an enforcement officer may not attend the scene in a timely manner. The offender must voluntarily give their information. Exchange license information like in a car accident. There may be a need seek medical attention for injured party before officer arrives. From personal experience after calling 311, operator took a complaint as it was after hours and I did not hear from an officer right away. I'm not sure if there are after hours officers that would have attended if the bite was to myself or more severe to my dog.
- [removed]
- My concern would be people's reaction and the feeling of threat for the dog.. this is not a good plan.. maybe expand it to 100 feet of incident so owner can calm and reassure dog so the stress level is lowered.. many of these incidents are caused by fear or perceived threat
- The offending dog should be removed from the scene, exchange information.
- This should be up to the two owners. Dogs that sometimes bite other dogs are provoked in wrong ways, that's in their nature especially males to males. These things just happen sometimes between dogs. If a dog(of any breed or size) runs up and aggressively attacks another human absolutely unprovoked, yes I think enforcement officers should look into the owner/why the dog acted this way(Dont always believe the attack was unprovoked). Give the dog a chance
- only in severe cases should an enforcement office be need. Exchange of information between parties should be require for medical and vet bills etc.
- exchange information like rational citizens
- "Support mandatory exchange of information but do not support prolonged exposure of victim to offending dog."
- I believe that there are 2 sides to a story and need to be discussed. However if an animal is feeling threatened and made to be kept at the scene there is potential for further disturbances. Legit contact information must be left though.
- While there are problematic owners who don't properly train their animals, there are also many members of the public who behave inappropriately and incite dogs to defend themselves.

- "I would support this if it went into more detail. Not all dog ""bites"" require this level of care, because some people can't identify a dog bit properly.
- E.g. I've seen children have their finger go into a dog's mouth and yell that the dog ""bit"" them. To which their parents respond outraged, when in reality, the dog did absolutely nothing.
- I fear this will only increase the ridiculous notion that people seem to have against bully breeds as well. People can't be trusted, and those who are in favour of BSL will only throw this completely out of proportion, as they already do."
- So if a dog is only 5 lbs like a chihuahua you should hold them to same standards regardless of breed!!
- The OWNERS, the RESPONSIBLE ADULTS, should be required to provide information and talk to enforcement officers if necessary. The animals should be given a safe and comfortable place to calm down after an incident.
- I think they should be required to exchange information with the other pet's owner or human who was bit.
- Depends on the severity of the bite and the ability of bylaw officers to attend the scene.
- enforcement can take far too long to respond to incidents. The owner should just need to leave contact info for the enforcement officer to follow up with
- As long as they exchange information that should be good.
- As long as he/she has given information to the victim, they should be free to go. I'm sure at times an enforcement officer will not be able to get to the incident in a timely manner.
- As long as both parties have exchanged info, follow ups can be done elsewhere
- Contact information should be shared and followed up on.
- The term "bites" needs to be defined.
- I used to believe that was the right thing to do until my dog had been attacked on 3 separate occasions and he defended himself. Because he was the larger animal and resembled (but is not!) a pitbull, he was blamed every time and he was the one with the injuries and the blood while the other animal was unscathed. He would hold them down by their collar. It is most often the small dogs who do the most damage to other dogs and situations at a dog park escalate quickly with people butting in when they don't even know what has happened. My vet advised me that when you enter a dog park it is buyer beware and you better have your wits about you so if you don't want the risk of injury, don't go to the park. My dog was attacked and infected out of the blue - just walking - by a homeless girl's dog on 17th ave. and it got severely infected! The city did nothing and she was known to people. and my dog who has never hurt anyone, is loved the city over and known to many, many people as a loving gentle soul- should be muzzled because he resembles a pitbull? or could be labeled a nuisance because he defends himself? How is that remotely reasonable or fair.

- Once contact information is shared, the owner should be free to remove their animal from the scene, so every one involved can get the attention of vets/drs asap. This would also help to calm the animal(s) hopefully de-escalating the situation.
- It's best to remove everyone from the stressful situation as long as the owner provides contact information and dog licence info to the other party.
- Contact information should be given but if the dog was in a bad enough State to bite, they shouldn't be forced to stay in that environment
- For human bite yes for biting another dog no as cumbersome and can happen often
- It is hard to enforce. Particularly when the owner is often not near their dog when the incident happens (and just call their dog away). If the victim or victim dog's owner is dealing with an injury, they wouldn't be able to run over to the owner to get them to stop.
- I should only have to stick around if there is a dog fight and the other animal has been hurt badly. Depends on the situation. Dogs sometime bites other dogs, even in play and draw blood.
- Some situations may require the owner to remove the dog from the incident site to prevent further incidents. By requiring the owner to stay, there is a likelihood in some situations for the owner to be able to remove the dog. However i do believe contact information should be shared
- I believe the owner should deal with their dog either bringing it to their house or other secure location first to calm down.
- Need to remove dog from situation to ensure no future incidents occur
- At the end of the day the owner is the communicator during incidents, the dog does not need to be present.
- Because if a Pitbull bites it'll instantly be deemed a Vicious aggressive blood thirsty animal and put down. But if fluffy the inbred, over weight untrained Labrador Retriever bites it's going to just be deemed out of character and allowed to carry on with its neglectful and incompetent owner.
- Was cell phones most of the incident can be documented as 98% of the public carries a phone
- They should have to give their phone number and plan to return to the scene, but should be able to remove their dog if they think keeping it there creates more risk.
- To avoid further potential stress (to all party members involved), I believe an exchange of information is adequate to start an investigation process. While it seems that cases of individuals giving false information and leaving the scene seem to happen on a regular basis, those same individuals are still going to leave the scene and or give false information.
- The dog and it's owner should be allowed to return to their place of residence to prevent any further trauma or potential issues that may arise if they remained at the scene. In fairness, this would require some good faith in both of the parties involved to share accurate and truthful information.
- It would be more beneficial to the offending dog and all those involved to promptly remove the offending dog from a high stress environment.
- No
- Having a rule to contact 311 with the information. This way the dogs and people are not waiting in same area. Its like a cooling off period.

- It can be very stressful and place them in a poor position leave contact information and follow up too many other factors to consider having them wait
- Owners or people should be able to exchange info on their own. We don't need police involved unless someone doesn't follow that order. Comparable to a hit and run.
- Provide contact information, yes - but remain at the scene may not be necessary.
- I think there would need to be a stronger definition of the types of injury the person/animal sustained from the bite. A dog could bite another dog out of play and the owner could be dramatic and then the dog and it's owner could be in trouble for nothing.
- It's up to the parties to decide if officer is needed. If skin wasn't broken and the person did something stupid like invading a dog's space and realizes it then that's up to the parties
- If the owner needs to remove their dog, then they would need to leave the scene. If the dog must be removed to avoid further escalation, it is not reasonable to ask the owner to stay on the scene.
- Not always does it makes sense. My dog bite another dog and it was minor. I gave my number and paid the vet bill. It would have been over blown to have an officer there. Common sense needs to prevail.
- There should be a "maybe" option. I worry that this type of rule could be used against responsible dog owners.
- They should be given the opportunity to prevent further injury in the event that they cannot control the animal. This should be the only exception made to staying until the authorities arrive. Information should be exchanged though.
- There are varying degrees of a bite. More hysteria, better chance for hostile interaction
- It is not the dog owners responsibility to have to explain why their dog was pushed to the limit of biting another person or animal. People should respect that not all dogs want to be pet and played with by people or other dogs and should ask permission therefore reducing the risk of a dog biting another animal or person.
- I feel that it would be in the best interests of all parties for the dog owner to provide reliable contact information and immediately remove the offending dog. Talks with enforcement can happen when/where the dog is calmer and more secure.
- I have a pitbull and I am sickened by the judgement these dogs face based on their breed alone. The people who believe these animals are more dangerous than any other dog are uneducated. Despite the studies that have been completed, there is no scientific evidence to support that Pit Bull -type dogs are more dangerous than any other. To introduce any rules regarding this is to perpetuate the stigma. My pittie has never bitten any dog, but she has been bitten. We would NEVER stay at the scene for fear that we would get the blame based on her breed alone. Bad idea.
- A dog bite event is just as scary and traumatic for the owner of the offending dog as the victim. A 24h time window to self-report should be implemented. Cause of the dog bite is sometimes due to the actions of the victim (i.e. a dog starts a fight and the other bites). Furthermore, having a dog who is in a high-stress state following a bite stay at the scene is not given an opportunity to decompress.
- That's tough. There may be better to have the dog go home and discuss there.
- If there is a dog-dog incident, why does the owner need to stay at the scene vs seeking help?

- If a dog bites, the owner should remove the offending dog and secure it. Then they should return to the scene, but only after leaving their address to witnesses so we know where the owner lives if they do not return. Failure to return should result in higher fines.
- The person may be on a schedule for work. It may take a long time for enforcement to get there.
- Bites is ambiguous. and can be part of normal dog behavior. I could be support for a rule regarding remaining at the scene if an owners down INJURES another animal. I don't see the point of remaining at the scene if a dog isn't injured.
- It would be better to share the information with the other person involved so that the dog owner can remove the dog from a stressful situation if needed
- if injuries occurred, it should be expected that the nuisance dog's owner exchanges information with the other party. they should be under no obligation to wait for an enforcement officer.
- Having had experiences with people being extremely aggressive towards me and my dog (just because they do not like dogs) this may result in more problems as aggressive "victims" can escalate situations that a dog did not want to be a part of in the first place.
- As long as it isn't a severe bite then they shouldn't have to wait for an enforcement officer but information should always be exchanged.
- Owner could provide information, but law enforcement is not always the fastest to arrive
- Some dogs are agitated and act defensively. This should always be looked after by the owner but sometimes accidents happen. If no damage is done and everyone is fine with the situation the dog should be taken home immediately and the owner can reflect on the situation. If the situation is more serve than police intervention can be useful.
- The dogs may require medical care and it is best to exchange info and leave to de-escalate the situation.
- Too bad. Go get a bandaid. [removed] Laws won't apply to me. Ever.
- It depends on the definition of bite. A small bite between dogs that get in a scuffle shouldnt fall under this however a dog biting a person needs to.
- Unenforceable. People run off too quickly already.
- not necessary, contact information can be provided and then parties can go home or get medical care.
- No as it would really depend on the situation, in some cases the person and or animal you are dealing with could be putting you and your pet in more danger by sticking around waiting to speak with an enforcement office. Although exchanging contact information should be a recommendation as you want to be able to resolve this in the best possible way.
- This doesn't seem like an issue law enforcement needs to be involved with
- It can take up to couple hours for an officer to arrive. I think a phone call would be fine.
- during the time of the incident, emotions and anxiety are at an all time high. The owner of the animal should be allowed to go home to compose themselves and the nuisance pet before speaking to an enforcement officer.
- This would be difficult to enforce and potentially dangerous since the owner would be forced to keep their pet in a high-stress situation, rather than removing the dog from the scene and allowing it calm down (i.e. by taking it home). Of course everyone would ideally stay at the scene of the incident but requiring this opens up criminalization of people who try to deescalate the situation by getting their dog back inside (e.g., if a dog got loose from a yard then bit someone, wouldn't you want the person to get that dog secured instead of trying to hold it at the scene while owner waits for police?)

- Again, always caused by human error not the animal!
- With the exception that if there was an injury to the person or animal then they should be required to stay at the scene. A small scuffle between dogs with no injuries is going to happen from time to time and shouldn't require enforcement officers.
- Could increase the danger. Victim should be able to get info and report immediately.
- This should be up to the dog owners not a bylaw or city employee. Pitbulls are no more aggressive than other breeds. It is irresponsible owners who are to blame. Stricter rules and screening to own a pet.
- When you say "dog" what you mean is Pitbull, therefore I disagree #dontbullymybreed
- I do not believe every incident requires this approach, it is simple minded and insinuates the dogs guilt with no consideration to the situation the rendered the incident in question
- People should exchange contact info immediately but the dog should be taken home quickly rather than continue to be traumatized and triggered by the environment. Violent behaviour could persist if the animal has to remain at the scene while waiting for an enforcement officer.
- Matters can be handled 1:1
- They might need to be doing other things.
- Maybe it be best if the situation was dealt with later in a safe environment
- Only if a dog bites a person unprovoked, or has severely attacked another dog. Causes a vet trip
- Seems ripe for abuse.
- How are you supposed to remove the dog from the scene and keep other safe if you have to stay at the scene
- Owner would still have aggressive or prey driven dog at scene which could lead to more damage or injury.
- Depends on severity, and the context of the situation.
- Of course if the dog bites a person but what if the two dogs get into a tussle as dogs sometimes do I don't think so what or how do you gauge what a dog on dog bite is as I have seen many owners think it was a fight to the death when it was nothing more than lots of growling and barking
- Don't waste more tax payers money making silly laws and bylaws
- The owner of that dog may not be able to stay there while they calm their own dog or seek medical attention for their own dog. In most cases the owner should wait to speak with EOS but not always
- For all you know the other animal or human could've been aggressive towards your dog.
- Removing the dogs from a high stress situation is of higher importance, they don't know what's going on.
- Because I think the owner needs to deal with their pet first. Calm them down and get them into familiar territory (ie. home) or for treatment (veterinary practice).

- I think contact information should be obtained and can be followed up with but requiring an agitated animal and upset owner to remain at the scene seems indignant.
- I believe that exchanging contact information between all parties would be the ideal. If either parties are not concerned about the dogs fighting, there shouldn't be a bylaw that requires the humans stay to talk to an officer. Also, dog owners may not always be present during an incident. Some owners enlist the help of dog walkers and dog sitters.
- So long as the owner provides necessary contact information, reports should be made whenever most convenient instead of necessarily immediately, which may require a long wait
- The dog is only as good as it's owner, it's owner should remain at the scene. A lack of proper training is the fault of the owner not the dog.
- Exchange information like at an accident scene and call it in
- It is an waste of enforcement time
- Dogs dont understand this. Its the humans responsibility. Get a number, get a dog ID # and deal with the situation one on one. Not both dogs still around each other. Who ckmes up with these questions? 75 year old grannies?
- "Dog walker might not be owner. Owner could give statement later by phone or on line. owner might be essential worker due on shift or parent needing to pick up child from school or nursery.
- Might be better to remove dog from situation or for owner leave an aggressive person when a dog bite incident is claimed (but disputed by owner)."
- I think it would be better to require them to exchange information quickly and remove the dog to the home. The situation is very traumatic and can be chaotic. Remove the dog from the situation and allow the victim some space.
- People need to control their animals period. Don't discriminate just one one or too dog breeds. [removed] Poodles are a close second. I'd ban shit tzu dogs instead. [removed] ankle biters is all they do
- Without enforcement it would never stand. And enforcement costs money so I am not open to having the city spend money at tax payers expenses. As well dogs tend to nip each other to tell them the rules, those that draw blood either were protecting their owner or felt that they were threatened in some way. For human interactions bites can be avoided through knowledge, many people dont know what to do when encountering a dog. I had an incident with my dog off leash where a child around 10 years old was scared of my dog and he was running away from my dog, my dog thought he was playing, I had to yell to the child to stop running, after that while his parents were present I had to inform the small child that if a dog comes up to you don't run because they will chase you thinking you are playing with them which can escalate quickly if the person becomes aggressive towards the dog (shouting, hitting, etc).
- Nobody reports small dog bites this would only further skew data suggesting bully breeds are more prone to biting which is nonsense
- The dog should be returned home and the owner should talk to an enforcement officer there.
- "You are not clear as to what ""if necessary"" means or what type of ""rule"" you are implying.

- Most altercations are of a minor nature: contact information should be required: enforcement officers take far too long to come and their presence raises the level of infraction."
- There are many variables to a dog that bites. Maybe, another dog provoked it (or a person) and the dog that is biting is in self-defense mode or protecting their owner. The owner should take the dog (that bites) home immediately.
- I think they should absolutely share contact information and be accountable, however, depending on the minor/or severity of the bite, talking with an enforcement officer feels unnecessary.
- when dogs play with each other it may look as though they are biting each other. How or who will have the non bias decision that the bite was or was not 'play'???
- Support mandatory exchange of information but do not support prolonged exposure of victim to offending dog.
- Remaining at the scene may cause additional incidents to escalate. The parties should leave all relevant contact information and move to a safer position.
- Not practical, depending on where the incident occurred (ie large off leash park like NoseHill you may never see an Enforcement Officer). We don't need additional rules / legislation on this. I don't see this as a practical solution. 99% of pet owners are responsible / understand their pet as well as others / In 20 years of daily walking with our pets, we've never even seen an incident outside of numerous Coyote attacks involving our or other dogs.
- No
- I would support it if there are injuries.
- If the dog needs to be taken home or inside or to the car, they should be able to do so for the safety of the dog and to diffuse the situation. Once information has been shared, they should be able to remove the dog from the situation.
- A dog has a mind of its own. All an owner can do is train and treat that dog right
- Most dogs bites occur when the person being bit has ignored all the warnings signs. Ie runner who can see if dog and dog owner is a little distressed and trying to correct or teach obedience decided to run past the dog and owner instead of reading the situation and taking an alternative route or giving space. Scares doge who bites then dog is in trouble not the person who already can see a situation and then without or with knowing escalates it. Each situation is different and requires more public education
- I'd like to answer yes but there may be circumstances where it is best to remove the animal or the person from the situation to prevent escalation. In an ideal world, the dog owner would remain at the scene to provide contact information, vaccination information, etc but making this an enforceable rule could be problematic. Also, how would enforcement be possible where an irresponsible dog owner simply leaves the scene?
- Depends.on the situation. Was I attacked by a man walking my dog and my dog attacked, and you now want me to sit with the man who attacked me and wait, it isnt going to happen.
- Situationally this could be understandable, but sometimes it's not safe to remain at the scene for either the dog or dog owner. Due diligence is all that is necessary.

- Just picture the owner standing there for a long period of time waiting for someone to show up. Their dog is angry and upset, the owner is angry and upset and so are all of the people around them who are aware of what happened. It's would make matters worse, not better
- It can be easily handled between two grown adults instead of getting police involved.
- There could be extenuating circumstances requiring the removal of said dog at the time.
- leave contact info, if its a violent dog it wouldn't be smart to keep it close.
- Exchange info just like a car accident. City bylaw and their response times are a joke 3 + hours
- Only if the injury sustained was severe should someone have to wait to exchange information.
- The dog is aggravated at this time and best to be away from the trigger that made it violent in the first place. Owner must take full responsibility and may come back to the scene after taking the dog home to it's safe place.
- Let the dogs be.
- Well yes and no, they dog might get aggressive again or something else might happen. The dog should go back home stay in a place or crate and the owner should go back to the scene and talk.
- The dog is obviously in a hot spot if they are reactive. Keeping the dog there could result in more incidents.
- I would think this is already required like a motor vehicle accident or assault. As such would be covered under fleeing the scene of a crime. We dont need more city bylaws that already overlap actual laws.
- If the situation is mutually resolved between both parties it is not worth the time of everyone to have to wait for an officer.
- While it is preferable to have the owner remain at the scene, there could be cases where remaining may escalate the encounter and removal from the scene would be the safer thing to do.
- Owners should exchange information similar to a vehicle accident. Where will the resources come from to attend an incident and what's a reasonable timeline to arrive?
- Not all bites are alike. Only serious bites should be included in this.
- People often misrepresent the situation regardless. If a bite is serious it must be treated by medical/veterinary services, not police
- A dog owner needs to be able to leave a situation that they deem unsafe, i.e. an irate bite victim attempts to hurt the dog or dog owner or becomes abusive and threatening after an incident. In addition, many dogs bite when afraid and unable to flee a situation, and should be quickly removed to a different environment.
- No, the dog should be taken away from the place where a bite occurred and the people should likely be separated too to help de-escalate the situation. Exchanging contact information is the only logical course of action.
- People do not currently stay at the scene. I don't think a bylaw will help it any
- It is up to the parties involved to determine the course of action. Allocate these resources elsewhere.
- Though it would be more expedient for dog owners to be required to remain on scene of a incident, dogs whether they are the victim or attacker whom are injured may need to be taken to the vet. Further emotions run high and the situation could escalate could escalate between the owner of the dog who is the victim and the owner of the dog who is the attacker. As long as information is exchanged and the incident reported promptly I don't think it should be required the dog owner to remain on scene.

- Dogs will often play-bite. No owner needs an over-righteous troublemaker insisting they do not leave a dog park after play-bites without injury.
- This is a traumatic experience for everyone and sometimes it's necessary to get the dogs separated and calmed and emergency care if needed, so standing around with a dog that's freaking out waiting for an officer is unhelpful to the situation. But people need to be responsible and provide contact info in a safe way.
- If the Bylaw officer was not an eye witness to the incident, there is no value in obtaining the information at the scene. It is a disturbing incident for which details can be gathered by a bylaw officer when visiting the people involved
- Law enforcement can take too long to get to the scene. Person should pass their information along and take the dog home where it is safe from any further issues
- Obtaining information can be done quickly and should not have to wait for law enforcement. Remove the animals and/or people involved to lessen the impact of the confrontation. Removal and treatment should always come first!
- I think the person needs to remove their dog from the scene.
- I would support a rule requiring both owners to cooperate to get veterinary help immediately in the case of a severe bite, and bylaw should be contacted. Dog owners should exchange information in the event of any moderate bite between dogs. Minor bites are a normal component of dog behaviour and are to be expected if you allow your dog to interact with others. Bites to a person where there is visible damage should require the exchange of information and the investigation by a bylaw officer.
- I think all dog bites are situational. Depends on the severity of the bite. I think being a responsible pet owner (no matter what the breed) should be in full control at all times of their animals. If the bite is severe enough then the proper authorities would already be involved.
- for severe bites and attacks yes.
- It would be horrifying to wait for a serious dog bite when one needs to get to the hospital. The two parties must be separated immediately.
- They may need to leave to remove the dog from the situation.
- If any living thing involved in the incident needs medical attention (which they probably would) this would prohibit them from getting it in a speed manner
- it should be treated like a car accident. exchange information before they can leave the scene, and if they refuse have the police / bylaw officer attend the scene.
- Exchange contact info with other dog owner / person
- Most dogs only bite in defense of themselves or their owner. Prompt removal from the situation would probably be best to decrease stress on the animal. If there is a dog exhibiting severe behavioral problems, it might be better to investigate their owner, who would likely be the one teaching them these behaviors either actively or passively.

- Should expect the two party's to exchange info independently just The same as if in a fender bender.
- I dont believe in bylaws that arent possible to enforce. I think this is just considerate and courteous behaviour but if one of the dogs is in critical condition get to the vet asap and deal with the other shi(t later
- Dog owners must share contact information to all parties involved and contact local authorities to report the incident
- Respible people will exchange information and can makes reports after if required rather than use enforcement officers
- This would be situation dependent. For example, if a puppy is learning not to play bite or an inadvertent dog bite inflicts no harm, there is likely no need for further action. However, if an animal or person is hurt, it would be reasonable to expect the dog owners to share contact information and report the incident to an enforcement officer. However, I don't think it's realistic to expect people and pets to wait at the scene to speak with an enforcement officer as the officer might not be able to attend the scene quickly.
- Dogs bite when they feel threatened, if the victim provoked the attack then the owner shouldn't have to explain themselves.
- "There should be a requirement for contact information but staying at the scene is difficult for a number of reasons. The dog might be injured. The dog might be in distress. My dog was bitten by another dog that was off leash in an onleash area and I just wanted to get my dog way from the other dog and bylaw response isn't immediate.
- I would also be concerned if the owner/dog would be harassed if they remained at the scene. I would fully support requiring contact details and license number being exchanged or some type of middle ground but not sure what that would be."
- It depends on the situation. Some bites occur because people act inappropriately. I get a dog should not bite however, if they feel trapped and the person doesn't listen, the dog is acting in self-preservation. Example: I have seen adults physically pick up unknown dogs at the park and carry them, for no good reason ("I was just trying to be his friend"). The 2 times I have seen this happen, the dog didn't bite, but if it were fearful, how is this the dog's fault. A kid wouldn't be condemned if a stranger picked it up at the park because the adult was trying to be his friend.
- People are becoming increasingly violent and I would not stay around someone who is upset and may escalate. Its not always the right response so forcing it makes it a crime to leave if its not safe.
- I have seen human onlookers become a a mean pack after a dog incident. I have seen them shame and bully the owner of a dog that has behaved badly. Also, it is often best to remove a dog from the scene. (I am not the owner of a nuisance dog.)
- Leave this up to the pet owners. It is their responsibility in the particular situation.
- I would hope a dog owner would do this regardless of a bylaw. However, I don't think a bylaw is necessary unless there has been a high number of people not doing so in these incidences.
- It depends on the extent of the injury and how long it takes enforcement to arrive

- Owner must exchange information. It's probably in nobody's best interest to prolong the stress and victimization of the attack in the moment.
- If the owner is alone he or she' need to get there dog away from a stressfully situation. A rule to share correct information should be in place. A quick exchange of phone numbers and name should be done at the scene and followed up at the people's home after.
- If information is exchanged the dog owner can be contacted by enforcement
- Owner should only have to remain if the individual/owner of the animal who has been bitten asks them to. Sometimes bites can be a form of playing and are not intended to hurt, in this case it would be frustrating to have to share contact information with another person.
- I don't believe these measures are necessary
- I think the owners should exchange info.. if owner with dog who bit leaves, the police should be called
- While owners should ensure information is provided/self reported if necessary, remaining on scene with a reactive dog will perpetuate the issue and cause additional stress and possible harm to all animals and humans. If able to remove animal and return quickly when animal is safely removed that should be done.
- Unlikely officer would be available in reasonable time. Better to have requirement to provide all info to attacked animals owner. Needs to be significant penalty for failure to do so. (Similar to drivers in fender bender.)
- In some situations I could see needing to get a dog out of the situation (either to deescalate or to seek medical attention). I could support it if there were caveats in place to make safety a priority, but I do think dog owners need to be held accountable.
- Only if the dog bite was serious enough for the person to require medical treatment
- I believe that the welfare of the public and animal come first so you can talk to me at the hospital or vet clinic .
- as long as contact information is shared, name,phone number and address are shared, dog owner does not need to stay at the scene. statements can be obtained later
- Case by case base. Law enforcement can find people it's there job.
- If a dog has bitten then people are panicking and upset which can upset the dog further and could cause the situation to escalate. I feel the owner should be allowed to secure the animal and then return to speak with enforcement
- That is not always possible. Securing the dog and removing it from the scene is necessary. They do need to be contacted.
- If the dog has just bitten person or animal the best thing to do is take the dog home and therefore the owner with them. They should however provide their information to the person or owner of the animal that has been bit.
- I've seen numerous times owners have walked off with there pet after an attack
- Dogs need to be separated and the enforcers need to be aware of both sides.
- People won't follow this rule anyway. It's hard to prove these kinds of cases. This could lead to people having more heated arguments while they wait for an enforcement officer.

- I want to say yes as I think it is important for both sides of the issue to be heard by the officer, but also have concerns about the safety of the dog owner if the person bitten or someone who was with them becomes aggressive. I've had a couple of nasty incidents in the dog park that did not involve biting where I was concerned for my own safety (and one where we ended up calling the police). Speaking with other dog owners that situation is fairly common, so have to balance safety concerns with accountability.
- Every incident is deferent.
- Most dog bites happen because of the lack of knowledge and understanding of dog behaviour. Why should a dog owner be held accountable for someone else's mistakes.
- If a bite has occurred, the owner and animal need to leave the situation I order to de-escalate.
- This would be stressful for all involved, including the victim. It would be better to exchange info and have both parties talk to an enforcement officer separately.
- I do believe it should be a requirement for all to give information and treated like a minor traffic accident. In some cases, people need to get animals to help, or in a minor case, have to get to work.
- I do and don't. Bystanders could get involved and escalate the situation on either side. I've seen it happen and it isn't pleasant. I support information being given, but not while bystanders are present in any way. And bystanders should be forced to delete any video once obtained by police (if required)
- I dont think the answer is black or white. If my dog is attacked by another dog, fights back and is injured, I will need to care for my dog eg: take it to the vet. As long as I leave my name and contact information with the other owner, I should not have to remain "at the scene".
- "I would hope that information would be exchanged immediately if it is safe to do so. In the case of animal to animal confrontation, it is often more prudent to remove them to a safe distance to regain control. This could mean taking the animal home to a safe enclosure/familiar surroundings to calm down. In this case, I would suggest self-reporting.
- How fast could an enforcement officer arrive on scene?"
- A responsible owner would make sure if their dog bite someone is looked after.
- i would agree to remain at the accident site generally unless the animal is so problematic resulting with the owner taking the animal home - obtain contact information. safety for others in the area should be considered rather than waiting for an officer to arrive.
- It really depends on the severity of the bite and if it caused any actual damage.
- It may not always be practical, safe, or wanted by emergency services for an aggressive dog to remain on scene. An escalation of tension may occur if the owner and the dog remain on the scene when police arrive. It may be best to be sure that information is exchanged or left and the issue was dealt with in a more controlled environment.
- If pets or people need medical attention then they need to get it. The person should have to leave their name etc. like in a car accident, but having people stay behind could increase tensions and reduce safety
- If there has been an incident, it would not be ideal to keep the dogs / people at the scene as leaving the scene may be the only way to diminish / end the incident. Also, medical attention may be needed for either dog or person. I would like to say that the dog owner must remain to provide contact information and talk with enforcement officer but realistically I don't see how this would be safe in many cases. There should be some obligation that they cannot flee the scene with no responsibility but I can't see what the alternative is. Must exchange phone number or address? My dog was attacked by a dog but I didn't stick around! It was too dangerous. I don't think the owner was even around. I couldn't see anyone.

- If your dog is scared or angry you have to take the dog out of the situation
- My dog (shiba) nipped a small child who hugged him and the best solution (as my dog was agitated and upset as he knew he shouldn't do it) was to remove him from the situation as quickly as possible to avoid anything else happening. The other person already had my contact info
- It may not always be safe to do so.... they must leave their contact info.
- It is idiotic to keep an animal who is stressed out and misbehaving in the same location where they misbehaved and expect a different result. Take the dog home and meet with officials there.
- I just think this should be handled by vets and people trained to work with dogs not the police who will likely do more harm than good.
- I believe that most people are able to come to a solution without involving the law. It would vary from situation to situation.
- No
- I think bad dog behaviour comes from the owners training. If the dog is trained well he/she won't attack.
- Simple dogs usually bite because someone is threatening or causing stress to the owner or the dog itself or other dogs and if the dog bites out of instinct that is because of the area they lived in like for example a dog living in a more aggressive area would be more likely to bite rather than one raised in a nursery thus it is the one getting bitters fault not the animal
- If the dog is likely to stay vicious while in the situation, there could be additional victims if the owner can't control the dog. However there should be some way to verify the owner's identify prior to them leaving (e. g. a bystander takes picture of driver's license)
- It is far more important that the dog owner assist the person bitten if they need medical aid than to remain waiting for a bylaw officer to eventually arrive on scene
- It is dangerous to remain in the same situation that caused a dog to feel the need to bite. All parties are at risk.
- If an animal bites someone it is clearly stressed or scared. The animal should be taken by the owner somewhere safe that it feels comfortable(ex. A car or home), then the owner should go back to the scene and discuss.
- Dogs often feel the emotions of those around them. Keeping a dog in a high stress situation would be inviting more attacks.
- Depends on severity
- Less rules, less government

- How do you force someone to remain at the scene or even provide their contact information? How long would it take an enforcement officer to arrive? Aggressive (and all bully) dogs should be muzzled in public to prevent these situations in the first place.
- It is best to remove the dog from the situation. Also one of the dogs if injured may require immediate medical attention
- If the owner arrived by car, place the dog into the car. But if the owner and dog walked to the place where the incident took place, provide the address or location in which the dog will be. Take photos of both animals before leaving. Provide phone numbers to be reached at. The reason so that the dog in question wont get spooked and lash out again, or get loose and potentially get hurt or hurt another animal or person.
- Someone other than a police officer should come. Maybe a nurse to assess the bite, and the victim and dog owner can exchange information on their own.
- This is just getting ridiculous. Before Calgarians know it no-one will be allowed to step out their door without permission or some kind of permit. Stop with this insanity.
- If a dog is worked up and aggressive, sometimes the best thing to do is provide distance and break sight lines. I don't think the dog and owner should be required to stay at the scene for everyone's health and safety. Staying within an area for contact or a way to report 'this was my dog' and 'im at /this location/ now' would be okay.
- It may be necessary for the owner to leave to secure the dog and prevent further harm.
- Often the owner staying means the dog staying which could mean more bites. Especially with higher tension.
- If contact information has been provided, then enforcement officer has method to get in touch with people. But what happens if the person runs off before that happens?
- Get a reporting system in place first. They should have to exchange details only. Work with AHS on reporting bites that break the skin. Get a history record started on actual offending dogs. Microchip etc.
- Self defense, if the owner is in distress or being assaulted, then i dont think they should stay at the scene where it's unsafe.
- So your telling me that dog owners should [removed] sit by at the scene of an incident. Because oh their dog but someone. Oh no The world is gonna explode. No the [removed] it isn't. You stupid pieces of [removed].
- Why are you being such crybabies over a dog bite? Maybe take a second to consider why dogs are lashing out and do something from there instead of taking away and killing pets because they hurt you and you're too much of a little piss baby to deal with it properly.
- No because I think you don't I I I think you don't need to give information but I still think you have to wait till medical professionals are there
- Dog could be protecting owner
- Dog
- Why? I shouldnt need to explain why all dogs should be treated equally and not abused
- Why even its really how yhe dog gets trained sometimes its not the current owners fault

- The dog owner should be mandated to hand their information to any victims of the attack so that enforcement officers can contact them, and remove the dog from the public somewhere where it can cause no further incidents until officers arrive:
- At times with the emotions, and risk of retaliation it can be safer to remove the dog, that means the owner as well. Leaving a means of contact, or making contact afterwards obviously needs to be done.
- Off leash dogs occasionally fight. In this case its hard to assign blame. If dogs are on leash and a fight breaks out the owners are responsible for what happens.
- this is not necessary. Again, put things in context. If a dog on leash bites an aggressive dog that runs up unleashed then nothing needs to be discussed.
- I think it would be stressful for the dog and its owner to remain at the scene everyone just wants to leave in an incident like that happens I think with her should be is a duty to report within 24 hours answers to a required set of questions: date time place of incident other name dog name.
- It really depends if the bite is a nip or a severe altercation & bites but I think in general the people on hand should solve the problem ... and if it is a major problem then it should be reported.
- Depending on the severity of the bite. If severe, then yes call an officer if possible.
- they should simply have to share their information with the victim/owner
- It would be an incredible drain for enforcement officers, law enforcement, or even animal services to attend EVERY incident (assuming they happen at all). Instead, let us do what we normally do, what majority of responsible pet owners do, which is to stay anyway. But please do keep in mind that not every bite (or nip) is an act of aggression. It could be a mistimed grab at a frisbee etc. Leave it up to the owners to decide if it is severe (like get the dog to the vet immediately severe) vs accidental, minor, or even non-aggressive. Mandating that everyone needs to report and stay is an incredible waste of time, taxpayer dollars, and can blow up incidents that are often completely resolved in mere minutes wherein the dogs are off playing together again.
- I support a rule saying that owners involved in a dog bite should give their information so that follow up can be done. I don't think it's reasonable to expect people to stay on scene, as, depending on the severity of the bite, it may be necessary to seek immediate medical or vet attention.
- The owner should be required to provide contact info however their priority should be to contain / control their animal, then report back to the scene or to bylaw enforcement.
- Keeping an owner AND a dog that had just done harm around is risky. Better that a quick picture if the dog and owner and if possible dog tag and everyone go seperate ways. Emotions and further interactions need to be min. If the dog owner leaves without exchanging information then it should be same as Hit and Run in a car
- No, but there should be a requirement to share contact information with other parties to the incident.
- If an owner of a dog that has bitten has to remain on scene, won't that mean that the bitten person/animal also has to remain to ensure details are accurately given to an enforcement officer? Wouldn't delaying any needed medical attention be unwise and add unnecessary stress to the situations?

- By staying at the scene, the animals get increasingly defensive. Its better for them to dis engage and the only way to do that is to walk away. They should definitely exchange contacts.
- It is a bit difficult to do this. For example it can take a long time to contact a bylaw officer if you don't have your cell phone with you and the incident takes place on one of the city pathways of offleash parks. There could be a system (like in auto accidents) where the owner of the offending dog gives contact info to the injured party but how can anyone know if that person is giving true information?
- Leaving contact information would be best so they can get the dog home and away from more potential issues
- Not all bites are severe or intentional. Some don't even cause damage. What a waste of taxpayer time and what a loss if we aren't trusted to be the responsible pet owners 99 percent of are.
- Keeping the owner there at the immediate scene of such a traumatic incident would likely lead to more escalation. I worry about overreactions causing mishandling of this resource.
- Keeping the animal at the scene may cause greater distress.
- Sometimes it is better to remove the offending animal rather than remain in the immediate area. Both parties share responsibility to communicate. Often one dog owner asks another if their dog is OK and the other owner stomps off or refuses to answer. What is the first owner to do?
- Information should have to be shared with the other individual.
- Require contact information exchange. Keeping the owner and pet at the scene will heighten the tension and may lead to further incidents.
- I chose 'No' because having the dog owner remain at the scene would take unintended time from the owner that they probably don't have. I think a dog tracking system would be more convenient on both sides
- There are no safeguards to protect dog owners or their pets from exaggerated or bias towards specific breed claims/complaints. Dogs use their mouths to express themselves, they will naturally fall out sometimes with other dogs who invade their immediate space too excitedly or too confidently. It's a dog's way to use their mouths whether it's to growl, bark, lick or bite. It's too ridiculous that dogs are categorized as dangerous just because some dogs are trained by stupid people to be aggressive. How would you like to be muzzled just because a small minority of people behave aggressively? Why do that to dogs. Pitt bulls etc can be so loving absolutely child friendly but you go on about them like they were all aggressive because you are bias. Why don't we for example restrict how big people can socialize in the outside world, because they have the potential to do far more damage than a slight built person when/if they lose the plot? The reason is because it would be downright unreasonable but you are doing exactly this to animals. Muzzling a dog takes away their quality of life - that is cruelty
- I believe similar to any other incident or accident the owners should be mandated to supply each other with contact information and/or exchange licenses.
- I think providing contact info is important, but often the best thing to do is get the dog out of the situation as this is usually triggered by fear /'d remaining on scene may worsen things.

