- As long as the animal, the community, and all others affected/involved have their safety and well-being prioritized, I see no issue with this.
- Hens are a great benefit for the owners, cleanliness of the coop is critical for hens & neighbours. Other livestock would be case by case.
- everyone has the right to grow thier own food, or care for thier property naturally and holistically
- Love it! I think that would help bridge the gap between city folk and farmers. I think that there is a lot of positive learning here. I also like the above requirements. This is helpful in ensuring that people are actually ready for the commitment of caring for another living being.
- I have no issues with other raising hens as long as the hens stay on their property
- I think small livestock such as chickens, hens, ducks are beneficial for the health and wellbeing of people and of land.
- Would love to see more animals in the city! They can bring many benefits.
- Many other large cities in Canada have adopted an urban hen bylaw.
- Chickens help with sustainability, they teach kids reasonably and treating animals with respect and knowing where their food comes from
- Urban agriculture can enhance the productivity of land that is otherwise wasted. As long as livestock is well maintained with proper care and conditions this can enhance a community while reducing environmental impact
- Assess properties based on inspections. Many people will think they want urban livestock but don't understand the means to care for them especially during winter. Create a detailed questionnaire as well asking all the means the owner will take to ensure safety of the animals and cleanliness of the property. Definitely create a fine system for too many animals , hoarding, dirty properties etc.
- As long as all is well in place.
- all living animals deserve a quality life
- I would love to have a hen in my backyard
- Back yard chickens need to be allowed for egg production. Up to 4 per household. Education should also be included so neighbours know that noise won't be an issue.
- How many chickens??
- Any domesticated animal can be a pet.
- I believe it would help out people who like to grow their own food to better off rely on themselves more.
- The more local you can get something, the better.
- Chickens have proven to be a small to non issue in other cities
- Chickens are cool, even though they are kinda creepy. My only concern would be the noise. I think both neighbors would have to consent to have chickens next to them.
- Why not, if there is no detriment to the community or the livestock. Neighbour consultation will be key
- as long as factors such as smell and noise are accounted for and the people around them (their neighbours) are okay about it

- Hens have long been something many people in the city would enjoy. There are good responsible people out there who should be allowed this privilege
- This is a huge trend in many cities
- Yes, if unreasonable neighbors can be overcome
- I have zero objections living by livestock as long as they're in a suitable environment.
- I believe urban livestock can help with people with low income feed their families.
- If the community one lives around is accepting that one wishes to raise livestock then it should be fine. This should be a community aimed question aimed at different zones of the city and reviewed from that data received by the separate communities.
- Urban Hens would be amazing for strengthening community and food security in Calgary especially with the recent opening of the Calgary Community Fridge in Crescent Heights!
- Fresh eggs. Economy
- The community benefit/positive impact would be great
- I think it's good for everyone
- Responsibly done it is a great thing to have
- If the people living nearby have agreed, I don't see why responsible owners shouldn't be allowed other animals
- Cheaper eggs!!! And healthier chicken for dinner
- Hens aren't noisy like dogs
- Doesn't really bother me either way but if a neighbor asked if they could have chickens or something I would agree
- Just like building an addition to your house, the decision to have livestock needs to be approved by your neighbours as the animals could affect the nearby environment - through odour, noise, etc.
- I would vote yes, only if the shelters were kept clean and did not smell.
- As long as the owner of the chickens kept their properties clean and their chickens clean then why not
- I see no issue with keeping a sustainable food source. As long as the amount of hens is capped and if a complaint about smell/too many hens is reported it's taken seriously.
- The hen debate has gone on for 15 years. Enough already. Waste of time and resources to keep revisiting. Just allow it permanently already. We are
- As long as the laws protect the animals, with appropriate limits, could be great!
- I've seen other cities adapt an urban hen program with much success. As long as the livestock has suitable housing during the winter I see no issue with allowing small livestock on private urban property.
- This would give help lower income families raise food for themselves
- As long as people are willing to raise the animals responsibly, then I fully support backyard chickens. It allows for families to provide food for themselves, their community and also it's good for the environment and reducing emissions, etc!

- Animals are therapy for a lot of people. Calgary boarders have a lot of big acreage lots so it would be nice to be allowed more animals.
- I support it in theory, but I would be concerned with noise and odour.
- Having a diversity of animals in the city would only be beneficial
- Livestock is a way of living and the city should let it be allowed to have them as long as they are cared for correctly
- "Urban hens, within the limits set by Animal Bylaw (whatever they may be) are a great idea!! Hens are great pets, provide a healthy fresh food alternative, can assist in pest management and will eat compostable food items. However, there needs to be guidance from the City regarding numbers, and husbandry, and smell control :)"
- Also, I believe special regard must be given to pigs, as they are a great alternative for families with allergies to the usual pets and their dander (i.e. rabbits, cats, dogs). Pigs are easily trained, and quite clean & their allowance within the city (again, with guidelines provided by the city) would be a positive influence :)"
- This could get out of hand, max + of chickens for example, or other animals will be important. Coming from a farm, look out come winter when people start giving up these animals, try to house them in their home and/or start doing a lot more butchering at home.
- I believe it should be extended as well to include teacup pigs and other small farm animals that can also be raised as pets
- As long as the livestock are appropriately cared for there would be no issue with allowing them within city limits.
- Hens yes with proper housing or cages. No other livestock should be in a city environment it is too traumatic to animal to be constantly caged or annoying to neighbors
- Wildlife is good
- Suitable living conditions should be assessed to obtain pet licenses regardless of whether they are livestock or not.
- Minimal QUIET livestock who dont make excess mess/stink shouldn't affect neighbors
- As long as there is space and the owners are responsible they should be allowed. Not everyone can afford an acreage or farm to have these animals.
- I've seen it work in Vancouver, BC
- As long as they treat the animals right, I don't see the harm.
- As long as steps are followed and all parties involved are in agreement
- I'm unsure. Cattle in the city, no. Chickens, sure. So long as they are being treated humanely and being kept in safe and well conditions.
- I love this idea. My only worry is if neighbours have disputes. I think I thought you meant actual chickens? Is this referring to pigeons instead?
- The only thing I would be worried about this would be that's hens could become a nuisance by increased noise.
- I think urban hens are a great idea to add to the community. As long as hens are in humane living conditions.

- As long as there are rules in place this seems fine
- Can't explain just like the idea and possibility
- most cases deserve a case by case review
- Chickens/hens would be a great addition to communities. Minimum space requirements is a fair stipulation.
- The points listed above seem fair.
- As long as they are not backyard butchers, raising meat for slaughter.
- Love urban hens and small urban livestock! For noise complaints etc a threshold decibel level should be set at night, this will keep enforcement more consistent and less subjective.
- As long as their well taken care of and dont cause issues with neighbors I don't see why it would be a problem.
- But no roosters!
- It makes sense for livestock to be responsibly handled, as well as with the consent of surrounding neighbors. Also, allowing people to have more than hens can only be seen as a resource boon for individuals, families, and communities (given responsible handling).
- Mostly no but there should always be room for exceptions e.g. a home that has no other homes around it.
- If the animal is well trained, well cared for and has enough space there should be no restriction. (Not applicable to exotic)
- I believe small livestock should be allowed and encouraged, such as chickens, pigs, maybe even a goat, but nothing larger. I think it's important for urban residents to be able to sustain their own living, food, and engage with animals.
- I'd much rather get my eggs from my neighbour whom I know looks after her small number of hens well and in with care than a giant manufacturer where the hens are treated like egg-producing machines. I also think hens have been emotional support animals for some people.
- Chickens are great for eggs! Someone who wants them should be able to have them
- Only if it's actually case-by-case basis not every cases the same
- buck buck
- Eggs!
- As long as there is _____ amount of space between the pen and the surrounding Neighbors. No one wants to hear or smell that right under the window! I can't comment on how far is reasonable because the wind does pick up the smell and it will also carry the drying faeces which can be dangerous to inhale. Also, some people are more sensitive to smell a noise than others 12 I guess as long as, for example I was at the back end of a longer property and far from the houses then it sounds like a really good idea!
- If people are properly providing for animals that are not causing anyone any problems and remain on the owners property , they should be allowed to have them.
- I like the idea of more sustainable living
- I see nothing wrong with keeping hens, pigs, etc being kept as pets in the city. So long as they follow the same rules as having any other pet.

- Yes, I believe everyone should have the right to keep animals as long as they can provide suitable living conditions for them.
- So long as the person/home applying for this has adequate care and knowledge and support from the immediate neighbours this holds no opposition from me.
- Provided all requirements are met for animal safety and Neighbors are not negatively impacted by noise or smell
- I believe people being able to have livestock to support themselves is a great idea.
- Yes if the animals are properly taken care of
- This amendment has the best interest of hens and the people caring/dealing with them.
- So long as the conditions stated above is upheld, this seems like a good idea on paper.
- Yes, but with a limit of the number of livestock per property.
- less livestock in huge farms CAN make for less animal abuse (obviously not in all cases)
- If people are responsible and caring properly for their animals I don't see harm in allowing them in people's yards. I think they would need to prove that they can properly care for the animals and give them a safe life
- Maximum number allowed should be about 4-5
- No harm in chickens. Anything else I think you would need neighbours to be okay with it
- But the Hens would need microchip identification tags. Many people, I believe, don't understand the time and effort to raise hens. I think after the first month, they would let them out.
- Consultations with neighbours on such a decision would be the prudent action. It's very sad that this is something the city needs to be involved in.
- If urban livestock (within reason) could benefit a community and has to be approved by various parties and regulations then why not.
- If animals are treated properly and cleaned accordingly, there is no reason to allow them in urban settings
- This is of course assuming appropriate noise conditions be met as well. It's difficult enough to have a barking dog in the neighborhood. I can't imagine goats or roosters at dawn.
- Put a max of 3 on it. Chickens are not that healthy and can bring over diseases.
- As long as it's something not too outrageous in numbers, people should be able to support themselves and grow food
- I see no harm in it
- Only if it is not a nuisance to the neighbours.
- yes as long as they are being cared for properly, especially in winter.
- I would love to have a couple of hens! I think this is a great idea that needs to be considered with great care.
- I love the idea of livestock in the City! Of course, with very daunting fines to discourage laziness when taking care of these animals.
- I would have concern for proper care being an issue with inexperienced people handling or keeping livestock like chickens

- Livestock can help people become more food secure and self-sufficient.
- I would appreciate a further definition of “community benefit”. Would this include rabbits kept outside as personal pets?
- I have wanted to have chickens on my property since I was a young boy. I’d love to have my own fresh eggs.
- Personal responsibility is of the utmost importance less enforcement
- As long as the hens are taken care of and not causing a nuisance to neighbouring houses, then people should be allowed to own and care for them.
- Chickens and coops should be inspected as part of licensing
- If it can be a suitable living condition for the hens, I would support it.
- As long as it is well regulated, it could support people who want to have small livestock. It would have to be kept very clean and only in certain areas as it could become a problem where people don't realize how much work these livestock animals are.
- If people have the space and want to have hens, I do not see the issue. As long as they are taken care of the same as any other pet.
- no issue with a few hens or other "barn yard" pets...so long as they are not a nuisance to neighbours
- Owners should maintain a healthy living environment for livestock with adequate space, odor management
- Need to address smell,noise and size of animal
- As long as noise or filth which comes with a stench is not a concern owning these animals in urban areas.
- must have approval from all connected neighbors
- As long as the animals are quiet and don't produce strong odour and are well kept.
- I see this being beneficial to many communities households. However, when it comes to enforcement, I think more resources would be required. Especially if larger livestock were to be kept.
- There would need to be something in place so the neighborhood doesn't smell like a farm.
- This has the benefit of helping people be self-sufficient in addition to the aforementioned reasons / criteria.
- With neighbour approval is important as long as they consider neighbours moving or the house next door being sold and re-evaluate as people around change.
- No concerns regarding chickens
- As long as proper environments, permissions, and social cooperation is maintained, then I see no reason that Urban Hens should be disallowed.
- Having 2-3 hens in a backyard if they are managed appropriately would not impact neighbors. Many communities around Calgary have successful programs and have mandatory classes you have to take before you can get the license to keep hens. This ensures people have the information to properly care for the livestock.
- Livestock must be on a the owners personal property but not allowed in apartments, condos
- Support

- I would also suggest a maximum amount of livestock allowed per residence (including cats & dogs).
- Neighbour agreement this is a- no case by case basis. If animals prove to be a problem - smell, noise, this should be revisited. Suitable living conditions a must.
- Possibly providing there is suitable living conditions for the animals and ALL neighbours agree.
- With covid highlighting how food pipelines can be disturbed there is an increasing interest in providing for your own food. Gardens, chickens, beekeeping come to mind. In this case as long as it is not a disturbance to others and not cruel to animals I think we allow people the option of having livestock on private property within the city.
- Hens should be allowed if the owner can take care of them properly
- If owners can be responsible, i do not see an issue.
- A main thing to focus on is the amount of predatory animals that venture into neighbourhoods. It is important to also make sure the animals living residential will not attract more of these dangerous wild animals to the neighborhood and put more animals at risk or people
- I like the idea of community farming
- I think anytime people can be more self sufficient, it's a good thing. There would need to be bylaws that protect neighbours from dealing with the noise/smell (if there is any).
- Having livestock in the city is a learning experience for children and refreshing for adults.
- It makes me feel weary that exceptions would be evaluated case by case by one person. The other points seem reasonable.
- It would take strain off of farms that are inhumanely producing meat, eggs etc. to meet the heavy demand from society.
- I think that people should be free to do what they want, within reason, on their own property as long as it doesn't annoy neighbors.
- I used to live in Nova Scotia and we raised chickens. As long as you don't have too many animals in one space it can be done safely for both animals and neighbouring humans. People should be allowed to raise their own live stock in city limits within reason. Chickens and small livestock are within that reason.
- Support from adjacent neighbours and suitable living conditions , ie . Cleanliness of enclosures being very important
- As long as they aren't a nuisance I am fine with it
- My only concern is smell and caring of the animal as a neighbor. I will not be keeping hens so I'd just like the consideration from those who are.
- I think when kept in smaller numbers in a responsible and clean environment, some livestock can greatly benefit communities and individuals.
- I believe pigs and ducks should be able to live in loving homes that treat them as pets. Both animals are very smart and loyal/loving. I have always wanted to own a pig but I know this is not allowed for the time being...
- Case to case scenario
- as above, why do humans own other living creatures.
- I want hens.

- It makes sense
- I believe urban chickens can be beneficial
- I see no issue with some livestock in urban areas. As long as neighbors are in agreement and the animals are well cared for and not a nuisance. The amount and type of livestock must be mutually agreed upon as well.
- There is much to be gained (community involvement And educationand self sufficiency)
- I [removed] love wild chickens
- I don't know enough about the issue
- if nobody is bothered by it and it puts food on the table might as well
- Why not.
- I am very big on sustainable living. Domestic hens would allow more people to lower their carbon footprint (in respect to transport distances for their food) by having a farm to table eating lifestyle. Is better for our environment.
- Limited numbers with licensing required. No roosters.
- I think as long as it is being handled properly on then this is okay.
- As long as there is a small maximum allowable amount of animals.
- As long as individuals are being responsible with their hens, households should be able to collect their own eggs for personal use.
- As long as there is no detriment to the neighbors, urban farming can be a good way to get fresh fresh eggs
- Support from neighbors should definitely be required- but new people moving in should also be informed BEFORE they move to avoid contention arising afterwards.
- Hens and other livestock within the city can help promote various farmer's markets and encourage local economic growth.
- As long as neighbours don't have unchallenged veto power because they want to be (forgive me) dicks, I have no problem with hens or other livestock, provided they're well cared for and the owners have appropriate training to manage them.
- As long as odour and noise are adequately managed, it brings us closer to animals providing our food.
- Chickens are great family pets. As long as they are cared for and not a nuisance.
- Bring more livestock to the city! The limitations in place are causing a generation of depressed people with no feeling of responsibility
- I think hens and livestock are a welcome addition, provided the neighbours gave consent and were aware of the consequences (noise/smell/ property value)
- As long as the owners are responsible and the animals are taken care of, I see no issues.
- Livestock can be useful
- I support measures that are humane for the animals that allow people to grow & raise more of their own food.
- What's the difference between livestock and pets. They are both animals we take care of.

- As long as surrounding neighbours are in agreement.
- As with other household animals the hens cannot be a nuisance to neighbors.
- Suitable living environments and support from neighbours should be the most important aspects when looking at livestock in homes
- Chickens!!!!!!
- If the neighbours are okay with it then it should be fine. Because we live in somewhat close quarters out of respect the people around the livestock should be able to have a say.
- Yes but with a mandate that urban hens or other livestock in the city should be subject to review by the City of Calgary to ensure suitable living conditions can be met as well as agreements from surround neighbors is important...If someone moved next door with roosters and hens that are howling I would probably want to know ahead of time. Or if someone has a type of livestock that lives under smelly conditions, again I would want to be notified.
- Why not
- I would love to hear roosters crow in the morning.
- Hens in the city is a fantastic plan! Locally feeding families. But definitely appropriate care should be enforced. Just as bad pet owners shouldn't have pets, we should not permit bad hen owners. Humane standards should be set early on to avoid misunderstandings and mistreatment of hens.
- As long as they are properly cared for and in a large enough space that they are not in a drastically environment than if outside the city. Neighbours would need to have a say possible, to lessen complaints.
- As long as the animal is treated humanly and checked up on by bylaw, it should be allowed.
- But, I've lived near hens before and the smell was overpowering. So there would have to be some plan for ensuring the owners understand proper care and cleaning of coops
- I like the idea of raising chickens but people need to be educated and go through a mandatory education and approval. Do many animals are put in harms ways for the dreams of humans.
- As long as the animals are taken care of properly and cleaned up after I don't see an issue with it. Maybe they should have to get consent with neighbors X amount of space away to have any livestock and they should be completely fenced at all times.
- A more robust food system is a safer food system especially at a time where you can suddenly be required to isolate for 14days
- as long as it is not detrimental to the surrounding urban wildlife
- Encouraging home owners to be a little more self & inter dependant. Having the support of adjacent neighbours is extremely important.
- As long as the livestock is not out of control/following reasonable expectations
- I think it's important that all animals no matter what they are should have appropriate living conditions
- Allowing us to urban farm is a great step towards lowering our carbon footprint. Eating fresh eggs from your own hens, or drinking milk from your own goats is something that myself and many of my close friends would love to be able to do. The "buying local" movement should also help out urban farmers. Calgary should pave the way for this!

- There would have to be limits imposed and guidelines for proper housing and care, but children need to know where some of their food comes from and care and consideration of livestock
- Depending on the size of the animal. Chickens should be allowed. Roosters no. Pigs should be allowed.
- As long as it doesn't create noise, smell or danger to dogs and or neighbors
- Animals are all innocent humans need animals to have humanity and kindness
- Cool!
- Eggs!
- Where space permit to keep animals it should be allowed
- As long as it would have a positive impact and animals would have suitable living conditions.
- Provided if an adjacent property changes ownership the permission be reviewed again.
- Certain livestock animals make great pets and could be reasonably accommodated in houses within the city limits.
- Sounds good.
- This would need to be supported out of respect for the neighbours, and there would need to be proper and adequate living conditions. Maybe a follow up once a year to ensure these conditions are being met?
- Good idea for people to reconnect with the food chain
- Only if they have explicit permission from all neighbors. Chickens are loud and smelly, which can carry within a block.
- Different types of livestock....a pig makes a fabulous pet....
- I think it is important for individuals to be able to grow and supply themselves with food like eggs should they wish to do so. There is no harm to the public to allow hens. Amazing idea.
- I absolutely support urban backyard chickens. I also feel that residents should not need pre-approval, or maybe if they have a large number of hens they should have more stringent requirements around housing/care to ensure the hens. & communities health. And if someone has 3 or less hens, there are less strict requirements.
- I believe as long as a person can submit a request to prove they are able to meet the requirements to maintain well being for the hen's, I think this would be a great idea.
- As long as there are measures in place for removal and elimination of escaped chickens.
- as long as the animals are suitably cared for.
- I love chickens
- I love chickens. I think they can be a positive thing for people in Calgary, as pets, and as egg-layers. I have no objection to people having a couple hens provided they are well cared for, especially in winter conditions.
- hens and goats if they remain on property with number of animals restricted based on yard size and fencing.
- As long there is cross property agreement.

- People should be able to support themselves by being able to provide their own basic needs. As long as a person has a suitable space and isn't torturing the animals they should be able to keep them. It should be a right to grow and produce your own food.
- As long as the hens are not going to bother any of the neighbors, there should be no issue.
- I think as long as the animals are being cared for they should be allowed. Also given that they aren't bothering neighbours, of course.
- Owning urban livestock is no different than owning pets really. Just as long as the same basic rules are complied with.
- When cared for appropriately, live stock carries the same risks as having a dog
- I think hens and chickens in a safe place is great.
- If the owners are responsible, shouldn't be a problem. Think it important to enforce limits on number of animals, including hens, as they tend to smell awful and neighbours would be affected.
- Increasing the ability for Calgarians to be sustainable should always be explored.
- I feel this would need to be regulated and tracked to ensure the hens are well cared for.
- Animals are animals and if you have the space for them, it should be fine
- I fully support that people should be able to have livestock or to keep unconventional pets, as long as they are being responsible and considerate of neighbours.
- Allow people to become more self sustaining, helping out communities with organic, happy hens. But hold those accountable to ensure the safety of wellbeing of the animals.
- Being able to have a small chicken coop would be helpful for those that may need to save money, and learn about more agriculture practices.
- Adjacent neighbours must be on board
- Urban chickens are a great resource for fresh eggs!
- as long as you're keeping the animals to a level where all neighbours agree and don't care about the noise, or if the noise can be kept to a minimum, I'm all for it.
- would be great if everyone could have access to fresh eggs.
- ONLY IF THEY ARE GOING TO BE TAKEN CARE OF PROPERLY. I don't really know how, if you're considering condemning certain breeds of dogs we can't control, you are going to enforce ethical laws about the treatment of other animals.
- I feel people have a disconnect from their food now day - I think it's good for people to earn and know where their food has come from
- As long as there's not too much smell.
- As long as the neighbours are ok with this why not?
- I believe people should be able to raise hens to increase self-sustainability, without interference from government, and without having to demonstrate community benefit.
- Adjacent neighbors MUST BE IN AGREEMENT. If livestock becomes a nuisance in a neighborhood, the livestock goes!

- I believe this would be great, allowing this would allow people to be more “off grid” and self dependant! As long as the animal has the proper space and environment it naturally needs as if it were wild
- I support hens or rabbits or other small animals. As long as a largish radius of neighbours approve. And no slaughtering being allowed on the property.
- As long as the owner keeps a clean area and noise and smell does not bother the neighbour
- As long as they're well taken care of, it would help feed calgarians locally and is environmentally friendly.
- People need to be given cheaper ways to feed their families with high food costs at supermarkets
- If someone has the means to create a suitable living space for livestock and they have support from their community than I have no problem with anyone having livestock.
- Around strict rules to size of property. Limit to amount of hens. Standards for expectations. Authority for the city to remove if a nuisance
- Makes sense to allow people to grow their own food!!
- Sure, let's license the pets/ livestock like dogs and cats, or in the case of fowl, the coop. And provide a database so we know where these are legally located.
- As long as the property and owner can provide suitable living arrangements and care - there should be education mandates in place to ensure the owner knows how to care for the livestock properly
- While looking for a future home my husband and I have decidedly not looked in Calgary because we cannot have chickens, and instead have been looking at moving away and commuting.
- As long as it's managed well and not bothering neighbours, I don't see why people can't have hens or other livestock on their property.
- So long as there is approval from current neighbours, I don't see why this would be an issue.
- Definitely need to ensure the nearby neighbours have the ability to veto this on legitimate grounds (noise, smells, etc.)
- As long as the animals are maintained and bylaw should have yearly inspections of their circumstances
- By including the community benefit and the adjacent neighbors this insures the well being of the animals.
- As long as all the needs of the animal are being met and can be taken care of
- Neighbors will control nuisance if any by discussion.
- As long as an animal is well cared for and provided for in the city I think more species should be allowed
- Every animal should be able to have a loving home
- If you have the space and the means to provide for the livestock I don;t see why it would be an issue, there are other bylaws governing noise etc..
- If surrounded by the appropriate regulations, other livestock animals (e.g. hens) can be well cared for without disrupting urban life. Regulations need to be explicit and well laid out with regards to number of birds, housing requirements, and what to do with sick/dead birds. There is a veterinarian (and right now a master's student) at the University of Calgary's Faculty of Veterinary Medicine currently studying backyard poultry flocks in Alberta who is very knowledgeable about the subject and may be worth consulting.

- Please allow urban hens! They are a wonderful addition to families and neighbourhoods
- People shouldn't own pigeons though
- I think having chickens is a great idea! As long as they are kept at a limit of 1-4. I do not think it is good to keep any other live stalk other than chickens.
- Hens have been allowed in other municipalities and it has gone successfully. I personally would like to have a pet hen if allowed.
- I love this idea!
- As long as the 'support from adjacent neighbors' is an open and clear process. The onus must be on the candidate who wants the livestock to seek to the support, not the neighbors to show that the candidate doesn't have the support.
- Hens are not noisy and if the owner cares for them, they have no smell. Hens are a better "neighbourly pet" than a dog. They cannot kill a person, don't hunt in packs, provide a sustainable animal friendly food source, good for insect pest patrol, etc.
- owning something as chickens could be beneficial. Maybe those who can't afford eggs or something can get their own eggs or sell them. And it helps with the grass to have them in the backyard, but they would need the proper care and space for them first.
- Smaller livestock such as goats or sheep, however I'd be concerned for any large livestock such as actual cattle. My main concern would be the proper living condition and/or being able to have multiple based on the space as they're social creatures.
- As long as there is no nuisance for the neighbourhood, and the owner has the habitat and animal experience and funds to properly care for (food, medicine, shelter).
- Provided the animals are safe and happy with enough space to live comfortably, this is a sustainable option for many families
- chickens fine, smaller pet pigs fine, rabbits for food fine as long as it's not too many, non canine service animals fine, but larger food animals not fine.
- I think this would be a great, as long as the hens are cared for and your neighbours don't mind!
- I think hens are a good idea provided they are taken care of just like any other animal in the home. I don't think other livestock should be considered such as goats pigs etc
- This is an important part of supporting sustainable communities.
- The positive environment and support from neighbours is important to avoid confrontation and a nuisance. The well being of the animal is important to provide a fulfilling life and health for everyone involved.
- Should have to obtain a license. Go through a process that is somewhat difficult so only committed people do it. Not people just trying something out that will get bored and neglect it. Otherwise chickens will become another animal people dump, sell on kijiji, abandon at the vet. Etc. when it gets too hard, too expensive, not enough fun, etc.
- I'm in favour of a small number of chickens for food (eggs). Concerned about extra cost to the City if cases have to be addressed individually

- Allow pet pigs and chickens
- This is a healthy and economical food option for many and also allows people to address ethical concerns about cruelty of factory farmed eggs and chicken
- I fully support this movement. I believe it's important to teach where your food comes from as well as utilizing kitchen cut offs and other grains to a fuller potential.
- "ONLY under the circumstances there are thorough processes to ensure livestock are actually under proper living conditions ONGOING.
- Checks throughout the year. Check each year at minimum."
- Yes! Certain animals can have a practical use and purpose in an urban environment, aside from the therapeutic or emotional/physical benefit of owning pets: i.e. pest control, provision of food, educational experiences, less waste, etc.
- A limit on the amount of hens and with approval of neighbours.
- Can't see why having hens would be an issue
- if people want and can care for chickens they should be allowed.
- Many animals less common to domesticity can make amazing pets, so Calgarians should be allowed to pursue that goal provided they have the consent of their neighbours and fellows
- This may help families raise their own source of protein therefore costing less in the end for groceries.
- people should be free to do what they want on their property
- I strongly support backyard chickens and would get them if it were permitted. My family is considering a move to the country because of limitations on livestock in the city.
- As long as the written support of neighbours was received
- Hens aren't a nuisance and can be delightful creatures. However they can be really really stinky so please limit the number.
- As long as livestock aren't a nuisance and adequate space is provided for the animals, I support it.
- Hens, in my experience, are not loud so there shouldn't be any noise problems. In small flocks they don't need a large yard to roam. Properly cared for hens do not have a strong odor. I don't see why not if the owner is capable of providing proper care.
- Sounds good
- Yes, why can't people have small livestock? This shouldn't be an issue, it should be allowed.
- Chickens are great for environment. They eat ticks and are great for composting
- In limited numbers. Chickens are cute and a great source of food. They are messy. & roosters are loud.
- As long as the hens are in clean living conditions it seems logical to allow people to have them.
- The animals will likely have a better life this way than most other ways animals are kept for food or other purposes. I think this is a great idea
- there would also need to be criteria in place for the # of livestock, etc. I feel all animals bring a benefit to their communities
- Between the support from neighbours and ensuring proper living conditions that should be enough.

- Other bylaws should still apply
- I think this is a great idea.
- Although some animals can be noisy and dirty, and rules would need to be established and enforced, small animals like hens should be allowed. Larger animals should not.
- Various types of livestock with in reason provides a healthier more sustainable environment. Would have to abide by noise and smell type bylaws.
- Hens in Calgary are a good idea in my opinion.
- We want chickens. Could stipulate a maximum number allowed.
- People can become more self sufficient
- so long as the noise level and smell from urban hens (i.e.) can be controlled. Chickens/hens/roosters are very noisy very early, and their coops are horrible for smell (speaking from experience)
- Sounds good to me
- If the animals are safe and won't be an issue for your neighbors then having a small number of livestock should be allowed
- If the living conditions for the animal are sufficient and adjacent neighbours don't mind any potential noise, I don't see any issues.
- The discretion should be the decision of a tribunal.
- If people can maintain small live stock well without bothering others I think it's fine
- As long as the living conditions of these animals are of quality and clean.
- As long as the above conditions are met
- Assuming the criteria listed above are enforced, I see no reason not to allow households to provide themselves (and possibly the neighbourhood) with a source of food.
- as long as the livestock did not impact neighbour's in a negative way such as smell or excessive noise
- People in urban areas should be able to feed themselves
- This is an important food security issue, particularly during this pandemic.
- We used to have chickens next door...they always came to the fence and said good morning.
- Allowing urban hens would be great! They provide a great source of eggs and residents in Calgary with better nutruecnce than store bought. The living conditions are better as well this making them my ideal choice for eggs.
- I think it's crazy this isn't already approved. Many cities and towns already allow this and it works well. I think as long as the above criteria is met then it should be a no brainer.
- na
- Properly housed hens are less noisy and cleaner than my neighbours dog!
- There of course must be rules on the numbers.
- I like the idea of community benefit, would have to have a limit and have permission from neighbours
- Backyard hens are a great idea.
- If above guidelines are followed I have no issue with this.

- Bring on the chickens. I want a baby goat
- Everyone has a right to homestead.
- Responsible owners would benefit from this.
- I see a lot of positive impact in the community by having hens and goats around. Would this bylaw approve the animal to be eaten? I would like to see regulations on that so the animal gets treated with respect, killed humanly and have hygienic methods
- Calgarians should be able to responsibly own farm animals for their own use.
- I dont see any issue with livestock in Calgary as long as they are properly cared for.
- I have known people with urban hens and they care deeply about their animals. I believe urban livestock to be of benefit to the community. With proper inspection, I see no health concerns with allowing them into the city. The only thing I would encourage is size requirements and restrictions. A cow cannot be kept in a tiny postage stamp, city size backyard, neither can a goat.
- as long as rules are followed i see no issue. Again the goal is responsible pet ownership not singling out specific breeds or in this case birds etc.
- As long as they are taken care of a cleaned up after, fresh eggs would be a bonus for the homeowners
- Sounds reasonable, support from adjacent neighbours is important.
- As long as they remain on their property and are cared for, they can do as they please
- If some one is responsible why noy?
- Perhaps having hens around will lower risk for dogs being attacked by wildlife such as coyotes.
- As long as the animals are safe and healthy and that the people in the community are happy, I don't see a problem.
- I am supportive of homeowners obtaining their own food. Ex. Eggs
- Pet pigs sound lit
- With limits on number of birds and no roosters
- I would love to be able to have goats. I have a huge yard.
- If suitable and safe conditions are met for the animal I see no problem keeping other animals in the city.
- Hens are no different than any other pet and actually provide something useful to families. They should absolutely be allowed
- Yes. But no, the neighbours have no say in what I do in my property. Now I just want to do it behind your back and not get approval at all. I don't get a choice of Becky next door wants 40 babies in 5 years. She doesn't get a choice if I want some chickens in my back yard. Her children are noises and smelly. No different than hens would be.
- These criteria seem reasonable.
- Most important is neighbor approval.
- I am apprehensive due to the smell and mess these animals can have and would not want to live next door to anyone with these pets, however, if regulated properly, don't see that it would be any different than having dogs.

- While I'm all for allowing Calgarians to raise fowl, I'd be in favour of starting with hens and seeing what problems arise and benefits are derived before moving on to allowing other livestock, and ultimately having size limits in place.
- If neighbours are on board and there are appropriate living conditions for the animal I don't see the harm. However there should probably be a maximum number allowed.
- Bylaws should be animal specific, be evidence based, and consider the welfare of the animal.
- I think hens would help with community engagement and sustainability. There was a yard with goats where I used to live in Yellowknife and their manure was provided to the neighbours for free. They were also a tourist attraction and the home owner gave tours about his sustainable lifestyle.
- Chickens are pets too
- I love animals. Goats and chicken would be fun to have
- I support this idea moving forward, so as long as complaints and issued are handled accordingly.
- As long as its done right. Having access to free range eggs will help communitys
- I think if people's living situations and ability to provide a happy life for the animal are assessed it's ok
- I support this based on that criteria. I would not support an all out allowance without some sort of criteria similar to that listed above.
- Hens lay eggs, eggs are food, people need food. Pretty simple.
- I agree with this but there is no need for roosters. It will become a noise issue in the future. Plus hens can produce eggs without a rooster.
- They can be a pet like any other animal just not in a large quantity
- No roosters
- Only if it's suitable and fair for the animal.
- If someone to properly care for an animal and provide for all of its needs then they should be able to keep it and care for it
- Sustainability. Good for composting. As with anything, keeping an animals living area clean and minimal smell is important for good neighbours.
- Its a good way (if done correctly) to let people have a bit more freedom to provide for themselves
- With the cost of living rising the public needs something to help even though it's just eggs they would get
- Like having urban chickens for personal fun ie eggs and for kids
- Welfare of the animals is most important and community support
- I'm all for allowing livestock in Calgary. As long as the animal has adequate space and shelter and doesn't create an eye sore or unkempt backyards
- I'd be interested in having hens and would like to know more about the possibility of using goats as a resource to control grass and weeds in the city
- Urban farming and livestock is a great step toward sustainability in our food supply
- If done correctly hens can be valuable food source for the community via eggs.
- Sustainability

- With appropriate enclosure for the hens. Pre-inspection process and license for animals.
- I fully support this.
- Livestock can be both pets and/or providers, Calgarians should be free to own/care for animals provided they can meet the above requirements.
- Livestock tend to be less noisy than dogs really. So I do not mind then in the city, if housed properly. Hens are also good support animals, provide fresh eggs which can help people who are struggling financially as they are very cheap to maintain.
- It is reasonable and shows responsibility
- more and more people are finding means to save money and earn additional money. Any way that people respectfully can sustain their families without fear of contaminations to their food, I am supportive.
- Yes
- as long as the animal is properly cared for and kept in clean conditions what type of pet that makes someone happy should be their own business
- They belong on farms not city
- People should be allowed to keep animals as long as those animals are properly cared for.
- As long as there were clear bylaws outlining the health and safety requirements of the animals, and these were being ensured through licensing and bylaw checks, etc
- But it must be supported by neighbours.
- As long as these animals have what they need and the owners understand the caretaking of the animals
- How is a chicken for example different then keeping a pigeon on a property. also there can be significant good that comes from keep wildlife on property as long as it is well managed and cared for. By law officers would need training in what constitutes suitable living conditions.
- As long as rules are enforced, I'm fine with urban hens.
- Let us have hens
- People should be free to do what they wish on private property, as long as the animal is properly cared for and not a nuisance
- A pet is a pet no matter the type of animal. As long as they are treated well it sounds good.
- Seems positive
- Of course. The more we can rely on ourselves, have natural food and help animals live a suitable life is great.
- No more then 2-3 and must be well kept and clean with out smelling up the yard
- Chickens don't tend to make a lot of noise at night and only really click when there's an issue or when paying an egg. Dogs actually are much louder. Quails also are mostly quiet pets that can provide eggs for food.
- Chickens would be nice as long as maintained.
- If the animals will not cause grief to neighbours, and the animal is able to be properly cared for I see no issue with someone wanting one!

- Raising minor livestock in the city is growing increasingly necessary in our current recession, which will only be worsened in the fallout from COVID
- Limits would have to be considered.
- I think we need to be more accommodating of animals in general. If the neighbors are good with it and the animal can be cared for in that location then it should be allowed.
- Sustainable for private consumption
- livestock should be allowed but only if the appropriate living conditions for the animals are met
- allow hens to be kept as long as there are rules to keep the hens in proper conditions (space, terrain, etc)
- Giving people alternative options to sustainable and healthy food sources (like eggs and free range meats) will improve the health of members of our city. It also has other benefits, for example, it's proven that children raised with livestock develop far fewer and less serious allergies. It may also have an impact (however small) on climate change and animal abuse; people raising animals like free-range chickens may reduce their need to buy products like eggs and chicken meat. This in turn reduces the need for chickens to be raised commercially, where they're often kept in inhumane conditions (and commercially raised animals for food supply is a massive contributor to global warming). If a property has the size and proper facilities to house livestock, the owners want to raise said livestock, and even the neighbourhood is supportive? Not only do I see nothing wrong with it, I believe it will add to the list of the many wonderful and unique reasons the City of Calgary is a great place to live!
- So long as the owner is responsible who cares what they do. The animal does not decide.
- Unban hens and other small livestock such as birds, goats, sheep, pigs should be allowed in urban properties with bylaws for high expectations of animal living conditions.
- Chickens and other small farm animals should be allowed as long as people consider their neighbors and work together.
- I believe that people have the right to have urban animals as long as safety rules are followed.
- I think the city should become more self sufficient and people should be allowed to own hens on their property. In addition, pigs make great house pets and should be considered in the amendment
- Benifital for community
- I think small livestock is okay and only if there's enough space for the animal to roam
- a few laying hens in a personal garden does present more positive benefits than negative.
- Hens can be therapeutic for some people.
- Social distancing. Get me away. Chickens.
- It could be a great opportunity for people as long as there is compliance with the bylaws
- Some folks need a special animal to help them cope with mental illness or other disabilities.
- No comment
- Chickens in a controlled environment would be suitable pets and urban farming to produce eggs for the household.
- Hens are of little nuisance and a great first step into urban agriculture and education for children.
- It could help with food insecurity in some households .

- Sounds good as long as the hens are well cared for
- This provides another resource for the community of done responsibly. We need to take in account the living condition of the animals and the disturbance it may cause surrounding neighbors.
- I think it would be a great thing for any community as long as there are suitable living conditions for the animal.
- Citizens should have the choice to have hens within their own private homes. As long as adjoining neighbours agree and the livelihood of the hens are up kept.
- All natural resources for food and such items would be good for the entire Calgary community and also provide an opportunity for parents to teach their kids more responsibility and give them an opportunity to invest in their future and see if it's something they may want to do for their lives
- Allowing hens into Calgary is fine, as long as it doesn't do extensive harm to a community or person, it's fine.
- People should be encouraged to be more a part of the animal to plate process.
- Aside from the smell that certain animals may have, I don't see this as an immediate issue.
- Hens can be produce for families. For eggs, and meat. They are beneficial to farms and I think in Calgary they would be as well.
- Hens are a food source and require minimal space. Having appropriate conditions for hens and keeping them allows people to take charge of their own food supply.
- [removed] YESS GIMME DEM BACKYARD CHICKENS AND BEEHIVES
- IF other livestock are cared for well, benefit the community or have a positive impact, and are not a nuisance in the community, I feel urban areas like Calgary will benefit from a larger variety of animals in the community serving various purposes.
- Urban Hens would be a benefit to communities.
- People should be able to create and support a sustainable lifestyle, should they do so responsibly.
- as long as they are pets, not being raised for food. NO backyard butchers.
- People should be able to bring hime any animal that makes them happy.
- I want hens and other livestock
- If owners are following rules and regulations on their property, I don't see any issue.
- I would love a couple hens in my garden to feast on my abundant slogs and other pests as well as giving my family some eggs.
- I fully endorse all local food growing and sustainability initiatives.
- If a resident lives in a home where they can care for the livestock, not create a community burden such as an eye sore, noise violation and are respecting their neighbors around them then sure. Even better if they are willing to offer up resources to their fellow community members.
- Yes, within reason and care
- As long as the animal's welfare is not compromised by living in the city and it doesn't disrupt the community, livestock could provide several services that would be useful

- I do however the support of the neighbours should have a condition that is an acrimonious relationship can be proven it shall be waived. The reason to decline the animals by the neighbours should fall under certain conditions, allergies, cannot care for current animals, smell, noise, etc.
- I'm on the fence about this to be honest.
- Hens are cute and fun
- Because livestock in the city sounds awesome.
- people should be able to keep whatever animal they want on their property, as long as there is mandatory enclosure cleanliness standards. As well as a consideration for neighbour's with regard to noise and smell
- If the animals are taken care of properly, there shouldnt be restrictions on what people should and shouldnt have
- As long as it does not affect neighbours and proper living conditions can be provided
- Urban hens would be a great addition to the cities diversity and allow people to explore self stustainability
- I think it's a great idea.
- I think it's helpful to the environment
- I would like to have my own chickens.
- Some people have animals and abuse them. It should be mandatory to see if the animal(s) are living in a safe, healthy and happy environment.
- urban livestock is the best answer for personal/community sustainability.
- I would support if adjacent neighbours had to give permission - including if someone new moved in.
- Chickens provide fertilizer, eat insects, and provide breakfast! They should be allowed
- I think this is a great idea, and that if someone has the knowledge and set up to take care of these animals properly, then who is to stop them.
- My mother in law raised her own chickens where she lived (out of town) and I think, along with community gardens and peoples desire to be more self-sustainable, this would be fine.
- Assuming that the animals do not cause nuisance or disturb neighbors.
- Why not?
- I am not familiar with untraditional "pets", but if they are not a nuisance and are well cared for I do not see a problem
- Love the idea. As long as people do it responsibly.
- As long as all parties are happy including neighbors and the animals are healthy and not causing problems with the neighbors
- If am I visual has the means to provide and care for the live stock, having it in Calgary should be okay
- Self sustainability is a human right. If being responsible, it should not be denied
- Animal welfare is my only concern
- As long as any livestock is well taken care of it is fair for someone to own them. If it were to benefit the community or neighbours in some way that is just a bonus.

- Only if properly regulated and animals aren't hoarded, being made to suffer and are properly taken care of
- Livestock could live in the city, but there is very rarely a cause for that. Would need to ensure they have adequate space.
- If the animal can be properly cared for I think the benefits it can provide for a family and the community is amazing.
- Many cities allow for their residents to own smaller livestock which can save the residents money.
- If a case by case basis is looked at for the safety of the animal and any possible impact of people around it should be fine
- I support as long as all cases be thoroughly investigated.
- I have always been open to the idea of backyard chickens in the city.
- As long as the living conditions are met and everyone in the area is agreed, this seems like a fair amendment.
- Why not? Hens don't even crow at dawn. There is literally no drawback unless you don't like eggs
- Other small livestock that provide eggs like Ducks should also be permitted.
- As long as the animal is well cared for. That the property doesn't suffer/decline and doesn't become a bad nuisance that it really shouldn't matter.
- If they don't make a nuisance I agree
- Common sense
- I think it's a great improvement
- Open to changes
- If it was evaluated on a case by case basis I would not see a problem with that
- Farm fresh eggs and hens are amazing.
- If my friend wants a goat, and is capable of giving that goat a good life and maintaining a healthy lifestyle, I say go for it.
- You would require a certain property to have chickens. It can't just be anyone.
- As long as they have enough space and the smell is controlled
- Only if the livestock benefits the neighbourhood and they approve and support the animal(s). This could be a nice addition to any community.
- There's no reason smaller livestock animals (hens, dwarf goats, etc) shouldn't live in the city provided they are not a nuisance
- Only if they served as pets and treated the same as other pets we currently allow. They should not be allowed as sources of food.
- If someone wants hens, let them have hens.
- "Urban farming is immensely beneficial to individuals, families, communities."

- I do not support neighbors being able to provide input in the application process."

- As long as the animals are well taken care of and the neighbour's don't mind, I don't see any harm in it.
- It's a good thing
- Chicken provide food a good way to support our local community
- I would love hens
- The more people can accessibly farm their own food the better.
- I believe that allowing certain livestock to be raised within the city limits has many positive impacts from education about raising animals to more organic food opportunities.
- Absolutely - fantastic idea as long as it is carried through properly. And well thought through by a qualified city employee.
- Why not? Lets encourage real food, food accessibility, and life-style choices that are good for physical and mental health.
- So many other places around the world are doing it and it is a sustainable way of living, growing food and being able to provide eggs for yourself would be a positive for more sustainable living. I've also heard chickens being emotional support for people. I cannot see any cons as long as they are contained properly, and they are being maintained as well as their coop being maintained properly.
- Yes, hens would be great.
- I don't see anything wrong with it but it would depend on the type of livestock.
- They should require a permit.
- People should be allowed to grow their food as long as it does not interfere with others
- As long as they would be properly taken care of and housed properly the yes I agree
- I don't see any harm in fresh eggs, as long as the hens have an adequate environment to live in the city.
- I think this would benefit communities and households while also taking weight off the environmental impact of the livestock industry
- I feel it is just.
- It can be an opportunity for opening a business and jobs.
- a great way to promote community engagement as well as self sufficiency
- A balanced approach is needed
- More and more we need to rely on our own gardens and if possible sources of eggs or maybe Goat milk :) to help lower industrial food production for the environment.
- It would help community and self sufficiency
- Just a good idea. Why not as long as it's not bothering the neighborhood
- If they keep the peace with neighbours, why wouldn't someone be allowed hens?
- By allowing livestock you allow people to obtain their own local products.
- As long as the animals are properly taken care of and provided for, I don't see an issue with this at all.
- Suitable living conditions needs to be of utmost importance, along with neighbour support
- Some animals currently considered livestock can live comfortably as pets or support animals.

- I think that as long as the impact would be positive and the surrounding neighbours are consulted it would be a great addition
- So many reasons to support increasing the connectivity to our food chain and ensuring our plots of land are productive whether it be a chicken coop, permaculture or xeriscaping. 100% supportive of this!!
- I see no reason to say no. But people must be conscious of animals' well-being.
- Provided the City makes sure these animals are well taken care of and not a nuisance (noise, smell etc)
- Urban Hens are a great hobby project for a lot of responsible Calgarians. They should absolutely be allowed in the city.
- Limited numbers in appropriate space with set distance from other properties to avoid pollution from noise or smell would be acceptable.
- As long as proper Cleanliness and living conditions are met
- Individuals need to be more self sufficient and be aware of where their food comes from. Factory farming needs to be reduced as much as possible with people producing as much as they can for themselves in an ethical, safe way.
- I'd prefer my neighbor to have chickens over barking dogs. Chickens are rarely a nuisance.
- Urban chicken coops are good for the community
- I want chickens, I have the yard for it, and my neighbors would love the fresh eggs I can give them.
- Provided the animals are cared for, and have a suitable home - go for it.
- Essential to obtain support from neighbours & have this regularly reassessed
- I feel hens would be a great addition to some families.
- I support this only if there are limits and strict guidelines on cleanliness and where they are to be kept.
- Because it would be educational to younger kids to learn where their food comes from and how to look after animals.
- "If the neighbours don't mind the hens, then I don't see the issue"
- . Provided that the hens are in a suitable enclosure fit for all 4 seasons."
- I love chickens
- don't want farm next door but if done responsibly would consider.
- I feel that if anyone is going to own any kind of pet or animal then the living conditions/standards for a healthy living environment should be met.
- If the criteria are met, why not have urban livestock.
- Yes, hens should be allowed in limited numbers, up to maybe 6. They would be no more annoying than all the magpies squawking.
- Other livestock if sufficient space is available and neighbours have been consulted. Especially for therapy animals.
- Hens are good for local food sources

- I think there are many benefits if someone wants to raise their own hens for eggs; especially if they're able to share the wealth for the community.
- But only with a low number of hens to reduce smell.
- if the owners know what they're doing they should be allowed to do what they like.
- Urban hens are a benefit to their owners and their communities, complaints can easily be dealt with in the same manner as dog/cat complaints.
- People should be able to grow/raise their own food if it is not disruptive to others (smell and noise)
- Permission from adjacent neighbors should be required for livestock animals like chickens and even backyard beehives
- It's someone's right to have what they would like on their property.
- Having chickens are good for ones health for having eggs.
- There is the potential for livestock within an urban setting to be a nuisance to the neighborhood. Noise, smell, feed, etc... there should be zoning as to what livestock can be raised in which type of dwelling/property.
- Important that people have rights to pets that are not common for the majority
- Local is sustainable!
- It provides families with the ability to raise their own food source.
- as long as the home in question is a single detached, and other nuisance bylaws are being followed
- I believe small goats make great pets too and are considered livestock.
- If they can be housed and breed safely then I don't see any reason to disallow owning them
- I think people within the city should be allowed to have chickens as pets or a few other types of animals. Many different animals make great pets. Restrictions on how many of each animal per household should be in place.
- I approve with the conditions that the owners are held to high standards of care of the animals and the number of each type is restricted, which if done properly, should ensure the community is protected.
- It would need to be controlled. In cityscape currently there is a hard that has probably hundreds of pigeon type birds. They make a massive mess and are actually quite gross. I wouldn't want to live by hens if it was the same.
- Small livestock could provide diversity to a community.
- Many people prefer farm animals, so as long as the animals can be properly cared for and the city agrees to it, I don't have an issue with it.
- Having livestock can allow people to have a low impact lifestyle, however they would need to be educated on the needs and behaviour of the animal they wish to have.
- A few Henson make no more noise, mess or stench than a dog in fact on a noise level it's likely significantly less.
- I think this would be a wonderful opportunity for people trying to avoid the mass farming industry where animals are not treated properly. owners of hens should be offering suitable living conditions and the welfare of the animal wouldn't be compromised for profit.

- Hens should be allowed
- As long as living conditions for the animal are indeed adequate
- "I have a large double lot, and hand made enclosures for chinchillas and a rabbit. Large 8x6 pens with all enrichment they could want.
- I would love to have 2-3 birds. It should be allowed if proper animal welfare was maintained."
- i think if the right rules are put in place this type of expansion to other animals can work. But needs to be followed up for compliance
- Yay chickens.
- Having grown up around farm animals, as long as the animals are humanely treated, it is within reason (property too small for cattle and most pigs) and if neighbours agree, go for it.
- If people are properly knowledgeable about the livestock, they should be allowed to have the animals they choose.
- As long as animals are receiving proper care, urban farming is great for sustainability.
- If suitable living conditions are met, and the neighbours have no issues, why not?
- This pushes self sustainability and food production in the city. Surprise surprise though, the owners must be reviewed.
- I agree with the criteria
- Why not let people keep chickens?
- Given proximity of homes to each other - and differing needs of households it would be imperative to allow neighbors to weigh in on the ongoing effects, maintenance and challenges.
- If the animal is being properly taken care of, and is not creating a nuisance, why not allow them to be kept? What separates these animals from the typical "pet" animals?
- Growing your own food should always be allowed within reason and with no encroachment on your neighbors.
- If all of the above conditions are met, there's no reason not to.
- I think it would be great to see more animal breeds in the city
- Fantastic idea!
- Only if the animal isn't for human consumption for example, raising rabbits only to kill them in order to eat them.
- Yes, with the condition that all neighbours are agreeable to hens or else the owner has taken enough precautions to ensure that their neighbours are comfortable or not disturbed by hens. I personally do not like hens/chickens/etc. As long as they never get in my property or are super disturbing, or any of their messes end up on my property (feather, feed, feces, etc), I don't mind.
- It's a great idea!
- But with strict requirements
- I would support this with the use of animal control officers to inspect properties before obtaining the animals and after to ensure proper care, living conditions and food
- I would want fresh eggs every morning this knowing the animal is properly cared for
- Only makes sense

- I would much prefer some livestock over my neighbours dog who they let outside to bark all day long! As long as proper care/husbandry is in place and the animal is not nuisance to neighbours I have no issue.
- As long as it's done right and it doesn't affect the neighborhood why not allow an animal to be cared for
- If people are responsible I see no reason why hens can't be kept. It can have an educational impact on children in the community as well as a source of
- As long as it is not an animal that poses an obvious substantial danger.
- I hate the bylaw about hens and small livestock. Times might get lots harder. There is no good reason for the hen bylaw and it infringes on rights to provide food for ones family.
- As long as responsible pet ownership rules apply
- If its within peoples yards and there are regulations, i support this!
- I don't have anything against it as long as there is no animal abuse.
- just chickens, no other livestock within the city. How will the approval from neighbour's work? What about niwghbors who rent? Or when someone new moves in?
- If the outcome is positive I'm for it
- It's important to encourage sustainable living
- If the city had programs for kids, teens even adults to take care of the hens it be a fantastic program.
- Chickens
- Chickens are a great way to teach responsibility to children and supply food.
- I think this is a progressive approach to increasing urbanization that allows urban dwellers to be more engaged with their own food production (eggs, honey, etc.) and with nature in general.
- I like the idea of a case by case basis and not broad application but recognize that it would require a lot of time and resources from bylaw enforcement.
- Eggs!
- Permitting live stock in Calgary may help our economy. People might be more inclined to buy local produce
- Why not let people have hens. As long as they are looked after and cared for correctly.
- Only if the home isn't fenced
- I think having urban hens would be a good idea as long as they are well taken care of like any other pet.
- I believe urban farming is beneficial to all. As long as the owners of such animals take care of them, so not put them in dangerous conditions (poor weather), and are considerate of neighbours I think this is a great idea.
- I support having well cared for livestock pets who may be a comfort or support to someone or a resource such as eggs
- as long as they keep the birds clean and healthy I have no problems
- Support chickens, goats, sheep, small livestock, not large such as cows

- Localizing sustainability and food production is a wonderful opportunity for all generations and teaches empathy, care and humane treatment
 - If the owners are responsible, and the neighbors don't mind the smell and sounds of them, then they should be allowed. But issues arise when new neighbors move in. So it should be reassessed on a yearly basis.
 - If adequate living conditions for the animal can be provided then I support this bylaw. Livestock should be more accessible.
 - As long as there isn't enough to be a nuisance or cause a lot of foul smells it should matter. It's not like someone having 5 dogs is less than 1 or 2 chickens
 - Yes I believe this is sensible criteria of hen ownership and I approve.
 - Only if the hens are treated and kept responsibly.
 - Fresh produce
 - As long as there's distance between houses and minimal to no disturbances to the neighbours
 - Only if noise from hens can be controlled and does not impact neighbours
 - As long as the animal is cared for properly and proper space anyone should be allowed to care for them. That being said they would have to be cared for properly (space inside/out as applicable, feeding, exercise, attention)
 - I do not see the harm.
 - "I fully support hens and other animals on city property. The benefits are great, this would support families ability to provide for themselves and creates an opportunity to share and bring community together.
- I have been speaking to many people about this topic and have not yet encountered someone that is against this. I hope we can allow people to live how they choose and not allow the few complainers to prevent this."
 - Everyone should be able to support their own food needs!!
 - Dogs and cats are not the only pets people need.
 - Calgarians should be able to support themselves with fresh and organic food if they so choose.
 - If done responsibly it's possible
 - Many cities allow hens. As long as people are being responsible.
 - Animals and their welfare should be part of our daily life.
 - If the animals are taken care of then livestock should be permitted
 - Seems fine for people to want hens or livestock if they have support from neighbors.
 - Chickens are good pets
 - It has worked in many other urban settings, so as long as community members are notified and feedback is collected, it's worth a shot.
 - As long as numbers don't exceed an unmanageable amount. Or I suppose in other words, disease and bacteria is manageable.

- If the care of the animals and neighbors is taken into account there's no reason someone shouldn't be able to keep hens.
- As long as the animals are of an appropriate size, are well cared for, and don't cause a disturbance in their neighborhood, there is no reason for people not to keep those kinds of animals on their properties.
- Strong property rights are a cornerstone of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Being able to obtain an economic or social well being should be encouraged, urban chicken and livestock programs are a positive.
- I would love to have chickens, and I think anyone should be allowed to have chickens, either as a pet or therapy animal.
- As long as the living conditions were suitable and the neighbors were ok with it. My concern is for the well being of the animal and noise/odor/etc is not effecting others.
- Hens and other small poultry (ducks, quails etc.) but nothing larger. Should be caps on numbers and subject to same animal protections as any other pet. Would not support sale of produce or meat from such livestock. Personal use only.
- I agree with Hens specifically
- If it is beneficial for the community and everyone agrees to them being there it makes sense to allow it.
- If the animals are treated well and aren't disturbing anyone they should be allowed to have them.
- As long as animals are well cared for.
- Chickens/ ducks provide a source of food.
- As long as people aren't overcrowding and are keeping coops clean, etc...
- I have a friend that houses chickens and they are freaking adorable, I would love that. Plus I am an animal lover have had many different kinds over the years giving in to my kids w rabbits, chinchillas, snakes, rabbits, hedge hogs, dogs, cats and almost anything else you can think of.
- I feel keeping small livestock such as chickens is a great way to help provide some extra food for a family.
- I think if the people are responsible and understand the animals needs, why not?
- I think there needs to have assurance for responsible ownership, ensuring their health is a priority and completing training. Particularly around what you do with them when they stop laying or 'stop being useful' for what the majority likely expect they are for. I also don't think neighbour support should be required.
- As long as the neighbouring houses are okay with it
- Have small livestock in a controlled space can provide both economic support and emotional support to a person or family buy providing grocery items.
- As long as it does not disturb neighbors, I see no reason for people to not keep/ have small livestock on private property
- On a case by case bases - and with support to neighbour much like we have backing regarding noisy dogs in the neighborhood
- I would support chickens

- chickens, small pigs, miniature horses and donkeys could all be kept in a large property. There would have to be good housing for them as well as good sanitation.
- As long as not bothersome or eye sore to neighbors and neighborhood.
- As long as there are good living conditions and a large enough penalty to deter people if they are found to be abusing the animal.
- You should be allowed chickens on your private property.
- As long the situation is monitored by the city, and all parties affected by the by-law change are happy, I see no reason to deny people livestock if they desire them.
- Chickens provide both eggs and meat and help cut down the cost of groceries.
- None
- Hens can help low income families provide food
- other places support it, why are you being a stick in the mud
- I think urban agriculture and farming to increase knowledge of food sources is a great idea!!
- I like the idea of folks consulting neighbours, and creating a great environment for other critters
- If you have your adjacent neighbors permission
- Just no roosters
- I do feel there is a strong need for the collective benefit - all neighbours should have a right to weigh in if their property is not rural, as this would affect property value, potentially increased noise pollution, bad odours etc
- Letting people grow their own food shouldn't be an issue in a First World Country like Canada.
- On a balance of nuisance, no one is banning kids or dogs in backyards. If someone wants to keep a couple chickens or a small pig or goat, then as long as they're following bylaw, then I have no issue with it. Backyard animals are more humane than commercial farms, you gain some food security/independence, and you don't need to worry about commercial industrial chemicals (ie hormones or antibiotics)
- Hens and support animals add value to the city
- As long as they are clean and taken care of, local production of products is amazing!
- Because it's funny
- Support from neighbours is key. All neighbours residing two houses from the home which houses livestock in all directions should be petitioned for approval.
- Yes but only if these chickens are getting proper veterinary care and there is a record of it. They would need to keep their pens really clean as well to avoid over whelming smells
- As long as people know what they're doing and the animals are well cared for.
- Sustainability
- Na
- Urban hens are sustainable and environmentally friendly
- As long as the animals are properly and humanely cared for and not a nuisance to neighbours.

- It would be a good way for individuals to be able to live in a more sustainable and healthy way. Hens make little noise, can be kept in a fenced yard, and would have no negative effects on the community.
- Totally Fine with it, if probably managed
- I support chickens and pigs within the city as long as they are properly cared for.
- As long as adjacent neighbours are ok with having livestock near their homes and the livestock are not a nuisance to the neighborhood, I would be fine with that. However, frequent visits to the home where livestock are being raised should be done to ensure that their living environment is still suitable.
- I'm against putting restrictions on pit bulls. I'm disappointed with Calgary that they are even considering it.
- They're not much different than cats or dogs.
- I support the above conditions and requirements.
- I worry about NYMBism from neighbours and wonder if their support should not be needed in order to have hens. I think if suitable living conditions can be provided for the animals there is no need for neighbours to approve.
- I think hens could provide a valuable resource in Calgary homes
- Happy with the criteria
- These are animals too
- Hens are not a nuisance and provide food. Who wouldn't love fresh eggs in the morning!
- If the hens offered a benefit to the community without creating noise, smell, or property value/appeal of neighboring houses to decrease.
- I think urban hens would be a positive sustainable addition to neighborhood, as long as the neighbors are taken into account if their are complaints
- Hens can be a great source of protein in eggs and with economy and many people food poor. City residents deserve the the benefits that non urban residents have.
- If someone is taking care of and supporting an animal properly, why not?
- Animals need to be protected
- Definitely agree to sign off from neighbours, noise restrictions (eg no cockerels!!) but small livestock kept well and cleanly should be permitted.
- I support the option to keep hens in backyards.
- I like the idea of urban livestock. Appropriate green space would be needed though. Could potentially grow into something like a community garden which would be a very positive impact for communities.
- As long as proper chicken coop is also necessary and that the yard/coop can be inspected by animal welfare. And that the cops must be cleaned on a regular basis.
- I've grown up around poultry in a farm setting and do know that a small flock in an urban setting could be a beneficial addition to yards. Chickens are less bothersome than dogs or pot smoking neighbours, both of which are legal.
- I've been in backyards where there currently are chickens and if kept properly you can't even tell.