- "I could support it in the first scenario (dog biting a person), only if the person was bitten for no apparent reason. For example, if my wife is attacked and my dog bites the attacker to defend her, I don't see why she should be liable for that bite.
- For the second scenario, dogs are not people. They communicate and interact with other dogs in very different ways than we do. Unable or untrained to recognize those ways, I see too many people just calling for imaginary bites that actually never happened. Often in dog language, what looks like a bite to the human eye is in fact normal administration, a way to say ""give me some space"". It all comes down to owners education and, consequently, dogs education and socialization.
- On the other hand, if a dog bites for no apparent reason, the owner should face the consequences, not the dog. The owner should be required to undergo a rehabilitation program to address the aggressive behaviour showed by his/her dog."
- The only concern with staying at the scene is where they will put their dog during this time. The dog could cause more harm by staying at the scene for officers to show up.
- Should be applied to EVERY dog bite if this becomes a rule/law. This rule is too vague. Would the bite need to be severe enough that medical attention is required?
- If a dog is aggressive towards some one or something you want to remove them from the situation. Not wait for 40 minute for an enforcement officer to come by. You should have to share your contact info though.
- "We do not yet have an effective reporting system to support this. There are missing steps here. Who are they waiting for? Info exchange yes but keeping all parties of a high stress situation together is a recipe for disaster.

- Can AHS work with the city on reporting dog bites that break the skin and treated at a medical facility?

- We need a better tracking system a dog's history us often lost. Dogs are rehomed fir biting but the new adopters are not made aware.

- We got a dog from a private rehoming told the couple were too busy for the dog. The truth came out later and reading deep in his vet file that he was exhibiting aggression. This was not made clear at time of adoption. Once we experienced his aggression and learned his true history we were able to have him retrained and address his issues. He did respond well and became a valued well adjusted pet. In many cases he would have been rehomed again and if left unaddressed become a nuisance dog. By the way he was a Puggle likely from a puppy mill and bought by the original owners from a pet store. Had we not bedn his next owners he may have continued the rehome cucle to unsuspecting new owners with potential of growing aggression and danger to public safety. More accountability is needed on reporting dog bites and liabilities.

- Our dog before the Puggle was a Rotweiler adopted from Calgary Animal Services. The Rotweiler was a suck a gentle giant. We had him privately assessed by a dog behaviourist to confirm his temperament. She gave 3 out of 10 for ability yo be aggressive. The Puggle the dominant pup with the higher potential for aggression. As responsible owners both dogs went through professional training. Both dogs responded to different training methods due personalities. Breed does not pre-determine aggression each dog is an individual and needs to be raised responsibly. Perhaps rewarding through discounted fees and training for all dog owners, regardless of breed for taking their dog through accredited professional training."
- Why would the dog bite rationally or just out of nowhere
- If there is a bite or an accident there should be contact information traded and be on your way. If you scratch someone's car, leave a note or wait till they return so you can give them your contact info. Don't call the police, fire, an ambulance and your grandmother to come over and cane you. Deal with it so there is less stress on the system.
- It is a matter that should be discussed between the parties involved. Involving enforcement should be determined by the individuals.
- Gotta get the kids from school, get to a job interview, doctors appointment. People walk their dogs when they have a convenient time in the day. Most are too busy to wait for an officer for a minor bite. If flesh is torn from the bone, then absolutely, the dog owner must stay to cooperate.
- There may be delays in an enforcement officer's arrival and/or a reason why an owner must be on their way.
- I think it should be handled like a traffic accident. People trade information and take pictures of any injuries, the dogs, etc. They then call in the incident. If it is serious, then bylaw should investigate. The giving of tracking information should be required --- dog license number and owners name and number.
- EVERY DOG/ANIMAL has it in them to bite. I used to have two chihuahuas that bit people and bit very hard to make one bleed, do not let size fool you. I now have two American pitbull terriers that are brothers and are the sweetest and most gentle boys.
- Not all bites or even percieved bites require law enforcement and can be resolved between two owners. (time money and officers at a time when government funding is cut or reduced and officers have more significant calls)
- If the person bit agrees to part ways then it's been resolved and parties can leave.
- If the dog is aggressive it should be taken home after contact information is given to the victim
- Information should be shared between owners. If necessary an enforcement officer may need to be involved.

- This bylaw would escalate many altercations that do not need to be escalated at all. How many times do we have severe dog attacks a year? And how often can the offending dog and owner not be found? Let's not make bylaws just because we can.
- I would hope responsible people would do this. I disagree because who determines the severity of bite requiring someone to stay? For every dog squabble in a park is bylaw to be called?
- If the two parties are in agreement that the dogs were not harmed and it was just play then no. If this is an attack then yes they obviously should stay.
- I support this of course if there is a significant injur from the bite. But this would unfortunately be interpreted to apply to dogs playing with each other, or puppies mouthing which is normal puppy behaviour. I do not support this initiative. We do not need more bylaws in this city, we need fewer bylaws.
- I believe there should be a rule that contact information must be shared; however, I don't think keeping the dog/dog owner in the vicinity of the incident is practical - often the best way to settle the situation is to get the pet out of the situation asap.
- Sometimes it is safer for all to have the owner remove the dog from the scene but it is important to get contact info -not know how this can be done.
- I agree with the premise of sharing contact information but having an enforcement officer present seems like an AWFUL idea. Why would you put someone with a gun in a situation where a dog has potential to be aggressive? I would change my answer if another solution were to be found in that regard.
- However, the dog owner must exchange contact info with the person bitten, as with car accidents.
- Yes and no. If the dog is visibly agitated, he/she should remove the dog from the situation ASAP before more injury is incurred. Leave name and number? Owner of dog should call police and report their own dogs as well? A lot of it depends on the severity of the bite(s) as well. Serious injury should require owner to remain present.
- The dog should be removed from the scene to be calmed down we have phones for a reason
- They should be required to report to authority within 6 hours of the incident or face additional fines, not remain on scene. Tensions will be high in a lot of cases where there is an attack. Exchange of information should be made between those parties, followup by officers does not need to be made immediately.
- It might take hours for enforcement officer to show up. However contact should be made within a time limit to bring all parties together. Our case in point, I suspect the officer would have made a different decision to lay the charge if he (they) had heard from both parties. There was no reasonable way the charge would have stuck and should not have been laid in the first place.
- If the injured party will not co-operate there is no way the owner can stay indefinitely at the scene. If the injured party will not comply and goes behind the owners back, the owner cannot be expected to stay at the scene indefinitely. The owner can only do what is lawful, expedient, kind, and considerate. The owner cannot second guess what the other person will do.
- You aren't specific regarding the bite including the severity. This wording is too subjective.

- Having been involved with a scary dog incident, I would have been more traumatized to have the dog stay on location, especially given the owner was unable to control the animal. If the enforcement office cannot arrive quickly, how long of a wait is reasonable in the dead of winter?
- If an animal bites a person or other animal I think the most important thing is to remove that animal from the scene. Forcing the dog owner to remain at the scene of an incident with their animal could escalate the situation. If there is more than one owner present, then one person could remove the animal and the other could remain to talk with an enforcement officer.
- Depending on the severity of the incident . MOs incidents will occur in an off leash scenario and ideally all off leash parks should be abolished . If cats have to remain on the property why should dogs be allowed off leash .
- In my experience, most dog owners are very good at exchanging information when there is any kind of altercation between dogs or dog & person. I like the idea of the rule, but believe it simply needs to state: In the event of any altercation, contact information MUST be shared.
- Dogs are going to bite, always.
- If it's severe, yes. But dogs get in to minor scraps on walks all the time, this is part of normal dog behavior and should not be considered serious.
- If it was a significant incident I would say Yes animal in distress and hurt but No for an insignificant incident small wound or nick . Animals can have have conflict owners need to take precautions using leashes and muzzles when needed.
- In theory this makes sense; however, it may not be the safest option. A dog that has already been provoked to the level of arousal that caused a bite may not be safe to remain on scene. I would rather see a person given the opportunity to safely remove the dog and return or report in within a specific time frame.
- If the dog bites a person yes, not if the dog bites another animal (the latter can be part of establishing pecking order or just playing)
- Having been attacked by a few dogs while out with my dogs and child if a dog has already attacked it's likely to attack again if left in the same situation. I would like for more education of all dog owners in general, not just breed specific. I don't think an agitated dog and owner waiting to talk with bylaw is going to improve the overall mood. Also, how long would it take for bylaw to arrive? What's a reasonable amount of time to wait. Why not just have owners exchange info like in a car accident and make separate reports.
- Not all cases make this safe for the animals or people involved to stay at the scene. Also, many incidences this is just not appropriate. Again each situation can be different. If my neighbors 3 year old slaps my three year old I am not calling the police for assault...same idea. If my old dog roles a puppy that jumps in her face, that is appropriate behavior for an old dog telling a young dog what behavior they will accept from the rude puppy an uneducated puppy owner could see this as aggressive or an attack...dog behavior does not equate to people behavior.....they are dogs and behave differently, I find people often miss that point unless they are educated in dog behavior.....we need to better educate dog owners.
- be responsible

- I feel like this would lead to a lot of he said - she said. There are many reasons why a dog bites and many times they are provoked and the "victim" side does not see it that way.
- I think they should at least provide contact information before leaving. In some cases it would be better for them to take the animal home and secure them to prevent further harm to all involved.
- if the dog is aggressive they must be removed from the scene. The owner must provide info.
- Some bites could be so minor that we would be tying up city resources if enforcement officers were required for every bite. This would lead to higher fees whether paid by pet owners or all Calgarians. I do think it is necessary for individuals to exchange information. We should be required to carry a pet ID with owners info on it at the very least.
- That could take hours
- I feel that contact information must be shared. I don't think it is feasible to have to wait for an enforcement officer.
- It depends on the severity of the bite but as long as contact information is shared, it would be best to get the offending animal away from the scene and possibly get the injured to medical attention.
- Yes - if the dog bites a person. However, dogs in off-leash parks often fight - it is in their nature when too much is happening around them or they feel threatened. It is different than if a dog attacks unprovoked. This bylaw is too broad.
- Getting the dog out of the stressful situation may help them calm and reduce chance for second bite. Owner should have to provide contact info to victim though
- Up to the owners and victims discretion.
- It may not be appropriate for the dog to remain on the scene after such an event, and the owner may also be flustered so giving contact information to someone else and leaving to take the animal home may be the best option in many scenarios.
- Enforcement Officers would be very busy
- I think I that can escalate an already tense situation. to diffuse trauma for all involved the dog owner should be required to return home and not leave until they have spoken with an enforcement officer
- Some stories are fabricated (doesn't claim the other dog was the aggressor.) resulting in more innocent animals especially "pitbull" breeds to be put down. When in reality it's the lab that started the fight.
- I am cautious of 'broad' based conditions.
- I am supportive of they bit a person, however a dog bite to a dog can be such a grey area (bite vs play or rough play). I would hope people are able to judge the severity and do what is right.
- The dogs should be removed from the situation
- People should do this already. It's called common decency. Here's an idea: piss off and leave people alone.
- I experience a lot of aggressive dogs as a child, usually the small breeds that go untrained do to laziness and the seemingly lacking threat. Dogs in my hometown were the communities pets, we knew their homes and their owners. My reaction would never be to put the dog down, make more time for your pets and this can be avoided.
- Requiring the owner to remain at the scene with a dog that is already riled up is asking for trouble.

- Bylaws are not to prevent due process and presumption of innocence.
- If there should be the unfortunate circumstance that a dog of any breed(not only pit bulls) happens to bite another dog or human we should be adult enough to discuss and exchange information. There are some incidents that are minor enough to not involve bylaw which would only affect the parties in a negative way. Of course in severe cases, bylaw is necessary. We are so fast to financially penalize people for everything rather than discuss and educate. The whole reason this Pitbull propaganda has made its way to Calgary now. ALL Breeds of dogs can bite, the same way all races of people can commit a crime but we don't rush to single out or ban a certain race of people that may show a history of committing crimes.
- This rule is too open ended, and enforcement officer response times are often hours long for low-priority incidents.
- The dog should be removed from that situation if it occurs. If an owner has to stay there it would be more difficult to control the dog.
- If there is an issue with a dog, the owner should be taking the dog off scene/home as quickly as possible. Clearly they are struggling to control the animal and should not be able airing anywhere publicly with it.
- Stop babysitting citizens
- The dog should be removed (brought home) from the scene to Remove any more danger
- You have give insufficient information to justify my support for more laws.
- They always blame the bully breeds it's never the "little dogs fault"
- if necessary being the critical term: my dog has been nipped by another, but no harm done, so what is necessary in that situation? My say-so? Doesn't seem fair to the other owner.
- Do not care if a dog bites another animal
- People do not tell the truth when it comes to things such as this. When a animal like a pit bull hurts another one it is always the pitbulls fault. So why should the owner stay on the scene to just get crucified.
- if the incident is serious enough to call ems, the people involved would be applying first aid. As a dog walker, I find smaller dogs a constant nuance, that doesn't mean I don't want people to own them. pit bulls are no different than any other dog, its all about how an animal is raised.
- It could be hours before an available officer arrives.
- But they should exchange information similar to what happens at a car accident (exchange name, phone number etc)
- You cannot enforce it. Make work project.
- To suggest this without describing the resulting penalty of failing to comply to remain at the scene has me left to disagree.
- Just req to share info and go sort it out later. Too much man power to enforce.
- dog attacks for a reasons, just like all of these karen's out there, expect all of these karen's attack for no reason! ban karen's, protect humans from karens
- Emotions are running too high Stay nearby and only talk to law enforcement.

- I would have to say no due to the fact that trying to get a hold of a bylaw officer to do there job [removed]
- Enforcement officers take too long to arrive.
- The owner probably needs to get the dog somewhere safe first. Making them stick around to talk with an officer doesn't make sense. Staying long enough to give contact info does.
- Because the last thing that people need is other people to come up and harass the individual who's dog has done damaged.
- As a rule that should be the standard practice. But if both parties agree the incident was not severe, they should be allowed to decide for themselves if it is necessary to call bylaw.
- Unless very serious injuries arise people should sort it out themselves.
- Its not fair to lump two different scenarios into one question. A dog biting dog vs dog biting human are two different scenarios. Separate them and i can give a more appropriate answer. Conflating the 2 means they are equal when they are not.
- If situation involved a serious injury I would expect people to share that info, vs situations arising from aggressive play styles
- I think society is quick to villainize a dog who has bitten, when rarely they bite for no reason. If our culture could shift to where the dog's best interests are prioritized then I could see myself changing to support something like this, but currently I think people use "reporting" as a threat/scare tactic and reactionary measure. I'd prefer an emphasis on proactive measures.
- This is too broad & not required in all situations.
- Assuming that an incident generally would happen outdoors, cold temperatures might prevent this enforcement from being realistic (or humane unless if there can be a prioritized and rapid response time). However, in the case of a bite, it should be mandatory that the dog's owner provide contact information to the person/dog owner that was bitten.
- If a dog has just bitten someone or another animal then the safest thing to do is to remove the dog from the scene immediately. Keeping the dog near the victim could potentially exacerbate the situation even further. For whatever reason or severity of the bite, the dog needs to be given physical space from the victim. For some dogs that may be a few feet, but others may need to be out of sight. Not to mention for the owner, their dog biting is an extremely stressful situation for them. Their heightened stress and emotions could further impact the dog's behaviour/reactions. There's also no way to predict how the victim may react. They could further incense the situation. I believe the safest action for everyone involved is for the owner to take their dog away from the scene and phone in the incident.
- Dogs get into fights. It's a normal thing. Unless it's a severe bite, this is an over reaction.
- Get both dogs away from the situation immediately
- Sharing of license information for a follow up should be mandatory and sufficient.
- Only if the doesnt have a collar with dog license number. The person should be allowed to see it and record it.
- I believe that after a dog bites a person or another animal it is best for the dog involved to be removed from the situation by the owner

- You guys are getting way to extreme.
 - The animal is already in fear mode. Staying at the scene may give someone a reason to attack the person.
 - The owner must get in control of the dog, whether putting it in the house or car. The owner should come back once the dog has been removed from the situation.
 - It may not be safe to do so. E.g. they may need to get the dog somewhere that he/she cannot cause further harm. It should be required that the dog owner share their contact info with those on scene.
 - What constitutes a “bite” could vary greatly. Rough play has been called biting by some.
 - Sometimes the owner may find it easier to get the dog home and it doesn't really help the situation to have people yelling at you. I do think they should have to provide their contact info before leaving the scene
 - I think these scenes can become quite heated and it may be best to have a reporting number/location. An officer can often take a very long time to respond. Exchange info like a MVC. What is a bite? I have seen many times where an uncontrolled dog pesters and challenges a controlled dog, who is forced to defend itself. And then the dog owner whose dog started the whole thing is upset that the other dog defended itself.
 - But they should be required to provide contact information to the other dog owner.
 - Generally yes, but in some situations this could lead to a more risk. I have been accosted numerous times by off-leash dogs while walking my (now deceased) dog on-leash on the streets, and it's often best for everyone get distance. Additionally, enforcement resources seem to be scarce which often means long wait-times - even next day call-back - so waiting at the scene seems suboptimal for various reasons.
 - This is the same as saying a robber is required to stay at the scene of a crime until police arrive. Stupid. And what if the owner is not with the dog? More stupidity.
 - They should have to give contact info to offended party.
 - It must be reported in very serious cases, otherwise settled between owners and witnesses and victim.
 - "Sometimes dogs play rough and sometimes owners of tiny dogs are the worst. Because the dog is small the owners don't see it as a risk and don't properly train it. Then it attacks my larger dog and the alpha will put the other dog in its place. I don't think one dog should severely hurt another but I also believe these poorly trained, ill mannered little dogs cause a lot of problems for other dogs
- If dog bites a person - that is different and they should stay put"
 - It's too hard already for someone to stay at the scene. There's no additional way to endorse this.
 - A dog bites for a good reason... they're either protecting their human or protecting themselves
 - Depending on the severity of the bite. If its two dogs playing and one nips another's ear, the two owners may decide to handle it on their own. This could be dealt with in a similar manner as car accidents where severity dictates the involvement of an officer on-scene.

- just swap information like car accident
- Someone could have been "asking for it". As in teasing, aggressive behavior to owner, lack of awareness. But this is obviously a "he said she said" ordeal. Some people may even be "out to get" pitbulls based of their emotions towards one, even escalating the situation by being over dramatic to induce more severity into the punishment. Because once the dog has inflicted damage onto , its hard for the owner to have any sort of defense because evidence against is clear. Unless witness.
- How can they remove the dog from the situation if they are forced to stay there?
- there is more than likely a necessary reason for that dog to be acting out, I also think the person who got bit should be in question. an animal does not act out or bite for no reason, there are just as many dangerous people if not more than there are dangerous dogs... please evaluate these ridiculous dumb questions. People who do not own dogs or are Unknowledgeable of these kinds of animals should avoid owning them and avoid approaching them like an idiot, it is purely common sense. A dog lets off many signs that it does not want to be bothered.
- May put the dog or owner in danger.
- Small dogs are involved with more bites than any other dog. If no damage is done why waste everyone's time.
- If it's a minor bite.
- Sometimes dogs bite in response to aggressive behavior by other dogs
- The owner should be required to provide contact information but it may be safer for everyone if the owner took the dog home right away.
- What is considered a bite? Dogs bite/nip each other sometimes at play. I am not against reporting and being responsible for vicious dog bites, however, this bylaw May be taken too far by uneducated dog owners who don't recognize dog play or by ignorant people in general.
- I do support the exchange of information, but I can see this being very difficult with two or more animals involved (especially two that just had an altercation). I think phone number and name should be shared (quickly) at a safe distance with follow-up individually from an enforcement officer (not at the scene). Pictures of IDs may also be helpful. This is similar to a fender bender way of approaching a situation.
- Having the owner remain with the dog while waiting for an officer may escalate the situation
- I think their contact information should be shared, however if a dog is acting that way it would be best to first remove the dog from the situation. They should be required to share their information for follow up.
- It is not always possible to remain at the scene of an incident nor is it always wise. Think about this for a moment....emotions are running high, niether the dog(s) or people may be in much control and sometimes it makes sense to get a little space in.
- As long as information is exchanged, so an officer can come later on to the dog owner's home to get additional information
- Responsible ownership means remaining at the scene of an attack if it is safe to do so. If things have escalated to the point where a dog has bitten a person or another dog it is probably prudent to remove the dog from the area to avoid more bites or escalation of violence. I feel the rule should be that and owner should have to exchange information so that an officer can contact them later.

- If the human doesn't want to report it, then it is a none issue
- The officer can meet the owner at the owner's residence.
- I understand that, given such BSL, people may be afraid of having their dogs taken away or euthanized. By implementing such legislation, the City is actually making it less likely that owners would stick around to suffer the consequences. Further rules restricting the actions of pet owners will only seek to make thing worse, especially where specific breed are singled out. If this rule is implemented, then BSL cannot be - BSL only seeks to further stigmatize certain breeds.
- Incident implies far too much of a grey area - allows for far to much opinion of what an incident is. Before I'd support, a better definition needs to be considered.
- A rule/bylaw should not be required considering it can't be enforced. It should be common sense.
- "You have not been specific about the extent of the bite. Dogs bite one another in the dog park when playing. You are now leaving the extent of that bite open to interpretation - furthermore this could be a huge waste of police resources if they are required to attend everything that is deemed to be a bite.
- If a dog nips because it is scared but no damage is caused to the person or the other animal should an enforcement officer have to attend this situation.
- If a dog gets angry at another dog at the dog park and pins it but doesn't cause any damage should an enforcement officer have to attend this situation.
- If a dog bites the air and scares a person is this considered an issue.
- People do not need excessive legislation for how to operate in a civilized society. A dog owner knows when their dog is in the wrong - we do not need the police involved in every dog incident. Surely the Calgary police have better things to do with their time."
- You never know what the case is when a animal bites another etc. I think children should be kept beside their parents because they can treat animals poorly resulting in a nip. I think owners are responsible for their pets , of something happens , they should be left to decide amongst themselves how they will go about it. Discrimination towards pitbulls and breeds alike is the most popostrous law I've ever heard. ANY dog can create a dangerous scene , so I think its absolutely absurd to make them wear muzzles, or ban them from public parks. Come on calgary give your head a shake.
- Not all circumstances include the owner as a witness to the scenarios. As a witness to the animals general demeanor they are useful but only parties present are of any use when these situations occur.
- Provide contact information for follow up but no need to waste time remaining at site.
- Enforcement officers are not always available and the ones I have dealt with need training.
- "This seems awfully like someone did some brainstorming and forgot to do any analysis of second or third order effects.
- I'm not sure it is really all that sensible to have two animals that have bitten each other and their owners kept in the same location. Especially given that it is usually the case that aggressive animals are associated with aggressive owners.

- Nor would it be sensible to have owners hang around in extreme weather situations."
- The owner needs to be able to remove the dog from the situation and leave so it doesn't escalate, for the dogs sake and those around it.
- If the dog has bitten someone, they are a danger to others. Forcing the dog to stay at the scene only invites further incidents.
- While I agree that information should be exchanged, staying at the scene is not always practical and could make the situation worse or even escalate into a mob vs owner scenario.
- "While contact information should be exchanged. Remaining at a scene with heightened emotions (anger, stress, fear, etc...) Is not a good environment for any dog at the scene, especially if the owner of the biting dog needs to remove their pet from the situation.
- Also, people don't rationalize or think with a clear conscious in the heat of the moment, words and decisions may be said/made without thinking."
- Too easy to abuse - should strongly encourage rather than require
- Individual should be required to exchange info and ensure other party is safe, but staying at the scene in some cases may further agitate the issue and should be handled on a case by case basis. The severity of the bite may also be a factor.
- People should be doing this anyways! It's common sense and the right thing to do.
- Owner should remain providing offending dog can be removed by someone else
- "The pet may require medical attention the pets may not be able to be contained if people do not have car or home
- in proximity."
- They should have to speak to an enforcement officer but if their dog bit someone it is probably safer for the dog and public for it to be taken home
- There are not enough enforcement officers to respond in a timely manner. Not exchanging information with the dog bite victim should be an offence. This would allow the officer the time to interview each owner and arrive at a conclusion.
- Bylaw can take hours to arrive . If both parties are ok with departing then fine , if either need medical assistance then they should be able to go
- Sometimes the dogs and/or owners are in need of medical attention and if this is the case, it should be sought immediately and without delay so that there are no negative repercussions as a result of delaying. This in mind, they must disclose as soon as possible, to officers via phone, their location and if treatment is being sought, provide proof and/or be willing to meet outside of the facility or nearby so that the matter can be addressed. Exceptions to this are where medical attention is not required, or there is no other emergency, and in these cases, the owner must be in control of their animal but gentle to keep them calm, move away to a quiet corner and/or an area free of distractions that is close by. If it is an open area where there is risk of others being in danger, then they must be obligated to disclose immediately to officers via phone before leaving the scene, where they are able to be safely located, such as their home with the animal for further assessment.
- Can leave information with those associated with incident and promptly remove the offending dog from the area

- No, because the other dog may have been the aggressor and it may be unsafe to stay at the scene because of the other dog and it's owner. All situations are unique.
- Sharing contact information should be mandatory, but not prolonged exposure to the biting dog if further safety being compromised is deemed by any party involved to be a reasonable threat.
- They may need to get the dog safely away or obtain treatment. Say "Should stay unless further harm could be prevented or something"
- Only in circumstances where the bite is severe, and/or witnesses are needed, otherwise the offenders owner could go to the place of work of the enforcement officer. Those officers have enough to deal with
- Ppl can talk and fix it without enforcement officer
- There is too much room for abuse of power by enforcement officers
- These enforcement officers have a lot to deal with on a day to day basis. Asking them to attend too every incident would be adding a lot to their plate. Also how long will it take for them to respond? Its un fair to ask a person to wait for hours for someone to show up to take a cell phone picture and a statement when there is other ways of doing this.
- I think a "bite" needs to be defined before requirements are enforced. Also by making the owner remain present, the offending dog would also have to remain present.
- I think both parties need to exchange information regardless. I suppose it depends on the severity of the bite and if it requires immediate attention. If the person or animal needs to be rushed to hospital/vet then their might not be time to wait for an enforcement officer. Also, the attacking animal is probably better off not being in the location where the bite occurred and should be taken away from there for the safety of others. I think contact from both parties and any bystanders needs to be made by an enforcement officer. I think it is important for an enforcement officer to see the scene, but I don't think this is practical in all cases.
- Depends on the circumstance. If the dog bites as protection if it's human why should the human stick around with a potentially dangerous person? Perhaps the owner of the biter should be required to self report.
- Depends on the situation. By owning an animal, you are taking on the responsibility that comes with that. If your dog bites another dog you have to take the entire situation into account. Was the dog that got bit not listening to the leave me alone cues from the dog that bit? Owners should be able to handle these situations on their own by involving or not involving an enforcement officer.
- Follow-up post incident and apart from all others involved is best, I think.
- In theory, I do. But in practicality, if the dog owner is at the scene, it is probable that the dog in question is at the scene and that is not always the safest/most responsible behaviour for either the dog or the victim. If the dog continues to lunge or attempt to attack, it is best to remove the animal from the situation. I think they should have to share contact information and if possible wait.
- The handler of a dog which is involved in biting another person may have been at risk to begin with. I would never ask a person to stay in an area where they were potentially attacked or harrassed prior to an incident taking place. Dogs will protect their owners.

- If there has been an incident you need to put the dog in its safe spot, most likely home. You don't investigate the cause for a fire to start while it is still burning out of control. Same thing here.
- The owner should remove the dog from the situation immediately. They should have to provide contact info so they can be reached later.
- The dog should be removed from the area. Contact information should be given and contact made once dog is removed.
- "I there should be a rule that the
- Owner of the offending dog must talk with the owner of the other animal or with the person, and the offended person or owner of the offended animal should have the right to decide if they wish an enforcement officer involved or not. A dog "bite" can range from normal play behaviour to significant injurious action, and to have a single blanket rule covering all possible incidents in between would be overbearing."
- You use the word "rule" when you actually mean the word "law", Further your question presumes guilt and doesn't take into consideration Defensive bites. Law enforcement has also proven they can't be trusted, and there are more than enough laws Already on the books for dealing with this type of stuff.
- Why would they? This is not currently an issue.
- Sometimes they'd need to get the animal away from the scene quickly to decrease further escalation. In this case they should still leave contact information. Can't just stand and wait around while their animal is stressed/in distress
- People are often walking their dog right before work or fitting the walk into their schedules. Unlike car collisions, there wouldn't be any additional evidence gathered by the officer at the scene. This would be an unnecessary nuisance to have to wait for an officer when it could be described over the phone.
- I do support this actually. Just like a car accident. It's only fair. However we are talking about live animals who may need to be calmed down. Sometimes people do not have heating systems or air conditioning in their vehicles. Their vehicle might be the only safe place to put their animal. How do we ensure another attack doesn't happen with the two animals if they have to stay in the same area? How do we ensure medical help if the bite or attack is bad? How do we ensure animals and humans have fresh water and snacks if they have to wait a long time to have an officer arrive?
- If a dog has bitten someone or another dog, requiring the dog to stay on scene in that heightened condition could lead to a second incident. Bylaw could take a long time to get on scene and both animals need to have time to decompress from the situation and that doesn't happen by requiring the dog to remain on scene.
- I think there are exceptions to every situation; this is too vague. I.e. if a dog bits a wild rabbit we are to remain? Just need more clarity before adding blanket bylaws
- Wording needs to be more refined. Dogs play bite and the current wording does not describe the severity or if there was triggering event.
- This seems impractical. What is an "incident"? Dogs often play rough, but there are no injuries. It's the owners that create the incident.

- i feel that the length of time for an officer to respond to an incident is too long. Mandating that the owner remain at the scene for an extended period of time may result in other issues. Best to exchange information and remove the animals from the scene.
- As long as proper ID is given, I feel it would be OK for the offending dogs owner to leave the scene
- If the dog was injured due to what just happened and the owner had someone else to take the dog to the vet then yes the owner should stay at the scene, if they didn't then no, waiting could be deadly to the animal.
- If an animal is escalated to the point of biting, it should be removed from the scene and allowed to return to a safe environment where it can de-escalate. Forcing an angry, fearful, or overwhelmed animal to remain still in the environment where it bit is dangerous. Ideally, information can be shared quickly and an enforcement officer should be able to follow up with the owner after they have removed the dog from the situation.
- Leave info as required or take picture of license. Be smart yyc
- It is important that this information be provided so that the incident can be properly handled, but parties should be separated to prevent possible further conflict.
- Dogs can bite while playing, which is normal, so this could be abused. If the dog attacked a person or animal they should share contact info but the dog should be removed from the situation that caused it to lose control in the first place.
- Critical to share contact info, but the owner may need to prioritize controlling their animal and/or getting help.
- If it is a tiny dog that nips because another dog has run at it and scared it that would be an example of why this is unreasonable
- I would worry that this would increase stops to BIPOC or profiling.
- The aggressive dog needs to be removed immediately for the safety of all parties including the dog. The offending dog info must be left prior to departure.
- I think the priority is to separate and deescalate the attack by removing the nuisance dog to a safe place.
- It seems like a good idea, but the most important thing is to remove the dog from the scene and the owner is the most likely one to be able to do that quickly and efficiently. They could remove the dog and then be required to come back.
- I don't think the rules need to be changed for animals I think people will always find something to be upset about with animals and this will change nothing
- Just like car accidents, exchange contact information is fine
- They should share contact information and talk to an enforcement officer, but should not have to remain at the scene; the dog could possibly become riled up, stressed, and/or scared after the incident. They would be safer at home or in their vehicle, where the dog can be behind a door/wall/barrier while the owner talks to the proper authorities or call in.
- Enforcement officers are statistically more likely to discriminate against people of color. Requiring people to wait for the cops to show up is like asking someone to leave their hand on a burner.

- Because sometimes it's just dog politics and everything sorts itself out. And also sometimes people aren't dog savvy, don't keep their distance (even when warned to do so), and/or taunt the dog, whether intentionally or unintentionally. The number of times I've had to body block my dog from strangers and other dogs is truly mind boggling.
- This is perhaps not the appropriate way to handle the situation for the animal or the person bit. Exchange of information and taking the animal somewhere safe would be ideal
- I support mandatory exchange of information but do not support prolonged exposure of the victim to the offending dog.
- I would support this rule only if the bite is severe enough to require medical attention. If the question was re-written to specify this I would select yes as my answer.
- It could potentially be very difficult to deescalate a situation when there's been an incident. This could be anything from continued dog behaviour problems to aggressive adults being physically violent with the other party, including for example, a teen walking the family dog. The requirement to remain at the scene is an undue burden in the face of confrontation, which is highly likely in this context. I recognize the need to gather information and hold parties accountable, but there needs to be a different way.
- Depends on the severity of the incident. A minor altercation like a small nip or bite that could be caused by many reasons (being startled, self defense) should be dealt with reasonably and rationally and there is no reason to get law enforcement involved.
- Tricky - it's probably better to get the dog home or away as not to escalate further. If dog & owner walked to park - there would be no place to contain animal to calm down if have to wait for officer.
- "My dog was bit and it wasn't by one of the listed dog types.
- Remember a dog bites for a reason. What did the other dog/person do to provoke the situation. Then it becomes a very angry situation."
- If removing the dog from the situation is safer than the owner to remove dog and then return to the site.
- This could get out of hand quickly with people calling in simply because dogs were being dogs. We would spend way too much money responding to frivolous calls. You already track dogs that bite so this is not necessary and will simply cause delays for everyone involved.
- I'd like to say yes, but the dog owner may need to remove the dog from the area / situation to calm the dog down.
- If a dog is being aggressive towards another dog, often the problem is the humans, the dogs can feel their stress, fear etc and become more excited, a dog will also generally follow its owner, so to prevent further confrontation I would say it's ok to get out of there. And then return once dogs/humans are under control.
- If a dog bites, it is protecting itself. Most dogs bite due to stress not aggression. Both individuals should be given training options to avoid this again. BOTH.
- Law enforcement officers aren't likely to be at the scene in a timely matter. I do think it would be right to share information and talk with law enforcement over the issue, but I don't feel it's realistic to assume an officer is going to be at the scene of an offense.

- This question needs to be more specific. Minor bites that do not bleed or need medical attention vs major bites that require medical or veterinary attention. I could potentially support a rule that requires the dog owner to remain at the scene should the bite(s) be very serious, ie. Requiring stitches.
- I don't think that is the issue with dog bites remaining at the scene
- If some clown teases a dog and gets bitten, the dog is the victim not the clown
- My dog is the sweetest but if he were to bite someone (which he wouldn't) i would want him in the most comfortable, relaxing environment. He would have to be provoked pretty bad to bite someone so it would be best for him to feel safe and calm so that others don't judge based in a fair, scared reaction from a dog.
- It may reduce the likelihood of further altercations for the person to go home and provide contact info only or call the 311 rather than remain on scene
- Depends on instance and severity. Sometimes dogs nio at each other when first meeting. Some Karen has no right to ask for info an minor scuffles
- The first imperative is to have the animal safely restrained so that it can not do any further damage. The owner must leave name / contact information, ensure that medical help is coming if required, but then should be able to leave with the animal if necessary to restrain them on their own property. They would, of course, need to speak with enforcement if / when they arrive, and continue to maintain safe restraint of the animal.
- It's not the city's responsibility for the two parties to exchange whatever needed information.
- I believe that contact info must be given and that the person be available for questions as required.
- If the animal is under stress or is worked up or being triggered by something to someone at the scene, they need to be leave the area so both the owner and animal can collect themselves.
- Again too much government control over issues that can be sorted out by people involved.
- Dogs play hard and enjoy the play with other dogs at the park far to many inexperienced dog owners will take this to an extreme.
- If the dog bites another person then the owner should definitely share contact information. The dog bite something like a skunk or a rabbit, the owner shouldn't need to wait around for anyone.
- I believe safety should be the primary concern. A bite is an emotional charged situation. Either the offending dog or its owner could be a safety threat, or have their safety threatened, by remaining on scene. It should not be an offence to leave the scene if that de-escalates a situation.
- Some people train strong dogs specially for attacks. Those people won't stick around to speak to a officer, likely because their using that dog as protection for illegal activities.
- More often than not dogs only bite when they aren't being treated properly or people are ignoring the dogs warning signs before biting and i donnt think the owner should be liable for others' actions
- I think they need to get there dog out of the situation as soon as possible, but then come back to give there information.
- Unless there is clear evidence of what happened, the owner should not need to stay at any scene, they could be accused just because the city of Calgary declared a certain breed a nuisance and creates the possibility for thoughts who hate animals to use it against them. At some point it is he/she say and more then likely humans will point the finger at animal who was only protecting. Sometimes people look guilty when talking to law enforcement even when they did nothing wrong.

- I think staying there can increase the tension between the animals and the people. Exchanging information is fine, and talking to an officer later when it is more convenient.
 - If a dog has already bitten someone they should be removed immediately to prevent the possibility of further bites. But that's just common sense
 - Depends on the context and severity. Some people are overly dramatic.
 - "If the dog bites someone you need to remove it from the situation, escalating emotions tensions and prolonged exposure will likely make the situation dangerous for animals and people.
- Say dog fight/bite, now both parties must remain together with their animals that have already provoked. Also if an animal or person is injured they may need to seek medical attention"
 - If this is not law now why should it be?
 - This seems like a common sense measure, but if the dog is agitated it would make more sense to bring it home and kennel it right away rather than waiting for officers to attend.
 - This is a grey area. Has the dog been provoked and has the bite been severe.
 - it is a dog. any infraction on the dogs behalf is direct correlation to the owner and not the breed of the dog. trying to hold a dog accountable will not work.
 - Just exchange information instead of waiting for bylaw to show up. They can come to the owners house easily enough
 - Tension and conflict could escalate
 - This process could take a long time. Or if the bite is serious then the victim would be gone anyways to the hospital. Could this instead be phoned in to describe the events with an in person follow-up from officer?
 - Dog and owner need to be removed immediately to deescalate the situation and reduce trauma on the victim.
 - We don't have a climate that would make this appropriate. Also if the animal is agitated it may be nest for the owner to get them to a calm and familiar place.
 - Look into dog behaviours. Learning appropriate behaviour
 - This can cause massive harrassment and stalling, property damage, can affect your job. Giving personal information to a stranger who thinks you wronged them is a BAD idea. I shouldn't have to be forced to exchange my person information. Just like with an accident I only have to produce my insurance. I don't have to give the other person my address or phone number.
 - I disagree entirely with how this city and others handle dog bites and repeat offences.
 - Responsible pet owners with provide necessary information. A rule is not going to stop someone that isn't going to hang around from staying.
 - As a pitbull owner... IF my dog attacked an innocent dog .. I would 1. Give my information and 2. Pay for the vet bill .. BUT I am removing my dog from the scene of accident.

- Owners can discuss expectations and share contact information without the need of a third party.

Responses below include those that did not respond with yes or no however provided a comment.

- I totally agree that it makes sense for pet owners to exchange information. Owners running off with a dog that has attacked someone or their pet, should face consequences. However, there may be situations where you need to separate animals or seek medical attention. So a prolonged wait may not make sense. And it seems unclear what criteria would be applied for determining if an enforcement officer would need to be involved. So, I'm finding it difficult to say yes or no to this.
- I want to put yes, but I also want to put no. Because at times I feel like it can be necessary depending on the severity and such, however it can also not be necessary depending on how understanding the other person is, for example if a dog is trying to get a rise out of the other dog, the other dog in question bites the other dog, the owners both see this, understand the situation at hand that it wasn't necessarily the dog being aggressive more defensive over aggressive and can be handled in a personal manner through exchanging information whether it be phone numbers, contact information, information on both dog's shots and medical history.
- Depends on severity of bite. If blood or torn skin. If a warning snap, then no.
- Exchange of information should be given. The dogs need to be separated from the scene quickly so the incident doesn't escalate as both are feeling traumatized.
- If there is a visible injury exchange contact info or if necessary file police report. Sometimes it's best to remove the aggressive dog to allow it to stop attacking so this may be a barrier to enforcing the bylaw.
- I believe the owner should be accountable, however, immediate resolution may be very difficult. Situation: two dogs get into a fight at a dog park. How do you expect the owners to share information when both dogs are still present and likely still wound up? The risk for another immediate incident increases.
- Depending on the situation, sometimes it's best to remove certain dogs from the situation. Dogs feed off of the energy so if it's high energy I don't feel as the dog would be as behaved as usual
- forcing a dog to remain on the property only because of a piss poor owner is not fair to the animal. Punish the owner for being reckless in not training their pet. Also investigate incidents without prejudice and thoroughly, I have heard of too many biased investigations resulting in the execution of an animal who just did what was natural and did not know any better unlike their useless owner who should get slapped upside the head for being such an incompetent owner.
- If the o
- Singling out breeds is unfair to the dogs and responsible owners.
- I don't know enough to answer this question.
- Feeding- allow...teasing/animal cruelty NO
- "Yes and no.
- if the dog is able to be secured somewhere to remove it from the situation (less stressful) then potentially the owner could stay around. Otherwise it may be best for that owner to take the animal home to secure it .

- It really is all dependent on each situation that comes about and the safety of everyone involved."
- Yes To determine if the dog is a possible nuisance if bite is a person only. No if another dog.
- What's with all the pit bull nonsense?? None of this was mentioned in Phase 1. You're proving that you have no idea about anything involving dogs - it has been proven time and time again that BSL does not work to reduce bites and many communities are getting rid of it. GET EDUCATED!!! The people you have working in animal bylaw obviously know nothing about behaviour and haven't done anything to learn more.
- The owner of the dog that bites should be held accountable
- Where did all this BSL garbage come from?? There was NOTHING in phase 1 about BSL - who are you consulting on this?? EXTREMELY disappointed in Calgary Bylaw; this questionnaire proves me right, animal bylaw in Calgary know NOTHING about behaviour or care to learn. Many places are doing away with BSL because it doesn't work (look at Ontario) and Calgary wants to digress and implement it?? We need [personal information removed] back, animal bylaw is being run by [removed] since he left.
- Irresponsible owners won't care whether or not there is a bylaw.
- Stop targeting pit bulls. Or any breed treat as individuals
- Yes and no. I think the owner should have the opportunity to bring their dog home and remove it from the situation, then speak with an enforcement officer if necessary.
- I think by law for pit bulls is discrimination against this breed. All pit bulls I know are friendly and well behaved. No I don't own one. Any breed can turn. I have two dogs I never let off leash as small dogs and it's for their safety. I have seen huskies labs shepherds I wouldn't trust. Should consider a dog's personality not the breed.
- Neutral opinion
- If possible it is a good idea as in at any incident for enforcement to get all the information as soon as possible but it should be considered that the owner may need to remove the animal to ensure safety of the public.
- "Sometimes" should be a choice. If the bite is severe enough to break skin and draw blood, then the dog owner should be required to share contact information. To expect anyone to remain at the scene of an incident until an enforcement officer showed up would be considered cruel and unusual for all parties, however.
- Hand over the authority to the trainers who are professional and educated on breed type, behaviour, and genetics .
- All life deserves to be treated with respect. Mistakes can happen naturally which should be recognized as so when needed.
- Not all animals interacting with humans are a crime.
- I do not like this as a YES or NO; There should be a choice: Clearly the owner should stay unless there is a situation with the animal that requires the owners immediate attention
- That's a hard one to answer yes or no as it depends on the situation as different situations yield different outcomes, as well as reasons for the bite or attack if the dog is provoked and bites I believe the dog should not be balmed again going back to. Stop blaming dogs for the bad decisions people with their pets. Start holding the owner responsible.

- It depends on the situation-are both dogs or owners in need of medical attention? I would think IDs, photos of bites, dogs and owners, emails etc could be obtained before leaving for treatment
 - That's stupid.
 - I'm unsure of this as circumstances of the bite are important
 - Dogs will lbe dogs, they play and sometimes get on each others nerves. If my dog starts to get agitated it's my responsibility to remove him from the situation. To stay at the scene if there were a scrap, would only lead my and other dogs to be more and more agitated.
 - Explain why there is no option not support the tribunal. Explain why pitbulls are the only dangerous dog breed.
 - Depends how severe and how long it would take an officer to arrive
 - Just like any traffic or offended that has caused harm to humans or their belongings; common courtesy
 - "Yes and no
- Sometimes the safest thing to do is to leave the situation so tensions don't build , but name and address should be given"
 - Yes and no. It depends on the situation. It may not be safe for the owner and the dog to remain but they should contact police or bylaw to give their contact information should they need to contact them
 - It would depend on the severity of the bite and the negligence of the owner/incident. Some dogs provoke others and that needs to be accounted for. It can't just be blame on the dog that bites.
 - only if the situation is safe for all
 - No BSL !!!
 - how about reducing the amount of food? Do I need to remove ny grass to prevent feeding animals? Let's think for a second.
 - attacked person/animal could have been at fault (taunting, unleashed, did not ask for permission to pet dog)
 - Medical attention takes precedence. An Enforcement officer is not always readily available but if an owner is not responsible and reaches out to enforcement when an incident occurs then definitely fines.
 - That is common friend decency
 - "# 1 - Depends on the response time of the enforcement officer. A person that is bitten should have the wound attended to as quickly as possible. A person that owns the dogs needs to get it away from the environment as soon as possible. Exchanging info should be done & followed up later.
 - Exchanging info is adequate."
 - Yes, if it is safe to do so.

- [personal information removed] needs to go. This is a form of racism and he steals from the city. He needs to be followed by Nenshi who once was a great mayor but has allowed his ego to cloud his judgment. This is absurd and I will play the racism card if anyone comes near my dogs....
- Yes if there is injury, not any and every bite (particularly between animals). Just exchanging contact info should be sufficient, there would have to be objective criteria.
- What is the response time for enforcement officers? I believe that as long as the dog owner provides verifiable contact information then it might be better for them to leave the scene to keep both their animal and the owner calm and remove them from the stressful situation. That being said, I have heard of too many stories of owners running away from situations in which their dog has caused hurt to another animal or person.
- I'm not sure. I don't want an encouragement of some people playing the victim in these cases so they can get their 5 minutes of fame.
- Small birds are not the cause of wildlife problems
- It is not always safe to keep the dog on scene following an incident. Information must be exchanged but safety needs to be the priority
- As a dog owner you should take responsibility and if need be defend your dog if it was provoked
- wild animals are just that "wild", leave them alone so that they remain wild and not dependant on us for food
- I feel this is case specific. For example: what if the dog bit a person but the person was not listening to the owner or the dog's warnings or in cases where the other dog provokes the attack and the other dog was defending itself. I've read of stories where smaller dogs attack a bigger dog and when the bigger dog defends itself to get away, the bigger dog gets in trouble despite it being the smaller dog/the smaller dog's owner in the wrong.
- I believe that the person should however only if the dog in question can be subdued or removed from the situation.
- Statistically, targeting a breed doesn't lower bite and is expensive to enforce/train and I do not support this.
- Common sense 101
- Need to define more. Bird feeders? Occasionally throwing a couple leaves of lettuce I have no problem with bating animals I sure do.
- Pitbulls are no more dangerous than any other dog. If forcing anything force classes for ALL Dog owners to train them. Its not the dog breed thats dangerous its NO training that is the problem!!!
- Not sure if it should be the case or not.
- If it could be done safely. If I have a small dog that was attacked by a larger dog, I probably would prefer the larger dog was removed from the scene.
- Only if the dog/owner were physically able to. IE- If neither were also hurt in the incident. Dogs fighting may require both parties to seek medical attention.
- Small animals are ubiquitous and often add to a family's enjoyment and appreciation of nature, but hazing (or even) attracting deer, coyotes, other large animals should be discouraged

- Yes to above question and fine unless contact with police / city officer so that they can go to a veterinarian with injured animals. About tribunal system, insurance for or cash payment up front for kennel costs(food shelter medical socialization) within 48 hours or further fines and stopping of agreed upon medical aid beyond basics.
- I think it is important the owner of the pet be held accountable. At the same time, if the owner has a dog that is acting out, staying at the scene may be putting others at risk (ex. In an off leash park). Ive been told by trainers to always remove a dog from a situation where it is exhibiting 'red light' behaviours. Maybe this only needs an exception - that the person stay in a safe nearby location (maybe their vehicle). It is unclear in this question whether the person would need to share contact information with bylaw only or with the affected party. If it is between citizens I wonder if that would result in abuse towards the person whose pet was responsible.
- Dye to the regressive BSL language, the panel members are of great concern. However, my concern for the animals well being makes me feel cornered into supporting this with huge concerns.
- They should go home and be talked to there
- I'm
- It's difficult to make that work everytime, like hit and runs there are laws in place but offenders still leave and some are never caught
- I think every situation is unique & must be handled as such
- Civilian input
- Depending on the severity of the attack I feel it is the responsibility of the person on the scene to get care for those injured first - people or pets. Then they should be responsible to own the remediation after the incident - sharing contact information and speaking to enforcement officers.
- Bird feeders in yards should be allowed as they allow for diversity as well as feeding birds when food is sparse (winter)
- [removed]
- I think owners should take responsibility but I also feel there may be times when it is best to remove the dog, take home and return. Ex hot day when dog cannot stay in car. Or remove dog if person is traumatized by it remaining there
- Depends on the severity of the bite and the circumstances.
- As long as the tribunal consists of impartial participants that are involved with animals (such as veterinarians)
- They should exchange info and then be allowed to remove the dog from the situation and return
- Too general a statement, how long would one be expected to wait for an enforcement officer, do you still need to wait if you have already provided the information to the other person involved?
- I think it depends fully on situation. Ie, if being attacked I would not stay OR if the bite happened because of an animal being teased (people who are warned dog might bite if you get close)
- Yes
- Common sense
- OMG.... Encourage normal human decency.

- Feeding the native birds especially during winter helps with survival with very little impact on the ecosystem
- I've never been more ashamed of this city. This kind of ignorance is truly disgusting. I never wanted to leave Calgary but if this is the sort of pathetic fear mongering we're going to resort to I will be packing up and getting out.
- BSL is discrimination and I don't support it.
- It would be more fair if the owner took part in the process and his point of view could be expressed and heard as well.
- Provided the ppl involved are unbiased in opinions (including history of their own animals) otherwise it's not productive. With at least 1 trainer & 1 veterinarian to give opinions.
- Please do not discriminate against pitbulls or those breeds that look like pitbulls. These are the kindest sweetest dogs I've ever met. I understand that their strength is strong and could cause harm, but so can many other things in life. This harms so many innocent dogs that are incredibly sweet and great dogs. Please do not do this.
- Depending on the severity of the attack, if they have to transport to emergency.
- Seems obvious
- I think this depends on the situation if the animal is under duress and may bite again due to stress then I would say no. If dog is calm then yes.
- [removed]
- It is NOT the breed, it's the owner
- Depending on the severity of the situation; if both parties can safely remain on site, it would make sense that the offenses be addressed immediately.
- there are already enough court cases
- Sometimes remaining at the scene could result in further aggression both by dogs and owner. I believe a call should be made to the authorities to report the incident but if leaving the scene prevents further bad behaviour then leave.
- While pit bulls don't bite more frequently than other breeds, pit bull attacks are far more likely to be fatal than any other breed. Pit bulls should be outlawed for that reason alone. [personal information removed] But I feel it important to encourage the city to research the number of fatal attacks by pit bulls and related animals, in comparison to other dog breeds. My beloved German Shepard is the dog most often blamed in dog bites and dog attacks. I have often defended Shepards in conversation, but honesty forces me to admit that if you are bitten, you were likely bitten by a Shep, or a mongrel Shep. It's time for Pit Bull lovers to admit that their dogs kill more people than all other breeds COMBINED. Owners should be held liable for keeping menace animals. Thank you for allowing an outsider to comment - and I'll show myself to the door now. Have a nice day!!!
- feeding of birds from feeders should be allowed
- If a pitbull has never had an incident with someone why should the owner or dog be penalized
- the person should take the dog away from the scene. Then be required to question after.
- LOL, and how do you expect to enforce that? The same way you enforce people not to that leave accidents? Or how you handle people not breaking into others homes, businesses, vehicles?

- This is a case-to-case situation and can not be a Yes/No answer
- I believe the owner should be trained properly .. it's the owner that is the problem.. once they can prove they are responsible they may have this breed .
- Unsure. How long would that take?
- "It's poor owner ship
- They were called the nannie dog for a reason.
- The myth they have a stronger bite than other dogs is just that a myth
- My st Bernard could bite a hell of alot stronger than my staffi
- And she's not classified as mean or dangerous .
- This by law is a cash grab from responsible pet owners who have never had any issues ."
- I would be concerned the courts do not need to be tided up with dog issues
- It depends. If the incident is minor and if the offending owner agreed to cover costs and they exchange info (like a car fender bender) then I think they can go their own way
- BSL doesn't work. I have been bit 7 times by small dogs. If you are going to restrict pitbulls, why aren't you restricting small dogs? Calgary has one of the best animal by law programs, why change it? Why follow Ontario? These good dogs, and good owners don't deserve to be facing a BSL against their dogs when they have little ankle biters running around and everyone thinks it's cute. Give your head a shake!
- I think it depends on the severity of the bite. Are we talking when blood is drawn or also when there is a nip?
- Dogs play, knicks happen. Our dog has ended up bleeding a few times. I think there needs to be some thought given to severity here or people could significantly overreact.
- It depends the problem with that is that if it was two dogs. It could create more aggression between the dogs waiting around for bylaw to come.
- If remaining at the scene means the dangerous dog remains at the scene it is not better for the owner to remove the dog.
- Yes if possible, but since the situation is stressful enough already, like in car accidents below a certain monetary value, share contact information should be mandatory.
- if necessary? More clarification
- This is a non-issue. Fix the God-awful infrastructure in this city instead before it caves in on itself.
- prefer tribunal rather than taking up precious time in the courts.
- depends on severity-need to get aid, etc
- Depends on the seriousness of the incident (ie potential for medical treatment needed) Sometimes dogs get in a minor tussle, lot of noise, no injuries, owners break them up and move on, do we need to waste an officers time for something like this? No.
- I need to hear more of the thinking from both sides of this issue.
- I don't have a good enough perspective to give a proper answer
- Speeding up the process is in the best interest of the animal.

- That would depend upon the definition of bite. There are inexperienced people who think that a dog mouthing is the same as a bite and it's not, so I would qualify this to place parameters around the severity of the situation in regards to whether or not anything further were needed.
- Enforcement and safety an issue.
- BSL is arbitrary, unfair and targets your resources at the wrong people/in the wrong direction. Singling out pit bulls under "nuisance" breeds is just lazy legislation in my mind.
- This is a difficult one. If the owner stays at the scene then the dog will have to as well which could lead to further or worsening incidents. However information needs to be shared. This is something that should be looked into more.
- I believe the owner of a dog who bit someone should take responsibility and exchange information however I also think it's important to remove that dog in question from the situation to reduce further consequences
- A bite needs to be defined . If a dog snapped at me but made no contact I would not say I was bit. Some people with fear of dogs would claim this was a bite
- Yes-if the dog and the owner leave they will never be found!!!!
- I'm unsure of the implications.
- It may not be safe if the owner has to stay on scene with the dog that was aggressive. They may have to take the dog elsewhere. This is difficult to manage.
- A tribunal just adds another layer of complexity and bureaucracy.
- I'm unsure how to answer this. Ideally they should stay however Enforcement officers are not usually available immediately so it wouldn't be enforceable and if a dog or its owner is injured, treatment is needed right away. In my situation where my dog was attacked it was a few hours before the officer was able to come.
- If the person has any moral character they if stay, help and ensure the situation is under control. Unfortunately we no longer live in that society and choose to "shame" them on social media now. Very sad world we now live in!
- I agree that it's important because it would be important to have the dogs medical/vaccination history, but if people are scared of losing their dogs or the situation being misjudged because of the breed of their dog and because they feel that the rules are biased against them I can understand why an owner wouldn't want to stay and I'm not sure a bylaw would change that
- As long as they can control their dog while remaining at the scene and the length of time it takes for a bylaw officer to arrive.
- feeders for birds are a typical backyard practise.
- Sounds like a lot of money would be needed to enforce this. Maybe it should be lawful to share contact info. and to provide licensing info of the dog in question.
- If the owner remains at the scene, so does the dog. Better if they share their info then take the dog home, away from the situation and potentially other issues.
- I do not agree with this as a yes or no question. All dogs are animals at the end of the day, and saying that one person has the right to judge that animal based on one action is not fair to anyone involved. An enforcement officer can be easily biased based on their own views of a certain type of dog. Even if, that dog was acting in self defense. Most people only see what the dog did to defend itself, or what it has been taught. No one judges the owner on his or her abilities to control or correct said behaviors. That's the real problem.

- It depends on the circumstances, generally yes but it really depends on what caused the dog to bite.
- Depends on the severity of the bite.
- I think it depends on the severity, and what caused the bite to occur
- This one isn't Y/N: I do think there needs to be a mandatory contact with dog owner and officer, but I think if a lone individual with offending dog, likely need to remove the dog in order to de-escalate the situation. Not sure how that could be accomplished.
- How ridiculous clearly somebody has an issue with Pitt bulls, I don't even know how you can begin to judge this issue a vicious dog is a vicious dog dog that bites is a dog that bites an owner's lack of responsibility is the issue if you have the stats that show pitbulls don't bite as much as other animals what are you doing such a waste of time and money no I don't have a bit bull but I do have a dog and fully aware if it bit somebody it's my responsibility and as a responsible dog owner I take full responsibility of my dog and this is what you should be looking at the owners not the animal how dare you judge a certain breed when they aren't the ones that bite yes the impact might be worse kind of like if a guy punched you in the face compared to a girl well I think the guy should be punished more I didn't even know how you can bring up such Ludacris subject you're certainly judging making judgment it's like I have a black dog people are frightened of a black dog with nice white canine teeth all lives matter white yellow black no legs 2 legs one leg for leg shame on Calgary for judging it's bad enough other provinces judge the breed of dog why don't you show them what you guys are really made of keep things the way they are find the owner take the dog from the owner do whatever you have to do to put that dog in a safe environment a dog loved trained respected is a well-deserved dog and should be judged by its breed colour or ability and strength regoup and think about what you're saying.
- Depending on the severity
- Any breed of dog that bites should be ordered for training..not euthanasia
- Contact information should be traded and the dog needs to be removed.
- The fact that one dog breed is here simply on its features and not statistics shows how ridiculous this government is

Livestock

In addition to hens, we are exploring criteria for the potential approval of other livestock to be permitted in Calgary. Criteria for other livestock would include:

- Offers community benefit/ will have positive impact
- Support from adjacent neighbours
- Suitable living conditions can be provided for the animal
- Exceptions would be evaluated on a case by case basis and the decision would be at the discretion of the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer

Participants who indicated they would support this bylaw amendment are listed here.

- Providing the animals are well cared for, cleaned up after and don't interfere with neighbours, there is no reason for not owning small livestock. This can help many Calgarians. For example, a family having a couple of hens will help feed the family
- Hens yes.
- if folks want to keep hens, as long as they are well cared for and are not a nuisance (and neighbors are ok with them - sometimes they can be loud and smelly) - don't see why someone couldn't keep hens
- I think it would be great to allow hens in the city
- Obtaining support from adjacent neighbours is unnecessary. The law should be that for a lot with a certain zoning and minimum size x number of chickens are allowed. Period. Set out the obligations of a chicken owner (set backs from lot lines, standards of care, coop and run size, acceptable feeding practices and cleanliness) and if those are violated and a complaint occurs, THEN bylaw enforcement can step in. People will raise a sink about urban chickens, but having lived in cities with them, the reality is that actual problems are very rare. Maybe prohibit roosters if you are concerned about noise, but be prepared to address the problem of what to do with roosters since people often have trouble telling if their one-day old chicks are female or male.
- only if I can occasionally get fresh chicken eggs or honey if raising bees...I think that's a fair compromise since I don't want animals at my home...
- If the chickens are safe and healthy, and their habitat is well maintained, then I see no problem with keeping them in yards.
- Fresh eggs!
- Yes however there needs to be proper oversight. Already there can be issues of abuse with regular household pets I worry that this could create a greater issue however I can also see the benefits
- Suitable living conditions and feedback from neighbors should occur before livestock is obtained.
- Yes it's about time because it gives people a chance to have fresh eggs as well.
- Would love to have my own eggs for cooking.
- Why would hens be an issue within the city if they are well looked after.
- I think as long as people are being respectful and diligent, what's wrong with having a few hens for fresh eggs and companion. We as a society need to be more self sufficient. Once again, as long as potentially dangerous animals are not allowed.
- free run eggs! Local business will be more supported!
- It must be supported and approved by neighbors and community affected in city limits
- I think hens would be sustainable livestock and easy to maintain.
- I'm open for any animal to be loved and supported but if we are going to give more animals homes then there needs to be more mandatory training for people to go through. People need to appreciate animal lives better.
- People are trying to be more self- sufficient with food and this would help.

- Provided that all animal needs are seen to, were management doesn't become a health hazard to the human population, and noise is not significantly greater, why should there be a problem? People are already allowed to keep exotic animals including large, highly intelligent birds. A few hens or a small goat would be significantly easier to provide for than a macaw.
- Some small livestock like hens maybe. I don't think many other livestock would be suitable for the city. And of course livestock should be in limited numbers.
- I think this is a great idea!
- Only on certain sizes of lots. (Larger)
- I support chickens and stuff. Yes I think this can be a great learning experience for children etc. But I am worried about additional noise pollution and being woken at the crack of dawn. Would be curious to know what issues have arisen from jurisdiction that currently allow it. And why would anybody want a pigeon? - ok reading the most of answers below is STRONGLY making me say I don't support this anymore. Ok so now Condo's allow dogs and cats now we going to have pigeons on our balconies. You know, go live on a farm with all your animals if that's your preference. People are going to just do this for shits & giggles.
- Hens and small milking goats should be permitted in the city.
- Seems like reasonable criteria.
- I think it would be cool! Fresh eggs and a great way to teach kids about where their food comes from and how to care for animals.
- If the above guidelines are followed I see no issues
- People should be allowed to have chickens if it's not being a nuance
- I have always wanted to own a couple chickens and have long lamented the restriction.
- Provided the animal is treated well, in a healthy environment and is not creating a disturbance.
- Limiting the number of hens in a yard, consulting with your neighbor. If there is a smell or mess constantly it needs to be removed immediately.
- Why not. Dogs, kids, cats and people can be loud, smelly and annoying, so why not pulley. Hell i'm game, just but an entire farm yard In one yard. Proper confinement, homes, sanitation, etc.
- As long as the animal doesn't cause excessive noise, odours, or dangers to the community and the animals are able to be provided everything necessary to live happy and healthy (i.e. enough space etc.), I don't care what kind of animals are kept by people
- I believe if the animal has a good life with someone who loves it what does it matter what kind of pet that is?? Animal racism #livestocklivesmatter
- Humane treatment of the animals must be considered. Please make it clear that no slaughter take place at homes. Perhaps start with chickens for egg production, with requirement of vet care and vet euthanasia if necessary. See how chickens go... then start looking at other animals. Please let people have their pet pigs though.
- Urban hens is a great idea! I fully support this.
- Sure, as long as there are adequate and strong limits to noise, smell, etc, for neighbours to complain if they need to, and to have their complaint and concerns addressed adequately.

- I think so long as its hygienic (picking up of feces regularly, general cleanliness for the animal grazing areas and bedding) then it should be allowed. Noise and smell should also be a factor.
- Of the animals are not being harmed and are being taken care of humanely then there are low risks.
- A small number of hens is less annoying than a neighbour who smokes and the hens aren't a health hazard
- animals are taken care of
- Have requirements about animal welfare and vaccinations so as to not spread disease.
- If the room is available why not have a goat mow your lawn
- As long as neighbours are on board, I fully support an individual's attempt to feed themselves sustainably
- if they are in no danger to other animals or humans and well trained or no complaints sure.
- Controls need to be in place to prevent salmonella and protect public health. There are currently a number of salmonella cases/clusters related to back yard poultry.
- Bring on the chickens!
- as long as there are no roosters there should not be an issue if the person follows the rules
- As long as animal, yard and home are kept clean and neighbors are supportive - why not.
- "Honestly, this amendment should have been made ages ago. Chickens, bees, and others...there's really no fundamental difference in keeping them vs keeping cats, dogs, rabbits, etc. You need to provide the animal proper living conditions and care- it's simple as that. It's typically once someone is no longer doing that, that problems start arising- no matter what animal we are talking about.
- So I really don't see any good reason to continue to ban backyard chickens or bees (or others).
- If the people are required to provide proper care as they are required to provide proper care for dogs, etc., then I think it should be fine."
- You want chickens and you follow rules and don't disturb neighbors, then have a few chickens.
- access to food is a basic human right. NOT allowing someone to responsibly keep chickens or eggs or any reason should be considered a violation of basic human right.
- why not? If its not hurting anybody.
- Backyard chickens are a good thing!
- Pot belly pigs should be allowed in city limits
- who wouldn't want chickens in their backyard. As long as neighbours are aware.
- Calgary is so sprawled most people have yards more than large enough to support a safe and sustainable coop.
- Chickens make great pets
- not much knowledge on the topic but not opposed
- it's a good idea
- As long as adjacent neighbours agree and they are looked after, aren't smelly, and are not noisy during quiet hours (after 11pm)
- Some people need therapy animals, but are afraid of/allergic to cats and dogs. This may satisfy the needs of those who require comfort animals, but cannot adopt.

- I feel that livestock would not affect me in my neighbourhood setting
- Certain livestock would be okay such as hens provided that the person has the proper facilities to have livestock in their back yards.
- Good for fertilizing gardens and for urban farming.
- Illegal hens will get the vet help and better care they need
- Allowing access to local and sustainable food options is always worthwhile
- I have many allergies and food sensitivities, many of which are protein based, (both meat and plant alternatives), and eggs are something that I can eat. Having my own chickens would mean that I have easier access to eggs and more control over the conditions to ensure that none of my allergies are secretly included (like unlisted corn, which is a prevalent problem).
- Yes I would support it if the land size permitted live stock. Side note - with regards to question #8 - people and children should ask before they pet. So let's teach our youth that.
- As long as pens are kept clean and away from neighbours.
- na
- Hens ok, no roosters
- As long as the animals are clean, healthy and happy this should be reasonable. Dont let people shove rhem.in tiny cages all day.
- Benefits outweigh negatives
- It's a chicken and they can be helpful on keeping the big population down.
- Individuals should be able to have hens as pets
- As long as they aren't noisy
- I like fresh eggs I wouldn't own hens but as long as they were keeping me up at night or waking me up at the crack of dawn
- We can learn a lot about conservation simply by giving them the opportunity to cultivate their own food and livestock in their own backyard.
- Livestock can be wonderful pets as long as they are properly cared for. I do not agree with the bylaw if they are being raised for slaughter.
- If taken of properly, having private livestock is a great way for self sustaining food for families as well as educational purposes.
- I support people's being more self-sufficient but not at the expense of their neighbours.
- As long as the animal is living in appropriate living conditions, and not experiencing any sort of abusive living situation. Animals in urban areas should not be exploited for profit.
- No issue with animals in the city as long as they are being cared for adequately
- Responsible animal husbandry in urban areas is not difficult and provides many benefits.
- As long as the pet/lovestock, owner, neighbours and community needs are balanced, there is no reason to object to a more diverse range of animals within the city.
- Limitation on how many and required living arrangements
- People should be able to have hens and other types of fowl.

- If proper measures taken for neighbor acceptance and quality animal care management, I don't see an issue.
- Chickens aren't loud, it's roosters that would be problematic.
- "If they are being cared for and are useful to the environment of surrounding areas then why
- Not try"
- As long as above criteria are followed and enforced.
- I think if people having a few hens to get their own eggs or whatnot is great!
- People should be allowed to have eg. a chicken coop as long as it's properly taken care of "cleaned regularly " and that they have adequate space for it
- Ok
- I would like to have the option to provide my family with our own eggs. I have no issues with anybody having a chicken as long as they keep it clean. No messy, smelly coops.
- Only if they are quiet
- Provided the immediately surrounding neighbors have no objection and the livestock does not attract any unwanted predators, create noise or mess (eg pigeons)
- Its our right we pay taxes.
- People should be allowed to source their own food. It's local and it encourages sustainability!
- Yard chickens are fantastic and further our ability to be self reliant and food secure humans
- If they are properly cared for and owned by the right people.
- yes, but also to take in to consideration that animals are more often than not used as support animals be it domestic or other livestock.
- I dont care pitbulls are pure bad owners should be hung
- Hens and other live stock are great low nuisance pets.
- Yes, I think it's important for the people who want to have their own source for such things. However, I only consent if the animals have the proper care needed and the kind of resources that are being used from these animals are dealt humanely.
- The animal-human bond can be extremely beneficial to both animals and humans for physical, emotional, and mental health for all parties. I would be most concerned about the living conditions for the animal.
- We should be allowed chickens
- "A person should be allowed to provide some sort of food fo their family off the land they own. Also cleanliness and smells must be kept under control.
- Also maybe another bin system could be provided to these home owners for the excrement from the hens. The city could use that to provide a community based fertilizer system for gardens as well."
- As long as they aren't causing a disturbance I don't see any reason to ban livestock.
- Whoever needs an emotional support animal it should be anything
- seems good
- As long as it's reviewed case by case, & not going to cause problems.
- provided odor and noise does not become an issue

- If adjacent neighbours pull their support on reasonable grounds then bylaw need to ensure animals are in good care and not too loud.
- I believe other animals can be a benefit and well homed within City limits but it should be managed on a case by case basis with permission.
- Hens and other birds can be beneficial to the landscape. Just like other pets, the expectation should be that the owner provides appropriate and decent living conditions re shelter, food, water, and mental enrichment while keeping them safe and secure on their own property.
- Hens are great
- I am in full support of furthering a self-sufficient community. It seems wrong that agriculture is outlawed in Alberta of all places.
- Let people have reasonable livestock. Allow it. With specific rules and conditions. Such as neighbour approval for example if it could be a nuisance. All must be registered.
- However, what counts as “other” livestock? Cows seem large for urban...
- Don't have a problem with hens. Helps teach kids skills.
- I would like to have chickens.
- I have lived in cities where hens were permitted and it worked well
- It seems to have the best in mind for neighbors as well as the hens.
- I support this bylaw only if all of these conditions are strictly adhered to. I feel that a bylaw should be included that require urban farmers to have a veterinarian approve of their farmer set-up and animal health.
- I have nothing bad to say. I think that all the benefits are completely valid and I have full support
- Please let us have hens!!!
- Allow people to use their own hens instead of paying a ton of money for eggs?
- Allowing people the opportunity to access support animals and animals that provide food is a great idea! For the health of the animals I would like to see that approved livestock owners have their situation assessed in person on an annual basis to renew their license.
- As long as the animals are taken care of and have the proper space, food and shelter... I support it.
- People seem to want them and I'm not one to stifle them.
- With agreement from neighbors
- N/a
- If people have hens, they should keep to 1 dog or 1 cat. Pigeons shouldn't be kept as pets. Let the birds roam free and be with other birds in the wild not in homes.
- This is fair so long as the above regulations are held in place and the livestock is cared for ensuring the best living conditions
- As long as the hens have a suitable winter shelter and a limit of how many
- owning livestock would not harm the city or anyone as long as they are being well cared for. Welfare checks can be done to make sure that the animals are well cared for.
- Hens are florets gor the community
- Education and great benefits! So hopeful for this alternative

- As long as it is only HENS being allowed. The access to fresh eggs will be beneficial.
- As long as the animals are well cared for I don't think it should matter them being in Calgary.
- Hens can be lovely pets and provide eggs.
- Hens can be beneficial for calgarians. I'm times of covid 19 when things are uncertain, keeping animals can help people's mental and physical health.
- if its done following rules then I dont see an issue
- Urban chickens are a wonderful addition to sustainable backyard food production.
- These would not be a nuisance.
- It's a city not a farm
- Increase food security, build community through bartering and mutual support.
- "Yes and no. Right now we dont even regulate propper winterozed, summerozed hpusing for dogs. And so many are neglected in yards and homes. Until we have better regulations on animal cruelty we should not allow breeding and housing farm animals in the city. Also is the city prepaped to deal with potential urban slaughterhouses? This will likely happen as well if folks are allowed to keep meat animals.
- -----
- There is no comment section for pet licenses, lower income families should not get a fee waver, rather we should own pets if we cant afford them. We need more fines for neglect and faster response times for cruelty. We should put more effort into over breeding domestic urban dogs and focus there, rather than the shock value of pitbulls. Yes headlines drive opinions but lets be sensible not stupid."
- If it doesn't negatively affect the surrounding neighborhood it should be allowed
- It is great for families to be able to be sustainable
- If the animal is being properly taken care of and can help with someone's emotional or physical needs I dont have a problem with it.
- Under the right conditions, people should be allowed to raise chickens for their eggs and its good for the kids to experience.
- As long as owner follows guidelines and animals are properly taken care of.
- we pay house tax, own the land should be able to keep animals that can provide food etc
- I agree with this, as long as neighbours are in agreeance and the animal is housed properly,
- I agree
- So long as proper environment is provided for animals
- Allows Calgarians to provide for themselves.
- Not high on my concern list
- if people have the resources to care for any kind of animal why not? Do we not live in a "free country"?
- Let people do what they want as long as its safe and humane.
- This is a fantastic idea! It works well overseas!
- I see no problems, personally