- Many of my friends have hens in Bowness and it has been a positive experience. As long as they aren't loud, smelly, or mistreated, I think they're great.
- Many 'farm' animals make really good pets and it would provide healthier, more affordable options for people. As long as that animal(s) can be provided for and are cleaned up regularly, I see no reason to disallow them.
- Urban farming in small, manageable numbers should be considered.. it could be very helpful to efforts of sustainability and "buying local". As long as it is all manageable, as in noise, odours, etc.
- I think this would be very beneficial to have.
- Far too many restrictions on this. Time to get back to the earth.
- I would love to have chickens.
- This question is confusing. Hens, absolutely support. Other livestock? Not really.
- Why not.
- I like chickens.
- Many people have pet pigs. This should be ok.
- Sustainable living should be encouraged by anyone who wants to engage in it. Having hens for eggs is part of it. They also are great recyclers of kitchen scraps, are great at catching and consuming pests, and their droppings, mixed with compost make fabulous fertilizer.
- it's legal to have a pigeon coop in your backyard in calgary.... or 20 parrots. Responsible pet ownership should be the foundation of the bylaw. If chickens can be kept responsibly (proper animal welfare, not stinking up the neighbours, not aggressive, etc) then thumbs up to having them.
- I see no issue with allowing people to keep livestock provided they are able to care for the animal properly.
- People should need to prove their knowledge and commitment to the animals prior to obtaining a permit for them. If there was no regulation I suspect that they would be obtained on impulse and become a huge burden on our farm animal rescue groups. Hopefully with proper education more people would be able to help these animals and provide homes.
- I grew up on a farm chickens are harmless but they are noisy (roosters). A requirement for them to be kept a minimum distance from neighbours would be necessary.
- I don't see why a person should be prohibited from owning hens, especially in light of nuisance bylaws. If the hens are treated properly and the hens don't impact neighbours enjoyment of their property there is no reason no to allow it.
- I love having chickens growing up and I believe that Calgary should look inward for day to day resources instead of importing them or buying from a supply chain.
- Chickens are a great addition to the the city! They help the neurodiverse and they can provide food. Other livestock like goats and pigs have the same kind of effect for the neurodiverse as well.
- It seems like common sense
- I like the idea of people growing their own food, would maybe bring neighbours closer together.
- Hens make great pets. Not just for feasting.
- Idk
- I agree with the above conditions and would love to see people with these animals as pets

- I want free eggs!!! Fully support urban hens pending immediate neighbours' approval and agreement.
- I believe that we should allow low scale urban agriculture with livestock, subject to standards that must be met
- I couldn't believe this was a law when I looked into it. People have a right to enjoyment in their own property, this falls under that category
- As long as these animals would not create excessive noise, smells, or other adverse impacts in the neighbours and neighbourhood, I do not see why this would be a problem.
- As long as people are taking proper care of their animals I don't see why it would be an issue on their private property.
- I think chickens are lovely additions to homes
- In support of hens - if someone wants their own eggs and organic food for better quality of life, why not?
- With limits
- I support having limited livestock on one's property provided there are clear rules that must deal with cleanliness of property, noise, safety etc.
- Having raised chickens, both free ranged and penned, chickens are great pets. They're no more of a nuisance than an ill trained dog. And let's be honest, there's tons of those.
- Hens make eggs. Eggs feed people. Less processed foods are better for people. Free range eggs are better. Why NOT let people farm their own eggs. Healthy for us all. Hens are not noisy.
- Finally!
- I think this would be super beneficial for families and community well-being, as well as educational for kids, particularly during this pandemic when we are all having harder times and need to be more resourceful.
- No
- I think exceptions would be good to explore
- small groups of chickens, all maintained are no problem
- If it is controlled I see no issue with allowing beneficial livestock in the city.
- As long as they had no more than 2. The smell and mess doesn't get out of control
- The fact is as long as the animals are cared for according to their specific needs there's definitely no issues.
- I should not have to explain to you why we should be able to responsibly keep care for and harvest eggs from chickens when someone can have an iguana or python as a pet
- Bring in the hens !
- I think support from neighbours is key here.
- Urban farming can be good for citizens and their environment.
- Urban hens are doing fine in so many jurisdictions.
- No killing of livestock and humane treatment must be enforced, but otherwise this is a good idea. They're no more of a bother than nuisance dogs.

- As long as potential owners are accountable and responsible for the animals and the animals are receiving proper care and husbandry in accordance to their species, there should be no issue in ownership of said animals.
 - This is a great idea, as long as animals are kept in good conditions.
 - Animal welfare needs to be ensured.
 - A way to assist in people lowering their food bills and providing education to the youth and the community. As long as the hens are taken care of humanely
 - There would also need to be restrictions on noise concerns along with proper clean up and disposal
 - I don't see why not
 - Many people in our city have large properties and could easily have a well cared for animal on their property. I believe the option (with criteria to be met) would be excellent for our city
 - As long as they are well cared for! But they should be checked on occasionally by the city.
 - Why not? Donkeys, hens, geese, and more are no less disruptive to a neighbourhood than the dogs that never shut up, or the cats that are released everywhere with no care.
 - Allows for more sustainable living. Along with therapy animals
 - "Only yes if 1) all adjacent neighbours support it (or if one vetoes it it doesn't happen). 2) the project needs to reapply every 3-5 years with full adjacent neighbour support (same as new application), and 3) Allowing backyard chickens does not grandfather them in to the property. A new owner should have to reapply as a fresh application.
- I am mostly worried about the smell and noise, and would be concerned if a neighbour had this in their backyard. I would also be worried about saying ""yes"" to it, because if it turned out horrible, there would be no trial period or chance to say something at a renewal."
 - if someone has appropriate room on their property they should have the right to do whatever they want with it
 - covid has made it harder to buy food. Having chickens would solve some of the problems.
 - Self provision is healthy in a multitude of ways. Cost savings, covid/supply chain. Farm animals (type dependent) are not far from domestic cats/dogs.
 - Clean living conditions, and ensuring smell does not affect neighbours would be important to me.
 - Chickens are good
 - With proper bylaws in place and appropriate education for owners and neighbors, urban hens can be an enriching source of food and companionship for owners.
 - Good way for children to learn, fresh eggs and meat
 - If you can have a garden for vegetables, you can have a chicken for eggs
 - all of the conditions listed i support for people to have other types of animals. neighbors/neighborhood approval is most important to me.
 - Yes, but livestock and chickens should be registered or licensed
 - I would like to be able to keep a goat or chickens on my property.

- As long as my neighbour maintained a clean and presentable yard and well kept animals I have no issue
- I think this seems reasonable, i think case by case might be important, as I wouldn't want to live next to a full on farmyard, however I totally agree with being able to self sustain on my own property while respecting my neighbors quality of life.
- I know multiple people who would like to be able to own hens and I have nothing against any neighbors choosing to own livestock as long as the animals are cared for well.
- Hens are great!
- Hens are fantastic pets and supply healthy food! Let people keep up to 4 and there will be no smell or harm.
- Hens to rid of ticks. Also allow chickens for fresh eggs.
- Urban farming is a great way to reduce environmental impact
- Strict regulations as people could set them free
- I fully support it as long as the resources are there to monitor it. That would be my biggest concern.
- The amendments are agreeable
- If the animals are being well cared for, have an adequate living space and are not impeding neighbours ability to enjoy their own property, urban livestock could be a great way for people to supplement their groceries, as well as provide enjoyment for their owners and also serve as a teaching tool about the food chain and how to respect nature
- This is great, caring for animals like these are a great therapy for urban livers
- It's fun
- Hens are sweet pets. I grew up on an acreage and we had pet hens. I would love to have a couple to have a humane way to obtain eggs and teach my daughter about caring for animals.
- Nieghbours can be unreasonable/have personal vendettas for others and should maybe not be a large factor.
- we need urban hens!
- Hens are sweet pets. I grew up on an acreage and we had pet hens. I would love to have a couple to have a humane way to obtain eggs and teach my daughter about caring for animals.
- I think it's a great opportunity for urban livestock with the following rules you've placed above! Could be very beneficial for communities!
- As long as the animals were well cared for and kept in suitable conditions I have no issue with this.
- Having a hen for eggs would be very useful for some families
- Food security is important, as is agriculture of al sorts in Canada.
- As long as there is sufficient space, care and clean up for/of said animal I think it should be allowed.
- Yes. But I think the rules can even be more lax than this, but this is a start.
- Up to 3 hens per household
- You property your responsibility.
- I think it is a private property and they can have them. As long it is kept clean and doesn't affect the neighborhood

- I think it will allow many people with fur and pet dander allergies to still have a pet. They also get the bonus of eggs
- Ensuring suitable living conditions are available for that animal should also be more widespread to include more household pets as well.
- People should be allowed to keep backyard chickens as in Edmonton, but complaints must be looked into by animal cruelty services.
- As long as the hens are kept in clean and proper conditions with a established standard of living and are not disturbing others, I feel that people should be allowed to own urban hens.
- Farm animals can bring peace and can be part of a good mental health regime
- As long as there is a limit to the number of hens owned.
- Yes, we should be able to have chickens.
- As long as its clean and safe for the animals. I'm sure they are just as noisy as some peoples kids.
- As long as all the animals needs are being met and not being a nuisance to the neighbours.
- Coming from Australia, we are allowed hens in our yard and its wonderful for self produce. Regulations would need to be in place to ensure proper living quarters during the winter.
- I think people should be allowed to care for what ever animals they want. Assuming that the animal in question is being properly taken care of.
- Provided they neighbours are supportive and reasoning is justifiable and does not cause disturbance I would be supportive.
- as long as there is the space required for the health of the animal and its needs are met. With this in mind, donkeys cattle horses pigs and other large livestock are unlikely to recieve the space needed in someone's backyard, and should only be considered in a communal or very large private property with adequate space
- To be honest... I want a pet monkey. Who doesn't want a pet monkey? In all seriousness, if an animal can be cared for in a city environment and it doesn't disturb or potentially cause harm to others, then I feel it should be considered. I don't want an Alligator next door but I'd be okay with a pig!
- We live right next to someone who owns chickens in Calgary and they have never been a nuisance.
- Every situation is different. Just like anything else, it should be researched and discussed; reviewed in a proper timeframe.
- This is in place in other municipalities and appears to work
- not worth a comment
- Urban hens sounds great, perhaps minimum lot size, distance from neighbours
- As long as it is controlled, I think it is fine.
- As long as the animals are taken care of
- If it is an animal that does not cause a lot of noise or smell then I think it could work.
- I think urban hens encourages and supports food sustainability and security.

- As long as laws are in place prohibiting roosters and requiring certain cleanliness levels and a maximum number of hens I think they can be very beneficial to humans. Also they can be great for children
- urban chickens in a proper pen and house. taken care of can be in a city environment
- If the yard space is suitable and I would hope neighbours would be consulted prior to bylaw approving a space.
- I don't think that chickens would have a negative impact on anything.
- These are reasonable criteria. I support them.
- Provided that positive living conditions are provided, increased family food independence and sustainability would be welcome and small livestock provide fantastic responsibility lessons for youth and children.
- I think urban chicken projects are excellent ideas! Providing food for the home and a great learning experience for children raised in the city
- Goats are great for managing weeds
- We want hens. So get it done.
- There are a number of other livestock that would make great pets and/or excellent backyard food producers - ducks, small goats, etc.
- There are a lot of big lots and good people that could support animals. Adequate living conditions and owners possibly licensed to understand the care for livestock.
- I have lived in a city with urban hens and it was nice. I strongly support the need to monitor suitably living conditions.
- Why not?? Personal goats and hens would be awesome. As long as there is room for them on the property.
- I like the idea of neighbour support.
- None
- urban pigs are great examples of where responsible pet ownership leads to a happy symbiotic relationship between owner and pet plus they are hypoallergenic and would offer a great option to those who want a pet but can't have one
- I don't see an issue if everyone is informed on the matter.
- It shouldn't always be what the owners want. It should be in the animals best interest, and ensuring their needs are being met. Healthy living environments, suitable living conditions, etc!
- the opportunity to experience and appreciate a true core level of self sustainment is imperative to a persons well being
- If there is a positive impact for the animal and people it's worth trying
- "Backyard chickens can give people a sense of purpose and self sufficiency. Really any small livestock, rabbits, possible ducks/geese.
- Not sure about other livestock, unless you owned a large acreage in calgary"
- Great idea!
- With some restrictions this could be positive

- in consideration of neighbours and community standards, people should be allowed to work towards more self sufficient food production. As a means of reducing environmental impact
- Yes not
- If the neighbours are amenable and the home owner has demonstrated they can provide proper shelter and care then Hens should be fine. No noisy Roosters please!
- Let us raise our own food, urbanites.
- As long as the welfare of the animal is prioritized, there is a licensing program and twice yearly welfare checks, and you have the full support of surrounding neighbours who may be effected by the animal. If even one neighbour disagrees the livestock cannot be present.
- As long as it's regulated, individuals with previous bylaw infractions against animals should not be allowed to participate
- Promotes a community spirit plus living in a city a lot of children don't have any connection or knowledge about farm animals.
- If its manageable and not causing noise complaints or other problems I dont see the issue
- I see no harm as long as they are be treated properly
- Why not
- I support this as with proper care livestock can be kept in the city and I think it is great for the community
- Bonding with animals is never a bad thing, people all have their own love for their own animal, bringing more non dangerous animals into our lives isn't a bad thing (assuming the animals are being properly taken care of)
- I don't agree with BSL. Each dog has their own personality. It's not breed related. It should be based on case by case basis. Not breed specific.
- Hens are a great food source that is easily contained.
- many calgarians are turning self sufficient and this change in lifestyle needs to be accommodated
- chickens are only another bird that just lives outside and provided proper housing can be provided for them i see absolutely no issue with urban hens
- The urban hens/livestock should be checked up on regularly to ensure no decrease in animal living conditions.
- As long as it's done ethically it's a benefit to the community
- This would ensure the needs of the livestock and urban hens are being met and the approval and support from community members is genuine while opening up opportunities for community and individual benefit.
- As long as the chickens are housed properly and taken good care of I see no problem with people having them. No roosters tho
- Seems like a good idea-
- Livestock can benefit a community in times of shortage, like during a pandemic
- Being able to have certain livestock if properly taken care of would allow people to support themselves.

- I would love to have chickens. This bylaw could make it easier to be self sustaining within city limits.
- Another sustainable option for people to explore. If people are providing suitable living conditions I don't see why not.
- I believe there are responsible pet owners and if the above criteria is meet they should be allowed.
- as long as they do not become a noise issue for the neighbors or an odor issue for the neighbors.
- I love the idea of urban hens
- A small number of chickens are generally quiet and could provide supplemental food for low income families.
- Other municipalities have done this and it works very well. Hens are quiet, clean, and allow food to be produced for the owners in the form of eggs.
- There needs to be very strict guidelines and these animals must be provided a good quality of life. Shelter must protect them from our winters and still give them room to move.
- What is the reason not to support this? If people want to own hens and are taking reasonable means to care for and minimize effects on neighbors have at it
- As long as they are responsible owners and not harming the animals
- Input from those affected would be required. Those not affected would not be allowed to contribute. Fair.
- There are other animals besides dogs and cats that can make excellent pets, i.e. mini goats, mini pigs. These are not typically all that noisy and many people would enjoy seeing/interacting with these animals in their neighbourhoods.
- Hens and other livestock if taken care of properly can be beneficial to communities
- If people took the necessary steps to ensure people and animals are safe, it would be fine
- Having animals is a good thing and would be feasible especially with neighbour support, and appropriate living conditions for the animal based on the type and care requirements
- If it does not affect the community as a whole and does not present harm to the animal, there should be no reason to prevent someone from caring for these animals.
- As long as the noise or smell isn't a concern I support having hens in Calgary.
- There must be oversight - no excuses from the city that they are understaffed or overworked. The animals' health and welfare must be protected.
- As long as appropriate upkeep (waste removal, etc.) was kept in regard it shouldn't bother anyone else (nieghbours)
- Why not? As long as they would be subject to same noise restrictions as other domesticated animals.
- Its 2020, we have a right to feed ourselves.
- If the neighbors are okay with hens, and there are suitable living conditions then there should be no reason why we can't have hens.
- I'm interested in getting urban hens myself.

- I think beneficial livestock, if raised humanly and in consideration of neighbours is sustainable and teaches the community to work together and teaches kids work ethic and how to care for something other than themselves.
- Chickens are great, and it's excellent that people want to keep them for personal enjoyment and fulfillment (via eggs and companionship)
- I would love to own a pygmy goat in one of the south communities where there is enough room and support.
- As long as those rules are followed
- Have you seen the prices at grocery stores.... i should be allowed to have a farm in my yard to feed my family lol.
- If livestock was kept to a reasonable amount given an owner's physical capacity/ability to support them, then I think it could be beneficial to have some within the city of Calgary (e.g. a small hen farm for small families)
- Hens yes, More no.
- There can be many benefits to owners and community.
- Hens and other livestock that are properly cared for can enhance community and family life but need close monitoring
- People should be able to have the animals they want in the city provided that the animals are responsibly taken care of
- Seems strange for in town
- If you are allowed to keep rabbits in the city you should be allowed to keep chickens.
- why not?
- Lots of animals can be pets, but they need the proper living conditions. But no exotic animals!
- As long as the needs of the hens and calgarians are balanced, there should be no issues.
- People need to get back to growing and raising their own food sources.
- But there needs to be limits to bids, care etc.
- No reason not to permit non dangerous livestock.
- Provided things like smell/noise during low noise hours do not affect other residents.
- Bring em on! The more the merrier!
- I think that livestock could be beneficial to Calgary .
- As long as the animals are kept on a suitable environment and it does not cause issues (such as noise) for neighbours
- Not an issue of there is enough space for the animals.
- I think urban hens are a great idea
- I mean in Asia chickens roam freely in big cities and don't cause many issues. As long as then hens are well looked after and it doesn't smell bad, why not?
- We see the city using goats to maintain grass in parks areas, why not allow citizens to own a couple on larger properties. As long as there is respect and agreement between neighbours, why can't it be allowed?

- I believe certain livestock are beneficial to our communities as long as they are raised well and kept healthy and not a nuisance to the neighbors.
- I think this would help with increased sustainability in Calgary if neighbourhoods could be able to get eggs within their neighbour hood
- As long as the environment is suitable for the livestock.
- As long as the noise is not a nuisance
- There is much urban husbandry that would support food security, and mental health support. If there is enough land that no harm is coming to the animal, there should not be restrictions any different than on farms. Yes, I recognize much abuse happens on farms, a whole different topic.
- Hens provide cheaper and healthy alternatives for Calgarians should they choose to eat eggs & chicken.
- Small livestock with suitable living amendments with knowledge for the chosen livestock should be considered however, those individuals wanting a hobby With no knowledge around said animal, this is not suitable for the animal.
- If managed and registered this would be a good idea, but the city of Calgary should have methods in place to ensure that these animals have adequate housing and nutrition and people are not abusing the right to own them
- N/A
- If animals are properly cared for and neighbors are considered then why not allow
- Chickens fine. Roosters can be a nuisance and will be. I'd hate it if my neighbour had a rooster
- I only support it if the bylaw is actually enforced. Not given multiple chances to continue to break the bylaws
- We should be allowed to have chickens or other livestock if room and conditions permit.
- I see no issue with it if the hens are properly cared for. There are a lot of people struggling financially in Calgary and this may be a way to get access to affordable proteins.
- Suitable living conditions and appropriate vet care as required
- N/a
- .
- limit of 2
- As long as they are responsibly maintained, there should be no reason against this
- fresh eggs are delicious
- I would support it as long as the criteria were met and abided by over the long term.
- Could offer a positive impact
- Allowing of micro farming leads to a potential economic stimulus and private sales of eggs should be allowed as well
- Doesn't bother me if maintained well.
- Why not? If you have responsible pet owners that can provide a proper and suitable living environment that has no affect on neighbors or surrounding area, let responsible people have the choice and weed out the people who have no idea how to take care of certain animals

- Urban farming is an up and coming environmentally friendly practice.
- Having livestock on your property, as long as well maintained is a good example of self sustainability in the time of covid
- as long as the livestock are sustainably taken care of and are living in ethical situations i would support this
- This could be a useful way for people to increase the productivity of their property. As long as the welfare of the hens was regulated appropriately, this would be a boon for urban food production.
- As long as all of it is human and sanitary I see no issues.
- Perhaps require licensing to promote responsibility and fund oversight of conditions
- This is a great planet friendly way to support our ecosystem
- As long as it does not interfere with traffic
- Urban hens would inspire individuals to have access to healthy eggs!!
- If neighbours are in support of it and only hens are permitted I can't see why it would cause a problem.
- As long as acceptable living conditions are available for the animals.
- We should be able to sustain ourselves naturally especially now with covid
- Responsible livestock ownership should be permitted.
- If kept in humane conditions and there are no reasonable objections from neighbours livestock could be beneficial
- People should have the right to have their own food providing source however I would suggest hens only.
- SO YOUR GONNA LET PEOPLE HAVE URBAN HENS, BUT DISCRIMINATE AGAINST AN ENTIRE BREED OR DOG THAT LOOKS LIKE PIT BULL? DO BETTER!
- Sustainable food helps those suffering from food insecurity.
- Must have suitable living conditions and the support of neighbours
- As long as they don't create an issue I don't see any problem with it
- For people on low incomes, having a source of protein like fresh eggs is vital, and properly kept chickens can be an ecologically sensible way of providing this - and they can work in tandem with rabbits etc.
- I'd love to have chickens!
- Because of the case by case basis
- I would only support egg-laying hens (not for slaughter or food) or hens that are for therapy, Number of hens would be contingent upon size of yard. No roosters or peacocks.
- As long as it is humane for the animal(s)
- This sounds like it would have a lot of benefit for families and communities.
- I think it will help not only educate people on where their food comes from and give In addition to this it could definitely help educate people from an environmental standpoint. The biggest reason for global warming is agriculture and this could potentially help people to critically think about not only their food consumption but the production and how it affects not only them but everyone.

- Hens are a great way to have fresh eggs and teach children important lessons about the world and animals around us.
- I think it's great that we are considering to allow livestock within the city such as hens! More fresh eggs for everyone!
- Fresh eggs :)
- Why not.
- As long as the animal isn't a nuisance, it should be allowed.
- If people have the knowledge and space to have a domestic animal let them
- It should be a given.
- Urban hens provide an opportunity for home grown, organic egg production that is to the benefit of both owner and other families who may receive the eggs.
- I have no issues with chickens or livestock provided the space is adequate and they are cared for properly
- If the rules are followed it should have no impact on neighbours.
- Responsible care of the animals is the key.
- As long as living conditions are suitable it shouldn't matter what species of animal resides.
- This could provide food for families.
- chickens kept in clean quarters are welcome addition.
- Some cultures and people are used to living in close proximity with their animals. The biggest thing is that the neighbours, and not just the immediate ones, approve.
- as long as they are controlled by the city, why not?
- People deserve the right to have their own livestock if provided proper environment and isn't a nuisance to neighbours.
- Coming from Australia where it is common to have chickens in urban areas I think they are a great addition to a household and not a nuisance when cared for correctly
- Hens, goats and other livestock can be easily well cared for in small spaces. Limits on numbers and agreement from neighbours would be positive criteria.
- as long as its kept clean, no odor, and limit number. No roosters! Roosters are loud!!
- Good for eggs or support animals
- Having a pet that can provide eggs for consumption is amazing! Also chickens are a great companion for children
- People should have the right to participate in urban agriculture. But it's important to ensure it's being done responsibly with respect to the animals and neighbours/the community.
- With support from adjacent neighbours and tracking/some kind of licensing for these homes, I think it's a great idea!
- I have no issue with any farm animals being kept in appropriate conditions in people's private backyards.
- Raising hens is a great idea, being able to essential farmstead your own eggs is a two for one food and friend!

- Society should be supportive of people raising chickens in a humane way in order to supplement their food.
- As long as all criteria are met, I don't have a problem with backyard hens.
- as long as the livestock has sufficient room, proper housing and the support of neighbors this should be considered.
- animals are great soothers thus responsible owners should be allowed to have such animals as long as the responsibility is clearly mandated and followed.
- Community support is crucial to how we can withstand any sort of political or medical ailment. The pandemic has shown that living divided is never the answer.
- I think urban hens would be a good change for Calgary but their needs must be met
- Sounds like a good idea to me
- Limitations on quantity and size based on land size should be considered.
- Sounds like a good idea to me
- If the neighbors can agree, it should be okay for people to keep small numbers of non-traditional pets. Cleanliness, smell, and noise should all be strong considerations
- why not??
- As long as all above rules are abided by
- Hens can provide more means for families
- So people can have control over their food source if they choose to.
- I think this is great if all those criteria are met.
- I think as long as the animal can be properly treated and taken care of and that there won't be any problems being caused because of them, then patrons should be able to have livestock or whatever.
- Urban agriculture, done with respect for the community and animals well being is a positive way to reduce food waste and environmental impact from agriculture.
- Sustainability
- As long as the hens are provided a humane amount of space, and this may sound counterintuitive to my yes for support but I almost feel as though it should be on a permit bases that can be contested by neighbours. I know as someone who works often until 2-3 am id be a little upset about my neighbours having chickens waking me up at dawn.
- I think certain things like chickens (for eggs) would be acceptable in a certain size yard and proper housing and up keep must be maintained to avoid smell and diseases. As well as pigeons, or even a bird atrium.
- people should be allowed to raise their own hens for egg laying purposes. Hens should be limited in numbers and all fecal matter removed regularly.
- as long as the animals are actually in a good living environment with plenty of space etc. must check in frequently to ensure people are following the rules.
- Let them have hens
- Animals are An important part of people's lives
- This type of program has worked in other cities.

- I believe there are many individual and community benefits to urban livestock.
- I support allowing hens and other livestock within city limits provided they meet the criteria listed above.
- Cleaning the pen and care must be assured and jail time for mistreatments of the animals
- Only if the owners are responsible and take care of the Hens.
- Chickens are great!!
- Hens are great pets and a good way to provide eggs and meat. Livestock should ALWAYS be allowed.
- I support urban hens and potentially other if they don't disturb neighbours with odors or excessive noise.
- Urban livestock offer a variety of options for individuals that would otherwise not have the option. It offers individuals to control their own food market. The only caveat would be that adequate excrement and other waste management systems must be in place to ensure that it does not pose a risk or hazard to other or prevent others from enjoying their space i.e overwhelming smell.
- As long as normal noise bylaws would be in place for the animals as well
- I think urban hens are a good idea for the community
- The criteria should only be if the area the hens are in is suitable. And support from neighbours.
- I agree with animal husbandry if it's done ethically.
- BUT will this end up like the process to approve secondary suites? That was a nightmare, if this is case by case a better system needs to be put in place to make it reasonable for people applying and not waste so much time and money. Again who determines what suitable living conditions for livestock is? This should be someone who has scientific AND animal welfare knowledge. I do not agree with any sort of animal slaughter happening in the city so if people are raising chickens fine but please no slaughter.
- So long as the property is large enough and the living conditions are adequate and do not disturb neighbors. Also the smell cannot leave the premise, once smell travels then this needs to be removed.
- Love the idea of people being able to sustainably farm for themselves.
- Fine with hens and other livestock given neighbours are ok with it and there aren't noise concerns (e.g. rooster)
- I agree with all amendments except the one stating support from adjacent neighbors. It would not be fair if those neighbors were not supportive of livestock because of a reason that has nothing to do with said livestock (personal grudges, etc).
- growing and producing our own food has become so important to so many people, with all the recalls, and restrictions regarding COVID19, the more we can do for ourselves the better
- I would love to have a therapy goat or a couple of chickens.
- More ethically raised animals should be allowed in Calgary to promote local community and economy.
- as long as it does not disturb the neighbors

- Other animals can be good alternatives if people are allergic to cats and dogs but scared of snakes and spiders
- We need more yard farms. You can't go wrong with homegrown food.
- I have no reason to be against it.
- I think it can be a great use however, chickens smell and that would need to be cared for impeccably. Goats are great pets and can be used on boulevards that take forever for the city to mow (btw why not plant wildflowers on medians to save watering and mowing and make the bees happy)
- Urban farming is the future. The more individuals we have partaking in it, the more we can improve it.
- As long as the animals are well cared for. That is the biggest issue
- As long as it's in suitable conditions and it's not bothersome to the neighbour, I don't see an issue.
- unfair to allow someone to have a rodent(ferret or pet hamster) and not allow a working animal
- I have seen this work in Denmark and hens don't bark all night
- Special permits should be required, part of the process being permission/informing neighbours that may be impacted (by noise, smell, ect)
- As long as the owner is being responsible with their animals, I feel that livestock ownership in Calgary can provide many people with opportunities to learn about these animals and animal care. These bylaws seem to be within the idea of responsible ownership and can be supported.
- Urban farming and gardening!
- As long as the person and their neighbours consent and the animals are properly cared for (which includes not being a nuisance to others living in the area) then I have no issues with it.
- I believe that chickens should be permitted for food sustainability and personal food use.
- Make communities more sustainable
- I think some animals can improve the physical and mental health of their owners
- only if it is maintained and operated the same as a community garden to ensure all criteria will be maintained.
- Yes as long as the livestock was kept appropriately and if the livestock got out and onto a dog property, the dog and owner was not responsible for any possible dog bites
- All of this seems reasonable.
- I would love the ability to have egg laying hens in our backyard.
- If it is supported by the community and is not overly noisy or smelly this appears to have little harm. It must also be humane.
- If its handled well, it shouldn't pose an issue
- As long as proper guidelines are in place, I like this idea.
- Urban hens have been a great idea and well implemented in other cities. The conditions above sound very reasonable.
- People should be able to provide their own food

- Hens should be permitted to live in Calgary homes, although only for purposes of companionship or rescues. Urban hens should not be permitted to be used for consumption of any kind (eggs, chicken meat) or breeding purposes.
- I would love hens in the city, as long as people have enough space to not upset their neighbors, and are treating the animals humanely.
- The approval criteria seem sensible
- If sufficient conditions are met (such as those above), I see no reason why the allowance of urban hens need be halted.
- I support urban agriculture and the benefits livestock provide to families that otherwise may not have access to without. I think with proper care it can support feeding families affordable as well (eggs, garden benefits etc)
- definitely time for chickens and support livestock!!
- This sounds fine.
- If the animal is well cared for in proper living conditions, then why not?
- .
- Small livestock should be fine as long as their needs are being taken care of
- If the animal has suitable living conditions and has a positive impact on the community, I do not see any disadvantages to allowing this
- Only if hens are required to have their wings clipped to prevent them from going over the fence and/or running into traffic. Appropriate conditions (size of yard, proper housing for summer and winter, cleanliness, etc) and care must be mandated to ensure the safety of the animal.
- I believe it is a good means for people to support themselves.
- It's a neat idea. As long as everything is sanitary and purposeful. Probably have a limit on how many hens per household?
- I think that's a cool idea.
- Yes, provided there's a means for limitations in the event of a nuisance.
- More options for individual choices, builds community business, cultural/traditions upheld.
- People should be allowed to have hens as long as they are properly cared for
- I dont care haha
- You should be able to have whatever animal on property you own
- Backyard hens support sustainable food source and provide comfort.
- I want chickens
- I believe small groups of chickens or other livestock -type animals can be managed in a responsible and respectful way if the owner has appropriate space and care systems in place
- People should be allowed to own livestock on their property as long as it does not interfere with those around them
- Chickens are harmless.
- More food produced at a lower cost to the individuals
- There is nothing wrong with a few hens.

- Only of there is less noise and kept clean
- Obviously within the reason. Im not sure.
- As long as the animal is taken care of and isn't a smelly or noisy nuisance.
- I think it is important for neighbors to be consulted before it is allowed. But otherwise if it is a small number of animals it seems reasonable.
- If someone has appropriate facilities for hens that is non disruptive, they should be allowed to house hens.
- As long as they are kept in proper conditions, it doesn't bother me what small animals people keep as pets
- As long as they do not bother neighbours, because of noise, smell, etc., I have no problem with it.
- Allows consumer choice while reinforcing accountability and responsibility.
- I support in town hens if its not over crowded and santized properly
- I think urban hens could be a positive addition to the city if implemented correctly. I do think other larger livestock does need to have strict and well thought out legislation.
- If neighbours support this, then sure give it a try.
- Provided that they are kept clean Hens are not an issue.
- If adequate facilities are present
- If neighbours support it and there is a positive impact as well as suitable living conditions it should absolutely be allowed.
- As long as they are not abusing the animals and have the space for said animals.
- Strict guidelines are needed (# of hens, type of habitat, confinement, strict penalties for those that don't comply)
- If no neighbours mind, then there's no real harm being done, assuming of course that all other criteria are met.
- Why shouldn't people be allowed to raise their own food
- We have wanted urban hens for years. We have a backyard with a suitable size for a coop. It is my belief that hens would teach my children responsibility, encourage relationship and cooperation between neighbours, and have positive environmental impacts. It is hugely beneficial to have the ability to farm your own food in your backyard.
- as long as the animals are kept in acceptable enclosures, and are well cared for. Well kept includes clean areas and minimal odors. Specify a maximum number of each species
- I believe that people should be allowed to have Hens and possibly other livestock animals if they have prove that they will provide a humane environment and be responsible owners s
- There are situations where this is feasible but criteria should also define what suitable conditions are
- Chickens sure! Larger animals no.
- If people can be responsible livestock owners and keep the animals healthy, it may help reduce the harm large scale farming operations can cause to animals
- Within reason, the type and number of animals allowed to be kept, as well as the size of the property in relation to the type and number of animals.

- Great idea! My niece has hens in Nanaimo.
- I agree if both neighbours adjacent agree and are in full understanding of what living close to birds would entail (noise, smell, and bait for predator animals like lynx's). I also think there needs to be an objection period (maybe 30 days?) in which the neighbours have the opportunity being any concerns to the homeowner's.
- I support having hens in Calgary as they cause no damage or harm to neighbours and communities.
- I think this amendment is great, being able to own certain live stock in the city could be beneficial for many calgarians.
- I think if you provide proper care and support for any animals than why not allow them to be kept in the city? They must be properly cared for though.
- Yes I would like hens in the city.
- All animals can be pets if raised right.
- I don't see why not
- As long as the majority are responsible, and there are resources for neighbors to air concerns, there is very little downside to giving people liberties.
- It's a good law, hens are natural pest controls and can provide food
- With appropriate safeguards, rules, and an approval process, I would be okay with this.
- As long as the hens are well taken care of it and not causing issues then I don't see a problem.
- I believe the neighbors/community should have an opinion & input into what's going on in their area & how it it going to affect them.
- People like chickens, ducks etc so why not as pets
- i believe we should have animals of all kinds here
- As long as no one, especially the animals, are negatively affected
- It would be a very great environmental impact to our city. I think this is a fantastic idea. It would boost morale and create a healthier population.
- Some people have them as support animals
- However, if the neighbours are annoyed with any smells, or sounds or general cleanliness of the chicken coop/area, Bylaw has a responsibility to remove the chickens and prohibit that citizen from owning chickens.
- I think being able to access local food, including fruits, veggies, honey, and now eggs is a great idea, and as long as the hens are treated well and other neighbours are not disturbed, this is a great addition to Calgary's neighbourhoods.
- The neighbors around the person that wants "livestock" on their property should be required to fill out a form either giving consent to it or protest it.
- Only for small animals, of course. They should be held to the same standards of any other animal, and subject to the same rules if they are a nuisance.
- If there is enough space to safely own an animal on a property it should be allowed
- Hens or other animals can have a positive impact on a community, if they are taken care of appropriately and if the neighbors are supportive.

- People are wanting/needing to be more self sufficient
- People should be able to do as they want so long as they aren't being a nuisance or creating a harmful or stressful environment for the animals.
- Provided the animals welfare is looked after and no one objects homeowners should be able to have small livestock.
- As long as the safety and health of the animal and health of the people who care for the animal are good, there should be no issue.
- I'd be fine with my neighbour having chickens or goats. Not bees.
- Enjoy raising chickens for meat or eggs, very therapeutic.
- Chickens give us food! They aren't terribly loud or difficult to take care of. Small livestock that can be maintained and cared for should be allowed.
- As long as the animals well being is the highest priority, I'm ok with this. If the animals are not being cared for properly, the person should have them removed from the property.
- I believe this is a good step to encourage sustainable and diverse living in Calgary that can also be very educational to people living in the city. I support the approval of other livestock (besides hens) on a case by case basis determined by an enforcement officer. I do not support roosters in city limits due to noise.
- I love chickens and hens
- Allows for sustainable living
- With very strict limits. Not ok in areas with high density or houses crammed together. Should be a minimum yard size and setbacks from property lines where animals can't reach unless neighbour specifically approves.
- As the city grows we are getting closer to Rural areas. I would be heartbroken if a family had to surrender a family friend because of changing land lines
- Many other locations allow other livestock with limits with no to minor problems
- As long as owner is responsible this should be allowed
- YES I fully support people being able to PROPERLY care for livestock without leaving the city.
- I think that allowing livestock in Calgary within reason will support a more sustainable living practice and reduce the use of importing if people can have their hens lay eggs in their own home.
- Chickens area vital part of the ecosystem and economic system. Provide food for families.
- as long as the animals are treated well I don't see a problem with them being in the city.
- Calgarians have such close relationships with the local rural communities and an interest in independent food sources, I think this would strengthen both.
- I believe responsible owners should be allowed to own hens in the city.
- Chickens provide locally sustainable food sources.
- As long as all points above are accurate, then I support this
- As long as adjacent neighbours and communities are in support, I think urban hens and potentially other livestock could add value to communities and mental health. However, each owner would have to strictly adhere to guidelines for health and safety of both their animals as well as neighbours and wildlife that already exists in our cities. These must be taken into serious consideration. If having urban hens creates a problem with wild bobcats, for example, and bobcats are then shot or euthanized if they attack hens, this is not an acceptable balance of affected parties.

- No reason not to allow livestock if they are housed and cared for correctly.
- We should all have hens.
- i want to be legally permitted to have chickens in my house
- Not every property would be suitable
- I suppose this on a small scale (very limited numbers), assuming the property has adequate space for the animal(s) and the animals / chickens are maintained /looked after so there is no adverse impact on the animals or neighbors.
- In a world of reduce, reuse, recycle encouraging urban food support makes sense
- As long as there is not too many hens (e.g. 5)
- As long as there is not an excessive amount, and there is adequate space for the animals, then it should be allowed. If there are noise and smell issues, then those should be quickly enforced with stiff penalties.
- Provided no roosters
- Better for environment. Local.
- Provided the animals are kept with proper animal welfare /husbandry standards it could be a good way to educate the public on the importance of agriculture
- Neighbourhood chickens only enhance a neighbourhood! However, there should be a limit to the number of hens PER house. No one, in a city, personal use way, needs more than 5 or 6 laying hens.
- Would love chickens, needs to be limits and sq ft/property size requirements
- No roosters
- Possibility implement a maximum number of hens per acre, and as long as space permits and the owner can consistently offer suitable living conditions and adequate space, livestock should be permitted.
- Allowing urban farm animals allows individuals to support themselves, and others if they chose. It might also support buying local if an individual sells by products from their farm animal.
- As long as the livestock are in a safe space and the neighbours are alright with their presence, there is no reason they should not be in town.
- There needs to be strict rules about coop cleaning, odor, and how close the coop can be to a property line
- As long as all the criteria above would be considered, I think it could be okay.
- In many areas of the world hens are legal as pets I think they should be allowed here aswell.
- This is a safe way to ensure that livestock are well taken care of
- I like the idea
- I think it's fine to have livestock if they meet the criteria.

- Nothing wrong with keeping chickens and the like so long as they aren't super noisy, and we don't go to the extreme and let people keep horses and cows in their backyard.
- Only if thoroughly researched and with neighbours approval.
- If people are responsible for their livestock and ensure their needs are met I don't see an issue as long as they are not disturbing the community.
- If London England, Vancouver and New York are ok with backyard chickens why is Calgary so far behind. There should be though a provision NO Roosters
- I see no issue with small livestock such as ducks, pigs, and chickens.
- My cousin has hens and they are not a nuisance, it is all on the owner and how they take care of them
- Considering how many barking dogs I have in my neighborhood chickens are quieter. No roosters though should be allowed.
- As long as they don't smell and make noise
- If livestock animals meet domestic animal criteria (noise, etc.) - why discriminate?
- Owner responsibility of any animal in the city is key - as with dog or cat or other domestic pet ownership.
- yes
- as long as things are controlled and appropriate
- Those are fair criteria for livestock
- Allowing urban chickens helps promote food security for Calgarians.
- My answer is yes because I support it...
- Really sustainable idea for many people, but there should be a limit on animals per square foot of yard/property
- If there were guidelines on enforcing any noise / odour restrictions I think it would be beneficial to homes with suitable living conditions
- Yes, as long as there can be proof on a semi regular basis that the animals are being kept in humane conditions.
- I think it is important that the hens are well cared for and the neighbors will not be disturbed as well. I do also think it is important to explore the situations on a case by case basis as sometimes different circumstances require different answers.
- Great ideas
- If owners are responsible and adhere to rules should be allowed, if not they lose the privilege
- If they want to be in any neighbour hood a questionnaire should go around to the neighbours asking if the birds are wanted. My neighbour has some and keeps getting more. My pet can't poop on his property but his PETS poop all over mine and there is nothing I can do!!!!
- I have no problem with hens in my neighborhood.
- Hens would be a reasonable addition
- As long as it does not bother the neighbors
- Hens have never severely bitten anyone

- It would give an alternative for people who are allergic to cats and dogs
- A few chickens won't hurt anyone. No roosters though.
- Should include a clause that adjacent neighbours must sign off.
- Within reason people should be allowed livestock with space and means for the animals to live happily and healthy.
- There needs to be monitoring system in place to ensure the animals are treated humanely.
- The regulation seems reasonable for all parties.
- If regulated properly this could help people be more self sufficient
- So long as they animals have adequate space and living conditions it should be allowed
- Roaming Livestock, when properly maintained and supported, could add value to the living conditions in the City, as well as help manage other matters such as grass care (ie. grazing)
- Yes, as long as I'm not having to deal with animal smells, be woken up at dawn by roosters and worry about bee stings for those who may be allergic because my insensitive neighbors have livestock. I hope a lot of thought about where livestock in the city is well thought out before a permit is granted.
- I think hens and other reasonable livestock could be a benefit to city residents.
- I think it would be extremely beneficial to have chickens kept in yards (in appropriate enclosures). This allows for a constant fresh food source (eggs). I do however believe there should be a condition where chickens kept within city limits cannot be butchered for food.
- Hens are a good source of food and restrictions against them are unnecessary.
- growing up on the farm, I was always able to provide myself and family with fresh eggs. This should be strictly monitored with written permission from your neighbors, and watched closely. There needs to be a limit on the chickens, and law enforcement should legally be able to enter your back yard to check on housing situations. Fence must be so tall, oyster shells provided, proper food provided, clean water, a heated shelter in the winter. You must also have a sign on your gate if you house chickens in your back yard, and how many, along with a permit per chicken and a coded anklet on it the city can identify it by.
- I strongly support allowing urban hens
- With food security being an issue I think it's a good idea
- Love this idea! Full support
- I strongly support allowing urban hens
- Anything that helps an animal is something I support. No matter what type. So long as it's in the animals best interest.
- Great for community engagement
- Not totally sure what this will do but if it's sustainable then sure?
- I think it is a great idea to have hens in the city
- Yes on the condition that keeping hens would require approval (through the city) of all neighbours (next door, adjacent, alley adjacent)
- But within reason. I think any one who shares a property line should be allowed to say yes or no

- N/A
- A limit would be needed
- Laying hens are good for the environment and peoples good health.
- If all surrounding neighbour's are in approval of it, there shouldn't be an issue, until an issue arises.
- I think this should be allowed because it is proven to be functional and helpful in other cities
- As long as they aren't making a profit from the eggs and have a proper living condition for the property. Chickens to be possibly licensed and treated as any other pets
- I don't see a problem with having hens and other livestock as pets, so long as they have adequate space and proper nutrition for a good quality of life.
- Anyone but [personal name removed] can have chickens in a small roost.
- Calgary is a large sprawling city and many people have large lots that could easily accommodate owning livestock. I agree with this as long as suitable living conditions can be provided and it does not negatively impact others in the community through excessive noise or smell.
- This is an example of responsible pet ownership, holding owners accountable for the conditions of their animals.
- So long as people can contain their animals reasonably I see no reason why other animals considered livestock shouldn't be allowed. We have rules for cats, dogs, and other common pets, why not hens?
- Proper coops must be provided and proper sanitation must be strictly adhered to.
- If a person wanted this, they should have to go through a through application process to see if they are fit to do. There should also be annual or semi annual surprise checks on the home.
- Why not
- Everyone needs a companion of some sort and cats and dogs arent for everyone
- What is wrong with a properly looked after pets that generate food.
- Yes, as long as it accompanied some clear husbandry outlines.
- Like just wild hens running around? I support
- Urban sustainable living is of utmost importance.
- As long as they have an adequately sized property and noise levels are kept at a minimum I dont see anything wrong with it.
- Becoming more self sustainable and in touch with where our food comes from is always a positive.
- Animals, so long as they are treated properly, should absolutely be able to be kept in Calgary no matter what they are
- doesn't seem harmful
- If animals are cared for properly, don't contribute to spread of zoonosis or illness to other animals and don't become a nuisance for neighbours I would support urban livestock.
- Chickens are great slug hunters!
- Depending on the situation of the home and the animal

- If adjacent neighbour's don't have a problem, there is no problem. But if neighbour's change and the new neighbour's do have a problem then owners of hens should be ready to give up the privilege awarded by the city
- As long as no roosters and they maintain a clean chicken coop why not
- Why not?
- I think it would be lovely if there were strict guidelines to enforce the safety and wellbeing of the animal. Hens can also provide food for the community, which I think is great and self sufficient!
- Only hens, in suitable yards. Must be kept clean.
- People should be allowed to do this as long as they maintain property and animals
- I would support thos bylaw as proposed but also mandate specific humane living conditions be ptovided. Size /condition of hen den and that the property be a specific lot size or greater. Specify # of hens permitted.
- I support the idea of having livestock such as hens in urban areas.
- I think urban hen keeping is great if done responsibly
- Provided the owner is responsible, I have no problem with allowing small livestock within city limits.
- Yes purely because the city controls enough of our lives.
- Allowing urban ducks would benefit.
- As long as everyone in the immediate vicinity is ok with it, then why not allow hens in the city?
- Local food sources and also grass management
- The support from neighbors requirement should probably be a recurring requirement since people move, sell/buy and new neighbors may not be as amenable.
- I dont mind when people have hens. Its actually an eco way of supplying basic food. When taken care of and meeting criteria hens are actually very good animals. Hen owners should go through some inspection process to ensure that they properly take care of the place and cleaning the yards etc so this not became an issue for the neighbors.
- Support animals cone in all forms. Miniature farm type animals provide community benefit.
- As long as it's safe and everyone can be happy/healthy
- The animal doesn't matter. It's how the animal is raised. If it's raised in a proper environment there should be no issues.
- I agree as long as they are kept as pets , and are not slaughtered !
- keep a coop on site for noise control
- I absolutely support this. As well as bee hive programs.
- Backyard hens aren't a nuisance. I'd love to have some in my neighbourhood. The foxes would too. Though this might go against my statement above on feeding the wildlife.
- If there are proper enclosures/ enough property, people should be able to keep small livestock. With the potential of increased food costs. People should be able to provide for their family with their own means
- Full support provided proper living conditions are met and checked at minimum on a semi annual basis.

- if you can have a dog you can have a chicken
- If everyone that could be directly effected agrees to the idea, then any risk of damage to property or property values or other risks, such as disease management, have very likely been considered in the decision. So long as the animal can and is being properly cared for and NOT being raised for meat (which creates many issues including no way to ensure any standard of care or cleanliness in the process), it seems like a positive step forward. If this bylaw was going to include the possibility for the animals to be raised for meat, I would absolutely say no. It poses a risk of being dangerous to the community, cruel to the animal, and a source of major neighbourhood conflict.
- I fully support the ability to raise livestock such as hens and goats within city limits so long as minimum required yard space is met. It is a great way to get city kids involved in agriculture and become less dependent on supermarkets
- As long as all the above are followed.
- I think we need to think about the definition of "suitable" living conditions and whether or not the city has the ability to enforce this on an ongoing basis. You may also want to limit the type of animal to a property size (for animal welfare).
- As long as the animals are well taken care of and not disturbing the surrounding neighbours, then it should be okay.
- As long as proper husbandry is maintained and it does not impinge on the the neighbours, I support the amendment.
- As long as standards for appropriate living are available to the animal and that the hens are controlled and not allowed to be at large.
- neighbour support should be mandatory
- As long as there are NO ROOSTERS, and people must have inspections before being granted a permit, then fine. Permits should be renewed annually and an inspection done annually too. The permit cost should cover the admin & inspection costs.
- I fee that there needs to be highly regulated laws that can control to what extent animals are being kept on personal property.
- Assuming the community is ok with it, I don't see why they shouldn't be allowed
- If someone can't control their animal they should not bring it to dog parks during popular hours, they have gated off sections in off leash parks for training purposes. At the end of the day the OWNER need to be more responsible and held accountable, how the dog acts comes purely from how they are treated and how they have been trained. If everyone was a more responsible pet owner we wouldn't have these issues. pet owners need to be held accountable for how there pet acts and behaves. If your dog is acting out and having problems then they obviously need to adjust what the person themselves is doing. IT ALL COMES DOWN TO THE OWNER NOT THE BREED. ESPECIALLY PIT BULLS. Pit bulls are one of the best family dogs and its the people who train them to be fighting dogs that ruin it for the rest of us.
- this is more a maybe... there would have to be rules that if the livestock become nuisances or are neglected that an enforcement officer can quickly do something about it.
- Urban chickens are a great idea.

- Hens usually stay within their yard and generally doesn't cause a nuisance
- Hens can be very clean and good pets. Urban farming should be allowed so a family can secure their food supply.
- So long as they are assessed case-by-case
- No harm, no fowl ;)
- No roosters in urban areas. 10 hen limit.
- Time to give new things a try. It gives people the ability to control what they eat
- chickens should be allowed as long as all requirements listed above are met
- Depending on the live stock they can take up very little space or cause very little disruption or issues (ie a chicken coop with a max number set by the city is something easily managed)
- As long as its approved and not putting anyone in harms way. That includes the animal. Live stock of anything need the space. If you don't have the space and could be dangerous or stressful for animal. Then they don't get approved. End of story.
- As long as the bylaw takes all sides into account, I see no reason why someone could have a cat/dog but not a hen if that was their so choosing.
- Sounds reasonable to me...
- Nothing wrong with raising chicken meat and eggs.
- home owner conditions need to meet a simple but minimum requirement for animal welfare.
- Yes, but there needs to be a way to ensure that smell/waste from chickens or the chickens themselves don't become a nuisance to neighbours.
- I think it depend on yard size and care of the animal and should you choose to have hens or other allowed animals, they should need a permit and be checked in to make sure rules are being followed
- It would be nice to be allowed say up to 6 laying hens to a property provided that the coop can be inspected and protected from elements and predators
- A source of food as well, not a bad thing
- There is no negative as long as cared for by owner and numbers do not exceed space available.
- Yes to avoid mistreatment of fowl their needs to be more laws for their protection.
- Yes
- Very limited on the amount.
- No concern
- No farm animal should be allowed at the cost of those close or impacted ... even for the animals should have safety and care
- Many animals can be trained and used to educate people if they are visible in day-to-day life.
- Everyone on the street must agree to the chickens as they smell. Also if they get out of an inclosure, it cannot be other people's fault if neighbouring cats or dog get to it first.
- if someone wants to raise hens, as long as they are handled properly let them
- Animals improve human lives and as long as the animals are being taken care of appropriately and disturbance to neighbours/the environment is minimal, the animals should be able to be kept in urban areas

- Hens are a great resource for food and I think could do greatly in an urban setting
- responsible pet ownership is responsible pet ownership, dog, cat, birds, etc; must stay on property of the owner and not cause nuisance, require licensing preferably
- Absolutely! I hope that it comes with mandatory training on Animal husbandry and there are limits of how many hens to keep. And no roosters !
- Why not
- Yes!!
- As long as the hens do not go outside on their own.
- hens don't hurt anyone
- Urban hens are a great idea to help feed a family.
- My wife wants hens.
- I answered yes mostly because of the hen idea. I believe a definitive list of what other livestock includes would need to be provided before agreeing to the additional amendment of other livestock. Certain animals need considerable room to grow and live and do not belong in people's backyards.
- Not every dog owner should own a dog as they are unable to meet the needs of the dog. Also they are incapable of supporting a mentally stable dog.
- Chicken good!
- I see no issues
- " -Support from adjacent neighbours should not be considered because no one else should tell you what is right for you. Neighbours should have no say in your life. Maybe your neighbours could be used as a reference, but not a condition of approval.
 - Urban hens should absolutely be allowed. I very strongly support this. Urban hens would improve food stability, public health (improved connection to food), reduced food waste, reduced carbon footprint, improved quality of life for a species which is typically factory farmed and treated very poorly. There could be limits on them, possibly 10 but it should be dependent on the individual situation and space and based on animal quality of life rather than an arbitrary number. For example, acreages would have a higher reasonable carrying capacity."
- As long as owners can take proper care of them.
- Would love to see chickens allowed to be kept.
- I support urban hens and other urban farming initiatives, we need to encourage local food production
- Just allow the hens, don't make it cost more with extra human resources from the city.
- Urban hens would be a great addition to Calgary
- ...dont have one. I like livestock. This plan sounds good.
- Chickens are very abused in factory farms having local chickens would reduce that abuse
- Chickens can get messy VERY quickly, so i think there would need to be random checks in the beginning to ensure people know what theyre getting into.
- Chickens and goats that are kept in hugh standard so smell doesn't become an issue.

- Providing for your family is amazing... 4-6 hens/ no roos in a suitable contained yard and coop would be amazing!
- More animals always! Making it a considerate and courteous process that maximizes the potential for the owner and neighbors to harbour amazing creatures that benefit everyone
- Can bring positive impact on the community
- Chickens not only provide food, they also eat bugs. It would make our mosquito season more tolerable.
- The animal cannot become a nuisance to neighbours
- Urban hens could contribute to a more engaged community and connected neighbors.
- Hens and other livestock are beneficial to the community in so many ways - would just want to make sure any rules are enforced, such as rules against waste/smells/cleanliness of their outdoor areas to ensure the neighbours will support these ideas
- People need to have a closer connection with nature and their food source(s)
- Many other large cities have seen success with this program and Calgary can as well if it's managed properly.
- Hens aren't particularly dangerous or demonstrate nuisance behaviour and as such their ownership should be contingent on the standards mentioned.
- I am all for allow Calgarians being self supp sorting by raising their own food.
- Promoting self reliance is great for the generations now a future. We have lost alot.
- As long as the owners clean up after their animals and there is no noise complaints
- I don't know if it's appropriate for cattle to live in the city because of the space they require to roam, but I have no issue with other types of urban livestock.
- Why not?
- Providing animal needs are properly met.
- It could make it easier for low-income households to be more self-sufficient in terms of growing and raising their own food
- Backyard chickens and birds aren't a problem
- I think you should be allowed up to 4 chickens
- If you can care for and provide ultimate living conditions for the livestock and they do not cause disturbances with fellow neighbors they should be permitted.
- While hens or other domestic livestock can cause noise and odour issues, requiring the support of adjacent neighbours should minimize future complaints. Raising your own food, both plant and animal, should be encouraged and should be supported where possible.
- Raising your own hens is a great source of healthy eggs
- If livestock are well taken care of and not a nuisance they should be allowed.
- Provided support from adjacent neighbours is considered in all cases. All adjacent neighbours - either side of home, and directly behind home - must consent. Livestock is contained and humanely managed.
- If neighbours agree on it sure

- As long as the animal does not pose a noise violation or a risk of attacking community members livestock should be allowed
- They're animals no more different than cats or dogs. People should have the ability to care for them just as those two animals.
- Domestic eggs are sustainably oriented
- I'm sure most would not approve of a rooster being close by.
- Urban chickens are a great idea
- As long as it doesn't pose a threat to anyone, it should be fine.
- The impacts on other members of the community caused by this sort of urban farming would not outweigh the positive effects for the people who would use it.
- I see no problem with hens or any other animal that can be of use.
- I might support a small number of hens, but no other livestock. approval with neighbors should be done yearly, as people may move and new owners may come in who have health issues that may be triggered by having livestock or hens around. e.g. severe allergies to hay.
- As long as folks are responsible, I see no problem with raising hens.
- Provided there's a limitation on the number of animals.
- As long as neighbours are keen, I think this is a great idea. Self-sustaining food growing and cultivation is good for communities.
- As long as the conditions are suitable and they remain on public property
- Exceptions need to include the reasonability of neighbours and whether they've considered it
- I co own a farm, and hens are vital to the ecosystem and would be beneficial for both egg production and reducing unwanted insects
- I don't have chickens/hens.
- service and support animals are not limited to dogs. If its a chicken or horse (for example) the person shouldn't have to move to cater to a bylaw.
- Chickens make good, quiet pets that can be relatively well cared for in an urban environment, therefore allowing it in calgary is a natural step. Plus not many people would choose chickens over a dog
- As long as there's no roosters there's no chance for excessive noise and should be no issue
- I would support backyard hens as long as the people who keep them are made to take some form of class or training to prepare them for keeping livestock.
- not much to explain
- Everyone deserves the right to feed themselves and their families. Chickens are low cost and make great pets
- There should a big emphasis on the impact of the community
- There is no difference when compared to buying meat from a grocery store. NIMBY is never a solid argument, sustainability is needed now more than ever. Get rid of dogs and promote the healthy and ethical upbringing of USEFUL animals in our society.
- I think it's a good idea

- Yes, but NO ROOSTERS
- As long as citizens show responsible guardianship of an animal they should be able to choose their pet from a wider range
- Be responsible for your animals
- The adjacent neighbours should have the choice to give their approval. I would not give my permission as chicken are noisy and smelly
- Chickens should be allowed in all urban areas with husbandry rules in place. Small companion animals such as mini-pigs and goats should be allowed with adequate protections in place for neighbouring properties (noise, odour)
- Small livestock like chickens make sense to reduce waste, emissions, and reduce costs of food.
- I have wanted urban hens for decades. They usually stay close to home, eat lots of bugs, provide food, and are great companions.
- I believe that both urban hens and other types of small livestock (i.e. goats) can be beneficial both for mental and physical health and can help with sustainable living efforts. Enclosures, and living conditions should be investigated and approved before the animals arrive. Support from adjacent neighbours should NOT be required however...so long as the animals are properly cared for.
- cluck!!
- Responsible ownership
- make sure we are not running a commercial animal operation in your next door neighbours basement
- As long as neighbors are ok with it and the hen or livestock keepers are respectful in regard to smells/ noise etc.
- It's a wonderful idea
- All animals deserve proper conditions to live
- it makes sense
- Many people have chickens and they should be permitted to do so in the city.
- I like Chickens
- It's a great idea.
- As long as people take proper care of their animals and it's not affecting others, it shouldn't be an issue. Some people even have emotional support animals that are chickens.
- Turk, the Ramsay turkey was killed by a coyote. I think more protection would have possibly saved his life
- I would only support this bylaw if all neighbours affected by urban hens agree to it.
- I would not support roosters in city limits due to the early crowing but strongly support people having laying hens if they wish. They also must provide adequate care and environment for these birds.
- locally raised chickens will be a good addition to our urban community
- Many cities allow this!

- Sustainability would increase per household if some people wanted to house chickens and things, but support from neighbours sounds like child support for chickens. It would make sense if you word it as acknowledgement or acceptance
 - "Yes, but hen owners should not need to prove that owning hens will benefit the community in any way outside of the ability to grow their own food.
 - I also don't really think it's the neighbors business if someone wants to raise hens, ducks, pigeons or any small bird for food so long as suitable living conditions with adequate space for the hens."
 - I would love to have hens in my neighborhood and maybe even in my backyard one day
 - As long as it does not affect neighbours with cleanliness & noise.
 - As long as there is enforcement that it does not interfere with neighbours and that the animal conditions are acceptable.
 - I want chickens & eggs!!
 - As long as owners are responsible and get the approval of their neighborhood
 - As long as the animals are well kept and cared for, I see no issues allow hens or other select livestock
 - People should be allowed to have whatever pet they want as long as the pet is safe, healthy and well taken care of, and they pet is not a danger or causes a negative impact on the living experiences of the neighbours. (No smelly yards, loud roosters, etc)
 - Hens can be good for community
 - Urban livestock is not a problem if smell and noise are controlled by the owner.
 - why? I support it... obviously the neighbours have to agree and we know a large won't, so moot question!
 - I'm just okay with it
 - If the surrounding neighbours understand the potential noise levels and still support it, why not?
 - As long as the animals aren't a nuisance or pose a health issue, why not.
 - I think the support from adjacent neighbors is key, and should have to be provided every two years (as neighbors move, or maybe find it impacts them after it's there)
 - With proper regulations livestock are okay. This should include number of animals per amount of property owned.
 - "Small livestock can be safely and humanely kept within city limits in suitable space and housing. Hens, ducks, rabbits, and other small animals can be safely kept in a yard without severe negative impacts to their well being.
- Large livestock (horses, large pigs, cows, llamas) probably cannot be kept on any reasonably proportioned city property due to the space they require for well-being.

- I am unsure if any property in the city could safely contain goats and sheep without taking many precautions for their capacity for climbing and jumping.
- The city should also consider the potential for noise from any livestock animal and make their choice based on its capacity to disrupt life for neighbouring humans."
- I like eggs, but more seriously I am not well educated on the situation. I've seen backyard hens work in urban environments. As long as the hens are healthy and provided for without too much public disturbance then I cannot see why not.
- I like the idea
- It's the 21st century and so many other places already have this in place.
- More food and education brought into the backyards
- Let them have chickens! As long as the neighbours are ok with the noise/smell
- I believe that Calgarians have reached a point in which we consider a more sustainable life style in harmony with nature. There would be great benefit, not only for the community, but also for individuals to share a natural approach to living.
- I believe that if pigeons are allowed in Calgary, that a certain amount of Hens should be as well. 2-5 hens should be permitted if one has a suitable place for them to live both in winter and summer and a large enough green space to contain areas for the hens to have space.
- As long as neighbours are in agreement.
- Hens can be very beneficial to the city overall but this program should be carefully considered by all parties involved. If the city is considering other livestock, this program needs to clearly outline the definition of other livestock so that everyone is well informed. Every citizen has the right to approve or reject an application if the introduction of such a program would have a negative impact on any of the parties involved. The city should disclose how they plan to monitor, assess and approve or deny such applications. Again, full transparency.
- Why not ?
- Great way to get food stuffs
- I think it is a good idea.
- I think this is a fantastic idea, I know many people that would love to have their own chickens within the city.
- I don't care what other people do.
- I'm good with it as long as owners are responsible
- This has been an experiment in California and has worked quite well for their communities. It's at least worth giving it a try.
- As long as they are well taken care of I agree with being able to own them
- Yea don't see why it would be a problem as long as the neighbours don't mind
- If this will have a positive impact and benefit a community, and the owners are committed to providing excellent living conditions for the animals, then I support this.