- Long as there is a limit on how many you can have
- All pets should be allowed in city limits.
- As long as the animals are taken care of I have no concerns. Noise would be my only concern but I don't see them as being louder than wild birds (crows, magpies, jays, the occasional peacock).
- If they aren't bothering anyone and if they are treated well I do not see why it couldn't be expanded
- Having "town hens" in the past while I lived in Didsbury was an incredibly therapeutic experience. The hens improved the interaction with the neighbours because who doesn't love free, fresh eggs?
- I like chickens as long as they were safe and kept very clean
- As long as these individuals can adequately take care of these hens financially and have proper housing and are cleaning everything properly I don't see an issue with it. There would need to be inspections by the city to ensure these individuals would be staying up to standard
- I think keeping hens within city limits would be completely acceptable, provided requirements for their care (such as adequate space & coop) are clearly laid out.
- If the owner can properly take care of the animals without disturbing the peace of their neighbours, why not. As it has been shown during COVID, there was a shortage of certain products in grocery stores, such as eggs. Other people were able to acquire chickens for their households to help with the strain and have their own eggs.
- I think this is a great idea but also think there needs to be support from neighbours and suitable living conditions for the animals.
- Yeah, the support from adjacent neighbors is important. Hens can be smelly if not properly maintained. Perhaps a complaint process can be generated for those said neighbors in case the owner of the hens, is obviously negligent.
- It allows city dwellers to create food for their families and if done in the right space it would be a great addition.
- They're cute and helpful
- If the areas where the livestock will be are somewhat controlled/monitored and clearly posted signage is available, I don't see why there should be an issue
- People should be able to have livestock on their property to encourage eco friendly ways of living.
- As long as everyone is in agreement livestock is beneficial in a community
- I have friends in the US who live in a suburban area and have chickens in their yard without any neighborhood issues.
- If it isn't hurting anyone why not?
- I support sustainable food practices
- I would love to have poultry.
- I have first hand experience with family raising chickens in a neighborhood with great success.
- If the animals are cared for in a way that they are happy and healthy the I see no issue. Again, people should be required to pass a course to show they are capable and knowledgeable to care for the animals they bring into their care.
- I believe that as long as they are properly cared for, there should be no reason not to support this

- I have no issue with small livestock in yards
- Ensure engagement with neighbours for issues such as allergies (like beekeeping), and size of the livestock enclosures and number of livestock do not become a nuisance
- as long as the owners properly care for the animals it should not be an issue
- As long as the neighbors agree and the welfare of the animals can be guaranteed, I think it encourages more community involvement and allows people to grow basic produce and goods in their backyards.
- Chickens are an amazing opportunity for cities to become more modernized and progressive. Chickens offer allot of diversity and allow people to have another source of food. Chickens make great pets and are quite quiet when you have 2-3. If people whom have them are responsible they shouldn't even smell. I would love to have chickens as this would support healthier lifestyles.
- Urban chickens would be great
- As long as these "pets" don't become a nuisance to neighbors and community
- obvi
- I feel having a few hens in a pen in a yard is better than someone having a loud or aggressive dog in their yard. It would be nice to raise our own hens and have our own eggs.
- Hens are quieter, tidier, and easier on the ecosystem than dogs. They are incredibly beneficial for gardeners, contribute to food security, and present low disease risk if kept in clean, appropriately sheltered environments (i.e. proper coops). MANY urban environments have already proven the feasibility of hens in urban contexts.
- people also use different animals for support and asistant animals
- I think it would be a great idea overall, maybe having a limit on ownable chickens for square footage of space.
- Only if beneficial impact could be demonstrated and humane, adequate living conditions provided for the animal.
- As long as they are properly cared and the Neighbour's approve
- Chickens!
- Goats!
- I don't believe that any domestic species should be illegal to own in the city.
- Many other cities have had positive experiences. Well done, it would be great!
- I would like to have it specifically laid out that chickens are not to live on balconies. Fecal matter and dichotomous earth can get in the air and litter down to lower tenants. That needs to be very specifically stated.
- A logical progression to meet the desire for local food sources.
- I think it is already happens widely without the majority of the population knowing
- With limits this is great.
- Small, animals like chickens are certainly no issues and very good for family food intake etc.
- if the animal is in your yard why would the City intervene?
- I think hens in CORRECT properties would be fine

- Many other cities have already implemented. Guidelines should clearly state requirements. ie a coop is not a box, size etc to be outlined for the wellness of the animal.
- i would love to have access to farm fresh eggs and support people in my neighbourhood. Plus, hens are really not annoying, peoples dogs can be more annoying. No roosters please.
- We need specifics on "other livestock" - hens are one thing. A braying donkey, or horse next door (as much as I love them), smelly and fly attracting pigs, no thanks.
- Provided proper care and maintenance on limited number without roosters , and adequate housing.
- Hens are valuable and would allow for more sustainable farming within the communities.
- Hens should definitely be allowed, they are quiet, easy to care for animals that provide companionship as well as eggs. Pigs make excellent pets as long as the have the necessary yard space
- I believe in being able to provide for yourself if you desire and that the contribution to the community is almost always positive.
- Adjacent neighbours agreement should not always be necessary, particularly in cases where there are existing disputes.
- Neighbours in Calgary aren't very neighbourly. If I want to own hens, I should be allowed too if I give them the proper home and take care of their needs. Yes the welfare of the hens and all animals matter, so the part about making sure there are suitable living conditions I agree with
- Only if "suitable living conditions" actually means large enough grazing areas, the animals are not chained up in one spot at all time, the animals quality of life isn't simply determined by the availability of 'food and shelter', but that the animal is actually cared for. Bylaw officers should have to do occasional rounds to ensure animals are being cared for responsibly.
- Animals are a great addition to a household and I believe it will help children learn how to be more respectful and potentially where their food actually comes from
- Yes as long as things are kept clean and doesn't contribute to more dangerous wildlife coming into neighbourhoods.
- Urban hens can be great contributors to home raised food! They have been successful in other communities with proper guidelines.
- doesn't bother me as long as animals are treated well.
- I'd like to have hens.
- Needs to be restriction on number of animals, animals must be provided appropriate shelter and must be cleaned up after. Noise and or smell could be potential issue...
- I like case by case approval.
- As long as animals are humanely kept all needs met and not disruptive to the neighborhood, I don't see an issue.
- Permits could be given to responsible land owners that coup their livestock in reasonable and responsible conditions.
- chickens!!!!!!
- However, I feel that the hens would need to be sufficiently distanced from neighboring properties.

- If animals are properly cared for, can be contained to the property and all adjacent (beside, behind, kitty corner) neighbours are ok with it, I don't see a problem.
- With criteria, can regulate what's deemed as responsible livestock ownership within city limits.
- Chickens are perfect for having. Just do due diligence and learn how to keep them
- Urban livestock provide a local and sustainable source of food
- I believe this would be beneficial and help to provide adequate living for the livestock versus people hiding them and not providing the best living conditions.
- Society needs the freedom to have more sources of food closer to home.
- In these tough economic times, allowing people to raise their own food is an excellent idea, as long as there are rules in place for sanitation and maintenance of the animals enclosure.
- This is a great idea, and would be a great step forward for Calgary.
- Excellent idea and bringing that rural feel to our community back yards
- Because of our climate, proper winter accommodation would be required for these animals. I think this would help many in the community as well as be educational for children.
- I think so long as the animals are not creating a nuisance issue (noise, smells etc), then I would support small livestock like hens or small pigs.
- Chickens only
- Small chicken coops aren't a nuisance.
- Why not?
- Livestock within reason, maybe a size/weight maximum as well as number of live stock restriction
- Can be maintained like any other pet.
- YES I would love the ability to keep backyard hens. The current bylaw forbidding backyard hens is the main reason I am considering moving out of Calgary
- Dogs owners are unjustly made to pay for license their dog, while cats license is at a much more reduced rate.
- Controlled perimeter to neighboring property
- Only would support horses
- Providing there are conditions in place for health and sanitation. As well as noise bylaws, just like any other animal.
- There should be a minimum land use requirement to ensure the animals are provided enough space for their well-being and ensure the animals are not a nuisance to neighbours.
- Only if there was plenty of space and the owners were required to keep the coops odour free. Also they have to take the proper precautions to prevent predators.
- I would want to have a say because I would not want hens next door to me
- As long as it would be able to be enforced, I agree. The neighbours must be in agreement, the livestock cannot create a nuisance, much like a nuisance human neighbour would not be tolerated.
- Max 3
- As long as animals are kept in clean and humane environments
- "I think a permit application,

- And livestock licenses should be done as they are for cats/dogs. With the criteria above.” Support from adjacent neighbours
- Suitable living conditions can be provided for the animal..”
- I support this bylaw as long as community members have some say as to the impact this would have on their neighborhood within city limits
- I support this as long as all of the above is addressed. There's no reason someone can't provide for their family in a small way by raising different livestock. As long as the impact to the neighbors and the animal are kept in mind.
- Yes. I wish my city allowed chicken and other livestock.
- I don't know that support from neighbours should be required for all livestock. If they animals are quiet and well cared for, involving neighbours seems unnecessary.
- Yes, with strict rules in place and regular inspections to ensure health of the livestock. Also cannot be a nuisance with noise or smell to neighbours.
- We are human. We should have access to our own food source. Like anything be responsible
- Yes, so long as mice are kept under control. Chicken feed is an easy source of food for them and nobody wants to have a mouse infestation
- I think, if a homeowner can get proper support from neighbours I don't see a problem with this. I think there's should be some kind of rule that hens can't live in backayrds or properties of less that a certain square footage, and continue to leave strata laws up to the decision of property/community owners in instances where someone is in a townhouse with shared backyards, it would not be as feasible.
- People who can't afford groceries can have a semi-steady supply of food.
- Good for food
- positive impact for everyone
- I would love to be able to produce more of our own food, teach children animal husbandry, and chickens are smart and loveable animals.
- Growing and harvesting our own food is imperative in society- hens should be encouraged.
- But it really depends what other animals you are thinking of. No examples were given other than hens.
- If it does the community good (ie. provides a local good such as eggs for a local restaurant or something like that) then I see no problem allowing that
- Chicken Is are fine! As long as they are humanely kept, have sufficient space, food, water.
- I would support the idea of having livestock that would help feed people. Having 5 chickens as pets is silly.
- Neighbours should not need to support.
- Providing the animal is properly cared for and it doesn't cause problems for neighbours, I don't see why smaller livestock animals could t live in the city
- Well conceived concepts could improve the City
- But would suggest regular checkups to prove living conditions are still being met.

- I would support this with strict regulations. My one concern is regarding the possible attraction of more coyotes deeper into neighbourhoods putting those livestock (hens in particular) at risk while then increasing the risk to other small pets (cats and dogs).
- I would support this as long as the animals are well cared for, provided with proper enclosures so that safety measures are being taken for the animals and for the neighbours.
- I think this could make Calgary stand out.
- Chickens!!
- I see no reason why livestock shouldn't be allowed in the city so long as the specifics to the animals care is followed.
- Great idea and the parameters make sense.
- People should be allowed to have hens if they're willing to take care and clean up after them like any other pet.
- Hens are wonderful! Fresh healthy eggs for the family and neighbors. There's nothing wrong with that at all as long as they're kept in clean conditions.
- I fall under the low income despite working full time with 2 kids. Fresh eggs and meat not to mention giving the kids some chores is great.
- Please no roosters as many of us work shift work and sleep is hard to come by as it is. Noisy animals would be a nuisance to me. But I think allowing a Vietnamese pot bellied pig or hens or animals that are well cared for and not incredible noisy would be fine
- I want a goat
- The goat in marda loop seems chill af
- There are many benefits to allowing people to own hens or chickens as long as the requesting person has the proper knowledge.
- As long as the neighborhood is not affected.
- Keeping Urban chickens for the purposes of having eggs promotes local food sources, which is environmentally conscious. Tens are also not a nuisance animal, as they are very quiet.
- Im unsure what i think of this but there is no 'unsure' option. This is Tricky in urban settings due to noise smell etc....you need to educate people about disease risk (salmonella, e coli et) because this is a public health issue
- I would support backyard hens
- How do you obtain support when property changes hands, or similarly publish permitted addresses so new or potential owners can make educated decisions
- It's a great source of food(eggs) for many who struggle, animals are amazing to have around all humans but especially children. I do not support raising hens for slaughter. I do believe they would make amazing pets.
- Hens are small, quiet, and provide food that is high in protein. I absolutely support making a move toward city folk being able to source more of their own food.
- Hens are productive. Vicious dogs aren't
- I think hens would be great, as long as they are cared for properly. Other small livestock would be good as well. People are becoming more serious about being able to grow and make their own food.

- I believe if you are raising your own food you will consume less, and more responsibly.
- I am open to urban hens, not sure I like the idea of other animals.
- Hens can aide the natural ecosystem of the area they are kept in, which benefits the community overall with an increase of fauna, and therefore an increase in bee population.
- I see no issue as long as the homeowner follows the above mentioned conditions
- These animals can be kept much like other animals (dogs and cats) and only need minor revisions to property.
- As a homeowner, I would like to have the chance to weigh in on livestock living in adjacent yards and I think that livestock living conditions need to be suitable for both the animal and our unpredictable climate.
- As long as neighbors are required to agree in writing to livestock living adjacent to them.
- Only if an educational course is received so they know what they are getting in to.
- I'm not sure what defines "other livestock" but I do support hens, within some restrictions on quantity, neighbour engagement and potentially involve regular inspections to ensure appropriate upkeep.
- People who have chickens should be allowed so long as they follow the rules. One of the rules should be to have consent of direct neighbours who could be negatively affected.
- Urban hens are great! I had some in Calgary for 9 years. No one was upset with them.
- I like that exceptions would be evaluated on a case by case basis.
- Producing your own food (ie eggs) has a lesser carbon footprint as compared to purchasing goods that need to be shipped. This is an environmental and sustainability plus as much as it is an owner rights plus.
- I like fresh eggs
- Cautiously I say yes. I think these animals can have many benefits but risks include increased potential for disease (salmonella in chickens is a big problem, because they're natural carriers of this bacteria) which can make people very sick. If there are free ranging cats and or wildlife in the area, this can lead to increased human-wildlife interactions. Permits, with stipulations that an accredited course on how to actually raise these animals (good welfare and husbandry, proper biosecurity), must be taken first would be my recommendation
- I have someone who raises pigeons on my street. Hes been responsible for them for a long time and they are not noisy nor a problem in any way. Id love to see urban agriculture bc i think it offers so many more opportunities for business and care and alternate lifestyles for those who chose to raise livestock in the city. I believe there would be proper regulations. And im aware that someone will always try to take advantage of this new pet ownership avenue and to be ready for bumps along the way in terms of learning how it fits in our city. 2
- Chickens are no more of a nuisance than dogs and cats and as long as owners are responsible and take care of them I have no issue with hens. No roosters in the city however as they are noisy and would be hard to live with.
- Urban farms seem to be the way of the future. If it is properly policed with rules then I see no issue.

- Hens would be very valuable for a lot of ppl in the city. I would much prefer raising chicken for eggs then buying from store.
- Mini goats and pigs make excellent pets. They don't bark or make excessive noise.
- Hens are a good idea
- Having university degree in Agriculture, I see tremendous value in approved families having productive "pets" (hens, ducks, etc.)
- As long as a healthy environment can be provided and it does not cause disturbance to the neighbours then I am in support.
- Chickens are a brilliant way to extend your food sources. Pls don't allow roosters as you don't need them to have eggs.
- It's a way to have a more renewable source of food.
- the criteria are balanced, so what difference does it make if the animal is a chicken or a small piglet that are often pets. they all make noise, eat and scat/feces/pee.
- Only if the applicant can get the sign consent of their immediate neighbours
- I like that there are the above conditions to be met. I think it could get out of control without some limitations.
- As long as the above criteria is followed and if the neighbors change they must also support the livestock
- Yes to all of the above besides support from neighbours - just because I don't feel like my neighbour shouldn't have chickens shouldn't stop them from it as long as they're responsible, clean and adhere to the bylaws.
- 🙄
- I think if the animals are cared for properly and the neighbours approve it should be ok
- If they can be kept safely and they are not a nuisance they would help a family's sustainability
- As long as the animal is well taken care of and isn't a nuisance.
- Urban chickens should be allowed, but with specific criteria adhered to
- If livestock can be adequately cared for within the city and not be a nuisance to others, I see no reason to restrict them.
- I think hens should have been permitted a long time ago. This "review" has taken way too long. However, as a matter of animal welfare, all persons keeping ANY livestock (hens, rabbit, etc) ought to be licenced and registered, and have their premises subject to regular inspections. Whether this would fall under the Health Inspectors (like restaurants) or another/newly formed dept, this would be an essential part of the bylaws.
- Fresh eggs!
- Yes again
- I think that if the number of hens is set in the by law, proper care is mandated and noise considerations are met (surely hens can't be noisier than a barking dog??), hens would be great to have in the neighbourhood
- I feel that well kept hens with proper care and cleanliness would Benefit the community

- I think raising chickens safely and in a clean manner would be great for the city! Also Goats. Goats are cool. They eat weeds!
- As long as proper care was being given, and the area the animal is being held is appropriate for size, eating habits, etc.
- Urban hens are important to food security and can be a healthy part of the urban ecosystem
- Yess! Farm animals make great support animals and pets! As long as they are properly taken care of.
- I think having hens would be a good way to be self-efficient. I think that there needs to be rules in place though.
- hens would allow households and communities to become more self sustainable. As for other livestock I think it would depend on the type of livestock and how well the household or community is willing to accommodate it.
- Hens can be very beneficial for the community (food source)
- If at least one neighbour agrees, needing full approval from all neighbours will be a disaster. Agree w the last bullet.
- It has worked in other municipalities
- I agree with this but there needs to be more clarification as to what " must benefit community or have positive impact " means?
- I don't see a problem with it, however, getting approval from an adjacent neighbor who then moves away might be replaced by someone who would not approve.
- Hens are great! They're quiet and chickens can be great pets as well as provide food for families (eggs I don't mean they should eat their Pets)
- Lots of large properties within the city to provide ample space and lifestyle.
- Chickens and other birds provide food, and help control waste. Sheep and goats should also be considered to help maintain healthy grassland environment
- I like the idea of urban chickens and I suppose if other animals like goats for weed control can be around that's a great way to reduce pesticide use in yards.
- We support urban farming and livestock fully, everyone deserves food security.
- I see no problem as long as owners can adequately take care of their animals and are keep their living quarters clean.
- As long as it's monitored for no hoarding or illegal stuff
- Allowing people to provide for themselves, as well as give first-hand experience to food production and animal care, is a great initiative.
- It could be beneficial. But a limit on how many can be at a single property, and ensuring animals have enough space
- If a suitable place for the animal and they are well looked after I would support this bylaw
- I live in a community that has urban hens already and have not had any issue with it. The city also uses goats for weed and grass control. This just seems like a natural extension.
- Only if strict rules are put in place that would ensure proper care of the animal and follow ups by by-law officers check in on the welfare of these conditions.

- But there should be provisions to rescind authorization if it becomes a nuisance (e.g. roosters at dawn) or if it attracts wildlife (e.g. coyotes or bobcats)
- It's a sustainable practice which for families with children has huge learning value. Just like we love having a veggie garden to enjoy fresh produce, it would be wonderful to enjoy fresh eggs and maybe share them with our neighbors which will build community.
- As long as they have the appropriate space and can protect them from predators then should be free to have a pure food source
- I have always wanted hens !!!!!
- As a me ya health professional, I see a benefit for some people to have livestock as therapy animals. As long as the environment allows for it then I agree on a case by case basis.
- I support this ONLY if there are clear regulations in place regarding the animal's comfort and welfare. I would not support raising livestock for meat.
- Free eggs and morning alarms
- Nothing more then chickens and pit belly pigs
- i support urban chickens and think they should be allowed in city limits
- As long as the above bylaws are being followed and the animal is being well taken care of and cleaned up after, I'd be okay with a neighbour having approved livestock
- Giving an animal a safe place to live is always great!
- Sure
- I believe there should be a greater connection between urban communities and their food sources. Urban hens would help facilitate this connection and also allow people more control over the quality of care that 'free range hens' have access to.
- Times have changed
- any way to save money is a good tbing
- As long as no roosters are allowed.
- If adequate living conditions are met, I believe urban livestock are beneficial.
- I don't think it would hurt anyone so I see no reason not to.
- Every case is different
- Chickens are great!
- May increase coyote present
- Yes Urban Hens that are properly taken care of :)
- I think this should be on a case by case basis with an application process
- Hell yeah
- People should be aloud to have a few chicken or ducks as long as they keep the area clean
- We would definitely like to see urban hens in the city
- Yes! Yes!
- I believe in being self sustaining and this is one way to do that, as well as a good resource for the children to learn from.
- Responsible ownership and care of animals is never a bad thing.

- Hens would be a great addition! I don't care about the noise. How awesome would it be to wake up and ask my neighbour for some fresh eggs lol please give us hens, it's Covid. We need something to make us happy. Hens are love, hens are life.
- I would love to have hens
- Urban hens have several uses and are less (and certainly no more) of a concern than roaming cats or barking dogs if cared for correctly.
- There is no reason to disallow this
- I support this fully!
- People should be allowed to do what they like on their property so long as it doesn't interfere with others.
- If the animals are well kept and healthy I don't see a problem
- If there is enough space on the property for the hens then why not. Fresh eggs!
- Yes this is an amazing green step
- If there are sufficient regulations and the means to enforce them I do not see an issue
- Many animals can bring comfort, joy etc to many people. I don't believe urban animals should be restricted to feline and canine.
- Hens are a valuable addition to increase food security in the city
- As long as some restrictions are applied. Maximum allowable animals etc. taking into account noise, space and smell.
- Having animals is great! Especially ones like hens which can produce resources for families. Why are people allowed to have pigeons and not hens?
- Who wouldn't want fresh eggs
- It would depend on the type of livestock, the space available and type of home including Distance from neighbors
- As long as the animal poses no threat and is in no way a nuisance to any person.
- There are many potential species that can be blended into a family unit successfully.
- I love the idea of urban farming - sustainable, local, supports a sense of community and cooperation
- families who want to produce their own natural sourced eggs instead of mass produced eggs.
- I think we should be able to be more self sustaining. I've lived in other cities where many people keep chickens / hens.
- People should be able to own them but with restrictions and respect to neighbors
- I would love to have hens in my yard
- I feel like this would be beneficial for people that want a pet but cannot have the typical ones
- I prefer animals over people anyways
- I would support this if it was highly regulated to ensure that the animal has a good living situation and is not abused or subjected to horrific conditions. Also I think that this would be good if the hen was for laying eggs, not for meat (I believe if someone that was untrained tried to harvest the hen for meat it could cause undue pain and distress)
- People use chickens for support or egged.

- having the ability to raise chickens for eggs and feed on small scales would help many families on a hard economy
- Chickens for everyone!
- I see no reason this shouldn't be allowed as it doesn't do anyone any harm.
- Most people are responsible. Pets come in all shapes and identities
- People can have more sustainable living and choice on the healthy choices of the foods they eat
- If it helps the person and doesn't affect me I don't care what pet you have
- As long as the animal is properly cared for and cleanliness maintained
- Who doesn't love fresh eggs! Outdoor meat rabbits are great as well, easy to keep in a backyard. Maybe not sheep/goats/pigs unless they have a few acres though.
- I understand neighbour support but what happens when a new neighbour moves in and doesn't want hens next door?
- My sister in law keeps hens and loves them
- Let people have animals that they want as long as they are not a nuisance
- Yes, but I'm on the fence/more neutral. Livestock is very high maintenance to keep up with smell, cleaning, etc. and could lead to more problems than a dog or a cat if people do not know how to properly care for their livestock.
- The city should have less oversight on what is done on private property.
- Potential someone inside city limits might have sufficient space for other animal. Exemptions from standard rules could be applied for from bylaw officers.
- Absolutely. As long as animals and livestock are held properly and as long as there are guidelines including approval by neighbors I think this is a great idea. So many people would benefit from a more self-sufficient lifestyle as well as the mental health benefits gained from this.
- Should have to apply with special permits to house Hens on property.
- I feel that urban hens should be allowed in Calgary but with specific restrictions that way animals are not being mistreated and is not affecting neighboring houses
- Feed birds/ egg laying should be acceptable
- As long as the animal and its related housing and care is not causing disturbances to the neighborhood, they should be allowed no matter what species.
- People with yards should be allowed to have hens or meat rabbits if wanted. They should be educated on proper care and avian flu
- If you can handle, care for and maintain the hens, why not?
- I like the freedom of production of my own food
- Some live stock animals like chickens and goats can be very beneficial
- I would expect a registration process and accountability for people to ensure they are keeping a clean yard and not creating a health risk
- As long as it is clear and registered with the city - this way they can be monitored for compliance and proper care of the hens

- As long as the animal is housed properly and has access to a vet specialized in their care, owning them shouldn't be an issue.
- Lots of community benefits.
- Provided they are hens only (no roosters, as they are a noise nuisance).
- It's important for the community, I see no issue as long as the community can provide input and come to a consensus.
- With proper housing for livestock and ability for neighbours to voice any concerns if there are issues (noise, smell).
- As long as there are rules about appropriate care, I don't see the issue.
- I think it's important to allow people to explore a sustainable lifestyle in a responsible way that ensures the animals are well cared for.
- as long as the urban livestock doesn't prove to be a nuisance to surrounding community members there is no problem with one person having some. this should require a case-by-case analysis with additional fees by those who apply.
- As long as the living situation is maintained
- Would love me a few chickens
- There is no valid reason to not support it but there must be bylaws in place to ensure these animals are cared for all year round, including winter months.
- I think it's forward thinking. Excellent example are the goats.
- As long as the animal is well cared for and isn't causing an issue with neighbours it should be allowed
- As long as the hens are provided proper living conditions and do not disturb neighbors, then sure, why not
- Bees and chickens at a limited number may be ok
- If the animals are taken care of properly and respectfully no problem
- If chicken coops required a licence (and thus revenue generating), the City could ensure regulations are met to minimize nuisance to neighbors
- The ability to grow our own food supplies is helpful for sustainable living
- I think owning small livestock and hens can be done humanely and well within city limits provided there is 1) enough space for each animal to live freely, 2) have access to shelter 3) have access to food and clean water, 4) owner establishes perimeter so that the animals cannot escape the enclosure/yard
- having pets are amazing for peoples' mental health! but not everyone wants a dog or cat. I think if the living conditions are deemed suitable (and there are check ups to make sure it continues to be suitable) why not!
- Chickens for everyone!
- There are a lot of animals that cannot be reintegrated into the wild and living in a home/city setting would be ideal for other rescues.
- Hens are in many urban cities and often times livestock can thrive and be a positive impact to families or communities

- everyone should be able to own whatever animals they'd like, especially as beneficial as hens, as they provide food
- As long as neighbors are respected and the animals are cared for properly. Animals should be removed if they are not being cared for properly or being abused. Also, I do not support raising these animals for food and seeing my neighbor run an abattoir in their backyard. Emotional support animal yes. Food no.
- because everyone has the right to make sure they have accessible food and income, which hens would provide. the city of calgary will let you starve and blame you for being poor, but a hen at least provides eggs.
- sure, I think people would just need to comply with nuisance/ good neighbour bylaws. Do chickens make rooster noises? People would freak about that (I wouldn't, ive lived by a rooster and I liked the wake-up calls)
- If the neighbours want chickens, they should be able to have them.
- As long as the animals aren't a nuisance to neighbors I think this is a great idea.
- Would be great to provide knowledge to kids, food and lawn care.
- "I don't agree with the "offers community benefit/will have a positive impact" but love everything else.
- I'm all for community and being neighbourly but I wouldn't want them coming over and picking my eggs or harming my hens."
- I would like the bylaws to mandate the size of yard these hens will need and to consider other animals carefully or you'll end up with more problems than the stray domestic breed rabbits we see everywhere.
- Hens are not dangerous animals.
- I think having livestock in the city would be fun and extremely educational for the community, especially children.
- Urban hens offer sustainable food with no negative consequences
- Encouraging urban farming is an important for sustainable and independent food supply.
- .
- Yes as long as all parties agree
- I would want a chicken.
- No roosters or noisy animals however
- If there are regulations in place, i support livestock in the city.
- Homesteading is very sustainable and can prpvide lots of benefits for a community
- If theres strict guidelines and follow ups.
- I don't see why it would be a problem
- The neighbor support is a big issue because of noise, smell or even allergies.
- Let's stick to hens.
- They can be great for mental health . Teach kids about farms and help low income families feed themselves
- I support hyper local/home grown food sources

- good idea
- Hens a definite yes. I am surprised we do not have this already. Children are so robbed out of experiences like these.
- i fully support urban hens, maybe a limit on numbers, but am not well versed in keeping chickens.
- I think thiamin a great idea.
- Current bylaws are far too restrictive on livestock vs pet. Pets come in all shapes and sizes and it's not the city's place to say otherwise unless it is having a negative impact on the community.
- More inclusivity
- Hens and pot belly pigs as in home pets should be allowed. We allow large dogs why not pot belly pigs?
- I think this makes sense
- Cleanliness is key with chickens! Roosters should not be allowed there is zero reason for city folk to be breeding
- As long as the animals are well cared for and not disruptive to neighbour's they should be allowed in an urban setting
- Lowering our carbon footprint by bringing our food sources closer only makes sense.
- applying and paying a small permit fee so the city keeps track of urban hens.
- Yes but you should also allowed small pigs
- I think hens could safely be raised in Calgary only providing that they have enough greenspace and proper living conditions and that the person owning them is educated on raising/keeping them.
- It makes sense for people to raise their own chickens for eggs.
- I think if the home owners are responsible and respectful enough to their neighbours to have certain live stock, and to take care of the animal's needs, i think it'll be ok.
- As long as they aren't noisy and owners cleaned up after them daily.
- There does need to be clear rules. No roosters, a hen limit, ensuring heath of the chickens, ensuring that noise and smell is kept down, ensuring their safety from wildlife or feral animals, etc.
- Laying hens, milking goats, and similar livestock would be hugely beneficial to many families, and do not require large farmyards for good quality of life. Not more annoying or smelly than other large pets!
- I adamantly support a change in bylaw that allows hens. The restrictions should only be based on being able to provide adequate care to them. I also support allowing miniature goats provided adequate care can be maintained. These are animals that provide enjoyment and food and should be allowed in our city.
- Some breeds of goats and pigs are no different then a large breed dog.
- Should be allowed for the pupose of eggs and pets
- Shouldn't be a problem if adjacent neighbour's need to give approval
- its 2020 support animals come in all shapes and forms
- I love the idea of urban hens, if the correct bylaws were in place.

- I think having hens, who are treated well and raised responsibly is a great idea, especially since we should currently be limiting grocery store trips....
- Please do not bully breeds
- As Long as there are limits to the amount of total animals.
- I don't think the neighbours should need to be in agreement, but should have recourse if the animals aren't properly kept/cared for.
- A similar bylaw is in Kelowna, and the ability to have hens is very cool. My only concern would be come winter time, and ensuring these animals have appropriate shelter.
- Only if the livestock has been rescued from slaughter
- Many other urban cities allow this, it's about time Calgary caught up with the times.
- Adjacent neighbors must approve
- As long as the aforementioned livestock is not a public nuisance. Or a negative influence on a community or other persons a person should be allowed their personal brand of lifestyle which includes pets of various types. EXCLUDING Rats. We are in Alberta and proudly rat free.
- They are pets that people love and care for, the same as a cat or guinea pig, or dog.
- Pigeons for instance, are an animal that we tend to consider as a nuisance animal, but early settlers brought pigeons here as companion animals, and then left them in the wild to fend for themselves. Hens are of no concern, because they provide food (eggs and meat) for the person raising them. As long as the hens have a suitable place to live, they are of no more nuisance than pigeons.
- Allow citizens to own for food (eggs) and or pets as long as they are properly cared for
- People should be allowed to have chickens to produce eggs for their family. I do not believe people should be allowed to have bees for honey though
- Owning livestock in the city is a great idea!
- Provides people with fresh food
- Except for support from neighbours. If there is adequate space, the hens are properly cared for, and the hen house is on the owners property only I don't see why the neighbours should get a say in the matter. Hens are way less annoying than some dogs or kids for that matter and neighbours get no say in that either.
- Na
- I think having local animals to produce food and such is good for the economy. I always prefer to support a local store over a chain.
- Raised properly chickens are a great addition to the urban environment
- Worthy of examination.
- I generally support this although it would be good to know what is meant by "other livestock". Does this mean I can put a horse in my backyard?
- Hens would be great to help with pest control in a back yard as well as eggs.
- If a strong case is made and there are no objections, why have a blanket prohibition?
- It's nice to grow your own food.
- I know people that live in communities that allow hens and they love it

- Would be a case by case basis. For example very small yards or zero lot lines property not great candidates.
- I am okay with chickens, but no other livestock.
- Small livestock. such as goats, I would find to be acceptable. Larger livestock can result in the area becoming undesirable because of space required noise, odor, etc.
- This could help families whom have experience, or want to experience, livestock handling to help sustain themselves. My neighbor has a huge garden and grows all her own vegetables yr round, if she had chickens as well, she could have eggs too and become more self sustaining and help each costs of living that the city keeps raising.
- If animals are being provided proper care and the IMMEDIATE (ie, either side, back and front) neighbors don't have an issue, I don't see why not.
- chickens within reason are fine. It's only when they get so stinky I can't enjoy my yard that they become a problem.
- As long as the animal is small enough to live well in it's yard, is well taken care of and the yard remains clean I think they should be allowed.
- If these criteria are enforced, families would have some means of self-sufficiency.
- Limit of one hen per family member
- I think that the chance to have livestock within reason should be allowed. Being self sufficient would benefit individual families and help to provide more local food options that would otherwise be costly.
- Urban chickens are great for communities. Let the people eat the eggs!
- I think certain non noisy animals such as quail are a positive addition to households especially with young children so they learn to care for said animal and also so they learn first hand where food comes from
- If someone wants hens/ live stock and have space and means why not? Obviously if they do not take care of the space, keep it clean and safe for people in the area that would not be acceptable
- With food insecurities becoming a real concern during a global pandemic I fully support the keeping of hens and other livestock
- If there can be rules I support it
- So long as these animals have a safe adequate home I don't see anything wrong.
- So long as neighbors aren't affected, and everything is set up with no neglect, I don't see why someone would be restricted on what types of animals they have on their property if they can appropriately care for them.
- I think that there are many animals considered "livestock" that can provide enrichment to not just their owners but to a community. I also do not believe that these animals would pose a greater disturbance to a neighbourhood than pet dogs or cats could so I don't see why they shouldn't be allowed if the proper measures are taken.
- If neighbors support, I cannot complain.
- I think it should be someone who is versed in livestock care not some random bylaw officer who might not have any actual idea what is a good living condition for that animal.
- Only if numbers are limited. Would not like to live near a mini farm in the city.

- I am in support of urban hens when properly cared for
- As long as the animals are not being abused, causing harm, and have proper care.
- Everything should be case by case
- A “yes” or “no” answer is difficult in the absence of a deeper understanding of requirements; how nuisance issues would be managed, which livestock would be permitted and so forth, but generally I’m supportive.
- I agree with the criteria above.
- I grew up on a farm. Having a couple of chickens for fresh eggs would be wonderful. When properly taken care of, they are not a problem.
- As the current pandemic has shown, people need to be allowed to grow/raise their own to the extent that it is practical. This should be encouraged and supported by the city rather than discouraged
- doesn't effect me
- As long as it’s not hurting anyone. Must keep in mind wild predators that we have a lot of in Calgary (coyotes, bobcats)
- I think it’s a good idea and know some of those animals can make great pets too.
- As long as people can care for the animals why not let them have animals as a companion?
- So long as the adjacent neighbors agreed that it was ok.
- Livestock that can live a safe healthy life in the city should be allowed.
- Yes! We need livestock in Calgary. We can build a better community with more variety.
- A potbelly pig can be just as much a companion animal as a dog or cat, so why exclude it?
- Only if there was enough room for the livestock to live comfortably not cruelly
- Join the other large cities in Canada allowing backyard hens. City aldermen need to be educated, e.g. dumbest comment was that hens die and children would be traumatized!!!! Using that logic, I’m guessing that alderman would like to outlaw cats, dogs, fish, hamsters, etc. People are far removed from their food. Time to get them in touch. Calgary holds the Stampede - back to our ranching/farming roots but the city council seems to be trying to create some pompous image of the city. Many newcomers come from areas where backyard chickens are the norm. Seems like council is forcing their ideas on these newcomers. Is this a class issue from council's perspective?
- What's wrong with chickens?
- Hens are a good idea, provided they can be kept safe from wildlife such as coyotes.
- Other large urban centres allow small livestock, ie chickens. Not only are some people emotionally attached to these animals (ie, emotional support), but allowing chickens in particular would help with food insecurity for some people
- As long as the animals are safe and cared for and the smell/coop/ pen was maintained, and no neighbor complaints.
- If the animals are kept on owners property and cared for, why wouldnt we allow this?
- There are many cities, towns etc that allow the housing of hens for eggs. Other animals like pigs can be cared for in the same manner of dogs/cats. As long as they follow local bylaws and the APA I would have no concerns with my neighbours having these animals

- backyard gardeners would love to have hens for both eggs and pest control.
- Home henkeeping is good sustainable urban farming!
- If it enhances ones live, one should be able to own such animal.
- I agree
- Needs to be monitored
- Provided there was a requirement that neighbours sign-off on said livestock.
- As long as the animals don't become a nuisance then go for it
- F
- I believe keeping hens is a right that Calgarians should have. The ability to produce food is our right. Bylaws should only be based on making sure they have proper living conditions. I would also like to see Calgary allow residents to keep miniature goats. Also provided that they can maintain adequate living conditions for them.
- Hens provide eggs and have the capacity to be emotional support animals. If kept humanely , they can contribute to communities.
- I support hens but I would need to know more about what other animals/livestock are included in this. Noise and smell is a concern for me.
- Support from adjacent neighbours is important for livestock. Noises and smells will affect neighbours
- Provided there being cared for and not become a nusences or smell from cages not being cleaned etc
- criteria is vague and up to discretion. Also, who approves the livestock? is there a permitting process, or, is it (dis)approved when the enforcement officer investigates and decides keep vs no keep. I argue many dog owners don't provide suitable conditions, don't have neighbor support, and some dogs have zero positive community impact (i.e. poop and barking). why would dog owners not be subject to the same rigor?
- Subject to change if neighbours change
- Limit the number of each per parcel of land and make stipulations about housing of whichever kind of animal (i.e. a winterized chicken coop / shelter from wind, snow, or rain for other animals.)
- Chickens are wonderful pets and can reduce the pressure in factory farms by allowing people to care highly for their chickens and receive eggs in return
- I believe support animals are necessary for many individuals, helping them through anxious and hard times. Reduces stressors, calming individuals, maybe reducing suicide, confrontations and increasing an individuals self worth as well as their worth to our city.
- I think that yards are a waste of resources. We should be encouraging urban farming instead of fining people who participate.
- Would need to be in an enclosure protecting them from other animals when not supervised
- I do not have an issue with proposed amendment.
- I think the ability for people in the city of Calgary to be more self sustainable whether it be through gardening or animal keeping is important. As long as the keeping of livestock is done in a responsible and ethical way, both for neighboring citizens as well as the animals.
- The current laws are to lax

- Chickens are quieter than dogs and provide food.
- As long as they're not a "nuisance" I don't see a problem
- Service animals come in all forms.
- As long as the animal is properly cared for and the area is kept clean and tidy, I'm all for it.
- People should be allowed to have chickens, provided they take proper care of them and provide them a good and healthy life.
- Reasonably cost effective food source for eggs etc
- Hens are great natural pest control, are affectionate and friendly, easy to contain, provide food and are not noisy.
- As long as the animals can be properly cared for. No roosters
- As long as these animals are being cared for as pets and not being used for food
- I support hens in Calgary
- All animals should be welcomed.
- Some guidelines are needed, however if situation meets these then people should have rights to house on private property.
- Can you please allow pot bellied or tea cup pigs? I've always wanted one.
- Small amount of chickens for a family is fine. Not for selling purposes. Let people feed themselves in a healthier way if they can be responsible
- As long as the animals are properly being cared for, no objections.
- If its on your property and they are taken care of there is no need for concern
- So long as the permitted animals cause no additional noise or smell of an already allowed animal, I don't see an issue.
- As long as neighbours agreed, but that's hard because people move
- Animals must be properly contained in private property and there must be a mechanism to deal with noise/smell
- I have no strong feelings against hens.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and are kept at a limit this is a great idea.
- Yes but also have rules regarding pen size
- Fully support this, I think hens are a great pet, and when done responsibly has little to no impact on neighbors
- Regular visits from bylaw officers to check in on animal welfare and clean living situations should be required.
- ALL of the criteria need to be addressed as well as odor and attractiveness of the structures erected to house the livestock. Honestly, some of the so called greenhouses in Calgary yards are shocking.
- Up to 3 hens, or one pot belly pig wouldn't have more impact than dogs and cats
- I think this is a fantastic idea and would do wonders for our city
- Why not.
- Implementation of home Hens, with the approval from neighbors on small lots would be essential to preventing unnecessary complaints.

- I think backyard hens would be amazing! Of course a limit should be imposed and square footage of lot should also be considered.
- However there needs to be BASIC SECURE coop options as the city has a large number of predators who would love a feathery snack.
- "No roosters. Hens only.
- Chicken owner should have to answer questions on a form when applying for a permit to demonstrate that the owner understands the care and feeding of chickens and the rules for keeping chickens in an urban environment. Wouldn't hurt to have a picture on file of the chicken house/coop setup."
- I would support it as long as no roosters are allowed.
- Each person has different needs and if we are trying to be inclusive, this must be considered. Calgary does have a history of livestock living in the city.
- Many Urban Canadian towns and cities allow it. There are some good rules, like not allowing roosters, which really in urban fowl keeping are the only problem. This is a good initiative.
- as long as there is no disturbance and the animal is cared for and the environment is appropriate, I do not see a reason why you should not be allowed to own livestock.
- I am a big supporter of urban hens, and if owners can keep them or other livestock in suitable and humane living conditions then they should be allowed to.
- I don't see why not
- I see having a limited amount of chickens beneficial as long as they are well looked after. It would be easy to neglect them and then they would become a nuisance problem [lice smell ect]
- Living along side animals can be rewarding on many levels including the ability to raise your own food source
- As long as these animals are not creating damage or nuisance to the public people should be able to have them. If some owners cannot be responsible than they should be penalized.
- Yes, but I feel proper homing/space should be required for hens. People should have to pay a higher fee to have hens and should be monitored if possible.
- Chickens are great! They provide eggs, and in some cases even comfort to owners
- It's absurd that certain animals which are considered livestock such as hens, ducks and small pigs are not allowed. I understand the spirit of the law (to prevent my neighbor from having a bull) but there are no reasons to ban the above animals.
- Doesn't bother me
- Hens are fantastic animals and much quieter than a lot of dogs, and don't run around wild like cats and rabbits. They make fantastic pets and also provide eggs. LET US HAVE HENS.
- Honestly a sheep or goat in a yard would be quieter than most dogs and just as friendly.
- Hens are sustainable sources of food and provide good companionship.
- I would comment that there should be a limit on the number of animals and they must pass regular checks by Bylaw Enforcement Officers.
- Include ducks with hens, as they are more prolific layers. Limit males. Require clipped wings to minimize at large birds

- For hens only.
- No issue provided they are properly cared for.
- This pandemic situation and global affairs have people looking for more opportunities to embrace the ability to become more sufficient in being able to produce their own food. There is no reason to restrict responsible ownership.
- Yes, and case by case acceptance of pot belly pigs should also be considered.
- I would only support for hens and only as long as neighbours agree. If they become a nuisance with noise etc then warnings need to be issued and escalate from there
- must have neighbors approval,
- All animals have a right to be looked after in a suburban setting. Each case should be looked at.
- I support growing food within the city where feasible.
- Can provide families with cost effective food (chickens can give eggs)
- As long as there appropriate living conditions for the hens.
- I want one, and now my husband won't be able to say they're illegal.
- Yes, if they do not disturb the neighbors
- Not everyone can own a cat or dog due to allergies, and a pot bellied pig or goat or chicken may be a good substitute.
- So long as they are taken care of and not unnecessarily disturbing neighbors, does it actually matter?
- I don't have an issue with it as long as the animals are cared for properly
- Good idea
- I think it could be beneficial for the city
- They are no worse than other pets, and things like fresh eggs from the backyard are a positive
- I want my hens back safely raised them in the city for 15 yrs
- Hens are awesome
- I support urban farming and « livestock » therapy animals - like pigs and roosters - as long as the animal is well cared for
- Family have hens out on rural property and they lay eggs that are eaten for breakfast every day. The hens also eat all table scraps and leftovers, so less waste.
- Needs to make sure animals are treated properly and have proper pens etc
- It makes sense, chickens can also provide eggs as well as companionship and are a great learning experience for children.
- Some livestock can be pet & some can be non-intrusive.
- Yes
- If done responsibly, this could be a very real benefit to our community
- Could show children how to raise animals and provide support to families.
- If there is mutual benefit I support
- I like fresh eggs
- Who wouldn't like fresh eggs everyday?!

- It needs to be quiet, not stinky, and cool with the neighbours, but I think small livestock are cool
- Everyone should have a right to farm and be food secure.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and not a nuisance to anyone then they should be allowed.
- As long as the needs of the animals are met, and they are not a big nuisance to citizens
- I have no issue as long as owners are responsible of them.
- I think they aren't any louder than a child and I like that it adds a level of sustainability.
- Obviously there would need to be control over what kind of livestock and how many animals per household. I don't think that the Chief Bylaw Officer should have sole discretion though, if needed, a plebiscite should be had to determine the exceptions
- Backyard chickens should have been allowed years ago, with proper provisions in place.
- Each case is different and should be evaluated differently
- I want chickens!!!
- I have no issues with people having hens. I personally would love a goat, miniature horse or donkey
- "If someone wants a hen, they should be able to have a hen.
- I really have no opinion on this."
- I think it will allow people to have their own fresh eggs and meat and I don't see a reason on why a person can't have the right to do so.
- All animals need proper enrichment, shelter and veterinary care.
- Case by case, check the welfare of the animals regularly
- Yes every animal should be taken care of
- I think that backyard chickens and other small 'livestock' provide benefits to families and communities. Companionship, caring for others, and eggs are all community building!
- I think an evaluation of the living situation for the animals would be good. At time of permit and maybe a follow up. To make sure they're okay.
- Heck yes!
- Community support from neighbours would be nice to have
- Evaluations on a case by case basis are important and if the owner EVER violates the bylaw (doesn't properly care for the livestock, doesn't clean properly, receives multiple and repeated legitimate complaints from neighbors) they won't be allowed to have the livestock again.
- When done in a positive/safe manner for animals and neighbours livestock ownership brings nothing but benefits for everyone involved no matter their age.
- people who live in suburban areas should be able to keep hens / other food sourced livestock much in the same way those people can keep gardens.
- Yes but it would depend on the details of the criteria, such as description of suitable living conditions, how one proves positive impact, as well as consistency of enforcement.
- Na
- it would depend on the livestock and why they are there. Therapy pets yes. For killing no.
- I like the idea of being able to have hens to get eggs.

- I want some chickens, a lot of my neighbours do as well, and none of us want to do it illegally
- I think as long as they have to have appropriate permits and have ensured the hens will be properly housed and cared for, that people should definitely be allowed to do this.
- as long as the area is kept clean and animals are cared for, I see no issues
- Chickens & goats can provide great benefits for local sourced food & better understanding of farm animals
- Urban livestock can provide food, support for plant life, and social opportunities that all benefit individuals and neighborhoods. As long as the requirements are met, there is every reason to allow urban livestock.
- would love to have chickens. Also like that neighbors have to be ok with that.
- Community hens would fill the same role as community gardens. Education, enjoyment and self-subsistence
- we lived in area that allowed chickens and our neighbors chickens never bothered us.
- As long as the area is kept sanitary and tidy
- Yes, I believe people have the right to own any animal as long as there is suitable living conditions and that the owner has enough to support for proper nutrition. They must research and have proper understanding and documentation to have other livestock animals.
- Guidelines would need to be clear and followed, however many livestock animals could make good pets
- I think that hens could be a reasonable option if neighbors are in agreement.
- Sometimes we need to get out of the “not in my neighbour hood”. The past few months have shown us all to “love thy neighbour” and so long as they clean up the mess if my neighbour wanted a cow in his yard I honestly would have no big issues, life is changing and so should we.
- I think it is a good idea to allow inner-city livestock.
- "It is important to note that while pit bulls are not involved in more bite incidents than other dog breeds, the reason they are listed here is because a pitbull's strength allows the potential for a more severe bite." This is completely false and who'm ever put forth these certifiably false claims on a government website should be let go. All I can say is, this had better be changed because it's 2020 and bigoted government wont be tolerated.
- All 6 of my surrounding neighbours are pro chickens and would live this idea
- Sustainability in any form should be explored and if it does not interfere with the neighbor's quality of life, it should be allowed.
- Becoming more self sufficient is good as long as the animals don't annoy the neighborhood
- Citizens should be allowed to have these animals
- I love all animals, I don't see this being a problem
- Chickens are quieter than dogs. They also provide sustainability and can help with pest management in the garden. I do not believe support from neighbours should be required as we all have experienced a lousy neighbour who enjoys making their neighbours lives miserable.
- Anyway people can provide for themselves that doesn't negatively affect neighbors is a great idea
- You need to have insurance on livestock within city limits.

- There would have to be conditions and limits on how many
- Chickens and other small livestock would be fine. Allows for some self-sufficiency
- I'd love to have my own hens
- If there is proper care and housing for the animals, and they are not an annoyance to neighbors I don't see a problem with it. I do not agree that livestock should be in residential areas, however on rural properties I agree.
- I love chickens
- Support from neighbours is a tricky criteria. One person can say no just because they're selfish and crotchety? What if someone says yes and then sells their home and is replaced by someone who now has a problem with it? I think there should be a process for notifying neighbors and allowing them to come forward if they have concerns. in the absence of concerns, and if the applicants are otherwise suitable to have the animals, then their application should be approved
- Animals are amazing!!!
- Makes sense
- There's a fine line between "livestock" and pets now (I have a pet micro pig. Hens are great and promote a sense of responsibility, as well as contribute to the household. They are easy to maintain. There should be a set number and space requirements however. And for pets like pigs etc there should be a stipulation that they are to reside indoors with the family as a pet/household member not live in the backyard (same as with a dog).
- Urban hens have worked well in many jurisdictions.
- I believe pigs should be allow within City limits as pets.
- Urban hens is a brilliant idea, and would be beneficially to many Calgarians.
- There needs to be clarity on distance from residential homes, dealing with doors and cleaning requirements.
- Please limit the number of chickens a person can own
- If neighbors support the choice and suitable conditions exist then other livestock should be allowed, example pigs. But I think the adjacent neighbors should be expanded depending on the type of livestock, with exceptions outlined in the last bullet point
- As long as they are kept in a clean and healthy environment and not roaming.
- Yes hens are good to have for eggs as long as area for hens is big enough for suitable quality of life for the hens.
- Hens are awesome
- As long as owners follow rules and the animals are treated humanely and have good living conditions, I support this bylaw amendment. All kind of animals provide all kinds of benefits to all animals.
- noise would be a factor. three strikes you're out?
- Under the right conditions for raising and housing hens, they are not extremelt intrusive. However insurance that no birds escape and become an feral problem is required.
- There is no reason we could not keep chickens in Calgary.It provides a sustainable food source and keeps the insects down organically.

- I would like yo see the number if animals allowed be proportional to the size of the property.
- the more people who eat sustainability, the better for our planet
- I do not see many negative effects of this bylaw
- Responsible ownership of Hens. Must keep their pens clean and well maintained.
- Yes, I support this with the development of material that outlines clear expectations regarding having hens.
- If the neighbours were considered BEFORE the animal was moved in and it will be properly cared for.
- Case by case basis seems like a good way to go
- urban development of viable food sources ie. egg production helps communities and people in general.
- What a great way for Calgarians to be more self sufficient.
- As with any animal, there should be some sort of registration for urban hens or other livestock.
- I'd LOVE to be able to be able to have a few hens. Home grown eggs, and a couple of sweet feathered friends.
- I think it would be okay to have small farm animals in the city as long as they have proper shelter and clean up after them
- I think it is good to allow hens in the urban areas but there must be sufficient bylaws in place to deal with neglected hens. For instance, the living quarters for the hens must be clean and cared for, etc, etc.
- I support this because of the criteria listed.
- I have lived in places with urban chickens before. I never found it to be a problem.
- Cows, pigs,
- I have no issues with this.
- A positive option where appropriate
- I see nothing wrong with having hens within city limits as long as the above conditions and requirements are met.
- Why not?
- As long as it's controlled and supervised regularly
- I think as long as there is reasonable caps on how many and rules it should be fine. Odor management and cleanliness would Need to be addressed
- "I'm all for more animals and less humans any day ;-)
- Seriously goats eat weeds and you can get milk, ducks eat insects as do chickens - and you have eggs, maybe it's crazy but llamas or ponies would keep coyotes and foxes out of the area that attack people's pets (not that they should be roaming free anyway...another rant for another time). The poop is the most natural fertilizer available. But, I'm a horsewoman so...I'm biased."
- I would love to have hens in my urban setting for eggs. I believe the owners should require a license and the coop should be inspected For appropriate conditions as winters in Calgary are very cold
- chickens are no more annoying then construction, loud vehicles, children screaming.

- I think responsible neighbours should be allowed to have other livestock.
- Should have a minimum acreage.
- As long as they're kept in a clean matter and contained. It's a great idea.
- Hens and other livestock animals can provide a positive community impact and a closer connection to the food we consume.
- I'm an old farm boy and miss having animals around. But they must not be a nuisance and need to be properly cared for.
- I don't have a problem with backyard chickens provided the conditions are suitable and are cared for. Perhaps there could be a yearly or every second year inspection/renewal to ensure compliance? If neighbours change, so could the support for the hens. And complaints must be investigated so that people respect this privilege.
- As we progress to a more environmentally and socially conscious culture urban hen ownership makes sense. Roosters should be restricted to avoid noise disturbances.
- I would like the idea of having hens on my property as pets and for eggs.
- As long as it's well kept
- Would be nice to have chickens for eggs in the backyard.
- A few (3-4) hens or a mini horse on a large property would not cause more odours or waste than dogs and cats
- It is fair.
- I think if the animals are well taken care of and owner ensures he cleans up excrement on a daily basis to minimize door, etc. I'm all for it.
- Livestock should be allowed especially chickens. Having chickens and the availability of chickens can provide people with a great protein source and can reduce poverty (eggs)
- Good for the environment and get fresh eggs.
- If the neighbours are irritated, hens go.
- chickens are not pests or nuisances. Let people have them
- I think it can benefit everyone to keep and raise hens.
- It's important that there is not a disruption to neighbours. Ie. noise, smell, etc.
- If done well, don't have a problem with small livestock.
- If all neighbours agrees and the housing requirements are met then yes it should be allowed, with follow up check ins to make sure it's being maintained proper/ responsible
- I don't see why people can't have a hen or two.
- Would need a limit on the number of hens
- Animals like hens and goats are useful!
- We encourage community gardening why couldn't we encourage community farming with standards around cleanliness.
- I don't see a problem with hens, as long as the owners are responsible and can care for them appropriately
- "Chickens, goats and pigs.

- Pigs alone would decrease compost by 50% or more."
- Why not? Animals can be less of an issue than a crappy neighbour.
- As long as the animal/s doesn't disturb the community/neighbors then I think it's a great idea.
- Urban homesteading is trending and a great environmental initiative that should be supported
- One or two hens only though.
- Allowing hens, goats, and other small livestock would be beneficial to the community if the owner of the animals is donating their harvest to food banks and local shelters/school/etc.
- I believe we should be able to have hens for providing our family with eggs. They are a staple and way over priced in the grocery stores.
- High propensity for lack of proper care for animals not suited for an urban environment
- If the city is aware of "hen" ownership and the owner has complied with the city by-laws and the owner has neighbour agreement
- Diversifying animal ownership for community benefit/improvement is a great way to support animal welfare through education and grow community ties.
- I've lived in other municipalities where this was allowed and it was fantastic. No reason not to allow it.
- I think there are benefits for people having hens, as long as living conditions are strictly enforced and neighbours are given the ability to weigh in, such as with public engagement for secondary suites.
- Support
- Neighbors would have to be on board with the type of animal
- It would be nice if we could prior the same level of care for people people living on the streets.
- It would be wonderful to have backyard hens - with the way the economy is going their eggs would be a good food source for Calgary and
- As long as they are licensed and have appropriate housing and care knowledge it's fine.
- There are different animals that are considered to be for emotional support. Whether it is an animal that is considered "livestock" or a pet.
- Hens could provide a serious support for low income families and allow for some food security.
- But could have limit, don't want a a neighbour with 200 chickens or something. Maybe like four/five.
- As long as he animal isn't annoying neighbours, have it.
- I would but proper licensing and fees to pay for supporting the program would be vital. Who will administer the program, who will check living conditions what will be the penalties for non-compliance to the rules?
- No
- This sounds fair to me. Those I,packed by the decision would have a say in it.
- Pets are very varied and you see this working in many other situations
- I would support this step towards allowing livestock, only if acceptable conditions are provided to the animals. There are advantages to families and increased sense of community through urban farming including access to food and soil propagation. However this move should ensure potential owners are knowledgeable of animal needs and care particularity during winter months.

- I support hens in the city
- As long as the animals are cared for this could be great
- Neighborhood support is essential
- We should be able to own domesticated poultry so long as their hutches are clean and do not smell or offend neighbours.
- If it makes the person happy and the animal has enough space then why not.
- Support animals are vital for some people, and as long as the animal is cared for appropriately I think it's a great idea.
- I don't want hens but don't see a reason why people shouldn't be allowed to have them as long as they're not too noisy or stinky, and that they're looked after.
- I don't see why people can't have Serbian animals on their own property as long as the animals are taken care of properly.
- Hope the animals aren't too noisy- otherwise, this could be amazing
- I personally know the woman that got the rules changed for the LESA chickens and have met the birds. They are NOT noisy (although they are female) I think we have to be careful though. Hens yes... cows and horses no
- important neighbours have input
- permitting small agricultural animals would permit residents to better control what they eat (eggs)/grow
- As long as it's taken care of properly, I see no problem with it.
- I would like to keep 3-6 special breed hens in a clean pen on my property. No roosters, as they are loud and will wake up the neighborhood.
- I think that there is a large number of people that would like the opportunity to have urban hens, and I support the idea. That being said the health of the animals are paramount, eg winter and cleanliness of pens.
- Neighbours should be allowed to say as our homes are extremely close together
- But support from adjacent neighbours should not be a requirement. Some neighbours object to anything/everything. Adjacent neighbour input should only be considered if a nuisance/problem becomes apparent/proveable/demonstrable.
- As long as the animal/S are not bothersome
- Conditional Yes that does not grandfather in and thereby defeat revision based on changes (in ability of care and maintenance of animals) of ownership through sickness, incapacitation, financial problems or death.
- I think allowing other animals such as chickens, etc could greatly benefit people because that would allow them to become more self sustaining (cows milk, eggs, etc) also pigs are cute
- People should be allowed to have chickens and whatever benefits the community.
- Hens are useful

- I am for enabling Calgarians to have availability to different options to support their families which includes keeping a reasonable amount of hens on their property
- They don't bother me.
- Yes if the home has an inspection to check the living arrangements for them. As well as there should be NO slaughter allowed. . Yearly inspections should happen
- It has been proven effective in other cities to have hens and other animals.
- Only if the animal does not cause issues for neighbours (smell, noise etc.). This is exactly what happened with Airbnb licensing. Now I have constant noise and problems next door and The City won't address it because it was not considered in the original "brainstorm" and I use that word VERY loosely.
- I am in support of backyard chickens to a maximum of six hens. No roosters. I would also consider other small animals as well. All as long as people keep their yards clean and free of smell and flies.
- Hens may help lower income households feed their families
- Not everyone can have dogs or cats as pets. However there should be some clear restrictions on the types allowed
- I believe people should be able to have livestock on their property if they so choose as long as they keep everything clean so that neighbours don't have to deal with the smell
- As long as the conditions above are satisfied and the animals are in a suitable environment I like the idea.
- Well behaved animals provide comfort to many people and should be allowed on a case by case basis
- I think having hens is a great idea, as long as they are properly cared for
- I support small unintrusive urban farming for food producing animals such as chickens, ducks, rabbits, and bees. I'm small numbers for personal consumption
- I think pet ownership is a responsibility and that pet owners need to be able to handle the animal they're in possession of.
- I have no issues with this
- More livestock in the city will help Calgarians mentally, as well as be steps moving forward in the right direction to save this planet.
- Has long as neighbors are on board of said animals
- Very important for the needs of the environmental if people treat them well
- I support this as long as people are following proper hygiene and care for the hens.
- Hens are great.
- YES to support from adjacent neighbours. This should also be required to disclose when potentially purchasing or renting a home beside urban hens.
- I would support this as long as there is enough consistent funding to enforce issues such as cleanliness, health and welfare of animal etc.
- I don't see a problem with people owning livestock in city limits if it's done in a safe manner for the community and the animals

- Yes for all the conditions stated animals are healthy kept in clean conditions neighbours are not affected by smells or noise
- Why not? What's the big deal. Unless of course it's like the bad neighbours that don't even clean their yard up, and have piles of poop/stench for days/months.
- As long as there's a bylaw to protect the rights of the animal
- Let people have a choice. It's a shame an individual would have to relocate just to have a potbellied pig etc
- I think as long as animal and community welfare were taken into account the addition of animals in urban spaces can be very positive
- Support from adjacent neighbors should not be required.
- As long as neighbours are not impacted
- I want to have chickens!
- Livestock does not belong within city limits. Waste management, disease and noise issues outweigh the benefit of raising your own eggs when you can buy them for $5.
- My family has wanted to have a few chickens for years, but of course this hasn't been a possibility. I see no problem with allowing a certain number, as long as they are properly homed and taken care of, and there is no negative affect on the neighbors. I understand the issue many have with chickens is the mess or smell, and while I agree that there should be measures to ensure they don't become a nuisance, I do think that people should be given a chance.
- Urban hens can be a manageable animal if housed responsibly and treated with care.
- "I think it's a humans rights violation to tell citizens they cannot have hens.
- Hens provide eggs, and improve sustainability of our communities."
- It seems a step to a more self sustaining environment....if the neighbours have no objection.....why not?
- Yes, I would support this as long as it didn't cause a noise issue or smell issue with adjacent neighbours.
- Who doesnt love fresh eggs?
- If living conditions are suitable why not? Neighbours cannot complain about the hens in order to keep on property.
- Only if it is properly ensured that suitable living conditions for the animal are followed. The city can't do that so far for dogs, cats, etc. So why would they think they could for even more animals?
- Urban hens would be AWESOME. We can use other jurisdictions as templates and do this safely and well
- Chickens are useful and harmless
- As long as the animals are being properly cared for and given the necessary enrichment for a good quality of life.
- Sure, in theory, I'd be interested in more information....
- As long as they are not a nuisance and owners must pick up their mess

- As long as they are required to pay licensing fees also that they do not disrupt or disturb any neighbours
- sustainable food options.
- This inclusion might support financial needs for some.
- Allowing hens would help food security for some families as well as provide an education in food to table which is missing from the majority of the population
- If neighbours all agree.
- Chickens goats sheep small livestock?.....yes.....we are getting to distanced from where our food comes from AND the benefits of an animal in our lives (beyond food and lawn cutting).
- re: no chickens - roosters like to crow. Florida has a problem with loose chickens
- I think that the ability to have livestock animals kept on residential property would enrich lives and the community.
- would not require neighbours support, it's an endless debate and non existent consensus, creates more frustration
- If neighbours are okay with it then why not?
- I would support as listed about if conditions are good for the animal. Certain livestock can be beneficial to do learning and companionship.
- There needs to be a limit on the number of hens, there also needs to be an annual review of the living conditions and a way to winter the animals
- Hens are cool. They feed you and it keeps production local and ethical.
- With neighbour support, this is a great idea
- There are likely urban properties that are somewhat removed from neighbors similar to an acreage where livestock would not 'bother' neighbors. In our regular neighborhoods though, I can not see having noise-making animals.
- I believe this is a solid plans for families to reduce food costs. Owners must maintain a clean and sanitary yard, limits to how many should be in place.
- I am in favour of livestock being permitted in the City. My main concern would be that they get proper care and living conditions. I don't like the idea that one cranky neighbour could stop someone from having an animal that was being properly cared for and posing no actual issues to the neighbourhood.
- I hear that chicken feces is smelly but that shouldn't stop someone from having chickens. Perhaps the bylaw should include proper management requirements.
- Hens are cool
- However, I am concerned about people mistreating these animals. Will regular ongoing inspections take place for these instances? (To verify appropriate shelter and care for these animals)
- As long as the immediate neighbors have no objections.
- You should need a permit so there is traceability for issues
- However, if there is even one objection from neighbours then it is not to be permitted.
- Chickens only

- I feel giving people the option to have different live stock with bring some country into the city as long as they get taken care of it's a learning experience for everyone
- If they have the means, space and want to, why cant they?
- Allowing livestock within the city is great, restricted to a number to support the occupants of the property.
- Hens are not dangerous. Annoying yes, but not dangerous.
- I like the idea of being able to keeping hens for eggs.
- I think that within reason this is helpful to household and communities by teaching Children where food is sourced and how to take care of them.
- Within regulations I support people having livestock
- Please let us keep bees! Bees help everyone and have no downside.
- Hens are great!
- Who am I to define what a "pet" is to someone
- Many animals would make great community members
- Depends on the livestock.
- Just yes.
- As long as the population be kept small.
- I've always considered trying to move and raise chickens
- Chickens only
- I think it would be fine as long as they don't get out into public.
- Hens are safe animals that provide food sources and are not a nuisance. They absolutely can live in the city.
- Hens are not noisy and provide food for their owners and neighbours.
- How are pigeons better than hens?!
- I dont really see an issue with hens as long as there's not too many in one household.
- If care is taken to ask neighbours and they are abiding by smell and noise rules then I don't see an issue. Need to make examples of smell and noise infractions though.
- Bird people are unfortunately human as well and birds deserve compassion.
- I believe that people should have the choice to own an animal if they are going to take full responsibility and take care of it and provide it with all its necessities that it requires and provide further support if required to maintain responsible ownership.
- We should be able to have hens and other livestock for those who cannot afford an acreage or "farm life"
- except don't allow evaluations by anyone to create exceptions, the main problem with all city bylaws is the ability of a city employee to create exceptions, something is either right or wrong based on the reasons given for the bylaw in the first place
- If a lot size (or yard size) is big enough, I see no issues with Hens
- I think having hands would be fabulous.
- Livestock is not a nuisance unless poorly cared for.

- Don't require neighbor consult. Don't make the rules impossible to meet.
- If suitable living conditions are provided and the owner has proven to be a responsible pet owner, I don't see why not. Strict enforcement of humane treatment and respecting neighbours should be applied.
- If they are well taken care of AND the neighbors have no issue, I don't see the problem with allowing it
- I used to live next to someone who had chickens in strathmore. I do not see an issue with this as long as the yard supports it. Obviously you can't live in a condo and have chickens
- Animal welfare must be considered, and capacity to intervene in neglect or cruelty must be available.
- I would LOVE a chicken!! They are excellent pets and getting fresh eggs would be amazing.
- The city should not be involved in what people do on their own properties if it is not harming another person.
- Regulations must be followed
- Let people have chickens. Increase local sustainability
- Quality food production should be encouraged.
- Hens do no harm they lay eggs and provide food and are also good companions for people
- Fresh eggs! Yes please!
- Hens and other non-annoyance livestock should be permitted... as society members seek to be more self sufficient, or whatever their motivation... people should be able to do so on their own property regardless if they are in the city or not.
- As long as neighbour consent/support is provided, I'm in support.
- I think backyard chickens work well in a lot of places, and we could do it thoughtfully here.
- I love the idea of getting my own fresh eggs!
- I would like to see a license system in place to ensure that people understand the correct care, including the lifespan of these animals.
- as long as the standards for living conditions are high, and the animals don't create a nuisance for the neighbours.
- Because why not
- This is not only a healthy hobby for some people, but an alternative means for food and well being. My only concern is strict measures are put in place to ensure the hens are kept in a safe and clean "cage or pen" at all times. The animals wellbeing is most important and the neighbors not having to suffer with intense smells etc is also important.
- If all of those requirements are met, there is no harm being done.
- It should be a citizen right to procure & sustain an autonomous food source.
- Permission from all neighbours within a set distance (500m perhaps) with a required renewal every 5 years (in the case neighbours change)
- "Hens can provide the similar benefits as (noisy) dogs in regards to mental health, also provide a food source for the household, and teaching tool regards food security :-)

- p.s. if firepits are allowed, which tangibly contaminate the air space beyond their property with toxic carcinogens, there should be no problem allowing hens on private urban property."
- I would allow chickens if they are cared for the right way
- Chickens and other livestock provide as few negatives as do cats and dogs, and they have more positives such as providing eggs for keepers. Caring for livestock is, in many ways, reflective of caring for any other type of pet given that one provides the necessities for a happy life for the pet.
- Depends on the animal
- People should be allowed to do what they want on their property.
- Goats are great at weed control, very social and usually bring smiles to people's faces.
- I would love to own a small flock (3-5) backyard chickens
- I fully support chickens in the
- I'm not really against people keeping whatever pet/livestock in healthy, safe conditions where the animal can thrive. But....there are smells (e.g. pigs, goats) and noise (e.g urban roosters) that I think could be problematic for neighbours.
- Pets of any kind should be allowed as long as the living conditions are correct
- Mandatory education is again paramount to preparing the public to respect, care for, maintain and house any animal or bird
- As long as the animal is taken care of and will not be a nuisance to the neighbourhood, I don't have an issue with other animals being allowed.
- With the recent instability in the food chain (and coming instability), it only makes sense to allow people to take survival measures to ensure their families will be secure.
- I don't know. I can see a lot of people treating the hens badly and some people giving them a good home.
- All animals including livestock deserve care and support. Any person wanting to have livestock should be required to prove they can care for the animals
- As long as owners behave responsibly and ethically
- If they take proper care of the animal, I'm all for it!
- I would love to have chickens for eggs only
- Love the idea of hens and livestock being permitted
- Get with the times. Edmonton allows it.
- Any animal should be allowed to reside within city limits with responsible pet owners
- I suspect that some people would use livestock like chickens or goats or sheep to annoy other neighbors. I also suspect there are many who are not responsible enough to maintain a quiet clean yard.
- I believe this would greatly benefit our community and work to promote families in building a sustainable way of ensuring they eat safe and healthy food.

- "I worry that it would just give neighbors more things to fight about. There would have to be fully informed consent.
- It shouldn't be left to the neighbors to learn all about what impact the animals would have; there should be thorough presentations vetted by the city that can help them know what to expect; good and bad."
- I think we need to make our urban areas more animal friendly.
- I have no problem with hens in the community as long as they are well taken care of. They are quieter than dogs and contained to the owners property unlike cats.
- As long as the animals are kept in suitable living conditions and are not disturbing anyone (eg rooster waking everyone up at dawn) I don't see a problem.
- I think sustainable food options are in our interest as long as there are parameters around it that people can abide by
- I believe that small livestock should be allowed as long as it is cared for properly
- If people want chickens, can provide appropriate habitat for them, and the neighbours don't mind, them I think it's fine.
- As long as people are screened and the animal treated well. Animal Cruelty cannot be given a pass
- Allowing cats and dogs but not some types of livestock is kind of arbitrary. Ultimately it's about whether the animal is appropriately housed and cared for, and whether it's a nuisance to neighbors. Same as with dogs and cats
- We are all learning that more is needed urban wise than what can be provided through general markets. A way to get eggs or milk in a neighborhood without going to a grocery with Covid would be nice. Helping a neighbor would be good as well
- Small numbers of certain animals can be beneficial to the owner. They would need suitable space and care, so may need additional permits beyond what traditional pets require.
- If animals are looked after properly and provided adequate space.
- I would like people to be able to have hens
- I fully support a bylaw to permit livestock in the city.
- Let people feed themselves for god sake
- As long as an owner can provide proper care and accommodations for the animal and the neighbors are ok with it then it should be fine.
- I think having hens would be a good idea as long as they were well cared for with adequate clean housing etc.
- If people own the appropriate space, they should be able to have livestock there.
- if well cared for I believe some animals (chickens) would be beneficial to neighbourhood atmospheres, there would have to be many restrictions and inspections however...no roosters, sufficient room for the chickens, sufficient shelter and food and so on, cleanliness...
- Fresh eggs
- Because I said so

- i would support the ownership of hens with a possible requirement of inspections for proper housing and care.
- Seems reasonable to get the neighbors approval if you have farm animals.
- I think it's great that people are getting back to raising their own food, be it for eggs or the actual chickens. If there is structure put in place I think that people should be able to have a certain allowed # of hens. As for other types of livestock, I guess it would depend on what type it is as well as the space they are being housed on
- living conditions/control of waste etc must be addressed. Neighbours should be consulted out of courtesy.
- Above
- perhaps just having someone check their conditions once a year to ensure they are taken care of properly
- Urban farming is important and a valuable resource to those on social services.
- If yard is large enough to sustain and noise not an issue
- There are horses smaller than dogs as well as pet pigs. Housing requirements could be specific. There are service horses available and their life expectancy is longer.
- if it is evaluated case by case then that seems fair
- We have a vegetable garden and we grow all our own veggies. Would be nice to have our own eggs too.
- I would like laying hens in our yard
- many calgary yards are large enough to accommodate chickens- numbers should be restricted though. Smaller yards shouldn't qualify
- I worry about the conditions animals would be kept in if enforcement isn't sufficient but a small animal like a pig or a goat can be wonderful to have around.
- People need to be more self sustaining
- I would like to keep some quail myself.
- If you have the room for an animal and they can have a proper life then I believe it's okay
- If there are strict rules and animals and living areas are very well maintained
- I think its a neat idea and could open more doors to community programs.
- As long as the animals are cared for and don't break other bylaws like noise, I see no issue
- Sustainable living and community gardens can greatly benefit co sumers and our economy, low income families could feed and nourish their children and neighbours . Ponies and goats on larger properties maintain lawns and weeds as well as fertalize. They are winderful companions . It can create awreness for farming communities and food sourcing and create more protevtion and understanding for livestock.
- My only concern here would be for the animals and ensuring they are well taken care of and of no consequence to neighbours. Cleanliness of living quarters and noise
- As long as the household and adjacent neighbors are in agreement, suitable living conditions are provided for the animals, bylaw standards are met I don't see why not.