- People have had hens for thousands of years.
- Suitable living conditions.
- I think it would be neat to have backyard hens, but I would be worried about neighbour hens escaping and entering other property, smell, noise. There should be strong rules around proper care and needs for hens. Also strong rules about barren hens and what happens to them.
- If people want hens as pets then they should be able to
- we have bigger problems in this city than worrying about chickens.
- I would love to have a few hens
- I believe that's a great idea, could support local Calgarians if they were to sell eggs.
- If neighbours are on-board (not just direct side by side, but also neighbours who back into the requesting property all agree, then why not? However, I do believe there should be "upkeep check-ins" to ensure requesters are keeping pens in shape in accordance to bylaws.
- The person should make application, provide written support of the requirements.
- I think it is a great idea to have urban chickens lots of smaller towns allow this and it is successful
- I feel if people want backyard hens or other species they should be able to do so as long as the needs of the animals are met.
- Urban hens provide fresh healthy homegrown food options. This should be encouraged.
- Raising food in cities is a great idea, if done responsibly
- Approval up to a limited number of animals
- Done properly chickens can be a great animal to own.
- Like bees not everyone will be comfortable with this but if they are it will allow people who want to create sustainable food production on their property the opportunity to do so.
- Urban food is an increasing issue. Buying from grocery stores can mean buying from stressed chickens. This is a healthier option.
- As long as the rules are applied to everyone.
- I'm all for chickens in neighbourhoods
- So long as there are no negative impacts I think this is positive.
- I see nothing wrong with this going forward as long as by laws are strict and straight forward in the best interest of the animals.
- It's your property should be able to do as pleased as long as conditions are suitable
- I like the idea of urban hens as they can convert feed and waste food into eggs and meat. Having proper living conditions and sanitation is also important as animal waste does smell unpleasant. Chicken waste compost is also good fertilizer, so it would go to nicer looking and producing gardens. As for other livestock, so long as their needs for space, food, and sanitation are met and so long as they are not exceptionally noisy, I see little problem. I am less concerned with support from adjacent neighbours, as some people will complain about anything. Unless there is some concern like someone being severely allergic to bee stings, well cared for urban livestock should be no problem.
- Good food source

- Self-raised livestock can provide ethically-sourced goods for much of the neighborhood. So long as the community is in agreement, I see no issue with it.
- It should be everyone's choice what type of animal they have
- With an addendum for non-commercial use, or restricted commercial use to prevent large scale hen houses in residential areas causing disruption.
- Hens are a wonderful way for people to have access to healthy, affordable food and can be extremely helpful to families. I also believe ducks can serve the same purpose and that neither are a nuisance.
- One cannot judge what is a support animal. Support comes in so many forms... Including all types of animals... Other than endangered species.
- I don't feel that the neighbors should have any say. It's the other three points I fully agree with, especially that the potential owner has the appropriate living conditions for the animals' safety and well-being
- Urban Hens should be allowed as long as owners look after them & house them appropriately.
- I don't see any problem with it. Also by having livestock it could help decrease the cost of buying food.
- Because people should have the right to grow food, be it plant or animal based.
- As long as the needs and care of the animals (such as hens) are cared for, and the household keeps the environment clean (therefore managing smells that could offend neighbors), I think allowing people to have hens would be an excellent and cool opportunity. We lived beside a house with chickens and besides the very odd cluck or coo, you would never know they were there. Fresh eggs everyday... who wouldn't want that?!
- Allowing the collection of eggs I do not find an issue
- If the hens have a suitable living condition and are not distracting or causing a nuisance to neighbors, they should absolutely be allowed in the city
- Cities need to start implementing internal and sustainable food systems. The introduction of urban farming and livestock should be a part of this.
- As long as the neighbors agree, I think it's a great idea.
- If the well-being of the animals is the main focus (size of environment and amount of animals)
- Chickens can be kept well in Calgary if proper management is exhibited
- People should be allowed to have non-distractive animals on their property
- I think it's fine
- If conditions are met, why not.
- Responsible animal ownership that is a benefit should be encouraged.
- Yes with limitations. Hens' cages for instance smell very bad if not properly maintained and I would like to see a limit imposed. Also they attract predators which can be a danger for small children
- Hens are no different than the pigeons we're already allowed to have.
- As long as the proper housing for the hens is abiding by the current building regulations on residential properties within city limits, hens are not a nuisance.
- It can only help.

- I've experienced hens in backyards in England however proper housing, cleanliness, and care is required.
- I would, if there were strict conditions in place to ensure a happy and healthy home for the animals, with the right level of care necessary. I would also stipulate that there needs to be ongoing check ins to ensure that the animals continue to be taken care of properly.
- Yes as long as the neighbours are OK with it and the noise is kept to a minimum (noise bylaws)
- I would also like to see domestic ducks allowed
- Let people do what they want.
- People should be required to uphold a quality standard of living for the hens. I think this is a great idea.
- As long as the owners are respectful of adjacent neighbors and are taking care of the animals welfare then there should be no issues
- Living conditions of the animals and the impacts to the neighbours of these owners should be considered.
- As long as those involved and those who would be affected are on board, and the animals are safe, fed, and taken care of, why not??
- As long as someone can properly raise an animal, whether a farm chicken or a cat, the city shouldn't care
- "If and Only if the animals are provided with absolute 100% care and living conditions that do not impeach on their neighbors.
- I live close to the woman who has the 3 Emotion Support Chickens.
- THAT is how animals should be treated and taken care of.
- She couldn't be a better example of how to provide an amazing home and environment for their required needs."
- Need a certain size of property for certain animals, certain distances from neighbours.
- If the hens aren't bothering people and are being cared for why not.
- Yes because some stock animals are good for the environment, like goats who eat grass.
- If there is support from neighbours and the community, why not allow it
- As long as they are taken care of properly I see no reason livestock should not be allowed in the city
- I would rather have livestock around me than Pit Bulls! A hen has certainly never killed anyone.
- This would work well in more suburban neighborhoods where the livestock has a higher quality of life and room to house.
- Good
- If the owner had permission from neighbors I see know issue with this
- Some people who want support animals are allergic to traditional pets such as dogs or cats.
- Generally in favour of urban livestock. Would like to see fewer restrictions
- I support the bylaw as a way for calgarians to become more self sufficient by providing a natural and organic food source.

- Society needs to shift to allow individuals to be more self sustaining, living within a city (and not being able to afford farmland) shouldn't prevent them from doing so.
- If criteria met, can't see why not.
- When kept responsibly animals are not a nuisance. A dog or a cat that's poorly behaved could cause more issues than keeping hens in a yard. As long as everyone around is in agreement and the animals are safe and taken care of there should be no issue.
- some livestock animals are used for therapy, I think taken into consideration of why that livestock is being asked for should be detailed looked into.
- Why not as long as they are cared for properly and not bugging the rest of the neighborhood
- Yes we need to be able to raise chickens for eggs.
- Hens can be great for managing pests, provide comfort and companionship as well as eggs. Other animals such as goats or rabbits should have the same health and shelter requirements as outlined by the Farm Care Alberta
- It helps people become more self sufficient while supporting the community.
- If the neighbors are fine with it I see no issue.
- This seems reasonable.
- Small live stock if properly taken care of should be allowed.. rules and control along with safety to be assured.
- Yes Calgarians should be able to have hens for eggs.
- Hens or other appropriately cared for and sheltered animals are no more disruptive than normal urban noise.
- This is fine
- I would support allowing Calgarian's to responsibly own livestock within the city limits.
- Would LOVE urban hens!
- There should be restrictions on square footage per animal-- please no multi-chicken coops in a suburban backyard that is only feet from the neighbors!
- If the conditions are humane and the neighbours are okay with it I see absolutely no problem with this.
- House pigs and chickens, on a case by case basis where space allows
- I would love to have hens on my property
- I would love to raise hens and have fresh eggs in my apartment (could it live on a large balcony if kept clean?)
- as long as they are in enclosures
- as long as they are kept in an enclosure.
- I only support this if bylaw enforcement has the means to adequately and effectively investigate claims of abuse and neglect.
- People should be allowed to do what they please with their backyard. Having hens is a way for people to have food sources
- I would like to have a few chickens. Especially in these hard times.

- No neighbours approval!!! I don't get along with one. Why should I have to suffer his disapproval if it's a benefit to me and our other neighbours.
- I really want hens and would be open to any kind of bylaws or rules that would allow me to have backyard hens
- Urban hens can be an amazing addition to a community!
- Provided there is a limit in numbers.
- Although I believe having livestock would be better outside of the city, on an acreage or farm, as long as the livestock is being properly taken care of, given love, and treated right i don't see a problem.
- As long as hens are on private property
- Certain livestock can be good alternate pets for some
- I would love to have hens and be able to provide fresh food for my family!!
- As long as space permits and animals are treated correctly, it doesn't bother m.
- As long as they don't cause major nuisance to neighbors.
- Encourages greater sustainabilit efforts in the local community.
- I think it is a good use of property for anyone, to be able to keep animals that can produce some sort of food source for their family needs.
- Good to have a balance of different (and legal) pets.
- If animal conditions can be maintained and the animals are very properly cared for, I'm open to a variety of animals being on personal property
- I see no problem with households raising hens in their yards
- Responsible ownership of animals should always be allowed if the rules are adhered to.
- I think hens only at first.
- Power to the people to grow their own food!
- I would as long as each criteria is met. Especially that of requiring support from adjacent neighbours.
- As long as it is done ethically it should not be a problem.
- Live stock to meet daily requirements are a persons right
- Hens and goats should be allowed.
- as long as their are rules in place, such as noise restrictions, people having to keep the chicken living areas clean, and they should have adequate spacing between houses/location of coops
- Could be a great way to engage communities and relationships with neighbors.
- Community/Neighbors should be polled for approval
- There are many environmental benefits.
- I believe that there need to be stringent regulations in place to ensure the hens are being cared for appropriately, but I otherwise agree with the idea of allowing urban hens.
- they allow people to sustain their lively hoods with hens that lay eggs or to eat
- There has to be buy in from anyone who hears a rooster or smells a chicken
- Just like any other animal.

- Chickens are cool and urban farming is important. Everyone should be allowed to grow or raise their own food, to a certain extent.
- This is a great initiative and would love to have a hen for fresh eggs
- Chickens would be great to keep around and will save many low income families money on groceries/eggs.
- pigs, chickens, ducks, there are many companion animals besides dogs and cats.
- Giving people the chance to be more self-sustaining is a great idea
- This furthers the opportunity to have sustainable urban living with unobtrusive livestock.
- Humans have kept small livestock for thousands of years. If well kept, there's no reason to restrict reasonable amount of urban hens.
- I believe people should be able to have hens and have their own fresh eggs. Hens really wouldn't cause damage or fly around. But people should need to have proper living environment for them also.
- Having the ability for neighbors to weigh in is absolutely necessary. Small livestock shouldn't be an issue as long as proper treatment is followed.
- If Not too loud
- If the property has enough space and the neighbors agree then sure. If there in a condo no space=no way
- Don't see a problem
- I would love to have my own chickens to lay eggs
- small livestock and proper care should be no issue and helps with family's food costs
- Backyard chickens are fine with me.
- Healthier lifestyles, community supports. Could help people financially
- Having fresh eggs is a benefit to many in the community. Proper regulations should be in place to prevent the spread of diseases and there should definitely be a limit on the number of hens. There should also be education around the care of these animals and the disposal of bird waste.
- It is our right to acquire our own food etc in a natural way and choosing to provide for ourselves opposed to store bought products. As long as it does not affect the community as a whole in a negative way.
- It is environmentally friendly and often a stress relief for people to be able to live more sustainably with community gardens and local livestock
- The number of hens should be limited (to five) and standards should be in place for the chicken coop - the coop should look good (match the house/neighborhood) and heating should be provided in winter. Odor prevention and cleanup standards should be in place as well.
- This can help communities and also individual mental health.
- If I can have a dog why can't I have a chicken?
- Hens can be of use to almost all people. Although they are hard work it allows people to learn and value the work others go through to support the people in need of the resources.
- Stop restricting people and let us live our lives.

- I like the idea of people being able to have their own hens as long as they are cared for properly.
- This seems logical.
- As long as neighbours are involved in the discussion, I am in agreement. If owners are allowed chickens without neighbour consultation, I am not in agreement.
- It has to be clear that the hens are pets and not used to be raised as food. The consumption of eggs is okay. Whether they lay eggs or not, the bylaw for any pet must apply to hens.
- I don't believe that city dwellers should be precluded from small livestock ownership if it can be done respectfully and responsibly.
- I'm fine with backyard chickens
- Needs of the animals first. They must have a high quality of life.
- This would promote a large sense of community, as well provide nutrients for soil
- Housing is suitable
- There isn't a spot for this but I must say that it is never the animals fault, it is how they are raised by the owners and bylaws or increased insurance against specific animals, such as pit bulls, is wrong. A small dog can be just as dangerous in the wrong persons hands.
- This would promote a sense of community
- As long as the animals are being properly cared for I don't see an issue.
- No harm
- Urban hens and other livestock, under appropriate living conditions, contribute to the vibrancy of a community much like a garden or greenery does. We see this in many other urban cities.
- Sure why not
- As long as it was not a pain for the neighbours to state their concerns or disapproval.
- If the neighborhood likes the idea, do it.
- Owning livestock should be no different than owning other animals as long as their needs are taken care of.
- N/A
- There is no reason a person can't have hens.
- I think that if hen owners are responsible and have a suitable living situation for the hens they should be allowed to have them.
- As long as animals are cared for accordingly
- "Assuming noise and smell issues are considered
- le no roosters"
- Evaluated on a case-by-case basis I can see the value of allowing hens in the city. Those who wish to raise hens provide a service to the city and reduce the need for large-scale farming to a degree.
- If everyone agrees on it (neighbours, owners, bylaw) why not!
- If the property allows for the animals to have a proper standard of living that should be whomever is purchasing these pets to keep them
- I would like to have hens. I think it is a great idea as long as they are ensured that they can be kept well.

- as long as they are not a nuisance to the community or have foul odors and meet certain criteria then by all means, allow it
- It can be well managed
- They can be very beneficial to a community!
- Rosters should not be allowed in city limits
- Hens and other small farmyard animals (like quail, potbellied pigs) are no more noisy or disruptive than plenty of dogs that are allowed to live in the city
- Chickens
- Livestock can be pets too. This is an excellent amendment
- I want to so long as they are housed in a way that doesn't bring the coyotes in after them. We don't need another wild turkey incident.
- I am on board with giving people the ability to feed themselves (eggs) etc. as long as there are healthy checks and balances.
- Chickens!!!
- Suitable
- I have only known one pet hen, but I was impressed with how smart and affectionate they were!
- People that struggle financially may struggle less to feed themselves
- Freedom, it's my property I should have access to any animal I want
- hell yeah, chickens are dope
- let the people have chickens, who cares!
- As long as the livestock are smaller (maybe animal size / number is based on a ratio of yard size). If yard gets stinky, fines.
- I don't care if my neighbour has hens as long as they don't impact me.
- As a "community" project, this could be a great way for people and children to learn about livestock and appreciate animals in a more meaningful manner.
- If the animal was treated well (no hoarding) and wasn't a nuisance to neighboring properties.
- As long as there are rules in place for the well-being of the animal and the humans around, and enforcement from the city, I see no problem
- Chickens can smell. So I think a certain distance away from neighbouring houses is in order.
- As long as the chickens are correctly cared for, I would support it.
- Livestock were meant to have large spaces and areas to roam, if this can be provided in the city I support it.
- I think as long as they are in a good home and supported this is okay.
- Small wildlife enriches an area, as long as they are given the best and safest chances
- It is extremely beneficial to citizens to have access to home grown/fresh food (eggs in this case). Also I see no difference in the noise level of hens clucking, vs dogs barking vs lawnmowers.
- As long as said livestock was cared for, and provided an ideal living situation I don't see why not.
- People should have the ability to care for some, smaller, easy-to-care-for livestock animals, but only if there are strict and enforced laws regarding the requirements to ensure their wellbeing.

- I would support this is there is mandatory vaccinations and flock containment and biosecurity to reduce disease transmission
 - Prevent food shortage. Support local. Save money.
 - Some people find comfort in chickens
 - Livestock can be beneficial and I think there should be a system that makes this possible
 - It would be nice if the city could have goats now laws instead of just lawnmower.
 - "If you're thinking of getting rid of a certain dog breed, you're already in the wrong.
- If people want a hen, sure as long as it's properly taken care of."
 - See above.
 - We live in a large property in the suburbs and think this would be a sustainable option to be able to have eggs.
 - All animals deserve happiness and love
 - I think that the support of the neighbours is key, and there should be a probation period where at any point in that period the neighbours could express a change of mind if it isn't working out
 - With same rules as pigeons listed below
 - As long as not doing any harm, I have no issues with this
 - Let people support themselves! Hens are a wonderful contribution to a household and a great learning experience for children
 - Urban hens provide lots of benefits to local communities.
 - Some animals such as chickens and pigs are known to be great support animals
 - pigs make great pets!
 - Yes, they are a bit noisy, but something like chickens can be incredibly helpful for the community. There is plenty of fresh eggs!
 - I believe that other animals and livestock should be allowed as long as it doesn't interrupt the community.
 - Nothing should ever fall under 1 persons discretion,ever.Thats a dictatorship in action..We need a panel. Including balance and with educated members of animal advocacy included. Not a slanted elected by 1 political party for life b.s. position.
 - Hens are natural pest control for rodents and bugs and provide food.
 - Hens allow for a more sustainable lifestyle and improve food quality and enjoyment of life.
 - No issue as long as noise, cleanliness, etc addressed. Also what conditions should owner need/decide to slaughter? Eg: Are chickens considered food or just their eggs?
 - I think it is unfair that hens are not currently permitted within the city as they can be quite beneficial in keeping ticks and other pests at bay while providing food and a great learning experience for those raising them.
 - I think that as long as there was a limit on the livestock. For example maybe 4 hens per household and if adjacent neighbours are okay, then it should be good.

- Why not
- I think offering people the opportunity to have laying hens, or other small livestock, could make a very positive impact on the City of Calgary.
- Seems reasonable.
- I love the idea of a real life, backyard way to show people (eg children) responsible care of animals other than dogs and cats, plus where their food comes from (eg eggs)
- Because my household personally would be interested in having hens for our own purposes.
- Fine for larger properties where they won't be too close to the neighbours.
- I think there is no difference between a hen and a cat nor a dog and a small goat
- Why should the City get to tell taxpayers they CAN own a cat but CANT own a hen. If the taxpayer has not shown themselves to be irresponsible (habitual offender of animal bylaws) I dont understand why you would get involved at all.
- Hens and chickens are a source of food for many
- Ethical treatment of animals is key - increases food security for all.
- Promotes healthy eating!
- 100% I want Hens!!!
- This gives the opportunity to maintain a fresh food living environment
- Some small livestock are great for local environment (recycling)
- its ppls lands. They pay taxes. They should have every right to do what they please as long as they are responsible.
- Small livestock animals can be a benefit to owners and the community if handled properly, for example the production of eggs from chickens or milk from goats. Some consider these to be pets.
- "Urban hens are fantastic, quiet, productive and relatively easily kept pet.
- No need for a rooster, low-cost and plenty of fun! I would adore a trio of hens for our neighbourhood block."
- Because all animals are beneficial for good health of all the people as long as they are not nuisance.
- Community/neighbour approval required.
- I think that any opportunity to allow people to harvest their own food - be it eggs from hens, or honey from bees, should be allowed.
- Hens are non disruptive easy to care for and a great source of protein
- Hens can be great pets if kept properly however I would advise an inspection of the pen or area it will be kept is up to a high standard before a license to own one in city limits is issued
- People should have the right to self sufficiency.
- So long as there are clear parameters for the care and living arrangements of these animals I think they should be allowed within Calgary.
- Na
- Hens would allow for laying and greater food independence
- If it's not gonna be a problem why not

- Provided strict adherence to the highest standard of housing and care for the animals are in place, and severe penalties for any breaches are in place, then I would support this.
- I think this is great as long as there are requirements for what kind of living conditions they can be kept in and that they do not cause problems for other people
- If the owners are able to keep the animals under control and make sure they are not a nuisance to others, I see no problem with this.
- this seems fair to all involved
- Animals such as hens, goats, pigs, etc should be allowed given that their living situations are acceptable
- I think having urban hens would be a great idea
- I have had chickens and they are easy to maintain and quiet. Better than dogs even.
- I believe livestock animals such as hens and pigs should most certainly be allowed in urban properties so long as the owners are responsible and have the knowledge to give said animals a happy and healthy life.
- Locally and ethically sourced eggs.
- Self explanatory
- I want hens.
- It would be good for the people's mental health and the community at large.
- As long as the person keeping them follows the rules, keeps their yard clean and have no roosters to wake me - go for it.
- Any animal that can be cared for in a residential area and that doesn't pose a risk to either neighbors or the animal in question should be legal to own and maintain on a private residence.
- As long as the animals are well taken care of and premises are kept clean.
- Hens would be a good way to promote perma-culture in Calgary. But it should be monitored appropriately.
- First and foremost is the care and cleanliness of the animals and their enclosures. I also feel limiting the number of hens/livestock a person can keep to be important. Community coops/social programs should be allowed to keep more, provided they can properly house and care for them.
- You should be able to have any animal as long as it is cared for
- Allows for access to local eggs, they can be domesticated very well in the correct environments, decreases travel time to access a staple in many diets. However, I would not support butchering the animal in their house and would encourage creating relationships with butchers for this part.
- Yes, I believe live stock, including chickens, can be kept within the city properly and without causing issues as long as they are properly cared for.
- Urban hens would be great.
- If animals can be kept in suitable living conditions and follow the same rules as other domesticated animals (such as the ones surrounding the 'nuisance' animals), I believe they can be beneficial and should be able to be kept in the city.
- Why not? A pet is a pet.

- There is zero issue with having hens in Calgary.
- If the stock doesn't hurt or annoy neighbors and the owner took proper care without any issues I see no problem
- Needs restrictions in place for proper enforcement
- I see no reason not to
- As long as the animal is cared for properly (including having enough space) and not causing any issues with neighbours there should be no reason why someone can't have those animals.
- Hens are quiet, and it's a good learning opportunity for kids to grow up around animals such as chickens. It will also allow for the family to harvest their own eggs.
- If COVID has taught us anything, it's that we need to localize and re-learn how to sustain ourselves without relying on massive amounts of imported goods. Learning to keep hens and other small livestock is a great way to reconnect to our food systems and to the land. Ideally, training programs should be made available for people who want to keep hens but need to learn how to care for them properly. This would probably reduce the need for bylaw enforcement down the road.
- I believe if the livestock can have proper shelter and care that allowing them within city should be allowed with conditions which would be dependent on the animal
- with a thorough application process. What if the neighbor moves and the new neighbor is not in favour?
- More freedom of choice.
- Hens and bees, goats and other small livestock do not create negative outcomes.
- A lot of animals considered "livestock" are also pets for many people. For example, pigs & goats.
- People should be able to raise animals for sustenance on their property, even when I'm urban centres.
- I like the idea of assessing cases as they arise and not umbrella-ing each case as if they have similar circumstances.
- As long as the above criteria are being weighed heavily in consideration of allowing livestock on someone's private property, I see no issue. However, this must also be monitored after the livestock has moved to the property. Moreover, neighbours must be made aware that they are not to change their mind after agreeing with said livestock moving in next door, except for in extreme cases where the animal is being neglected or abused in any way.
- It's 2020. People want to fend for themselves more and more when it comes to food.
- Be a good neighbour first. Who doesn't like Pygmy goats.
- There is no reason any animal should be banned from anywhere if proper care is met.
- If the farm animals are beneficial then they should be allowed in, however if more restrictions are put on pitbulls I will not support it because it is not fair to target that breed.
- Great idea!!!
- I believe if an individual is responsible, competent, able to provide an appropriate environment and meet all the animals needs then they should be able to have livestock in their home.

- Urban hens are a sustainable way for a family to provide a healthy source of protein in the form of eggs. I fully support an urban hen program as long as these programs are being closely monitored by appropriate enforcing bodies. The hens welfare and safety should be a priority.
- Hens should be allowed as long as it is regulated.
- As long as the animals are being taken care of and not a disturbance, it should be allowed.
- Urban hens can be life changing for many people, including those seeking a more self-sustaining lifestyle where they rely less on traditional food sales (large stores). Urban hens do have the chance of becoming a nuisance, so having conditions on the ownership of urban hens, such as support from adjacent neighbours, seems like a good idea.
- I think chickens could be a great addition to our city as long as they are kept cleanly and humanely.
- There could be many benefits.
- Raising food should never be an issue
- Urban hens and livestock have been shown to have great benefit in other communities where they are allowed. I am very excited about the introduction of this bylaw amendment as long as it is done in a responsible and fair manner. From experience in other cities these animals rarely cause significant issues.
- People already do this so it makes sense to create a bylaw so there are suitable living conditions and that other Calgarians are aware of the bylaw.
- As long as the pet owner can keep the area clean then there is no reason not to allow it.
- Assuming neighbours are okay with it and the living conditions for the livestock are more than acceptable. I would be in favour of this bylaw .
- It's totally reasonable.
- Fresh eggs! Plus it would be nice to have some chicken in the yard.
- I support urban agriculture initiatives for the purposes of community-building, education, and food security and permitting responsible ownership of backyard hens would be a great amendment.
- With guidelines and regulations in place, having a few hens in a backyard pen, well contained, shouldn't create strife amongst neighbors. Regulating square footage per animal (as per humane, not farming, practices, and ensuring the housing and waste regulations are met would eliminate many issues.
- Proper research must be done.
- As long as there are laid out expectations this is very beneficial for families and communities. I have some concern about adjacent neighbors outright.... I'd prefer adjacent neighbor if the coop or the chickens are within a certain distance from the property line. The living conditions must be laid out clearly. I also support licensing to pay for annual or as needed inspections
- Not to many per household.
- "Keep a minimum on how many hens, max 2 hens per household
- Quality control of living conditions"
- A maximum number of hens is important to set. No more than 3 should be allowed, that is plenty to serve a family.
- free eggs

- In a proper environment, small livestock could be very beneficial to a home and community. People that wish to have pet pigs/ ducks etc would be able to have these pets as well
- Why not?
- We have a right to have small farm animals that can help provide food or companionship if taken care of probably
- If someone can keep a barking dog, why would a chicken coop cause a problem, as long as the hens are well cared for.
- Eggs
- We should be able to have a few small animals like chickens to help off set the supermarkets. We should all be somewhat self efficient
- Citizens should be allowed to have hens as long as they are fully capable of caring for them and their enclosure remains tidy.
- All livestock should be allowed anywhere in the world.
- Chickens in your backyard laying eggs for food is a great idea as long as you have enough space and they are not a nuisance
- I think as long as the animals are cared for, do not cause disturbances to neighbour's and are not considered nuisance animals they should be allowed.
- Following suit of what an other municipalities have successfully implemented this could be a very positive program for Calgarians however there should be strict bi laws to enforce safety and well-being of the hens and also ensure that people are educated before acquiring them.
- I think urban farming is the way of the future, people need to be able to be more self sufficient, the type of livestock should be closely monitored however, cattle might be a little much, but goats and maybe even pigs could be ok.
- Everyone can benefit from taking care of animals, children especially, which most people cannot afford (living outside of the city is expensive). In addition, some small livestock can help provide food supplements to their people, helping ease financial strain.
- As long as the animals welfare is of utmost importance
- Exceptions should be evaluated by an animal health professional such as a veterinarian not an unqualified chief bylaw enforcement officer.
- As long as it is noise compliant. I do not want a rooster waking me up at 5am
- It sounds beneficial and worth a try.
- So long as suitable living conditions can be provided and the animals will not be a nuisance to adjacent neighbours, I think this type of program would be very beneficial and sustainable
- capitalism is failing, we need to start becoming for self sufficient and support locally. This would benefit the economy and people
- As long as it doesn't disturb neighbours in any way.
- Suitable living conditions for all animals must be ensured- that much is obvious. Having the consent of the neighbours can be important because there may be animal allergies, or other animals there.
- If the animal is properly cared for and has adequate living space, why should people love limited to certain animals?

- I don't think support from neighbours should be a requirement
- No. Are we dating? Why do I have to explain my answer? If you aren't getting enough info from my answer, ask better questions. Jeeze.
- I don't see any issue with this so long as the additional criteria above is implemented.
- As long as it is not disturbing peace of other neighbours it should be allowed - noise and odor must be managed
- As long as they are not a nuisance to the neighborhood there should be no issue.
- I like cows
- Low maintenance animals, quiet, lotsa eggs. Pro chicken.
- alpacas make excellent pets!
- If you're able to be responsible for said creature, you should be permitted to do so.
- I like the idea of having eggs if the birds can be managed.
- I think urban hens are a great idea as long as there is education readily available from the City of Calgary on how to properly care for hens.
- Having personal livestock is a great way to have food security and provide residents with alternative experiences.
- Max of 2 or 4 hens
- The line between livestock and pets can get blurry sometimes, I think given the opportunity to keep other types of animals in the city is a good idea as long as reasonable conditions are met
- If the community is okay with it, animals are being treated okay...I don't see why not.
- This could be a great way for people to be able to ensure their egg supply comes from ethical sources (their own home! With suitable conditions). If only factory farms had the same rules...
- Let people have their chickens or other small livestock. It's no big deal.
- Small livestock such as chickens can be fun and provide benefits, but I feel this must be supported by neighbouring residents due to the possibility of smells and noise.
- as long as suitable care is provided living within the city should not be a restriction of ownership
- I'd love to have chickens or a goat or an alpaca
- As long as people are responsible, can provide proper care to their animals, and have ample space and housing for the animal residential areas shouldn't restrict people from owning live stock as long as it doesn't effect the quality of life of the animal. You can't put a horse in a 2 bedroom condo but you can easily have a chicken. It should be assessed based on that criteria.
- Don't see why people can't own unconventional pets.
- I don't agree with the community benefit, but I do agree with having the support from neighbours as that would be really the only people you might bother, and suitable living conditions is a must!
- As long as the animals are being treated properly and they aren't disruptive to the community.
- hens and birds. I think livestock might get messy, as they are generally larger animals.
- Hens ..not pigeons
- I like hens. I would just hope that there are some regulations and rules in place to protect the animals from harm.

- No roosters though
 - It is a lot more green and sustainable to raise your own livestock. I am 100% in agreement that hens should be allowed. Other livestock could be great as well, as long as the animal is living in proper conditions.
 - Hens, yes. They are small and quiet. Other livestock, probably not. I would not support goats, sheep, pigs, etc. These are animals that require more space and care than a backyard can provide, plus they are noisy and stinky. I love animals, but if someone wants livestock then they should purchase an acreage and move out of the city.
 - Having access to eggs is great and so is monitoring animal welfare and living conditions
 - Urban agriculture is an avenue that i think is worth exploring
 - These animals are positive to the environment and economy. More people should be able to have access
 - I support adding live stock to communities
 - There should be no issue with keeping a handful of chickens or smaller toy pigs on a property as long as certain criteria are met and enforced (ie, keeping the smell down).
 - I think having hens and livestock in the city is fine as long as there is enough space and suitable living conditions are maintained.
 - "Home food production is a good thing
- Would want to know how much noise they make before agreeing as a neighbour"
 - So long as conditions for safety of animals and measures for reduction of negative impact to neighbours is maintained.
 - If other animals can safely be added to the bylaw and the animals and neighbours do not suffer... Why not?
 - i support community hens, but no roosters
 - Hens, yes. Large livestock like cows, pigs, etc. should not be kept within city limits as they require more land to roam.
 - This could be very beneficial in many ways provided that the space is sufficient for these animals and there are maximum measures taken to ensure they are not accidentally released.
 - given the conditions above I think this would be a great idea.
 - Urban chickens has proven to be effective in other towns/cities.
 - any animal can be a companion to someone and I don't feel like species should depict whether or not they can reside in the city
 - Must have written permission by neighbors
 - Raising hens should be allowed in the city with conditions just as any animal. Needs are met, noise etc.
 - I have no issue with personal keeping of livestock so as the animals are treated well, and they do not become a nuisance to neighbours or members of the community.

- The above conditions are fair
- Hens should be allowed with proper care and rules to follow
- Yes, if proper care for the animals is provided. Perhaps through licensing or education requirements on proper livestock care. Although I'm curious on what kind of livestock this would include? Other than chickens, I don't think most Calgary homes/yards have adequate space for common livestock.
- Other cities do this, people should have the right to grow and raise their own food
- if it has a positive impact, neighbour's are ok with it, and the animal is happy, whats the problem?
- As long as it is not a disturbance to the neighborhood
- Chickens can be a great source of food and companionship. As long as the ownership is being performed properly and safely, I see no reason not to allow it.
- There are other municipalities around the world that have shown success in allowing small livestock to be kept on urban properties. The precedence is set that it would be beneficial to Calgary as well.
- Hens can be a nuisance noise-wise but they provide sustainable benefit to urban life.
- I want my own hens
- I see no problem with this as long as they are treated humanely and are in an area that is spacious for them to move around in.
- I think this would be a great option here in Calgary. I know Airdrie is already having success with this
- I would support but it would need to be a large home lot area and neighbours would need to be consulted as not everyone is on the same schedule and would like to hear louder animals so early and or late
- Good idea
- If people want to have hens and other livestock, as long as they don't have too many to actually take care of, I don't see the problem.
- Only if routine, unannounced inspections are carried out and neighbor approval is required and should include type and proposed location of any structures (both sides, and behind). Any documented negative impact on neighbors is grounds for immediate animal removal (in adherence to approved plan (location/size of structures, sound, smells, unsightly care structures (coups), other pest problems (eg. mice) due to feed or improper waste disposal.
- People being able to get fresh eggs in their backyard will decrease their carbon footprint and those people can be sure of the welfare of the chickens they get their eggs from.
- Fresh local eggs is more economic and less of a foot print
- If these animals aren't causing a nuisance, there shouldn't be an issue. Farm animals typically aren't any more of a problem than cats, dogs, and other pets.
- Having a logical policy for urban hens would likely lead to more discussion and compliance than no policy or a overly strict policy.
- I think this a great idea as long as livestock can be properly taken care of and all living conditions for the animals are up to standard.
- I think self sustainability is always a great option plus having backyard livestock would be a great addition to any community.
- Hens are a wonderful source of eggs.

- There are many types of pets that are loved and important to people so it's a good idea
- For greater food security and better use of backyard space in suburbs, I think it is a great idea to allow chickens and possibly other livestock in the city of Calgary.
- I think this would be lovely, and a good way for people to look after their own food needs.
- I believe small livestock should be feasible, within a specified number of animals, within a person's own property if they can ensure the animals aren't nuisances.
- The community needs to support the breed and their owners!
- Food self reliance will only be more important in the future
- Within reason....I would not support my neighbor having a cow. However hens for eggs would be acceptable.
- Hens are fantastic pets and can live happily in adequate urban environments. And nothing beats fresh eggs!
- Hens are easy to keep and can provide sustainable food for families. In a yard, they help manage pest and insect populations. Cleanliness of the chicken coop and associated property must be a priority though
- This would encourage sustainable food sources and cheaper access to food
- No roosters.
- urban hens are a good thing-as long as it's done right.
- as long as it ensures the animals are treated well and homed properly, I have no problem with it.
- Homegrown food is one of the best methods to reduce our ecological footprint. why restrict it?
- Initial support from adjacent neighbours is fine, but people move all the time so it seems a bit redundant.
- Backyard eggs. No roosters. Hens only
- Only if there is a strict limit based on available outdoor space.
- certain animals
- As long as the animals are clean and do not create too much noise
- I have thought about keeping chickens myself and have always wondered why it wasn't allowed if you have the space.
- Other than possibly roosters, which are often very loud
- As long as there is limit on the amount.
- As long as there are requirements for the animals to have enough space and maybe a minimum yard size so that neighbors are not inconvenienced (I could foresee a neighbors dog being very agitated by chickens on the other side of the fence), this seems like a fine idea.
- Chickens!!! Hens are wonderful!
- Owning small livestock is fulfilling, helps ex laying hens
- As long as they are not allowed in individuals backyards etc. the noise from chickens and roosters makes it impossible to sleep
- If you can provide a proper home for the animal why would you say no?

- Written and rescindable (with notice) support from neighbours would be required, plus appropriate space available per hen (not sure what that is)
- Assuming good animal husbandry is followed, don't see any issue.
- If consideration is entertained then I feel like this amendment allows for new animal/people dimensions.
- This is a wonderful way for people to live more sustainable lives! This would be a huge benefit to so many people
- Fresh eggs, duh!
- The right conditions must be present.
- chickens are cool
- I would like to be consulted before hens move in next door. I would also like to understand the scope of activities. For example, will animals be butchered on site? That would be a definite no.
- It is better to have criteria in place so it can be done safely with some oversight.
- It would be an amazing way to connect with animals and allow the community to learn more about food sources.
- With adjacent neighbor approval, being able to own small livestock animals like hens helps the community with food costs, however requirements for house and smell need to be considered.
- Nothing better than fresh eggs.
- As long as animal is properly cared for and neighbours provide written support.
- As long as the rules regarding noise, smell and clean up of pet mess remain, it seems fair.
- Hens make amazing pets and yard animals. However, the only part I do not agree on is getting the consent from neighbors. The hens would be on my property, and be my responsibility, it has nothing to do with my neighbors.
- Some mechanism for monitoring or assessing the wellbeing of the animals and environment needs to be in place.
- As long as the owners are responsible and it doesn't bother their neighbors backyard chickens provide a valuable food source.
- Support from neighbours is critical.
- With the conditions listed above it seems these animals wouldn't be an issue to the neighbours or community and would be a safe addition
- Livestock would be cool ngl
- If it benefits the community and is an ethically safe way for the hens to live there are nothing but positives in this situation.
- If supported and not going to be an issue to the surrounding mahouts then I see no problem as long as the property is in fair condition to the animal and the animal receives sufficient space
- Chickens are excellent
- Allow all animals by default. If the City of Calgary or community members want to exclude particular animals from specific sites, require the active support of a majority of neighbours for the exclusion.
- Let folks keep chickens if they want

- provide someone owns ample space to care for the animals without disrupting their neighbors, they should be able to do what they want with their property.
 - As long as the hens are safe, happy, and free of disease, I have no problem with living with chickens in my city.
 - As long as the hens are living in a safe and fair environment.
 - A couple hens won't be back for a back yard upon proper care
 - I think urban farming is an important step that the City could help kickstart and maintain. This includes, but not limited to, providing a conducive environment for such activities. Thus, a balance between the need of neighbors and those of urban farmers can be attained in many cases.
 - I would expect any animal ownership to have little or no impact on a neighbour. I don't want to know if my neighbour has a pet - that means no excessive noise and says on their property.
 - I think it's important for animals to have suitable living conditions and to be considerate of others if it could affect others :Ex noise
 - I feel if you want to keep a certain animal you should be able to if it's not a nuisance
 - As long as the hens are cared for and not disruptive to the neighbourhood then it is a sustainable practice
 - as long as the animal is happy and healthy and is not hurting anyone I see no reason why they shouldn't be allowed
 - I don't see why not unless the person is not a responsible animal owner
 - As long as adjacent neighbours support it and the resident takes full responsibility, they should be allowed to have livestock.
 - Personal hens and other providing animals are beneficial to people and communities.
 - Depends on the animal. Can someone have a cow? What are the limits?
 - Proof of responsible ownership, regulated (in care and limited number of hens) and willingness/agreement by all affected parties (adjacent neighbours) should be sufficient
 - I would love to have a pet chicken and I'm sure I could create a great home for one.
 - I think this gives people an opportunity to be more in touch with where their food comes from. That can only be a good thing.
 - Good idea!
 - Hens would be beneficial to community as long as there are strict rules in place to ensure the well-being of them
 - "Urban agriculture is important. We have a disconnect between urbanites and where our food comes from. Many children think that eggs come from a carton in a store. Anything we can do to encourage urban farming (laying hens, food forests, community gardens, native grasses, etc.) should be encouraged.
- Pot-bellied pigs are also excellent urban dwellers. They are clean, quiet, and well behaved."

- I believe the approval of livestock would be beneficial for many Calgarians although there must be strict bylaws and enforcement to ensure the protection of the animals.
- I don't see any issues.
- Hens are wonderful and sustainable and this is a fantastic idea!
- I believe that we have to ensure livestock will not be at risk and have a suitable environment, this includes ensuring that the neighbours are on board and support this. Also to ensure that the calgarian is suitable to raise and care for the livestock.
- People should be able to raise their own animals for food, within guidelines, if they so choose.
- I think thats fine if people want to bring in barn yard animals.
- Let people get their own eggs.
- I don't see anything wrong with having urban hens as long as they are properly cared for.
- Hens fine - just no roosters. And as long as they have proper living conditions
- If hens mean chickens then Im all for it. people should definitely be allowed to own and keep any bird that produces food (eggs) for their family. No roosters though for noise control
- If rules are followed than why not?
- N/a
- Urban hens would be nice to have in the city. I would say you need a limit on hens if anything and a certain amount of space required.
- If the owners clean up after the animals and take care of/train them properly, it should have no more impact on the owner's neighbors than any other pet would.
- "Could be a source of sustainable food (eggs).
- More farm animals will be treated in a humane manner."
- Allowing individuals to have livestock on their property would be extremely beneficial
- As long as the property is kept reasonably clean and tidy and noise and smell are not excessive I would have no problem with urban livestock.
- I think if maintained well that hens should be allowed in the city
- If the rules are followed and enforced, I see nothing bad coming from allowing small livestock such as hens from being allowed within city limits, it's also especially good for kids to get involved with livestock and the responsibility of having them.
- I want fresh eggs
- I believe certain livestock, such as hens, ducks, potbellied pigs make excellent pets, provided the individual is committed to excellent care of these animals (as they are required to be of non-livestock animals).
- The benefits are huge for both humans and environment alike.
- Livestock can be a useful alternative for insect and weed control. By products such as wool, milk, eggs are a great thing. Education of care must be available and applications should be knowledgeable in the required husbandry.
- As long as an animal it treated well and not a concern to the surrounding community.

- If the animal is well cared for and does not pose any problems to neighbours, I don't see why they shouldn't be allowed.
- Allows more of the general public to care for these animals in a humane manner
- I would love to own hens within the city.
- If the suggested criteria are met, specifically with hens as they are messy and can smell which could be a major concern if you are a neighbour.
- Have a source of livestock should be a fundamental right to Calgarians. If they choose to offer suitable living spaces for said livestock. As the world transitions to a healthier, source of food. It should be a fundamental right of citizens to have access to livestock!
- If done properly it could add value to the lifestyle of people.
- I would support the bylaw with strict rules and regulations. Both for the animals safety and effects it could have on neighbours. Cleaning up poop regularly to avoid smell just like for dogs would need to be in there.
- Allow the hen's, but no more than a certain amount per household
- As long as conditions are clean and each hen has enough space to live comfortably, I'm in support of the amendment
- I believe that the benefits of having backyard hens outweighs the downfalls as long as they are looked and cleaned up after properly.
- I support more opportunists for live stock as long as conditions are met
- I support backyard chickens and bee hive
- Yes I think chickens should be allowed in Calgary
- I believe hens are an excellent idea, not my cup of tea personally because of the work involved, but I would never be bothered by hens on neighbouring properties, I grew up in a small town and we had the full chicken house next door including 2 roosters and even they were not a bother. I believe that small livestock such as goats or perhaps smaller pigs could work IF the property size is large enough, properly fenced, and the animals had proper shelter and 24/7 access to running water (keep it from freezing). I do understand that this may necessitate more city staff in order to assure animal safety as well as bylaw compliance in neighbourhoods so it is probably best to just start with hens.
- I think its a great idea
- I know a girl who has two pet pigs as support animals and they act just like a dog. So if these animals are trained and their environment at home is tidy and proper for them to reside there I think I it's a good idea.
- Chickens are hella cute
- As long as appropriate living conditions and space are given, rural animals should be fit to live in the proper housing within Calgary limits
- Having other livestock would promote the local community to support each other. As long as the animal's needs are met (living space, food, care, etc).
- Maybe less people would get dogs and get animals that are easier to take care of and we would have less dog problems.

- "I think it depending on land size and how many animals per household you are allowed in other words animal units.
- 1 unit is equal to
 - Cat
- 1 dog
- 1 bird
- 1000 bees
- 1 pig
- 1 goat
- I would then say you can have
- 2 animal units from the domestic side and 1 animal unit from the livestock side.
- Or 1 domestic animal unit and 2 from the livestock side."
- I think that there should be a permit for these animals, but I do believe it should be legal to own livestock as long as they can prove that they have the proper requirements to care of the animal.
- Less limitations are good, so long as owners are responsible.
- As long as the noise/smells aren't an issue to the neighbours it should be ok.
- I live in Bears paw and have raised chickens. They are clean, quiet and excellent for pest control
- Hens can be therapeutic to some people, with limits and cleanliness maintained
- Absolutely agree. I've had hens in my garden for a long time and they are fantastic!
- I always felt this bylaw to prohibit livestock and hens/chickens in the city was outdated. There are more and more people that would like to raise their own animals to better feed their families with home grown food.
- I think having access to urban livestock for the purposes of obtaining fresh, organic food should be an option to Calgarians.
- I think responsible animal husbandry should be encouraged.
- It is possible to have animals that do not fall in the typical pet category, ex support animals. There must be a limit however on the number allowed in ownership per household as well as size limit, this will help keep from having inappropriate pets that cannot do well in city out of households, such as a cow
- It's common sense
- sustainable food could help ease financial burden on lower income families. (Eggs)
- I think people being allowed to have hens is a great way for people to get back to understanding about food and animals.
- It would be a great way to increase people's ability to use local resources and foster community, especially in lower income areas
- Small livestock would not hard Calgary properties and allow people to have more locally sources food options.

- I think it would be fantastic for Calgarians to own their own chickens and get to experience fresh eggs for breakfast. My only concern would be if they are too loud (which I have no experience with, if this is the case) or not kept in a maintained environment that is morally appropriate for the livestock.
- As long as the animals have the proper housing and are properly taken care of, there is no concern for them in my neighbourhood.
- If everyone is okay with it and the animal will not be harmed I see no problem
- Hens would provide food and money to the cities poorest communities. They would be a great source of simple income while providing fresh eggs and meat.
- I think having chickens/other livestock within the city would be beneficial as long as appropriate and safe housing and care practices are mandatory
- I support having livestock in the city. I also strongly support the idea of training being mandatory for people who have dogs to limit any incidences.
- Grow your own food
- I think small livestock would be appropriate, but in terms of larger breeds it would be important to take into account the size of the property, proximity to neighbours, and the reasons for having such animals.
- safe environments for Any animal should be provided, no over crowding. complaints taken seriously.
- Fresh eggs!
- Chickens and other animals could help with food security for some agencies as well as families. As long as they can be cared for and are not a nuisance there shouldn't be an issue.
- Most people don't own other types of livestock just for [removed] and giggles, they would provide suitable living conditions.
- As long as there are no roosters. Absolutely no roosters.
- Chickens are fine. Don't let people have cows, horses, pigs, or any type or herd animal in their backyards.
- With restrictions around land size. Would not support on small inner city lots. Must have neighbours approval.
- Any and all animals should be allowed within the city.
- Yes, of course. This is a sustainable and environmentally friendly way to produce your own food.
- Engage the neighbors, and ensure clean and healthy animal standards
- I just think it's a great idea
- Helps to be more food-secure
- as long as the criteria above is followed, I see no harm in this.
- There should be a trail period, can have them for 3 months, if the neighbours have sufficient complaints with facts behind them then maybe they should not own hens. If no one complaints then don't think it hurts anyone....also they should have some sort of yard reinforcement, dogs and cats will be curious....
- why not
- More wildlife would be great!

- If people wish to have urban hens, then they should be able to have them, granted there are rules in place for this type of animal.
- The criteria look reasonable.
- There are some farm animals that are currently not allowed that could be accommodated - pygmy goats, Japanese piglets, weasels etc. At the same time, some order has to be done with respect to farms at the outskirts of the city. I think certain accommodations has to be made for them too
- The size/type of an animal might affect more than just the immediate neighbours, with noise and smell, especially since the houses in most neighbourhoods are so close together.
- Yes, if there is appropriate bylaws stating what, when, where and how the people within city limits are able to have them. Then yes. But the animals well being must be always in consideration.
- Sustainable living is important f
- More goats and pigs please aw
- Allowing people to raise hens provides safe food and local options and it more environmentally friendly.
- I think the idea of urban hens is fantastic. The idea of people being able to have secure food sources is a wonderful thought. If people clean up after them adequately, I don't think they would cause much pests to come to the area.
- Good for people experiencing food scarcity, responsibility for kids
- I think hens are a great pet and addition to our urban areas.
- Hens are great pets, will allow for people to get their own eggs, and ensure a more self sufficient environment. I know people with dirtier children than most chickens.
- As long as the living conditions are good I don't see why people couldn't have those animals.
- The more people can make their own food the less strain on the whole food system.
- Owning hens or livestock in Calgary should be fine if the owners are responsible.
- Seems right to involve those around you in the decision to care for an animal that could be considered a nuisance to some.
- I think it is a good idea to allow livestock and hens. I dont see in what world it would be dangerous.
- As long as the living conditions are suitable, I see no issues with this.
- The number of neighbours to be consulted should correlate with the volume and smell of the animals involved (may impact more than just the adjacent houses). However, once a neighbour has agreed, that support should remain even if a new family moves in.
- But there needs to be vets in the urban area to support these new owners. Due to medication availability changes small chicken owners don't have the ability to get meds to treat problems. Hell you can't even get louse and mite powder anymore. Vets who treat commercial chickens can't treat private flocks. Yay the chicken mafia. And where are they getting their PID number so they can get disinfectant for their coops and vitamins for water that is so needed in this heat.
- Neighbouring houses should be in agreement with allowing the livestock to be held, if not, it should not pass
- I have no problem with this so long as the animals are properly cared for

- One of the biggest problems facing society today is a disconnection from our food. Urban agriculture such as laying hens should not only be allowed, but encouraged. It's a public health risk that we are so disconnected, leading to obesity and other cultural dilemmas.
- Yes yes yes!!!
- Why not?!
- "I would love to have backyard chickens, ducks and/or quail.
- I feel certain species of livestock can be adequately reared withing city likits, provided the owners are responsible.

- However i think it should be required to have a property/backyard of X size before you can obtain chickens or X size for q pet goat or pig. An apartment building is no environment for these animals"
- As long as all the above criteria would be met, I do not see why this is a reason to stop Calgarians in having alterative pets.
- I believe that if someone owns a home either in town or not. If you have a back yard you should be allowed to have a chicken coop, or dogs. Now if you wanted to have livestock you should be checked by the city for yard size depending on animal, and that they have a solid wood fence and have to comply with their neighbihrs that they yard doesn't smell like a livestock farm like once a month with gets reported to the city or something
- As long as it can be a safe home for the animal but noise and smells don't affect the neighbours
- If an animal will be cared for, it would be awesome for neighbours to provide eggs for their community, or goat milk or other animal by-products.
- Why can people not own whatever they would like as long as it is not on the specific not allowed animal list.
- I would love chickens!
- As long as the animals are safe and healthy - i think they can offer many benefits
- As long as the animals are well cared for, i dont see any problem with it.
- No roosters though
- Give people hens
- We have neighbours with hens and they are well kept, healthy, have a great environment, but I could see the importance of limiting numbers and ensuring the well-being of the animals especially with Calgary's unpredictable weather.
- Reviewing on a case by case basis enables the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer to determine whether the exception is warranted or not and will allow them to evaluate the likelihood of owner bylaw compliance. PLEASE NOTE: I do not support urban beekeeping under any circumstances, as bee sting allergies are common and often life-threatening. There is no way to keep bees contained on a property without destroying the entire purpose of keeping bees. Honeybee colonies should not be allowed within city limits at all.
- All animals should be treated with compassion

- I believe that most animals can be pets. As long as it's determined it won't be stressful for the pet to be in a smaller environment (backyard vs acreage) ex. A hen or two would be fine as long as they had the proper space/amenities and people would benefit from having fresh eggs.
- As long as the animals have suitable living conditions and everyone's okay with it, why not?
- Could have positive impact on community and it's members.
- I see no harm in having livestock on private property
- Urban chickens and pot belly pigs would be great!
- anyone should be able to have animals & gardens.
- no harm - only positive outcomes based on those criteria above.
- Urban hens should be allowed but the conditions needed must be regulated
- Urban hens are source of protein (eggs) for food Insecure individuals and acquaint youngsters with animal husbandry and where food comes from.
- As long as the animals have an appropriate environment for living and are not a nuisance to neighbours.
- Provided people license their animals they should be able to keep them within reason. Size/number of animals should be considered relative to property.
- there should be way more allowance for sustenance animals
- n/a
- As long as the animal is controlled and not a nuisance, there should be no problem.
- Keep them quiet, keep them clean
- Calgarians should be allowed to own animals considered livestock if they are able to meet certain standards/conditions to owning them
- We are in a time that has shown that hobbies and interactions with nature helps the physical, mental, and psychosocial part of humans lives. To allow for hens and things of this nature. We would be opening up another opportunity for people to live more fulfilling lives.
- Promotes people learning how to raise farm animals while also getting eggs.
- The criteria listed seem adequate, along with perhaps some restrictions based on area of the city, etc.
- I love chickens
- Yes as long as the person clearly has support from their neighbours
- People should learn to self sustain to some degree. Having the freedom of being able to have something like chickens within the city would be good for that.
- Eggs!
- Standards must be maintained. Similar to expectations we have with any animal.
- "Dogs and cats are no different then chickens and goats. No matter what way you look at it- there will - Always be responsible owners and irresponsible owners. Any bylaw complaints should be dealt with accordingly ."

- I think that this is an excellent way for communities to both come together (in the case of neighbors benefiting from the eggs of another neighbor) and offers an added level of control over what we are consuming.
- I think it is good to source local animals and products. I have no issue with anyone wanting to raise hens as long as the neighbours are on board and as long as they are treated well
- I struggle with this due to the fact that it attracts wild predators to the area, but also support an individual's right to sustain their own food sources.
- In favour of chickens but not necessarily other livestock
- The owners should take proper precautions before setting up the urban animals (such as chickens or goats) with proper housing, shelter and feed/water, ensuring that they have proper medical care for the animals with yearly check up's and ensure that they won't disturb neighbours or the neighbourhood.
- But please, just chickens at this point
- If a person can show suitable conditions for livestock then of course they should be able to own what they like and provide for themselves.
- I support all of these proposed amendments relating to livestock. Specifically the areas relating to the space and cleanliness of the animals living quarters as well as the surrounding neighborhoods support.
- Many communities have been allowing hens in backyards for decades without issue. This pandemic has proven that citizens need more control over their own food security.
- urban chickens are a great way to ensure you are ethically obtaining eggs and meat rather than supporting inhumane conditions at factory farms
- A general set of base guidelines for eligibility should be used to first review the case, like size/weight, the food-production ability of the animal, and a proper waste disposal plan.
- ethical egg consumption
- Having local food sources is great for the environment
- As long as limits on noise, smell, and nuisance are upheld.
- If a person has reasonable space and chooses to raise animals, as long as they aren't a nuisance to neighbours- why not!
- Restrictions to small number of animals per household.
- As long as the live stock are not a nuisance, neighbours should not have a say in which animals are kept on a property
- Urban hens with the correct bylaw support could be a huge asset to communities, so long as cleaning/noise regulations are put in place and enforced.
- "I think there should be restrictions for herd/flock size per yard area within the city. There should be regulations related to waste and there will need to regulations for selling/giving away of product (e.g., tracking who you give eggs to so if there is a salmonella outbreak, the appropriate people can be informed) and fines for violating these regulations. I think people should have to take an online or in person course regarding flock or herd management before being given approval to have a herd/flock, so that a bunch of people who think it is cool to have chickens and have no idea how to care for them don't lead to animal welfare issues.

- In terms of the pigeon question below, I think animal welfare specialists should be consulted and a minimum area per pigeon should be determined. Calgary has a wide range of single-detached home property sizes - for some I would say "
- hens are quiet and lovely animals. With proper pet care they are not as smelly as people think and can serve as a great experience for young families.
- I am a supporter of urban livestock as long as there are bylaws in place to make sure they are being properly cared for
- with the food shortage we almost experienced. If we can be more self-sufficient it is always best
- To discourage consumers supporting battery farmed hens and egg industry
- I think the key is support from the neighbours-noise, and smells from livestock will need to be dealt with on a case-by-case basis.
- As long as there were proper procedures in place to ensure that the owners were taking proper care of the animals and that was checked on regularly.
- I would appreciate being able to keep chickens in rural places for food production.
- I trust that you guys will be able to provide a good outline for what is okay and what isn't and living conditions of the animals (size of the enclosures or whatever).
- The neighbours must agree though. There shouldn't be a blanket acceptance of animals that will cause large amounts of noise or smell without consent from neighbours.
- As long as the livestock is not disrupting the neighbourhood, then it should be fine.
- If the animals are kept in clean and a safe place then I'm all for it.
- Allows for people to raise some of their own food and can help people understand where their food comes from.
- As long as the livestock has benefits to the owner and community I think it's a good idea
- The more self-sufficient we are, the better. As long as people properly maintain their coops, there's no reason they shouldn't be able to keep them.
- Sustainable living. We need to collectively be able to handle our own matters and require big business or big government to make all the decisions for us.
- As long as the hen has suitable living conditions I don't see why they can't be allowed
- I think it is a great idea if people can have urban hens and have fresh eggs from the hens as long as there are proper living conditions
- I think as long as there are no major disturbances there is no reason not to allow urban livestock.
- Livestock such as hens provide food it makes the city more sustainable
- it's great for people and animals
- I see no issue with allowing chickens or other animals as long as they are properly cared for. I think this would help people with self-sustainability along with helping the community.
- I do not see any harm posed by owning urban hens
- Yes if they are held to the same standard as domestic animals there shouldn't be a difference

- I think hens are a great idea
- doesn't phase me
- Livestock should be allowed provided the effects of housing them on neighbors are limited.
- I think this would be an awesome idea to allow people to connect to the earth in a more organic way. Animal husbandry can be very good for people's physical and mental health and be a very fulfilling hobby.
- Chickens can be kept in sanitary conditions and not be a nuisance with proper care. Families should be allowed to take part in providing for themselves and teach children about livestock and food origins
- I feel that if a household could prove to be a safe, humane, comfortable home for the livestock animals that this wouldn't be a problem.
- The main criteria should be support from neighbours and suitable living conditions. Remove officer discretion and community good. Being able to grow your own eggs and meat should be enough to justify it if everyone is happy.
- If properly cared for I think this should be allowed
- I have not heard a good argument from the city against Urban Hens. Yes, what the neighbours smell is a concern but could be managed by limiting numbers. Number of Hens allowed may need to consider property size, as well. Too many in a small
- Why not?
- As long as proper space and care can be provided, I fully support the possibility of allowing urban livestock.
- Great idea to allowed livestock within the city as long as they are appropriately cared for and kept.
- Within reason; i.e. reasonable distance from neighbouring homes.
- As long as there is a requirement for consent from neighbours. But I feel it should be a radius and not just the adjacent neighbours.
- Could assist with lower income areas, etc.
- Someone with enough land and a clean property should be able to own chickens, for example. But only Responsible people. Anyone who owns over one animal should be subjected to evaluations.
- Chickens would be excellent to have to ensure they are free range and well cared for
- we should be able to make better use of our yards and lawns as long as it doesn't disrupt the neighbourhood around us
- I'd love some chickens or at least the Porto have some
- Hens don't cause a lot of noise, give food to the owner, and can be good pets. I see no downside to allowing hens within the city so long as owners take care of them properly.
- If people are raising small livestock for food purposes or comfort is there legal right I think if supported properly it's okay
- As long as owners are being responsible for the noise, smell and well-being of the animals I believe people should have the freedom to own them.

- But only with a minimum lot size. No duplexes, row housing, condos, zero property lines etc. or any high density housing. Single family homes only with a minimum of a 900 sq foot back yard for hens only. No grazing animals like sheep, horses etc.
- Hens would be fine and suitable living. Bigger livestock like cows and horses should not be in the city without the acres needed to support them.
- Seems like a good idea
- There should be a minimum backyard size for hens to free range. Backyard hens should be treated as pets and not livestock.
- Chickens And similar animals cause no harm to anyone as long as they have suitable accommodations.
- I would like to see a requirement for a suitable veterinarian lined up as avian care is more difficult to source. I would also like for humane society to have permission to enter and check on any livestock when a complaint is received re: welfare of animals
- Yay Chickens!
- I support the bylaw so long as neighbours in the area have to agree to the animals being allowed
- If 'other livestock' included such wild animals such as, say, monkeys, large cats such as tigers, or any exotic type of animal, I am not in favour of this at all.
- Increasing self-sufficiency and supporting/eating local is something we can all do to lessen our impact on the environment, so yes, as long as the animals were not suffering or living in squalor, I would support freedom for my neighbours in the city to be able to raise animals.
- If they are cared for properly and safely, there is no reason not to.
- chickens are fine so long as the living space is adequate and cleaned properly to not cause sickness.
- I dont care what circus my neigh its have as long as they can comply with noise/smell/wandering pet bylaws.
- As long as the owner can care for the animals I am fine with this
- I would love to see urban hens allowed. Food management for eggs and compost are needed in our city. I'm not wanting a large flock, but to have 4-6 chickens would be lovely.
- Urban hens have worked in many other places and are a suitable addition.
- i think it's a good idea
- Yes to chickens and maybe goats but the line should be drawn at large mammals like cows or horses, unless they somehow have end land in the city to support that.
- Responsible owners of livestock can benefit the community.
- Stop taking pigs from little kids
- I want chickens
- Good opportunity for people to produce their own food/save money/be independent.
- Great learning opportunities and sustainable resources for the entire community!
- Suitable living conditions and proper disposal needs to be spelled out more clearly.
- I like the idea of more households becoming self sustaining, if possible.