- Hens when properly cared for should not present as a nuisance to neighbors.
- People should be educated that you don't need a rooster to have eggs as the roosters cause the most annoyance. The hens will produce eggs as long as they are comfortable. I would limit the # of hens though, so no stench is developing.
- I support this bylaw but I'm worried that the live stock you refer to may be obscene. If we are talking about having chickens then sure. But if we are talking about goats, and sheep I wouldn't be on board for this bylaw.
- We already allow [removed] "emotional support" chickens ([removed] btw), allowing them as pets makes sense.
- I agree with allowing livestock as long as they're treated well
- I've never had problem with this. However, I think this should be limited to smaller animals.
- As long as guidelines are clear so people cannot hoard them or that there are caveats that allow for neighbour input whenever a person requests a permit for livestock (assuming a permit is necessary, which I would hope it is)
- But only if there is recourse for neighbours having problems with the livestock eg. not being cared for properly or too noisy.
- I agree with all the terms
- I love chickens and I think letting people have them in the city (with the appropriate habitat and yard set up) would be really awesome.
- Backyard hens are wonderful, even in urban environments.
- Why not. I see no reason as to why a person should not be able to keep hens. Dogs, and cats can smell just as bad. And can be more of a problem, than a little chicken pecking around a yard.
- I agree with most of this, but I disagree that livestock needs to offer an active benefit to the community to be allowed
- A way to connect with other animals.
- Get written approval from neighbours and allow neighbours to report violations of any of the criteria (e.g., drop in living conditions). If all parties agree and the property owner abides by all rules, this should benefit all involved!
- To a limited extent, ie 3 chickens, it should not turn into a business but rather self sustainability, if they would like to run a business then they should have to go to a different zoned area.
- Hens don't make noise so as long as neighbors are agreeable, and the animals have appropriate living conditions, I think hens are a great idea. I would be ok with other livestock as well provided neighbors agree and clean living conditions are provided. There should be a limit on the quantity of any animals though.
- Max limits per house must ply. Hens are a non issue
- Depending on the type of livestock. I think animals such as cows, goats, etc could become a nuisance to neighbors. There would have to be some restrictions regarding noise and smell. But hens would not be a problem I think.
- I would love to have 1 or 2 hens and a rooster to promote egg laying and bug population control
- As long as the livestock is not being raised for slaughter.

- Yes, as long as the property owners properly maintains the livestock. Cleaning up after them, providing adequate shelter, food and water.
- With the support from the closest members of a community, small numbers of productive livestock should be allowed.
- If city people can reduce the cost of food I am all for it.
- as long as we don't have roosters in the city. Why not, there are many forms of therapeutic support, if this helps with an individuals mental health, go for it. again as long as they are a responsible owner.
- important for all animals to have proper care and responsible owners
- Key word is balance ..numbers of chickens / smell / noise would have to be reviewed on a case-by-case basis.
- Allow the chickens!
- Yes, with limits and rules.
- I think this would be a great idea. However I don't think it should just fall on adjacent neighbours. Some people are jerks for no reason. I think there should be exceptions to getting neighbour approval depending on the property, and the city should carefully look over why a neighbour says no and go from there
- Only if no unpleasant odor could be detected. Dirty chicken litter is strong .
- Many urban jurisdictions have livestock options that work well if Proper guidelines are in place.
- I like farm animals
- I had hens as a kid in Vancouver and loved the eggs and training it
- Contact with animals has the potential to improve mental health. I'm sceptical about the space and conditions but in theory it sounds great good.
- If neighbors support the livestock and suitable living conditions can be provided then I would be supportive.
- Chickens are great for killing insects. Healthy eggs. Other cities are managing fine with urban chickens. Good way to use up our scraps too.
- Chicken would be good to have for eggs
- Hens / bees both make a positive impact for backyard 'farming'.
- Under these conditions, yes
- Keeping of small livestock should be allowed.
- I am in favor of allowing urban hens with appropriate restrictions. There seem to be little downsides that are unique to hens vs. what we see with dogs (e.g. noise, smell, etc.).
- Noise and smells need to be addressed.
- If proper husbandry and care is provided I believe this is low impact on neighbours (and I do not like chickens myself!)
- people should be allowed to have hens if they are properly caring for them
- Community benefit and positive impact is subjective and based on personal perspective.
- These requirements would definitely make it a more realistic goal.

- I think these are good strategies for promoting local food resources and self reliance
- Important to ensure cleanliness and care of animals is ongoing and that neighbors do not have an issue.
- I have no issues with hens for laying eggs and emotional support. There should be a maximum allowed to minimize smell.
- As long as there is no negative impact (odours, noise, nuisance), this should be acceptable, as long as there is an annual review process.
- Needs better definitions for positive impact.
- not permitted in row housing back yards
- As long as neighbours agree
- There should be more small scale farming (chickens, bees, etc allowed)
- Increase enjoyment of personal property, increase food security
- I came from suburban area with backyard chickens, goats, etc. and they weren't much of a nuisance if at all
- Provided the hens/livestock due not become a nuisance.
- I love having a self sufficient neighbourhood. If someone could benefit from having hens, then I'm all for it. As long as they do not interfere with others personal property or wellbeing.
- I think Calgary should allow individual to own a few laying hens. Hens do not make noise, and produce fresh, healthy eggs for their family to eat. We are behind other cities and counties with this one, I think there would be a lot of enthusiasm for a project like this.
- Provided no reasonable complaints from neighbors and the hens/livestock are not a nuisance, there's no reason why someone shouldn't be allowed to own and keep other types of animals
- Livestock are fundamentally no different from dogs and cats. I assume there would be a limit on the number of animals.
- Chickens in factory farms are horrendously treated, hopefully allowing people to have hens would take business away from these mass abuse farms. There would need to be accountability and education to be sure they were being cared for properly. I am a Calgarian currently residing in Didsbury and my neighbours across the alleyway have hens, they're not a nuisance at all!
- As long as this is not disruptive to the neighbourhood - smell, mess, noise, etc...
- I live in a new neighbourhood where we are stacked one on top of another I sure wouldn't want hens in our area but there are areas in the city where there is room between houses for hens.
- Companion animals come in many forms. Allowing chickens and even other livestock would be an enlightened action.
- Sounds good.
- I support having more local livestock in the city limits
- The trend to onshore and localize food production needs urgent municipal support particularly in the wake of COVID; offering guidance on urban hens is an investment in food security, personal health and community resilience.
- If they're not a nuisance to the neighbours or public at large they should be allowed.

- If the property can sustain livestock and the owners ensure the area is cleaned and maintained on a regular basis plus the livestock is/are properly cared for. Then yes.
- This can help low income families with food. I also like the idea of a goat maintaining my lawn
- I think it would be wonderful to allow certain livestock if the premises were suitable and there wasn't an obvious reason for neighbours to oppose it.
- if no roosters are present and the situation is well looked after then having a few hens should be okay
- I think as long as the animal is properly cared for and has what it needs, then I think we should be promoting taking in animals. Like I think raising hens for eggs is awesome!
- Provided the hens are well kept for and I was notified if someone was getting some, I fully support urban hens.
- I love hens.
- Thought: What would be done if the neighbours agreed, but then were unhappy with noise / smell / other factors after it was implemented?
- Neighbour support is important, but what if neighbour moves?
- Urban hens is a fantastic idea. But control, reduction in composting material (chickens can be fed scraps from certain food sources with only positive effects).
- If folks have the proper housing and conditions, I don't see an issue. However, the number of animals allowed on a city property, should be considered
- I am for allowing hens in Calgary - not sure about other livestock.
- We should be encouraging people to blend urban and rural parts of life together
- "As long as it doesn't smell like a farm
- And animals are pets not a Commodity Or being used for
- A
- Profit"
- Housing regulations and sanitation considerations so that poultry bourne illnesses are not spread.
- Absolutely. Farm fresh eggs and other types of livestock will provide food locally in case of a disruption in trucks bringing foods to Calgary. Self sufficiency should always be supported. There are ways to minimize chances of disease by having local livestock.
- Depending on the distance hens are kepts from neighbours. Townhouse yards can be extremely small and wouldn't be suitable for coops.
- as long as owners are responsible for the care/welfare of them and make sure their housing/yard is clean and a limit to how many they can own.
- I support chickens and livestock in urban areas for the uplifting of the community and educational opportunities for urban people to learn about keeping livestock etc.
- I fully support free citizens caring for livestock in a responsible manner and I feel that the city has responsibility to ensure this process is not unnecessarily drawn out, ie, a decision is made within 45 days or automatically approved.
- Neighbours shouldn't have veto

- This would be a fantastic way to support local sustainable agriculture
- I would as long as there was sufficient staff and resources to monitor the program. As livestock animals are less common to the average person, their needs are not as obvious, and may not be properly cared for/ contained due to lack of education.
- Hens can be used for food
- This seems quite reasonable although it will depend on how close an adjacent neighbor is defined
- Everyone's house and lot size is different. Some times people can provide a great come for a little pig or a few chickens within the city as long as it doesn't disrupt neighbors.
- I would have no problem with a small backyard chicken coupe for hen if it was kept clean. Roosters however, should not be permitted.
- I can't see an issue with small animals like chickens. Larger animals, like goats, cows, pigs, etc, need more care and space than a city backyard can supply.
- If those conditions are met, I'm fine with it. That would be ALL adjacent neighbours though. I would not want my neighbours having a rooster waking me up, but so long as the hens are taken care of and used for eggs and food, then so be it.
- As long as pet owners are responsible and take good care of their pets, as well as take into consideration anything that may bother their neighbours (odors, noise, etc), animals such as chickens should be allowed within the city of Calgary.
- As long as reasonable limits place on numbers and that no roosters permitted. Must be clear rules to how the chickens are contained and space required.
- As long as said animal is not able to roam or making noise constantly, I see nothing wrong with it.
- Good lesson for kids, economical and sustainable
- But noise concerns must be met.
- adjacent neighbors should not be allowed an opinion
- Urban livestock can help with the environment.
- Companion animals should not be exclusive to dogs and cats.
- As long as livestock are well taken care of (including vet care, clean, spacious living area, healthy food, etc) & not a nuisance or hazard to anyone, I don't see a problem.
- Why not?
- NA
- Along with upgrading the cities bilaws to more cohesively include guidelines for care of dogs and cats, more extensive outlines should be the same for other such animals including hens etc.
- Support from more than just the adjacent neighbors should be required as the smell would not adhere to the boundary of a property and would mitigate to neighbours close by.
- I would love calgary to open the door on more animals. Goats, hens. More!
- So long as it does not infringe on the rights and comfort of neighbors, I see no problem with this.
- If neighbours are good with it I don't see a problem unless it becomes extreme
- Only if the owners are responsible.

- As long as all the conditions above have been met then I do not see any problem with livestock to be permitted on private property in the city. One more condition would be that the livestock reside at a detached, single family home.
- I don't mind sustainable living within the community
- If proper balance and harmony can be achieved for positive effect then animals should not be discriminated against based strictly on species classification, more details and criteria should be considered to determine overall impact.
- I see nothing wrong with having select livestock on ones property as long as it/they are being humanely cared for, there is adequate room on the property and it is not a nuisance to the neighbours.
- As long as there are suitable conditions for the animal, I don't see why it matters.
- Why can't a person have a chicken - chances are it'll be less of a nuisance than someone's yappy dog.
- Needs to have additional bylaws in place for hens and adequate space, shelter and plans for the well-being of the animals. Example being winter, how will they be cared for? How close to the neighbors can the coop be? How many chickens per square foot of green space? Adequate fencing?
- If there are no complaints from the community and the owner is responsible there should be no problems
- I think if the conditions are right for the animals responsible owners should be able to have live stock in the city.
- Ensure animals are cared for and not a nuisance.
- I would have no problem with this as long as the bylaws were very clear on what the expectations are from the city on the care of said animals ie; daily cleaning to control odors and that said animals remain on owners property and possibly a limit on the number of livestock allowed on one property also that the any fines be large enough to make the owners want to comply quickly with said bylaws
- Having hens is no different than having dogs in terms of owner responsibility. A responsible owner cares for their animals properly, cleans up after them, etc. whether their pets are hens or dogs or anything else.
- As long as guidelines and protocols are adhered to
- Not all pets are dogs and cats.
- Those make sense except for the neighbors portion. It's private property after all. Or are we not capitalists?
- As long as the animals aren't bothering neighbours (noise/smell), I don't see any issue in which animals people choose to have on their own property
- Livestock such as hens provide a community benefit.
- Why wasn't this done years ago! The city needs to get out of people's lives.
- I don't have an issue as long as the animals are properly cared for and the neighbours are respected as to potential noise and smell problems.
- no harm

- i don't see how this isn't good.
- As long as owners are responsible, I see absolutely no reason for people to not be able to own hens in their yard. This is something I've been wanting for a long time. It is no different than any other pet, which all have their own rules and restrictions. Same goes with other livestock following the above mentioned guidelines.
- If all of the above suggestions are met, I would support the bylaw.
- This is a great opportunity to explore new ways of self sufficiency and alternative options like weed control from goats can be considered instead of harmful chemicals. As long as the owners are responsible and accountable for their animals.
- I'm in favour of any animals that don't disturb neighbours
- Hens should not be a problem provided that the owners care properly and enclosures are kept clean and no unreasonable noise.
- Hens are fine
- If people want chickens and as long as it's done responsible then why not
- i believe our food chain is polluted and it would be nice to have natural eggs.
- I think owning something small like hens or pet pigs is perfectly acceptable. Maybe not cows or horses though if it's an urban environment. Large animals can produce bad odours.
- It makes sense
- Unsure. Would need a lot more information.
- Urban hens, when not neglected, will be beneficial to communities. Further, they help the city address inadequacies with food access, and move closer to match the UN recommendations in regards "right to food", which Currently the city is open to human rights law suits for no real reason.
- I believe there can be some positive environmental benefits to having a hen house on ones property. Less green house gases.
- Like any animal/pet feel their living quality and respectful noise levels for neighbors should all be a factor with odor etc. I encourage the idea we can produce our own food but also respect our neighbors with the pet/animals living quarters not be neglected or abused.
- I am in favour of Urban Agriculture/Livestock if done in a deliberate and thought-out manner. Neighbour support is essential for those directly impacted. For instance - geese are loud and their impact could reach beyond those lots immediately adjacent. There should also be a way for neighbours to put forward their concerns/objections to the city without being identified outwardly. Neighbour relationships are vital and the pressure to permit despite concerns could make some reluctant to voice their concerns.
- I love chickens!
- It seems reasonable to allow other certain types of livestock, as long as criteria listed has been met
- I know of such a situation in Red Deer and chickens next door are not an issue.
- Chickens are awesome and it would be great to be able to have some in the city.
- Chickens maybe. But with NO ODOR and NO ROOSTERS (crowing at dawn). And NO LARGER ANIMALS - goats, sheep, horses, etc.

- But depends on size of livestock, number allowed on property, noise, smell and distance from adjacent houses; and if become nuisance, what rights to the neighbours have to get them removed (see pigeon additional rules below - 7B).
- I wouldn't choose to keep hens, but many others would like them. There should be a limit though.
- as long as neighbours are okay with the situation and the animals are well taken care of. The owners could expect surprise visits from bylaw officer. There should also be a contingency plan in place if it is not working out, where can the animals go instead of the present location.
- We need to be flexible and adapt to what people want. I know people who have multiple chickens in their yard in the City even though they aren't allowed to and they say that they provide a lot of companionship and also help to produce food for their families. The noise is minimal and the mess is minimal. Animals can provide so many benefits for people and we can't always say no to things just because we haven't tried them before.
- I feel there is nothing wrong with owning other animals if they are looked after according to rules set out. The question is will these rules be informed.
- I think that if done correctly and responsibly it is a great step in sustainability
- Yes I support it, but I feel like this would cause some issues for others who or irresponsible
- I have lived in cities that allowed hens without concern. Neighbour support was not required, nor would I consider it necessary.
- As long as the owner has adequate space and can provide the animals with better quality of life.
- This is tough because I don't want livestock next door. What is support from adjacent neighbours? Would I have to "approve" my neighbor having hens? What if I move into a new house, can I tell which houses have hens? I have a dog and don't want to live next door to that.
- Food resiliency should be encouraged as long as it is done responsibly
- No skin in the game but I don't see why people shouldn't be allowed to if kept properly.
- As long as there is consideration for the neighbors and surrounding area, I have no problem with it. But people shouldn't be inconvenienced by it
- I think urban farming is great, allows us to diversify our food supply a bit and become more self-sufficient.
- As long as adjacent neighbors were consulted, I believe a yard is mostly for what you would want to do with it, with proper sanitary checks on an annual basis.
- If done responsibly, no harm.
- It really depends on having sufficient resources for Bylaw Services to enforce the rules (e.g. noise, smell, etc.).
- As long as livestock is being handled in a safe way and the area is being kept clean I don't see any issue with it
- its a great way to self supply and farm and teach kids about it as long as animals are in an appropriate environment
- I think it is a fantastic idea to allow hens. Save some people some money on poultry products.
- If the animal is well kept, and not annoying a neighbour with noise or offensive odours, it should be allowed.

- If it is not infringing on anyone else's rights then why not.
 - No issues with this as long as they are in good living conditions and the owners have the ability to maintain these animals without causing disturbance
 - I think it's fine
 - Welcome urban backyard chickens for everyone - do not waste taxpayers money by pre-qualifying people
 - Aslong as the animals are cared for properly and provided the correct shelter without affecting neighbors, they are not much different from a domestic animal.
 - Why not! Everyone loves chickens
 - Provided the number and living conditions are good, other livestock may be kept as pets.
 - if the neighbors are okay with chickens, because of rbe potential added noise it should be up to them.to come to an agreement
 - Urban hens are a fantasitc idea and would be of huge benefit to our community. I have a little concern about some people trying to abuse this and having too many hens in a small space and the owner's need for a profit from meat and eggs being a priority to the health and conditions of the hens.
 - "I've seen it done in Ontario. My father's friend had a few chickens and stuff in an old farm that they built around.
- Neighbors didn't seem to complain."
 - To my knowledge this is allowed on acreages, so yes I agree.
 - I think positive interest would be most important. You wouldn't want constant noise disrupting neighbours with a large flock or large livestock.
 - Sure. I don't see why not, assuming the above criteria are imposed.
 - Allows people to be just a little more self sufficient. More humane source of eggs for people interested vs. factory farming
 - No explanation needed, saved everyone money.
 - Could help people of lower income to supplement their groceries
 - By allowing this, you are also obligated to provide a set of rules so people have to provide their livestock with a good quality of life. They should already, but animal hoarding situations for example prove otherwise. Regulations will help to keep everyone, animals included, in a good situation.
 - Would be beneficial for all of Calgary to have their own livestock
 - Eggs are good
 - Hens are nice animals :)
 - As long as a maximum number of animals is set, animal welfare is considered and those animals do not prevent the neighbors from enjoying their properties They should be allowed
 - As long as the living conditions for the hens promotes a good quality of life for the animals, whether sold commercially or used for product (eggs, meat, etc.)

- As long as there is proof of suitable living conditions for the animals this is a fantastic idea.
- Current circumstances make it clear that food security and food independence is a must for Canadians
- I believe this would be an advancement in our community
- Good for food supply
- Pet pigs can be a wonderful and clean pet to add to a home
- I don't see an issue with livestock as long as rules are followed for the city and neighbours aren't bothered
- Choice of pet
- Depending on what is meant by "positive impact" and whether the animal has the necessary space and care
- I would support this bylaw amendment if it ensures livestock is living in suitable conditions.
- There would need to be a lot of enforcement for this to work though. I don't want someone's chicken flying into my yard and my dog killing it or something.
- I would have no issues with neighbors having hens, used to have chickens myself and didn't find them an issue
- Hens can be very quiet and clean animals when taken care of properly. Livestock can provide emotional support to humans in need and should be granted the same treatment as seeing-eye dogs.
- Promotes healthy living
- People should have the right to grow their own food, including livestock.
- Depends on type
- The more the merrier, if it means lives will be happier and enriched on all sides
- Because I like chickens
- Should expand, if people are responsible
- Hens and other suitable livestock can be considered pets also
- Its about time! The call for self sustainability is getting louder. Giving people choices with parameters is a positive move.
- Pot belly pigs are fabulous pets, quiet and clean. And who doesn't like the ability to have fresh eggs
- It's appropriate
- As long as the animals have suitable living conditions than it shouldn't be an issue. It could provide fresh eggs for people and lower certain carbon footprints
- Chickens are cool. Local sustainability is a good initiative as well. If urban beekeeping is permitted, why aren't hens?
- Hens are a great means of sustainable eating in an animal friendly way
- hens are very therapeutic
- With all the above criteria and support from the entire block, not just adjacent neighbours.
- I support owning any animal that will provide community benefit as long as it is provided with suitable living conditions and doesn't disturb others.

- Fresh chicken eggs. Who would say no to that?
 - Fresh eggs are the best and folks should be able to grow their own food.
 - You shouldn't need a neighbour to say it's okay to build a chicken coup. Nothing else that you do on your own property is their business. Why should this be?
 - Animals are amazing, we need more!
 - Inspections by bylaw would need to follow a regular cadence to ensure all parties were fulfilling due diligence. If animals became problematic, a system would need to be followed whereby a protest could be lodged to reconsider the application. Property sales would be required to disclose presence of neighbouring animals
 - I don't believe you will have an issue with responsible people. Having to apply for a special license for it would help keep honest people getting them. And random checks to assure the animals living conditions are adequate and not being a nuisance.
 - Definatly needs neighbor/ community depending where and size
 - As long as it is done responsibly, I don't have an issue with urban livestock ownership.
 - as long as the animals are being taken care of and are healthy, i don't see a problem.
 - Urban agriculture is important
 - H
 - But their should be should the numbers of livestock allowed
 - Provided people do not attempt to run a commercial operation and things are kept clean, no issues should arise.
 - As long as the owner can prove they have sufficient education regarding care of animals
 - Yes I think it is fine to have other animals
 - I've wanted hens for a very long time! They're lovely and I would love to have some :)
 - "Animals must be taken care of
- That is number 1
- Other than that nothing wrong with keeping alternative pets"
 - Hens are incredible, our friends outside city limits have them and they are so sweet
 - Keeping Hens is beneficial as long as they are cared for properly
 - I am open to explore whatever makes sense for local food security and sustainment
 - As long as you don't single out Pit bulls. The welfare of our animals is very important to me, all animals, specially pit bulls.
 - If hens are not a disturbance to neighbours (noise) and are properly being cared for (ie - fed and enclosure kept clean), and there was a limit on the number of hens.
 - As long as it does not create a noise or smell nuisance for neighbours

- As long as there were strict standards and strong enforcement to ensure the safety and happiness of the animals.
- But permits have to be made, and all neighbours affected by it have to agree
- As long as it meets all of the requirements it seems like it would be a fantastic idea.
- Include rules regarding noise and odour management
- Only small animals in small batches with complete support from neighbor's
- If the noise can be managed and the conditions suitable for the hens, it should be allowed
- Urban hens make nearly as much sense as urban gardens as long as they are not a nuisance within the community
- More hens please.
- As long as the person can properly care for the animal, I see no harm.
- Assuming the living conditions are acceptable for the livestock and don't interfere with neighbours.
- Livestock should be in health, more than fair, safe environments & this needs to be enforced/watched
- But no roosters
- So long as people are properly caring for the hens I see no issue with this.
- I think it would be beneficial for the community
- Many people are now thinking of livestock as pets
- If proper training was mandated for the animal (ie. understanding chickens and how a chicken cope works)
- Chickens also need a healthy environment to live in. If people in the city can't provide that, then they shouldn't be allowed to own chickens.
- As long as proper rules are followed, i see no reason this bylaw shouldn't be allowed.
- I would accept hens, provided they are properly cared for and numbers are limited. Other animals on a case by case basis. I would not like to live next door to a domestic zoo!
- Lots of barn animals can live happily in a responsible persons yard
- Hens should be allowed but only if the property size meets a certain standard. Some infill properties are so narrow that there is not adequate space from the sound or smell of those animals. Also, there should be restrictions on how close those animals cage can be to any neighbors house.
- I think this could be a very good thing, provided that excellent living standards are upheld and maintained.
- Limited numbers and size of the animals.
- I believe in this day and age of recalled food and sustainable living people should have the right to make healthier choices for their families as long as it isn't a nuisance to others.
- People should be allowed to have any farm/domestic animal as long as properly taken care of
- I agree with the statements above.
- hens a proven to reduce organic waste.
- Urban agriculture is a growing trend and I believe it can be done responsibly. Limit the number of hens, and no roosters.

- As long as the homeowner can prove a humane area for the animal.
- The idea has a good appeal, as long as done in a responsible way
- As long as you need neighbour's approval.
- Look at Detroit ; their economy crumbles and they allowed people to build farm land on empty lots.
- it is food for poor in this POOREST canadian city.
- Supporting the keeping of livestock within the city with Neighbour consent is a quality of life issue and should be allowed as long as owners are responsible animal owners.
- We need more farm to table animals in the world. It also benefits children with caretaking
- All animals if treated appropriately should be able to have an owner.
- The animals must be properly cared for and it must not disrupt neighbours (sound, smell).
- It bridges the two solitudes of urban - rural divide. Hens for eggs but not for slaughter. Household consumption and not sales, only exception being gifting to friends, neighbours, and relations.
- I think these are suitable key points
- I would be okay with hens, but I cannot imagine what "other livestock " would be.
- Helping the family financially
- Animals should be kept in good health condition and not become a health hazard for neighbors and neighboring pets.
- We saw good and working models in England and in Nova Scotia. So better late than never dear Calgary.
- People should have livestock if and only if they can provide a safe happy environment
- chickens in the city don't bother me, as long as they are safe, looked after and contained in humane ways
- Yes
- Everyone benefits from chickens. If properly kept they don't smell and are relatively quiet.
- Na
- if everyone is safe and sanitary who cares
- If neighbours don't object and suitable husbandry practices are achievable there should be no reason to prohibit livestock. Suitable does not mean minimum. If only minimum care requirements can be met it shouldn't be allowed inside Calgary. Good to excellent standards of care should be required. This should deter nuisance owners.
- I would support this only for properties with large yards. I would not support livestock in new communities with small yards.
- My worry is that it would be extremely difficult to evaluate what is acceptable living conditions.
- There are several animals that are therapy pets.
- I absolutely support having urban hens allowed and I understand and respect the need for neighbors to potentially agree, but sadly neighbors who don't get along will never get this opportunity so it should weigh in but not be a deciding factor.
- I think as long as neighbours are consulted as this could directly affect them and that the owners are responsible for their animals and care for them appropriately then it's fine by me. I think there should be a process to assess whether the animal owner are apt and knowledgeable in animal care prior to allowing it.

- Hens provide positive benefits to the owners and community.
- As long as there are proper housing structures, consent from direct next door neighbours and safe living conditions for the animal, the city should have no reason to intervene.
- Hens are a good way in adding to a persons ability to be self sufficient. People plant gardens for the same reason.
- I absolutely think that with rules for noise and smell hens should be allowed in Calgary! It's about sustainable and accessible food!
- It allows for sustainable living
- We should have the option to have a up to max number of each kind. For example - 1-3 goats or sheep up to 10 chickens.
- Support from neighbours for chickens should not be necessary. They are quieter and less of a nuisance than dogs, and nobody is currently asking the neighbours if it's okay to own a dog. Or a roaming cat for that matter.
- Harmless animals should be allowed. Chickens for example are known to be therapeutic in some cases.
- Not sure how I feel about it , but definitely not something commercial.
- Positive impact !
- Only if the above conditions are met
- backyard animals are okay with me
- Anyone wanting to have livestock in the city limits should go through an information session to be aware of the pros and cons of owning livestock.
- Suitable living conditions must be shown, a specialist in livestock management should approve. maintenance of facility should be reviewed regularly
- provided they keep the smell to a minimum.
- I think livestock would improve our living conditions significantly
- why not? as long as it does not result in danger or disturbance.
- I am okay with it
- There needs to be very specific rules and bylaws involved to ensure the hens are of good health and well being
- I support the option to keep hens or other livestock for positive community impact, whether that is a local community or larger.
- Yes chickens are a valuable resource
- As long as the animal is well taken care of I have no problem with hens being in the city
- It is critical for neighbour support to be considered given the potential for noise issues.
- Why not, it's your property
- As long as it does not disturb the peace and the waste is managed properly.

- People should be allowed to have bees, chickens and even goats! Need more farm to table opportunities.
- This can be beneficial in keeping money in the community/Calgary area by providing food items.
- Safe conditions should be considered for any animal
- As long as proper research and preparation is done beforehand and there is appropriate accommodations for the livestock, it sounds beneficial
- I believe that in some cases people could raise livestock without interfering with others. Again on a case to case based....people have a love for different animals
- Not everyone can live on an acreage so why not allow certain livestock, within reason of space and if the living conditions of the livestock is approved
- (Under the assumption that everyone will take good care of the hens, and that the City will talk to animal experts as to what the minimum space requirements are for 'x' number of hens to live HAPPILY), I am in full support of the City permitting hens, they are endearing animals and I think it will prompt more education as to how our food is made and where it comes from. My only concern is that if a chick (whether bought or somehow hatched) turns out to be a rooster, that it is NOT euthanized. If the owners decide to kill it for meat, so be it, but it should not be killed simply for being a rooster, and the rooster should be relocated to a shelter or sanctuary. Also, cockfighting and any other sort of animal abuse should be at the very least heavily fined AND the animals relocated to a trusted owner such as a sanctuary.
- it is a great idea so long as appropriate guidelines for care are in place
- If there are sufficient regulations in place to govern the wellbeing of the livestock, I would absolutely be in support of anyone having livestock of their choosing on their own property.
- I want to have more stability in my home by producing my own food.
- Feels more natural and humane than keeping chickens in pens. People would have to take care of their chickens if they wanted success.
- Because why not!
- With restrictions. Amount of chickens and cleanliness rules to follow. No roosters pls.
- Animals can improve ecosystems
- If chickens can be kept then there are other animals that need to be considered as well as the criteria for keeping them.
- Backyard chickens can be very beneficial to the community
- This could be beneficial to the city
- Urban livestock allows people to get involved in sustainable eating habits that connect them to the earth and its animals. The benefit to owners and the community largely outweighs the risks to the city.
- Significant benefit to urban farming (bees, chickens,etc) and some livestock (ex: pigs) make wonderful household pets
- They should have to apply for a permit to own chickens/hens etc.
- If neighbours are supportive and the animals are properly cared for, there is no reason not to.

- I think as long as the animals are cared for properly that it would be nice to have urban hens and other livestock potentially. I wouldn't not want to live close to any livestock that was particularly noisy though
- a course on chicken care should be required prior to ownership.
- provided they are adequately cared for and responsibly owned I don't see a lot of downside to this.
- People should be able to have hens to lay eggs for food for themselves or share as they see fit
- Chickens should be permitted
- As long as the animals are cared for I do not see a problem with people owning livestock on their property.
- I would LOVE to keep hens and fully support this!
- This is an excellent community initiative to create self-sufficiency on obtaining food locally.
- I would prefer to live next to chicken "noises" than to marijuana smoke smells; only one of these is currently legal.
- Chicken's aren't any louder than a dog or other bird so I think they should be allowed. They're friendly animals and can make a nice pet plus gives you eggs.
- If owner's are responsible, have adequate space and the ability to care for such animals in the city, I don't see why not.
- Let them have chickens
- Only if this is disclosed when buying a new house
- Yes
- As long as the above criteria are consistently followed! Reports of abuse to be immediately addressed.
- I cannot think of a reason to not allow hens. Allowing people the ability to harvest their own food is a no brainer
- Backyard beekeeping is important for the promotion of pollinators and community education around ecology and the importance of sustainable naturalization projects. Backyard hen's are a great community project that brings neighbours together and sustains local needs for food. Many other municipalities have allowed them without issue.
- It might be beneficial to have hens in the city
- animals if cared for humanly and are checked by vet visits and the enforcement officers there shouldn't be an issue
- As long as it doesn't bother anyone and animals cared for why not
- Hens sound like a great addition to neighborhoods
- Nikki Pike
- Making a sustainable urban living can help to increase physiological and mental health. Also, it can help to reduce the dependency on social program for balanced meals.
- Why not? Really, why not? They can produce not only food for the owner but in this down economy, could potentially become a potential semi income
- It's worked elsewhere. Why not?

- Though it really depends on the animal - and the purpose for keeping the animal. I would not support urban livestock for slaughter.
- Live stock animals that sustain ones personal food chain while providing the stock also provides a secondary function such as pest control. Chickens are an excellent example of such a situation.
- Who doesn't like hens
- As long as the animals are properly maintained and cared for, as well as vetted for illness, there shouldn't be any issues.
- With city approval of space and care plan. Random/ periodic animal Welfare checks.
- people should be allowed to have hens in their properties only if they have a proper enclosure and they are protected from the elements and the harsh Canadian winters
- I think you should be able to have your own livestock.
- I know people that live outside the city with a fainting goat as a support animal and that goat is as cute and sweet as can be. Plus you allow people to have snakes and tarantulas, so what is wrong with a few farm animals? Common sense should obviously be used when reviewing these - small property and cow equals not plausible or sound.
- Personal livestock will help with global warming.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and the neighbours approve I think this is a positive step
- There are plenty of ways humans and quiet livestock can coexist.
- As long as the animals are kept in small enough numbers to not be crowded and destructive to the environment, any person who can keep proper care should be able to add that benefit to their lifestyle.
- I think that hens are a great idea. They offer a lot of benefits without a lot of fuss. Other small animals could be considered as well
- I support the balanced needs that are met.
- Never heard anything about phase 1. If paying a lincnse think City should be in touch with all to have input
- Responsible pet ownership, including livestock, should always be encouraged.
- As long as animals can be properly cared for and not disturbing neighbours.
- It does not matter what type of animal it is, it should be allowed within city limits as long as the surrounding neighbors are ok with it.
- Limited animals with appropriate housing condition. So not pigs sheep and such all crammed in a hen house
- humans have always kept small livestock in urban centers
- I support urban hens but believe quantity of hens to be limited, as well as by-laws to control noise and odour of hens
- I support hens at a small amount but anything over size like doneys horses etc are not suited for a small yard like calagary that isnt over 1 acre. So in my thoughts hens yes or if its a emtional support animal then yes. But other wise large livestock isnt ment for the city.

- I believe it's fair to have neighbour input, but to also have the availability to create a self sustaining environment with animals and animal byproducts within your domicile and property.
- Chickens have no place in a city
- I think that the requirement of 4 adjacent neighbours would be beneficial, but can see the benefit and joy of this hobby.
- If you want to farm chickens for eggs i think it should be allowed
- Hens have many benefits, eggs, compost and they are a true joy to keep
- I know tons of people who have "emotional support chickens" simply because they want fresh eggs. Put a limit on it and allow it. Let us provide our own food!!
- Because who doesn't like fresh eggs.
- Love chickens!
- As long as it is not bothering your community I think it is ok
- People should be allowed whatever animals they choose on their property, within safe boundaries of what's best for the animal.
- Neighbor approval should be mandatory
- I support people owning urban hens
- I think there are certain livestock that can be fairly easily accommodated in the city and provide some sort of benefit
- Maybe is my answer. While it could be a good project, no dog breed should suffer for it.
- I think with responsible ownership and accountability as long as the animal has proper care and is not a nuance to adjacent neighbors then what would be the harm?
- Domestic livestock is fine if smells and sounds are acceptable to neighbours.
- No explanation needed. If u want a chicken full send.
- Urban hens are an asset.
- Hens and chickens that are properly contained should be acceptable
- I think that responsible guardianship will need to be monitored.
- Small animals that can be used to supplement food in a household should be allowed
- Hens are rad.
- As long as they do not create odour or excessive noise, and are kept in good conditions I see no problem living near chickens
- Hens would be a great idea for Calgarians provided that their living conditions are well-maintained.
- stop breed specific blaming!
- If properly and responsibly housed and cared for some livestock could bring value to people even in the city (mental, emotional, and economics benefits)
- As long as they are well kept and cared for, I don't see anything wrong with it.
- I agree with positive impact to whom ever owns the animals as long as they are living a good life and are not in any danger or in bad living conditions
- With support from adjacent neighbours
- People like raising animals but don't live on a farm. Great idea.

- ...
- Livestock, within reason, should be welcomed in the City of Calgary. Specific guidelines in place should protect both the livestock and city residents
- We need more chickens.
- Sustainability and independence
- I support responsible hen owners
- The wellbeing of the animal is of utmost importance, and that includes a healthy environment surrounding it. Upsetting community leads to animal abuse (see Canmore Alberta, last ~10 years, show roosters 'kidnapped' for disturbing the peace..)
- Must have some noise management but urban hens are a great idea
- Hens yes; Roosters no
- Hens and other livestock are a pleasant and sustainable activity if managed correctly.
- Agreed it is time to review and potentially allow this.
- As long as they're being well taken care of people should be allowed to have live stock as pets.
- I have concern about it being unpleasant for neighbours, but if this is managed it's a great way to add something to a community and offering an alternative food source.
- Certain livestock depending on the property and proper care i feel is beneficial
- If the animals are in a well kept area and the space and yard is to their needs I feel livestock in limits should be allowed.
- Chicken ownership is happening in Edmonton, and so far there have been very few negative instances.
- As long as the pet does not pose a threat to the community, is in safe and a habitable environment to live with the best of care and does not belong in the wild (such as a bear, wild cat, coyote, etc.) it should be fine.
- annual inspection/approval required
- Yes as long as the animals are cared for
- Must be approved by at least neighbors on either side. Also, should be made aware to new homebuyers when looking to purchase an adjacent home.
- The city bylaws are outdated.
- Neighbours must be able to rescind acceptance if the presence of the livestock proves problematic
- More modern approach
- as long as proper space is provided for livestock animal
- It would be beneficial to the community.
- Animals need to be properly respected for their well being. Also neighbours need to be okay with it
- If it can be deemed a benefit to the community it should be able to be seen as an option
- Self sufficient nutrition is excellent for the environment and a closer connection to animals will hopefully lead to a more thorough understanding of the life to food process in the average citizen.
- Providing conditions are sanitary and adequate space, water food, light, heat are provided for the animal, human being have a right to keep their own animals for food as we always have done.

- Direct rules are necessary to keep the peace
- Food!!!!
- Also would depend on yard size. And noise.
- Hens are dope
- As long as the animals are secure and there is support from neighbours ,why not
- Provided adjacent neighbours are supportive, and it is limited to things like laying hens that are properly housed, I see no issue. Please include a No Roosters allowed in the bylaw though!
- Giving people the option to have hens for eggs and being somewhat self sustained is great. Some sort of permit should be required to do so. And approval should depend on the quality of housing in which the owner can provide for said animal
- I like the idea of a case by case basis where the neighbours are mailed their own documents to share how they feel, and the living standards for the animal are met.
- They should be sure the livestock will be safe
- Yes if all care and cleaning aspects are met
- Allow miniature horses under this bylaw. They make awesome pets and therapy animals.
- Animals are just not cats and dogs but I think there is a reasonableness clause that needs to be considered. For example a horse living in a condo
- I believe that they should have to get something in writing agreeing to ownership and permission from ALL neighbours directly located beside their residence prior to owning livestock in closed quarters (such as a city residence) Especially since most places do not even permit clothes lines anymore.
- Would be okay with having backyard chickens
- Not opposed
- More and more people want access to local or homegrown food sources. Allowing for hens provides opportunity for fresh eggs. Would like to see this allowed with rules such as licenses, coop plan approval and number of hens limit.
- I don't know a lot about hens but I believe what goes on in other peoples backyard is none of my business. However I wish to not be responsible for accident or injury to their escaped livestock.
- I fully support allowing urban hens and other livestock within the city of Calgary, as long as licensure is required and minimal care requirements are enforced. I believe licensure would make it easier for the city to ensure that these animals are receiving proper husbandry.
- I think this can be a great thing for others but it's definitely not for anyone and everyone. Responsible owners that can provide good quality life for the farm type animals.
- People should be allowed to have livestock so long as they can properly take care of them and neighbours have no objection.
- It is fine to have hens, roosters, pot bellied pigs, ponies, small goats, reptiles, mini horses or other livestock in the city. If they are taken good care of they should be welcomed. Some city lots are huge and could support full sized horses, like some properties in Spring Bank. People should be allowed to have these types of pets if they are taken care of.
- "Let's have the whole NE smell like a barn.
- Awesome."

- Animals are family.
- Has to be on a case by case basis. Neighbourhood support is essential in a urban setting.
- It adds a fun and diverse element to communities.
- Look, the economy is tanking, anything that enables people to provide sustenance for themselves is a great idea as long as they are responsible
- People should be able to own hens
- Hens can be amazing pets to care for. They provide eggs and all have many differing personalities that can be explored. Teaches children the value of work and an animals trust.
- However adjacent neighbors shouldn't have any power of persuasion. It's not their property or life. They should have ability to complain if warranted and the city can investigate.
- I don't see an issue with having urban hens if they are given a suitable living space and used for eggs and educational purposes.
- I don't really think there's anything wrong with hens? What's the worst outcome of them?
- Some livestock, while unusual are great pets. My cousin has an affinity for pigs. She would prefer living in city for work, but is not prepared to give up her pets.
- Hens I support if taken care of properly
- Responsible ownership and support for welfare of all animals should form the basis of regulations regardless of the animal
- Backyard chickens pose little risk to other animals, if maintained correctly. As long as no roosters are kept, they should not cause major problems.
- I would support with strong regulations and notifications to neighbours to allow for input.
- Why not? As long as the livestock is safe, has proper space and is adequately cared for.
- As long as the animals are taken care of
- CHICKENS!
- Backyard chickens would be amazing.
- Livestock is essential to providing for one's self and in the current situation of society i find it beneficial.
- It's kind of nuts that we don't allow hens. Please no roosters. OMG please no crowing all night!!!
- Friends in the type if animals
- I would love to have a chicken or two.
- As long as it is managed properly it should not have a negative effect on other citizens
- The designation of "pet" should not only be reserved to dogs and cats, small animals such rabbits and hens can provide the same human - animal bond.
- Sustainability is everything these days and being able to have livestock that is housed probably within these restrictions allows individuals who live sustainable lifestyles to make further improvements to their quality of life
- Hens aren't as loud or smelly as some people think. Many people in Calgary have ample space to sustain chickens so why not allow then the opportunity to have some if they wish?
- "The only thing I care about is:

- Wellness of the animal
 - Noise, if i remember right, roosters are noise and annoying."
 - I believe this should only be considered if the lot size is adequate. However, the majority of the newer neighborhoods are smaller than a postage size lot. So in that case no I would not support it.
 - I agree with the bullet points above therefore I am for it as long as those conditions were met.
 - ONLY if living conditions are adequate.
 - Neighbours should be in support of your new livestock
 - As long as the livestock animal in questions isn't a nuisance to the community and is properly cared for like any pet, I see no reason to disallow these kind of animals in the city.
 - As long as these animals are in a large, safe space that can cater to its needs and the animals are fully cared for, it sounds wonderful.
 - I am not knowledgable enough on the benefits of farming inner city. However, I do not have any reason to believe that it would be fair to say no in this case. So long as neighbours agree, and the proper regulations are in place, it sounds like a wonderful opportunity for those ready to handle it properly.
 - Other animals are fine.
 - Why not?
 - I think urban farming is a great idea if done properly, allowing people to more easily provide for their friends and family is beneficial.
 - You do you, boo. If they respect my space and it doesn't affect me negatively I've got no problems.
 - Hens are a good idea
 - "I just really love chickens.
- Also, people benefit emotionally and psychological when near animals, so having some that are potentially more accessible or can be viewed by the public might benefit mental health."
 - As long as the hens stay in the yard of the owner I'm ok with it.
 - As long as they are not a nuisance. Noise & smell would be my biggest concern.
 - On a case by case basis, small livestock within city limits is not an issue as long as they are getting adequate care.
 - As long as they are properly cared for and the neighbourhood isn't being inconvenienced, then it seems fine.
 - I think this will help the economic situation for many Calgarians; it is also a very sustainable practice.
 - This is a great way to help promote self sustaining healthy living.
 - I feel that as long as bylaws are explicit about appropriate cleanliness and neighbor engagement being included, it could be supported
 - Hens are quiet and as long as they are taken care of by the owners Nd the neighbours are in support I think it is a good idea
 - Please no roosters. I support calgarians being able to utilize their property for food.

- All animals deserve homes
- Bring diversity to our communities and give people the opportunity to raise their own food sources
- This would be a good idea for therapy animals
- Especially hens so people can lay their own eggs instead buying them from the supermarket
- I support this as long as the animal is safe healthy and has a proper living environment
- As long as the overall well being of the animal, including living condition need to be met.
- I caution against having "support of adjacent neighbors" as a criteria, this gets into really mucky and unfair territory, especially if people are just being bitchy due to a dislike.
- As long as bylaw is required to inspect premises yearly
- As long as they are not a nuisance to neighbours there should be no issue
- "Due to the wide variety of animals,
- Noise complaints, cleanliness, odours could be issues that would not be considered"
- As long as it doesn't open the door for other livestock type animals.
- Absolutely! Urban hens are excellent pets, help connect individuals with their food and environment, and help further the goal of having a well fed, sustainable city. A potential expansion to this bylaw that I feel might be warranted is allowing for urban hens and urban laying ducks. It is little known outside the agricultural community, but ducks in small flocks have fewer health issues, more cold tolerance, and a longer productive life than do laying chickens, all the while laying just as many eggs.
- "Sanitary issues should be addressed as fowl carry many diseases
- Have no impact on wildlife
- Limit what animals can be kept"
- I don't think people keeping hens would bother me. So long as there are rules and regulations in place including some sort of a noise restriction on these animals I'm for it.
- I absolutely support urban hens and other livestock (goats or sheep). Especially in times of economic hardship, allowing people to raise a sustainable, inexpensive protein is a responsible decision. Especially given success of similar programs in Red Deer and Edmonton.
- (Proper) Care of animals had been repeatedly shown to be a net benefit for individuals and communities. Exceptions made on a case by case basis, while more expensive, would result in higher levels of compliance and satisfaction.
- Chickens are absolutely wonderful additions to an ecosystem! Anyone gardening could benefit, and it would allow so much potential for local-food production.
- Keeping hens for eggs is a much better option than the factory settings that keep thousands of chickens in questionable living conditions.
- As long as populations of hens aren't put at risk, and the people of Calgary don't suffer for any reason.
- Chickens are cool with me
- With responsible ownership, good things can happen
- I agree with outline above

- Livestock can make good pets.
- If there is adequate space on a property and neighbors are on board, a goat to mow the lawn and fresh laid eggs could add to quality of life. Again, as long as the animals are humanely cared for.
- I have no issue if this has a positive impact.
- Only to ensure the well being and proper care of the animal(s)
- Be responsible and there shouldn't be an issue.
- Bees
- There's no reason not to expand this if it can be done responsibly - livestock animals can be beautiful parts of life!
- Great idea!
- Livestock are not any more annoying than regular pets. If the owner can meet all criteria then I don't care if its a dog living next to me or a steer.
- Hens are great; they help control slugs, bugs and ticks. They do not need a lot of space. Keeping a small number should not increase smell, or noise. They provide food and fun for people, and it is important to have options that are sustainable and educational. Imagine children experiencing hatching and caring for a chick, raising it to a hen, then gathering eggs from it. Maybe we will be able to address food security with amendments like these. Other small livestock can also be educational and fun. Some people keep smaller livestock as pets, with additional benefits of eggs, milk, wool, etc. I think it is important to make sure people are well educated on the livestock in question. Maybe make a short online course mandatory before they can be allowed. But I think this is wonderful.
- As long as people are responsible pet owners I see no reason not to have chickens
- Hens (if cared for properly and efficiently and ethically) make great ways to feed a family and save money purchasing eggs and egg products.
- So many people In Calgary have chicken coops and other livestock. Being able to live off of your own food from your own garden and animals should absolutely be encouraged and allowed. Those who don't provide humane environments or are ill-equipped to handle them should be exceptions on a case by case basis. I'd take livestock over yappy, annoying dogs that don't stop barking any day.
- I can't see how this wouldn't require strict regulations. People start things with the best of intentions but don't necessarily think of the long-term. This can create an unhealthy environment for animals and a disgusting environment for neighbors. I like the idea and have considered it myself but For me it lacks a certain sustainability in a city with such unpredictable weather.
- if people can properly care for their animals I feel they should have every right to take care of them.
- As long as it is safe for the hens
- Hens are a great animal to keep around as long as people keep up with their demands and care. Would like regular check ups to make sure people do not have more than the legal amount of hens.
- As long as protection laws are in place to protect the animals from abuse and neglect. Stricter laws need to Be in place to protect current pets before we should allow other live animals
- If people are going to care for the livestock properly, then it doesn't bother me, and it shouldn't impact me if amended.

- Hens should only be allowed on private property
- As long as the goal is to provide a safe environment for the animal
- Need to be managed effectively and not be a nuisance.
- If a homeowner has adequate space, they should have the right to own livestock under certain conditions within the city.
- Provided accurate care and housing by the owner
- Hens can live good lives in a city under the right circumstances and I think it would be good for Calgarians to have that option
- I think having a size and/or number restriction is reasonable, as well as proper living conditions.
- "Sustainable food is a good thing.

- Also this survey is very confusing and questions are not worded clearly. I think this will be reflected in your survey results."
- The only issue with this is attraction for other wildlife such as coyotes in neighborhoods.
- As long suitable conditions are provided and kept clean, why not have livestock
- I would support the hens with appropriate restrictions etc. Other livestock becomes tricky and not sure that it makes sense given yard sizes.
- "case by case with reference to the health and wellness of neighbors and animals involved.

- On #7, I know nothing about how many pigeons is healthy for the coop. This should be decided by people who know more about these animals"
- Think it's great having animals in unsuspecting areas. Brings more life to the city
- We would definitely get hens once approval is given.
- A few chickens power household would be great. Adhere to noise bylaws and keeping pens clean and humane
- Emphasis on suitable living conditions and cleanliness
- I think there could be many benefits for allowing some people to keep hens. The main issue is if people aren't responsible and create messes, noise issues, etc.. but as long as there is recourse for neighbors who are bothered, I think this is a good idea.
- The bylaw should except roosters.
- Who doesn't want fresh eggs in the morning. Along with people being able to throw them at cars that speed through neighborhoods
- I like chickens.
- I have always thought you should be able to own a hen in the city. I think we should be able to have them on single home property as long as the hen is quite and cared for
- I have no opinion on this.
- As long as all laws are followed, certain livestock is okay in the city.

- Yes I want a Billy Goat, a Horse and a Donkey.
- Knowledge is always good
- I don't care I'm only here to protest your [removed][removed] idea of singling out pit bulls
- As long as the neighbours don't have a problem with the animals and the owner of said animals are responsible and take proper care of their animals, and the land lot is spacious.
- I believe hens and certain livestock would have a positive impact to communities - upon approval to house them / property inspection of the conditions or area the hens or livestock would live.
- People should be permitted to provide a humane environment for hens they use for egg production or a pet if they like. Wonderful alternative to factory farming environments & an affordable option for fresh cage free eggs which are quite expensive in store.
- Only in places where it's a house NOT in apartments or townhomes or shared living. Suitable pen is a must for hens.
- As long as agreed upon by neighbours and noise level is kept down.
- For two reasons. For consumption/food, I would argue that local agriculture and food security is important. But most importantly, we need to stop considering farm animals as livestock and less than other pets, like cats and dogs. This is a form of speciesism, placing higher value on one living being over another. There is no difference between a goat and a dog, or a budgee or a chicken, a cat or a pig. They are all equal and should not be treated like property for us to own and exploit. When people profit from animals, the animals' welfare is never a priority.
- Livestock provide many benefits to families.
- I believe we can safely have urban hens and other livestock.
- This does not affect me in any way. I have no valuable opinion about hens.
- Food security
- As long as the animals are being well taken care of and the neighbour's cock doesn't wake me up at 530 every morning.
- Great opportunity for all
- Urban hens support local, sustainable food initiatives
- As long as the animals are well taken care of and are not negatively affecting the city I don't see any problems.
- I believe that as long as the animals have the appropriate space and are being properly taken care of, the species is irrelevant.
- Would have to be agreed to by adjacent neighbours.
- So long as the hens are well taken care of and do not cause a disturbance in the way of either noise or more importantly smell (Rural friends of mine own dozens of hens and they smell a great deal), I see no problems.
- I want chickens. And a pig. Maybe a goat (lawn mower)... and an emu!!
- There is a cleanliness aspect that needs to be dealt with
- Neat idea to have hens

- Allowing urban hens and other livestock in Calgary is a win for small businesses, our economy, our local product production, and for reducing our ecological footprint.
 - What about renters & landlords, and those living in condos or townhouses, perhaps wanting livestock on balconies?
 - Don't care what people do with their pets as long as it doesn't impact their neighbors.
 - I have no issue with livestock within city limits if they can be provided suitable living conditions.
 - I think having chickens in a great living environment in the city would be a fantastic idea.
 - I feel like having a suitable home for certain animals would be beneficial to them.
 - Other places do this and as long as the animals are being treated well
 - I think it would be great to make Calgary a more sustainable city. Covid really showed how much we need to work on this
 - If an individual meets all of the following criteria above and has support from their adjacent neighbours and their livestock will not be disruptive to other neighbours, then go for it.
 - requires approval of bordering properties
 - Bring more life to the community
 - Seems like a good idea as long as the criteria in the bullet points above is adhered to
 - Let people live their life through free choice. This is a waste of your time and mine.
 - I would love to have some chickens for sustainable food
 - Providing that the having of said animals does not impact on me. Smelly chicken coops, loud roosters crowing at 430am, animals escaping into my yard..An urban environment is not a place for barn animals.
 - Opportunity for broader access to fresh foods, reduced pesticides use, control of invasive invertebrate and plant species.
 - I'm not keen on having chickens in a neighbors yard
 - With proper care and education it is beneficial to everyone
 - Urban hens and livestock - as long as they were properly cared for and had appropriate conditions to live and did not create a negative impact on communities or neighbors would be a valuable resource for owners
 - Hens, quail, rabbits and other small livestock all seem appropriate where suitable conditions exist.
 - As long as the community benefits and the health of the hens is looked after it is a win/ win situation.
 - As long as direct neighbours are ok with hens. Then why not ?
 - "I support urban livestock,as i believe the benefits outweigh the drawbacks.
- However, i do believe that adjacent neighbours should get to veto/approve this."
 - If neighbours don't mind then no problem as they would be the ones complaining in the first place
 - A few chickens is fine (5 or 6) but a case for case basis is best for other animals.
 - To benefit the community

- I think have a hen or two to supply food for a family should be acceptable if they have neighbors okay and they are taken care of properly
- It would be beneficial for mental health
- Personal live stock would be helpful to pollution.
- Allowing responsible ownership of livestock is essential for the well being of many.
- Again. Letting us do what we please on our property with little govt intrusion is best.
- If the animal can be properly cared for people should be allowed to own what they want
- supporting the ability for people to become more self sustainable is never a bad thing.
- The property should have to apply and show how they will maintain and care for the coop without bothering any neighbour's. It should have to be inspected and approved by the city and only so many allowed per area of the city.
- Urban hens can be a great addition to a household/community, and urban livestock can be great depending on the species.
- food security and minimize our disconnect with the food system
- Small livestock, seeing it is properly cared for, would potentially be beneficial for more than just the keepers.
- As long as the yard was big enough for sufficient pens and coups and everything was kept clean so the smell didn't bother neighbours
- Suitable living conditions
- With a major condition that the animal is taken care of properly and as its own biology requires. In addition, the animal not be directly subjected to traffic, distressing sounds, unfit environment, unfit food, neglect, etc.
- As long as there is support from adjacent neighbours
- I want chickens!
- As long as there are rules in place to ensure the suitable living conditions of the animal..
- I like this idea as long as there are quality of life standards in place for animals and neighbours
- If neighbour support is given I see no problem in allowing chickens in the city
- Unsure what animals might be considered, so cannot really answer this.
- It makes sense to allow people to do what they want on their own property, as long as it isn't negatively impacting those around them.
- It must have ongoing support by neighbours - ie: if they become messy/noisy or otherwise a nuisance they should have to be removed without question.
- 100%. It's oppressive to prevent ethical hen ownership
- Yes I want chickens!
- I like eggs
- Not all support animals are dogs.
- This is a long time coming. I hope this change occurs.
- Self sufficiency and keeping livestock can be done effectively and is beneficial to communities and households.

- Based on 4 bullet points, there's no reason to not agree
- If it doesn't bother the neighbours and things like waste are dealt with properly it is a net benefit to be able to raise smaller livestock in the city limits.
- In the case of chickens, goats, rabbits I think this is acceptable. If they are in a safe environment have permission and have a positive impact ie goat chewing the grass down. Why not?
- Everyone should be aiming for local and sustainable ideas such as this.
- I struggle to see why ascertaining support from neighbours would be necessary for the ownership of hens, but not for the ownership of other animals (i.e. cats, dogs) that could also be a nuisance to neighbours that live in close proximity/in an urban setting. I do not support this aspect of the proposed amendment.
- Why not
- I wanted hens as a pet. Fresh eggs. A pet duck.
- I feel calgarians should be allowed to be more self sufficient in growing and harvesting their own food.
- I think chickens and other livestock are very different things. This needs to be addressed separately in the bylaw.
- As long as they stay in their space properly care for and are no offensive orders I am ok with it
- I support urban hens if they are well kept and not a disturbance.
- Providing the animals are well cared for.
- As long as the project was positive impact.
- People should be able to own whatever animal they want as long as it is not a nuisance.
- Yes people should be able to raise their own food
- I think the city could benefit from having a urban goat population. It would help with weeds specifically.
- Animals that are born to be wild and are wild as of now (i.e. foxes, squirrels, deer, etc.) unless they are in need of rehabilitation or unable to be realized back into the wild.
- Miniature goats and hens should be allowed, maybe pot belly pigs. Just keep up with proper care.
- To be more sustainable in our living backyard hens can play an important part of food security. They are far less of a nuisance than pigeons. The rules for both should be equal.
- I would like it for educational purposes also with the schools.
- Na
- This would enrich lives. Big yes from me
- A small amount of hens or livestock could be beneficial to persons wanting to sustain their own food sources, and diets.
- Growing one's own food is one of the most environmentally responsible things a person can do.
- People should be given the opportunity to explore urban farming.
- This works well in other countries so there should be no problem here if managed properly.
- Hens are helping support communities
- I support this.

- Chickens, goats and other small livestock can be beneficial to a neighbourhood.
- This amendment ensures that the livestock is living comfortably.
- We can sustainably live and if you have the support from your peers and the animals needs are met then I believe you are capable to raise livestock
- yes, as long as the animals are not mistreated and have the resources they need.
- I think it would be great to allow farm animals in the City as long as the living arrangement is appropriate for the animal. I think as a City we need to allow people do the things that bring them joy as long as they are not creating a large impact on others. Connection with animals and nature is very important and is therapeutic for some.
- As long as the animals are looked after and cleaned up after I don't see a problem.
- "Urban people are currently very disconnected from their food sources.
- However, no roosters!!"
- When having chickens on your property, as long as they are maintained properly, they produce eggs as well as manure for the gardens.
- If the animals are well cared for and aren't an issue for neighbours, then why not. What happens if the neighbours change their mind? Should be standards of care like in #7.
- If this is successful, there would need to be measures in place for animals to also be removed if not being taken care of properly. Fines should apply if certain requirements can't be adhered to by the owner, such as safe and humane management of animals, noise and smell issues, slaughtering practices, etc.
- Would be fun
- It would be beneficial to have your own chickens laying eggs. To an extent and not have too many in an enclosed yard.
- Considering things like eating cleaner (ie: close to home) reduces the environmental impact, I support this with consideration to the community.
- This would be very beneficial to citizens of Calgary.
- It's much better for the environment to raise our own food locally when we can. I would approve my neighbors having hens.
- Although I don't have a hen and don't need a therapy chicken, I support the movement. Having a few fresh eggs would be nice, too!
- N/A
- I'm all for this amendment. As long as livestock animals are provided with good living conditions and are cared for appropriately by the owners (including keeping them from free-roaming in the street), I would have no problem with chickens (and others) in my neighbourhood!
- The world is changing.. bylaws need to reflect current requests.
- Yes on a basis to basis as an emotional support animal comes in all different kinds but no if it is just to have
- I've always wanted to own a chicken. And also a hammerhead shark.
- As long as there were regulations as to number and type of animal and that the property was suitable

- yes approval should be given for the above Criteria
- They are no more of a nuisance than a neighbourhood dog or cat if they are cared for responsibly. Why are certain “pets” deemed ok and others not.
- No issue with hens at all, love the idea
- People should be allowed to do what they want in their own yard.
- Livestock must have appropriate lodgings and be agreed upon by all whom would be exposed.
- An urban hen bylaw would alleviate people from abusing the system saying their hen is a service animal when really they just want an urban hen
- I would love to have fresh eggs from my own hens. you make it very difficult to do this without a great deal of preparation and aforethought- so why not?
- Great idea
- Small livestock are acceptable and not a nuisance provided they have proper care and shelter.
- It would be great to have the ability to have your own eggs provided it was done in a safe and non-disruptive manner.
- I see no issue with urban hens/other urban livestock as long as the criteria stated above is met. Animals must have their needs met and be in suitable living conditions. Adjacent neighbours must be supportive of the presence of urban hens.
- Yes if neighbours approve on both sides and no roosters. The hens should be checked upon to ensure that suitable living conditions are being provided, especially in our cold weather.
- Love this idea, with support from adjacent neighbors
- I think having other livestock as pets could prove as a benefit (such as hens or a mini house-pig) to those who have allergies to cats and dogs.
- good for the environment
- Urban hens would be amazing an more affordable access to eggs and meat. And I completely support the idea of pet pigs, they are very intelligent creatures and can be very clean when properly house trained.
- I believe individuals should have the right to own animals that make their lives easier and help provide food
- Only if all neighbors are consulted and agree. Chickens can be noisy and could disrupt neighbors quite a few houses away
- As long as the hens have a proper coop and are comfortable and there is no environmental issues then why not ?
- Animals are animals. It's great we can help the livestock and our economy by having these programs. I believe that as long as the person responsible can show all of the above, then livestock should be allowed.
- I believe that nature balances urban living. With careful planning I believe this could work.
- Small back yard chicken coops are no issue if maintained.
- There are more support animals than dogs
- As long as the pens are kept clean I see no issue with this.

- As long as the animals are being properly cared for, in the correct living environment and not negatively impacting neighbors, I don't see an issue.
 - I think it's great that people want to own livestock. And it allows people from rural areas with livestock as pets to move to the city. (Pet pig/chicken/goat)
 - As long as animals are properly cared for I think we should be allowed most animals.
 - I feel people should have freedom to choose what they have in their yards. Within guide lines set forth above. Some livestock...like chickens provide eggs. Others companionship. Also great for childrens learning. Such as responsibility, education and lots more
 - Chickens and other small fowl or farm animals are not going to be a problem in the city as long as they're cared for responsibly.
 - As long as they are properly cared for and property is kept clean
 - I'm a huge supporter of people growing their own good in all manner. I do think the noise could be the biggest concern, and the safety of the animals(comfort and there are many coyotes in the city).
 - with adequate space and food, hens are easy to take care of
 - Neighbour consent is the main part of this. However, there should be something written in to allow for that consent to be revoked on specific criteria (like the person doesnt clean up after them properly and the smell is overwhelming, or other reasons)
 - No explanation just agreed with it.
 - It would be very positive to have livestock allowed in the city. If neighbours consent and an individual follows all bylaws/regulations, I can't see any issue with this.
 - Certain livestock can be great to have around, though winters in Calgary are hard and appropriate housing would be required.
 - As long as there is enough space to keep them it is fine.
 - As long as there is approval from neighbours and proper care of the hens, I don't see why this would be an issue.
 - As long as suitable living conditions and neighbors are agreeable.
 - Unless these animals will be killed for food.
 - As long as the proper regulations are put in place, I completely support urban hens.
 - It's a good idea to take into account both the animals and the neighbors.
 - As long as they are properly kept and aren't a noise issue, I don't see a problem
 - As long as the person who wants these animals can take care of them properly and safely for the animal and the community which needs to be reassessed over time
 - "Imagine the movie Chicken Run but set in the city. Amazing!"
- I actually don't care about this..."
 - Having hens in the community can help feed our communities in these dire times of unemployment.
 - With restrictions. Maybe a maximum number of animals. So to not have a farm next door.

- Seems reasonable, especially support from neighbours. Keep in mind chickens are loud and smell, so anyone affected by that should be included as well.
- N/A
- As long as they are in properties with a fenced yard, it's the owners business and none of mine
- I want a pet skunk. They can come deskunked (spray sacks removed).
- As long as the animal's needs are taken care of and the neighbours are fine with it there is no problem.
- This amendment should be allowed as long as the animals are provided suitable living conditions.
- I don't see it as a problem
- I think chickens can be a great addition to a yard/family.
- As long as the livestock is properly taken care of and stored, there is no reasonable reason to forbid other animals on a person's property.
- It would make for a more interesting neighbourhood
- All animals are dope and should be welcome.
- Only if there is also a requirement to obtain proper education in care of said livestock.
- As long as the animals are protected, live comfortably, safe and don't disturb neighbours too much
- Livestock can indeed be beneficial and urban livestock can help to address such issues as transportation of goods etc., but they can also introduce zoonotic pathogens and diseases into an environment so suitable living conditions and support from neighbours would ensure risks are mitigated and everyone is aware of the risks.
- I already grow my own vegetables, I would like my own ethical and clean source of eggs as well.
- Hens don't seem like they would pose a large threat or inconvenience on anyone.
- If cared for in a safe manner could be an asset to communities.
- "I do not support raising livestock in urban areas - if you want livestock you should be in a rural area
- The only exception I support is the LESA"
- It is a great idea to allow hobby hens kept in good conditions.
- I support the choice to have hens and livestock in urban yards, and I want a bylaw that permits livestock in the city but ensures the wellbeing of the livestock and consideration for neighbours.
- urban hens can contribute to food security, and there are many successful examples in practice in other major cities
- Chickens don't kill people
- I would love to have hens or ducks for eggs and natural pest control.
- It's 2020.
- Hens provide a renewable food source and can be kept more humanely by private citizens rather than big businesses.
- who doesnt love eggs?
- If the pandemic response has shown one thing, it is that we need to be more self-reliant for our food supply. Urban hens can help meet some of these needs.
- If there is a positive outcome, I would support this. But not if it becomes noisy, smelly etc.

- So long as the animals dont pose any danger or nuisance, they should be allowed.
- It is better for the planet, and a better life for the chickens than industrial egg farming. As long as the owners are responsible and keeping things clean and safe from coyotes/foxes, I see no down side.
- Hens are cool.
- N/a
- Require consent from neighbours.
- Provided that neighbours do not object and the animal is being care of properly I have no issue with this. How are pigeons not considered other livestock? I didn't even realize people had them in the city...
- I don't see an issue with having livestock within city limits if they have proper housing for them.
- As long as the hens are contained this shouldn't be an issue to others.
- There looks to be like a lot of benefits
- Limit the amount of farm animals that can be kept in city limits due to smell and noise.
- Backyard hens should be allowed in Calgary
- As long as there is suitable living conditions and neighbour support I don't find anything wrong with this decision.
- I love the idea of having fresh eggs and it is a great pest control
- Responsible Calgarians should be able to bid with these rules.
- As long as the animal, individual, neighbours and community needs are met and a balance is achieved between the desires of the individual and the capacity of the community.
- sounds reasonable
- Urban hens are undervalued - they do not take up a large amount of space and can produce eggs and meat - two important sources of protein in a cost-effective way. Other livestock would be acceptable depending on the size of the animal and the amount of space it has.
- Hens should be allowed
- all the chickens!!!!!! So good for people.
- It would depend on the animals allowed, how big and ho aloud they were and how smelly for the neighbours.
- I have no issue with responsible, ethical ownership of livestock in suitable areas
- As long as the neighbours are cool with it, why shouldn't people be allowed?
- As long as the animal has a proper living space within the home owners property then they should be allowed
- I am interested in having backyard hens.
- As long as the household had to check with neighboring houses and is very clear on the maintenance required with strict penalties if not maintained.
- Chickens are quieter than most dogs
- Particularly in the case of hens and potbellied pigs, there's no good reason why people should not be allowed to own them as long as the owner is providing adequate care, shelter and ensures any issues that might arise are not a nuisance to neighbors.

- I would love my own hens and have always wanted them. It's a great way for kids to understand where food come from as well.
- Food security via husbandry is a positive thing for all of us, provided that it is carried out responsibly and the rights of neighbours are respected.
- If someone wants a goat in theird backyard, why not!
- I want chickens so I can have my own eggs!
- As long as the animals have suitable living conditions and the neighbors aren't bothered by noise.
- Chickens are fine
- Why not? If they are well taken care of, there should be no issue. Fines for those who do not follow the by law.
- As long as its being followed up on and they also have to identify and pay for licenses for animals
- My concern would be on quality and aesthetics of hen housing on a property to be secure from predators, good husbandry practices to contain odor and not attract pests and to not be an eye-sore structure a neighbour is subjected to viewing from their home.
- As long as it's not for people to kill these animals for food. You cannot provide an animal with a nice living area, keep it happy, and then slaughter it for taste. Using hens for eggs only.
- I don't think anyone should be told they can't have any specific animal on there own property, but proper regulations should be in place to prevent failure on both side. For the safety of the animal and the owner.
- Self-sustainability is something we should be supporting
- It is cool and helps people respect where food is from
- Strong supporter of urban hens as long as they are cared for and not interfering with pleasant enjoyment of neighbours (house kept clean etc..). Would be great for community.
- Animals make people happy. More the merrier.
- thatd be awesome
- I support this criteria
- Bring on urban chickens!! Let's join the rest of sustainable/progressive cities around the WORLD
- As long as it does not cost me additional taxes.
- Creates sustainable living
- If it benefits everyone we should do it. But not at a sever cost
- I believe a person should be aloud to raise a reasonable amount of birds to supply their family with fresh food. As well as companionship. Bunny's are a great source of home grown meat and should also be allowed. Of course the enclosures need to be a sufficient size and need to be kept clean and sanitary.
- If you have a large enough space it could be nice to have other animals at home.
- With the consent of neighbours, this seems reasonable. "Community benefit and positive impact" is vague. The only potential downsides are noise or smell. However, neighbours would consent to the potential noise and cleanliness is a factor in suitable living conditions and responsible ownership so I see no downside.

- Sustainable living is sustainable living, as long as it doesn't become a problem for every one else
- I think most certainly livestock can be held in the city when done correctly. However, they should only be permitted in homes that have suitable yards/living space for them. So a person shouldn't be allowed a lamb in an apartment or something. I think as long as the law is well thought out and covers all basis, then it could be good for some back yard farmers.
- I like the idea because it would help more people to fend for themselves if need be. Also animal rearing has a lot to teach adults children everyone. And is a wonderful experience.
- Providing this livestock was not a nuisance or infringed on the communities abilities to enjoy their own living space.
- Fresh eggs and domestic "pet" livestock are no worse than dogs or kids
- So long as the neighbours are supportive and suitable living conditions can be met I believe this could be approved.
- A low maximum number allowed and as long as they are not noisy and oder is controlled.
- The criteria outlined seems realistic and responsible, provided everyone affected is on board. of course, how you define affected matters- would the neighbours 6 doors down be considered affected?
- As long as they are cared for and the neighbours support it, I'm behind it.
- If it is not a disturbance to neighbors, I would not mind livestock within the city.
- This would be great and allow the opportunity for people to be more sustainable.
- As long as the animals have an adequate space, not crowded and well contained, I'm OK with this.
- Each case is evaluated. And if a house effected by the animals is sold. There should be full disclosure.
- I think that this is a great idea! Giving people the ability to provide their own food for themselves is amazing! Also chickens make great therapy pets! Same with goats, sheep, cows, and pigs, although it's is much more difficult to suitably house these animals
- could benefit the community and city
- Great for the community.
- People should be able to have the means to produce their own food including eggs etc.
- Hens are of great benefit and can help provide eggs. This allows for families to be more sustainable and have fresh eggs. As well, some animals such as pigs make good house pets.
- You would have to get neighbour approval, but what happens when a neighbour changes and the new person says no? Is the case grandfathered? It seems unfair to make me listen to other peoples chickens or them to mine if one side of the fence does not like it. You can take a barking dog inside, but you cannot tell a chicken to be quiet.
- Urban hens are a wonderful addition to large cities around North America without issue.
- All animals should be welcome in the care of responsible humans
- Please allow hens in Calgary, I support Calgarians who want to grow/raise their own food
- As COVID-19 has shown us, our global food supply market is fragile. It's nice to know that we may someday be able to raise hens in our yards as a method of becoming self-sustainable.

- Especially now during a pandemic where people need to rely on affordable food options.
- It would be great to have some livestock to provide for ones household.
- I think this is great for children to learn from
- Neighbours should not have any input on what is done on private property, period. NIMBYism must be stopped in Calgary it is a social disease.
- A blanket no is too restrictive, however its case by case
- having chickens to rise for food or companionship is awesome.
- Yes, allowing for resident to have and care for smaller livestock such as hens can help that resident to save money on things such as eggs.
- agreed
- Every little bit helps. We not only get back to our roots and cleaner living, we support local businesses such as butchers, and granaries. Keep the money here!
- Only if the animal choice is reasonable. A chicken or miniature pig is a lot different than a miniature horse. Some animals are just not appropriate.
- Livestock within reason, like hens, can be pets, without being a nuisance
- If there is a benefit to the community and no harm to the animals, I would support this. If the situation begins to resemble farming and would result in killing of animals, I would not be in support.
- Chickens are awesome.
- I would say definitely yes, but you should need to have sound proof pens at night to be respectful to neighbors.
- As long as rules and standards are set regarding the care and treatment of these animals I think it is a fine idea. The support of surrounding neighbours is important.
- I think urban farming is okay. If we can do beehives in our back yards why not hen houses? We use to urban farm in Calgary in the 1950s. Why did it go away. As long as animals are cared for and the yards are adequate spaces. I do think you should be considerate and make you hen houses not an sore for your neighbours.
- This is something practiced all over the world and it's time Calgary caught up. This city was brought up on ranchers and livestock.
- Some small-scale urban livestock could be a benefit to the citizens of Calgary. However, it is important that any livestock does not negatively impact neighbours.
- as long as it doesn't effect others, why shouldn't people be able to partake in all the benefits of having more in their life.
- I agree
- As long as neighbours don't have an issue with it, people should be able to do what they want in their yard. This will be tricky though because chickens are very loud and noisy.
- I don't believe the hens need to have positive impact to the community so long as they aren't causing harm or nuisance.
- These animals can provide personal food / milk. As long as they are properly cared for with proper housing and kept clean.