- as long as the animal is taken care of and that they be monitored on an ongoing basis to prevent abuse to the animal.
- I would consider having hens within the city, however there must be strict requirements for veterinary attendance to prevent the spread of disease (i.e., avian influenza) between the domesticated animals and wild birds. Additionally strict control on their impact to natural wildlife due to spread of spores, bacteria or other pathogens via fomites (i.e., feces) would be of great concern for both avian and non-avian populations and raises a significant number of questions around biosecurity that would need to be addressed and investigated further.
- It would be important to me that the caveat is that the neighbours unanimously agree with the individual's request to have animals such as urban hens.
- Only two be allowed and for the eggs to be only for personal consumption and not for sale
- "Urban Hens are great! Lived beside someone who had some when I lived in a different city, and it was no problem.
- I see a problem providing suitable living conditions for some other animals in the city, but as long as the licensing fees cover city inspection of living conditions for the animals, I do not care."
- As long as there is support from neighbours, no animal cruelty, and good care from the owners of the livestock, there is nothing wrong with this.
- Sounds like fun and encourages us to be more conscious of animals
- Specific livestock species must be considered and found reasonable before allowing them to live in the city
- As long as the people around you don't mind, and you take proper care of the animal I don't see any problem in keeping hens or any animal for good reasons.
- Provided there were oversight to ensure animals were being well cared for
- As long as the neighbours are welcome to the hens and the owners provide proper living conditions, there is no issue.
- Having the option for organic/home grown food options and/or pet benefit can be balanced through restrictions on quantity. I would want a permit/license to determine the suitability of these animals as it is important to consider the welfare of the community and the animal.
- There should be a limit of hens and livestock based in the size of the space available.
- Hens are great for the environment, and gardens. There should be a limit of how many you can have per sq ft.
- Chickens are great for the environment and especially poor soils in the city
- Let me have chickens!!!!!!!
- Urban hens are a great way to support the ethical consumption of eggs. I agree with the criteria that hens and other livestock should have suitable living conditions; however, requiring support from adjacent neighbours can create tricky situations and be a barrier to an otherwise positive experience.
- medium to small sized "livestock" should not be classified any differently than a cat or dog.

- I don't see a problem with hens in the city. I know of some who have had them and they haven't caused any problems. Also, I know that pigs can be used as service animals, but it should be on a case by case basis.
- This sounds like a reasonable approach.
- As long as care and living space is sufficient
- Urban farming is becoming a sustainable way for folks to save both money and carbon; allowing it within city limits is a great idea
- I'm fine with this. If someone wants to have farm animals in the city and in their home, let them. Not going to affect my life.
- I think owners should be required to pay a fee for an inspection of housing facilities by the City, similar to a building permit that ensures the animals are housed properly.
- Support from neighbours so you don't annoy them.
- If the person can provide sufficient care and shelter for livestock then it should be allowed.
- a goat or two on a property would allow for a natural means of maintaining the conditions of lawns
- If people can properly and safely take care of livestock without negatively impacting their neighbors, go for it.
- The cost of living and food is constantly increasing. If people want to grow or produce their own food that is absolutely their right. Food is a right, not a privilege. As long as the chickens are treated properly, and it's not a complete nuisance to neighbours, and their enclosures are well cleaned and maintained, there is zero reason why people should be barred from providing food for their family.
- I think that as long as there is support from adjacent neighbours and not excess noise then individuals should be allowed to have urban hens and/or other urban livestock on their property.
- It is important that people are able to raise and choose their own food sources.
- I agree with allowing only laying hens within Calgary as long as the living conditions are suitable and they are not used for their meat.
- Yes, if they aren't a bother to neighbours.
- If people have the proper set up, I don't see the problem in owning and caring for hens. I think it's a good move towards more urban farming
- As long as the neighbours are ok with it and smells are kept to a minimum for the neighbours then it would be acceptable.
- Don't see why not, as long as it doesn't disturb the neighbours and fecal matter can be properly taken care of
- chickens are beneficial to urban gardeners as pest control
- As long as this is done properly it shouldn't affect anyone in a negative way.
- Proper care of the animals and how they live
- Having animals would reduce the household's carbon footprint and improve quality of life. Less dependency on stores.
- Great source for fresh food. Long as they are kept in good health and are well taken care of
- People should be allowed to make use of their property to generate food or goods.

- As the cost of food is going up if a livestock animal can be safely raised on a private residence then there should be no issue.
- Would be nice to allow chickens to be kept in city limits
- I believe that urban domestic agriculture should be allowed, but must be done responsibly, and with respect for neighbouring properties. (Proper husbandry and hygiene).
- The term livestock is limiting. Animals such as hens or pigs can be excellent pets.
- Criteria seems reasonable.
- Hens should not provide noise issues to neighbors. Roosters will. Proper education regarding care and maintenance is necessary, however. That way, odors would not become problematic.
- Would allow for great community feeding programs, educational for kids too, they would love it
- If there is buy in from neighbours, and the animals are well cared for this should be sufficient. If the owner goes beyond the neighborhood, then it can be a bigger issue.
- As we move more towards community gardening and personal gardens, having a few chickens to help maintain and contribute to the ecosystem would be a nice option
- Food sustainability is an important issue and this could alleviate food scarcity for families in need.
- There would have to be strict conditions met to be granted an exemption, such as minimum space requirements, grazing area, etc. Would also be subject to random inspections by bylaw.
- Suitable living conditions are a must when housing livestock, i'd remove the necessity for community improvement though.
- SA long as people are responsible for their animals and are respectful of their neighbors, they should be able to have a few hens on their property.
- As long as there are standards put in place and animals are well cared for
- I think offering sustainable food options on our properties should be encouraged.
- The conditions of approval from neighbour, suitable living conditions, and case by case assessment are good ideas.
- Sustainability is key.
- What's wrong with hens? They help with sustainability. You should ensure that each person who decides to get hens is taking a course to receive some sort of certification - like a fishing or firearms license.
- Hens, when well taken care of offer a great many benefits. With good animal husbandry practices, they are not a nuisance animal.
- Alternative animals are an eco conscious option.
- I dont see a issue with having other live stock on people's own property
- As long as it's a suitable living condition
- People should be allowed to have other types of animals on their property. Adjacent neighbours should only have so much impact on what an individual does or has in their yard.
- Hens and goats would be great!
- I support urban livestock provided their living conditions are appropriate.
- If the animal can have good quality of life I support it.

- This is a simple yes or no question. But please, let us have hens.
- If the hens are well cared for, then there shouldn't be an issue with people raising them.
- People care take for their animals in all different ways. Case by case would be the best case
- As long as there is responsible owners - this can be allowed. Sufficient cleanup as well should be part of this phase 1 engagement
- While allowing community members to own and keep certain livestock on their private property could prove beneficial for some people and the overall treatment of the animal, certain considerations should be taken to ensure that the keeping of these animals does not create a nuisance for the overall quality of life in the community. Steps should be taken to ensure the animals have adequate space and not subjected to unnecessary stress from urban living.
- Hens are amazing
- If one of my neighbors wants to have hens and they can provide a safe enclosure for them, who am I to stop them
- This is very important for food security (eggs) and sustainability. It needs to be permitted and regulated or people will just start doing anyway. They are good for bugs too.
- Hens are technically not a dirty animal and as long as the owners keep on top of their living conditions, I would be in favor of this.
- I want chickens.
- As long as all fencing is secure from other animals/predators ex. Coyotes. Limit the # of livestock per household. Odour/feces management
- as long as animal manure does not contaminate the water or surrounding properties. Noise from animals would also have to be kept to a minimum.
- I support this initiate as it helps to add biodiversity to the urban centre
- I think that it can be expanded, but must be done so carefully with conditions depending on what kind of animals are allowed.
- There are lots of animals that can be kept as pets which currently are not allowed due to the current restrictions. As an example, miniature pot-bellied pigs can make a great pet but are currently restricted under Calgary by-laws. An animal of this nature would cause less of an impact and would be less of a nuisance than chickens and therefore I feel as though all animals would need to be considered without the bias if chickens are now allowed. The other consideration is the impact chickens would have on natural Calgary wildlife like bobcats and coyotes. Chicken coops would attract these animals and could lead to a higher number of incidents in populated communities.
- As long as all areas are looked at. The owners maintain suitable quarters and keep clean so that neighbors are not disturbed.
- Hens could be a reasonable addition to pet life in Calgary, under controlled conditions.
- I would like to have three backyard ducks for their eggs. They are charming creatures and I love the sound of their laughter. Any animal should be licensed though, and the license fee should not be high nor be waived for low-income. Having an animal is expensive - if a license fee is a barrier, the animal will not get proper vet care during its life.

- If the property has a big backyard and is suited for a chicken coop then allow it; as long as they maintain it.
- My only concern is animal welfare for the hens. Are there suitable living conditions in the city for hens?
- I like the idea of urban livestock improving access to locally produced food. I would like the City to take it slow though to ensure that any failed types of livestock can be appropriately rehomed.
- what additional criteria is required, such as size of private property lot, number of animals allowed, noise control
- Urban hens and other livestock are great for sustainability. Plus people should be involved in food processes, education is key. Further, they just make great pets and why should the city stand in the way of a responsible pet owner who can provide the conditions needed for an enriched life for chickens and other livestock!
- K
- options for food production on a small family basis
- Would be nice to be able to have your own livestock IN city as long as appropriate land is provided.
- There are animals that should be aloud ie chickens and pot bellied pigs even goats should be considered for lawn care on larger properties
- I want eggs and a pet chicken.
- I support a balanced approach to allow hens while ensuring large disturbances are not caused
- Would love to be able to have chickens within the city, this is a great amendment. We need to support urban farming to create a more sustainable food system. COVID just reinforced how much risk there is with our dependancy on large-scale farm systems and imported food.
- Chickens are not overly aggressive animals, and they provide a service to the humans that own them. As long as coops are kept clean and warm I am in favor
- As long as the animals needs can be met and there is support from neighbors I to k this is a great idea.
- I believe backyard chickens and other small livestock should be allowed within reason and as long as living conditions are acceptable.
- I wish to own hens on my property so I can have my own eggs. I believe these, and other livestock if cared for Properly, are acceptable within the city.
- I think done correctly it could be beneficial to our city
- I agree with urban hens if they have suitable living conditions and neighbours are agreeable. I'm not sure what other kind of 'livestock' could live happily in an urban setting.
- If exceptions would be evaluated on a case by case basis.. For chickens.. Why would you not do the same for dogs? Just going to lump all dogs that look alike into one group and label them dangerous? When chickens are loud and smelly and carry diseases. Smarten up.
- Depending on the noise (and possible smell?), they may not be any worse than the dogs that are already in the neighbourhoods.
- Provided neighbours are on board
- Small livestock is feasible and beneficial!

- I think no more than 3-4 at most
- This is an excellent idea. As long as people take care of the animals and keep the property safe, this is an enriching hobby that would likely reduce stress and help the mental health of citizens.
- Animals are sentient beings. What one considers livestock could be deemed a family pet.
- Hens are wonderful alternatives for birdkeeping that are domesticated and are much better than parrots. They also are wonderful for helping maintain an engaged and healthy yard.
- This allows for a fair resolution
- Strong YES!!!! Food sustainability and training / education for children makes this a most critical change that would bring Calgary in line with other jurisdictions.
- More and more urban micro culture and personal food security are things we will need to consider as ways to deal with environmental, community, and economic factors changing in the future. This is a good first step.
- More ethical eggs for everyone!
- I like chickens
- Sustainable and make good pets
- Only if approved by neighbours and bylaw. Don't want a free-for-all.
- I love all animals living in the city as long as they're not bothersome in anyway.
- Every case is different but there should always be proper suitable living conditions
- Since everyone is started to urban garden and other neighbouring communities are slowing chickens for the purpose of eggs and meat, due to covid, I beleive this has merit.
- As long as all parties involved are cared for, there should be no reason to ban ownership of hens on your land.
- As long as the animals are living in good conditions and are being treated well.
- i dont see why its a problem , if people are being appropriate there should be nothing wrong with having livestock in city
- As long as the neighbours are okay with it (some animals are noisier than others). I don't see an issue, they can provide eggs, milk, ect.
- Great idea! Make sure there's a limit - 2 or 3?
- If they own the property and are able to provide proper life habitats and have the room, they should be able to provide themselves the animals of choice to feed their families as they choose on their property only
- livestock can be extremely beneficial in the city when properly handled
- people should be allowed to own livestock as long as they follow guidelines
- I think urban hens would be a nice idea, provided slaughtering them was illegal
- Rules and regulations are being met, and the safety of the animal is being acquired.
- I want to support my family with eggs
- As long as the livestock are in appropriately sized and properly maintained, clean enclosures, I personally don't really care what other people keep.
- Should confirm that the pets won't escape the backyard.

- I support urban chickens
- Chickens should be allowed
- A pet is a pet. As long as adhere to laws and take care of animal who are we to judge what someone wants as pet
- As long as the animals can have a safe and comfortable living situation and it's not affecting everyone around them. (with smell of poop etc.)
- I think this is an important ownership opportunity for people who could do it responsibly.
- As long as the animals are taken care of and noise/smell doesn't become an issue, have at it.
- Yes, but if the livestock becomes a nuisance the neighbors should have the legal right to appeal the livestock on property.
- Most major cities are now allowing people to have small farm animals
- As long as they make sure it's alright with everyone I see no problem. Lots of people are growing/producing their own food. Let them.
- I think having animals/live stock in city limits is a great way to enrich the community.
- I think this is a great idea. but neighbors should also have to agree.
- In some parts of Calgary, goats are used to get rid of vegetation already. If the neighbours are ok with it, why not have hens and/or goats, if you are properly taking care of them and they are not wandering around.
- Pot bellied pigs are excellent city pets- less of a nuisance than dogs and cats (which I own. I don't want a pig but prohibiting them makes no sense)
- I have wanted urban chickens for many years. I think as a responsible pet owner, having a food sourced pet would be great. I know of places that limit how many birds, to 2 or 3 and they have to be licensed like you would a cat or dog and you must register to own urban chickens. I think for those who know how to be responsible for animals, this would be a suitable option.
- N
- I think as long as the animals are cared for correctly there should be no issues!
- As long as they are small livestock animals yes. Sheep, goats etc.
- If kept responsibly, these animals are a huge benefit. Rules do need to be in place to ensure balance.
- Must have home owner approval and suitable space property and not be a nuisance to neighbors
- YES!!!
- Community benefit, positive impact, and support from adjacent neighbors is key here. Also type of livestock - I would support something like a goat or sheep but not a herd of cattle for example.
- As long as you take care of the animal, it's fine.
- I would like more people to be able to have hens in Calgary.
- Quiet, non nuisance or smelly animals shouldn't be an issue
- "I was thinking chickens for eggs not pigeons. A mandatory education class to be taken on care of chickens and how to spot disease must be taken before issuing a permit to have chickens.

- In an urban yard 1-5 chickens would be taking into consideration the space 1 bird would need vs how much space you have."
- Depending on what animal and how responsible the owners I would. Its all on people though, just like cats/dogs you can be a great responsible owner/neighbor or you can be terrible. I'm ok with it on a case by case as long as they are held to a certain standard
- I could see some people wanting to get their own eggs, instead of store bought, or other things with livestock.
- The more people can grow their own food and be self sustainable the better.
- If it is not bothering the Neighbor's, then it wouldn't be a problem. We should be able to have livestock if cared for properly.
- I do not mind chicken at all.
- Adjacent neighbour support should be like Development Permits -- notice put out and ability to respond instead of requiring actual approval. Approval can't be withdrawn (assuming all other conditions are being met) once animals in place or we have a dumping problem.
- Hens should be allowed in calgary. I want eggs.
- Approval of other livestock would be supported
- If the animals are being taken care of properly I do not see why they can not have them.
- I think everyone should be allowed to raise food to feed their families. Hens if properly cared for are not even a nuisance.
- I would like to see more goats mowing lawns.
- When done properly, it is likely a benefit. That said chickens smell atrocious. I'd hope that your involvement would weed out the bad people.
- Providing neighbours agree and they do not become a nuisance
- No issue
- I have lived next door to hens and never been disturbed by them
- This is a fantastic idea, as long as the animals are kept in safe and humane conditions!
- I believe people should be free to do as they please as long as it doesn't affect anyone else.
- There are conventional pets that are more disruptive than people raising simple livestock ie barking dogs
- As long as the regulations are clear and enforceable
- I like hens
- Need strict rules if animals become a mucin even including smells the animal should be easy to remove, also rules for where the livestock is allowed off premis and rules for picking up after them
- I believe that community livestock if managed appropriately would be a valuable asset to community engagement, cultural roots and the overall well-being of calgarians
- Hens and no roosters!
- It will be good for the animals
- as long as it is kept clean and healthy for people and animals.

- I am very interested in using goats and sheep as a means to cut down in lawn mowing in certain areas.
- Free country.
- With education foremost on proper husbandry, and clear and concise laws easily understandable to the public
- I think case by case must be looked at because it would work in some locations but not others
- Yes
- So long as neighbours are still able to peacefully enjoy their own premises, I believe allowing urban hens would benefit many people greatly. It would reduce the need for hens in factory farms, which have a significant environmental impact.
- So long as it is a safe environment for animals and owners/surrounding people
- they should be kept on private property but I don't see any harm in owning urban hens or other livestock
- Let people own chickens
- As long as the animals were cared for appropriately and not a nuisance to neighbors (ex, by infringing on their property etc).
- I think people having their own live stock can help families with lower income and help calgarians be more "green"
- Absolutely! With our economic downturn having access to eggs provided by loving family animals is an awesome way to ensure families can eat. The cost of keeping hens is significantly less than owning a dog. A 50lb bag of feed is $14. A 50lb bag of typical dog food is $50 and up.
- Chickens are not a nuisance to anyone
- Hens are a sustainable alternative to factory farming for eggs! I'm all for this as long as the neighbours approve and hens are treated properly.
- So long as the animals are properly taken care of, I do not see a problem as to why they would not be allowed.
- As long as the animal is not a nuisance and can receive proper breed specific care above just food and water then I am open to different animals being owned in a humane and responsible way.
- There does need to be consideration for limiting numbers
- Involving other livestock In the bylaw would be beneficial to our community as long as the criteria is met and brings no harm to neighbors
- The people have the right to provide sustainable food for themselves
- I agree
- Hens are not quiet animals and having the support of the neighbors helps keep everyone happy.
- As long as the livestock is not a nuisance.
- I think it's very good to make sure all the animals have a proper home and living conditions. Why does that need to be explained LOL
- Eggs good

- I think keeping animals such as hens can have a huge positive impact on the community. It teaches people the importance of livestock and where we get some of our important ingredients from.
- if these questions are answered: Will there option to reevaluate or reassess if the conditions are not being met or if there are issues. How are changes in adjacent neighbours going to be managed? Will some areas/types of dwellings be deemed unsuitable ie. townhouse or very small/close proximity backyards?
- Chickens and other birds in small numbers are not a problem and give some self-sufficiency.
- I believe small farm animals should be allowed on private property.
- I don't see a problem with it
- So you want to ban pitbulls, yet let people have hens? Makes no sense? Lol
- I think having livestock could benefit the community as long as yards and homes support it.
- As long as quality of life for the animals is actually being observed and enforced by the city ppl should be allowed if the space they have or have provided for the care of the animals is at a level of quality of life for them is acceptable
- Given that owners of livestock will be responsible, these bylaws make sense
- Like hens, I think other livestock can be harmoniously introduced into the urban environment. The criteria seem very reasonable and the benefit to communities through increased interaction with livestock is large.
- Small livestock animals don't cause disturbances if cared for properly. No more than a dog or cat. If neighbours are OK with it, I see no problems.
- If neighbours agree and the animals have the correct housing/enrichment then people should be able to have livestock
- Hens are relatively quiet and friendly, I have no problems with them.
- As long as they are being cared for and housed appropriately in something they cannot get out of, I fully support having livestock in the city as they provide food and as a result there is the potential for people to make money from that.
- When I lived in BC my landlady had chickens, built a sustainable coop and the sounds were minimal.
- If there's enough space for the animal to live happily and healthily then I don't see a problem as long as the appropriate enclosures are in place to avoid the animal escaping.
- They're just chickens!
- If it is safe for the animals and the humans in the surrounding areas, then I don't see an issue with it.
- People should be allowed to have chickens on their own property providing they dont bother the neighbors with noise, smell etc
- Livestock, bees, etc are great for the community spirit, flora diversity, soil health, and they encourage people to garden and do small farming activities. It is healthy and educational.
- if you have the space and resources to raise livestock on your property, then i dont see the harm in it, as long as it is not a noise, health or safety risk.
- As long as hens are cared for correctly this would benefit the community, no roosters
- There would have to be restrictions (ie type/size etc) and support from ALL adjacent neighbors

- with a permit anyone should be able to have livestock if criteria is met
- As long as it can be done in a safe and clean manner I see no issue with this. I do not think I would support large livestock except for in more rural areas of the city
- Very fair
- As long as general decency and other calgary bylaws are followed
- Within reason. I do not support letting cows or larger animals being allowed in residential. Neighbours must be involved in the approval process just like they have to be contacted when building an in law suite on top of your garage
- Turk
- Yes, but I do believe there should be limits on the number of animals (or beehives) on a property.
- Hens are great for keeping pests down and they support a healthy and local economy.
- If they are taken care of properly and not being a nuisance why not.
- Livestock has a positive impact on a community
- If the owner meets requirements for safe keeping of the animal and then neighbours don't mind, then it should not be an issue.
- I support allowing goats, pot-bellied pigs, ducks, turkeys and chickens in the city if they are kept as pets and not raised for consumption, and if minimum space requirements are established
- As long as there is accountability for the owners to ensure the animals safety and well-being and they are able to provide for them.
- Ppl who have hens can have fresh eggs and the chicken can be used as food
- I don't see the harm in this as long as the person isn't breeding animals for commercial purposes
- I fully support hens and other small livestock for personal pets/use. (example: eggs)
- Must have a minimum yard space and enclosure size per hen. Example 100sq/feet per hen
- Chickens are a useful animal when it comes to supper.
- If people want to raise chickens in their yard for their own food so be it
- Some livestock could benefit a small community. Preferably not raised to slaughter
- Chickens are great
- Sustainable local food production is positive when done well
- As long as there is no issue with neighbours, residents should be allowed to own and raise small livestock like hens - not, for example, a cow or horse
- I agree with the amendment. I think communities will need clear guidelines and rules for something like this to work and be beneficial
- I feel like neighbours should have a say as well.
- We should be allowed to have chickens. Calgary has been ridiculously behind the times on allowing in yard coops.
- As long as all the criteria are followed I see no issue with livestock within city limits.
- My aunt lives in another city, with hens and she loves them
- Everybody should have the option to raise there own food if they so wish.
- I would like to see more Calgarians taking initiative to put in hard work and effort to care for animals.

- As long as they are well taken care of and have enough room to roam and be comfortable yes !
- As long as they have the proper care
- Fair treatment of animals as well as respect for neighbours is important.
- Having urban hens is good for the environment; less carbon footprint and its healthy source of natural protein (eggs and meat).
- I've lived in countrys where chickens and goats are part of the community. I hit used to it and I like the idea.
- I think that so long as the approval of neighbours is given (eg. to prevent disturbances, etc) urban hens are a great idea for access to fresh eggs.
- Community benefit should not have an impact. Hens are quiet and pleasant animals and should absolutely be allowed.
- Having chickens is awesome
- If it doesn't have a negative impact on the community then people should be allowed to own livestock.
- Some small amounts of chickens would be okay. Big animals no and owners must keep premises clean or they get fined or lose their right.
- I think that Urban livestock is a great use of space, but can be unfair if the neighbours are unaware of a homeowner wanting to bring it on to their property.
- Animal safety and welfare is of the utmost importance
- As long as someone is treating the hens properly and they are being cared for, I don't see why they can't be in the city
- I believe if someone can take care of a pet. And they truly want one. They should be able to get it and provide a happy life for a pet they love.
- As long as the animal can be well taken care of and has enough space and resources to live a healthy and happy life!
- I'm not sure what other animals are being considered, but urban hens are worth a try. (I've always wanted an alpaca, are they on the list?!!)
- As long as theirs measures in place to ensure the animals are kept safe and have suitable living conditions during winter months.
- we shouldn't need some law to allow us to feed ourselves however pest control may be an issue worth addressing at a bi-law level
- I think having hens is not a big deal. They provide food for a family
- Conceptually, I support this. The problem is that there is always someone who is irresponsible, makes life miserable for their neighbours, and ruins the opportunity for responsible individuals to have urban hens or other appropriate livestock in the city.
- Yes only if people couldn't get around the system. Example: having a large animal restricted inside or in too small of a pen, not cleaning it frequently, etc. I think anyone who is approved for this should also have a 3 month review EVERY 3 months or so to make sure they are still taking care of the animal and that the animal is in a healthy happy condition. Because people tend to get bored of taking care of there animals....

- As long as the care requirements are being met, I believe that urban hens should be acceptable.
- As long as it isn't a problem for others in the area and the animals needs are met I don't see a problem.
- Food is food
- I think that urban hens would be a great addition to any neighbourhood!
- na
- As long as it's looked at as unique cases, that it involves neighbors opinions and acceptable living conditions are provided, I see no reason to restrict some animals considered "livestock."
- If people want to live in the city and become self sustainable. Then they should be able to, however I feel as there should be designated areas in the city for those who don't want to be woken up by chickens.
- Sounds great as described! Hens in particular would be great.
- If neighbors support the application.
- I think we should be allowed to have liver stock such as Hens as long as they are looked after and provided for properly.
- Living in victoria many people had hens and I think it added to the community spirit.
- It ensures that people are not abusing this bylaw
- If the owner is qualified to take care of the livestock appropriately-maintaining it's quality of life in city limits and is respectful of those around them I see no issue. However it could be a one strike policy-break one rule and warning next time policy is broken then the animal cannot stay in those conditions.
- As long as the animals can have an appropriate home and care then I don't see this as a problem.
- As long as the above apply.
- As long as adequate living conditions are maintained for the animals, there's no issue with allowing hens within the city.
- As long as they are well kept, chickens are wonderful
- Hey if people can farm responsibly and can't self sustain themselves then go for it. Just don't be a jerk.
- I think people should be allowed to have a reasonable amount of animals as long as it doesn't disturb the neighbours
- Hens are an easy way for a community to supply themselves eggs and become more self sufficient
- I do support this, however, the owners of such animals need to maintain cleanliness, noise factors that do not disturb the neighbours
- Support from adjacent neighbors is very important.
- I love fresh eggs and as long as the neighbours don't mind, it should be okay
- Certain livestock could have a very positive impact, if done right.
- As long as they are taken care of properly this would not be a problem
- You should definitely be allowed hens.
- Good

- Neighbour complaints should be taken into account for any application. Proper cleaning and maintenance is a requirement for keeping hens. No one should be allowed to raise pigeons, they cause far too much damage to neighbouring properties. We have had visiting pigeons during the fall-spring feeding from our bird feeders and all they do is shit all over the place.
- This helps support sustainable living
- But only if they were closely monitored and approved, we have enough poorly treated and neglected animals around let's not add to that. Please.
- People should be able to have livestock for the purpose of food production. Creates self reliance and potential for a community or group to rely on each other for food.
- Livestock should have suitable living conditions and should not be a nuisance to neighbors
- I support the proper husbandry of a small number of Hens but not other animals. Most livestock require significantly more space for their welfare than any single yard within the city limits can provide.
- I would support if Permit needed to be pulled for livestock, to approve proper Accommodations, also permit needs renewed every 5years and to be post where public can see what is allowed for that residence
- Only if neighbours opinion is heavily weighted in the decision (e.g. the applicant must address neighbours concerns or application is denied). Often approval gets given for things with complete disregard for neighbours' concerns.
- Support from adjacent neighbours is most important.
- I see no harm in allowing hens or other livestock where there is space and care for them available.
- "No
- Roosters Urban hens rock!"
- But there needs to be a way to ensure welfare standards are being met for the type of animal. and I would say no large animals, like a cow or horse or large pig
- The fact that urban chickens are illegal is embarrassing and reminds me of the illegality of rain water. You are literally forcing people to waste money
- Makes sense.
- So long as owners are responsible and respectful of their neighbours, I do not feel that livestock, particularly urban hens, within city limits would be an issue.
- We must stop trying to take things away from one another, but support each other. Laying hens can teach children lots on the circle of life and where things come from and how to love and care for things.
- Individuals must pass a test of some sort showing they know how to care for the animal, have the proper means to care for the animals, track how many animals the owners have and reviews on the facilities to check they stay in order
- as long as rules and regulations are followed i don't see why not
- every situation is unique and needs to be taken care of with facts in mind.
- The city can reasonably allow livestock such as hens, ect
- chickens are cool, my grandpa had pigeons so

- I want eggs!!!
- .
- You should be allowed any pet you desire as long as you can provide and take care of the animals.
- I think some urban livestock (that can live comfortably in smaller quarters) are a great idea
- I believe people should be allowed to have animals that they wish to have (with the exception of exotics)
- Goats have a profound impact on weed control.
- I want to be able to keep hens in my backyard
- People want a cheaper alternative to what is out there in grocery stores, and with COVID - people not wanting to be in stores
- I think it is great to support people having animals. I think its beneficial and many people already have them so it might as well be allowed so long as it's not too loud or smelly. However, I think there should be rules to support proper training for someone to have these animals such as how to ethically put down the animal, how to ethically collect eggs or other by products, and how to ethically house them.
- If monitoring and neighbours are okay it's okay. Noise and odour are my 2 concernc
- Why not? Lots of livestock are capable of living in urban environments providing their needs are being met for food, space, and cleanliness.
- I feel this would be dependent on the type of livestock
- I want chickens
- More criteria to better evaluate feasibility is great
- Allow chickens!
- As long as the owners are responsible and keep the animal area clean, I have no issues.
- if the livestock was for person use and didn't turn into a farming production for profit
- As long as they don't become a nuisance, why not.
- I have no issue with farm animals as long as they abide by noise and smell bylaws
- Potbellied pigs should be allowed
- We need to have more sustainable, local resources in Calgary.
- Farm animals can be kept safely inside city limits.
- Livestock in the city should be regulated to ensure proper care and housing for the animals.
- Small scale urban farming, assuming it's a healthy situation for the animals and people around them, could be a great way to produce food and cut down on reliance on factory farming
- Sustainable living and natural personal food source. Healthier then store bought too. Could help feeding low income families
- Love this idea
- But only if the animals won't I truly the neighbours with noise or smell
- As long as there are stringent guidelines that are heavily enforced
- People should be allowed to have chickens and pigs up to a certain amount
- As long as they are well kept and cared for I have no issue

- Depending on the definition of "livestock"- is someone going to be keeping pigs in their yard? Cows? Sheep? There would have to be a way to deal with the animal waste, and it would have to be extensively monitored- I wouldn't want any runoff getting into my yard, or into the river system, when it rains.
- Consideration order community first, health and wellbeing of the livestock second and lastly the owner.
- Pigs and chickens are able to live comfortable in homes as long as their needs are met.
- Urban livestock can have a positive impact on persons.
- The addition of other small livestock animals could enrich communities by providing educational opportunities and reducing food costs for some.
- as long as the living conditions of the hens is sanitary, and they have the right amount of room to roam
- As long as people treat their animals right. I don't see a problem with having unusual animals in the city
- Seems reasonable
- If you are following all the rules I encourage hens at homes
- Size of the property and proximity to neighbors should be taken into consideration
- I see no reason why chickens or other small livestock can't be in the city if the premises are clean and sufficient for the livestock.
- Fresh eggs would be amazing. As long as the owner is responsible and clean.
- A fantastic way to shorten local supply chains for eggs, repurpose kitchen scraps as food, and ensure humane treatment
- It will help Calgarians provide for their families themselves
- Sure, why not; people should be allowed to choose what they own as long as they are responsible and do not infringe on others.
- As long as it is achieved humanely, and the animal does not cause a nuisance. People should have the option to provide for themselves
- I think it would be great to have urban farming again!
- Self sufficiency and sustainability are important for urban dwellers too! And hens (and other livestock) can be raised without causing issues for neighbours if done responsibly.
- No roosters should be aloud as the crowing at all hours of the day would be super annoying.
- I love the idea of urban chickens and find it ridiculous that they are not allowed.
- Stringent measures must be taken to limit the amount of livestock allowed in urban areas. Livestock animal dwellings are loud, smell bad, and have lots of bio-waste. Efforts should be taken to limit these activities to community co-ops or non-profits as opposed to commercial operations
- As long as there are regulations for care of the hens and noise regulations.
- Airdrie has done it and the program has gone well
- Ruralization if our urban cities can increase efficiency, decrease carbon emissions via less need for large shipments every week to grocery stores.

- I think support from adjacent neighbours would be the most critical point in approving livestock.
- I think the criteria is fair - support from adjacent neighbors is reasonable.
- Hens give us eggs, move forward to a self-sustaining household
- Hens provide eggs, it's better getting fresh eggs than from the store.
- Chickens should be included as livestock and if people want to raise their own for eggs or meat, they should be able to as long as certain requirements are met (appropriate husbandry and veterinary care etc.)
- I like eggs
- The right to have livestock for personal use should always be upheld.
- As long as the person has enough room and experience with livestock it should be fine
- Let people have some freedom.
- I support livestock being kept in backyards as long as they are not a nuisance and they are maintained. This means the pens etc are kept clean and there is no overwhelming smell.
- As long as people are following rules with hens
- Yes we should have the right to have our own hens within reason and without the destruction or disturbances to neighbors or their properties
- Allowing the public to have access and take care of a wider variety of animals is a great thing. But the rules would need to be followed in order to allow the animal to have a healthy lifestyle and no one is able to be hurt.
- I have seen urban hens work wonderfully in other cities. It is part of growing your own food.
- As long as owners can accommodate and be responsible, they should have the choice
- I can't see how this would affect me in anyway so why would I be against it.
- All about responsible owners.
- Should be able to supply your own household with fresh eggs and other small livestock the same as if you were on a farm
- Hens are a good and cheap source of meat and eggs
- As long as the area is kept clean and is respectful, it should be fine. No roosters in town though.
- Animals such as small goats and chickens can provide emotional support for people and I would support those. I do NOT support the owning of bees in anything but a rural area as bees can disturb and cause harm to others that are allergic to stings..some having anaphylactic reactions. It is NOT acceptable to potentially cause harm or death to others including allergic children with the owning of bees.
- As long as conditions are safe, clean, and not harmful to neighbours it should not be an issue!
- Family is family, human, cat, dog, hen, goat.. who cares if it's being cared for properly?
- If they meet a certain criteria put in place so the animal is happy, yes
- I'm all for responsible, sustainable urban livestock.
- People should be allowed to own whatever they want as pets, within reason. Exotic cats and endangered species, or Exotic reptiles should have some sort of licensing.

- It would help naturally control nuisance bugs and rodents in gardens and allow for healthier lifestyles for many Calgarians
- I've wanted fresh eggs forever. Would seriously look into having them if it was an option. Cleanliness would have to be heavily enforced
- Urban agriculture is a good way to educate consumers about where their food comes from, as well as encourages more involvement and engagement in the agriculture industry.
- Sustainable living for people who are trying to have a smaller impact on the planet.
- I believe that measured urban livestock keeping is valuable. It assists economically, and teaches us urban dwellers about our food and caring for animals other than domestic pets. Knowledge is valuable and, most especially, teaching children the value of keeping animals and how our food supply chain functions.
- why not
- I grew up in the country. Having animals is fun for kids, good for humans. I think the animals should provide a purpose. like eggs, honey or something. Pigeons as an example - provide no value in the sense of sustainable food sources and just make noises and carry disease. We have phones now. People want a pigeon, keep it indoors.
- I believe there wouldnt be much issues to this.
- If they are being taken care of and are not causing any sort of problem I don't see the issue.
- I like cows.
- I support ethical and humane options for the care of livestock
- I want a chicken
- Under the circumstances that livestock is given an appropriate environment suitable to its needs, passing a bylaw that allows livestock within the city would be beneficial to some people
- With increasing societal changes/global warming/global instability, allowing people to raise chickens (for eggs and food) on their own property or other animals (I STRONGLY support allowing people to keep pigs as support animals) makes increasing sense. If their animals are treated humanly, and secured on their property, I have no issue with this.
- Within reason and adequate limits in city
- I hesitate to include the portion: Offers community benefit/ will have positive impact and Support from adjacent neighbors, as if its your property, the community doesn't need to be engaged with it. It's silly to think the quality of life of a neighbor would be severely affected and limited if their neighbors had chickens.
- As long as there's no horrible smells for neighbours and animals are healthy and have a safe environment
- As long as the livestock is well cared for.
- I want chickens
- Under case by case basis people should be allowed to have support animals provided they don't cause a disturbance to the community
- It's a long time coming
- Some people like other times of animals.

- Strongly in favour of needing neighbours approval for keeping livestock.
- I think it's great
- People feed pigeons and have them around their houses all the time so whats the difference if its a chicken
- The case by case evaluation will allow the ciy to determine if individuals and the property are suitable.
- My main concern is the care of the animals and their living conditions. Suitable doesn't mean optimal. Allowing the decision to be at the discretion of one individual is not wise - having a list of very specific requirements to say yes or no to would be better.
- Livestock have the capability to become an individuals companion. It isnt just dogs or cat. All animals should be welcome as long as they are being taken care of and not being neglected then there shouldnt be a problem.
- Based on location, property size, community and owner experience. Smell and sound need to be controlled and effecting managed.
- Emphasis should be placed on noise and waste disposal (including odours that can easily waft across properties)
- Fresh food, fertilizer
- Yes given that the noise and smell of livestock including hens is controlled in some way
- I see no harm provided the needs can be met without disturbing your neighbours, in owning a few hens and or other live stock depending on yard size distance between your neighbours etc
- But it should not depend on the support from adjacent neighbours. My house, my property, I should be able to do as I please as long as the other conditions are met.
- Urban hens and livestock should have been permitted long ago, provided they are safe
- With strict enforcement of the above criteria, do we have the funds to support enforcement?
- I've always wanted one! I wasn't aware they were not allowed but I don't see the harm in allowing people to house them with the proper care.
- I love my pot belly pig and she provides so much comfort amd love she is really better than a support dog.
- hens are fine, we already allow pigeons to be kept as well as Common Grackles so why not hens?
- adjacent neighbours must include all houses within ear shot of the livestock house because livestock are very loud and often can't be silenced.
- As long as the animals are kept safely and humanly there really should not be problem with any livestock kept on private property
- Licensing to have costs of enforcement of people letting their roosters crow, or animals getting loose.
- Neighbours are consulted.
- Only if the conditions are favourable for the hens and the enclosure is kept clean.
- I'm fine with bi laws looking out for the animals and there well being so they don't end up in poor living conditions and neglect

- Some residences would benefit from backyard chickens, pet pigs are desirable to some people. However I believe approval from neighbours would be essential. For example, someone who is allergic to bee stings should be able to oppose a neighbour's potential backyard hive.
- As long as the guidelines outlined above are followed I am in favour. When adjacent property owners are affected, their rights have to be taken into consideration.
- I want to be able to provide fresh eggs to my family
- If it's suitable for the animal and is not a hinderance to neighbours, there should be no reason why they can't be in the city.
- Small farm animals should be allowed
- They can't be worse than dogs in terms of noise and mess. They can provide emotional support to vulnerable persons, and provide food.
- I believe that as long as it is done in a safe and sustainable manner and those in the immediate area are in support of it Calgarians should have the option to have small livestock on their property.
- Yes on the condition there is involved community engagement to gain support from neighbours.
- I think if managed properly, this would be a cool project.
- Due to the growing want and need for natural and organic foods and products, I could see that allowing livestock in urban areas would make people happier and feel healthier.
- I think this is okay as long as the hens are being treated in a humane manner and are in suitable living conditions.
- Why not
- So long as the conditions are favourable for the hens, and the living conditions kept clean and humane.
- As long as the community is on board this is a great initiative. I'd be happy to have one of my neighbors have chickens and a close resource for fresh eggs.
- No issue with hens
- I don't see chickens as a big threat as long as they are looked after properly. I think Dog owners should face the same process
- Seems fair.
- It's rare a home can provide needs for livestock but if there's a process and regulations I am ok with it
- Only if they are RESPONSIBLE!!! Some people slack at the care of their animals and animals hose people should not be allowed to even have animals!!!
- Family is from England and it's natural to have your own chickens for eggs. Shocked that it is not allowed here.
- Every animal deserves the right to live a happy and healthy life. Education towards keeping livestock animal should be done to ensure that the future owers of these animals understand what it would take to upkeep the animals properly they
- If the animals can be raised in a healthy & happy environment, without disrupting the community, there is no reason people shouldn't be able to have them.
- Support local, community based resources

- Smaller livestock such as pot bellied pigs end up in shelters all the time and could find loving homes within the city if the bylaw was amended to allow them.
- Hens would be a great addition to food sustainability, I also supports points made above.
- I have no problem if people want to have a couple of chickens in their backyard so that they can get their produce fresh as long as the animals are being taken care of properly and have adequate room to roam. I do believe though that people should not be able to keep animals on the property if they are just going to slaughter them. I would not want to see that as a neighbour.
- Within a reasonable amount of chickens
- I think we should be aloud to own certain live stock in calgary as a means to help those who can't afford a farm but would like a chicken for eggs or a lamb to help eat grass and make wool.
- As long as it doesn't interfere with neighbors quality of life, I think it's a good idea
- I have no issue with hens as long as certain rules and standards are met
- As long as they are being treaged right.
- Hens should be allowed as long as they are properly cared for.
- Seems fair
- Everything would have to be strictly regulated, and make sure that people aren't keeping animals inhumanely and not providing for livestock in a city environment properly.
- I don't understand there's a bylaw against it to really have an opinion
- If livestock has the adequate space required and isnt bothering anyone it should be allowed. Other major canadian cities allow this, and towns, Calgary is behind. Look at verson! Lots of goats and chickens, and happy people.
- I'm not against it.
- It's a chicken. What harm can a chicken do? None.
- N/a
- However I also believe that most people have absolutely no idea what is needed for care of said livestock so will need strict guidelines and easy access to reliable information. Also need availability of appropriate vet care
- as long as noise and odor are not caused, this is fine to allow.
- Could help our city
- The amount of yard space needs to be a factor in wether a citizen can have animals. Some yards are just too small and to close to neighbors to make owning animals a good idea.
- No one has ever been harmed by hens. Also the noise from hens is minimal to the barking of a dog, whether is playing or protecting.
- As long as the hens are being kept reasonably and safely then it is a superb choice to let them be kept by responsible owners.
- If supported by those around you, this promotes sustainable living! The problem becomes if a new neighbor comes into the community and doesn't like this, how would the city handle this considering the livestock value and impact on owners way of life.

- If the above criteria are met, I think this is a positive change. One thing I would add is that the livestock should not be bred and sold for profit.
- As long as neighbours and the community agree, I don't see any harm in having hens in the backyard.
- I think having hens, as well as other live stock is a great thing. I love that the city is supporting this.
- I support urban agriculture.
- Somebody wants to have hands, and they want to take care of them properly. I am OK with that
- Less red tape
- So long as a limit on number of hens is enforced. A few hens is ok.
- having chickens would be nice and why not a pet pig they make great pets
- It would Support community engagement and encourage self sustainability
- Livestock animals can be loving pets as well. As long as they're housed right and treated properly, I don't see why not.
- As long as it doesn't cause nuisance
- Hens and other small livestock, so long as they are cared for properly, open the community to more locally produced food and would be a net benefit.
- Nice way to encourage sustainability.
- The esthetic of a community must be maintained. With so many different cultures living in Calgary now, there is going to be a wide variety of opinions of acceptable shelters, noise, smell.
- Being able to produce our own food in our backyard/neighbourhood reduces the need for long range transportation of goods and adds to environmental sustainability. Additionally, home grown food helps humans better understand where their food comes from.
- I think it would be a great idea to allow people to have chickens
- As long as no harm comes to the community I have no issue supporting.
- Having hens would be a benefit to many families.
- Chickens!
- Hens and livestock are peoples pets and loving animals. Not everyone may have them as pets, but to some they are. We need to include them and allow them to have their pets in their lives no matter what animal they are.
- As long as someone is cleaning up after their animals and it is licensed there shouldn't be an issue.
- I would be in full support of urban hens. It's hard to comment on other livestock, as I have less knowledge of their living conditions, required care, noise/smell levels. and other significant factors.
- People are so out of touch with where their food comes from, it's educational, has a healthier environmental impact than factory farms, and provides alternatives to spending money where you want not where you need.
- I definitely think it's important to make sure people are treating livestock well
- Responsible owners should be providing this care and suitable living conditions to begin with.
- No reason why people can't have hens based on the above criteria
- No need.

- It's a great idea
- I think it would be a great idea to allow for urban livestock, I believe it would enrich the community.
- As long as the living conditions of the animals are monitored and maintained, I see no reason someone couldn't have other types of animals living on their property.
- as long as a responsible owner there is no concerns
- Laying hens are a fantastic addition to the city of Calgary
- For chickens and hens yes for other livestock this should be farm / hobby farm only and not within the city limits
- Not everyone should have hens or chickens. But some should be allowed. A case by case basis seems fair.
- Urban chickens should be allowed.
- I like that cases would be evaluated on a case by case basis; I hope noise concerns would be part of the evaluation for inner city animals.
- the support from all Adjacent neighbors is key for me
- Adjacent neighbours must be notified and support this as they would be affecting your everyday life.
- let the people have hens, why not
- I would be open to hens but not in favour of larger livestock. The exception may be on a larger parcel of land. EG. 1/2 acre and larger. Still would require the same criteria.
- Hens allow independence and community activity.
- If people have the property and are able to take care of say chickens they should be allowed to have them
- As long as the neighbours are in agreement & the needs of the animal are met, there is no reason to not allow it.
- If the owner has a suitable area and needs are met for livestock I don't see why this would be a problem
- N/a
- It dependa
- I don't see an issue as most of them are not a nuisance.
- As long as it's not disruptive to the surrounding neighbors, why not? Disruptive can include noise/odour but as long as those aren't an issue I'd have no problem with it.
- Smaller towns have had chickens for years with no issues. Not sure about other animals - but there are some miniature horses that are therapy animals and if your yard was big enough this seems like it would be okay.
- Sustainable communities include livestock.
- Why not
- People should be able to make their own food.
- If it helps, why not?
- I like chickens
- I support small livestock, such as hens, I think it's a great idea.

- I absolutely and unequivocally support urban chickens and ducks in Calgary. This program should have a large budget to ensure safe and ethical conditions for animals, and provide bylaw officials with the power to fine, confiscate and enforce changes.
- I fully support urban chickens. In a responsible environment these animals can provide comfort and sustainability to backyards. And they are no louder or fowl smelling than a dog.
- Cool I guess
- Positives outweigh the negatives.
- People should be allowed to have their own source of food
- Honestly would make a huge difference for struggling families
- As long as it is a healthy environment for those animals.
- I think it would be good for the city to allow hens on private property. I do think it should be monitored and there should be limits per household/street.
- It's a harm principle thing. If people can safely enjoy a behavior like hen ownership with minimal/no effect on neighbours and community, it ought to be allowed.
- Fresh eggs and they're very smart. Also great for getting rid of insect /pests
- Can be helpful and more humane
- As long as anyone affected is okay with it, and the hens are taken care of then I agree.
- If people are responsible and manage the care and treatment of their animals without having negative impacts to their neighbors, it should be permitted
- As long as the animals are kept in a healthy environment and they are not a nuisance.
- If neighbors are responsible owners, I see no problem with urban hens.
- We should allow pigs as well as hens. Pigs are amazing, smart animals. They are also quiet, and can substitute as an emotional support animal better than a cat. They are clean, quiet, eat compost and weeds, and don't escape from fences.
- As long as the animals aren't a nuisance for the neighbours. If a rooster is crowing at 3 am, then it would be the same as a noise complaint. If it kept happening every night, that wouldn't be acceptable. If the animals are causing disturbing smell, and disturbing the neighbours enjoyment of their yard, that would be a problem too
- If you can provide a proper life for the animal then why not?
- Small livestock such as hens are good for reducing carbon footprints, as long as there is minimal negative impact and support from neighbors there is no reason not to have hens or other small livestock. Pigeons are already allowed, and as hens provide a resource (eggs, meat) and a similar nuisance to neighbors, they should also be permitted.
- They seem like reasonable criteria.
- doesn't bother me either way
- No problems if animals are treated well and neighbors are okay with it
- Similar idea to community gardens
- As long as the animals are being taken care of and given the best life, individuals should be able to own and care for their animals.

- Love the idea of having hens in calgary
- Livestock provides so many benefits to people and as long as there are restrictions, responsible owners, and community support i think it would be a wonderful thing
- Yes because chickens need specific living conditions and it wouldn't be fair for them to live in unacceptable living conditions
- Smell & noise must be controlled
- Sure as long as there are strict rules on waste clean up and fencing/enclosure guidelines.
- I think it's a good idea as long as animals are cared for properly and do not disturb the surrounding neighbours.
- I just think it's a good bylaw to have in place
- I believe that animals should have the same rights as people to a degree. It is a living being and needs to be treated as one. To be equal to humans and have rights to a safe and secure environment.
- I have had chickens before and they are awesome animals to have around. They are usually very clean animals that help to support self sustainability for families.
- I have nothing against people having small livestock in their own personal yards.
- Sounds reasonable
- As long as there is a limit and no roosters are allowed, urban hens can safely be kept and provide food!
- Having access to one's self grown food should be a basic right. Obviously hens can be noisy so requesting permission seems fine.
- As long as noise and/or smell is managed and the welfare of the animals is considered, I am in support of this.
- As long as the animal is protected, well cared for and is not bothering or creating a problem for neighbors I believe this would be acceptable. I believe random audits would be needed to ensure owners are following the laws at all times for livestock in the city. An agreement would need to be signed by the owner when owning livestock
- As long as the chickens are cared for have proper space and I cleaned up properly then I have no problem with Urban chickens.
- hens can be kept clean and in a small enclosure. far less noisy than most dogs left outside.
- I don't think someone should have to prove there could be community benefit. That's ridiculous. One persons chickens may not benefit the community. Also, I think there should be a checklist of conditions to be met, rather than random 'discretion' of the by law officer.
- Within reason, considering space available, number of animals involved, etc that we can't incorporate responsible ownership
- There is opportunity for small livestock to be very beneficial to areas especially is there is cooperation between neighbours. This can also allow people that have lower incomes a chance to supplement their food sources and those of their neighbours through this initiative.
- If the animal can be cared for properly they should be allowed to have it.
- Helps with animal welfare.

- If they are not noisy and restrictions are in place for their shelters/cleaning up after them
- I think that allowing residents to have their own hens is a great step towards sustainability.
- people should be able to have their own chickens
- No roosters, if they break noise bylaws they're out.
- as long as everyone involved and surrounding is on board, why not!
- As long as there's no roosters, eggs are awesome!
- Chickens are quiet. Roosters are not and if the eggs are important there is still no need for a rooster.
- Chickens are quieter than a lot of dogs. I think they should be allowed.
- It would be kinda cool
- Like any other animal responsible owners should be able to have these options. Of course cleanliness, noise, numbers etc should be taken into consideration.
- Each case should be assessed individually to ensure the chickens are taken care of.
- If neighbours agree, sure.
- I love the idea of being able to have hens within city limits. Just like any other city noise (airplanes, buses, construction, loud vehicles) neighbours will adjust and get used to the noise of the animals eventually.
- I would love to see hens providing eggs in the city, done humanely.
- I think we need to move towards more sustainable farming options like this.
- Hens are needed for organic resources
- I think it would be amazing to be able to have hens in the city but would be worried about noise.
- If someone wants a pet chicken they should be able to do so. Who am I to dictate what someone can/can't have?
- N/a
- Because chickens provide food and no one should be punished for that
- home raised eggs are excellent
- Why not
- Within reason I think this could be a benefit to the community to experience a bit of where our food sources come from.
- Having hens in the city is a WONDERFUL idea. Especially when families can come together and learn about animal husbandry and get some fresh eggs
- If the neighbours are ok with it and they have suitable conditions for the animals they should be allowed to have certain livestock on their property.
- Why not
- More backyard farming = more self-sustainability
- This follows with the direction Calgary is naturally growing in. Allowing certain smaller breeds of livestock is a great idea so long as livestock is declared and registered with the city, similar to pet ownership.
- Chicken coops in the city would be expected to meet minimum size to hen requirements and care of would have to meet farm-level regulations.

- I want backyard chickens
- chicken is fine. But don't allow pigs or cows. Those are large breed farm stock that will not adjust to being in the city. And are disruptive to their neighbours and could cause more damage to a property than a dog.
- I believe there are a number of animals that can live comfortably within a city as long as the owner is caring for them properly and has the space.
- All neighbours adjacent to your property should need to allow it. You should have a certain amount of land
- If it is done and kept in such a way that its provides benefit for those who have them and they maintain the area then i am all for it
- Support from adjacent neighbours should be paramount.
- Works in other cities
- Urban hens can be a great food source for families, if limited in number to 2-3 per household they are not noisy and considerably more neighbour friendly than many dogs.
- I don't have a problem with people owning chickens in the city
- People find pets in all animals. Just because one finds more joy in a pet goat should not mean they have to live on a farm. As long as the animal is cared for appropriately.
- I am all for it as long as it doesn't interfere with the peace of the neighbors.
- If the animals have suitable living conditions and space.
- If people can care for their livestock and they aren't a nuisance for neighbors why shouldn't they be able to?
- Everyone needs hens!
- Why not?
- I have seen how this can work in Okotoks. It really promotes sustainability and innovative urban gardening.
- There are many benefits to city hen coups.
- As long as the animals are given adequate space and neighbours are okay with it, I don't have a problem with it. I would like the city to perform checkups on the city if the bylaw is expanding to other animals with complicated and specific needs, it's not the same as owning a dog or cat. We don't need to add to the amount of animals being neglected in the city
- If it doesn't interfere with me who am I to stop it. If someone wants hens to feed their family, by all means allow it.
- Cool idea.
- as long as it was limited and there wasnt a heard of large livestock
- I would be afraid of many people taking advantage of having livestock in the city, so to have it monitored/controlled would be best.
- As long as appropriate fines were in place for cleanliness and minimizing noise, I don't see why people should be allowed to own hens
- Amazing step forward for urban farming!

- People should be allowed to own livestock in humane conditions, as long as it doesn't cause nuisance to neighbors.
- Urban livestock are a responsibility that most people are not really willing to bear. For those that are willing to put in the extra work they require, I support them being allowed to have them. I think it's important that the city manage them though, as it's too easy for people to jump on a bandwagon without considering all the implications.
- Yes
- Livestock can provide important benefits to communities.
- I support this as long as urban hens are not allowed to be slaughtered.
- As long as it does not harm others there is nothing wrong with it
- No issues.
- as long as people follow the rules it would be fine.
- as long as the community supports it and peoples health is being considered i think urban hens is a great idea
- Urban centers should be encouraging sustainable and local solutions for agriculture.
- As long as the owners are responsible and noise/smell is not an issue
- If kept properly, hens are no more of a nuisance than other already permitted animals.
- that would be cool if they don't all just get hit by cars
- Support of neighbors and community associations. There must be a law in this that they only need one time support form neighbors, if a new neighbour moves in beside an already established hen house or exotic animal holder permits cannot be pulled unless it's determined abuse or neglect to the animals in the permit holders care.
- urban farming is great.
- I agree with the above conditions.
- As long as the neighbors approve, then its fine.
- We should be able to raise hens on private property as long as bylaws are followed.
- If people want to raise hens for fresh eggs, why the heck not.
- There would need to be limits on the size of livestock, and the permitted areas this can take place.
- allowing urban hens to become part of the community would offer better ability to be self-sufficient as well as educational experiences and therapy for the owners.
- If a suitable environment is provided and maintained, humans should be able to raise animals to feed their families
- Chickens and pigs are quite clean to begin with. Chicken feces are amazing for gardens and pigs are great support animals. Allowing city folk to be self dependent assists the community by allowing them to make and spend money.
- Love this idea!
- Live stalk can support mental health as well as provide a sustainable food source.
- As long as the chickens stay in the owners yard and aren't all over the road

- They don't use public spaces (dog parks, roaming, defecating on lawns etc) and are a great addition to those who can support the animals properly.
- Animals such as chickens and goats are good ways to control weeds/ bugs and are low maintenance. They're also a source of food for low income or large families
- Hens would be fine, but not roosters
- I support freedom of the citizens
- Only if the animals didn't interfere with the lives of the neighbours
- Calgary is behind many other urban cities in allowing home owners to keep hens and other livestock. I fully support a licenced, and structured approach to keep 1-5 urban hens to help families support themselves, feed themselves, and for children to learn more about Calgary's agricultural roots. Engage 4H and make them a partner in the process.
- "If the animals have good living conditions & it's not a nuisance, why not?"

- SIDE NOTE:It is incredibly disappointing to see the suggestion of breed specific language being added to a bylaw that was once world-renowned for its success. Furthermore, the City is not asking for a postal code or any other measure to verify that you are a resident of Calgary. With the survey being accessible to anyone, we anticipate that spammers and pro-BSL (breed specific legislation) lobbyists will skew the results. Calgary needs to take lessons from its own past, when it was a world leader in animal control legislation in the early 2000s. Only breed-neutral, evidence-based legislation will have any chance to address dog-related problems in the community.
- The fact 'pit bulls' are being discriminated against causes fear towards the general public, when you specifically state that they don't cause the majority of bites within our city. It's a 'responsible pet ownership bylaw' not a 'lets ban and discriminate against pit bulls and their owner law'. This is absolutely ignorant and very narrow sighted and I am disappointed to see Calgary hurt and fear monger a breed based off of an uneducated perception."
- I think being able to raise your own chickens needs to be highly considered
- This should be allowed if criteria met.
- Only if there could be a guarantee of no bad smells from the livestock
- We could all benefit from a less "sterile" city - -let people live. During this pandemic, we have all learned that getting back to basics and nature is a good thing. We need more flexibility and being animal friendly helps make Calgary the hospitable place we claim to be.
- yes
- Hens are fantastic! If allowed I would have some as well. We consume a flat of eggs a week in my home and garden. This would be amazing.
- The size and amount of animals can vary depending on property and smells and noises
- As long as they are looked after, cleaned up after often and they don't disturb neighbours.
- I have nothing against hens, roosters in the other hand... NO
- Chickens can be very beneficial

- It's not my property, not my business.
- As long as the animals are not causing neighbors any issues, I do not see why any animals should not be allowed if their quality of living is deemed very good.
- These days, it is important that individuals have the opportunity to keep some "small" livestock. A clucking hen is likely less intrusive than a barking dog at 5:00am. As with anything, we need to ensure that responsible care and behaviour are observed. Examples: ensuring the yard doesn't turn into a foul stinking mess... good neighbours and all that.
- As long as people are responsible, there shouldn't be too many limitations
- I think this would be a positive move for Calgary
- I have no issue as long as there are reasonable limitations in place. I.e. there isn't wild hens and roosters outside of yards.
- If the hens are safe and being well taken care of, I have no issue.
- As long as they have adequate living conditions, why not
- Other livestock, like pigs and goats? The smell and noises would be unbearable. If I wanted to live on or near a farm, I wouldn't be living in an urban area. Support from adjacent neighbours is an absolute must
- Fine for people to have.
- Urban hens are good for the city as a whole
- As long as there are husbandry requirements and welfare considerations built in for the protection of the animals
- Ensuring that future neighbours can not cause a change in the ability to own a pet. It is irresponsible to force people to later rehome their animals, such as pot bellied pigs who are similar to dogs. There would have to be a system similar to dogs in place for bothering neighbours etc.
- I support this because of the "Support from adjacent neighbours" stipulation. If surrounding neighbors approval is not considered, then I revoke my agreement.
- Sustainable food source.
- That sound like both animals and owners will benefit from this and both will be safe. Owners held accountable.
- hens are a great idea
- If people want hens and will care for them, let them have hens
- If the owners show responsibility and education on the livestock's needs I think it would be acceptable to have such animals.
- N/A
- As long as an animal is treated right, why should it be a problem for owning it?
- self explanatory
- Would be a benefit to community, providing living conditions for the animals are strictly enforced.
- Amazing idea and great for the community!
- Chickens are quite and provide sustenance to many people. As long as regulations were in place that held people responsible if bylaws were breached

- I love the idea of more variety in the city. I'd love to have a hen or small pig.
- I'm for more animals allowed as long as neighbours agree and animals are safely cared for
- I think the more we can switch to natural resources (goats for lawn mowing and hens for fresh eggs) as long as the animals are treated properly, then go for it!
- I agree but subject to noise restrictions. I have lived next to a hen house and it was very noisy. Might not be best suited for high density areas.
- More self contained living = more money saved
- if urban livestock is properly managed it can be a benefit to the community
- as long as everyone is safe, happy and healthy - why not?
- Hens are amazing creatures full of personality. I'd rather hear clucking than barking.
- I think its [removed] that you need permission from your neighbour. I pay property tax and I don't need permission from my nosy neighbors to do anything. I keep to myself yet I get barking compliments for other dogs in my neighborhood. How do I know this, we put my dog down in December of 2009 and got another one in May of 2011 and we were getting barking complaints the entire time. Even though we called your joke of a city to tell them that we didn't have a dog and even had an officer come and check, and yet complaints still kept coming in. So I'm getting a chicken without my neighbours permission.
- The well being of any animal should be top priority.
- Adjacent neighbours should have a say when it comes to keeping hens and roosters due to noise.
- People should have the option to raise hens for eggs so that the community can be more self sufficient if desired. These people should have to adhere to standards that will benefit the hens wellbeing/safety, and to prevent neglect/animal cruelty.
- As long as there are rules in places about the living conditions for the hens and support from neighbours... why not?
- I think it would be wonderful to allow livestock in calgary
- Yes on the condition that the live stock doesnt prove a nuisance or inconvenience for other calgarians or neighbors.
- I think support animals shouldnt be progressed to just cats and dogs. With over a million people in this city - everyone has different animals that can be comforting to them or something they have a deep love for (snakes, rabbits, fish, pigs, chickens etc.)
- Responsible pet owners and neighbors should have the freedom to assume the responsibility of caring for an animal
- I support
- Why not
- As long as noise is kept to a minimum.
- I support the allowance of smal livestock animals in the city such as hens & pigs.
- Absolutely!!
- Folks should be educated on the necessary health and safety conditions best to keep these animals well taken care of, even if for food. It goes without saying that review of the home and space is important.