- I would support this amendment as long as there are strict conditions that must be followed and are enforced.
- We should be allowed to take care of livestock with the criteria above included.
- The criteria above address the concerns with allowing livestock in residential areas.
- I think if people get approval from their neighbors and follow protocols to offer a safe environment for livestock animals that they should be allowed in the city. There are so many positives to this.
PLEASE DO THIS!!!!!!
- As long as the animals have good living conditions and aren't a nuisance to the community then I see nothing wrong with this
- If there is enough oversight and the neighbours are consulted, if the owner can prove that the animal will not be a nuisance and will be cared for properly it could work.
- If people can show that they can properly care for animals. And they have the space to do so, then I think it should be considered on a case by case basis.
- Local food is important. Many municipalities allow chickens, pet pigs or goats.
- The above criteria should cover the issues.
- Urban farming should be pushed.
- if anything provided a positive impact on the community or even an individual, it is the duty of the community to support it.
- Especially in uncertain times like this you should be encouraging and supporting people in providing for themselves. Additionally this could be the start to shutting down food industry business that treat animals inhumanity. Allowing people to provide their own eggs and chicken for themselves and their family and friends would reduce the need for these types of toxic industrial norms.
- Suitable, safe and healthy living conditions are a priority and will help support the other criteria.
- this could enable an increased amount of fresh, local, and lower-cost food products food to be available to communities and could also increase community engagement with neighbors.
- I've lived in other jurisdictions where chickens and livestock were permitted. If there is sufficient space on a property for a coop/pen and decent lifestyle, then they should be allowed.
- To each their own as long as it doesn't interfere with the noise bylaws
- Given that suitable living conditions are provided for the animal, Calgarians should be allowed to own hens/livestock
- With the support of neighbours and appropriate housing conditions for the animals there's no reason why they shouldn't be allowed.
- Unless it's a nuisance and the animals are contained, healthy, safe, and are in an appropriately sized enclosure, there should be no problem. ie. chickens are ok, large animals penned up - no.
- I have no issue with this
- Support from neighbours is highly subjective. Would encourage that the instead of 'support', a rapid assessment of any detrimental effects on neighbours should be done. One should be able to own livestock if it does not objectively detrimentally effect surrounding neighbours even if neighbours don't 'support' the operation.
- lots of benefits, as long as animals are properly cared for

- As long as the noise bylaw is followed with these animals. For instance I don't mind the idea of chickens but roosters are way too loud! Pigs aren't very loud either and can be great pets. Just for a couple examples.
- I like hens
- As long as the livestock are adequately cared for (clean enclosures, appropriate feed, disease-free), and the neighbors are aware & undisturbed (by noise, smell, waste, etc.), this is appropriate.
- Take into account the smell.
- Chickens are okay as long as they are being taken care of the
- I believe is having hens within city limits. And see where it goes with live stock.
- As long as an appropriate amount and living conditions for the hens are kept tidy and clean.
- If the animals are well cared for, and the neighbours are supportive, I am supportive of having hens and other livestock in the city. There may need to be a number limitation to ensure animals are still being well cared for and the neighbours are supportive; if for breeding, could allow temporary increase in population number while livestock grow to appropriate age to be re-homed.
- Let people do what they want.
- I think pigs should be allowed
- As long as neighbors can veto the decision I'm fine with it.
- If people want to keep livestock in Calgary, as long as they are not causing a disturbance I think that's fine.
- the responsible and ethical raising of urban hens should absolutely be supported
- YES
- Provided cleanliness rules are enforced
- I do not have a problem with livestock in the city given the above conditions. It has been successful in other municipalities
- I don't have a problem with livestock being kept in the city as long as living conditions allow for proper maintenance and upkeep of animals and enclosures
- I think it would be wonderful to have more fresh, local produce and means of caring for your property. I also think this could leave to amazing community involvement!
- I think animals are a way for Calgary to go greener. Goats mow the grass and eat weeds, which limits the use of gas or electric powered equipment.
- n/a
- Support the bylaw amendment with the understanding that neighbours have the opportunity to renege their support should the owner prove themselves incompetent.
- I think urban hens falls under the Calgary values put out in high level documents about increase local, resilience and environment sustainability
- Urban microfarms are a great way to emphasize green opportunities within the urban setting.
- I have no issue people keeping animals, as long as they are safe and well kept.
- Beneficial for community and individuals to be able to keep some limited livestock as long as they have the facilities and means of caring for them.

- I agree with this whole heartedly. Hens are great for eggs and meat, goats are great for milk and meat. So long as the bylaws above would be implemented approval from neighboring houses and proper living for the animals. I think it's a great idea.
- I believe is all criteria is met there would be no issues again as said person takes care of the hens or livestock with care.
- As long as there is property permitting the hens range
- Hens provide fresh eggs and also can teach responsibility when they are cared for in proper manner.
- All animals are good
- As long as it's fairly hygienic and all neighbours surrounding said property are on board.
- As long as there is community benefit and neighbour support I don't see why it would be an issue
- I believe there could be benefits, and if the situation fits then it would be okay. However, in order for individuals to have animals that potentially make a lot of noise and smell, I think there should also be a requirement that the individual has to have a certain amount of space for the animals in which could lessen the noise and smell for neighbours. Also, maybe in order to be allowed to bring these animals to their house, they must contact the closest neighbours and have them give their consent for the noise and smell that may or may not be present with the animals.
- As long as this amendment to the bylaw offers a safer environment for livestock and a beneficial outcome for all parties, I will agree to it.
- Solving problems by introducing ecological solutions sounds like a good idea to me. Plus, it also could allow income supplementation (selling eggs, goats milk, etc)
- No explanation needed
- No roosters or pigeons
- Yes, under the condition that their welfare is protected by Peace Officers, just as domestic pets in Calgary.
- All sorts of dogs need homes
- Yes, but only if it isn't a nuisance. Urban hens, ok. Roosters crowing their lungs out at 5am, no thanks.
- The definition of an emotional supprt animal is growing, people can bond with more then a cat or dog and rely on that relationship for support. I would therefore support animals such as hens and pot bellied bigs to be able to live in a household.
- As long as the animals are being cared for and have the appropriate environment i don't see why not.
- Hens are good
- Urban agriculture is being done in several other Canadian cities very successfully. Calgary is behind on this.
- It is very important to ensure that the animals are safe, and that the community is okay with having the hens there. Neighbours being the most important as they are directly impacted
- I think small scale urban farming is generally beneficial as long as their is appropriate support from the community and the needs of the animal are met in a humane manner.

- I think having hens is a great way to provide for a family, what I think should be considered in the bylaw is the cleanliness, smell and living conditions of livestock. I would not want a rooster next door as an example, or to live next to a literal pig pen in a suburban setting.
- I think it's a great way to make Calgary more self-sustaining.
- "Approved living quadrants, enough space for them and ensure neighbours are okay with it
- Make sure owners know what they are doing. Education before approved to have hens"
- people should be able to have whatever pets they want. As long as its safe for the animals and people.
- If the animal is cared for properly.
- I realize some people have animals such as a pig or mini horse as companion animals, and as long as the property is large enough to sustain the need of such animals and the animal waste is disposed of effectively, and if person is a renter the landlord should be able to control what animals the renter brings to the property.
- I am allergic to some animals, so I'd like to say, but overall it would be great for many people to have a goat or sheep for milk and wool plus clipping the lawn, etc, hens for eggs, that sort of thing.
- Hens are a great backyard / urban pet that are good for morale and the community!
- There is a benefit to allowing certain livestock, ie. chickens, in that people are able to produce their own food, as long as their property is kept clean and noise bylaws are adhered to it should be encouraged.
- case by case. some people are just awful neighbours - whether it be the hen owners or their neighbours. Perhaps an assessment process also
- I think having proper assessment and an application process in determining the requirements for housing hens, keeping their health and safety in mind as well as the property and neighbour considerations, would be a great addition to the city.
- As long as the animals were in suitable housing and provided a benefit to the owner (producing food or providing support) then I support it.
- if and only if the adjacent neighbours are consulted
- I think if done right, with proper education and respect for those involved, allowing certain livestock in the city is a great idea.
- Chickens are fairly relaxed animals so I have no problem with hen ownership as long as larger animals such as horses and cows remain at farms outside of stampede season.
- ensure appropriate mitigations are in place to limit spread of avian or other viruses.
- Urban farms are becoming more and appealing to individuals, not only for a cost saving/lifestyle change but also to give families something to do together.
- I don't see any problem with people having chickens, pot bellied pigs or any other animal considered small "livestock". As long as the animals are well taken care of and neighbours approve. The animals should always come first. Too many are neglected or abused. That's a problem for me.
- People should be able to use their property how they wish so long as it isn't damaging anyone else
- As long as everything is done fairly for people and animals

- I would like to participate in having urban hens
- But training needs to be mandatory so owners can recognize diseases that impact birds (and ones that can spread to humans!)
- Within reason
- It's been well received in other cities
- As long as it is done in safe and human ways for both the caregivers and animals, and the animals are not overcrowded
- Having your own hens or milk producers would be beneficial.
- With support from neighbours and humane practices, I see nothing wrong with this.
- I have lived in an another city that allowed 4 hens per yard and it was successful.
- Responsible ownership rules must be followed.
- As long as livestock owners are responsible they should be allowed to have these animals.
- If people can provide an appropriate home for the animal, they should be allowed to care for it.
- Everyone should have the opportunity to have a self-sustaining lifestyle.
- urban ducks could help with slug problem
- Just because someone lives in the city, they could have adequate spacing for the animal and it could bring the community together more
- As long as the hens are cared for properly, it would be a good local alternative for eggs that doesn't support larger corporations with inhumane practices.
- I think it is very important that only hens are allowed, and not roosters. I think that there needs to be minimum property size requirements for this as support from adjacent neighbors is only helpful until your neighbors move
- Some livestock are harmless.
- Support from adjacent neighbors is huge because chickens smell so bad
- As long as animals are well cared for and not a nuisance to their neighbors ie Rooster cawing at dawn would be a nuisance if it was outdoors however if it was indoor until a little later in the morning 8am it would not be a nuisance
- Depending on the animal. Quiet, Smell, safety would all have to be considered.
- I honestly don't care as long as the threat of property or bodily damage is low. Pls no cows or hogs or other animals over 50 kilos though.
- I like the idea of being able to have your own hens and/or livestock to feed your family.
- Hens can make good companion pets and should be allowed with the right support.
- I support this bylaw amendment provided that the context of the urban hen house is suitable. There should be setbacks for where hen houses can be placed within one's property. Adjacent neighbours should be consulted and must agree with the hen house.
- You should always be able to get into sustainable farming as long as you take care of the animals
- Allow people freedoms but manage it.
- self sustainable
- Proper living And eating conditions Must be provided for the livestock.

- More efficient and cost effective
- As long as the animal is in a safe healthy environment then I believe it's okay.
- If one chooses to have a certain livestock, as long as kept clean and decent.
- Livestock have different requirements and deserve to be evaluated on a case by case basis.
- As long as neighbours are supportive, and there is enough space for the animals.
- Supporting small scale animal husbandry has a great many positive benefits, mainly in the form of humanely raised food. Highly support.
- Urban agriculture is a great way to leverage scarce land and resources.
- people should be able to make their own decisions about what kind of animal they want on their own property as long as they have proper containment for said animals
- Better for population to be close to livestock.
- I would support this if there was a stringent review process for these applications.
- No battery cages and limit on the amount per home.
- They can offer many benefits to the community as well as the owners. --- provided the level of care for said animal exceeds the necessary level of care.
- Sustainable resources. As long as people take care of them doesn't let them fence for themselves comes winter I think it would actually be a great idea
- But the parameters would need to be provided to gain my full support. In particular what licensing, accommodations, protocols and even certification before these people will need before they can have animals in their yard.
- As long as the adjacent neighbors are consenting, there should be no issues.
- Fresh eggs.
- I don't see a problem if people have livestock.
- I would love a couple hens! Fresh eggs!
- Urban farming should be utilized far more for sustainability
- It's the right thing to do, let people have their pets
- I'm indifferent as I have limited knowledge on livestock care.
- better for mental health, food sustainability, income or lack of. So may more + than - for this question
- There are many other pets besides dogs and cats
- As long as the animals are being treated humanely and aren't a nuisance to those living around them.
- As long as the animals have the resources they need
- Would like to see urban hens and mini cows allowed in Calgary with due criteria met.
- As long as it does not impede on neighbors enjoyment of their property
- Housing hens is great and it is better for us to get our food this way.
- many other livestock can have benefits but as long as hygiene standards are enforced strictly
- As long as they are well cared for, this would be a great idea

- As long as regulations are followed, with the economy as it is people should be allowed to have livestock that they are able to self sustain themselves and/or their family with
- As long as livestock is kept as companion animals not as meat....this would be my biggest worry about people abusing this and running their own farm and butcher shop out of their home (I know of people inside of the city who do this with rabbits and it is vile)
- I would like to have a miniature horse, sheep, or goat on my property, which is large enough at 14,000 sq feet (1/3 acre). They are smaller than many dogs, are less of a nuisance than dogs - they don't make continual noise like some dogs, never attack or accost people like some dogs.
- If someone raises them responsibly I have zero issue
- If done well could offer lifestyle benefits
- Livestock could be permitted as long as there was not a busy nuisance concern
- I fully support this. it is a great benefit to the community to be able to provide high level of sustainability and education in producing some of your own food. .
- I don't think they should need neighbor approval
- Certain cloven-hooved animals (with quantity limitations) should also be allowed. Goats and other small animals would be extremely beneficial to weed control, mental well being, etc.
- Chickens are good additions to city neighbourhood food supplies.
- there are many benefits to allowing residents to have small livestock including food resources and emotional support
- Our winters are too cold for the coops typically used by back yard owners and its animal cruelty. Must require a heated coop.
 - provided 'suitable living conditions' is followed-up on, and urban livestock is provided security from other neighborhood pets.
- If they don't bother anyone else, why not?
- Local food production is always a bonus
- "Urban" wildlife can provide many benefits to both family and community life
- the opportunity for fresh products is abundant and could potentially add value to a larger space, such as whole community involvement/benefit.
- urban farming as long as it is not disturbing others.
- Hens are productive, useful and not a problem when taken care of properly
- As long as thorough research on how it will affect the water and urban environment says it's not harmful!
- Small/non dangerous livestock would promote sustainability in the city.
- Provided that support from adjacent neighbours is a requirement, I would support this bylaw amendment.
- Hens are a great way to control garden pests organically. Pigs are great pets.
- Need to respect the neighbors
- "Hens can be wonderful part of our lives.
- No to roosters!"

- As long as everything is done as stated above, it can be a cheap solution for low income families to acquire food.
- Sounds fair. I am fine with hens and pot belly pigs.
- I think as long as they have neighbors support, they should be able to have hens.
- Urban hens would be great if managed appropriately.
- I'm on the fence for this one. I'm mostly concerned about unruly teens hurting these animals.
- I do not have a problem with people owning livestock within the city
- As long as the animals are safe and do not become a nuisance.
- As long as the animals can be safe, happy and healthy, then I don't see an issue.
- People shouldn't keep livestock just for the sake of it. They need to know how to properly take care of them and provide suitable living conditions. Adjacent neighbours may have problems with the noise as well so while it shouldn't be totally up to their input, they should get some input.
- I think allowing urban chickens is a great way to support self reliance
- Everyone has an animal preference and also some can use these animals for food depending on the type of animal it is.
- nothing wrong with birds I don't think a cow would be appropriate
- I like the idea of Henson provided they are cared for and maintained
- As long as it doesn't become a nuisance to the neighborhood.
- I think all neighbours need to agree for the person to have hens
- I don't see a problem of having a limited number of hens in inner city back yards as long as they are properly housed.
- It would be great to allow this in the city.
- prospers sustainable living, ect.
- Dont let it become a problem for your neighbors
- Have live around urban hen before and they cause no real issues to neighbors. They provide food for local families and can be a great teaching tool for children.
- People r too selfish and can learn a lot from animals.
- I don't believe we should prejudice what pets people can and can't own if they do so responsibly
- I would love to have laying hens in the city.
- Na
- With a license that is given once suitable housing provided
- I am curious to see how that turns out
- as long as there is minimal interference with the immediate neighbours, they are in support, there is limited or no risk to the public, and the animals are properly cared for, i see no harm in opening this up.
- Confused
- i love animals
- As long as the criteria is met, this should be allowed.
- If it is safe and in the best interest of the owner and animal yes I support.

- Husbandry Danimals is critical to a sustainable future
- Should be limited to a certain amount of hens
- If all neighbours in the area support a household getting chickens and such, I don't see an issue but noise and smell are a high priority on my list.
- It doesn't hurt anyone and animals deserve to be free.
- We support sustainable living and the local food movement. This is a very important city step towards support healthy living for its citizens. Those that participate will have to understand the commitment but this community is usually a very reasonable crew.
- I like the idea of people being able to have their own eggs and food potentially.
- With the rising costs of food, having access to eggs might help some people.
- It is more sustainable for people to have their own livestock if they choose as well they can provide emotional support as pets
- People should be able to do as they please on their property.
- Only if the purpose of "other livestock" is not for the production of food. In no way.
- I believe responsible ownership of hens in the city is a great idea.
- Chickens are cool.
- If the animal could be cared for appropriately, I don't see why there would be any issues, unless it reduces the quality of living for adjacent neighbours (for example, if there was a significant smell or mess).
- This does no harm to the residents of Calgary
- If people want to own an animal they should be allowed if it's safe.
- I think it's a beneficial option for people to have
- I think this is a reasonable thing to consider with proper guidelines in place
- Having a couple of hens can be way less of a nuisance than a neighbor with three or more constantly barking dogs who never picks up their waste. Allow people who are responsible and considerate to have some control over their own food supply. why are unlimited pigeons, rabbits, dogs and cats allowed and chickens are not? just do not allow roosters if noise is a concern.
- Backyard hen programs have been very successful in other major Canadian cities.
- As long as suitable living conditions are enforced
- As long as suitable living conditions are enforced
- it has worked well in other communities for the most part
- SAFE and LOVING temporary places for animals is what I want for these dogs. There are clear issues with the dog mentally to be attacking, rehabilitate!
- Livestock is good for everyone.
- No issues with chicken, goats small animals
- As long as proper care and space can be provided for the animal, and there is no negative effects to their neighbors lives.

- Given they are in a safe environment for themselves and others and that it has some environmental or community benefit. Most animals have some sort of prey drive and it cannot be expected that dogs won't react. Especially that most will be seeing them for the first time ever. Dogs are curious animals.
- If it can be done reasonably, I think one should be able to do as they please.
- Food security is becoming an issue. Local or private operations should be encouraged
- Chickens another livestock can be great additions to life but they take a lot of work and time. People should be educated on the needs of the livestock.
- I love chickens
- nice to have fresh eggs
- Allow people to have their own eggs!
- I think size of yard should influence this decision. I think keeping a small flock of chickens can be very advantageous to those who love to organic garden in the way of fertilizer and bug control.its a great project and learning opportunity for families.
- I think there should be a limit to the number of these types of livestock.
- Animals like pot belly pigs can be good pets
- As long as they weren't free to city roam I don't see an issue.
- Really, I just love fresh eggs. If a neighbour was keeping hens, I would be ecstatic.
- this would be a welcome addition as many people struggle with basic food needs
- I believe having hens in the backyard would be great and offer little downside to adjacent neighbours
- I see no problem with this.
- As long as they are not at large I am okay with that. My dog is high prey drive and if they are at large it is hard to walk my dog.
- with the cost of food today, certain livestock allowances would help families feed their kids.
- People should be allowed to have livestock as long as conditions are healthy, humane, and do not affect surrounding wildlife and neighbours
- Let people have their chickens or whatever responsibly
- Property taxes are expensive so you should be able to do whatever you want on your property as long as it doesn't affect neighbours and the quality life with animals
- Urban hens could be a really awesome way to build community.
- Hens should be allowed providing the property owner has adequate yard space & proper chicken house. Most important owner actually knows how to care for chickens
- Some people have space to keep these animals and they should be free to do so if it's not causing trouble to the neighbors.
- As long as there is a cap on the number of chickens a household can have
- I think that urban livestock approval, especially hens, would be an amazing step forward for our city! What a way to promote food security and benefit our community.
- If the livestock is well cared for by a responsible owner I would support allowing them in the city.
- I don't see a problem with what's being proposed

- If the animal can be properly cared for and not negatively impact the community, why not?
- If the home has a proper area that he a could be in and it doesn't affect neighbours then why not?
- As long as there are complete neighbor support and rules in terms of animal waste and care from the City.
- Calgarians should be allowed to house hens so they can meet their dietary needs
- Urban hens don't pose a threat, however the same rules should apply to hen owners as other animals (ie. Keeping their living space clean)
- Depending on the collateral impact owning these animals can have (I.e. smell, noise)
- If people would like to raise chicks or hens on their own property it shouldn't be a question. I think there should be restrictions to size and quantity but noise shouldn't be an issue, especially considered other noise factors that are out of control and not regulated
- I just support animals in general and if they can have a better quality of life in the city, well I agree.
- Seems responsible
- As long as the animal has a "met-all-the-requirements" home and not one that was good enough for them to live in.
- BUT with like chicken, the area must be kept CLEAN, else mice will come and cause a problem
- I think the idea of hens/live stock could support the city and neighborhoods alot as seen with the "goat cutting crew" but suitable living conditions would have to be a primary concern as to keep livestock well and neighboring homes happy.
- I would support urban hens
- I think this is a great ide.
- We could have our own little cottage industries, sharing food with each other.
- Not sure what to think ... some neighbours may have animals that could get out and attack/harass
The livestock
- I would allowed select live stock as long as they have the appropriate needs met, such as ample space to roam and grow, proper food, water and shelter and then to also look at the quality of life, making sure the animal is happy, not stressed, not abused, still acting as a animal. Also a license to keep such animals must be given out with inspection of living spaces before the purchase and sale of livestock or urban use. Permits displayed (like dog tags)
- A great way to produce your own food and reduce environment impact.
- Following the aforementioned criteria, it could be feasible.
- Exclude large breed animals (cow/horse/pig (standard, not pigmy)/alpaca, etc)
- This could be a fantastic opportunity for people to raise some home-grown livestock, and could potentially provide restaurants with more local produce!
- As long as everything is kept clean all is OK.
- Love the idea of urban ag and hope that communities can get into this!!
- The support of neighbours is important with this, because it is not solely the livestock owners that are impacted by the livestock being present, both positively and negatively.
- Chickens can be a valuable pet that enriches people's lives

- No thanks
- It allows for people to have their own agricultural experience in the city.
- Chickens are cool
- Absolutely. Hens would be an amazing addition to urban back yards. Not sure about larger livestock including pigs/sheep/cattle/goats. Depending on size of the yard etc
- Food security is very important and laying hens, dairy goats, etc are an easy, multi use option.
- Chickens can be raised responsibly as demonstrated in other cities. It is important to provide a local food source and to teach kids about respecting their food source.
- They would help with the amount of bugs.
- As long as all neighbours agree I'm fine with it and the owner keeps the area clean of feces and feathers, limiting any smells and noises to houses outside of the adjacent neighbours
- As long as care for the animal is taken seriously and hens have appropriate living conditions this could be a great movement toward more sustainable and connected living
- absolutely 100%. This pandemic has shown lots of us how much more self sufficient we can be. Please, please encourage this wise, safe idea. I'd like three chickens, no roosters.
- I think it would be amazing to have the opportunity to raise your own eggs or other resources that the animals could provide. Just another opportunity for sustainability.
- excessive noise need to be considered and clearly defined. some animals like to talk more than others and different people have different levels of discomfort with animal noise
- Chickens are less of a noise, cleanliness and environmental harm problem than dogs, cats, and pigeons
- Roaming cats could be a problem for these hens
- I think having hens and other non-disruptive livestock is a great idea for both our health and the environment. The animals welfare is key, as well as realistic expectations from neighbours and communities.
- I live close to the lady who pushed to have the hens deemed legal pets. And I support her and anybody else who has pets that don't meet the general standard. the hens bring her such peace and calm that if another animal can do that for somebody else I'm in full support
- If suitable living conditions (ie. smell/noise is controlled), then a small number of hens should be allowed on single family dwelling properties.
- But no support from neighbors requirement as jerks will just veto it if they have a beef with the neighbor for any reason. If it's just a few hens and no roosters, it should be fine
- I think this is an amazing idea !
- I fully support urban hens.
- Don't ban a breed
- I think a minimum backyard size and distance between neighbors would be important
- Chickens and hen's are awesome and precious creatures that can be silly cheerful companions. As well as provide fresh eggs during lay season. Good plan to allow this bird as a 'pet'
- If it meets the things above I like the idea of local farming to reduce environmental impacts

- As long as you require support from all neighbours and if neighbours are able to revoke approval do to changes in conditions.
- I think it's fair if neighbours are consulted.
- As long as the livestock are not causing a problem to the neighbours it should be nobody's business but the owner's
- Home grown food such as eggs cared for responsibly is a benefit
- I fully support any movement towards a more sustainable future. I think urban livestock should be a community level decision meaning some communities have more opportunities for urban livestock than others.
- "If it helps get the job done without adding man hours, and unnecessary expense
- it's a great alternative."
- Chickens are useful, easy to keep, and help families be more self sustaining
- Yes, if everyone around is fine with it
- As long as the people who the animals keep the living space clean, having small livestock in the city would benefit many people.
- right now, lots of people are spending a lot of time at home. if they want hens or other reasonable livestock, and they do it right, cool!
- If proper conditions are provided for the humane handling of small livestock, I am in favour. I think the other concerns would be noise and handling of waste and smell associated with it
- Yes, let's utilize natural resources
- If people want to be able to start having their own food sources, why not? It's a great way to bring some basic human skills back into society.
- see no issue with it
- As long as the appropriate measures are taken to ensure the animals are secured properly and there aren't so many it causes a nuisance I fully support this
- Ability to keep appropriate livestock within city can improve food security and be beneficial for homeowners and neighbours (eg: chickens eating pest insects)
- As long as the adjacent owners agree and the animals are properly looked after. When I lived in Bowness some one had a rooster, I often heard it crowing
- Some people connect with a specific animal that falls out of the standard domestic cat / dog / guinea pig / ferret paradigm. If someone has a rather spacious land inside city limits, and the capacity to care for a Horse (for example), it would only make sense to allow it. As well, people having hens and other such livestock will allow for independence, so they can produce their own eggs and such. For Seniors especially, having something to occupy their minds while their body is still able to care for animals could help ensure a greater quality of life.
- I only support livestock in the city has companion animals and not used for exploitation i.e. eggs or slaughter
- The criteria to meet is reasonable. Provided all criteria is adhered to, I am comfortable with the amendment.

- Calgarians need more opportunity to have sustainable practices and bylaws outlining same are necessary
- Doesn't affect me if someone wants to have a chicken
- Within reason and with neighbors approval i see no issue
- As long as the neighbors are aware, and there are proper living conditions and standards in place, I agree.
- It cannot negatively impact lifestyle of neighbours, specific defined rules about conditions so it's not arbitrary.
- Limit the amount of chickens a person can have and where allowed on the property
- Always praise self sustainability.
- Small livestock animals should be allowed as long as owners prove they have suitable living arrangements for the animals
- I have personally dealt with a neighbour who had livestock and it was no problem at all. They livestock was friendly and provides eggs which they shared with all of us. Community togetherness was what came out of it before bylaw took the chickens away which was extremely sad.
- If animals are well cared for, I don't mind where they are
- It would be wonderful!!! Other municipalities have had successes in Alberta and elsewhere with urban hens, and provided they or other such animals are not a nuisance to others, why not?
- As long as animals are kept in a responsible humane manner
- I think as long as it's being owned by someone responsible in suitable conditions I support
- Beneficial to the community
- I support the urban hen initiative and support requirements be met.
- As long as this is community supported and there are standards for appropriate animal welfare that are enforced.
- I would expect that there would be criteria the city puts in place as far as acceptable housing for the animal
- Goats as gas powered lawn mowers are a great alternative.
- As long as the animals are well cared for and don't cause a nuisance to neighbors they should be allowed. Yearly licensing reviews with affidavits from adjoining properties should be instituted
- I believe individuals should be allowed to keep and care for animals considered as 'livestock'. If an individual wants to own any animal, a background check and living conditions should be investigated to ensure the animal will be provided the proper care. As a person who cares for the well-being of all animals, i believe if a person is going to own a animal, it is because that person is looking for a companion. If the individual genuinely wants to use a animal for livestock purposes, they should have to request a permit that would register them as a livestock owner, and be reviewed regularly for humane care of the animals.
- the idea of it is great, i just want to be sure that enforcement of these criteria are met, particularly the suitable living conditions
- Allowing people in the city to raise some livestock would reduce costs on food and transportation for food as well as more efficiently use the space we're occupying.

- I think proper space and hygiene requirements and noise issues should be considered for the safety of animals and in consideration of neighbours.
- With restrictions on numbers and cleanliness.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and aren't a nuisance to neighbouring homes.
- There are so many benefits to having small livestock in the community
- Chickens are great pets and are a delight to have around. Roosters should be closely examined as they are dicks.
- Yes, the hens where properly housed and not allowed to roam the neighborhood.
- I think it would be beneficial to owners and neighbours to have livestock in the city, assuming proper living conditions can be provided for the animal.
- It's very important that suitable living conditions are provided, as many livestock require bigger amounts of space and different care. When evaluating the case, it needs to be ensured that the people are well-educated on how to provide for that species (E.g., food, shelter, husbandry, training), and the animal is suitable for being a 'pet' as supported by published scientific literature. The species should not pose a significant threat to public health and safety. The species should not represent a significant threat to native wildlife. Species ownership must be permitted under provincial, federal or international laws and regulations.
- Farm to table is much easier when you can have your own hens. Help reduce carbon emissions.
- The animals MUST be treated humanely. People wanting chickens MUST be educated in the the physical and EMOTIONAL needs of the birds.
- Yes as long as the livestock can be contained on the property and provide no risk or detriments to the neighbours.
- As long as they are raised in the correct environment, and not allowed to roam freely in public, it is acceptable.
- I support the right to own livestock given their needs and space requirements are meant. Limits to the property size should be in place to avoid hoarding situations. Free registration should be in place to encourage owners to add their animals to the database.
- It will benefit the community
- If they are secured. Wander wildlife can cause hazards to people, drivers and other animals.
- Urban farming is a great sustainable option for the Calgary population. It would be great to see this happen.
- Every home owner should be able to raise their own food provided they are caring the for the animals in a responsible manner
- Allow community input before approval
- Evaluate case by case basis
- hens and chickens can help reduce the cost of living.
- Thoughtful, responsible urban animal husbandry benefits the animals, their owners, and the community.
- it would provide a healthy alternative to buying eggs for some calgarians
- I don't know any reason why it would be an issue

- if they're properly being cared for and have a certain degree of living expectations. If animal cruelty occurs in any way they should be fined and any animal in their care should be removed
- I don't see a reason why not.
- Before giving permits need to make sure they have proper enclosures and rules when the hens need to be put in and out of the coop.
- If animals are cared for properly, hens are an incredible option for eggs and natural pest control in your garden. Removes the need for harmful pesticide and factory farmed eggs (or ridiculously expensive "free-range/organic" eggs).
- Since I can't explain the next answer (pigeons) I'll do so here. I hate pigeons, I think the correct answer should be none, HOWEVER some people have carrier pigeons and pet pigeons I get it. So I put 1-10. Again, difference between pet pigeons and wild pigeons.
- Hens are a way to provide food for your family
- As long as health and safety is maintained. And are not drawing in predators from outside the city. Coyote, lynx, etc.
- If they are given the appropriate safety measures, yes.
- If the animals have proper dwelling/space there is no reason not to.
- Huge benefits to the community. Community farming, connecting kids to food, more local food production etc. I don't think support is necessarily needed from neighbors. Some neighbors will just be a pain and object without having a good cause.
- I've had chickens, love fresh eggs. As long as they have a secure place to roam and sleep, and don't cause too much noise, everyone should be able to have them
- With changing needs for sustainability and self-sufficiency amid the pandemic and climate change, allowing urban livestock could be a positive impact for food security and community growth. Ownership should require proper training and understanding of the needs of these animals and proof of knowledge of care.
- We can allow hens but are not allowed to make decisions on our own pets? Irresponsible pet owners should be facing consequences. Not citizens as a whole.
- Should allow when reasonable. Part of a Sustainable city.
- Don't see the difference between dogs and chickens. I'd rather have chickens that stay on their property than dogs peeing and pooping everywhere.
- Should be a limit to how many and need a certain amount of space for every one of them.
- I think it is fine as long as neighbors agree to it and the owner keeps the animal under control and does it does not become a nuisance i.e.: smelly, loud, running at large.
- I think it would be great to have urban hens or other livestock if their needs are met.
- no
- I love being able to self-sustain as much as possible. I currently have a fruit and vegetable garden, and have always dreamed of having farm fresh eggs. I do think proper protocols are required to make sure the animals have a suitable living environment for our harsh winters.
- everyone deserves to have a pet they want, even if they are stinky.
- No loud roosters.

- Anything that helps people be less reliant on grocery stores is a good thing
- Decentralization of food production, like more sustainable.
- People who would be able to have local livestock would benefit all the communities with fresh eggs etc
- So long as it is not harming anyone and has the potential to provide some good, why wouldn't the city allow it.
- I think chickens in the city would be fine as long as they follow your criteria
- Who doesn't like fresh eggs? As long as the animal is well cared for why not?
- They must also show that they have an adequate understanding and the means necessary to provide optimal care for said animal.
- Giving people the option to have hens in their backyard allows those who would rather raise their own food the chance to do so.
- Not bothered by the idea, also love fresh eggs
- the care and upkeep of the animals should be priority
- Chickens, when handled by responsible individuals, would be a boon to local communities.
- Seeing as long as bylaws are met such a noise/ clean up & housing their should be no issues with owning livestock
- ONLY if the animals are maintained in the way that the person advertised after community engagement. (IE: if they agreed to clean cages daily, they must clean cages daily or forfeit the animals - swiftly!) Also, does a person have the physical and mental capacity to care for something on a structured and regular basis. Are they financially able to support regular medical, food and shelter bills. Most of my comments are in the interest of "Is the project maintainable over the long term after the blush of excitement over)
- i think it would be nice for people to be able to have chickens etc. within reason
- because the criteria is valid and makes sense.
- I know that chickens provide a lot of joy to people and as long as they have a home that is maintained (as I would expect for any animal living outside) I would be all for it.
- A species specific maximum number of livestock animals
- Livestock can be pets too.
- Sustainable homesteading in an urban environment is gaining popularity and technological innovation is making more alternatives possible. Given the already high cost of living in Calgary, as well as the exorbitant food prices we are already subjected to, having the option to source more of our food from our own resources such as domesticated stock is an excellent alternative to continue to feed ourselves. Moreover, the byproducts of such stock, like manure, can be used in gardens throughout the community to add nutrients to the clay-like soil of Calgary, and in the case of hens, you get even more benefit with both egg production for several years and then eating the hen herself after she's outlived her egg-laying years.
- If the neighbours don't object, why should anyone else?
- I like hens, just be a responsible hen owner.

- As long as the animals are not a nuisance to surrounding neighbours or able to escape then they should be allowed
- People should be able to make their own food on their own property.
- Hens ain't hurting anyone... as long as their coop is maintained and isn't a nuisance. Give it a try. Wait and see what happens. Call it Hen and See... rappers will love it.
- So long as they are monitored and the animals/livestock are being taken care of and treated properly, areas are kept clean etc. I don't see the issue.
- Absolutely yes! Other municipalities (Okotoks for example) have implemented this in an urban setting without incident. I do think that getting approval from neighbours may be onerous in many cases though and what happens if one of the neighbours you got permission from moves and the new person objects? Do you have to get rid of the animal(s) that you have been caring for and are attached to?
- As long as the animals can be well provided for, including proper food, shelter (from weather conditions and temperature), and enrichment, I see little issue with allowing people to have them. That said, the consideration from neighbours needs to be heavily weighted--perhaps requiring signed agreement from neighbours within a specific range--as not everyone will appreciate a crowing rooster at or before sunrise.
- Barking dogs and at large cats cause more of a disturbance than chicken would. As long as there is a maximum number of hens and the owner cleans to avoid a smell.
- I don't understand why they are banned in the first place
- being wary of people who want to abuse the livestock bylaw and become nuisance pets. but if enforced bylaws were in place hopefully these issues will not become a problem. I do not agree with every type of livestock should be allowed.
- If people can prove they can be responsible by thinking about the big picture in an urban environment with their pets, then they should be allowed to have the opportunity to care for those pets. However, a minimal standard for some animals is not humane in such cramped settings. IE goats and small ponies/ mini horses. Also noisy or odourous birds is not fair to neighbours. So minimal requirements yet more than basic necessary needs for the animal should be a set standard.
- I totally support an initiative to allow livestock inside the city.
- I think there are a select few "farm" animals that would do well in an urban setting
- it's important to have a safe space where you can grow and engage with your food. we don't have that anymore living in a city relying on grocery stores.
- Fresh eggs
- Responsible pet ownership is necessary for any animal
- I support local livestock as long as neighbours are in agreement.
- As long as there is buy in from all parties (within reason) then I have no objections to the amendment.
- As long as the owners tick all the boxes for requirements I think this would be fine.
- If I had the space for a chicken and by laws allowed it, I would love to have a chicken.