- Suitable living conditions MUST BE upheld.
- As long as the animals have space and are cared for correctly I see no issue.
- I agree, but with guidelines and some restrictions in place, so there are standards of care and numbers of animals in place.
- I would if they had restrictions. Cannot be in just anyone's yard, as they require a lot of space for them to have a high quality of life and a lot of Calgary backyards are too small for that
- Would increase urban sustainability and has not been shown to have detrimental effects.
- If the necessary measures are in place to promote the wellbeing of livestock, then people should be able to possess them and care for them!
- I grew up in a small town where neighbours had hens, there were no issues.
- Should be limits to if you have the space to provide where the animals are not encroaching on neighbor's property or causing a disturbance. I support urban agriculture and mixed use properties but also respect that individual's decisions affect others
- I think urban hens are a great idea. I think larger livestock would need to be case by case pending inspection of the individuals property and accommodations. Again circling back to the idea of a license to ensure competent ownership.
- As long as the livestock is well cared for.
- Raising your own food is always a good thing
- I would support a limit on the amount of hens on any property. As long as they're cared for properly, I don't see an issue with it.
- I think the criteria is well thought out and if people are able to care for and own livestock on their property it is a nice privilege.
- If everyone is cool with chickens or otherwise, why not?
- Times are tough. Home grown eggs can mean the difference between starving and living.
- Having owned Hens before when it was legal, I support this.. when I talked with neighbors none of them even realized we were keeping hens lol.. they were shocked and pleased that it wasn't even a bother to them. If cared for appropriately the birds pose no risk to others :)
- Pets come in different shapes and sizes, as long as they're not creating significant noise, smell they should definitely consider it
- people should be able to do what they want, as long as the criteria is met for a healthy living space for the livestock.
- I think within reason it would ok to have certain livestock (i.e. chickens) on one's property within a strict set of rules/regulations.
- As long as the animals and being taken care of and not abused I see no problem with this
- I have no issue with livestock in the city as long as they are cared for in a way that is in keeping with the standard of living (space etc) they would receive outside of the city.
- Hens and small livestock such as goats should be allowed with a cap on the number of pets allowed per property example: no more than 5

- The city needs to request proper licensing and permits for urban hens, and needs to instate a law regarding ratios of hens-to-cocks to control reproduction and population. That being said, I support the idea if properly executed.
- Much rather a goat to eat the grass than a lawn mower.
- As long as there is suitable housing for everyone and animal involved. Proper inspections, licensing and training. In addition to approval from immediate neighbours
- Small animals are fine as long as they are maintained correctly. You would not want someone with 2 cows in a residential area
- Urban farming is a great use of otherwise useless land
- "It's important to allow this because the restriction makes zero sense. Other animals can be equally loud and dirty. Hens are relatively quiet and make very little environmental
- Impact."
- I'd love to have chickens!
- This would be a positive change.
- Love the idea of urban livestock as long as it is regulated
- Excellent idea
- I believe this law is beneficial. Livestock help food supply, soil productivity (thus helping us grow healthier gardens to sustain our family, livelihoods, it reduces costs and pollution since less feed, fuel and water will be used as opposed to intensive farming.
- Small farm animals often have similar probability to cause "nuisance" as animals already permitted as pets. The bylaw must consider the number allowable so hoarding can be avoided. As well, proper winter housing must be provided.
- But only if limited, and in consultation with the local community, and under similar process to changing the land use for a dwelling or secondary suite
- Suitable conditions should dictate this. If no issues- why not?
- I think support of surrounding neighbours is most important within city limits.. otherwise no need for a by-law outside city limits
- Backyard chickens are amazing learning and community resources
- As long as there were limits on the number of hens, and the size of the yard.
- As long as it is okay by neighbours I don't see a problem with it as long as they are properly cared for
- Hens yes, can't imagine larger livestock could be cared for in someone's back yard.
- If the animals can be properly cared for and are not interfering with others, I don't see why there would be a problem.
- No issues with this
- Livestock are important, and can improve life.
- Just makes sense, to keep everyone happy
- More agriculture close to home could be beneficial for many families and smaller markets and communities
- "1) Hens have the potential to enrich a community. Eggs can be shared with neighbours.

- We have arbitrarily categorized chickens as "livestock" and dogs and cats as "pets"; many folks have indoor chickens as pets.
- Keeping and caring for hens can boost peoples' mental well-being, particularly during these times of isolation."
- If the environment is safe and healthy for the animal then yes and it should be followed up on after a certain amount of time to ensure it's staying that way
- I support urban livestock as long as the needs of the livestock are a top priority.
- If the animals are safe and being cared for and not being a problem.
- well maintained smaller livestock should be able to live in the city if the owner looks after them
- Urban farming, including farming eggs, can be part of great sustainability plans. But killing animals for food should not be allowed generally (I think this is obvious but had to say it)
- As long as they are well kept and non disruptive
- The hens need a certain amount of space and quality of care/housing, you should need a permit, and you should be required to have them a certain distance from the road and neighbours.
- I think the world and our individual communities only benefit from urban farming. Having hens allows people to start that process, which is important for global warming and income equality.
- As long as the neighbours on both sides of the property were okay with it and there were benefits to doing so I suppose that would be fine.
- I think animals help to enrich people's lives.
- If limited in numbers and not affecting neighbours.
- I like the idea that the neighbour's are to be consulted if an owner wants hens.
- I would be fine with this, as long as neighbours were consulted.
- I think owning chickens would be a wonderful way for more people to begin eating more local eggs! Better for animals and environment.
- We allow pigs as service animals
- I'm all for people having urban hens but want them to have the proper shelter and care.
- We need to be more sustainable and produce as much food locally as we can. I would also be in favour of mandatory potato plots on properties where that is feasible. They're easy to grow and would could be donated to those in need.
- Hens are beneficial
- some people get pets for the novelty of it. If the had to actually change something in their lives. maybe they would put better thought into it.
- People should be allowed to do as they wish provided the animal is cared for properly and humanly
- I think this is a great idea. In my home town of poland, they have small chicken coops fenced in like we have here with fenced in community gardens. Allows families to get out, clean up, feed and collect eggs as they come. This is also good for those who are struggling financially. Small food goes a long way.

- As long as they're not bothering neighbors, and their well-being is being taken care of, then why not have them in the city.
 - What kind of Livestock? A cow??...No! Chickens/Ducks ...okay sure if kept properly. NO PIGEONS
 - I don't really understand the need for this but I don't have anything against it
 - Support animals do wonders for their owners. We cannot say what works best for one works better for another. Some people are in need of an animal but are afraid of dogs. Services should be open to whatever animal they need.
 - person must apply and be approved.
 - "I support sustainable living. But I don't support it if it hinges on my rights as a neighbour to a serene and quiet lifestyle.
- If you want a house that houses animals and makes a ton of noise and mess then please but yourself an acreage.
- If the animals don't cause a ton of noise, smell, or mess then I feel it's fine."
 - Allowing hen dens and other livestock would be able to help support our local economy as they could sell eggs or other food and could also help lower income families put food on their table
 - As long as the animals are properly cared for and neighbours support, I see no issue.
 - The biggest thing is the possible nuisance for other neighbours. If other neighbours are in support of the hens on a property and there are regular "check-ups" from enforcement officials I don't have an issue with it.
 - I'm indifferent.
 - I think more people should be given opportunity to provide food for themselves whether it's livestock or converting their lawns into garden boxes.
 - Having egg-laying chickens does not require a rooster. It's a more humane and eco-friendly choice for households than buying at the store.
 - Sustainability and self provision of food can really help the economy.
 - Support animals are very important for some people. Different species should be considered.
 - As long as they a responsible pet owners and don't affect other people
 - There is a demand for urban livestock but it needs to be regulated for health, humane treatment, and neighbour relations reasons.
 - I think urban hens are a great idea. Larger livestock would get smelly and noisy much faster and shouldn't be allowed.
 - I think much like community gardens, open or vacant spaces could be used for hens, goats, etc. that the community takes care of together. I see it positively impacting food security, education, and community building.

- I think it's important to support all ways for families to provide food for their families. Urban hens would be a boon.
- Livestock are a very good way to have sustainable food, and fresh food in a humane and caring way for animals should be encouraged
- Most cities give people the right to have laying hens.
- each case should be looked at and neighbour's should be ok with it.
- People should be allowed to have the pet of their choice
- Chickens would be great
- This came up in 2011. Yes, why not.
- Within one life time we've gone from hens in the yard being normal to restrictive rules against them. With food security becoming more and more an issue e need to make practical changes to our laws that remove archaic and impractical restrictions and allow more people to take good security into their own hands.
- On the condition that the livestock (in this case hens) did not attract predatory or vermin animals like coyotes, as well as contained any smells associated with housing such animals.
- I think urban hens would be a welcome resource in Calgary and is long overdue
- Many neighbours hate each other and therefore you shouldn't have to ask your neighbour. You don't have to ask your neighbour when you get a vicious dog or roaming cat. Why pick on the hen people?
- People should be able to provide for their families with hens for eggs, milk from goats, any use not for slaughter.
- Right to use property.
- People's property they should be able to keep whatever animals they want as long and they are properly cared for
- The fact that this bylaw already exists is silly. I can understand the restriction required for roosters but otherwise it is ridiculous.
- I just dont see the reason someone couldnt have a hen or any live stock if they have the proper space.
- Because I want chickens
- It makes everything legal and be supported by bylaw
- Food security and sustainable sources are important
- This would be a great way to engage people in animal rearing
- It will give people the ability to produce their own eggs
- A return to self sustenance is welcomed. Backyard hens are a good step in that direction. Some issues could be raised, specifically if you raise any other animal and intent to butcher, it could get a little trickier. Maybe they need to do it in a garage or something instead of right out where a neighbor infant can see.
- Chickens are fine.
- Hens need to be cared for properly. Rules for animal abuse extend to hens too

- Hens provide good that is needed for homes. There will be a time where hens in backyards will help feed people.
- I have no issues if a person wishes to own a hen, but if the quantity of hens in a single property starts to produce noise complaints, then I feel the owner should either take steps to reduce those instances (IE: noise damping fencing, or insulated hen house) or should be asked to remove them all.
- Chickens can be great for people and they're only little.
- While I do not like the idea of leaving the final call to the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer whose expertise will likely be too nonspecific to be of use and who will likely be overtasked with other issues, it is a good opportunity to address community food needs in the form of cooperative neighbourhood gardens. Consumers today value healthy and happy livestock, and have an outstanding appreciation for farm to table. Allowing chickens and other livestock (goats, etc) on private property will keep money out of the hands of factory farms where animals are notoriously abused and encourage local production of eggs, meat, and dairy.
- If there is a new adjacent owner (neighbour) there must be agreement or an update that doesn't require a full application but the new neighbour must start the process if they have grievance with an already approved situation.
- We need hens
- So long as the animals are not impeding or disturbing neighbours, there's no reason someone shouldn't be able to own a pig if they'd like, so long as the animal is being rightly cared for
- Hens eat nuisance bugs when gardening; hens provide eggs. We need to encourage more self-sufficiency.
- If it allows people to support themselves, why not?
- Chickens are cool
- If someone wants to own livestock and has proper property for it, they should be allowed to. It is great to have your own source of eggs, milk etc.
- This gives people the option to adopt a farm to table lifestyle.
- Urban chicken for eggs are a good idea
- I don't think neighbors should be consulted. If there are noise or smell issues they should be handled the same way we do with dogs.
- I think having hens is a great idea so long as they have adequate living conditions.
- As long as animals are well taken care of, and the neighbours do into mind (regards to smells) I don't see any issues.
- All of the criteria make sense and I think these animals can provide a lot for certain people.
- Persons wanting this must provide a certain amount of space per animal
- We should be allowed to grow and have our own food.
- This supports environmental and healthy living
- fresh eggs are delicious
- Hens require little space and can improve a person's life greatly. As long as no rooster is present the noise would be no greater than any other pet.

- Hens are fine, just keep the smell under control.
- As long as the animals are well cared for and the owners have approval from neighbors.
- Backyard farming and small livestock should be encouraged and incentivized.
- Let people have livestock.
- Change is good
- Hens are good. Owners would be able to sell their eggs to locals, helping their household income, ultimately bettering our economy in the long run.
- All animals have merit. I support any healthy relationship. Do not discriminate.
- The keeping of urban hens and other livestock, providing that criteria involving sanitation, animal welfare and support from neighbors are met, contributes to local food security, provides learning opportunities for children and teens, and can serve as a consistent source of income.
- This could be beneficial for both families and the community.
- if the owner is responsible, I don't see the harm in it
- I think having the ability to create your own food and be more sustainable is incredibly important in easing stresses with the environment.
- Sustainable living is necessary.
- Livestock really has no place within city limits, that being said should an individual be able to garner 100% support from their neighbours and community (no more or no less) than yes each case should be given some level of consideration. However I truly feel that it is not fair to the animals to be living within the city, as there are natural space constraints that do not allow them to live their lives as nature intended. I believe everyone has the right to present their case but I do feel this amendment requires more scrutiny.
- Livestock can also be amazing support animals
- I think it's a good idea as long as the surrounding neighbors agree.
- I think this would be an excellent way to move forward in progressing towards a more balanced and sustainable living.
- Urban farming is positive and should be encouraged safely.
- Why not? If people want to own them and look after them properly why the heck not?
- Yes
- If pet pigeons are allowed in backyards, so should chickens.
- I like the benefits of it, as long as regulations and animal welfare and well being are at the forefront.
- I think more urban animals make for a more diverse population
- Having hens doesn't just impact the owner but those around the home that has them. It needs to be something everyone is okay with.
- I have heard many citizens bemoan the fact that they cannot keep hens for eggs or bees for hives. I support any initiative that encourages ethically sourced food.
- Home grown eggs!
- It would make it easier on our lives if we had sustainable food that we didn't always have to go to the store for

- I don't see harm.
- I don't think that you should need support from a neighbour especially with all of the other criteria.
- Hens are rad.
- As long as it is on a case by case basis, I see no problem with approved people having the ability to own livestock. This helps to support the greater community.
- Pigs can be great companions. Chickens can provide food, and are gentle. So long as they aren't any more nuisance (noise, waste, aggression) than any other pet (dog, cat, bird, snake, etc), and do long as the owner can properly provide for them. I see no reason that a person can't have the pet of their choice.
- Upon neighbors approval
- If they had the proper enclosures and it was supported by their neighbours, then yes. It would be important for the conversation to happen in the community as, like other domesticated animals, this could become a nuisance.
- As long as conditions are suitable and safe for all parties, I don't see a problem with keeping urban hens.
- Pets are pets, if taken care of properly let them be.
- I think it's a good idea to always handle things case by case.
- It's a maybe. All animals should be rescued. The procurement of livestock concerns me. This needs to be thought about and how it will take part in the promotion of livestock breeding. This should be a rescue story. Shouldn't be buying chicks. We should be giving life to the hens deemed not as profitable. Hens 1-3 years old.
- Having "livestock" in a yard promotes healthy eating and living. This also supports some of those who cannot get out to the grocery store and money is an issue when it comes to fresh items such as eggs.
- Food security is important and other urban hens projects have proved this to be a mostly non-problematic way to increase food security
- Having lived on an acreage, hens are easy to care for properly and quiet
- I'd love to be able to have some chicken for fresh food for my family
- I think it's great to allow hens in the city. If suitable living conditions are established and held to a good standard, it sounds great that people want to have a sustainable lifestyle.
- If a person can make it work with the neighbours and community, they should be allowed to have animals that could benefit that community. It would have to be complete sign-off of immediate neighbour's and they should have to prove they know how to properly take care of the animals.
- No explanation needed. Just yes
- "Food should be produced in the city, and people who wish to raise their own food, while living in the city should be able to.
- As long as no animal is living in sub standard conditions, and noise and smells are within reasonable levels for the neighborhood, I don't see any problems"
- no problem with chickens

- I think self sustainability and urban farming is great! as long as they are abiding to bylaws and keeping the animals safe and properly cared for.
- I think it is important that the animals have proper living conditions.
- Yes. Any means of facilitating the inclusion of amicable livestock within the city helps encourage community, diversity, and economy.
- If it has a positive impact, why not!
- If the community is on board then why not
- Hens for eggs only
- Noise & smell should be primary considerations. I've lived next to dogs where owners didn't clean up & left dog to bark. I've lived next to clean quiet chickens.
- I would like to have a pet chicken
- if a person can handle livestock responsibly, why not.
- Hens and pigs should be allowed. As long as the owners are taking care of them and they are not noisy
- Raised on a farm! I think a chicken in a yard is no different than a dog or a cat.
- As long as animals are kept on the owner's property and given suitable living conditions, they should be allowed.
- Yes but.... if new neighbours moved in would they also have to approve? If they didnt what would happen to the hens?
- I live in the community with the support hens and they are wonderful!!
- If it is ok with neighbours and supports the community, why not.
- People can have chickens if they want. Who cares?
- Allow hens as many other jurisdictions do.
- Allow for ducks as well, they are cleaner, and don't damage the grass
- As long as the rules are followed and no liberties are taken e.g. excessive numbers of animals, breeding etc.
- I think a key part of the city's responsibility should be to provide information about biosecurity and provide proper health treatments for hens because Canada does not currently have many health products for hens who contract lice, mites, and other parasites (internal and external). I would also like to see there be a requirement to have the hens or household with hens be registered with the city.
- I think if people would like to have hens or a handful of other livestock type animals, with suitable conditions and support from their neighbors, they should not be prevented from doing so.
- If everyone in the area agrees and the chickens are well cared for, I see no issue with a family having access to chickens.
- They are not hurting anyone
- I think with sufficient planning small livestock shouldn't be in issue in residential.
- I think as long as the person owning hens can provide the necessities of life then why not. I would love to have fresh eggs from my backyard.

- Chickens are good
- Chickens rule!!
- limit sizing but must contain odour, cleanup.
- Strongly support this, though with appropriate regulations in place to protect all parties, including animals and neighbours.
- Urban hens like any other pet should be housed and cared for properly
- These pilot projects have done very well in other cities, I think it would be good for Calgary's food system to allow hens at the bare minimum.
- I am very much in support of hens and other livestock. This is a sustainability issue and should be our right. I do not believe it is fair to ask for support from neighbors. If you have a grumpy neighbor you won't be able to get hens? That doesn't seem fair.
- Backyard chickens should be allowed, with neighbours support.
- let the people have them
- I think well cared for hens are a good idea. it teaches children responsible pet ownership.
- It would help in fight against cruelty to animals in factory farming by providing locals with cruelty free eggs.
- I don't see any issues with urban hens, however roosters would be an issue for noise. Other livestock might be questionable though.
- N/A
- I think can be positive for both citizens and livestock.
- N/a
- As long as the owner is knowledgeable about the care of the animal and can provide a good home for the animal they should be allowed the animal.
- Cleanliness and amount of animals would be the big factor for me personally. Must be kept clean and odor controlled.
- If it "will have positive impact"
- I think it is a very good idea for people to raise hens if they wish. The implementation of many community gardens would work well with small livestock rearing.
- I support it - not really sure what additional explanation to put
- As long as there is no issue to a neighbor I don't see why not.
- Food security is critical, responsible urban farmers should be allowed to raise reasonable livestock on their property.
- With clear guidelines for both owners and neighbours, this seems like a feasible idea. However, what happens if a neighbour moves? Will the new people who take residence have some say in wanting an urban livestock house there?
- As long as the neighbors are all right with it, I don't see a problem.
- Hens would be great, I can't quite imagine which other farm-type animals people might want, but if support is required from the neighbours then that would seem to be a good way to be fair
- its nice to have fresh food, and pigeons are smart creatures

- "My question would be why not?"
- Noise maybe the only issue or maybe it would bring in more unwanted coyotes etc to neighborhoods."
- I don't know why anyone would want an urban hen on their property, but to each their own
- This helps people to save money on groceries and use natural resources. There are goats in Lethbridge that eat the grass on the Coulees, it's amazing.
- People should have the freedom to own animals in city limits especially if it helps with providing income and food.
- I think it's a great initiative to help people sustain themselves and take full advantage of their property for something other than grass. It also sounds like community engagement could increase with a project like that, similar to community gardening
- People should be allowed to have an animal as long as they can provide proper care and housing for the animal
- I think chickens for eggs in backyards would be great as long as those keeping them are educated on how to keep them properly and humanely, and how to keep them clean and tidy.
- As long as the animals are well taken care of and have the right space.
- Horses are cool man
- Hens are fine as long as they are taken care of and not too loud. Nothing wrong with fresh eggs!
- I'm just on board. There's lots of benefits of allowing more ways to produce food and take care of their animals.
- If the livestock contribute to the stability of Calgarians.
- Free eggs for the neighbors!
- If people want hens for the sole purpose of eggs and they are treated properly and humanely then why not allow them.
- People should be allowed to have hens or goats etc if they can be cared for
- It totally depends on each individual case. Limit ownership to two animals per household. Ensure cleanliness and any noise concerns are met. Only small animals allowed ie chicken Investigate what other provinces have done like B.C.
- Living conditions should touch on "smell/odor". Chicken houses or coops can smell very bad very quickly. This will surely bring conflict with neighbors and/or the community.
- Better
- Producing our own food is vital. As long as ownership of the coop maintains a clean environment and keeps the smell down to its minimum.
- As long as the hen coops are maintained and not causing a large odour
- Local food sourcing is important in maintaining regulated prices on big chain supermarkets
- As long as the animals are cared for in an appropriate way and facility (fenced, clean, and housed properly) and they are not disturbing neighbours (noise and smell), there is no reason to prohibit animals such as laying hens for personal enjoyment (not commercial production) - especially considering 6?! dogs are allowed!!

- As long as the resident had support from neighbours (addressing concerns around dogs or cats that may possibly come in contact with livestock) and provided the best care for the livestock, I would support.
 - This is a great concept! I had quail for almost 5 years in Rockyview county and harvested eggs as well as sold birds for meat, it was a great side hobby but had to get rid of them to move into the city. Hens are bigger, require more space and are more messy in my opinion but I see many people with excellent set ups. I actually know [personal info removed] on a personal basis and love what she is doing with her hens and the impact they have in her family. I fully support animals in the community and would even like to see community hen houses just like community gardens!
 - If my neighbour can't keep a clean yard they should not be able to have hens.
 - I think it's a great way to have people start organically living !
 - It is good for the community as a whole to have more contact with domestic and farm animals
 - Yes but depends on the animal as it has to be proper living conditions for said animal.
 - Must have support from neighbors who can withdraw their support at anytime
 - Someone in my community has chickens, and it took her such a long time to have them approved.
 - Only chickens
 - Support from neighbors is unnecessary. If the livestock is negatively impacting neighbors/community then address it.
 - I think there are potential benefits that make this worth exploring. However, people need to be held accountable to meet certain standards/requirements with how they keep any type of livestock in an urban setting.
 - As long as proper vet care and vaccinations were in place. Also, if cleanliness standards were in place
 - I live in a condo. Won't apply to me but as long as the animals are safe and taken care of I don't care.
 - As long as the hens are properly taken care of and their owners are held accountable for their livestock then it should be okay.
 - I fully support urban hens
 - I also think there needs to be a limit of hens on a property. As with pigeons, neighbors do not want to smell the hens.
 - It is healthy for a community to have self sufficiency and raising meat is essential for people to achieve that. It should be allowed for backyard chickens as long as it doesn't result in too many birds or a big mess.
 - Pot belly pigs should be legal
 - "It increases people's control over the food they eat and promotes a healthier lifestyle.
- I also want to talk about the bandana program. It is a choking hazard to dogs playing (they can get their jaws caught). A better idea would be to promote the concept of asking. Children should not be running up to play with dogs regardless of bandana colour without asking first. That's common sense."

- "If a person wants to have an uncommon city pet, I don't think they should have to get neighbours approval (exceptions needing approval would be if it's a noisy pet ie: chickens, however that pet should not/can not impact their neighbours/city, obviously this would mean if you want to have an uncommon pet their should be virtually no trace that you own it.
 - You shouldn't be able to smell it (excretions primarily)
 - You should have sufficient food, water, shelter if it's an outdoor pet and requires a certain structure it would need building approval and shouldn't impact your neighbours (ie: view
 - It should not increase traffic (extreme example: if you have a zebra in your backyard word of mouth may spread and more people may frequent the area to view it)
 - Noise should be at a minimum similar to noise bylaw and restrictions, it shouldn't be calling out at all hours of the night
 - Size - obviously animals require a certain amount of space, obviously the animal needs enough space to live a healthy life (someone with an animal background should make a list for this ie:
 - 4 acres/horse
 - chicken qty = size coop
 - Goat = _ x _ space (increases with size of goat and qty)
 - All home owners require licensing of said animals (this should also go for exotics (meaning any animal not native to AB or even CGY). And perhaps even once every x amount of years they would have to pay to have an inspection done on their animals living conditions (I think this would weed out a lot of people who don't realize what it takes to raise animals not in their natural environment and those following a the moments trend)"
- I think it's dumb that this already is not allowed.
- Suitable living conditions are regulated for animal safety and a limit to the number of hens allowed, for instance.
- neighbors should be consulted
- Chickens are awesome! Ive only heard the stories about waaay back when you could have them!!
- I think if livestock isn't anymore offensive than a dog or cat, have at er! We need to be far more open to allowing people to live their lives without bylaw knocking at their door from others trying to control everything around them.
- "Urban hens allow for additional food security.
- I don't necessarily support the requirement for neighbour support. Unless there are terms to allow for majority support rather than allowing one or two neighbours to stop someone from having a coop arbitrarily."
- I support only if again responsible ownership happens. No cruelty, No neglect, Good clean living areas.
- Something like goats eating grass is fine by me.

- I don't think support from neighbors should be required because it really isn't feasible and personal feelings can get in the way. I don't think community benefit is required as long as there is personal benefit.
- It's a great way to provide more sustainability within the city that most would want to move out of city to achieve
- They provide a source of food and are not a nuisance.
- Chickens, goats, etc build community and both provide additional revenue streams for residents but also a nice connection point between residents. Chickens in absence of a rooster are no nuisance whatsoever. Other livestock should be considered in small numbers.
- As long as it does not become a nuisance to neighbours (noise disturbance) etc.
- With limits and neighbour approval in writing
- Support bylaws that are for animal protection against abuse
- So long as the animal owner has space, knowledge, and ability to keep animal healthy/safe/secure livestock should be allowed. Due to Calgary property sizes immediate neighbours should be consulted if animal or animal waste will be near their property line. Minimum space requirements should be considered for each species and qty of animals.
- I think this opens up a whole chance of disease from farm animals being brought into community, it also attracts larger cats to come more into the city as well- thus I'm sure, will result in those cats being caught and euthanized if they continue to enter the city and communities.
- It should be fine as long as they don't disturb neighbours
- Responsible Ownership
- As long as the bylaw requires people to provide proper living conditions for the hens I think it is a wonderful idea.
- I think depending on the animal more than the adjacent neighbors should have say. Sound travels.
- A
- I think there are enough criteria to make it acceptable.
- Other livestock such as goats are beneficial in keeping grass short and well maintained so if the owner can properly care for them and they aren't being a bother why not let the owner have them.
- Who doesn't want chickens or other animals. Great step in a positive direction
- Resourceful food growth and consumption is beneficial
- There are a lot of animals currently considered livestock that make great pets
- As long as the animal is taken care of and the animal is not a nuisance, it would be fine by me.
- If you can be a responsible owner and care for the animal all while respecting neighbours it would be worth a shot and also more budget friendly for a lot of residents where they wouldn't have to pay for boarding elsewhere which in turns will give more money to local businesses etc.
- Sounds like the appropriate steps will be taken.
- As long as they aren't a nuisance and the owners are responsible, I am fine with this.
- Certain farm animals would do very well in the city. Small goats and chickens are good examples. They don't stink, they're not loud, and are not dangerous. They also help mow lawns.

- If a person has a large property on the edge of town, yet is technically still in city limits, they should be granted the same liberties a property further out of town would have, especially if that property was there before the city expanded. As long as an animal is properly cared for, with the proper living conditions for the animal, then I don't see why the person shouldn't be allowed to own it, no matter what it is, as long as they are respectful of their neighbours.
- I don't see the harm in this, I think animals bring joy and happiness and decrease depression and experienced traumatic feelings.
- If the conditions are appropriate, it is more environmentally conscious to have your own hen
- I think it is fine to allow livestock under these conditions
- bring on the chickens!
- Chickens are an amazing asset.
- People should be able to own a few hen if they have the means to take care of them.
- No different than any other animal, needs are met, owners are held responsible
- I think Hens should be allowed in single family households.
- As long as there is enough room for the animal (s).
- Support
- people really like them. But they stink so it must be maintained
- Any animal should be allowed as long as it is receiving proper care, activity and has room to play/roam/exercise. (Exception being large animals like horses etc that need lots of space)
- As long as the animal is well cared for I don't see a reason why you can't own it.
- I have wanted hens for a very long time, but I live in the city and they're not allowed. Rescuing factory farmed hens gives them a better life and caring for these animals can teach community members about where their food comes from and the importance of proper livestock husbandry.
- Makes sense
- Backyard chickens is incredibly sustainable for the community. They also help with pest control. I'm all for this.
- As long as animals are being cared for properly I am fine with urban hens
- As long as clear guidelines were provided and neighbours have an option to reject it. Like planning permission/permits.
- Allows people to still have a small urban chicks.
- Allow people to raise for food
- They can be pets, sources of food and excellent learning for children
- Some livestock would be fine to have in the city limits.
- This seems suitable and allows for a case-by-case basis of approval for the evaluation of community and livestock well-being
- As long as animals are housed and cared for properly and don't smell, I have no issue with livestock in the city
- If it will help with mental health yes, but just because, no.

- Hens are a great hobby to have to help those with special needs, mental/physical disabilities, and they are not a large enough nuisance to seriously hinder a neighborhood but can bring one together.
- I think it would be great for people to be able to have other animals as long as they can take care of them properly
- Who wouldn't want fresh eggs as long as the animal is taken care of, and it's not harming anyone, owner is responsible. what's the problem
- I think this would be great! Learning where your food comes from is very important.
- As long as there would be NO roosters.
- A few chickens never hurt
- As long as they don't become a nuisance to neighbours.
- I think with proper regulation and screening to ensure proper ownership certain animals could be housed within the city without problems.
- "If support from the community and direct neighbors is granted, people should be allowed.
- I might suggest a size limit, based on the yard size."
- As long as when new neighbours move in they cannot disapprove and force them to remove animals
- We should all be free to grow our own food, especially in this uncertain economy.
- As long as neighbours are okay with it, and the livestock can be well taken care of, I think it is great to allow this.
- As long as the number of hens is very limited and they are quiet (not providing a nuisance) and the birds are properly cared for as COMPANION animals it's fine.
- Supportive of urban chickens
- I would support it but fear that "suitable living conditions" and is subjective. How would this be monitored? It's hard enough getting someone out to respond to an animal welfare complaint now!
- Getting neighbour approval is super important.
- Animals should be provided a decent living otherwise they shouldn't have them.
- Asking as living conditions and needs are met, I do not see an issue with it. Not all living arrangements (like condos) would be able to accommodate livestock, but some communities have large yards that can accommodate such animals, to an extent.
- I've always wanted to get hens and other farm yard animals would be good.
- I think chickens are great. Ducks and geese too. Goats should happen as well. But limit them the same as pets. No more than 3 of each. And make it a licensed venture. Makes for a more responsible owner.
- Hens provide a food income source which could be shared and lead to greater stability. Animals also can lead to improved mental health and encourage people to spend more time outdoors
- numbers should be limited
- I'm in support of this as long as it's well-maintained, the animals are healthy and treated well. And the owner is accountable and respectful of their surroundings.
- Pigs are cleaner the dogs

- I think it would be a great idea to facilitate livestock animals in a regulated system in the city. This could help with giving people more options for their pets and could inform and educate people on the importance of these animals in our day to day lives (home education themes/topics)
- People should quite frankly have that option as this is our owned property. We pay a lot of money for our land and it should be ours.
- As long as sound and smell are under control there should be no issue. But if there is neglect, then that individual should no long be allowed to have the hens and livestock
- Everyone gets a free chicken
- This is an amazing idea! Let's live in harmony with the hens and all animals in our city! No need to kill them when we can make friends with them and eat something that isn't sentient
- As long as the animal isn't a nuisance to neighbours, urban hens can provide healthy food and a hobby to Calgarians.
- They should never have been taken away.
- For us, we would love to be more self sufficient in the city with growing our own food and having hens.
- Goats are fantastic animals to have in a proper sized yard. As a small pig would be.
- Support from adjacent neighbours would be 100% necessary and very strict rules would need to be in place
- So long as the animals needs are top priority, in the city people should have to get approved before adopting livestock by proving they have the space, knowledge and financial resources to provide for these animals.
- As long as everyone in the immediate area is okay with it and the livestock are properly taken care of and provided for then it's all good.
- Love this
- Most people need animals for emotional support. If that animal is a house pig or another form of farm animal than so be it.
- I have friends who have had illegal backyard chickens without issue for years
- If these people can take care of these animals properly and have the appropriate space/equipment, it does not bother me.
- Support from neighbours and suitable living conditions are crucial.
- Self sufficiency and getting back to basics is amazing
- As long as your portentous neighbors don't more sway, and there should be more then one person to approve, in case the chief is friends with someone who has a problem,
- We should be allowed to grow or raise our food
- Small non intrusive livestock would be beneficial
- Surrounding areas have already allowed urban hens, including airdrie. Even TORONTO allows urban hens. Hens are an enrichment to people's lives. They are hardy, peaceful creatures, easy to care for and can teach children about animal husbandry. hens can be a decent option for low income families to produce nutritious meals. There should however be a rule on noisy roosters and hens. Certain breeds are louder than others.

- Many types of "livestock" are now considered pets. If they are provided for properly and not causing damage to the community it would be fine.
- We live in Alberta :)
- Livestock and hens are a great way for the Calgary community to have organic, self-sustaining food in their home
- I support this for hens and animals that are about poultry sized or smaller. I do not believe other livestock species can have their needs met in an urban setting
- I think the criteria are fair and provide good care for the animals. I am not opposed to livestock in the city at all so I think this is a good compromise
- I personally love the idea of being able to have fresh eggs and such. Long as they are cleaned up after properly, and country education on how to care for hens is offered.
- However, I do worry about the noise and smell
- Providing the animals have adequate space and care and do not create a disturbance.
- Yes, if the criteria above is met. Neighbors allergies must be taken into account. People with lung conditions etc... specific dog breeds are more prone to chase chickens etc. My personal opinion a dog takes precedence over owning a chicken.
- I would support this bylaw if there is agreement from adjoining neighbour's so they do not impose unnecessary disturbances.
- As long as the property and owners are suitable for care of livestock, there's no reason to not be allowed them.
- I'd love to have chickens. And I feel if it was monitored correctly and people had a limit on chickens they could have I think it could be done properly.
- Livestock including hen's offer food and sustainability to households
- All situations should be case by case and reflect neighbouring houses concerns
- Urban farming is becoming a more popular practice. As long as health standards are maintained I see no reason why a person with an appropriate set up should not be allowed to own specific, city appropriate, livestock.
- Seems reasonable.
- I feel as long as the person with the animals provides a good environment and cleans up after the animals they should be allowed
- I think people should have the right to farm in their own back yards as long as they don't overly upset the neighbours with animal smell and noise. I think a reasonable amount is okay.
- Yes provided the animal is not a nuisance to surrounding neighbors
- There will be a positive impact from this
- Hens are kept in many places throughout Canada and the us. It can help feed their family in a troubling time. I believe this is a good idea.
- Just like other pets in the city, I believe all these livestock should have to be registered with the city.
- Calgarians having hens would be beneficial to their community.
- Chickens provide food and in some instances support for some individuals

- Having a hen would be great for eggs! Food for the pandemic!
- All animals deserve suitable living arrangements
- Small scale livestock, when managed properly, are beneficial to the individual and the community.
- I do not support allowing urban hens in Calgary but if the bylaw goes ahead then these amendments will be required.
- It's worked in other cities.
- Urban hens would not be a nuisance to others if properly cared for, people should be able to keep what they want as long as it isn't hurting others.
- chickens are awesome
- I see no issue with this
- I am in full support of urban hens and other livestock as long as the owners are accountable to the animals wellbeing.
- Support from neighbors critical. The smell...
- I want a pig and a goat.
- Urban hens can benefit a community through neighbour communication and sharing. Urban ducks and goats should also be considered.
- Having chickens is a great form of a sustainable food source. As long as the care is correct and they have proper living conditions, I am all for people owning a few chickens.
- Why not!?
- I would absolutely support livestock animals in city limits provided they are cared for properly. Taking care of animals can be great for your mental health and it's adds to a community!
- Suitable living conditions is my main concern. This would have to be described very well and be strict
- Fully support the concept of urban hens as long as there is a limit on how many each household can have on their property.
- So long as property owners can properly care for the animals and cleaning up after them to avoid smell.
- Options
- Hens aren't a danger and provide food so why not.
- Worked well in other cities if done right
- If people are interested and able to support themselves, feed their families and supplement their income this way than I don't see why not.
- Wait, I can't have chickens?
- as long as the hens/animals being kept are not for human consumption.
- However - there should be a proximity rule prior to requiring neighbour feedback.
- If someone can have a 100lb dog, I should be able to have a chicken. Freedom.
- I think they could benefit families
- Some people need chickens so they don't have to pay so much money for eggs

- There's no downside as long as there's no roosters and the hens are properly contained. I don't understand why it was ever not allowed.
- Let people do what they want to some degree, if the neighbors don't have any problems then I don't see the issue.
- I think chickens would be a great addition and the eggs they provide can reduce the grocery bill of many family. I think a noise bylaw should be in place for male chickens as it is unnecessary for a rooster to crow in the am in an urban environment.
- Grew up on a farm. Hens, when taken care of are great. Teaches more responsibility for children. Also, the smell isn't there if cleaned up appropriately, and noise isn't ready and issue when there are not 20. Roosters are the problem. I don't see a huge difference between chickens and dogs and cats. Other than the outside house and running room needed.
- More animals would be good to add. Hens are great, but there are other options as well.
- As long as it did NOT impact the neighbours.
- Seems reasonable
- No pigs!! Bees are great, but in an urban yard, number of hives must be limited. Chickens OK, but noise levels must be low. All sites must pass regular inspections for cleanliness and proper animal husbandry procedures.
- I have no problem with small livestock, such as chickens, pigs, sheep. Large livestock can not be safely housed in an urban environment
- As long as their living conditions are regulated and they aren't being put in inhumane living conditions this is fine
- A city like Vancouver allows Hens but Calgary doesn't. So bizarre. I would like to have hens and fresh eggs from my back yard on my property.
- Appropriately managed urban hens and livestock should be allowed but require outlines for ownership.
- If followed I see no issues
- I think the idea of allowing a small number of hens or other small animal as emotional support animals or for eggs is good AS LONG AS owner can demonstrate that they have met all care requirements for the animal and have a veterinarian vet for the animal to see (agricultural veterinarians aren't really in the city). Especially important would be housing requirements through the winter cold and summer heat.
- If the livestock has the appropriate provisions and enough room on the property (size of the animal to the size of property ratio) then I don't see a problem (I personally would like a mini goat!)
- Yes, but it needs to be well laid out. The owner of the livestock must ensure that the animals are properly cared for, that they are not a noise or smell issue. The number of animals must be kept small and manageable (no hobby farms on a small residential lot). Fecal matter from these animals must be properly disposed of on a regular basis. The animals must be fully contained on the owner's property, no digging under fences. The animals must be small in nature. Guidelines need to clearly indicate what is and what isn't permissible or people will fill in the grey areas with things that are unacceptable.

- This would ensure neighbours are not impacted.
- Chickens!
- Why not?
- Being able to supply one's own eggs should be a basic need
- As long as adjacent neighbours are consulted and are comfortable with the hens, I think they can provide benefit to the community.
- Urban farming with reasonable types and amounts of livestock is a good idea. It creates a more vibrant and diverse community. It allows citizens to engage in meaningful daily activities.
- I would support things like hens, pot belly pigs and other reasonably sized and regular volume animals.
- Benefits the community as a whole. If the chickens are in good health and don't attract coyotes or other predators then good.
- Allow hens would be fine. May need to have larger yards
- I fully support responsible hen keeping.
- I think we need to be careful with this, but having the ability to potential approve in case-by-case would be OK. I am concerned that people will not understand what they are getting into with owning livestock type animals.
- I don't care.
- Sustainable living is more important than a few community aesthetic changes
- If all the criteria listed are met, I see many positive potential impacts of this kind of neighbourhood diversity
- as long as neighbours are okay with it, why can't people have fresh eggs. I do think that there should be an education component to allow people to have livestock in the city. How to care for, house and control livestock.
- I knew a few people who had, and took good care of, hens. As long as there is close monitoring of cleanliness to avoid aviary type flu.
- Urban hens would allow people to be self-sustaining. They don't cause any bigger issues than a dog or cat. If you have urban hens, you would have a licence (low registration fee only) and be under the same rules as dog or cat owners
- Better for semi-urban farmers. Who want to live both worlds.
- when suitable, these animals should be permitted on private urban areas.
- To a certain extent, I believe that there should be a limit on the amount and the type of animals depending on the space needed/given.
- I think it would be beneficial for many people to be able to have chickens etc.
- As long as the welfare and health of the chickens are appropriate (enough space, diet and shelter) then it's a great idea.
- Hens are a food source.. if they are properly taken care of sure np
- I think this would be a very positive step to allow people to keep chickens.
- It's a nice way to engage the community in a more eco-friendly manner.

- I fully support this idea as hens are no more annoying than dogs in that they are no more noisy or smelly.
- It would depend on what animals it would be.
- Sustainability is crucial. We should also be able to grow vegetables freely in our front yard.
- People should be allowed to keep hens.
- most important to enforce animal welfare. If these animals are to be kept in the city limits, their health and well-being should be far superior to such "fads" of having backyard chickens
- Urban farming (ie hens producing eggs) promotes community sustainability
- People should be allowed to do what they want as long as it doesn't infringe on another's freedoms. The bylaws seem currently quite biased towards what people consider "infringement".
- Providing there is sufficient land for the animals to roam free during daylight hours.
- Certain livestock in the city can do well if properly cared for.
- The more people we have capable of doing even minimal sustenance farming at home, is a net good.
- I would love to have a few hens and agree that this could/should be regulated for the hens well being.
- You can have a garden to grow your vegetables, why can't you have a chicken to get your own eggs
- Having hens or other livestock permits you to have your own food daily which could potentially bring costs of living down.
- As long as their are rules around cleanliness, smell, noise to ensure no disturbance to neighbours
- I think many people could benefit from having differing types of animals on their property
- If you have the means to have hens on your property and provide for them, it is a better way to keep them rather than factory coops.
- As long as the livestock are being properly cared for and aren't a nuisance at early hours I don't see an issue with keeping hens
- As long as the hens are kept in a roam area that's healthy for them and the neighbors (ex: the pen looks fit and there is no waste spilling into other property, smell included, etc.). People should have the option for more sustainable living experiences as long as they do not impede on existing rules and regulations (safety).
- Why not?
- As long as it is handled responsibly, I believe there are many benefits that livestock can provide to within the city.
- It should not impact neighbours or surrounding areas if an individual has Livestock and all the proper secure structures must be in place and health and safety measurement should be required
- Having a limited number of chicken in the back yard is no different than having barking dogs or cats. They're not as noisy as people would think certainly no worse then a barking dog. Teaching our children about appropriate animal care and food production is a great idea. For many these animals provide lots of emotional support (even if previous trauma is not the reason for need of such support).

- So long as people are taking care of their animals and it's not negatively effecting our property or life (noise, bad odour, mess).
- I think it should be upto the people of what animal they would like to keep.
- There are often many benefits to having animals such as hens. I also think it will reduce animal cruelty and dependency on factory farm eggs.
- Urban folk should be able to grow their own livestock.
- Love the chickens.
- As long as they are being taken care of and aren't bothering neighbors then I don't see an issue with someone having them.
- Remove the neighbour consultation.
- Provided these are laying hens, and they can be properly taken care of I have no issues
- Like many other things in life if it is done respectfully and with no ill will...it is none of my business
- The rules against live stock have always baffled me
- As long as the livestock could be properly contained and the neighbours are willing to tolerate the noise and smell, it wouldn't be a bad thing to get a bit more country into the city.
- As long as they're living in a proper condition and aren't a nuisance to anyone
- I support people having as much autonomy on their private property as possible. However I am also wary of the possible consequences to livestock on property, including strong odours, increased presence of wildlife predators, and damage to our city's ecosystem
- It would be nice to allow people to have hens in their own backyard providing they follow regulations
- Why not allow people to have livestock animals so long as neighbors are aware and okay with it.
- As long as there are no roosters I'm fine with hens.
- As long as a suitable habitat is provided and they are not a nuisance.
- Do not necessarily support requirement for support from neighbours unless if they can prove the livestock are disruptive or impacting their lives in a significant way
- Yes
- No roosters
- I think having hens is an amazing idea, as long as owner is responsible and hens are properly cared for
- Small traditionally rural animals that are not a nuisance and can be properly cared for should be allowed.
- having involvement from all parties allows bylaw officer to manage situations where these animals have the potential for the disturbance of others IE noise or Smell
- I believe that with the right living conditions various animals would thrive in back yards, and in turn they would help with education and self-sufficiency.
- As long as communication is made between neighbours this will work
- With the above criteria, I would support this
- I think you shouldn't need permission from neighbours

- Depending on if you're letting us use the hens as a source of food, it could bring eggs to low income families.
- Suitable living conditions is important - this point needs follow through and enforcement
- Organic living.
- I cannot see a negative to this.
- I've raised chickens myself and have been part of the Edmonton backyard hen pilot project as a chicken mentor. I think backyard hens are wonderful and would be happy to provide mentor ship for poultry husbandry in my neighbourhood.
- As long as the animals have adequate living conditions, their existence in urban areas won't affect much
- Allowing people to produce food (eggs meat etc) is fantastic and should be allowed
- But... limited animals and city approved accommodations for the animals
- It offers a solution to a more economic lifestyle if residents wish to explore that.
- Within limits. I'd be concerned if horses and cows started to appear in the yard next door.
- people should be allowed to raise their own food sources. I do want to see that animals are humanely raised so ensuring they have suitable living conditions should be a priority.
- Having a small coop in a home would be feasible and allow for a more sustainable lifestyle for a family
- So long as the hens are well cared for and have the space they need
- Hens are ok if clean but could easily get out of hand
- Yes I support, however I do believe potential for attracting dangerous wildlife (bobcats, coyotes, etc) into neighborhoods should be considered.
- People should be able to own the animals they want as long as they are cared for properly and under consideration for neighbors and other animals in the area.
- If it helps of course
- Sanitary conditions must be kept. Fines for noise and disruption and excessive excrement/waste
- I would support smaller animals chickens etc.
- My dream has always been to have a pig so id love to see more livestock in and around Calgary provided they have everything they need to survive
- Hens are great for urban homesteading, non-nuisance animal, and teaching our child/future generations how to live for themselves.
- Allowing food security and community benefit
- I don't think there's any harm.
- Urban Hens have proven to be a good thing so long as they are properly cared for
- Emotional support animals come in all shapes and sizes! As long as they are well cared for, given the correct environment, and aren't a nuisance- why not?
- If it is safe for the animals, why not? It's healthier and more sustainable for us to have our own eggs.
- I think it would be great to allow additional pet options in the city. We foster for the humane society and the option to foster pigs or hens, I would love to be able to help out more!

- As long as everyone is safe and the animals are happy and well cared for, sure (pigs, chickens, goats, etc.) I'm not in favour of cattle or horses, though. The city is no place for excessively large livestock.
- This would deter people from "impulse buying"
- Support from adjacent neighbours is important, while recognizing that sometimes neighbour relations can be difficult- these cases should be evaluated on a case by case basis to determine where problems might truly lie.
- Hens provide food. We need to understand where our food comes from and it's not a clean quiet grocery store.
- Other towns already allow for certain livestock. Why is it even a thing to not allow animals like hens, small pigs ect.
- I can't see why it is not allowed in the first place.
- n/a
- As long as owners are responsible, bylaws are enforced, and the animals are not dangerous they should be able to be kept on property.
- I see no reason why this would have a negative affect and therefore I support it.
- I think small livestock animals in the city would be ok if bylaws were followed. eg: hens; small breed pigs, goats, horses. These newer breed mini animals can be smaller than a lot of dog breeds and don't bark and aren't worse than aggressive dog breeds
- urban hens will not bother me.
- People should be allowed to raise their own poultry.
- As long as the animals are treated humanely and the neighbours are on board, why not? Individuals must demonstrate that they are able to care for the hens throughout their lifetime.
- If suitable living conditions are given I see no issue
- there needs to be proof of sanitary and appropriate living conditions for the animals as well as some education on the persons behalf on raising livestock.
- Hens and livestock when properly taken care of, provide little negative impact to a community n
- Support only if strong bylaws in place to ensure community engagement is considered prior to bringing in livestock. If livestock become a nuisance (smell/noise), options are available to mitigate the concerns.
- Suitable living conditions still needs to be further fleshed out. Alberta Farm Animal Care Association (<https://www.afac.ab.ca/resources/urban-hen/>) offers urban chicken courses that could be made a requirement to have hens within city limits.
- I have no problem with the above provided the animals are WELL cared for and the feces is cleaned up regularly
- There is benefit to this but could also attract coyotes and other predators into yards
- Urban livestock can be accommodated if done correctly-proper living conditions and minimal impact to others. I believe it can be done in a responsible manner-hens,miniature goats, rabbits- these could have a positive impact both environmentally and socially.

- Hens provide improvement to the urban flora/fauna. They reduce the amount of food waste going into the compost/garbage. They are quiet and friendly animals that pose little risk to keeping in the city
 - This is long overdue, the correlations listed have been realized and studied in many municipalities already. No brainer.
 - People should be allowed to raise their own hens. But do not allow them to be surrendered to the humane society. Do not let people have that option. Otherwise when they stop laying people will just leave them at the humane society and take up space for other animals.
 - I support Calgarians being able to own hens or other livestock. It provides fresh eggs and meat to households, allows families the opportunity to show children where food comes from, and can be a positive impact on communities and programs who also want to be able to raise livestock.
 - As long as their living environment is suitable
 - There really isn't a difference between livestock and 'pets'. The important thing is that the living conditions are good.
 - "Urban livestock is beneficial if done properly. Chickens dont take much.
- Yard size and a waste plan should be considerations to get permit approval.
- I honestly don't think neighbours should be involved as neighbors dont even abide by noise bylaws or fire bylaws but would throw a tantrum over animals."
 - I see nothing wrong with chickens pot belly pigs small livestock being in town as long as it is housed and cared for properly.
 - I believe having urban hens would be a positive experience for many people and families. It has been successful in so many other urban centres. I feel like Calgary is years behind on making this an option.
 - It's each person's right to decide what tupe of pet they would like to keep
 - Any animal can provide support why limit to just cats and dogs
 - Non intrusive livestock should be allowed within city limits, with a number restriction per household.
 - raising chickens for eggs and meat would be fantastic considering cost of living prices
 - I support farm animals in city limited
 - I have no issues with livestock as long as they are cared for properly.
 - Not really a nuisance so why not
 - Self sufficiency is necessary
 - Hens are pets too! And therapeutic for some people :)
 - allowing a small number (6 or less) chickens would be amazing in urban areas.
 - Growing and raising food locally is important not just for food chain supply but also for teaching the public where food comes from.

- I think this is a wonderful idea. Obviously there should be limits on number of livestock, and ensure proper housing that limits affect on environment and on neighbors.
 - I think that food security is important, and allowing urban Calgarians to have pets who produce eggs would be beneficial. As someone who has owned laying hens in the past, I can attest to the fact that if they are properly housed and cared for, they are quiet and do not smell. If feed is kept in a secure container, there is also no issue with rodents. Chickens actually kill and eat mice if they catch them! They also eat ticks and fleas.
 - As long as proper care guidelines are established.
 - "Wow. From Pitbulls to this.
- Allow chickens. They produce food and comfort to families. Kids can learn where food comes from in an urban area.
- This is the only good questions you have so far."
 - I feel we need the boost to food security and connection with our food. I volunteer with youth and many have lost touch with where our food comes from.
 - I would love to have hens for fresh eggs in my yard! Calgary is know for farming/cowboys/live stock. This would be amazing
 - Keeping of livestock is the responsibility of a person, not their neighbours. It should not matter whether or not the neighbors approve. Furthermore, if the city is to address the widespread food insecurity facing Calgarians, livestock must be allowed.
 - Small livestock is okay,
 - Done responsibly and non-intrusively, I am always for the freedom of people to do what they want on their own property and not to be stifled by the mounting number of bylaws that exist.
 - As long as they are managed responsibly
 - Seems like a good idea.
 - I think people should be allowed to have pets other than what is considered traditional in North America. It would help the community and help people other stand/work with different animals.
 - As long as appropriate shelter is supplied for weather conditions
 - Hens would be a great way to improve food security. There needs to be support for (quietly) killing a hen when is it no longer laying eggs to use for food too.
 - As long as the owner is responsible for said animal it shouldn't be an issue
 - Urban Hens can provide, eggs, enjoyment for their owners and valuable compost.
 - As long as they don't keep me up at night, and are kept in proper conditions. What other people do, doesn't matter to me.
 - Hens can help control bug/pest population on your property without using chemicals. Also an opportunity for fresh, organic eggs.

- Love eggs and chickens in homes our neighbour had one years ago in another city.
- I do think there needs to be a restriction on cockerels as they tend to be noisier, maybe limit number allowed
- Livestock are a valuable source of income and living
- We should be able to provide for ourselves in small ways, even in the city. Having a small number of chickens isn't going to cause harm, so long as they have the proper space, not too many chickens per household, and they're cleaned regularly.
- I think chickens would be great or even a goat if the space is avail.
- If the property is large enough to sustain a livestock animal and a protective shelter it should be permitted. Duplexes and townhouses should talk to their neighbors if their yard is shared. There should be a limit of what type of livestock and the number of livestock.
- Small livestock such as chickens would increase sustainability in our city and provide people the opportunity to grow/raise more of their food similar to community gardens.
- Urban hens would be a great idea! I would love to have hen eggs available and would put in effort to make sure it was done correctly.
- I think this would be beneficial for many people
- Yes because I myself would love to have a chicken pen.
- I have no problem with someone who is responsible owner having hens, as long as neighbours agree.
- Chickens and other livestock should only be allowed within city limits if the owner is willing to have the right conditions for their animals without having it disturb the lives of their neighbours, such as bad smells do to uncleanliness and other animal waste and buy products causing a nuisance to the neighbours or the community.
- I think that the annoyance to neighbours does have to be factored in and that the hens should be kept in a clean and smell free environment. The city should be allowed to investigate the hens living situation and take them away if they are found to be in an inhumane or unacceptable condition.
- I believe that hens could be an excellent addition under these conditions
- Chickens can be a useful pet, providing food, education, entertainment, comfort, etc to their owners. Hens are no (and often less) noisy then some other already allowed pets, and if properly taken care of do not produce [much if any] more odour then a dog would.
- I think urban farming is great if the proper care can be provided. There should also be a limit on the number of hens allowed.
- Hens would be awesome!
- Urban hens would allow for more sustainable food for a household and potentially a community
- Hens should be allowed provided they are adequately cared for and no more than 2 per household.
- As long as the animal is fo Ng estimated or looked after in a loving way this would be amazing.
- Only under the conditions that they be monitored by animal control and must actually be HENS not Pigeons. The amount of them and keeping them under control, not loose and noise levels, filth and health enforcement of both the living arrangements and the birds themselves. This include other animals near the cop. Cat / Skunks and wild dogs etcs

- Good education opportunity for kids. Support animals and provide food with rising costs due to govt forced shut down for a fake pandemic.
- As long as the animals are well cared for and not a nuisance they should be allowed, with reasonable limitations on numbers
- It would be great for family's to be able to ease some foods costs
- Not roosters!
- As long as animals and people are taken care of it is fine.
- I think everyone needs support animals no matter the animal
- if the correct and healthy living conditions are met why not? Why restrict hens? It seems rather elitist to say this person or that person can't have them when there is a monopoly on hens in the farming industry. Support for self sustainability should be a focus for the city.
- Support from adjacent neighbours may cause people to be unable to keep hens if the neighbours have a poor relationship
- Hens or therapeutical and offer a great source of food.
- If people have rescued farm animals or wildlife animals, they aren't going to be accustomed to living in the wild with their kind. We find stray farm animals for a reson.
- As long as they have neighbour support and will take care of said animal, I do not think it would be a problem.
- The goats do a great job with weeds and helps with it spreading so as long as it has a positive impact on the environment.
- Hens are no dirtier than a cat or dog and if they want to raise a hen for eggs or whatever who cares??
- Keeping hens would allow citizens to supplement food/income
- As long as the neighbours on in the chickens looked after them properly . Are they kept for producing eggs or slaughter .
- Animals protection and welfare
- As long as they are well taken care of, I see no issue.
- Helps with the impact of accessibility to a food source
- If the animals are well taken care of and are not hurting anyone else, there is no reason they shouldn't be allowed.
- Chickens should be allowed it's absurd that they aren't permitted
- As long as they're clean it would be a nice addition
- As long as it does not impact a neighbour or neighbourhood negatively. Having these kinds of animals can have educational benefits for children and families, provided they are well cared for, and the location is properly maintained to manage animal excrement and Calgary's seasons.
- Being able to have a few chickens on your property to provide fresh eggs or meat is a great idea. However again education is key and rules on the coop need to be put in place.
- As long as noise levels and odours are reasonable, and there is sufficient plans for enforcement
- I want a back yard donkey

- We are interested in having chickens as pets.
- I have always thought prohibiting livestock/farm animals was stupid.
- As long as they can show they are capable of care and the equipment to care for them.
- It needs to be on a case by case basis.
- If the animals can be housed with no negative effects to neighbours or the animals themselves, It should be allowed.
- Urban hens could provide a great boon to citizens of Calgary. However, this must be done respectfully of their neighbours.
- I'm from the Netherlands, where this has been legal for as long as I can remember. There have never been issues.
- Let people have their own little farm house
- I believe keeping small livestock in the city is positive as long as it is suitable
- Becoming more connected to nature is something we all need.
- I would have no problem with hens, as long as their coop is properly maintained and they are contained to the individuals property. I do not agree with any roosters within City limits
- The world belongs to nature and animals humans just think they own it.
- hens make good pets and offer resources at little to no disruption to others
- Dogs and cats are allowed so why not other animals.
- I think there should be a walk through of the property to assess whether having that type of livestock will have the care it needs and whether there will be unwanted issues for the neighbors due to the livestock
- If suitable living conditions are provided, neighbours consent is given and bylaw officers are competent in evaluating exceptions I think the amendment is acceptable.
- We live in a farming province, as long as conditions are proper I don't find I have the right to take away people's love for animals
- I would love to have hens, and believe its beneficial to families
- If they have the correct environment I don't see why not
- As long as the property is large enough and the neighbors are consulted for noise / allergies
- Hens, rabbits, and small game birds are a viable source of food, like small gardens.
- Not everyone is an acceptable pet/animal owner and should be held to higher standards of care
- I believe urban hens should be allowed within reason. They need to be properly cared for and housed
- If it's evaluated on case by case, same as any other animal.
- Hens and ducks can be good pets and a source of food. Small goats make great pets and help keep your yard trim.
- Backyard chickens can be beneficial to the individual and to the community
- there has to be a limit, say 2 hens, and there needs to be agreement from neighbors on all sides.
- As long as all conditions are met, why not?!
- Doesn't bother me

- Yes, urban farms are amazing
 - If neighbours are opposed they need to provide rationale beyond they just don't like it.
 - If it benefits the community and causes no issues then i agree.
 - If they can be kept cleanly and responsibly, why not?
 - As long as animals can be kept safe and healthy, at the same time, not being a constant nuisance to neighbors, then an individual should be allowed the chance to do so.
 - "Urban hens have worked in many other cities, reducing food scarcity and providing a source of protein.
- Its time for Calgary to do the same."
 - I support small, local livestock for sustainable living.
 - Any animal can be well kept
 - As long as the living conditions are safe and suitable and there is not excessive noise (ie no roosters)
 - As long as owners are responsible
 - I like the idea
 - I am all for different animals in households, as long as they are being cared for.
 - No issue with owning them but your direct neighbor should be informed.
 - I think if they are being looked after properly and the neighbours don't object there should be no issue. Even in some cases with neighborhood objections it could be allowed ie for support animals
 - Plenty of animals in town. I've no problem with livestock.
 - I think more people should be able to have chickens for fresh eggs
 - As long as the smell and noise level isn't offensive then why not.
 - Make people take a course on proper care first. People need to do better
 - Supported provided the above conditions would be met, and assuming an appeals process could be in place where a solid case is made but neighbours are against without reasonable cause.
 - there are people within the city who would make great hen guardians, but this would need to be monitored closely as hens are more complex than most people believe, and are more than just egg machines. heated winter living conditions would need to be made maditory.
 - Urban hens and livestock can provide both a food source and comfort to owners. As long as they are able to be cared for appropriately within city limits they should be allowed.
 - yes, only if people with urban farms have licences and support from authorities and neighbours.
 - There a number of animals that would be acceptable inside city limits as long as the above conditions are met.
 - Hens would be beneficial and quieter than my neighbours dogs
 - If the animal can be cared for properly, I don't see why not1

- I keep a hen outside of the city where I lease my horses. Would be more convenient to keep her home instead.
- Would be great for sustainability and local food production.
- Nothing wrong with natural farming
- People who want chicken should be allowed to have them as long as they are registered and random quality checks are done because people don't look into the health concerns with housing chicken.
- Strict rules required.
- I believe it's a good idea to allow families to have low cost, healthy, sustainable, renewable food source as long as the animals are being well taken care of and proper licensing is enforced.
- I think it would make our city a bit unique and allow for citizens to experience something here they can't in other places.
- Allows income for Calgarians by potentially selling the eggs, and healthier people from home raised eggs.
- if people have the space and proper living conditions, they should be allowed to do what they want on their property as long as it's within reason and responsible.
- We have chickens and are low income. It insures we can always have a healthy meal.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and monitoring is in place for wellbeing
- As long as urban roosters don't become a thing because of noise I think a small amount of agriculture within the city would be a benefit to people and great learning for kids
- A few chickens should be allowed
- There are lots of type of animals that can live in thr city as long as they have suitable living arrangements
- As long as they take proper care of the animals, and have adequate space, people should be allowed to choose what 'pets' they have.
- Hens are pretty docile creatures and should not be a problem
- We should start acting more like a community and supporting our neighbors. If the animals are well taken care of and we could all benefit from it, why not?
- Allowing Calgarians to own chickens would be beneficial for local economies and allow diversification!
- hens are honestly lovely. But maybe put a maximum of 3.
- I fully support urban hens.
- Why not. It couldn't hurt if everyone in the vicinity of the hens is on board. Very progressive and forward thinking
- Chickens are great pets and for companionship Also, eggs! Please no roosters allowed.
- I would also like to add Goats to that.
- If its their property or they have permission from landlord then they should be allowed. Private property means exactly that.
- I would love to be able to have a couple chicken and enjoy fresh eggs

- people should be allowed to own what they want provided they are keeping the animals and people around them safe and secure.
- Livestock within the city can help those of lesser income be able to maintain a livelihood. Certain limitations should be taken, i.e a limit of coops, and/or livestock within a property. Depending on property size will also depend on occupancy
- It is no more bothersome than pets in a yard
- I would love to have livestock at my urban home
- Yes for chickens. No for anything bigger that people wouldn't bring inside during cold months
- Why spend time and resources on something that has never been a major issue in calgary?
- Case by case basis is most important. Need to be careful with people who have no idea of basic animal husbandry who would feel it would be "cute" to have livestock as a pet, and ultimately the animal suffers. Home inspections at initial license, and also periodically to ensure adequate husbandry is necessary.
- Only if neighbours were consulted and agreed to hens
- As long as proper living conditions are provided small livestock i.e. goats, pigs, chickens should be allowed.
- I do not see hens, ducks etc as a problem in the city of calgary
- Responsible, licensed pet ownership should be encouraged. Love of animals and sharing space with them is natural and should be encouraged. It gives humans better respect for other creatures and encourages conservation-positive attitudes towards other forms of life.
- Remove support from neighbours. People don't need permission for a dog even if it barks a lot - we have methods to deal with that. We can have methods to deal with smell and noise similar to existing permitted animals.
- It would be good for people to learn where their food comes from
- I have no issue in case by case basis. I think on zero lot lines could be an issue for neighbors if there is noise
- ONLY if it doesn't cause any disturbances and if neighbours have the opportunity to confidentially provide there input if the animal(s) are causing issues (noise, smell.... etc). People won't give there honest opinion if they are asked by the owner or bylaw officers. People are to afraid of causing a ruckus or drama, so they lie.
- I support this so long as the criteria above is enforced through an application process.
- Love the idea of people being allowed chickens and livestock with approval from neighbours and enviroment enforcing
- Hens yes, I see nothing wrong with a few chickens provided they have shelter and heating in the winter
- You let people keep pigeons but not chickens?
- We need to start acting more like a community and actually supporting our neighbors. If we could all benefit from it, and the animal is well taken care of, why not?

- Settings can be tight and can be locked on leashes are many standards that reflect it having a hen is no more devastating than having a potbelly pig or a dog or a cat. Owner is responsible for keeping the hand clean and healthy
- Yes I think it is important for people to have chickens, it helps with landfill waste as chickens eat a lot of compost scraps. It helps people feed their families too!
- As long as the animal is being cared for properly and they have proper space to roam and graze
- I think Urban hens are acceptable
- Keeping hens in the city would be greatly as long as there were laws in place to protect the animals; limiting the amount of birds one could safely keep, establishing the rules for their habitat, etc.
- This would promote healthy habits.
- On the condition that all neighbours in a reasonable distance must agree to allow not just those immediately beside the residence. Approval should be revoked if multiple complaints.
- Having hens is a great idea
- It should be only animals that are quiet, and should not include animals that need a lot of space to run for a satisfying life.
- Minimal government restrictions. In fact, the city should expand the list of animals allowed along with defined conditions.
- People should be able to supply thier own food
- Helpful but pointless
- Families having hen's can be beneficial, and wouldn't be anymore louder or annoying as dogs that bark.
- Depends on the livestock and numbers should be capped per household regarding livestock.
- Good for sustainable eating
- Fresh, local eggs are wonderful and hard to come by.
- Owning hens would be another step closer to households becoming more self sustaining. That is a win in my books
- Required training for hen owners regarding proper animal care and community/neighbourhood standards in relation to keeping the hen
- there needs to be strict laws insuring the safety and care of these animals. You cannot allow them to be treated as horribly as they are on a farm
- Any complaints of negligence or impact on neighbors investigated immediately
- I think this is a wonderful idea and a great way to provide eggs for ones family etc.
- However, not requiring neighbour support as this unfair to those with uncooperative neighbours...should not hold sway over rights that other citizens can enjoy.
- I think pets such as goats could be a benefit to weed control. Rooster are not appropriate in the city however.
- I think this is a great idea
- "Laying hens should be allowed. Rosters should not.

- So many live stock animals are beneficial. Its situational depending on providing the right living conditions for the animal. Neighbor support should be required as well."
- The description above wasn't very specific but I believe that if the animal is being taken care of properly and each case is being worked out individually it could be a possibility.
- Why not allow people to have chickens etc, they do everywhere else. We are behind
- sustainable food, better conditions for the hens supplying food for a family.
- I am on board with this so long as there is a "trial period" after approval by community members/neighbours, and that ultimately the approval for livestock can be revoked if the neighbours file complaints and agree that the livestock has become an issue since prior approval, with proper evidence provided before a hearing/tribunal, etc.
- I would not mind my neighbors having hens
- So long as appropriate health, welfare, and care standards are being met for the animals I would support this.
- I am fine with these propositions, as long as there would be licensing, or investigation into complaints from neighbours for noise etc. Possibly no roosters allowed.
- I support urban hens/ livestock based on the criteria listed above.
- Animals like chickens dont need much room just adequate shelter. However the actual needs of the animal need to be considered. For example goats probably dont belong in a small backyard.
- Hens can teach kids the value of healthy food and how to care for animals. Get them out of the house.
- I just. really like animals and seeing them in the city makes me, personally, happy
- Chicks are better than children.
- It provides legal opportunity. People will do this regardless illegally.
- I've previously owned 12 hens in a different province. They helped with bugs and were a great pet to have. I do think a no rooster law should be added as they most likely will be aggressive and loud. Hens should be kept to under 6 for inter city properties
- It would support local
- A maximum number of hens should be set. They are beneficial to keeping pests populations down.
- Things like backyard chickens help sustainability and are environmentally friendly.
- Any measure that takes an animal out of a factory farm situation is a positive one.
- Animals can and will become accustomed too there surroundings and if adequate Food, shelter and mental health is available there should be no problem
- Livestock kept responsibly is an excellent addition to any community.
- Livestock can be beneficial and if it does not impact others there is no reason not too.
- As long as these animals are not a nuisance and are kept in a suitable, clean environment...I see no problem with it.
- Would support up to 4 hens as pets and egg layers. Concerned about rooster crowing before 6am in the summer.

- I think allowing small livestock to be kept on city property is a great idea & no different than keeping a vegetable garden.
- I would, however this runs in to the problem of noise. If my dog can't bark, but a rooster can crow (can't train a rooster or collar it like a dog), that feels unfair.
- It is none of your business if someone wants to become more self sufficient for food or if they want companionship from a non-conventional pet. The municipal government needs to learn it's place and show more respect for freedom for responsible people.
- We as humans should be able to raise our own animals of any sort for food or for mental health given we pay outstanding amounts for properties as is.
- hens are an excellent sustainable choice! And goats are a natural weed solution that it not harmful to other animals (like fertilizer is)
- There would need to be strict regulation to encourage responsible ownership
- As long as the animals are being properly cared for I'm ok with it
- As long as suitable, well-kept conditions are provided hens are a positive addition to the neighborhood.
- Other jurisdictions have allowed these type of conditions, and it appears you have taken the consideration/support of the neighbors into account before approval. If properly taken care of, hens and other livestock can be no different a pet than dogs or cats.
- As long as the property is suitable for the animal, and the owner has the meNs to take care of it.
- People should be able to have any pet they want within reason and as long as the pet isn't a nuisance to the neighbourhood then why shouldn't the owner enjoy their pet.
- Hens are able to provide even just a little bit of food for the community, which everyone deserves to eat
- Xx
- As long as it's done respectfully and the animals are not a nuisance to other neighbors I would support this.
- As long as there is a limit to the number of hens per household
- Backyard hens and other livestock can be an excellent addition as long as the program is correctly researched and enacted.
- I think we should be able to have chickens within city limits, as long is they do not cause issues for neighbours or those who wish not to have chickens.
- This is no different than having pets, as far as I'm concerned.
- I have no problem with hens and other potential livestock in the city as long as they are well cared for.
- Chickens are great.
- Chickens are a great support to the community! And making sure that they are given proper living conditions is beneficial.
- This is acceptable provided there is a limit to numbers of livestock and the noise level that may result in them being housed in an urban setting

- I don;t think you need your neighbour to agree. Some people in the city are really hard to live beside. They are just violent, mean and not worth engaging with.
- Allowing people to provide for their own food security, i think is very important.
- As long as neighbours are supportive and aware, and the animal is looked after appropriately, owning a hen is beneficial for education and providing food.
- Limits on numbers of livestock must be in place.
- If someone can properly care for that animal? Sure.
- If people are allowed to have a dog on their property then it would make sense to allow chickens and other livestock.
- It's worked other places in the world so why not here.
- I think more people should have access to learning the care of livestock.
- I think it's a good thing
- There are few places in different cities around the world with small urban farms but with limits of how many animals.
- In areas of Calgary with very large lots and distant neighbours there is no reason someone shouldn't have hens... but in areas with small yards and urban density backyard hens are not appropriate as they would not have good living conditions.
- As long as living conditions are suitable
- I would love to have hens
- I think hens should be allowed as long as they are provided with proper living conditions and there are no issues with neighbors in regards to smell.
- As long as it is not a nuisance to me or smells like farm in my yard I don't mind my neighbours having livestock.
- As long as the animal is domesticated and provided a good home there should be no reason to take it away.
- As long as it is done properly and the neighbours approve, then it only makes sense.
- Chickens are safe pitbulls are not
- Receiving approval from adjacent neighbours is essential, and NO ROOSTERS for heavens sake.
- Creating sustainable food sources through urban livestock is a great idea that has worked for other municipalities.
- I see no issues with livestock animals provided they do not cause issues regarding noise or smell.
- Urban hens would be a very sustainable and positive step forward
- But not for food.
- Within reason this is beneficial. Grandfather clauses would need to be included so that a new neighbor could not cause a previously approved animal to be disallowed. Home buyers should be told as part of disclosure.
- The government should have less control over what happens on private property
- Why not. If there are suitable living conditions and everyone is fine with it.

- As long as they are just used for eggs. I don't want to see chickens getting their heads snapped off. Repulsive.
- I like fresh eggs
- Although I think agricultural animals like chickens should be allowed, the size of the average Calgary yard is tiny and barely provides enough room for a dog or cat let alone an agricultural animal larger than a chicken. Furthermore, if a neighbourhood had a high concentration of agricultural animals the actual capacity/animal would be too small leading to a crowding issue that would never be allowed on an Alberta farm.
- Hobby farms and self sustainable living should be an option for all
- Health and welfare of the animal is important as is neighbour support
- If the animals are being cared for properly then why not?
- Hens seem harmless. People should have their own eggs.
- It's important to have parameters around this because there are always some who will attempt to push for more and more. The criteria outlined above are good
- I don't see a reason why not.
- As long as animals were properly cared for.
- We need to move towards sustainable urban farming
- I don't think it's a bad thing to have chickens as long as you're being responsible
- Urban gardening and farming is one of the pillars of a healthy city - the access to locally grown food eases poverty and supports the environment.
- Livestock within the city is fine as long as the animals are being properly cared for
- Other than support from adjacent neighbours. It should either be legal or not. Asking your neighbours for permission is ridiculous.
- If owners follow the bylaws they shall have right to practice to limited version raising their own organic hens
- People should be allowed to have an amount that is relative to the size of their property.
- I support it
- It's ok as long as there are clear guidelines for noise and cleanliness
- Everyone should be able to own a pet as long as they can care for it properly and have the right environment for it. A pet is a family member and to deny someone that isn't right in my opinion
- If someone wants to have a few chickens they should be able to
- why not let people keep hens if they are doing the best by the animals and the law.
- I have no issues provided the animals are properly cared for.
- People should be able to keep hens
- If cared for correctly and it is not a disruption to a neighbour people should be allowed hens
- Hens
- Why not as long as we don't end up with people that hoard livestock and is used for family and friends (eg.eggs) then I would support it.
- Many animals (goats) can be quite helpful (keeping park grass short and weeded)

- As long as standards are met, and neighbors agree
- Backyard chickens will reduce the amount of organic waste placed in the green bins and it allows people to raise their own organic food source if they do choose.
- If one have the space and proper hen house it should be allowed
- Support animals are not limited to domestic animals.
- Let us have livestock for personal use such as chickens for eggs. A cow for milk? It would be weird for me for someone to raise and animal for eating though if they were allowed to slaughter them in their open back yard. For animals to be slaughtered for eating they must have an enclosed slaughter area that has water access/drainage to sewer for cleaning. Have a minimum yard size for larger animals. If someone has a tiny yard with no pasture than limit to one or two chickens.
- There would need to be a check-in process to ensure cleanliness and allow neighbors complaints to be handled quickly, but I support this measure.
- As long as there is support from neighbours and hens are well cared for I would support this
- If dogs and cats are allowed so should other animals
- Please take neighbours into account. It was not done for legalizing pot and now there are days when I can't have my windows open because I find the smell offensive.
- I would love to see backyard chickens. I think most people are responsible and this allows us to have a bit of self sufficiency and an ability to provide another affordable source of food.
- Neglected care of livestock brings terrible smell making neighbours (and the livestock) suffer.
- People should be able to have access to eggs on their property if they have the space.
- Urban hens will improve local food supplies
- Raising chickens in an urban setting is a great way to teach and learn
- There would need to be a class on proper rearing
- There should be a limit to how many livestock and they have a specific purpose whether they are a pet or have some other purpose like providing eggs for the family.
- Why not?
- Again common sense
- As long as they are clean.
- I don't mind chickens.
- If my neighbours wanted hens, why not? They can make wonderful pets. As long as they have my support then I'm fine with it.
- As long as their are strict guidelines around quality of life for the animals and restrictions on living conditions. The animals should also be licensed.
- I have seen responsible owners with house chickens and small pigs. They have benefitted the community
- I think chickens can make lovely pets!
- Chickens are amazing! Let us be somewhat self sufficient!
- Hens are not loud, not only can they provide food but they hep keep away bugs

- This is a healthy life style choice and if it is well organized could increase the life style level of many communities
- If someone wants to raise a hen on their property it doesn't affect mw
- Responsible ownership will benefit the community
- If the hens didn't cause disturbance or danger to surrounding neighbours it should be allowed.
- I've yet to see a typical "Farm" animal owned by a hobby farmer or animal enthusiast living in anywhere near as poor of conditions as mainstream farm standards. Definitely need to ensure that they're treated as what they are though, a 700lb sow can pose a significant threat on a good day with a careful owner, much less a bad day with an irresponsible one.
- CITY SLICKER CHICKENS HECK YEA
- Na
- If done properly its a great idea and helpful to families but point number one should be removed.
- I was unaware of urban hens existing in the city and support the criteria given that these livestock are communal and respected
- As long as there was a limit on the number of hens a homeowner was allowed. Hens can be noisy and smelly.
- As long as it's kept clean and quiet- neighbors should have a say
- Urban Chicken keeping has become extremely popular and is allowed in many bedroom communities surrounding the Calgary area. However, I do believe that this should be regulated in some form. I think that people wanting to have Urban chickens should be required to purchase licences to cover some of the costs incurred by the city.
- As long as the animal has adequate living arrangements and is properly cared for. It must also be for the well being of the animal.
- Livestock as in farm animals
- As long as the birds in question are not causing any distress to the neighbours I don't see a problem with having Urban hens.
- As long as people are okay with it why not. It is cow town after all.
- Home grown eggs and chickens are ok if the surrounding 5 homes on all 4 sides of the proposed application are ok with the coop
- Urban chickens have been successful elsewhere.
- As long as it's not bothersome to others why would it be an issue?
- Having pair of hens for Laying eggs should allow big help for the community to have additional source of daily egg on the table
- Responsible pet owners and true animal activists adapt and can manage well these situations.
- In this day and age, people should be allowed to become more self sustaining, providing eggs for their families would be incredibly helpful in feeding people who may not have some luxuries.
- I believe that they can be properly housed and maintained in the city without offence to neighbours when done properly.
- As long as they are limited to 2 per household

- "I encourage the keeping of other livestock with the approval of surrounding people (with reasonable objections) as long as there are standards for the keeping of said livestock.
- I don't see an area on this page regarding breed specific rules for dogs. I am strongly against all breed specific laws or regulations. If there is believed to be an issue then insist on training for such animals and their owners although I'm not sold on that either as there are many possibilities for variance."
- I don't think it should necessarily have community benefit. Unless the community would be willing to contribute to the care and upkeep of the livestock
- I think there would be a lot of benefits to this, including lowering food costs.
- Small food producing animals are essential to some to eat!
- As long as the animal is safe, healthy, well cared for, and has the proper living space I think it's fine with in reason. Some animals should not live in the city but that's because of the lack of required space ie. horse or cow. I think it should also have to be something your neighbours should be ok with. Fresh eggs are good, with that said if you want to have a bunch of live stock no it's the city, move to a farm. It's better for the animals to be in more open space and away from the toxic fumes of the city.
- I think if the circumstances offer the possibility for a safe, healthy and nurturing environment for the livestock and fellow Calgarians then they should be able to raise certain animals. I would however recommend making some kind of rule or law that there be animal welfare checks made 1-2x a year for anyone who has registered with a livestock program or have registered livestock animals to protect both animals and citizens.
- Hens make great pets and provide eggs! They do not disturb other people. I would limit it to two hens per family though.
- as long as not a nuisance to others why not
- An animal that offers emotional or physical benefit to owners and can be provided suitable living conditions should not be restricted. Again, owner takes full responsibility of their pet.
- It would have positive impact on the community and would be a great success
- Calgary and surrounding area has many larger residential areas and houses that could be more than suited for livestock such as hens, I do feel that there should be some sort of like inspection or something to make sure that the animals have space and won't be neglected etc. But as long as it's done properly I don't see a problem with it!
- As long as the animals are cared for properly and aren't bugging anybody else I think it's fine
- Yes, urban hens is a fantastic idea which would provide countless benefits to the families involved. Locally sourced food is a huge factor for reducing ones carbon footprint, for starters.
- People should be allowed to raise hens as long as the practice acceptable poultry husbandry
- Well cared for chickens can provide many benefits to a family.
- If the animals can be properly cared for they should be allowed.

- More animal diversity, especially for agricultural purposes in the city is a good thing
- Livestock can provide food and grazing to citizens.
- As long as the backyards are kept clean and there aren't a huge amount of chickens running around making noise, etc it should be ok
- Food security and engagement with the food cycle is crucial. I am so grateful for this proposed change
- As long as they are being properly taken care of I do not see a problem
- As long as these are suitable conditions. I don't agree having a horse living in my backyard unless I have an acreage.
- I think that if a family owns a rooster, they should give up their right to operate a gas-powered lawnmower or leaf/snow-blower. (trade in right to use noisy equipment for right to own rooster).
- If proper rules for the betterment of the animals and community health, this could be great. My biggest concern is the rules broken or ignored.
- "Suitable living
- This also lowers environmental"
- I think backyard chickens are beneficial and would keep pest control down as an alternative to chemical treatment.
- no roosters and we're good
- I don't mind urban livestock in the community as long as they are well taken care of and don't become a nuisance.
- Backyard hens are a great way to get fresh eggs! Fantastic idea!
- We should be able to have hens and other animals of cared for properly!
- Only if it did not affect the lives of neighbours (as stated above, must be supported by people living adjacent). I don't think having chickens in an apartment is proper, but if you have adequate space it could be ok.
- Any legislation that allows Calgarians to be more self sufficient in their food is a good thing, I think.
- Helps support families.
- Hens can be a valuable resource for healthy food and could be rewarding for Calgary families (teaching responsibility to children, and bonding with them as pets)
- I think it's natural for people to have livestock. It would help citizens to provide for themselves.
- I don't see these animals being anymore problematic than people keeping domestic pets.
- I think people should be allowed to own hens and other livestock if the animals are cared for, I don't see a problem with it.
- I think everyone should have the option to own chickens if they want to and do not get to love rural. They are wonderful pets.
- I support house chickens. They are bring value to a family life.
- When tended to properly they are of use and can help with good costs for some
- If everyone that will be affected is involved and supports the presence of the animals then let it happen. Why should someone who is not involved or impacted be able to stop it?

- People should have the right to raise their own food, provided they can be cared for humanely, and that noise or pollution isn't an issue for neighbours.
- As long as there are some forms of noise control or bylaw.
- Go hens! Yay!
- The idea of producing food has benefits on so many levels better understanding of the food we eat, a relationship with animals that we don't normally have, support for income management with self-produced food, non-chemical pest management for other crops and best of all education for citizens of all ages and stages
- Yes, because factory farming is often very cruel and Not environmentally responsible. But there needs to be regulations and Check-ins so that animals are safe and healthy.
- As long as noise isn't crazy and the proper care of the animal is met, I have no problem and see no issue with this.
- This would be a phenomenal way to promote local food development and sustainable living (raising your own chicken for eggs, for example).
- If the animals are being treated humanly and they have sufficient living space.
- If it's good for the environment, why not?
- People and animals are a natural pairing. There is no real reason why people can't have chickens. Or other animals. My neighbour has no animals but makes noise all day. We can all live together and relearn to be respectful of each other. And by respect, I don't mean to be quiet as to not disturb other people, I mean to respect each other's way of life and chose not to be bothered by the noise of people living a happy life.
- Hens are not a detriment to the city therefore shouldn't be banned
- Chickens good. Roosters bad.
- I want a duck
- I see no harm in allowing these animals provided they are well cared for by responsible, considerate, competent owners.
- Something as small and harmless as hens would be a fun addition to city living
- Yes as hens are a source of food and could help low income family's
- I want a chicken myself.
- I think it's important that we start looking at feasible ways to urban farm.
- It is okay as long as these conditions are met to ensure the neighbour's are not bothered and the animals are safe. However, I have concerns as typically a rooster is kept with hens for their protection, and roosters are loud.
- You are allowed hens in BC and it has been a great addition to many city/town people's lives by providing eggs and other by-product of hens
- Community food is healthier, cheaper, and more sustainable if done properly. Less gas, packaging, animal abuse, the carbon outputs would greatly reduce.
- If the hens are kept in suitable living conditions and do not disturb the neighbors, I don't see any issue.
- I think this could also help with supporting sustainable and local food options (eggs)

- As long as they are taken care of and cleaned up after.
- I think exploring urban farming would be beneficial to the city and its culture, and will help people learn more diverse skill sets.
- As long as they aren't loud and disruptive and they help the community out/ keep them safe why not do it?
- I think it is a great way to teach children about where our food comes from
- Chicken lady lives in my neighbourhood. We have way bigger concerns than her chickens.
- "There should be limitations set in place so that animals and people can live in peace.
- Example - 2 horses in a inner city backyard"
- As long as the owner is responsible and cares for the animals and community properly, this is fantastic.
- If someone wants a chicken let them have a chicken
- As it is healthy and the animals are safe and happy
- Urban chickens are an amazing benefit to communities and neighbors, and contribute to self sufficiency of households
- As long as the animals housing and food etc (quality of life) is regulated and neighbors/ neighborhoods are considered then it's fine
- Hens and any other animal that can benefit a community and be properly housed and cared for and agreed upon by all neighbours, should absolutely be allowed!
- Animals must be kept safe, contained and well cared for. No objectionable noises or odors are permitted. All adjacent neighbors and others that could be directly impacted agree to animals presence.
- I think it is well thought out although I am terrified of birds and chickens, I think it urban hens will have a positive impact on the community
- I mean if people have the room and money to keep it going, Why not?
- We should always be allowed to have and grow our own food as long as there is sufficient space to do so
- I think it can be fun and beneficial if done responsibly.
- I think it's a good idea
- depending on the livestock. I would not support roosters, farm pigs, cattle, or horses
- I think that the raising of chickens and other livestock can be a source of pride for a family or community, an educational experience for children - and of course, a source of delicious eggs and other scrumptious animal products. I think it might also encourage people to garden more, and to allow their yards to become habitats for indigenous plant species instead of just grass.
- There is no harm in exploring the idea and testing feasibility.
- as long as the welfare of the animals are forefront, I have no issues with any animals.
- I am/have never been/am not looking to own any livestock. I do not feel qualified to make an in depth decision, but feel whichever option is the best outcome for the livestock is appropriate.

- Only chickens should be allowed at this time and a special license or permit should be required. I do not see what other livestock would be suitable living in an urban setting at this time.
- As long as an animal has sufficient living conditions and not a nuisance to neighbours, I don't see why it would be different from owning any other "domestic" animal.
- I would say as long as suitable living conditions are provided and people approve, I don't see why there can't be hens hanging around.
- in support granted that both the welfare of the animals and the cleanliness of the enclosures are maintained and not a disturbance to the neighborhood.
- N/a
- Just awesome!!! Why not?!
- I support all options to help produce sustainable and affordable food
- Bugythere should be strict rules for it for the people that are not responsible with their hens. It will already be hard to regulate and chicken manure produces bad smells ammonia when not removed regularly.
- I would love a hen but there should be a restriction on how many
- I don't think keeping certain smaller livestock should be illegal as they pose no threat to the land or community (ex. Chickens)
- As long as the livestock animals are not causing a disturbance to neighbors and animal waste is kept clean, I don't oppose people owning hens and possibly other livestock.
- Support from neighbours is the most important thing, as chickens and other urban livestock can be problematic for many.
- I believe that people in Calgary should be allowed to own specified livestock as long as it doesn't hinder the natural and peaceful living of their neighbors. For example, I find that it would be unreasonable to expect an individual to own animals in which smell of animals is pungent within the city and having a negative affect on the lives of those that live around them. Noise levels of particular live stock would also need to be addressed. It should not be suitable for a rooster to start making lots of noise at 5AM which would disturb the peace of surrounding neighbors. Just like a dog is not allowed to be barking all day and night.
- Fresh eggs
- As long as they have a space and needs for livestock.
- Commercial eggs are known to carry disease from mishandling in factories. Responsible urban keeping reduces this factor and is a more sustainable practice for urban dwellers. I do think there should be a limitation on how many hens are allowed, and there should be regulatory inspections and fines for hen welfare.
- As long as neighbours aren't affected give it a shot!
- As long as the neighbours approve And standards for health and cleanliness are maintained I have no objections.
- I think 3-9 hens is reasonable, with lot size and animal welfare taken into account
- If they help and are not causing an issue to anyone what's the problem
- As long as approvals go through the proper terminals and processes

- Yay chickens! Fresh eggs!
- Encourages biodiversity, healthy living alternatives in urban farming
- Chickens is a great way to produce your own food (eg: eggs) and to teach children a responsibility most city folks don't receive
- Support from adjacent neighbours....people move, so this does not make sense. May support case by case!
- I agree that citizens should be able to own livestock however I do not agree that you must get permission from neighbours to enjoy private property.
- I think starting with hens to see how that goes could provide further insight into other livestock.
- I don't think you should need neighbours approval for something on your property
- Neighbors should not get a say otherwise I would support this
- It is fine. Does not need amendment
- Everyone has the right to own livestock as long as it is within their property, has adequate living standards, and is not a disturbance to the community.
- City should not have authority over people who choose to raise livestock in their own property. If they are responsible and keep things clean and quiet they should be able to do as they wish on their own property.
- Livestock such as goats, chickens, and pigs are wonderful animals provided their needs are attended to and I support this change with one small caveat. I would suggest that the community benefit be removed. Personal benefit whether physical or emotional, in conjunction with the other criteria, should be enough to allow for livestock.
- "Support from adjacent neighbours unnecessary, if living conditions are suitable for the hens and noise control is possible.
- Requiring adjacent neighbour support could leading to prejudice and bullying from neighbours who may not favour the resident"
- Puts onus on the neighbors to be the bad guys and say no I don't want to live next to a small farm with smelly and/or noisy animals is unfair. Set standards of distance to next residences, allow neighbors to voice concerns and consider. And follow up with inspections and with the neighbors after a reasonable period of time.
- I don't think it is fair for your neighbours to have a say in what you put in your yard. As long as it wasn't affecting them, it's not their place.
- "I don't think the hen needs to benefit the community. It can just benefit the owner and that should be fine.
- I don't the neighbours should have a say as long as there is suitable living conditions for the animal."
- Support urban hens but I would have concerns about what is meant by other livestock.
- Less input from adjacent neighbors. There is too much "not in my backyard". If the property or housing for the proposed livestock is insufficient, the city's assessment will reflect this during the case by case evaluation.
- Chickens are cool [removed]
- I do not believe that adjacent neighbours should have input.

- Anyone should have the right to have hens if they can prove they have suitable living conditions for the hens needs. Neighbours may not always agree & often times those who don't simply don't like that other person or are intoxicated & incapable of socially acceptable human interactions, or other reasons certain people don't get along. One person should not have their right taken away simply because the person next door doesn't like them! Hens in residential setting may not always serve the community but rather the resident to which they live ... why would owning hens require it to serve the entire community a benefit?? If hens are raised in a sustainable manner, they actually reduce waste & aid that owners efforts to live in a more sustainable fashion ... again the manner in which the hens are to be living/raised should be the only consideration!
- I don't think neighbors should be Able to veto you have a hen on your property. I fully support looking at more sustainable living by caring for hens rather than buying eggs that need to be shipped and packaged and evaluated. Hens should be allowed.
- Ensuring that animals are well cared for is important and I do agree that cases should be assessed individually. However, Calgary has a large population of people who would pull the "Not In My Back Yard" arrogant attitude, and thats not fair to everyone else. I think neighbors should have an opportunity to give the city feedback when someone seeks a permit for livestock, and that feedback should be considered, but I don't think neighbors should be able to fully veto it unless they have very valid concerns, like evidence of mistreatment of animals or something.
- What exactly is "offers community benefit"? Look after the needs of the animal period, standardize/provide adequate housing, forget about getting consent from what be ignorant/contrary neighbours.
- Assume that someone is providing correct living conditions, as you would with any other pet they might get. Support urban livestock without any ridiculous hoops to jump through.
- if people want chickens or other livestock and they are kept healthy and happy why should you have a say at all? Overstepping per usual.
- Size of yard should be discussed as well.
- What is done on private property is the business of the property owner. If things such as noise or waste complaints from neighbours are an issue, by law already has a foot to stand on and can look into loud animals in this case. But if someone wants to care for an animal it is their responsibility and not anyone else's, and therefore should not be required to get permission (support) from others who will not be taking responsibility for the issue at hand.
- As long as the hens are not posing a nuisance or threat to neighbours and are being properly cared for let people have them.
- I dont feel personal hens should have to help or impact the community, their should be a 4 -6 hen limit similar to that of other cities also neighbors should not be able to have say what is happening in your yard, if I needed neighbors approval they would say no, they already come over and yell over my fence if my kids are using the backyard or if we use the bbq he will yell about the smell.
- I don't think neighbors should have to agree on this. If you can have a pack of screaming children then I can have a chicken. Other than that I support keeping livestock 100%.

- I believe if the animals are healthy and safe the neighbors should get no say in what you have in your fence. Some people unfortunately want to make other people miserable and would outright deny any animals on their neighbors property.
- As long as the animals kept responsibly, it is no different than owning any other domestic animal.
- "The choice to own animals on your property should be in full responsibility of the owning party. I do not see why they should get support from adjacent neighbours unless all the parties are in agreement. I would not want to move into a new neighbourhood only to be saddled with supporting my neighbour's private choices.

- I don't see a requirement for it to be a community benefit, just as long as it is not a community hindrance.

- Suitable living conditions for the animal and case by case exception evaluations are agreeable terms for someone to own livestock/pets."
- Only if it's hens. You don't have a list of what other livestock would be allowed in the city.
- I like the idea but am tired of our law enforcement deciding what happens
- As long as the animal has all it needs, it should be no one else's business.
- neighbour's should have ZERO say in the animals you can keep so long as you have a proper space for them
- Should be allowed to have what you wanted on your property so long as the animal is taken care of. sometime neighbors will do and say whatever cause they don't like you
- I would like more neighborhood support.
- I shouldn't have to have my neighbours support to own a chicken
- Calgary is behind the times. You should not need neighbour support for your own property if the owner is abiding by the bylaws. If the neighbour is continuously complaining about smell, it should be looked into. It does not mean it is a worthy complaint. Some people don't have good neighbours. The other amendments I would agree with.
- We have all the rights to have animals and live off the land.
- Less govt rules mind your own [removed] business.
- Animals can be loud, and it's difficult to have a chicken or goat learn to be quiet. I'd recommend a special permit system, where the property is large enough to ensure noise from the animals does not impact others in the neighbourhood.
- Livestock can have an individual benefit but community benefit should not be required
- I should not require the approval of my neighbors to do something in my yard that complies with city bylaws. Too many poor neighbor relationships that are created out of spite

- It would be nice to know if your neighbours have hens in their yard but as long as they are looked after and not causing issues to the direct neighbours, there is not a need for them to seek community benefit.
- I own my land. I can do whatever I want. I do not need permission from ANYONE to do what i See fit on MY land.
- I don't like the idea of exceptions at the discretion of chief bylaw officer. It either yes or no and if complaints are received then officer can go by
- I support suitable living conditions for the animal, but not the other 3. Who determines community benefit? What if a neighbour withdraws support; how to determine if a neighbour's reason to not support is "valid"?
- Agree with most of it but it shouldn't require support from neighbours.
- If neighbours can have hens then neighbour should be able to have a cow or horse. They are both farm animals.
- do not agree with requiring support form neighbors and discretion of CBO. Animals should be permitted provided they meet certain care/condition requirements. Allowing neighbors to have a say is an unnecessary infringement on personal property rights, and allows neighbor disputes to "weaponize" bylaw against each other. Discretion on a case by case basis complicates process and is needlessly complicated than writing approved animals into a bylaw
- Puts the pressure on the neighbours to say yes or no. Makes it awkward.
- Should not be at the discretion of bylaw officers.
- No bylaw necessary
- Living by chickens even if they are not roosters can still be loud, having lived by some. If the bylaw is put in place there should be a minimum required distance from any residence other than the homeowners.
- livestock should be permitted only on larger properties that are a certain distance away from any other properties
- There may be an overall negative perspective for some that urban areas should not have hens. I think it's unreasonable to have to gather support from adjacent neighbours.
- It would depend on what livestock, smaller animals would be okay as long as they have space to live comfortably
- People should be allowed to have livestock in limited numbers.
- I support everything except the support from adjacent neighbours. Responsible pet ownership should apply. As long as what you are doing is legal on your own land, neighbours have no business intruding.
- I think a person shouldn't have to have their neighbors approval for what they have on their land and I don't think it needs to benefit the community as that will hurt people who have livestock to feed their families.
- people should be able to have chickens without a law in place other that proper care
- I don't see why there shouldn't be any urban hens if properly kept
- I dont see a problem with livestock in the city so long as they are managed responsibly

- I believe people should be able to raise their own food, humanely and with proper resources.
- Bylaw to include waterfowl (ducks/geese) in limited quantity.
- Let's be progressive and get on board with urban hens and dangerous dog legislation - breed specific legislation is a load of BS.
- Depending on noise or smell. There would definitely have to be input from neighbors prior to allowance
- I see no downsides to this amendment.
- It should be mandatory for all owners for animals of any kind have to be properly taken care of
- I would like to have hens in my yard.
- yes BUT - owners should register prior to owning and a program should be in place to educate owners on public health risks (zoonosis, etc) as well as welfare requirements for keeping hens
- Provided that strict enclosure and cleaning protocols are in place. Chickens only.
- So long as the above criteria is followed, it seems reasonable.
- If they are kept responsibly: clean, low numbers, well cared for for personal use, Fine. Adjacent impacted people must have input.
- As long as the resident cares for their animals properly, humanely and the animals are not being neglected or left in poor living conditions.
- The right person/group and right environment demonstrating capability to be safe should be allowed to have any type of animal.
- With the criteria, it would be feasible and not create problems.
- Would support as long as there is a limit to the quantity of animals and that it is for personal purposes only (i.e. not a business)
- love hens
- Urban hens (in moderation) are not a hazard to a community.
- Yum eggs!
- If you allow hens and other livestock pit pulls should not be muzzled.
- I would especially like to see the ability to have 1-2 hens as well as see more urban beekeeping.
- As long as the animals are happy, why not?
- I think people would become more connected to the land and where their food comes from if they were allowed to keep livestock
- as long as animal are properly cleaned up after and cared for.
- I want go have a few chickens for eggs.
- I agree
- Inclusivity.
- I don't necessarily believe that the neighbours' support is necessary unless it's a potentially dangerous or especially disruptive animal. If it doesn't go wandering out of their yard or threatening safety, then why should they mind?
- I love my pet chickens!
- If done properly this can improve quality of life for calgarians

- Hens are not harmful to a community, and provide a sustainable food source through their eggs.
- The distance between city dwellers and agriculture is always increasing. When well cared for, hens and other livestock can be unobtrusive, educational, and good for the local economy.
- Support of neighbours is key.
- I think it is a positive to allow small groups of these animals to be owned by people within the city
- I think if owners can maintain them without causing unreasonable odor or noise, it should be allowed.
- I
- I think people should be allowed to have animals they wish as long as they are responsible and provide a mutually beneficial situation.
- If raised in approved conditions they should not be treated in any manner different than a cat or dog
- Self reliance and ability to provide ones' own food source
- Very vague question. Why does the deciding factor have to be community benefit.
- As long as there was a limited number of animal on any given property.
- As long as these animals have strict bylaws on how they must be taken care of, and this doesn't become a way for residential wet markets to pop up.
- As long as people are responsible for there animals
- People should be allowed to keep livestock on their property ONLY if the animals needs are being met and their aren't a major bother to neighbours.
- I think it is a step in the right direction and a freedom people who follow the law should have.
- I would support the approval of certain livestock only for personal use and not for profit and with strict enforcement of the conditions in which the animal would be allowed to be kept.
- Having hens is a valuable learning experience for children, they are a great source of entertainment, a food source. Most of Alberta allows them its time for Calgary to catch up.
- Having fresh eggs daily.
- NA
- I think people can be responsible with livestock - there should possibly be space requirement for having them though i.e. no shared outdoor spaces (duplex), houses without fenced yards or small outdoor spaces.
- As long as it doesn't disturb people in proximity to the areas lives I don't see an issue with it.
- Providing smell and noise is within reasonable limits. which means responsible ownership.
- As long as the habitat is safe for the animals and they remain on their property. But no roosters
- Chickens are fine!! As long as they can be cared for properly.
- yes
- I'm all good with chickens.
- This would help support the local economy and still keep humane animal treatment in check
- Suitable living conditions and neighbour support will create a positive experience
- However, I am worried about noise, smell, and attracting pests (like rodents). There should be a way to have the problem cases dealt with quickly and efficiently.

- Urban farming is very doable in many communities. As long as there is suitable space for the animal and neighbours agree then it why not!
- Absolutely! I do think bylaws should state a specific size of yard is required so the chickens have the space they need.
- I don't love the requirement of support from the neighbor, but ensuring that the animal's living conditions are suitable is wise.
- As long as a "farm" animal is well looked after, have decent housing and is cleaned up after I have no problem with livestock living within city limits.
- It is about time. Thank you.
- [removed]
- Hens are beneficial to have as long as numbers are managed, they are properly cared for, and no roosters are allowed
- Rural aspects can enhance quality of life in urban settings when executed in a safe, considerate fashion.
- As long as the coop is kept clean and the neighbors agree
- If people are properly understand how to care for hens then sure
- If they are kept well, clean, safe, protected from natural predators.
- Many cities allow urban farming. It could be a wonderful way for people to pick up a new hobby and create a food source or just Have the opportunity to raise and care for animals.
- I believe people owning hens and other small livestock could potentially be good as long as the animals are looked after properly and not slaughtered at the home. There needs to be a bylaw in place the protects the animals from any cruelty.
- This ensures responsible and humane raising of animals and use of animal products
- Absolutely I support allowing urban chickens and agree with these guidelines. 100% support, I eagerly look forward to introducing my children to some backyard chickens.
- Yes, unless the adjacent neighbours are bothered by smell or noise.
- As long as they have proper living accommodations, are well cared for, and not becoming a nuisance why not!
- As long as the animal has feasible room to graze they're should be no problem with allowing them within city limits.
- As long as hens are given proper living conditions I see no issue with it.
- they can provide food to which every human has a right to produce for themselves
- Chickens are cool
- Owners must contain animals and if they are loud they must either bring them inside or otherwise muffle the noise
- so long as they are used for eggs only. slaughtering an animal in a back yard is not cool
- I think this is a great idea with many added benefits, as long as it is done right.
- Hens provide a wonderful source of eggs ands meat while eating insects.
- If you wanna add livestock [removed] you can't try and cap the dogs that were there first [removed]

- hens are fine, with neighbour approval. Large animals would not be appropriate.
- we should be allowed to have hens
- I had urban hens in Calgary for a year (I had originally thought that I was participating in a pilot program but later learned it was not approved at the time). I talked with my neighbors and decided to keep 3 hens. It was a great learning experience. I support allowing urban hens in Calgary. I think that permission from immediate adjacent neighbors who share a fence is a good idea, NOT the whole block or neighborhood. I also would support a cap on numbers. My hens were mostly quiet and no one knew they were there with the exception of the neighbors I originally discussed it with. From first hand experience they didn't bother anyone including those sharing a fence and were less disruptive than a neighbor with a barking dog. I would have them again if approved by city council.
- Chickens don't bother me, home eggs are great
- There should be a standard for the coop built, proximity to neighbour's, limits on noise if at all possible but also the standard should be achievable at a reasonable cost
- As long as city officials are actually going to uphold and investigate complaints
- u cant make me
- If they have a safe living situation I see no reason why they shouldn't be allowed
- Owning livestock is 1000x less harmful than factory farming. The government should strongly encourage self-sufficiency.
- My neighbors had hens and they were fine. As long as they keep it clean then I'm fine with it.
- Let people grow and raise their own food
- People should be allowed to own animals given they are able to provide proper living conditions for them.
- Not everyone wants dogs or cats. If a hen makes someone happy, and provides something they need, are well treated and properly looked after them why not!!!!
- As long as guidelines are followed and the hens do not disturb other residents.
- As long and the owners are being responsible and care for the pets unique needs while keeping the neighbourhood in mind, I am okay with anyone having any pet.
- [removed]
- Having a few hens is a great way for families to get eggs, hens can be good pets/ provide responsibility to kids
- If the conditions outlined above are met I see no reason to not grant approval.
- This is long overdue! Hens and small livestock are vital to healthy urban ag.
- I'm all for it!
- As long as the animals are pets, and not used for food, entertainment or any other kind of cruelty.
- As long as the animal is properly cared for then there should be no issues.
- It must not effect neighbours or the status of the community
- If we are going to continue to lose farm land to urban sprawl then city dwellers must find ways to more self sufficient and food secure
- As long as certain criteria are met as far as living conditions go (suitable living space, shelter, etc)

- Hens are great!
- If Adequate housing is made and research is done on the animal there should be no reason why someone shouldn't be allowed to own livestock
- Self sustainability should be encouraged.
- Everything must be human while keeping in mind sound pollution.
- Allows people another option to provide their family with food via hens eggs.
- Hens not roosters
- I mean....let them have hens. Why not?
- I would be fine with living next door to livestock as long as the animals were well cared for, kept on the property and reasonably quiet.
- As long as the animal is taken care of properly and the neighbours are not disturbed, I would support livestock in the city
- as long as the animals are kept healthy and in suitable living conditions.
- If the neighbours don't mind, then I see no problem with hens. Horses and cows might be a bit much
- If there's no noise issues, there's no need for concern.
- I think livestock has a place and should be with people who want them. Alternatively, I also think that people don't move to suburban areas to have livestock as neighbours. Furthermore, should this bylaw go through, I don't think people with hens or other livestock should have to provide benefits to their neighbours as part of the bylaw but because they want to. It's not a job they're applying for it's a lifestyle choice.
- I don't really care
- Hens can be very positive to people's lives.
- This should only be allowed in designated areas, similar to public gardens.
- Case by case.
- hobby farms are fun
- I have no issues with it
- Hens are a great addition for fresh egg supply and the enjoyment a backyard flock provides. Other livestock are also great additions if they can be properly kept
- I think that livestock to an extent should be allowed if they don't cause distraction to the neighbourhood.
- I'd love backyard hens
- I just like the idea .as long as there is rules about living conditions
- Anything that allows people to act in a more sustainable manner I support.
- Keeping animals like goats/hens around would provide sources of food, lawn management and emotional support for owners. Yes please.
- As long as the animal and their habitat is well maintained and taken care of.
- I am for urban food production even if it's for individual house consumption. That said as long as cleanliness and husbandry is followed, so licensing and regulating by the city would be required with frequent inspections.

- Must have fairly restrictive sheltering requirements in addition to spacing enabling odours or sanitation to be a non issue
- If you really think about it, we're imposing on them.
- Both the animals and humans safety and well-being should be taken into serious consideration. And also that humans and pet owners have a significant impact on animals behaviour.
- If owner abuses this law they get a warning and then a fine
- I support hens and potential other livestock within Calgary
- The more animals we can care for and support the better. This is a fantastic opportunity for people to engage and connect with these sentient beings, rather than them ending up dead on their plates.
- As long as it requires support from me (as a potential livestock neighbor) as well as suitable living conditions for the animals (most important factor I think)
- Update existing bylaw due to more instances affecting safety of communities
- I love hens. Roosters are the worst. Ban them in the city.
- I support people raising their own food.
- animals can be amazing companions
- Not a problem.
- But I think people need to apply and prove proper ownership or ability to care for the hens.
- Why not
- The third bullet is most important.
- As long as these animals are being cared for and given the space , yes !
- Support obtained by immediate neighbours and one neighbor further. Or anyone within a certain radius, within reasonable ear shot of the noise they make.
- Potentially yes, but not if the hens aren't kept well.
- No roosters, free eggs and a cuddle buddy
- Hens are fine but cows well that's a different story.
- Livestock should be properly cared for and should be kept in a manner acceptable to the neighborhood regarding noise, waste, etc.
- Maybe
- I believe this needs to be a permitted(yearly) approval process. I Would support as long as neighbours 3 doors in every direction of a home wishing to house hens agrees/supports the application. This should be a yearly renewal process to ensure every is happy and safe.
- as long as people care for their animals properly and don't inconvenience others over their livestock
- I think mental health wise, this would be a good choice.
- Hens are good
- Some properties can accommodate this
- Fully support responsible livestock ownership!
- I think this is a good idea; brings people back to their roots if we have more freedom in growing and raising our own animals, even within town/city limits.

- Mandatory minimums on size of pens for animals comfort and well-being, restrictions on noise caused by animals, restrictions on where they can be located so as to not disturb neighbour's.
- We need to localise food as much as possible! I have supported renegade hen farms within the city.
- "I would like to raise chickens, however, there are many issues with animal husbandry that must be mandated - the animals must not be raised for slaughter. The property must be of a significant size to accommodate chickens. Some livestock should not be in an urban setting - goats, sheep, pigs because of the potential contamination from feces. Noise, smell and the inexperience of urban ""farmers"". Would there be an increase in the number of bylaw officers?"
- I do support bee hives - this is a vital contribution to the world."
- So long as they are properly cared for I see no reason for chickens to not be allowed in the city
- This is a fantastic opportunity to have your own eggs, as long as there are parameters set by the city and enforced. For example, having a permit, and perhaps being checked on once a year.
- People should be able to keep hens as long as they have a proper life
- If this bylaw gettings passed it needs to be done correctly and with regulation. If there are not strict rules and guidelines set in place for the ownership of livestock, people will be careless and animals will be hurt. It's not enough to say 'suitable living conditions can be provided for the animal', the bylaw requires more detail and I support the decision of the city to review an application for owners wanting to own livestock prior the purchase and housing of such animals.
- Chickens are fantastic pets and provide year-round eggs for the owners (thus cutting down on food costs), eat insects that are on the property, and fertilize the lawn/garden. I am totally for other livestock as well; great idea!
- Depending on the animal and the accomodations, they can be very beneficial to a home or even community.
- If suitable living conditions can be provided then it's okay
- As long as there are no excessive noise issues with hens
- Easier access to animal resources. Serves as educational as well
- Pens must be inspected before hens allowed and checked up on occasionally to make sure they are on good health and then odors are kept under control. Similar to what I have answered for Q7.
- Considering the criteria is met, it seems unreasonable to restrict people's freedom in this regard. Only thing Id argue with is that the first criteria is a little vague and seems unnecessary. Are the neighbors okay with it and are the living conditions for the animal okay seem the only ones necessary.
- It's up to any individual if they wish to raise chickens. It no different then any other animal
- Yes I think we should be allowed back yard chickens
- I think it will have a positive impact on the community.
- With the stipulation that there are noise and odour bylaws as well as bylaws for the care of said animals, including extreme weather care.
- No roosters. Not allowed in areas that have preexisting coyote or wildlife issues. Approval of neighbours multiple houses down mandatory.
- Only if all impacted neighbours agree. If the neighbour changes, approval must be resought.

- There is benefits to having more self sustaining food sources. BUT a there would need to be considerable discussions with not just the directly adjacent neighbours but 2 to 3 houses away as well.
- Many communities successfully have hens.
- I have been around chickens all of my life and not once have I been bitten by one or kept awake all night by constant barking. Not once have I experienced stepping in chicken poop outside of the coop or found some digging in my vegetable garden. The notion that a person would not be allowed to have a couple laying hens is ridiculous. Every major metropolitan center in North America has by-laws supporting my opinion. By disallowing this, Calgary comes across as a back-water. Please take an example from the town of Taber that gets famous for ridiculous by-laws like swearing. We don't want to get on the National news for that.
- Hens yes. Not sure about livestock would need more information
- As long as agreement is reached among neighbours, it should be fine.
- As long as there is no harm to the animal and neighbours I see no issues
- Bring on the hens
- As long as the hens are being taken care of properly i have no problem with them.
- For the points noted, if it does not cause disturbance to the neighbours by way of noise, strong smells from fecal matter and if the premises are appropriate for the care of the hens.
- Egg laying hens are economical
- I think having chickens properly would be excelent and some animals like pot belly pigs are not a nuisance.
- I think it's a good idea
- So long as the animals are properly cared for, I would support this.
- Sounds reasonable and balanced
- Provided the livestock is not dangerous to the public and can be well cared for it should be permitted.
- As longs as the hens are well kept is would be great. If chickens are going to be allowed though the city should have no say on whether people can have more than one pit bull.
- It would be great to have your own chickens for eggs or rabbits for eating. Healthy and affordable
- Potential owners should have to prove that they can provide healthy living conditions for the hens.
- I fully support a self sustaining lifestyle.
- Small animals don't present a risk to our community. It would be great for kids to see animals in a different light.
- Chickens deserve space to live their lives.
- As long as the animals are cared for and aren't a nuisance to neighbors then there is no difference between a chicken or a dog
- Improves environmental impact.
- As long as the safety of the animals, and people are primary, then laws should be enforced
- As long as the space is able to actually host and maintain without interfering with neighbors.

- I fully support allowing the keeping of hens. So long as the living conditions of the hens is humane.
 - People should be allowed to raise and source food as they see fit.
 - It seems fair and I wouldn't mind hens in my neighborhood
 - Responsible chicken ownership sounds amazing!
 - "The criteria listed above seems fair; owning livestock (especially hens) promotes self-sustainability, food independence, and intercommunity relations on a smaller scale. A cost/benefit analysis on a case-by-case basis may be necessary.
- In this situation however, there are possible complications that may arise:
 - NIMBY
 - Hens and roosters look similar up until maturity, so it may result in an increase in noise complaints (crowing) if roosters are not removed ("fall through the cracks")."
 - As long as there are suitable living conditions for the hens and precautions taken to protect them, they should be allowed.
 - If everyone involved (neighbours) is ok with it then I don't see an issue. Why can people own 10 dogs and 10 cats but they can't own 10 chickens?
 - I support self sustainability
 - As long as regulations are followed, there shouldn't be any harm in owning hens.
 - Allowing hens would be a positive addition to families who own them: bug control, steady egg supply, great fertilizer for garden/yard
 - Urban hens are a great, sustainable resource for many families. Neighbor support and proper living conditions are crucial
 - Chickens are amazing creatures.
 - I would love to see pot bellied pigs and miniature horses to be allowed. As long as the owner is responsible and both the animal and owner isn't a nuisance, I fully support it.
 - I think the ownership of hens for the purpose to provide eggs for a household is a wonderful idea
 - I can support the idea of having more diversity in an urban setting as long as the animals have been domesticated and/or tamed to not cause harm to citizens in the communities.
 - This is a movement toward more sustainable urban living so I'm all for it. Goat lawn care- ethically produced eggs. I think inspection would be necessary to ensure animal welfare
 - If you have a yard, urban hens sound cool! Just a different type of pt
 - livestock is fine
 - The property would need to be titled as having livestock so potential home buyers in the area can know BEFORE they move in if a property has previously been approved for livestock.
 - If all of the appropriate conditions are met I feel there isn't any reason to not allow them.
 - As long as they are not disturbing anyone, I don't see the harm in allowing certain animals within city limits.

- This would be a great idea! A lot of calgarians left because the way of living has changed so much here. It would bring a sense of community if we could have hens to produce eggs and have them to eat . As well as some livestock, permitted the living situation is proper
- Hens can contribute to communities. Abiding by specific regulations and having permits would help make it successful
- People should be allowed to have chickens!
- I don't see a reason why this shouldn't be approved.
- Letting people have hens is a fantastic for sustainability, and nutrition
- Livestock such as hens offer people the opportunity to have their own eggs to feed their family and hens are very beneficial for bug control and lawn maintenance. The only concern could be the possibility of a predator like a coyote being introduced to the neighbourhood due to the new prey presented
- Why not??
- Hens=food
- Nothing to explain. I support urban hen projects permitting the animals are treated humanely.
- If it's working then keep it working.
- Small livestock can be good and benefits the food chain and/or can be a non allergic alternative to costs/dogs
- This makes sense.
- sounds neat
- I would support hens and possibly other poultry and goats but not larger livestock.
- I can't see any good reason not to
- I think owning hens and other livestock is fine as long as the amenities and good living conditions are provided for them by the owners and don't impede the enjoyment of property by neighbours.
- Chickens and ducks can be beneficial and are great for providing food. They do not take up a lot of space and aren't a danger to the community.
- Emphasis on suitable living conditions.
- As long as there are proper accommodations for the animal. For example, I don't want to see/smell a cow in my inner-city home.
- Got no issues with a hen in someone's yard as long as it isn't a roster that wants to crow as the sun comes up.
- Give people more freedom in their homes.
- Urban hens has been successful in many cities
- Sustenance farming is a great way to get quality product while also reducing ones carbon footprint.
- Hens and other small livestock should be allowed! Food security and sovereignty is so important.
- Does not offend me. Good idea for healthy living
- If animals can be adequately cared for and do not create disturbances for neighbours.

- On a case by case basis I don't see an issue with it. Having a laying hen wouldn't be an issue. Smaller farm animals could be allowed if their living conditions are maintained and don't cause a nuisance.
- I think it's a good idea
- Edmonton has already expanded the urban hen project and it's going great
- I think hens and other animals that provide for people is important
- With the proper means to care for the animals I don't see the problem. I'm not educated enough about hens to say more.
- Do not restrict ownership
- With more public consultation and proper guidelines for animal welfare, so long as neighbours are not bothered by sounds/smells, this should be okay.
- Provided the animals are being cared for properly and not a nuisance I do not have any concerns regarding the animals kept
- As long as the animals can be taken care of properly and on a property that is large enough for them I see no reason why not.
- Livestock is and always has been a crucial part of everyday life, and forcing people to eat supermarket meats is annoying. If the person has support from neighbours, I see no problem with said person keeping chickens or even a pig.
- Hens appear to be wonderful pets and the organic eggs are certainly a bonus
- Limit the number though to 10 or less. No roosters in residential areas
- If the animal is not a nuisance to the community then what is the harm?
- Hens for sure. Would be hard to properly care for larger animals in an urban setting.
- Would provide a more eco-friendly option for food, provided the location is appropriate and nearby residents are not disturbed.
- As long as it were monitored carefully to ensure they are humane conditions.
- As long as enforcement is consistent.
- Expanding on livestock is a wonderful idea! Being able to support local farmers or even backyard farmers is a huge help to neighborhoods and communities.
- More freedom, more local food!
- I love eggs.
- If it benefitted the community and wasn't a nuisance I think it is a person's right to have livestock
- Livestock can be used for food for families. With the increasing cost in meat/dairy, people should be able to be self-reliant even if they live in the city.
- I don't have an opinion on this. While I would not want livestock living nearby, others may not mind. If this is handled on a case by case basis in cooperation with neighbors, that is fine by me.
- Good to have fresh eggs
- A limited # of chickens should be acceptable.
- Raising farm animals like chickens can be a good hobby, food source, education, and allows people to know where their food is from

- Na
- I believe owning livestock is a good thing as long as the conditions are met, they need a good place to live and enough room to roam around they can't be put in small cages and forgotten about since that would be animal abuse. But owning chickens for the eggs or meat would be beneficial as some people have a hard time buying meat from the stores but as long as they kill the animals correctly and properly, there needs to be good laws about this before it should be considered because we already have an issue with puppy mills we wouldn't need a new issue with livestock.
- I think this is a great idea! It's a super healthy and engaging for Calgarians to have this option as long as they are following guidelines
- I support urban agriculture
- If the neighbours are in agreement, I don't see a problem with this. However, if a problem occurs, there needs to be a simple process for review in place
- That is fine as long as the animals are taken care of and its ensured that they have the right needs and are safe.
- Its a chicken who cares
- I want chickens!
- As long as each case is indivisible assessed.
- As long as the proper measures are taken (housing, feeding, care), and it's not causing harm to neighbours, I'm all for it
- I think it's a great idea and furthers individual families to have more nutrition and food accessibility. I would expect regulations and welfare checks (on the animals) for adherence to said regulations.
- I don't think you need to have the neighborhood approval.
- Some municipals already allow urban hens and I think it is good to implement the system in Calgary. There's a trend of healthy living and this idea would beneficial to many Calgarians.
- Edmonton does it
- As long as the rules are followed I have to problem.
- Chickens are great
- Enlarging opportunities for people to have animals like hens is extremely positive.
- its good for the community
- Provided their is no impact of neighbours.
- Only if used only for eggs
- People should know where food comes from and this can reduce waste
- Chickens are fantastic
- Chickens are a brilliant way for us to eat more local, as well there have been many studies on chickens being excellent support animals. they also add a more natural ecosystem and their excrement adds a lot of nutrients to the ground.
- Good to be self reliant. Chickens are great for pests.
- As long as it doesn't impact the immediate neighbors.
- Absolutely amazing idea, this would be great for the city!

- As long as the neighbors are okay with it and the hens are treated humanely I think that's great
- Only on certain sized properties. Zero lot line and legal rental suite/high density homes should not be allowed livestock option
- For example chickens. If living quarters are appropriate and neighborhoods are on board why not?
- I would welcome the opportunity to have hens. They would be wonderful for pest management.
- As long as the live stock are being careful properly and their feces is cleaned up, I support hens!
- I would support this as long as living conditions are amenable for the animals and the neighborhood was in agreement.
- Having livestock in an urban environment can work with some guidelines to assure neighbours and the surrounding communities are not negatively impacted
- These measures need to be reviewed on an on going basis every x number of years to ensure the animals are looked after and neighbours are supportive
- As long as the livestock is kept to reasonable numbers and appropriate sized living areas I would like to see the option available.
- I like hens
- I think that as long as the other animals aren't causing a problem or being bothersome to the neighbors, then why not welcome different animals.
- I think if , On a case by case basis, a property and owner can successfully and properly take care of the animal, it should be allowed
- I support urban livestock but don't believe adjacent neighbours have a right to determine whether or not an individual can have it on their personal property. There is potential for abuse of the regulations here, eg a neighbour could threaten to withdraw their support for reasons not related to the livestock during disputes, or blackmail individuals into sharing the food with them
- Anonymous survey of the neighbours should be conducted before anyone is allowed to have livestock in the city
- Yeah but good luck with those hens if you're going to allow a dog breed that was bred to have a tremendously high prey drive and animal aggression to roam loose with zero repercussions.
- I myself would love to have hens and I know many others probably feel the same
- As long the the property is maintained, animals are taken care of and there are enough officers available to enforce the bylaws. I dont think adjacent neighbors support is needed.
- back yard hens are a great addition to any back yard. controls bugs, gives you protein, don't bite :)
- I see no reason not to
- If people want animals to a source their own food, let them have them
- Hens are quiet and provide a good source of eggs for families. They eat bugs. They are a great animal
- Why not....it's a wonderful idea.
- As long as the animal is cared for appropriately and the neighbors see no issue.
- Hens allow for families to provide more for themselves.
- Present is not working..needs change

- There is no valid reason to not allow livestock like chickens in the city. Banning them is ridiculous.
 - As long as the coups are strictly monitored for cleanliness etc.
 - I would like urban hens for myself
 - If everyone nearby agrees, it's no problem.
 - As long as they are not disruptive to neighbors and you can care for them, go for it!
 - "I don't think one should have to have support from adjacent Neighbours to keep hens on their own property.
- I 100% support a person's right to access food and urban hens are one way to do this."
 - Food security is an issue however health and disturbance issues must be strictly managed
 - In agreeance with this as long as neighbours agree and hens are kept responsibly.
 - But make sure these people know how to care for these animals. And approval should be required from neighbors just like building permits.
 - I believe owning a hen can be fine, if the conditions and care of the hen is acceptable.
 - If the animals not a nuisance and can be taken care of properly I don't see why you can't have any kind of animal !
 - I think as long as it's not disruptive to the neighbors.
 - I don't see a problem with hens in the city as long as they are properly contained. animals can be therapeutic.
 - I believe that this could have a very positive impact on the community. The situation must be appropriate and beneficial for the animal and the owner must be responsible.
 - If neighbours and everything are fine with it . Why not
 - sustainable food is something I support
 - As long as suitable living conditions can be provided.
 - More sustainable living
 - I just think it's a reasonable situation to allow for, as long as the owner remains responsible in terms of caretaking.
 - Assuming there will be restrictions on the type of livestock and the amount of space required, I feel this amendment would work.
 - Having hens don't bother me
 - Seems to be more pros than cons. Must be check ups done for animal well being
 - Good for the mental health of people and children as long as they are well cared for and it is strictly monitored.
 - As long as the living conditions for the animal are optimal, which I find one of the most important factors to enforce, I see Calgary and and communities benefitting from this consideration. I can see how allowing Calgarians to raise and produce more of their food sources will bring more awareness and support for the local farm industry, but again, only as long as living conditions for the animals is fair.

- As long as it is not harm to anyone or the environment it is fine
- having an opportunity for increased organic living would be amazing
- Backyard hens would be awesome, and in keeping with the times!
- Hens in town are good for the environment if contained correctly.
- its peoples right to do what they want on their property. Stop abusing your power.
- Again, responsible ownership.
- Hens are a great example of urban livestock that bothers no one. They cannot jump a fence, they do not make noise, they don't even interact with other humans/animals outside of the owners property.
- This should no require support from neighbours who can just have a "dislike" for their neighbour, if the person looking to breed, raise, etc the animal can do so in a manner that does not directly affect their neighbours
- A pet is a pet. As long as it is cared for adequately.
- They have it in red deer and it seems to be okay. As long as it is kept clean and smell isn't overwhelming.
- I think it is a great idea to encourage people to bring in more sustainable food sources for themselves. I think case by case scenarios should be evaluated by more than one individual.
- I'm all for urban hens if there is support and agreement from neighbors and was monitored to ensure the animals are being appropriately taken care of.
- So long as they are properly managed and contained, this should not be an issue. It is perfectly common in other countries' major cities.
- If the animals are being properly cared for and are not a nuisance to neighbors, there's no reason they shouldn't be allowed.
- I have many friends outside city limits who raise hens and they adore them. I personally haven't owned any but have enjoyed interacting with them.
- If animals are well cared for only.
- Livestock shouldn't just be for the country, if regulated properly it should be allowed
- There are a lot f animals that can become pets. As long as their needs are met, why not have a hen.
- People need to become more sustainable in their food production
- as long as its done responsibly and doesn't impact neighbors adversely
- It can be allowed as long as the animals are kept properly
- I have no issues with backyard hens
- If the neighbors don't care why not
- Hens are cool! No crowing roosters please.
- Food security is an issue that can be assisted by increasing the food sovereignty of a community. Eggs are an important source of nutrition that can be easily shared amongst a few households.
- If they are Properly taken care of then why not
- I see it as progress. And I'd much rather live next to someone with chickens than a dog. Granted hen owners need to follow bylaws around odour and noise.

- Citizens should be able to raise their own food and have appropriate support animals as long as they are cared for and maintained well, and not becoming nuisance animals.
- I think livestock on property can offer many benefits.
- No identifiable harm.
- If they can help the family/families and can be taken very well care of.
- Hens are wonderful friendly animals and are beneficial to the people they live with.
- A good way to provide for your nutritional needs, teach kids about other animals etc. The hens should be well cared for and not a nuisance to others.
- That sounds good.
- If they are all properly cared for, this would be good.
- But 'support from adjacent neighbours' can be tricky depending on relationship - control, intimidation. Again, perhaps a tribunal is an answer. What would be community benefit? Chickens, goats, pigs benefit the person, not the community. You will have to more adequately address whether butchering is allowed in a residence or not. Currently, as you probably know, this is happening.
- I think Calgarians should have access to options for more sustainable living; urban livestock is a part of this.
- As long as the animals can be properly cared for and in a suitable environment, I see no problems with this.
- I like this idea however there needs to be more research done and many rules in place. If livestock are allowed in the city, there needs to be adequate space etc which is difficult since the houses in Calgary have barely any vacant land (ie a large backyard). The threat of predatory animals coming into the city more needs to be explored as well, such as more coyotes coming into the city and needing to be dealt with, getting killed by cars and attacking animals and humans.
- I think people should be allowed to have hands on their private property. Obviously in a condo type home that wouldn't work. But if someone lives in a house and wants to make that decision and they should be able to. I think the role of the government is to provide guidelines to ensure that the owners, hens, those living adjacent are and stay safe. I don't support the rule that a person would have to get approval from their neighbours if they wanted to get hen house. As long as it's not interfering with neighbours then they should be allowed to get a hen house.
- I think people should be given the opportunity to own certain livestock as long as its' living conditions are appropriate. Of course you will always have the odd bad apple that will abuse this privilege, and therefore their needs to be consequences such as fines or tickets.
- "A conditional yes. Support from adjacent neighbors may be withdrawn. Then what?"
- Houses having this livestock need to be open about it when it comes to things like real estate
- How will this impact the property value of both that house and the ones around it?
- Will bylaw have the ability to check on the animals at any time
- Strong security measures must be in place - this is a situation where vandalism and cruelty could be high."

- "I think allowing urban hens or other small livestock should be allowed in small numbers (per yard/owner), as long as they have sufficient room and are properly looked after, and do not pose serious health risks to other community members.
- (There is nowhere to leave a comment for #9, so including it here. I think fines should increase for repeat offenders, e.g., $100 for first offence, $150 for second, especially for things that are likely to happen again, such as animal at large... I'm not sure if this would apply to the owner or the animal, but it seems that owners who cannot control their pets should have more severe consequences than a first time offender. One thing that comes to mind is errant cats... I know several people who let their cats roam repeatedly, and don't seem to understand or care that errant cats are responsible for killing large numbers of wild birds and small animals...)."
- Some people have yards big enough for some chickens to produce their own eggs
- I don't see why not, as long as there are certain restrictions in place to ensure neighbors & the community can still be enjoyed by everyone.
- I think urban livestock (within reason) should be okay as long as minimum standards are met and maintained. It would also depend on the reason for the livestock.
- I think people should do proper steps when owning any animal for safety of the animal, themselves and others. But if they show they care for they animal they should be able to have it.
- People are focusing more on local sourcing of their food, knowing where their food comes from etc. Particularly as food supply chains have been altered and may be affected again with the pandemic it seems reasonabel to help people be more self-sustained. I think it is a progressive step.
- it is important for individuals to become more self-sufficient
- As long as the animal is cared for it's not a problem
- It's a great idea especially for animals like chickens where you can use the eggs.
- allow
- I think it would be really cool if people could get eggs from their own backyard. Also it would be neat to own goats in Calgary if you have enough space for them. Bee keeping would also be great in Calgary as well because it would help increase the bee population.
- If everyone is in agreement and the animals are treated well, there shouldn't be a problem.
- People should have the option to raise smaller animals, IF it does not lower the community appeal / housing value or increase thigns such as noise (sunrise roosters....no thanks) or smells / pollution
- It is more sustainable for people to raise their own chickens in some circumstances so it would be amazing to have that possibility in the city.
- Obviously cattle won't be approved but maybe some folks could have little pigs.
- banning livestock outright is unfair and pointless.
- anything that supports growing or raising our own food is a means to self-sufficiency.
- As long as the neighbours are okay with the hens, and the hens are cared for properly, I don't have a problem with allowing them.
- Provided community is on board and owners are responsible, I see no reason why chickens shouldn't be allowed on private property
- Hen owning should be allowed but certain numbers only.

- The key is "support from neighbours" and "suitable living conditions" - if this can't be met, no permission.
- Having livestock can increase the mental health of a community as well as educate.
- Small animals such as hens and ducks would be acceptable, no roosters or drakes as they are noisy
- I have no problem as long as they don't become a nuisance to neighbors
- As long as there are strict guidelines, I do not see a problem with this.
- But also being aware that more food options for wildlife will bring them closer to urban areas. And therefore being prepared to deal with that but NOT BY JUST KILLING THE WILDLIFE. It seems every answer to human's nuisances is to kill what's in its way. Relocate wildlife or those who want hens be ok with them being stolen by wildlife and therefore more wildlife being in your backyard. And no, they don't just get to kill coyotes or bears as a reason to "protect" their chickens.
- If the adjacent neighbours are good with it then that's cool
- There are many city homes/properties that have adequate area for the proper welfare of the animal. Animal welfare to be determined by modern research and scientists.
- So long as animals can be kept in appropriate conditions with appropriate space, I think it's beneficial.
- Livestock to one person is a pet to another. City dwelling livestock should not be raised for slaughter.
- I've been to many parts of the where backyard chickens is the norm. This city just interferes with everyone and raises taxes.
- Great idea
- It's been proven time again the animals help humans mental health
- Should be strict rules and monitoring
- In my opinion the most important part of that is the support from adjacent neighbours.
- This is a great idea to reduce impact and add to our communities!
- In the current world climate, urban farming movements, and the like it only makes sense for the expansion of rules to allow for livestock and hens within city limits.
- Whether an animal is classed as livestock or a "pet", I see no problem with allowing people to have any type of animal on their private property as long as the animals are looked after properly, have appropriate living conditions, and don't cause substantial neighbourhood disruption (i.e. noise).
- Fresh eggs! Yes!
-  because you have not allowed a space for further comments, I completely disagree with BSL legislation it is archaic and wrong. Working in the animal industry there are plenty of breeds that show aggression both of similar size and power to bully breeds. So many communities in Canada and the world are working to get rid of BSL legislation why do you think enacting it is a good idea. We need to enforce responsible pet ownership and not blame the breed.
- This would allow people access to farm quality eggs at home on hand.
- Chickens should be just fine. One should have the proper amount of land.
- it fine with me

- Don't care what type of pets people want.
- No explanation needed
- I think livestock in urban areas where people are educated on that specific animal can add enrichment to the owners and community
- Yes for hens, no for other livestock
- If it was hens or live stock that would be a benefit to the communities
- There is literally thousands of birds in the city. Hens won't have a large impact on life in the city
- Chickens can make good pets
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and causing no harm I believe that they should be welcome.
- Hens are cool. Free eggs.
- Having Hens for eggs etc can't possibly be that much of a nuisance.
- Economical
- Having chickens is educational and sustainable
- I'm all for this as long as my neighbours have to ask me and get written permission. I don't want to wake up to the sound of a rooster.
- As long as noise and smell can be minimized and the animals are kept as pets not used for food OR allowed to be sold for slaughter. I only support this if they are treated as any other pet like a dog or cat.
- I've lived in other cities where hens are allowed in yards. Its totally fine, but needs to include informing neighbours as there tend to be more predators like coyotes/owls in the area (important to know for owners of small pets like cats and small dogs).
- With appropriate space and noise control, I support expanding urban farming.
- A responsible owner should have this opportunity
- If dangerous dogs are kept contained, these livestock animals would be safer and they create benefits for families to eat (eggs, meat)
- As long as any issue that come up are dealt with as with any other animal
- As long as everyone is in agreement on everything, i dont see an issue
- As long as criteria for care and cleanliness is met
- I think this idea is great as long as the animals are registered and treated humanely and given similar rights to other animals like dogs cats etc.
- I believe urban hens would be a great way for everyone to learn how to treat animals which are not ordernarily kept as pets.
- as long as they can be taken care of properly and the population doesn't get out of hand.
- Chickens are quiet and clean creatures that are an easy and cheap way to have local food.
- Why not? Let us give it a go
- Livestock are less harmful (noise, mess, smell) than many other hobbies.
- Sustainability and affordability

- Within reason, my concern would be a smell if a neighbor has too many Livestock animals. We have to remember this is a city, not the country.
- I think having certain forms of livestock can be a good thing in the city, within reason.
- I don't think there should be exceptions. Either you meet the criteria, or you don't get to keep hens.
- I think that responsible owners should be allowed to keep hens on their property as they can be a good source of free food provided that neighbors do not mind
- the bylaw needs to be updated and clear rules need to be in place to ensure that owners of livestock are clear as to what is allowed and for neighbours to be able to have their rights ensured if keeping of livestock gets out of hand
- At least as a pilot and neighbor approval should be VERY important
- I feel it is important that, in all stages of these reviews and in the enforcement of any amendment, the deciding party is an individual with formal training on the matter at hand. Agriculture and animal behaviour specialists know more about these topics and should be consulted.
- The more we can support local the better.
- Who will be deciding there are benefits to the community?
- Local food security and independent food security should be considered extremely important
- I think that livestock should be allowed in Calgary as long as the animals needs are being met.
- Why not ?
- Again this should already be a thing
- Tending to hens in an urban setting is fantastic. It promotes sustainability and caring for animals could teach so much empathy to owners and owners to be.
- People should be allowed to own a reasonable amount of backyard hens if they wish to and are responsible about it.
- Food security.
- Yes.
- As long as the livestock is well cared for
- Responsible owners should be allowed to keep livestock. Excellent source of food, and wonderful for mental health.
- If the neighbours agree, then sure. But what happens when they move? As someone purchasing a property, how are they meant to know about this agreement. I mean...Have you smelled chickens? It's a hard sell to people who are not interested.
- If people own their own property why wouldn't we allow them to do with this property as they please. If people want the hens for the sake of being self sufficient and having a healthy and more natural source of food then let them
- Helps people!
- If neighbours change once you have an animal, you shouldn't have to give it up. Chickens can affect more than just adjacent neighbours with their sounds
- As long they are properly cared for and don't disturb (legitimately- not just a. Cranky neighbour being an [removed]) neighbours, I think it's a great idea

- The animals should be happy and well kept. It should not cause excessive disruption to the neighbours.
- Small no noises livestock can be great therapy and a healthy hobby
- Please bring back making our own food
- Better for the environment and support local.
- I'm in support of urban livestock and feel the listed criteria cover the range of associated concerns. I would recommend that 'support from adjacent neighbours' may be more suitably addressed as an absence of evidence-supported objections, where they have to prove that it effects them negatively to be able to deny their support
- If animals are safe, loved, cared for, I support this. The problem is confidence in the city to hire people who actually like animals.
- i would love to have my own fresh eggs every morning & i think others would agree
- People should be allowed to own chickens if treated humanely
- Yes but... the living conditions must be kept clean so as to not be a source of disease or draw rats etc
- If the personal property is large enough within the city, chickens and small livestock should be acceptable. I would also like NO livestock in rental properties.
- As long as conditions can be met, including space, noise, care, cleanup and smell, then they should be able to be had. There would be a need to have limit on amounts, but all should be considered.
- As long as it doesn't cost me money
- I wouldn't mind having a neighbor who has small(ish) livestock if they are well cared for and aren't a noise nuisance. I think it would be good for the community.
- I think any animal can be a beloved pet. I would not support having animals to slaughter.
- Live stock must be contained and not able to wander in and out of citizens properties. Also there is no guarantee that live stock will not provoke animals or people out for walks.
- Animals should be able to live theirs if there is a healthy safe environment for them that they will be supported in.
- why not as long as the number of hens is limited so it doesn't become a smell/noise issue.
- Yes, but in order to have livestock there should be mandatory education.
<https://www.cdc.gov/salmonella/backyardpoultry-05-20/index.html>
- For me it would depend on what purpose the animal serves, the enclosure must be suitable and maintained, and overall space must be appropriate.
- The above criteria supports the practice.
- provided they are taken care of properly, I think it's great. But I do think possible a license or mandatory weekend or evening course to get your 'bird' license. To ensure everyone knows what needs their birds will have, especially if they've never had livestock,
- From a community sustainability standpoint, urban livestock is a good way to involve and educate citizens of more sustainable agricultural practices. As long as there are requirements to ensure the presence of livestock doesn't negatively impact other community members, it should be looked at similarly to that of community gardens.

- There is no reason why not if it does not become a nuisance to others
- As with other pets, as long as the owner is responsible there shouldn't be an issue with neighbours
- I'm from BC where everyone I knew had two hens and a coop in their backyard.
- As long as it is beneficial and your neighbours do not mind then it should be ok. As long as the animals are being raised ethically and are being taken care of.
- As long as the animals still have a safe living environment that is not severely impacted by city noise or pollution, then I think it could have a very positive effect on the community.
- There has to be a way to guarantee neighbours can protect the value of their property value, (ie. Bad smells, unkept and messy coops, noises, etc.)
- Allowing things such as laying hens is a good idea so long as it's done responsibly with proper guidelines
- It's great to hear about possibly allowing hens. While I don't personally have interest in having them, I am from a city in the USA where they were allowed (and so were goats). Honestly, they were a delight as neighbors gave tours and shared the produce with others. Most times, you'd never even know they were any animals there. Also, our observation was that folks who had them actually took better care of their houses and yards and were more community-minded than the average resident. Let it happen. I think you'll be pleasantly surprised at how few bumps, if any, there are in that transition.
- People have too much open/free space in their yards. Would be nice if citizens weren't limited to what they're able to grow / keep in their yards to feed themselves.
- Yes allow for livestock that can make for a sustainable living
- I'm on the fence. There is a lot of room for negligence and mistreatment, but it will save lives in the long run.
- I think as long as the living conditions are appropriate for the animal and not a nuisance to neighborhood individuals that allowing people a means to produce their own food should be allowed. Such animals as laying hens and pigs I would think to be acceptable. However, cows and horses are too large to be kept in the city
- Who wouldn't want fresh eggs every morning? Vegans don't count.
- eggs!
- As long as proper living conditions can be provided.
- So long as they have proper housing and are not a nuisance, they should be allowed
- Hens are quiet, make great pets and give you eggs.
- It would be great to reintroduce certain types of livestock into our communities to better our relationships with these animals, with our food, and decrease reliance on mass commercial herders (especially for eggs)
- Hens are legit. Stop being [removed].
- I don't see a problem with it as long as the owners are responsible. Maybe require a cleanliness check for anyone owning them
- Keeping hens within city limits offers families a chance to source food locally, share fresh produce in their communities, and minimize the global impact of large scale food production.

- If they are kept in clean, maintained cages and looked after appropriately I think it's a great idea.
- By receiving the support of neighbors, suitable living conditions, and each case evaluated then every one involved has been taken into account.
- Contingent on approval by neighbours and surrounding are within your community.
- I would love to have my own eggs.
- More sustainable local farms and or and a richer local economy by allowing more coops
- I believe chickens would be great IF adjoining neighbors agreed
- We need to become more sustainable
- As long as the chief bylaw officer isn't biased
- If someone can adequately care for an animal and has the space, they should be allowed to have it.
- It makes sense that all parties including neighbours must be involved in the process.
- Encourages sustainability
- hens = eggs. Sustainable food. Easy.
- This would be beneficial to support people sourcing their own food and being less reliant on factory farming. However, requiring licensing may be a good idea to track who has livestock and so follow up can occur to ensure people are properly caring for the animals
- As long as the livestock isn't a nuisance and is safe and treated well, I have no issue with neighbours having them as "pets"
- If neighbours/neighborhood agrees to hens next door then why not?
- Chickens and livestock when taken care of properly don't smell much and wouldn't cause any issues besides occasional noise issues during the day and as long as they are being taken care of they should be allowed in town.
- As long as they are treated humanly and not nuisance than it is fine
- As long as the hens are in proper care, I support it.
- If all goes well it would be very beneficial.
- Edmonton has had the urban hens program for quite a while now and it has had little negative review. Owners must be responsible for proper care of the animals, proper enclosures and supervision and proper hygiene of the environment around their coops. When all rules are followed, it is an interesting, fun and innovative urban practice.
- Urban hens are a great way for City families to have the ability to have their own fresh eggs. Not only that but hens really can be beneficial to a persons mental health.
- Chickens are very smart animals and can be used as therapy animals, as well as providing food stability to low income families. The eggs, obviously, but chicken manure is also VERY effective when urban gardening and allowing low income families to grow their own food.
- Hens can be beneficial to the family for food. When properly taken care of they are less annoying than a dog left out to bark all day.
- Some home owners would like to have their own egg supply.
- As long as the animals are well cared for and not causing harm to the area or neighbors i believe small live stock (is. Chickens, ducks, geese, baby pigs, goats, etc.) should be allowed within the city.

But, owners (as well as neighbors-I say neighbors because not everyone knows how to respect or handle a farm animal) must be held responsible and be well advised of the bylaws.

- People are more focuses on sustainable food supply in light of covid, hens at home can support this in a safe and fun way
 - No roosters.
 - It's good to make sure the conditions are suitable for the animals.
 - Yes I have no problem with any other animals as long as it isn't disturbing communities.
 - Hens, when raised responsibly, are a noninvasive and nondisruptive means to increase food equity. For other livestock, I would suggest looking to rural MDs as to how they manage more animal units than an acreage permits
 - Suitable living conditions
 - Only if proper care and cleaning is maintained
 - I agree that hens should be allowed. So long as neighbours do not have issues and the animals are provided suitable living conditions, it should be permitted within reason (i.e. no more than X amount of hens).
 - Organic, well-tended animals reduce the industrial impact of farming - which is rarely capable of giving an animal a respectable life.
 - Answer is self- explanatory
 - If the criterias above are implemented
 - we need some control on this, people with absolute no clue are having these ideas of having farm animal on their backyards, this needs proper control, plus hens are smelly, anyone that has been to a chicken farm can tell you
 - with covid 19. People having chickens would be good
 - I think small animals might be okay, and depending on the neighbourhood and property size. My greatest concern is having adequate space and amenities for animal welfare. I think having a unique feature of a home ie a pet chicken or dwarf pig, would be a great talking point for neighbours, but where do you draw the line at how many animals, what species, etc. For me, the most important issue isn't about the person, it's about the animal's needs. We don't want a bunch of hens or other animals just abandoned (like feral rabbits that were once someone's pet) or dumped on the Humane Society. That is animal cruelty.
 - As long as the suitable living conditions are strictly enforced and offenders are severely punished.
 - My neighbor had chickens growing up and they often invited me over and taught me how to take care of them and why they are good for sustainability. It was a great experience for a child to understand where food comes from.
 - "I like the idea - with conditions:
- I would like to see careful regulation of the size of the flock (perhaps proportional to the size of the property) and the condition of the shelter hens are kept in. Ultimately, whether they are regarded as pets or livestock, chickens in Calgary should never be abused or neglected. Animal welfare should be the highest priority. While the city already has laws that address abuse and neglect, animals kept in numbers, or breeding or producing animals are probably more vulnerable to casual abuse or neglect owing to crowding. Any owned animal in Calgary should have healthy access to ample food, fresh water, clean warm shelter, and - in the case of hens - outdoor space for exercise and forage. The city would need to ensure compliance through reasonable monitoring.

- And neighbours should have a reasonable expectation of cleanliness and quiet."
- I love chickens.
- Not as familiar with livestock but it sounds fine.
- Bring back the farm! Sustainable living and supporting your neighbouring communities with small , local farming is the best idea!
- [removed]
- As long as the animals aren't a nuisance, and they are living in the best of the best most humane space, I think it's okay.
- Why not?
- Without knowing exactly what other kinds of animals people are wanting, I can see the benefit of having a hen for eggs for some families. With ever increasing grocery costs, many people are now starting to grow their own gardens and trying to make a more sustainable life for themselves.
- Most importantly points 2 and 3 MUST be met- support from neighbors and suitable living conditions
- So long as they are reasonably kept and looked after, why not.
- This would have to be widely regulated, as shown above most people can't properly care for dogs or cats, let alone more exotic animals. People should have to prove their knowledge about the animals they are looking to receive permits for.
- Regular weekly clean up of animals area to reduce odour attractants to wildlife
- There's pigeon farms already in peoples back yards in the north east. This poses the same or higher threat to the local environmental health
- I have nothing against people keeping chickens
- I don't care
- There is a pair of illegal hens in my neighborhood and they are beautiful and you'd never even know they were there if it weren't for someone telling me (I walked by this house many times before without noticing) and they are even in the front yard haha!!
- As long as people are responsible to these animals, it is acceptable.
- i would love to have a hen!
- There's more and more animals a year that need homes but have nowhere to go
- As long as they're contained, properly protected, and cleanliness is maintained what does it matter? They can't be any more obnoxious than a neighbor with a dog that never shuts up, so who cares?
- Permaculture, including owning livestock, is a great way to provide for one's community.

- nothing wrong with critters.
- We need to support this - families should be able to have a small Pen like they would for a vegetable garden
- It's about time.
- Is neighbors say it's fine I don't see the problem
- "More people are wanting the option to source their own food, which can lead to increased community and communication between neighbours. Also giving neighbours the opportunity to vote if they are comfortable with adequate poultry housing in close proximity is paramount.
- Coops/ housing/ upkeep should be subject to periodic random inspections and adhere to a strict number of live animals (hens>chicks) and provisions for over-hatched broods (sell/surrender to rural farms)."
- As long as they are not causing a disturbance or affecting neighbours people should be allowed to have specified wildlife on their property.
- Some people with PTSD find comfort in animals that are not dogs or cats. I support this in those instances, but not as a general pet.
- As long as rules are in place to keep noise down (no roosters) and sanitation/quality of care up.
- Bees/ Hens/ Goats....great way to teach people to appreciate food chain. I would also support fines for those abusing said animals, just like a cat or dog. ZERO PIGEONS!!
- As long as you take care of your animals.
- As long as the animal is not smelly or going to be loud after hours similar to existing noise bylaws.
- Let me have a cow for all I care so long as the neighbors don't mind
- owners of said animals must abide by the code of practice for the animals in question. Seizure from Animal Protection services must be implemented if the animals are not well cared
- Urban hens are a huge success in much of the world. Brings people in touch with animals, allows you to control where your eggs come from, local food, etc! It's time to get on board with this Calgary.
- I think it would be cool to have some more nature around calgary. People might be able to see where part of Alberta's economy comes from and their food. It seems like a great opportunity for new learning experiences, given the persons neighbors/ neighborhood is fine with it.
- I see nothing wrong with this amendment as long as, as said, each differing case is evaluated and the animal is being cared for in the proper conditions.
- I think it's a great project, a limit to how many should be enforced and also bylaw on housing for the birds
- All immediately surrounding neighbours must be notified and have the ability to decline consent.
- Hens would allow poorer Calgaryans to achieve a certain degree of food security.
- All of the above criteria seem suitable for urban hens.
- I strongly agree with having a Chief Bylaw Officer assess livestock on a case by case basis. There are residential places in the city that could accommodate livestock being part of the community, and there are definitely places that could not.

- Chickens are great. The eggs are fresh. And if the standards are met, and neighbours are okay with it, why not?
 - If neighbors support it and the "license/exemption" is revoked if the applicant lied on application.
 - More options would benefit all and I see no negative consequences from this
 - If they are kept well and maintained properly there would be no issue with having hens in backyards
 - Who doesn't like fresh eggs?
 - Chickens are acceptable pets.
 - As long the animals, are cared for properly, clean & do not create a smell!
 - People should be allowed to have small live stock on their property. As long as it is well cared for, both the animals and the surrounding land, I don't see why people should not be allowed to have small live stock, especially birds. People are allowed to own parrots and budgies, and other types of birds, why not chickens.
 - Urban chickens are a norm in many large urban cities around the world. They help keep families connected with the food chain and combat food insecurity. They eat slugs and other harmful garden grubs and provide rich garden fertilizer.
 - Not the city's business what food I produce on my property
 - "The disposal of manure will need to be evaluated. Chicken feces can contain dangerous amounts of bacteria that could make people sick. They would not only need suitable conditions for the animals but also measures in place that mitigate any run off of manure and feces to enter our water system or onto a neighbours property.
- Also roosters in the city would be terrible as they are sooo loud and would crow every morning. Roosters are a no-go.
- Lastly there would need to be continuous check ins with these live stock in the case where the owner doesn't clean up the manure well enough and smells travel into the neighbours yards..."
 - If people can support multiple pets now (cats dogs) why not hens? If they are responsible then it should not be an issue.
 - As long as the neighborhood are supportive and the animal is cared for properly it should be allowed.
 - As long as individuals are responsible for their pets and respectful of others properties. Cleaning up after them, keeping them contained to their own yard etc.
 - If properly managed, this could be very beneficial for families and communities.
 - Small animals fine. No horses or cows (animals that smell)
 - I think people being able to have hens in the city would lead to more education in regards to the needs and benefits of hens and having fresh, traceable eggs.

- I think this could be beneficial for the community as long as there are guidelines in place that take into consideration the animals' well being, and are also respectful of neighbours and the community.
- If conditions are good for the animals and people involved why not.
- If it benefits the community and surrounding neighbors are on board, i don't see an issue with this.
- Also follow up surprise visits to ensure proper care for livestock.
- Having lived in other countries/cities that support urban hens I have consistently seen it be very successful and allows the city as a whole to engage in more sustainable and environmentally conscious practices
- This is a great idea.
- I have no issue with small livestock in urban areas, as long as the noted conditions are met.
- standards and expectations would need to be set. Regular inspections for both bird and community
- I don't see why hens in particular couldn't be kept on someone's personal property as long as they are well taken care of and not disturbing surrounding neighbours.
- Small barn animals should be allowed. People can use hens for food. Poy bellied pugs should also be allowed, as well as small (Pgymie) goats.
- Having chickens would be great.
- I'm not really sure why most of this is necessary with hens when it is NOT necessary for yappy dogs, etc. But I do think that it should be required that suitable living conditions can be provided.
- If they are properly taken care of I don't see why not.
- People should be able to attempt to provide for themselves. Let them have animals as long as they are taken care of - Food sustainability is an issue that we need to be aware of so having access to fresh eggs would be a huge benefit. Also in many areas they are using goats to get rid of problem weeds, the goats eat the weeds, they get fed, and in turn they fertilize the area. A win win situation.
- Only with the regulation that hen houses and yards must be at least four metres from neighbouring property/fence line, and there is a restriction on number, no more than six, and no roosters.
- I support responsible ownership of backyard chickens and other livestock deemed suitable.
- As long as the owners are responsible, people should be allowed to enjoy the benefits of livestock.
- I think this is a good idea as long as they are given good living conditions, and dogs will not be blamed if an attack on a hen happens.
- In a small numbers on property, well maintained and not a nuisance to neighboring property
- If a property had sufficient space to accommodate hens and the neighbours supported it, I'm not in objection to people keeping hens
- There shouldn't be a problem as long as they are being properly taken care of.
- Urban animals should not be restricted to only hens
- Livestock animals can be used as therapy animals and people should also be allowed to have the benefits of home grown eggs
- humans should be allowed to care for reasonable livestock as a means to provide for their family as long as the livestock are protected and properly cared for.

- I support the hens
- Why not? Everyone should be able to it's part of growth and learning how to grow in agriculture and raising your own food(eggs).groceries are getting expensive and I think this would actually help some of the lower income people feed themselves.
- So long as the animal is not a nuisance in the neighbourhood and is being properly cared and looked after, I see no issue.
- Anyone should be able to have livestock as long as they have the means and space to support them.
- limit the number that can be owned
- You should really have a "maybe" answer that allows people to consider an amendment based on conditions the City would impose. You're forcing people to agree or disagree, which is bad form in a survey.
- Hens are not harmful to neighbours. Minimal noise and no concern of damage to neighbours' property (unlike pigeons!)
- Hens and other livestock can help sustain a family economically as well as emotionally
- I think domestic hens is a great idea!
- There needs to be a specific reason why the request is being made and the neighbors should have a voice in the decision
- I agree only if the living conditions are acceptable and nextdoor neighbours are contact prior to and have given their ok.
- I think community hens with proper checks and balances in place are a great idea. They support mental health and can be a great way to teach children about where their food comes from. Plus delicious eggs.
- Responsible ownership can create a great environment for other livestock within the city.
- What animals my neighbours keep does not matter to me as long as they are cared for
- Teach children how to look after an animal that supplies food
- I think urban farming is great as long as there is the proper resources for the participants
- I'm always happy to have more local food sources
- Yes! Allow chickens! Those low income individuals would then have a source of food and potential income, and sourcing locally is always better than importing.
- People should be allowed to have whatever kind of animals they want as long as the animals are being cared for properly
- Having hens is great for teaching kids and you get locally sourced eggs that can be shared with the neighbors
- As long as hens are properly cared for and neighbors agree!
- Health considerations would have to be considered for the handling of stool
- Communities that allow Hens could provide eggs in farmers markets, ect. Boosting small community economics.

- Fresh eggs from chickens, pot bellied pigs are wonderful pets. The city needs to be less restrictive in what animals are allowed to live in the city. Obviously large animals like cows and horses wouldn't be acceptable.
- Yes but with strict policies to ensure as time goes on and neighbors change things remain fair for all involved.
- As long as someone is a responsible, good pet owner, then the type of pet (size depending) shouldn't matter
- this seems reasonable
- Would like to see support for responsible animal ownership, for example chickens.
- I agree to the criteria in general, but am curious as to what animals are being considered. I fully support the option for having laying hens in the city as per the criteria.
- Factory farm produced eggs are far more cruel than backyard eggs. It is a sustainable way to shorten food miles and provide food security. Hens should not be butchered however, they should be protected as pets.
- its about time!
- As long as support is given from neighbors that no smell, noise or other concerns arise. This would need to be revocable so if there are complaints it could be felt with ie excess noise, smell
- As long as the livestock isn't causing a nuisance then I'd be for having livestock in a city
- Other cities allow them and have no issues
- I support urban farming/ranching as long as adjacent neighbours are consulted and in agreement first.
- Urban hens are a great way to teach children where our food comes from, creating food for their people, and brining an overall joy. Allow urban hens!
- Must be monitored by the City for proper shelter, living conditions, animal health and ongoing impact in neighborhood.
- I personally would love to have chickens given appropriate care is available
- As long as one has support from all neighbours. I agree with all points that were listed above.
- Yes, but with a limit on the number of hens as birds can become stinky
- Livestock can provide calming and therapeutic effects, as well as help our ecosystem
- As long as the animals would be cared for properly and their living habitats kept up to not cause any foul odours, then I don't see an issue.
- I see no issue with allowing livestock in the city
- This is an excellent move and brings the city up to date with the latest urban planning
- The ability to keep hens on private property allows for food for families and sustainability learning for household members.
- nothing wrong with Hens
- I think a case by case basis for other animals is great!
- Hens should be allowed in the city but definitely need to be cared for properly.
- If neighbours don't care. Why should anyone else?

- because they are a food source
- Like other animals they should be cared and cleaned up after without breaking noise bylaws.
- As long as they are not a nuisance to the neighborhood. And respect the animals that already live there. Like beehives intuitive. You have to disclose to your neighbors you have them, and agree to respect habitats.
- Lots of other cities allow this. I believe Edmonton does.
- As long as the owner can provide for the animal, and keep it safe, and cared for in a good space, then I support it.
- If the correct precautions are taken to exercise, food, shelter and provide the animals with a positive environment, I believe it would positively impact the communities and those considering moving to Calgary.
- If the neighbours say yes, go for it.
- Sustainable backyard food growing should be allowed and supported, including chickens. Anyone who abuses this freedom and does not support the chickens adequately should be punished to the same extent as other animal abusers.
- urban hens would be a fantastic addition to the neighbourhood
- With ever increasing grocery expenses, I feel people should have the right to own livestock for the purpose of their own survival so long as the owner is courteous of their fellow neighbors and providing the necessities for the animals well being.
- Another great local food source.
- Yes with the above criteria
- Animals bring a lot of benefits, from providing food to teaching responsibility. However there needs to be a sufficient team readily available to respond to cases asap so there's no unnecessary animal suffering.
- As long as the animals are taken care of properly, we should be able to be more self sustaining.
- These bylaws have been successfully implemented in other jurisdictions.
- I think urban livestock is fine, so long as they are properly caged, especially at night. Something like this could potentially Lure in predators such as Coyotes, which could harm residential areas.
- People should have the right to have small livestock for personal use if all is humanely kept.
- As long as the animal is cared for and the property doesn't end up a complete mess, owners should be able to provide for themselves. Whether it be eggs or anything that helps people be self-sufficient, but with some rules in place to protect homeowners around them.
- If the involved animals are well taken care of and the neighbours agree there is no reason to not allow these animals
- Hens and small livestock - yes.
- Great educational tool for children.
- Chickens should be allowed anywhere in Calgary as long as they have proper living conditions. Just please don't allow roosters
- .

- With a limit to how many animals a household can have. They also must be humanly taken care of. Those rules should be relatively strict as well to insure they are being cared for properly.
- Strict guidelines on how many hens a person can have and purpose of having them.
- I want a pet cow.
- I believe livestock ownership should be introduced as a collaborative effort with City and residents, with information sessions, and plentiful resources available for first-time owners on proper care and sanitation requirements.
- As long as it doesn't bother your neighbours, why not?
- I want a pet pig.
- Suitable living conditions should be enforced for an animal
- I love this idea so long as the animals are properly cared for
- As long as hens are kept in safe/humane conditions, I do not think they are a detriment to the community. I do feel it is important to limit the number of hens allowed per lot.
- It shouldn't need to benefit the community. It shouldn't disturb others, and should have adequate seasonal living conditions.
- I don't see any harm in this at all. Could be beneficial to communities.
- Calgarians should be allowed to have livestock as long as they have the space and resources to care for the animals.
- I don't see anything wrong with someone having livestock as long as the animal is in a good environment.
- Seems acceptable, however antagonistic neighbors may choose to attempt to assert negative impact based on personal animosity. Case by case evaluation of antagonistic neighbors may prove to be time consuming, delegation of investigation of facts may prove to be necessary.
- If we can have dogs and cats, why not goats and cows.
- There would need to be enforcement on proper hens accommodation (protect against predators and enclosure to prevent hens escaping, safe heating), location of accommodation (outdoors, garage), noise control, sanitation (smells, insects, discarding off, products allowed to be used to control any of these)
- It is important to many families to be able to eat locally sourced food were they can control and know exactly what they are eating (organic, non gmo, no hormones, antibiotics etc
- I would support different kinds of animals in the city as long as they are following the same rules that dogs and cats have to follow by not being let off property and not being a nuisance to neighbours and people surrounding them.
- Chickens are fine in a city but maybe not larger livestock.
- I think the point about neighbours is critical but also potentially difficult to achieve-neighbours move out and new ones move in.
- Keep in mind adjacent neighbours WILL change and neighbours now may approve but future ones may not.
- Hens are a great addition to an urban garden.
- The criteria needs to be strict to ensure the animals welfare is indeed met

- I grew up in a community where livestock was permitted given the conditions of the living area was adequate and it had a profound positive effect on the community.
- As long as nuisances (odour, pests, noise) are under control, these animals could be of value in terms of mental health
- X
- I hope your bylaw enforcement officer is at least trained in Zoology, or has Agricultural knowledge and training, so that there are no surprises or mistakes on judgements.
- Have a proximity to neighbours minimum requirement and square footage of land requirement
- People deserve this option.
- As long as suitable living conditions are provided and neighbors are not disturbed, hens should be allowed, like a cat or dog
- As long as neighbour approval is received. Neighbour approval should be able to be revoked if the livestock becomes a nuisance.
- If benefits are proven, neighbours agree, suitable living conditions provided for the livestock, no objections.
- Sustainable living and humane raising of animals within reason should be allowed. Especially if the intent is to use the livestock animal as food.
- I like hens.
- People should be allowed to keep a limited number livestock as long as they are properly educated on the care of the animal. Maybe there should be a licence for it to ensure people can properly care for the animal.
- Don't know much abt hens
- As long as the animals have suitable living arrangements and can be cared for properly, I'm not opposed to people caring for livestock in Calgary.
- Animals of different varieties are no problem in some situations and not good in others. Case by case provides a fair assessment
- they are hens, let them exist here
- It would be good for the local economy (small restaurants and possibly entrepreneurs)
- Backyard chickens for collecting eggs would be OK.
- Let people do what they want on their property do not interfere you communist local government
- I think that if all neighbours are fine with it people should be able to have urban hens. If people can treat their own hens properly this would reduce factory farmed hens in the egg industry.
- It doesn't affect me one way or the other. If a person wants to raise said animals it is their prerogative.
- If neighbours are in agreement that an animal is suitable and possible in their neighborhood and it would not be a hindrance to others then there is no logical reason to not allow it.
- Yes, as long as there is written consent from neighbors.
- Only if there are precautions sk that neighbors arnt impacted.
- With support from neighbors and positive impacts I agree.

- Hens are a great idea to create a somewhat self sufficient household for eggs.
- Food security and sustainability should be a priority for the city and for citizens interested in urban agriculture I fully support bylaw changes to facilitate urban agriculture needs.
- the benefits of owning laying hens is well known and their needs are low (small space, contained coop, do not fly etc.)
- I fully support bringing more self sufficiency in to our communities.
- "If you can responsibly provide for livestock on your property, then you should be entitled to Ownership"
- As long as there is neighbor and community support this should not be an issue
- I think it'll be a great addition to any community who support local livestock. The community can reek the benefits and provide an environment for children to learn from right in their neighbourhood.
- As long as the neighbors affected by the new additions to the backyard continue to be ok with it. Hens provide exceptionally valuable self-sufficiency our government is very much against, but they absolutely can be noisy and create unpleasant smells that would impact the neighbors from rightfully enjoying their own property. An appeals process should be in place so if neighbors previously agreed but have changed their mind, the owners of the livestock must be given an opportunity to address the concern to alleviate the problem and keep their livestock. This could just be handled with some kind of write in situation if the neighbors wish to remain anonymous or cannot resolve the situation between them amicably. Neighbors send their complaints to someone overseeing the program who then works with the livestock owner to either remediate the situation or supervise the removal of the livestock. Take the cost out of one of the mayor's two pensions. It's our money, let's do something useful with it.
- As long as people are taking appropriate care and they are not nothing anyone else you should be able to have what ever uou want as long as not a danger to others . If I had a mini horse in my backyard who is that hurting?
- No real reason to seclude them!
- If you allow hens, why not other livestock? They would need a good sized property to support the animals and neighbours support, so I would support this amendment.
- There no reason why we shouldn't allow this already.
- As long as the hens had appropriate husbandry and approval I think it would be beneficial for people to have their own hens
- Other cities allow hens... why not Calgary
- I think overall having certain farm animals could be a positive, provided they can have an appropriate habitat and they aren't a nuisance (smell).
- I think as long as animals are not a nuisance to the surrounding neighbours (ie smell and sound) people should be allowed to keep them.
- I think more people are looking for food sustainability. More natural management of green spaces and just the education of having animals in correlation to our existence can only benefit our society. Perhaps getting us further away from Factory food settings and back to more sustainable humane living

- As long as the animal's needs are met with access to proper care and enough space to be suitable.
- Allowing people to produce their own food (eggs) is a positive thing for residents.
- If the conditions can be met I don't see a problem
- Hens are not noisy or smelly. One concern I have - what happens to the roosters?
- As long as the livestock were not disruptive, taken care of properly and removal of waste was done regularly.
- I feel small livestock for food should be allowed. Nothing bigger than a pig. Also providing the neighbors say it is ok prior.
- Sustainability is something modern societies need to work on, and individual households providing food for themselves outside of the carbon emitting factory system is a great start.
- It will teach a life lesson and also how to get and make own food.
- I'm unsure of the condition of ensuring that neighbors are supportive. I think for residence that are close together this makes sense as a courtesy, but if the hens wouldn't impact neighbors in any way I think it wouldn't be as necessary.
- Good way for people to learn about how difficult it is to keep livestock and where their food comes from. Should have mandatory training done by people in agriculture/university so that they can learn about biosecurity and disease prevention (etc).
- Only if it's done in a way that is able to keep the hen houses clean and sanitary and is not a nuisance to the surrounding neighbors. You could even go so far as to require permission from neighbours surrounding the property, for houses close together in suburban neighbourhoods.
- As long as it doesn't cause harm or inconvenience to others, it's all good.
- Having a hen or two can help control weeds, plus provide eggs for the owner. As long as the area the birds are kept is maintained and kept clean it's no different than keeping any other animal, whether it be a pet or otherwise.
- As long as hens are living in safe and sufficient conditions they should be allowed.
- As long as the animal is safe and healthy
- As long as the rules governing this are fair and equitable to ALL involved
- I believe hens would be great to help with certain bug problems like ticks
- As long as proper living and eating conditions are met, citizens should be allowed to own any animal not banned or prohibited by endangered species or domestication laws.
- I think there is a way to have hens within the city. This helps with food sovereignty and health of those that have them or share their eggs
- Urban farming has been well received and benefits shown in other jurisdictions.
- I don't think it needs to support the community but it would likely support that family and those associated with it but it would need to be monitored to make sure the animals are being cared for
- Chickens are awesome
- Sustainable living.
- As long as they do not disturb others by noise or smell it would be fine.
- Hens don't make much noise and it's wonderful to have fresh eggs

- City hall needs to let people be people. Stop regulating everything all the time. Some chickens don't hurt anyone and our kids don't even know where food comes from anymore. Let them learn.
- I would love to have the option to raise my own food!!
- It's a delicate line...are we going to have urban goats, cows, horses?
- Responsible owners should be allowed
- As long as the property is suitable and the livestock isn't being kept in poor conditions just because someone wanted them as a novelty, I don't see why not.
- Well why not!
- If lack of support from adjacent neighbours were a sufficient measure to prohibit someone from owning an urban hen, I'd like there to be some reasonable and tangible basis for their lack of support to be a prohibitive criterion.
- I think allowing hens has the potential for a great deal of positive impact.
- If there is a proper environment for them to live in, adequate space and housing. I think certain animals can provide an opportunity for children to learn about responsibility and caretaking.
- urban hens can be a great hobby and are social birds. They can also provide provide a good harvest of eggs and poultry
- On the approval of those living nearby. And that the animals are properly cared for.
- I don't care
- I believe there is a benefit to hens with proper training and facilities available. Of course this is something that would need to be submitted upon application if the resident did not have a large enough yard to build a proper chicken coop with roaming area.
- If they can be kept happy and healthy and not cause a disturbance to the neighborhood I think it could be a wonderful idea to help diversify urban farming/gardening.
- Hens are allowed in Toronto, we should have them here too, as long as their welfare is maintained including winter care.
- Calgary is behind so many other cities that have already implemented similar bylaws.
- There should be a cap on how many a home can have... ie 2 per household.
- have no issue with this
- I have a pig living in my apartment building and he's extremely well behaved, a positive almost mascot for our building, and has been well trained and well cared for. If other people wish the same, I agree as long as the animal can be properly cared for and the space is available.
- Think there are more support animals than just dogs or cats.
- I support people keeping hens to collect eggs for their family. I also support someone keeping a small goat or pig as a pet but no more than 2 goats or pigs per household.
- Chickens and livestock are great if they are kept in suitable living conditions
- Please allow urban hens!! I think that with the criteria listed above for approval of other livestock seems reasonable.
- The more hens the better!!
- Common sense

- Laying hens have always been beneficial as long as adjacent neighbours are supportive and owner properly handles them
- Animals have rights too. We as people just need to enforce them
- If they're properly maintained and guidelines taken care of and met. I'm for it. Don't see an issue promoting opportunities.
- It's a sustainable way to produce food and landscaping.
- BUT... support from adjacent neighbors policy must include scenarios of renters, change of home owners. Support must be renewed as neighbors change.
- Some people can derive a great deal of comfort from a support animal that is other than the usual dog/cat selection. I support the right to responsibly own/have animals in your home regardless of the species. I feel that neighbours should not have a say in these types of decisions if it does not effect them.
- Fresh eggs 100%
- I'd rather hear a rooster crowing, sheep beating, or cows lowing rather than a domestic dispute or my neighbours loud music.
- I think urban livestock is great! Especially hens!
- Should be a case by case matter and you have to be able to provide the space for these chickens where they aren't constantly locked up and have room to roam
- Having chickens or other quiet livestock animals in the city should not be an issue as long as they are taken care of and their living quarters are kept clean.
- Edmonton allows this.
- chickens, ducks goats and even sheep can all be useful.
- Urban hens provide education opportunity to kids, a way to grow your own food, and when contained, cause much less problems than comin roaming cats.
- I think animal raising and urban farming should be a fundamental right.
- Having small amount of urban hens, or other wildlife that would benefit the community and owners is a good idea. As long as you have responsible owners for their livestock. If they're not responsible, have a lot of valid complaints against them etc, they wouldn't be allowed to have any on their property.
- Urban hens are a great contribution to the city and can really emphasize a backyard, a lifestyle, and promote sustainability within the City of Calgary.
- There are many other animals, such as some breeds of pigs and goats that are small enough, that make good pets, and can teach children a lot.
- I see no issue with this
- If a single-dwelling home has backyard space, why not? Why does the government need to be involved in every decision?
- "Again as long as these animals were cared for and kept quiet to adhere with bylaw and people being able to lead a normalized life in their own home.
- Same thing as a dog or cat , nobody wants to hear a dog barking all day all night or a cat meow all hours of the night etc."

- Yes!
- I have no problem with that as long as it's dealt with respectfully and responsibly.
- I would support any bylaws that allowed a person to raise their own food within reason on their own property.
- Makes sense
- While I see the need to be able to live more sustainably, and that includes having the right to raising livestock, you need to be able to do it safely, and in a way that doesn't negatively impact your community and neighbours.
- "Pet bylaws shouldn't be about specific animals. It should be about educating people on responsible pet ownership and if they fail to be responsible they lose their rights to own an animal."
- Irresponsible pet ownership such as, not training of dogs, letting cats free roam; is animal abuse and should be treated as such. These animals are innocent. People are the problem."
- EGGS ARE VERY EXPENSIVE SO TO ALLOW CHICKENS IN THE CITY - WITH A LIMIT TO NUMBER - A FAMILY COULD REDUCE THEIR GROCERY BILL
- So long as it is being done responsibly and with little negative impact I see no wrong in raising chickens. Yes their needs and safety are my main concern if urban arrangements are being set up but I would personally like a chicken or two for the eggs. Self-sufficiency is a valuable factor
- "If the spacing between single dwellings allow, and neighbors support is in place then hens should've allowed.
- Reducing noise from the coop would be my main concern."
- As long as the owners are responsible.
- Neighbours must agree to the increased smell, noise.
- Allow laying hens as they are quiet. No roosters. Limit the number of hens per residence. This is for personal use not commercial.
- Depending on the definition of "other livestock" I agree with this. I don't understand why chickens aren't allowed to be kept. I think as long as the rules for other pets applies (no/low smell, no roosters to avoid the noise that would come with that, I'm all for allowing this. I don't think the "support from adjacent neighbours" needs to apply. You don't need your neighbors support to get a cat or dog. What's the difference with a chicken?
- All for urban chickens
- I believe it is a human right to be able to grow and harvest our own food, but we should be required to be mindful of neighbors that may not support the concept.
- just dont let me smell the [removed] we are not a farm
- Provided the criteria are met.
- If the livestock are pets and arent being bred for slaughter
- Chickens being prime example if supported by community and they have a proper coop/ area for grazing.

- Urban hens are a great way to make a more sustainable community!
- If people want chickens and can properly care for them, why not.
- I want them
- Why not if it helps the family with food, etc...but only small to mediumish size.
- With only 2-3 allowed/property with getting a yearly permit. The property must also be a minimum size. See town of Rocky Mtn house bylaw on this
- As long as neighbours agree to it
- As long as they have support from adjacent neighbors and can provide suitable living conditions, more than happy to allow whatever people want.
- If a person has the means and room to have livestock, it should be allowed, especially during this time when food prices are rising. It is also likely that only those who are truly invested in the animals would take on the raising and care for livestock. For many it would be so foreign to their experience they wouldn't even consider it. There would need to be monitoring of care and housing of any livestock.
- I think its a great idea if done properly and enforced properly. Some people prefer other animals then dogs or cats and as an example hens are fun and produce food.
- As long as the animals are well cared for & not offensive to REASONABLE neighbours, it's a win-win.
- There is nothing wrong with owning livestock if you OWN your house/property and are properly taking care of them. I do not believe renters should have this right as it's a lot of mess for the home owner to deal with when the renter ups and leaves.
- without discrimination of species. With the exception of supporting infrastructure in place for the animal (on private and/ or public property). using the example of bull; if person(s) owns a bull and decides to keep in the backyard. The supporting infrastructure would be strong fences (expenses on the owner) - Covenant to neighbors agreement.
- With the stipulation that the animals do not cause a nuisance / noise issues for neighbours, or the owner does not clean up after the animals
- Support this bylaw amendment to a limitation of the number of animals.
- makes sense
- Chickens are great pets and they give you eggs. What's the problem?
- If there is licensing required that would go a long way in ensuring urban hens are properly cared for
- Neighbours' support should not be required
- Livestock if cared properly should be allowed
- The owner needs to have permission, in writing, from any neighbours that share a fence. If the neighbor moves, no need to get new permission
- I would be worried about too much noise or the animal escaping and running loose in the neighbourhood, if these concerns can be addressed then I would feel better about this amendment. Support from adjacent neighbours would definitely need to be included for me to be okay with this.
- Open to people having some livestock if proper conditions are met
- This would allow for a more sustainable food supply.

- They are harmless unlike nuisance dogs.
- As long as the noise isn't too much why can't people have hens.
- I would add that these additional livestock animals would have to be acquired through adoption only. For example, I'm very against the selling of so-called "teacup pigs" because they don't exist and owners after their pigs reach their full size are very quick to dump them which overwhelms rescues.
- It places onus on neighbours to say NO if they don't want chickens and the associated noise/mess which is unfair. Acreages should be allowed as per the above rules.
- I think having urban "farms" allow to provide food sources (eggs, goat milk, etc) for families/communities and it helps provide a sense of community to neighborhoods
- I think everyone should have the ability to do what they want on their property they choose. I also think consideration of neighbours especially those communities where houses are so close to each other you need to take in smell, sound etc to the fellow neighbours around.
- People have the right to secure food for themselves. It is not up to the city or the persons neighbours to decide on how an individual does this.
- Property size should be a factor - a few hens are less likely to be a bother if there is a decent amount of space between properties.
- People should be able to do what they want as long as they're considerate of their neighbors.
- Of a neighbor can responsibly have a beehive or a chicken coop in reasonable number. Keeping cleanliness and animals/neighbours happy. One should be able to do so.
- Provided the proper health and safety measures are in place for the welfare of the animals, and consideration for neighbours, I see nothing wrong with this.
- No reason this cant happen
- It is good to allow people to produce their own food, if the co ditions are healthy and enriching for the animals.
- Urban livestock seems like a great idea as long as they are managed properly.
- I think that key elements of this for me include: noise and smell concerns, the ability to override community fencing requirements to allow for higher or solid fences if livestock is allowed at the expense of the livestock owner. For example, our community fencing requirements call for an open style lattice fence with a total height of 4 feet. I would not support my neighbour having chickens, goats or pigs with that fence style.
- As long as there is a reasonable expectation of what these changes mean, and that those looking to bring livestock into The City are fully aware of their responsibilities.
- I don't think the neighbours should get a say. The owners need to manage the smell though.
- Hens help keep big numbers down and are a source of food (eggs) for those that have them.
- Animals are great and should be allowed to live and be adopted by people who can properly house, feed, train, afford all items and healthcare for the animal(s). Like adopting a child. All people should be screened.
- no issue with urban hens, as long as they are looked after - cared for and the areas are kept clean and up to standards

- With exception to community benefit, neighbor support, and case by case evaluation. A dog, cat or other currently acceptable "pet" is of no community benefit, or any other reasons listed above. I would not be getting a chicken or a goat to support my community or neighbors. I would be raising them to support my family with fresh eggs and milk. Interested participants should have to apply for a permit, and have certain criteria based on land size available, as well as number of animals, but not have neighbor input as a deciding factor. Some neighbors already don't get along and would deny the request due to personal agenda.
- Hens are wonderful companions, and, when cared for responsibly, can be a wonderful addition to a household.
- As the city expands some farms may be swallowed by the city limits. It is feasible for the farm to still exist inside city limits if it was preexisting.
- It would be nice to have new wildlife in Calgary as long as it's not more predators.
- as long as the livestock smells are contained and disease managed.
- Make sure any animals are well cared for and not being housed in bad conditions (ie left outside in very hot/very cold temps) etc. Removal of animals if they are not being looked after
- This should always be considered on a case by case.
- Heck yes hens
- it is a good educational tool but needs to monitor for cleanliness and noise. Number of livestock should be limited. Maybe a number per surface area limit
- I think it would be beneficial to a community if one neighbor had chickens with eggs. Bring back the old sense of community.
- Properly cared for chickens provide inexpensive nourishment for families.
- Done within management and care standards many small livestock animals can be beneficial for having a fresh supply of eggs etc. Can be good for community engagement, and any can make wonderful alternative companions.
- Helps with people wanting to live a more self-sustaining lifestyle, as long as the animal is properly cared for. Hens are not as loud, as long as a rooster is not introduced.
- As long as safety is maintained for animals and people nothing to oppose
- I think that the urban management of livestock and poultry increases the community.
- would need to be reviewed case by case to ensure the welfare of the animals.
- Raising hens seems completely fine. The only possible issues I could see are noise complaints, or maybe outdoor cats/dogs attacking them.
- As long as the property is visited first for there to be proper care and space for the hens and the owner has a permit, it seems fine.
- As long as livestock/property are clean, healthy, well kept, and respectful to neighbours, I do not see an issue with having smaller livestock, like hens.
- I support this to an extent. I believe that hens/livestock would have to have the benefit of having a large place to roam, and be owned by someone who can continually maintain a clean and appropriate living conditions where the animals health/quality of life isn't being put at risk. Being a farmer/rancher is a full time job that requires experience, therefore, would require someone who has time to care for the hens/livestock

- Case by case is important. Every situation will be unique. The support for adjacent house holds is also important and should be considered... Some people don't want to live by avian smells... Absolutely no animal should be housed in inappropriate habitats. Our climate is unique and if an animal will be housed outside there needs to be appropriate heat sources, cooling sources and environmental enrichment.
- As long as everyone's needs are met, I don't see a problem with this.
- Chickens can be beneficial
- If the neighbours approve I don't see why not
- For rescue purposes as well it seems fitting to make exceptions to allow urban hens and small livestock
- if the animals are on the owners property and are healthy and well cared for I have no issues
- Creates more jobs and sustainability in Calgary
- I like chickens, as long as it is ok with neighbors and the hens are well cared for I don't see why not
- As long as the owners are responsible and respectful, this should be allowed to give families an option to raise hens.
- I think that this is a great program following the other community's that allow it. Great for family bonding and mental health
- People are looking for ways to save money & raise their own food - as long as it wasn't a nuisance I don't know why it would be an issue?
- As long as hygiene and nuisance standards are clearly outlawed and enforced.
- Fresh is best in my life, so I think if I could raise my own with proper care then why not ?
- If the neighbours have no problem with it, then should be allowed
- Must attend classes
- Limits to the number of hens per square footage of their living conditions imposed. And a majority of "neighbours" instead of merely adjacent (we have troublesome next-door neighbours who would reject our proposal for hens just because they could - if, say 5/6 of people surrounding our place - across the back alley, for example - agreed, majority should rule to bypass jerks)
- Local produce is better for your immune system. As long as this is regulated and enforced properly it can help our community.
- Some animals yes, cant fit a horse in a bungalow yard. Cant be slaughter animals. Proper care must be given to the animal but should be able to have egg hens.
- Chickens would be great for more locally produced that people know havent been injected with hormones etc. The only thing I would want to see is that the City do a regular inspection of people owning livestock to make sure they are being cared for properly.
- I guess I support this, but would be concerned over a possible increase in dangerous wildlife like bobcats and coyotes within residential areas.
- City has no place in how people get to feed themselves, a very basic human right.

- If it is possible for them to live healthy and not disturb/or have support of neighbours, then I don't believe it can be seen as negative.
- If there is suitable coups for the hens to live in this makes sense. The problem will be the cleanliness of the property over time.
- I feel with proper standards and quality of care implemented this could allow for a connection to nature for those living in the city and create a greater sense of community!
- If all the criteria is filled it can be a great learning experience as well as access to fresh homegrown products.
- There are many types of livestock that would be happy living in a backyard and they wouldn't cause a whole lot of grief to the neighbours. I like the idea of the neighbours needing to approve it first as well.
- This will protect livestock rather than have people hide animals in poor living conditions.
- I have no say in what my neighbors do with their land. Raise a damn velociraptor for all I care, as long as it is sufficiently contained.
- Not new ownership but perhaps be grandfatheres in.
- Neighbors on either side of property must agree and any odor issues should be addressed immediately.
- If there is space and neighbours are respectful of one another, I don't see a problem
- Seems fair if the animal is thriving.
- I believe that calgarians should be allowed to have other livestock as pets as long as their abide by any bylaw regulations and that the animals won't cause a nuisance for other neighbours
- Any way to allow people to be more self reliant is a good idea, as long as it does not interfere with neighbours.
- Hens and other live stock should be allowed on private property
- As long as it was controlled and managed appropriately.
- If all criteria above were met then I do not see why not but I cannot think of other livestock that could happily live within the confines of an urban yard. I do not support this for livestock larger than a dog.
- Sure, have a hen. But how can we be sure it doesn't spread disease?
- Because not everyone can afford rural living & would still benefit from growing their own, even if it's in town
- When cared for properly hens make wonderful pets and provide food
- If your going to allow Hens that would be rather loud and nosey adjust your current definition of a nuisance dog. I'd rather live next to a dog that barks at people passing by then hens.
- All animals should have this criteria, owners should be able to prove they can provide a safe and healthy home for all pets
- Again if the animals are well cared for this is a non issue
- Especially during covid it would give people who may be unemployed income potential and a way to feed themselves. As long as there are no male roosters.. they are loud

- The benefit of raising hens has to be balanced with the safety of the animals as well. They provide a positive environment and resource for those who raise them and there should be bylaws that protect them as well
- Hens can do a lot of good in a home from bug control to feeding people.
- The river city chickens have done well in Edmonton. I think it's a great idea to also bring this to Calgary.
- Who doesn't like working for their food ?
- I want a pygmy goat :) and also I don't see why someone can keep pigeons which provide no benefit but can't keep chickens. Noise bylaws would still apply.
- I support this amendment fully. As for the question on pigeons below, they should be considered livestock. If a racehorse is livestock then so is a racing / homing pigeon, if a chicken is livestock then so is a pigeon raised for meat, and if a pet goat is livestock then so is a pigeon kept as a hobby.
- I would love to have chickens on my property to provide eggs and assist with pests in the garden. I'm happy to discuss with any neighbours about this decision and take their opinion into account with this decision.
- Giving Calgarians the option to become self-sustainable with hens and access to farm fresh eggs is a wonderful idea.
- As long as it doesn't effect any neighbors I don't see any issue with it.
- I agree with allowing urban hens and livestock however I feel that the criteria for livestock could be better. For instance, neighbours should not dictate what animals you have, and offers community benefit seems unclear to me.
- As long as there was something to ensure individuals kept properties and cages clean
- Backyard hens should be allowed.
- As long as they did not become a nuisance
- encourage people to eat healthy with their own eggs, garden produce etc.
- It doesn't bother me if neighbours keep hens, so long as the birds are kept in suitable living conditions.
- as long as the animals are kept in a safe and well maintained area and the neighbors have no disruptions there should be no issue
- Urban hens are a fantastic way to build food security!
- It is a good thing for people who are responsible and able to prove that they are capable and qualified to care for a livestock animal to be asked to provide proof of their abilities, and the housing situation.
- It should be required to have written support from neighbors. Noise levels should be taken into account.
- Strict rules surrounding proper treatment of the animals must be in place and must be enforced to protect against the neglect or abuse of these animals.
- as long as we aren't having farms in communities
- Raising livestock provides people/children with food, teaches responsibility and respect, and provides an emotional/mental support system.

- I don't see any harm in this. It may become a problem if these animals ever got the chance to wander off property as there is sufficient wildlife (bobcats, coyotes) in the city that could cause harm to them.
- Turk would be an example of how much a community can love a livestock animal. If they provide benefit to individuals or the community and are not a nuisance, then I support the allowance of them.
- People should have the right to provide eggs, meat, and dairy for themselves
- There is a greater need than ever to be able to grow your own food, and to be able to respect the process of growing those foods.
- It should be restricted to hens.
- Livestock is good anywhere
- Only if the living conditions are suited for that animal
- As long as they are not a nuisance to other Calgarians and are properly cared for I do not see this as a big issue.
- If they are being cared for appropriately, I think hens are fine.
- Keep backyard hen numbers limited based on appropriate biomass, how many hens can live a sustained life in a given area. Hoarding animals can get out of hand fast.
- "Ensure that proper care and space can be given. If the animals need larger groups to feel safe, and enough space can't be ensured, than no.
- Make sure the owners will take care of them.
- Maybe only in select areas of the city, so people can select a residence accordingly, but make sure the areas aren't because low income families can only afford it there, but instead which would actually be safer and better for the animals.
- Also make sure that the chief bylaw officer isn't playing favourites, and is fair with who is and isn't accepted."
- Urban hens provide a slug eating service, help control the pests in gardens and provide organic eggs. All beneficial to the community and it might help reduce factory farming of eggs and chickens.
- If it's on private property and the person who owns said animals can care for them effectively then I don't see a problem.
- Ensuring that the animals are beneficial and properly cared for. It could increase predators in the area.
- I do NOT support the need for "support from adjacent neighbors" -- it is not their property, nor their choice.
- It would allow for people to have farm fresh eggs at home!
- It sounds like a good idea
- Hens are undisrupted if cared for properly.
- some children are more annoying than livestock and they're not banned...
- If the animal isn't being a nuisance and taken proper care of.
- As long as the neighborhood is respected in terms of noise and smell, I think that encouraging personal sustainability through mini agriculture including livestock, is a good thing.

- As long as there is responsible ownership
- Having small livestock can be a good source of education for children and it can provide food security. The manure from these creatures can be used as fertilizer and their presence can reduce pests.
- Airdrie has a chicken pilot project and so far it seems to be going well. As long as people in Calgary actually take care of these animals and they aren't abused, neglected or left outside in the winter to freeze to death.
- I believe as long as the animal has the right living conditions. Why not have it as a Domesticated animal
- I think livestock in the city limits should be allowed if taken care of. They can allow for a more sustainable food system and can benefit the community.
- Promotes a healthy biodiversity
- Allow public to learn where their food comes from
- As long as high standards remain for the treatment of the animals on the property, I agree.
- hens are easy to care for and quiet
- During such uncertain times in a pandemic, having the ability to harvest eggs at home along with our small yard gardens would help tremendously for those of us who are immunocompromised and would prefer not to go to the grocery store.
- People should be allowed to provide their own food security at home when appropriate
- Allowing people to keep hens or livestock gives people the chance to be more in touch with where their food comes from. It also allows people to make more environmentally and economically conscious efforts with how they consume food.
- People should have access to their own eggs, and improved life in caring for such things
- Other cities allow backyard chickens. Why wouldn't Calgary?
- I agree with the criteria above
- Growing up on a farm with many animals has taught me lessons I otherwise would not have gotten in a City. Having hens on your property (to me) is more than a pet, it's food.
- Hens provide food sustainability
- Seems to support idea of urban food sufficiency. Training must be required in all aspects.
- Backyard chickens and other urban agriculture is historically appropriate and improves environmental conditions
- If you have enough room and resources to have hens then I don't think there is anything wrong with it.
- Yes
- Livestock, when there is space available, make great additions to the community
- Calgary is literally the only city that doesn't allow urban hens etc. they are quiet and if taken care of, not smelly and enjoyable for the most part
- Why not? As long as it doesn't impact others, I don't see a problem.
- Livestock needs room and if they have everything then it's good

- I don't see a problem with hens.
- More sustainable local food with minimal impact. A good idea.
- Yes, as long as it is VERY specific conditions. Most locations are not set up for holding livestock. I think if an inspection were done, this could work though.
- Many forms of livestock can live harmoniously with population.
- Yes I like farm fresh eggs
- This is a great step forward
- hens are great if well maintained.
- I'm a dual citizen that lives in both the Portland Oregon area as well as Calgary. In Portland hens are allowed and cause no problems at all. I'm definitely for it
- Gives access to food
- "Chickens are awesome
- And provide food!"
- I think hens would be good, other animals too large.
- I would support people owning hens, pot-bellied pigs as long as they have the space to do so.
- If the above criteria can be met I see no issue. I would only suggest regulated numbers of livestock be kept to a minimum and suitable to size and type of property apply.
- Sure. As long as the animal has a good enough living environment and it doesn't infringe in the neighbours property or peace while in their home.
- As long as your neighbors are in agreement and proper living conditions and treatment can be established this seems to be a good responsible way to bring hens and other animals to a city setting.
- If they're properly taken care of I don't see it being an issue
- People should be allowed to keep animals as long as they are responsible owners. It will ensure quality food. Organic eggs are to expensive and factory farm eggs are cruel to animals.
- As long as the animals are being respected and taken care of, it's not my business unless they're in my backyard
- As long as the animals are not a nuisance or bad odour, all good.
- YES. All the yes. Why is Calgary, a farm town, so far behind on this? Food sustainability for the win!
- keeping of chickens can be dirty and smelly and not all areas are suitable - has to be some input from neighbours but should not be completely disallowed either
- Urban agriculture improves communities. It's science, they have multiple university classes explaining the benefits. Talk to an ag rep or the sociology department and do it properly but overall a great idea.
- Of livestock can be kept in the city without causing undue duress to neighbours then it should be allowed
- Good idea
- I do not support factory farming. I don't believe it's possible to properly care for each animal when you are processing hundreds or thousands per day. I think that residents being permitted to have a few hens on their property would be a good way to encourage people to be responsible about where their food comes from. However along with this I would hope that there would be regulations in place to ensure animal welfare as it can be a challenge to inspect welfare conditions when its on someone's personal property compared to a larger farm.

- As long as there was a limit on the livestock the owners would have to ensure the cleanliness of the coop.
- as long as animals are not noisy and don't have bad odours
- Keeping hens is a great eco friendly option and is successful in many surrounding cities and towns
- If you can provide for that animal it's needs why should anyone be able to say no
- Hens are a low nuisance addition and can provide a valuable food source. If we want a more sustainable and food secure city this is a good idea. Plus, it is a harmless hobby.
- I believe that livestock, like chickens don't have a place in the city.
- It's important for people to be able to grow and produce their own food; not everyone can afford the inflation in grocery stores and this affords them food independence and security.
- This would be good?
- Why not? Hens, goats, and alpacas are great pets
- No roosters and limit the # to prevent excessive odor and noise. Proper confinement with time restriction and noise suppression for sheep or goats.
- raising hens is great
- Having citizens have the right to have hens in the city limits would allow any person who wanted to to harvest their own eggs, raise their own chickens, which could be an incredible aid to families looking to eat less factory-farmed foods, and also allow others access to food more freely.
- They're harmless
- Certain animals of course
- If animals such as urban hens can be kept humanely and in a sanitary fashion, there is no reason why it should not be allowed
- As long as there would be no roosters allowed
- With permission of neighbours and that the upkeep and cleanliness is maintained
- As long as rules and regulations are in place to make sure it's being done properly and in a health conscious way, sure.
- However a minimum number must be set, no roosters and roasts must be inspected yearly or two times per year to insure the living conditions of the hens are acceptable and do not encourage pests/rodents.
- How cool would it be for my neighbour to have a goat.
- Hens lay eggs. What's wrong with being able to supply our own food?
- na
- I would only ever support this decision if the animals were properly cared for.
- Citizens deserve the right to support themselves.
- Having animals in your own yard should be your right as a property owner.

- Especially for support animals
 - Chickens have done well in other urban environments
 - There is no viable, scientific evidence that indicates a negative impact of responsible controlled livestock on a community.
 - "spillednt to the bylaw to allow owning hens but with strict standards and criteria to be followed.
- When I was a child my family kept hens (in the UK, a temperate climate).
 - Keeping hens results in vermin presence due to spilled feed, hens will kill and eat mice but rats are too big."
 - As long as properly cared for (like all animals), hens and livestock should be no different than having other animals on your property.
 - Food insecurity is a challenge faced by many Calgarians. Allowing people to produce their own food through urban livestock continues to decentralize local food production and increase access to food.
 - If it makes sense and the livestock will be well taken care of, then why not
 - I'm all for some chickens!
 - As long as these animals were given proper homes/enclosures, etc.
 - Urban hens is a great idea that has worked well in other cities in Canada. I would love to have take part in this program.
 - Livestock are good for cutting grassy areas. Goats are great for potentially even helping the city with a dandelion problem without the use of herbicides. Pigs and Chickens make great companions for kids with autism. I maybe wouldnt allow a horse or cow to live in the city just space limiting, but smaller livestock I dont see a downside to.
 - no issues with this.
 - seems fair.
 - .
 - Urban hens are incredible, they offer so many benefits to the owners and are less irritating to neighbors than barking dogs, wandering cats, or loud children
 - I always support organic living if you want fresh eggs everyday this is a good way to do it
 - So long as rules for minimum living conditions for livestock are stringent.
 - Great pest control
 - many livestock are benefitial to the environment and community. Seeing and interacting with livestock also can release endorphins, reducing feelings of depression and suicidal tendencies.
 - Chickens are fun
 - Opening up options for people is a good idea.
 - Yes yes yes. Hens are a lovely sustainable animal; however would just want to make sure they are kept in clean and appropriate conditions
 - Only for fowl, no other livestock
 - hens are a good thing

- Responsible pet ownership = all animals deserve a loving home.
- Chickens are gross but each to their own I guess.
- N/A. Sounds good.
- Large lot residential or acreage only
- Owning hens/other livestock is a wonderful opportunity to be more sustainable.
- Urban chickens have been successful across Canada.
- If they're kept appropriately I see no issue with it.
- To each their own! If it's a healthy environment and ok'd by neighbors it shouldn't be an issue
- Although support from adjacent neighbors would be preferable, it should not be a requirement
- Concerns about attracting wildlife need explored. Coyotes etc
- As long as sufficient space & suitable enclosures are present, I think it's a great idea for people to be able to urban farm.
- If animals are being neglected, starved, abused, mutilated and or anything of that nature, people should be charged and not be allowed to pets.
- There is no good reason why hens should not be allowed on private property . The current bylaw makes no sense.
- There is no harm.
- As long as owners are clean and quiet.
- If a person can raise live stock responsibly without adversely affecting neighbours, that is their prerogative.
- This would have to be permitted and inspected to ensure proper welfare of the animals.
- As long as the animals are well cared for, it is not imposing on the neighbours, I think it's a great idea. If promoted properly, it even has the potential to create a stringer community environment. i.e. selling eggs to neighbours.
- Yes! Everyone should have access to a sustainable protein food supply at home. Urban hens have been very successful in other large municipalities around the world.
- As long as people can take care of the animals, and they are only livestock, nothing exotic/endangered, they should be able to have whatever pet they desire.
- If you can have pigeons I don't see why you can't have Hens or other livestock
- I think being able to have a couple of hens & depending on the other livestock is great. It gives people a sense of accomplishment, in being able to provide for their families in a more sustainable way.
- Only urban hens. An urban environment is no place for larger farm animals.
- it would ne good for the city
- There are other livestock animals that are very useful like goats for yards and such.
- Backyard chickens are part of food sustainability. They should 100% be allowed.
- As long as people kept there yards clean and smell free.
- It's important to have neighbour approval.
- Common sense supports this.

- Better than going to the grocery store and not knowing what you are getting
- At any time the neighbors complain about cleanliness/smell the animals can be assessed by the city and the owner may be fined.
- I would be ok with it as long as I don't have to smell any obnoxious odors.
- As long as they'd are well cared for, I'd support urban chickens. Perhaps with a permit scheme that helps pay for an official who will check in on the living condition.
- Responsible Calgarians should be allowed to have a chicken.
- There should still be a limit on number of animals allowed per property.
- exploring ideas is ok
- Hens are a great resource
- I want a goat! Well I would never get one but a mini goat would be so cute, I could do naked yoga in my back yard with one, it would be so zen.
- I think having hens who produce fresh eggs would be great to have for people who want to help reduce the load on farmers to produce eggs
- Small quiet animals would be cool
- If Approval from neighbours provided, I believe livestock -Hens in particular- could only enhance a community
- If the number of hens is not a large number, and the welfare of the chickens is maintained, I support Calgarians be able to raise and home chickens.
- If the livestock is not a nuisance and is providing a benefit then why wouldn't we allow it?
- People should have ethical livestock available if they so choose. It can be another food source for the individual household or community, and allows for more hands-on experience of where food comes from. It is also an alternative to a super market, as we know how pandemics can affect food supply chains.
- Urban chicken farming has been demonstrated to be a feasible option that often does not interfere with the ability of neighbour's to enjoy their property.
- Having back yard chickens can be very clean, non smelly and not loud.
- if people want chickens, let them have chickens
- Hens provide food and are a bird smaller than a dog; they should be allowed everywhere.
- If the neighbors don't mind where is the problem?
- I only support if it is an emotional support animal. Livestock in a neighborhood can get stinky, attract coyotes, and trigger severe allergies. Also, agitate neighborhood dogs. Putting them in an unknown situation.
- As long as the community benefits from this, and good living conditions are in place, it's a good idea.
- However, I Would say no roosters, they are loud and can disruptive, only a low number per household like 2-3. And like any other animal, proper care must be maintained, which includes, cleaning so the smell isn't bad cuz they stink, making sure they have proper shelter for all weather including heat in winter, and proper food and clean water.

- Livestock within the city would improve the communities appreciation of those animals and allow for even closer farm to table meals
- Hens are no bigger than some exotic birds, it just makes sense to allow.
- Specifically for hens, many other major urban areas in Canada allow for this. I feel this is a positive move to make and would have a positive impact on communities.
- The UK and Europe allow it
- With a one day "how to actually take care of this animal" certification course in order to have a species-specific livestock permit.
- Livestock such as rabbits and hens can be a food source for many, and most certainly eggs are. People who wish to help feed themselves should be given the opportunity.
- Pets are pets! Whether they are pigs, hens, mini horses etc. If a person has the appropriate space and means to care for an animal, whether it is considered "livestock" or not, they should be free to do so on their own property, so long as they are not causing undue stress or disruption to their neighbours.
- Chickens are awesome, it'll give people access to healthy food without paying extra and still not know where it comes from
- Only in a coop not free to roam the yard/neighborhood with very strict cleaning rules of feces
- being able to safely raise certain livestock given they have good living conditions and neighbours are not bothered can be a practical and beneficial activity
- With responsible animal care and shelter this can be a benefit to the community.
- To some people they are pets too.
- This would have to be approved on a case by case basis, with all neighbour support, and a way to follow up and ensure safe practices continue to be observed.
- urban farming could bring balance to peoples lives.
- hens are a great way to cut back on some family feeding costs, and aside from roosters are fairly low in noise and neighborhood disruption
- "Some live stock in the city allows for possitive interactions for community Members"
- I don't feel that all livestock are a nuisance. If cared for and kept properly, they can provide many things to their owners, from companionship to cheaper food on the table.
- I see no problem with hens as long as they are well cared for.
- Why not. What's the big deal about chickens. No more nuisance than the dog that barks non stop
- Urban hen programs are hugely successful, and the benefits are great.
- Hens are beneficial and I'd like to see them allowed.
- chickens for eggs, or support animals within reason, ie pot belly pig. No slaughter allowed on residential property.
- Keeping chickens could help families save on grocery costs.
- Chicken and domestic geese make great pets
- As long as they are not a nuisance.

- I would support hens, limiting the number to four to six and providing they are kept clean and with ample space - and it is monitored. No roosters due to their noise. No livestock meant for slaughter. Other livestock for pets only providing space is adequate and must also be monitored.
- if all the above were to be followed
- as long as the livestock is a food source (nanny goat) and not a pet (donkey)
- It's a chicken. Provides food, and are most often an easy to care for.
- A few hens yes 30 no
- Responsible pet owners should be allowed to responsibly own hens on their property
- If certain criteria are met, including welfare of the chickens, size if property, cleanliness etc, 8 would support this.
- No rosters
- I desperately want a city hen. For eggs and companionship.
- I don't see any issue with hens or livestock as long as it is supported by neighbours and it does not become a nuisance.
- I like this because it is evaluated in a case-by-case basis
- Individual people should have the right to have livestock to be able to help support themselves
- I support the above only if the criteria is clear and we have a process and the ability to regularly review the animals and habitat,,, so enough bylaw personell to enforce
- There would need to be guidelines around suitable, cleanly living conditions, but having certain domestic livestock within the city should be embraced.
- Urban hens are a wonderful idea
- Full support of urban livestock if the living conditions are appropriate.
- Urban livestock, if cared for properly would be a benefit to the community
- For all bullet points above
- If the owner has proper shelter and the animal isn't loud or out of hand, what is the harm.
- I think it's a good idea
- As long as it's a case by case basis and they animals are being taken care of, I see no issue. As well as the neighbours are being considered in the decision as well.
- Roosters are a definite no.
- I believe any person can own any animal such that it's basic needs are met, nay, surpassed. A city is not a hens natural habitat and they should only be allowed when that habitat is mimicked to the best standard.
- As long as there are rules for maintaining a clean coop so any odors won't bother neighbours and noise can be kept to a minimum maybe by only allowing them at the back of the yard away from houses
- As long as it doesn't become a problem with noise or smell
- I think small chicken coops should be legal, as long as they are being taken care of properly and aren't frustrating the neighbours.

- If properly cared for, other livestock their caregivers AND the community can benefit immensely from Living together in an urban environment.
- I think any type of urban farming is beneficial.
- That really depends on what other "livestock" you are considering.
- I don't see any harm in people having hens for eggs.
- Urban farming and food production can be done responsibly and respectfully and can support the needy within the food chain
- Backyard hens are a great idea!
- This is a good trend towards making urban spaces more liveable
- When well cared for livestock can provide many benefits. Especially chickens.
- "Considering size, noise, smell (I.e. Pigs and Rooster)
- Chickens would be fine"
- I think that most people that want these animals would know how to care for them responsibly.
- Would be a great way to support the community and local agriculture. So long as strict rules are in place to ensure proper operations.
- Responsible animal ownership is good for people and communities.
- I'm Pro being self sufficient with growing/harvesting your own food sources so feel this would be beneficial
- Its grass roots. There is a lot of learning and community growth that can happen in having livestock. Also, thinking of community gardens - why not community pastures/farms?
- I love the idea of urban hens. And urban farming options and techniques that allow citizens to be self sufficient and responsible about their food supply.
- Support from neighbours is crucial in cases such as this; and I like the idea of taking each item on a case by case basis rather than a blanket statement. All cases are not going to be the same
- Small livestock such as sheep and goats can help with weed control, they also make great fertlizer (their poop) so that can help grow fruit and vegetables gardens in the community.
- So long as above criteria are in place and sufficient resources exist to enforce them
- Pets are pets. if they are well taken care of, not bothering the neighbours, and abiding by appropriate bylaws there is no harm.
- I think it is great to allow for sustainable food sourcing
- If they can properly be taken care of in town why not. It's much more good then harm.
- In the case of keeping hend within the city, people can obtain eggs from them and thus take some of the load off of factory farming and potentially decrease the need for hens in battery cages (providing that those looking to own hens learn proper husbandry involved).
- Calgary is highly populated so to have livestock on your property they would need the appropriate living area and room to move around. Its not fair to have a large animal caged in a tiny yard.
- Good Guidelines are here for number of animals.
https://extension.unh.edu/resources/files/Resource000471_Rep493.pdf

- Great for therapeutic reasons. You can harvest the eggs. The droppings and bedding make excellent compost.
- I do think that support from the neighbours would be imperative. For example, if someone had a rooster that crowed loudly and woke the neighborhood, those neighbours should have some input.
- what reason would we have to not
- as long as they don't bother the neighborhood and are kept clean
- Urban livestock is used for grass cutting for example so would enhance our city. I support it as long as the animals have the proper care and living conditions.
- Urban livestock are a neat and helpful part of a growing city. We have hens in our neighborhood and they are enjoyed by all the surrounding houses. Responsible ownership is key, we don't need more abandoned and neglected animals. Again a short course based on the animal wishing to be obtained would be ideal.
- Urban hens not only provide food they also help to keep down the number of bugs.
- People should be able to choose their family
- I think having a sustainable living environment would be very beneficial. Only if ample living space is provided for the animal and the living conditions are satisfactory. Neighbors also have to approve this.
- I'm indifferent to this
- So long as neighbors don't object, and the conditions are clean, quiet, humane I see no issues.
- Pets like chickens are quieter than dogs, less of a both than roaming cats and provide the owners and usually neighbours with a food source. Goats keep the grass weeded and mowed and again are quieter than dogs with less offensive poop, rabbits are another good animal, turkeys are even quieter than chickens and make nice noises, ducks can be quieter as well and help keep the mosquito and bug population down, naturally. Chickens, turkeys, ducks, etc. Can all also help keep rodent populations down.
- Since the city allows pet animals for pleasure they should allow kept animals for food in a similar manner.
- Why not? If there is appropriate conditions for the animals it shouldn't be a problem.
- Support from neighbors is critical
- They are important to the health and well being of those who need them
- It would have to be on a case-by-case basis and depend on the
- The government shouldn't have a say in what animals I choose to keep. Within reason...
- Being more flexible in what we allow is important. As long as not a noise nuisance
- Sustainability is important and should be promoted
- As long as the owner is responsible and taking care of them I see zero issues.
- Why not? As long as no roosters are allowed. You're not needed for eggs buddies! Goats would be cool too.
- It would help ensure people who had hens were providing good care for the hens. It would educate urban people in raising animals that are used for food and help people be self sufficient

- I like animals.
- I grew up with hens; loved it. Minimal noise and provide an excellent source of food.
- Fresh eggs!
- As long as the animals are housed species appropriate they should be welcomed
- Should require support from ALL residents (including owners and tenants within reasonable radius- no roosters)
- There is ample evidence that backyard hens can be kept in a city without issue. It also helps provide food security to more vulnerable populations.
- I live in a small town where we have hens all over the place.
- The use of farm animals is very beneficial to people and the community as a whole
- Case by case basis sounds great! And don't discriminate about the way a hen looks, the strength or a hen, how strong it's peck is. What color or feathers the hen has or the length of claws it has. Apply the same laws and fines for dog at large and cats at large and hens at large. Owners need larger fines as in like $6-7hundred per event. Having pets is a luxury and if well taken car of should have no issue.
- Self sustained produce, therapy, and an alternative to domestic pets.
- The more self sufficient people and small communities can be the better! I am all for this!
- Under the right circumstances, these animals can be of great value and benefit to individuals and communities
- A max of 3 hens and the living conditions and method of disposal must be clearly outlined. There are a number of different cultures in Calgary, each with it's own way of what's acceptable.
- If hens or livestock are aloud within the city , pit bulls or any other dogs from that family group should be aloud within city limits without special rules , it's not the dogs that are dangerous it's the humans .
- As long as it doesn't negatively effect other people and there are care standards in place
- Only if livestock is properly cared for and not tampered with as you would make sure of with wildlife
- As long as neighbours agree and the animal is safe and is provided for, I see no problem with it.
- I wouldn't want my. With or in my condo having a chicken but there are numerous yards in Calgary that can accommodate it. I feel like adding a square footage to the chicken space needed will help avoid the caged chicken sitch.
- Strict procedures would need to be in place as this could easily be upsetting to neighbours, particularly around smell or sounds
- With education, having hens is a great thing for people.
- There should be a minimum size yard beyond the chicken coup with minimum distances from the house and neighbouring house as well as from neighbouring property line. As well, chickens can be smelly, but with a good system they are not bad. Owners should be required to produce plans for a well designed chicken coup /yard to ensure the best possible conditions for everyone
- Sustainability to the family. Allowing fresh eggs for families. Compost of certain foods.
- Let people own livestock, if they want to raise and take of the animals and have the space for it

- People should be allowed to raise whatever they want so long as its done responsibly and doesn't disturb neighbours/the community
- Positive community impact
- People can be dirty and gross and it could translate outside. Animals make a lot of noise.
- I wouldn't mind having chickens
- Needing support from neighbours is key, however if the neighbours that support you having hens move, then what? (if new neighbours disagree). This will be a tough one.
- chickens are food, should be able to have them.
- Suitable living conditions is key. Ensure follow-up from bylaw officers for any applicants.
- Great learning opportunity for families and provide food
- I think we need more nature in our lives. I grew up with chickens and would very much like to have them again.
- I would support this as long as there are restrictions based on how much space a person has, and that the animals be well looked after
- Hens are great! It's good for people to experience animal ownership and the sourcing of food other than a packet in the supermarket.
- Requires a permit and neighborhood to be notified
- If a resident can humanly maintain hens without the objection of their neighbours there is no harm
- Hens do not cause any issues if they are taken care of properly and housed properly. I don't see it as an issue.
- Food independence is a good thing
- Urban hens are great for improving access to sustainable food sources.
- As long as smell or noise does not become a problem
- as long as noise issues and cleanliness is enforced.
- 4-6 urban hens would take up less room, make less noise, and be less of a mess than a dog. This would also allow people to get their own eggs. I do however think people who own the hens should be accountable. Coops should not be run down and be an eye sore, should be maintained, and be cleaned regularly.
- This would allow more people access to fresh eggs
- Hens only. No roosters.
- "Public education is key to the success.
- Clear guidelines would need to be in place, for the sustainability of livestock within the city.
- What constitutes suitable living conditions for the livestock.
- What uses of the livestock are permitted; pets, food, etc.
- If livestock is kept for food purposes, clear guidelines on where the processing of the animals is permitted and carcass disposal."
- As long as your pet behaves who cares
- Livestock can be great companions/helpers for people who need them. Example: emotional support. As long as al bylaws are met.

- I don't have anything against it
- As long as the person's neighbours agree to these animals I do not see a reason they could not be included.
- Owners must go through a livestock responsible ownership training course (Could be provided online).
- Small livestock such as hens and bees can be massively enriching for city dwellers, and especially in the case of bees, these insects greatly improve the natural world around them through their role as pollinators.
- great idea
- As long as the animals are in a safe and healthy environment. Not causing issues in the area
- would support allowing poultry species, bees, goats, sheep and pot belly pigs in urban areas. Would not support allowing larger livestock in urban areas such as bovines, equines and pigs (other than pot belly pigs).
- Having well kept hens has been proven to provide positivity for both keepers and the neighbourhood as children love them as well. Having your own fresh eggs also provides people with a sense of stability and accomplishment. Hens have been proven mental health support animals so it would be beneficial for city for so many reasons to allow hens
- Food security is important. I fully support urban chickens
- The introduction of chickens and regulated livestock allows for an integrated and wholistic systems as long as conditions and consideration for the animals are first and foremost.
- I don't see any good reason not to allow this.
- Self sufficiency would be with a chicken for eggs
- Na
- I have lived in a community that allows hens and it is a beautiful addition to anyone who owns them. Allows for local homegrown options.
- People are trying to be more sustainable. As long as all neighborhood parties approve it there should not be a problem
- There is nothing wrong with having a pet goat etc. So long as it is well cared for and has a suitable living area
- But there was to be a very outlined manual regarding this.
- Animals should be cared for properly
- Feed ur family with them
- Chickens have so many benefits including emotional
- I think this is a great idea for people in thr city as long as the neighbors immediately affected by ot are okay with it.
- Hens, chickens, small livestock pose no threats in the city
- As long as the owners are taking care of the hens properly and keeping their space cleab. I don't see an issue.
- Why not?

- If an animal is properly cared for and can live happily within city limits, it should be allowed.
- No roosters
- I only support it if the quality of life for the animal is exceeded
- Because it's 2020 and we've been talking about this for over a decade. Hens don't make noise and provide food from your yard.
- Emotional support animals come in all shapes and sizes.
- Goats
- "Love the idea of having chickens. Love the idea of knowing people who take in old farm animals etc.
- Love the adequate living conditions part by I would like to see what that entails."
- I think the proper number of animals considered it's a city and then of course proper husbandry, respect for neighbours. sounds , smells , sights all under control
- Hens are no bother. No roosters however
- Chickens r good
- I am all about urban hens in Calgary. They offer so many benefits locally and globally. Hens are just like household pets. They love cuddles and have distinct personalities. Plus you can eat the eggs so we can get rid of all those nasty gmo'd caged chicken eggs and start supporting local food and self sufficiency
- I had chickens growing up ... provided necessary coops are created, maintained and clean it's not much different than any other pet ... however roosters crowing may be unacceptable for many perhaps urban hens are only allowed when people have a certain amount of property or they are kept in a similar fashion to urban shared gardens
- It is great to have more animals in the city as long as there are standards and standards are met.
- I think the amendments are fair- welfare of the hens is important and getting permission from the neighborhood is a great idea
- People of Calgary should be able, under the right circumstances, have a pet under the list of livestock. More homes for animals.
- As long as neighbours are okay with it.
- An animal that keeps to themselves and benefits the ecosystem is a yes in my books
- As long as the individual seeks consent from all neighbours who would be affected.
- There are some people with limited income that if they properly care for this animal will gain food security. Also very educational for children.
- I believe that the hens could be a natural source for food and this would be a good idea.
- People should be able to own whatever livestock can properly be accommodated on their land. It is our right to eat.
- I think having hens etc. In the city would not only provide doos but a community coming together. Who doesn't want fresh eggs instead of purchasing them? Self sufficiency with this virus is the only way to go! Aa well who says dogs and cats are the only pets you can have, goat mow your lawn so no loud noise on a sat or a sunday, I would rather listen to a goat then a lawn mower on the weekend

- Within limits I support the proposal
- People should be allowed to raise hens and poultry
- Grand idea
- Everyone should have the ability to produce their own food. Chickens especially, are easy to keep and are actually entertaining and relaxing to watch, which is something we need in times like this
- welcome all the animals
- Would help out a lot of people
- It is necessary for the animals to have a good life through support and good living conditions.
- Common sense says...
- As noted in that is being considered is supported.
- Some times these animals will be a support animals, unconventional yes, but the person may be allergic to the conventional animals
- As long as coops, yards animals are kept clean and its in an area that's kept clean and has enough space that I'm not being kept awake all night or woken up early in the morning by it what business is it of mine what my neighbor does.
- As long as the animals are NOT being exploited for breeding, selling, and/or eating. As well, living conditions should be equivalent to that of a pet; habitable and healthy for the animals.
- Nothing wrong with other livestock given the criteria.
- It should be on a case by case basis as long as the hens have a safe place to live.
- If proper measures put into place Good quality of life in all aspects living space, feed, treatment, etc responsible owners should be allowed to have the choose of what they own.
- Everyone has the right to grow and produce their own food if it doesn't cause a substantial nuisance
- Decisions should be made case by case
- I like all the requirements
- As long as the hens are being looked after properly, I don't see a problem with people having them.
- This opens up educational opportunities for growing & caring for ones own food sources & accessibility to these things for communities
- If the chickens are kept in a clean and quiet manner, not being a bother, and are elevating their owners' enjoyment of life then why not?
- backyard hens are awesome. Would def need to be limited to certain neighborhoods so people can move away if they don't like being around them
- I feel this is an excellent amendment. As long as suitable living conditions are ensured, having urban livestock is a sustainable practice that offers a better quality of life for the animal as opposed to farmed animals.
- Hens are less of a nuisance to neighbors than many dogs.
- Hens can be reasonably kept in coops and can provide a source of food.
- Livestock in moderation would help struggling families during these difficult times
- These guidelines seem just
- Limit number of animals and have enforcement of acceptable living conditions

- Allowing people access to local produce is extremely important. Having the ability to supply your household with eggs and other such food items would help a lot of struggling families.
- As long as the animals are well cared for, I think this would be a great addition to our communities. That being said, the penalties should be clear and concise for those seeking to harm these animals.
- Sourcing your food as locally as possible is in most cases environmentally sustainable - will likely reduce in factory farming that is both harmful to the environment as well as the wellbeing of the hens.
- Hens and other livestock should be allowed in urban areas as long as all they have suitable living conditions and are not a nuisance to neighbours
- I feel the hens could bring a goodness into our city
- In particular, having chickens would ease some of the poverty in some of the neighborhoods. Having fresh, free eggs for a family can help ensuring that they at least have some protein if they can't afford other basic foods. Plus it can help provide some small monetary gain for whoever owns the laying hens. No roosters though. Roosters are far too loud for residential areas.
- I think you shouldn't be limited to living on a farm to own livestock or hens provided they are cared for appropriately
- I believe there are many animals that would be wonderful in the city for enrichment and food sources.
- If done responsibly, there is no issue
- Many types of animals can be turned into a pet and so long as they aren't a nuisance (smelly, loud, etc.), I don't see a reason why they should not be allowed.
- Food production (personal) is important in today's uncertain world.
- Yaaaaassssss
- As long as the animals have proper care (food, shelter, comfort), I do not see an issue.
- Cost effective. Low maintenance. Healthier than store bought poultry and eggs.
- AS long as the hens are cared for properly, I see too many animals outside in the freezing cold in the winter, I am assuming that there should be some additional education or licensing for people to make sure the hens are well taken care of
- I really see no reason not to support this, if reasonable restrictions/conditions are followed.
- I believe hens and other livestock such as small goats can be beneficial for the community and owner and can generally be non intrusive to the public.
- You should be allowed to have whatever animal pleases you as long as it has room to flourish and doesn't bother neighbors. Bothering neighbours should be limited to smells, sounds and potentially destruction of property. Eye sores should not be considered because it is a personal opinions if something is ugly to the eyes or not. Removal of some birds if you keep offending the basic rules.
- Only if they have a shelter or housing for the birds and a system in place to take care of the sanitation etc,
- hens are completely fine to own within city limits. During my childhood I lived in a town that allowed this and it was fine. Still unbelievably dumb that the city is wanting more animals and less pitbulls.
- As above

- Wellbeing of an animal should be at the forefront of these decisions. That being said I'm all for anything that takes away from the large corporations that do not treat their animals in such a way.
- If enough space is allocated, why not
- I think if the individual has sufficient funds, expertise, and space to provide adequate situations for the livestock it should be okay as long as the livestock does not have the ability to go onto other property and as long as a majority vote of the neighbours agree to the terms.
- If neighbours are okay with hens, and if people applying to have them take a course in care, then I would support hens.
- More hobby farming and regenerative farming is necessary. We should do all we can to encourage people to avoid factory farmed meat.
- Chickens in particular, if well managed can be so good for gardens as insect control and fertilizer, not to mention fresh eggs.
- Will allow residents to start seeing where their food comes from, educational for kids
- I don't see a problem with this
- If the environment, space, care and health is adequate for the animals. Written support and standards to follow (ie. health, cleanliness of animals and environment) from surrounding neighbours may be beneficial for any future issues.
- By all means have hens but don't punish responsible dog owners
- I think urban homesteading will help our economy and bring people more stability and home joy. Chickens are great!
- Only if there is good collaboration from neighbors.
- I would have no issue with neighbors wanting to house hens.
- "Support local
- Farmers - even in your backyard."
- This bylaw looks to be in the benefit of the animal, so I approve.
- If neighbourhood is okay with the smell and noise it shouldn't affect anyone else. I'm not sure people entirely know that chickens keep early hours and need constant maintenance as well as attracting coyotes so community should be informed.
- Make sure there is adequate space and living conditions are healthy
- Common sense 101
- Why the heck not?? I am 100% in support of this as I see it as only a positive action
- I would love an opportunity to rent hens from a farmer to produce eggs for my family Within City limits during
- .
- What is 'other livestock? Need more clarity to fully support this
- free run eggs so much better with suitable living conditions.
- If the person whom wishes to keep these animals can care for them properly and they will pose no issues then it should be allowed
- I think many people and communities would benefit from this

- Considering the price of groceries why shouldn't people be able to raise livestock for family consumption.
- Yes if this was a mutual agreement from surrounding neighbours, there was adequate space for hens and between homes, and humane conditions.
- Heck yes let's get agriculture into urban spaces. Monotype areas lead to sprawl, one of the worst things to happen to a city.
- "Having lived on a property with livestock (chickens included) a hen house smells bad. And you can smell it for about 200 feet away. Further if the wind is blowing. It's bad. And the smell doesn't go away when the chickens do. That smell permeates the ground.

- Also, livestock living in cities and urban centres was how plagues kinda happened for the last 1500 years. If people are having difficulty picking up their dogs poop in a park, do you really think people will figure out how to safely stop livestock viruses/parasites/bacteria from entering a heavily populated area? (I got cryptosporidium from the farm with the chickens. You don't want that spreading to people who, say, prepare food or care for elderly.)

- Inner city livestock, if it is going to happen, needs more restrictions than anything else. Livestock in urban centres are so very dangerous."
- It's absurd that sustainable use of homes is restricted, if we can grow reasonable amounts of food we should be able to have reasonable amounts of food animals.
- As long as livestock have appropriate living conditions and are not a nuisance to neighbours there is no reason they shouldn't be allowed in the city.
- Sustainable living.
- "If each Calgarian had two chickens, they could provide enough eggs for a family of four! Chickens are fairly quiet & easy to take care of.
- BUT the adjoining neighbors should be able to object and have a right to have chickens removed if they are not taking care of them properly and causing a smell in the neighborhood due to improper care."
- With proper guidance and rules it could be a positive situation for some lower income families as long as the animals are treated with respect
- I have heard of it working well in other cities
- Responsible ownership supported by neighbors. However an annual review with consultation with neighbors would be required. Owners would need to demonstrate that they continue to uphold high standards of care with no "disruption " to neighbors. In saying that, this could become an onerous task and financial burden on the system.
- Yes, this is in line with many other municipalities across Canada
- Pets are pets.

- So long as the animals are well cared for, and are not a nuisance to neighbours, I'm all other livestock to be considered.for
- I strongly support having hens in residential homes
- Why limit this to hens only?
- However discretion can not be 1 person. Opportunity for appeal.
- It is a good idea moving forward from the debacle of 2020. Self sufficiency and community support by way of therapy animals and food (eggs).
- The stipulations are adequate. Urban chickens are a great idea!
- I believe the city of Calgary is leading behind in allowing creative options for citizens to manage their own food supply within the city.
- Chickens/rabbits/ goats etc can be a huge learning and financial benefit to owners and their children that can not live on a farm.
- As long as the animals don't create a nuisance (noise, smell etc.) backyard animals can give the owners, fulfillment, additional food etc.
- Hen cages and bee hives would be amazing to have in the city, as long as there is adequate room. Large livestock is unnecessary.
- Fresh eggs are good.
- It'll give people a actual mindset of animals on a farm
- As long as everything is kept clean and organized, and there wasn't any more noise than a dog would make, I have no problem with any animal being kept.
- I used to enjoy seeing horses on 14th st near 90th till the ridiculous barbaric bylaw was slammed on us.
- I am very supportive of urban hens especially as a way to be more in control of where our food comes from, specifically eggs. Urban hens is something I have wanted as a calgarian for many years and I think it's a wonderful idea so long as people care for them properly
- If the animal doesn't affect the neighbors because if the current neighbors are fine with it but they move and the new neighbors aren't, there could be a problem.
- I trust that people that want to do this will have researched what is involved and if there is issues they could be dealt with through bylaw services.
- Easier access to farm fresh organic eggs and better living environments than most chickens
- If the animals can be contained safely, kept healthy and aren't a nuisance, then why not.
- Perhaps only when the property is large enough to support the livestock. Infills with their narrow lots may not be suitable
- I just think this is a great direction to head towards.
- As long as the living conditions are very good for all beings, I support them in all communities.
- every person should have the right to domesticate any harmless animals. I don't see any harm from hens(if they all are fully vaccinated)
- As long as neighbors are advised, have chance to oppose (like secondary suite zoning)

- As long as there are appropriate parameters around this I think people should have the option to provide for themselves and their families.
- I think there should be a limit to the number of hens any household can own--maybe 5 max. To comment on other livestock, I think that size and number should be taken into account, as well as whether that type of animal is typically considered a nuisance.
- Good for communities
- I have a giant garden with a massive slug population. If I could have ducks or chickens helping me out, my yields would be much higher. AND I'd have eggs! Amazing!
- Can't have a chicken unless the proper dwelling is acquired for our extreme temps
- If you can do it with the neighbor's permission, why not?
- Urban farm animals such as hens or other livestock when maintained correctly can be a great addition to a neighborhood and allow many great learning opportunities to children
- It's a great idea.
- With support from neighbours I don't see an issue. Living area and ability to provide an adequate lifestyle for any animals under your care would be important, but you seem to be heading in that direction.
- Especially in our current economic climate we should be exploring ways for people to be more self sufficient.
- Great for sustainable life
- Good for local sustainability
- Livestock should absolutely be allowed so long as there is adequate care provided.
- As long as the animal is properly cared for I support this.
- As long as the hens are treated humanly and is regulated by the city to avoid over populating a small area. However the noise pollution and sanitation may be a problem for alot of people.
- Fresh eggs
- I don't care if people own livestock
- 100% in support for making responsible urban agriculture a possibility.
- Urban livestock is good for communities.
- Many other cities now allow urban hens. Calgarians could benefit from the ability to own hens, and they are not substantially more of a nuisance than any other house pet.
- There is nothing wrong with hens. When treated properly, they are an effective way of sustainable living.
- this depends on the owner and adherence to reasonable care and nuisance reduction.
- People wanting to become more self sustaining should be fully supported by the city and neighborhoods
- As long as there are living conditions that follow the Five Freedoms, the homes neighbours have been consulted and the situations have been examined by someone (or more then one person) having higher knowledge of bylaws and animal health and wellness then I agree with the changes.

- Urban farming and some livestock husbandry is an efficient and ecologically sound practice in many parts of the world. I would not like to see this abused so some strict regulation would be required, but it is a sustainable way of life that should be allowed within certain, clearly defined parameters
- My husband would really like to keep urban hens
- I am in favour of anything that increases food security and reduces reliance on grocery chains.
- pot belly pigs are lovely pets and live well indoors. Calgary covers such a wide area now and some people have large lots and could accommodate some livestock
- Why not? But it depends on what kind of livestock we are talking about
- I have no problem with people keeping hens. People are allowed to keep rabbits which are small livestock.
- I think chickens and such are a great thing to help families that are in poverty help to get a cheaper food choice and also teach children how to care and raise animals
- It would be nice to see more animals around.
- If coop checked and neighbours agree.
- As long as all neighbors are OK with it. And are asked again if one neighbor moves and a new one moves in.
- Chickens are wonderful pets and beneficial animals to have.
- I support urban chickens. Not other livestock unless it's a pot bellied pig.
- Animals including livestock need to be properly cared for. Appropriate guidelines and criteria need to be met to house these animals.
- Sure, why not
- Fresh eggs! Yes!
- If animals/birds are being kept safely and not a nuisance to neighbours- should be allowed.
- Noise considerations should be an important aspect of the permission to own his animals. Completion of a 'care and well-being' specific to the species must be proven to have been successfully completed.
- As long as the animals well being is being met and there's no issues with neighbours Y not
- Livestock needs to have protection and be properly cared for. If this can be proven and all nearby neighbors are okay with said owner having livestock, then no problem. Fresh eggs are nice.
- As long as someone has a location for the animal in a non-shared space or backing onto a green space.
- If the owners are responsible and communicate with their neighbors I believe this can work. Suitable living conditions is a must.
- Definitely support hens, would love a lawn service that brings goats for a short period of time.
- If the animals are properly cared for there should be no reason they should not be allowed
- I think on a suitable property, hens would be a great addition to a larger yard.
- Just so long as the animals are well cared for and not a nuisance to the neighbours. This includes not being too noisy.
- owners should be allowed to responsibly raise livestock in the city

- Sounds fair and reasonable
- I think its important to know where your food comes from and we factory farms are one of the downfalls of our lifetime.
- I think there is so much benefit in having certain small animals in urban areas.
- There should be a limit on the number of hens (say 6-10 depending on the size of the family), no roosters, pre-purchase inspection to ensure adequate facilities. Along with the same enforcement as for pigeons. The only other livestock I would consider within city limits would be a mini pig (inside, 1 per household, registered with city) or rabbits, with limits on the number.
- Controlled amounts of small livestock are very beneficial to all segments of society.
- Love chickens
- If it's anything like using the goats as lawnmowers it's a great idea.
- Sustainability and environmental impact
- I would support this as long as there is adequate space for said animal, and as long as neighbors are in agreement
- Having backyard hens if they are maintained properly are a sustainable food source. Food security is important. Knowing where your food comes from is important.
- as long as the animals are not too noisy, smelly or generate excessive pollution on neighbours property (eg pigeon poop) and kept humanely keeping them should not be a problem
- Don't care either way
- As long as the criteria is enforced. i.e conditions are regularly checked and also can be spontaneously checked (officers can drop in at any time).
- Let's start getting our eggs from our own hens
- If people need emotional support then I will support any animal in that fassion as long as the city approves of the animal but not allowing endangered animals, or snakes or siders,,, ew
- I would love a chicken.
- Could care less but it might up the amount of apex predators coming in for an easy meal
- Urban farming is important and small livestock can benefit people mentally and get them food.
- Food security and self-sufficiency benefits the owners and their community.
- I don't see why not, as long as the hens are properly cared for.
- I like the idea of hens in urban settings, but any other livestock would need considerably more space to provide for the animal. (Pot belly pigs, goats, etc)
- Some Hens/ chickens are Beneficial to People as a Personal Comfort and Stress Reliever Physcologically..LESA
- As long as they aren't bothering the neighbors I don't see a problem.
- Providing there are minimum yard sizes and control requirements I have no issue.
- As long as the neighbours are consulted and in agreement.
- As long as criteria are followed.
- As longs the hens are flightless and limited in number there should be no problems.

- I am all for allowing hens and other livestock in the city as long as suitable living conditions are provided. So maybe some sort of permit system where the owner has to prove they have the space and accommodations to support the animals first.
- I think that having a self contained method of accessing livestock is much more ecologically sustainable.
- I believe that as long as the animals are well taken care of then they should be allowed.
- Absolutely!! That would be fantastic for the health of calgarians nutritionally and emotionally.
- Chickens be ok in city.
- Why not!?
- Chickens are a good back yard animal
- I don't see why not.
- People already keep chickens they just do it in secret so the animals may not be cared for probably. You could limit the number of chickens that allow them to be social but not a nuisance.
- No license fees! We keep chickens to be more sustainable and to save money. Maximum of 6 hens. Maximum of 12 meat birds. (They would be kept for only a few weeks). No roosters at this time.
- I think it's a great idea to have livestock if taken care of properly
- Promotes self sufficiency.
- Again it is about the people's responsibility, if they are good animal owners then fine [removed]
- Urban livestock provides another way for people to source their own food and have more control over what they feed their families.
- Yes
- People should be allowed to own whatever they want in their home.
- I think it would be very beneficial, but people need proper education, and again - sadly - people have to behave responsibly (not sure that it possible :()
- Allowing these animals in the city provides people with a more direct source of food (eggs, etc.) that help with reducing carbon emissions.
- If people are responsible with their animals and keep the appropriate conditions for them and their neighbours I don't see any issue with allowing other livestock.
- The above sounds reasonable to me.
- I support this as long as there is no danger, such as avian flu-like diseases that can be transmitted to human beings.
- support from neighbours essential for this to work.
- There would need to be laws around slaughter and ensuring the meat/eggs was being sold with standard food regulations. I wouldn't mind people owning pets or for personal use.
- As long as it was a need for the home owner to own this type of animal and it was monitored to make sure animals were being taken care of and causing problems for neighbours
- No roosters too much noise
- If people have adequate space and resources to have livestock, fine by me.
- Someone in the law enforcement needs to keep an eye out for things like neglect etc...

- Chickens are great
- As long as there is no harming to the animals involved.
- Within limits... what animals, types of animals, number of animals, noise limits, a more robust complaints process, inspection of health and sanitation and far more robust penalties and fines for abuse, neglect etc.
- Would want assurances on specific requirements that must be met to allow hens in Calgary including housing requirements, food/shelter/water requirements, noise control, cleanliness controls
- Certain livestock, like hens and bees, can be beneficial for our environment and our citizens in an urban setting.
- As long as enforcement is available to ensure that the rights of the animals and Calgarians are protected.
- As long as these animals are properly housed, I think it is acceptable to have hens and other animals in urban areas
- Allow for eggs and natural food source
- Why not try it?
- Practical farming
- I used to have a chicken in Airdrie and I think it is a amazing thing for children to see the entire life cycles and where food comes from
- If the animals are well cared for and are not a nuisance to neighbours there should be no problem.
- Most livestock can be programmed to turn in at night and sleep. Living conditions should need to be assessed annually or every couple of years to ensure they are being kept up to acceptable standards and to ensure the positive impacts to the owner and species is still intact. Otherwise, you end up with someone who decides they don't want to clean out the hen house any more so the hens have moved into the family home.
- "As long as the livestock is not
- Interfering with neighbours or city inhabitants, then it should be fine."
- I would love to have laying hens I my back yard or a goat for milk.
- How many laying hens per property? ?may attract other 'wild animals...coyotes.
- Added benefit to a healthy living.
- Food production should be allowed in every home
- I didn't know hens weren't already allowed. the only exception should be that support from adjacent neighbours shouldn't be required a priori as it is private property, and other pet ownership does not require neighbour support. Neighbours should have a mechanism to submit complaints if other criteria are not upheld, or hens are deemed a nuisance (just like all other pets).
- I'm fine with this as long as the animal is well cared for.
- But there must be limits on numbers of animals.
- I'd love to see hens in Calgary, they provide eggs and education regarding our food supply to children and family's.

- As long as there are rules in place and bylaw responds to issues in a timely manner. Please add No roosters!!!!
- As long as no roosters. Chickens are helpful to reducing insects like grasshoppers. Spraying chemicals is dangerous chickens aren't
- I would be worried about a lot of unwanted chickens- increase of abandoned or birds not cared for properly. You would have to set STRICT guidelines for care
- Hens only
- We absolutely should be allowed to keep eggs and bees in our yards.
- I think it would allow opportunities for people to have more direct and humane access to food provided by livestock, benefiting the community.
- As long as it's safe for the animal it's ok
- Sounds cool as long as people don't abuse the privilege like they abuse Lime scooters.
- It's good for the environment
- There is no reason to prohibit keeping of livestock if their care and the care of the community is looked after.
- Yes, but only animals that do not create noise and smells
- Limit number of hens per household.
- Only a max of 2 chickens per house. No other livestock
- Maybe 2 chicken per property but no livestock should be permitted.
- As long as they dont become a noise or pollution issue.
- Yes if the above conditions are enforced. They should not be raised for eating or other immoral acts & noise bylaws need to take place.
- But the conditions must be humane and set up so as not to increase the coyote activity in a given area of the city (no free roaming, etc)
- i think calgary bylaw enforcment needs to make sure the area is sufficient for the animals , and discussions with neighbours to make sure eveyone is happy with the situation.
- Let us have urban hens but no consultation with the neighbours are necessary
- Opposite of no!
- I do not see any harm in allowing people to have chickens, as long as their welfare is priority and waste/noise is kept to a minimum
- OK as long as neighbors don't feel presurised to say yes.
- I support urban farming
- Contingent on the setting rules on husbandry (eg. space per animal, etc) to protect livestock welfare
- I am all for urban hens, so long as there is a low limit to the amount of hens per household (3).
- I don't believe in keep live stock for human consumption. But as a loved pet it's okay.
- Yes, as long as adjacent neighbors consent
- Several types of animals make amazing pets and should be allowed
- Long as you fan't have roosters, and must keep clean, not a big deal.
- "it would allow people to save some money on things by raising small livestock to consume.

- As long as the noise & smell does not get out of hand."
- Urban farming is healthy for responsible persons
- They are as well domesticated. Licence then. Hire people in bylaw that actually know something about animals, not just police academy dropouts
- As long as hens are kept in a safe and secure facility, why not?
- Hens make good neighbours, provide health and food benefits, and as long as they're maintained properly, are less of an impact in yards. Its a good idea
- Chickens are alright.
- Living conditions must be upkept
- Good idea
- If, and only IF, noise and cleanliness are not an issue. If you are in a high density neighborhood, the restrictions should be higher .
- So long as they don't cause a noise/nuisance I don't care.
- The criteria of "offers community benefit/will have positive impact" is ambiguous and difficult to evaluate. The other criteria are reasonable.
- Would expect special licensing and inspection of living conditions.
- There is nothing wrong with people having their own sustainable food source, eggs and meat, and chickens make fantastic pets!
- As long as livestock are cared for and not a nuisance to others, it should be permissible to have them.
- Wildlife brings a HUGE benefit to mental illness. Especially with farm animals that do not require 24/7 care and can be set to a certain area of property. So long as proper arrangements are made and there is a cap on how many animals someone can have I see it as a great benefit.
- I garden. Chickens would help with insect maintenance.
- "Any animal should theoretically be allowed as a pet as long as it poses no inconvenience to the surrounding residents.
- For example:
- Small numbers of ducks and hens could be allowable because of their small size, relatively low noise, and low risk of harming others if escaped.
- Examples of unreasonable animals would be:
- Cows and horses: too large.
- Roosters: too loud, potentially aggressive.
- Goats: aggressive, potentially too large."
- Chickens aren't a big deal in an urban setting so long as they are contained in a fenced property and roosters aren't affecting the schedules of neighbours.
- Hens are safe and provide a good outlet for people who love having them.
- As long as the animal in question is cared for and is not causing a problem. It's great.
- As long as they meet the requirements which should be pretty strict.
- Bring the rural and urban back together

- If there is a consultative process that involves neighbours, and considers suitable housing and care for the animals, I think that's better than a blanket bylaw
- Many cities allow hens, and as long as their living conditions are well met and they and the environment are taken care of they should be allowed.
- Sweat shop eggs are a huge problem (especially for the poor chickens), it's good for people to connect more with where their food comes from, and Calgary is way too uptight with its NIMBYism, this makes me happy to hear we might be lightening up!
- Within parameters
- The first point is a bit vague but I support the idea of it. The rest is common sense.
- hens only, no roosters, no laying hens if no roosters
- If they are housed and cared for humanely.
- Urban chickens would be good
- they should be able to
- As long as the hygienic standards are increased to meet smaller urban spaces due to disease and infection becoming a greater risk to spread to domestic animals. I would expect property sizes and shelter accommodations would require many adapted guidelines. Also, noise complaint stipulations should be considered as repeat offenders would prove that this may not be a successful modification. Perhaps an annual review for a set duration should be considered with a four year pilot or trial period should be considered.
- These animals do not belong in the city.
- If it enriches community, then it is a good thing.
- yes as long as they are not disturbing others and are well taken care of.
- Food security is an issue. Urban farming is essential.
- No roosters and I'm fine
- no
- This is only acceptable if the yard of the people seeking to have these animals is large enough for the animal and would not negatively impact their neighbours. Absolutely no Roosters.
- if cared for carefully and noise and mess aren't a problem, animals only bring benefits. Wonderful education for children, it supplements one's food bill or provides an income.
- as long as people follow the law they should be able to own livestock
- I like the idea of being able to have my own eggs
- As long as the chickens are properly cared for and not being a nuisance in the neighborhood, why not? Farm fresh eggs, keeps the bugs down, great pets to have.
- Lots of animals provide therapy for their owners. If their living conditions are clean and do not deter the neighbour's property value, then I would not have a problem with a chicken or pig living next door.
- It is past time for urban hens to be allowed in Calgary. They offer multiple benefits and no downsides.

- As long as it has restrictions in number of livestock and does not cause a property or neighborhood to decrease in value due to nuisance livestock
- However, would we be inviting/risking cross transmission of diseases to humans.
- People with large enough space who are responsible should be able to own chickens
- Responsibly kept livestock is beneficial for the environment, food security, owners, and animals.
- Must have approval from Neighbours
- Chickens are not significantly louder or disruptive than other animals.
- Diversity is great. Local is better
- urban hens could be a positive, under the right conditions
- If someone wants chickens for example to feed their family. As long as the premises are kept clean and the numbers are limited .
- Urban hen programs have worked successfully in many other cities
- As long as theres room, the animals are provided care and it doesn't disturb the neighbours I don't see an issue
- Support from adjacent neighbours and suitable living conditions can be provided for the animal are very important.
- Urban farming is the future.
- I see no harm in it if the animals are well provided for and the neighbours do not object.
- As long as the humane treatment of the hens is considered
- There are many places that allow for keeping small amounts of small-scale livestock in urban environments for various reasons. Provided proper measures and standards of upkeep are kept, it offers an opportunity for self-sufficiency and some experience in what raising livestock-type animals actually involves.
- As long as feed isn't left out and it's kept clean so that mice are not drawn to the area
- As long as the needs of the animal and the community are well balanced, I am in complete agreement with this.
- If everyone agrees it's alright is a fair enough restriction.
- I do not support having to gain support from adjacent neighbours. They don't have my consent to blast loud music, use their garage as a mechanic's shop etc. Citizens have the right to a certain amount of discretion on their own properties, including hens. I think it is more important that safe and clean housing is provided for hens, and the ability to inspect the hen house by the city.
- As long as they're cared for and not causing disruptions in the neighbourhood i see no issue.
- Clean up and its fine
- Good for the environment & mental health
- If you are responsible and animals are small, contained and looked after, no different than having a cat or dog.
- I love the idea of backyard hens! It's environmentally responsible too.
- Seems sound

- But must take into consideration the smells, sounds and anything else that might affect surrounding properties and people
- Very important to ensure neighbors are ok with it.
- Absolutely yes. As an elder person, I would dearly love to be able to have eggs for my diet to supplement my pension. I must however point out that obvious good care and cleanliness is most important. Some leniency should be expected during very hot weather as the cleanest coop will have smell issues during very hot days. A coop owner should be allowed to use as much water as they need, without extra fees. Most owners would be giving back to their street or small area, so it would be awful to penalize them with more costs. Such fees could prohibit ability to afford good ownership.
- Please include bees
- As long as the urban hens are housed safely, why not?
- So long as the animals live in humane, safe and healthy conditions.
- Noise Control, pest control, and overall cleanliness Must be factored in to prevent disturbances to neighbours.
- As long as the animals have proper/safe living conditions and enough room, being well taken care of
- Rearing your own animals has many benefits. As long as noise, smell etc is acceptable to neighbors
- The world is changing and there are new realities with respect to how people get their food. This is one way people might get food.
- I think it is a wonderful way to develop sustainable living practices
- I think having access to fresh eggs is a huge asset to people inner city that can responsibly care for hens.
- Only if whatever animal is approved by neighbours. And is taken care of
- With the exception of the second bullet point. Adjacent neighbours should not be given a veto. The remaining safeguards are robust enough to discourage nuisances.
- Food insecurity is a problem as is importing food. Allowing people alternative sources of food by having urban hens or other livestock seems reasonable.
- Just like any animal, if livestock/hens are being provided a good quality of life in the city I don't see why they shouldn't be allowed. And just like dogs and cats, improper care of livestock should result in a fine and/or seizure of the livestock.
- Smaller livestock companion animals acceptable, not large livestock like cattle, enforcement of living conditions and noise, maintenance etc important
- Hens provide eggs and meat. As long as they are kept in clean conditions and well looked after I would support this.
- I always wonder about end of life for these animals. The slaughterhouse?
- if people can care for the animal, its safe and ads enrichment to peoplea lives it should be allowed
- As long as the animal can be properly looked after it shouldn't be an issue.
- That would be amazing
- as long as the criteria above can be verified

- Absolutey chickens, goats, sheep need to be allowed with the rule that you can only have a certain amount of each on your property.
- I believe urban agriculture should be encouraged. Food security, freedom to feed and care for your family, all of that.
- Organic
- Eggs bro
- On a case-by-case basis there should be no problems as long as Neighbors are in agreeance
- This would be wonderful! Eggs year round and allowing children the opportunity to take part in the care and instruction about hens.
- A few chickens are ok but it must be regulated.
- My only concern is appropriate care if the animal: proper shelter, food, water, cleanliness, and adequate space for the species.
- Farm animals can offer many benefits if the environment is right. A few hens in the city that are looked after is amazing!!!!
- I think people should have to apply so that it is ensured they have appropriate facilities for the animals
- People should be allowed to own chickens for egg production as long as they're properly cared for. However, a bylaw needs to be in place for the proper disposal of the chicken once it no longer can produce eggs. I also think there should be a limit on how many chickens are allowed on a property.
- I'm not informed on the issues but I can't see a problem with having a couple chickens. As long as there is a set amount and it's not too high
- Broadly, people should be free to use their property as they see fit. The current ban is government overreach already.
- If neighbours don't care, they should be allowed, if safely and responsibly done.
- As long as neighbours are on board, I see no problem with urban hens
- As long as hens have adequate outdoor space and plenty of fresh air and good and safe shelter.
- Assuming other by laws also applied...eg house bylaws
- No comment
- I support it but I don't think that approval or support from neighbours should be required.
- I think the support from adjacent neighbors is appropriate however the positive benefit and living conditions is highly subjective and I think is already handled with current animal abuse laws.
- "Love city chickens, quieter than dogs too
- "
- Hens are good pets, source of food, and entertainment
- Other municipalities allow hens and I think we could do it too
- Sure, it's not a large animal that needs acres to roam, but shouldn't be penned up continuously either as that's cruel
- If there is responsible ownership in terms of care of animals and pens, I don't see how it is all that different from those who have cats and dogs. Indeed, it is more likely that these livestock would not roam the neighbourhood freely like some cats are allowed to do. Also, I strongly support the criteria of community benefit and adjacent neighbour support.

- I could have a chicken
- Suitable living conditions is the only important thing. A neighbour's opinion of what a person has in their backyard has no merit. If a person is responsibly keeping hens then their neighbours can mind their own business.
- Must be careful with not ruining others' quality of life.
- Being able to consume eggs from hens that you know are healthy is a good thing
- Neighbours would need to agree but how would the city handle a case where neighbours changed and no longer agree.
- I am all in favour of urban hens and think the limitations are reasonable
- Important for city people to learn more about animals (other than cats & dogs)
- Cities need to get on board with urban agricultural options. We are heading towards a food security crisis!
- I would support people in Calgary being able to have hens. However, I think this amendment should include minimum requirements for the animals (e.g., space) and maybe only allow it to people who have a big space, who can clean the animals often, can manage bad smells, prevent disease spread, etc.
- Why not, as long as safe and not intrusive to neighbours in either or one of noise, smell and hygiene.
- If everything was done the right way then I don't see a reason to not have them in city
- Number of livestock. Size of yards
- Local and secure food sources are increasingly important.
- I would support provided that yearly inspections be required prior to yearly permit being issued.
- Very good idea for people to have food sources other than store
- I live by a couple that has chickens, it is a sustainable choice and no nuisance.
- Teaching kids our heritage, biology, taking care of pets, organic food supply.
- Provided they are well provided for, bring benefit and are not nuisances then I see no reason why we wouldn't allow it
- As long as they don't stink or make annoying noise, why not?
- As long as neighbours give support I think this is a great idea
- Thought is needed along with fair, considerate guidelines so all can benefit and those who choose to care for another life is willing and able to take full responsibility for it.
- It's not the animal, or the numbers, it's the owner and their ability to manage, keep quiet and clean.
- Assuming neighbourly support and good animal husbandry, the only question is what constitutes community benefit? If, using an example from elsewhere, pygmy goats were utilized in targeted weed control with local support, I would reverse the implied question to ask why shouldn't we do such a thing?
- I think if the right environment is available for the animals then it could be a positive situation for all.

- Having more local food options is good, as long as it is balanced the animals well being and it's respectful to the neighbourhood.
- As long as animals are contained in yard
- Hens are not dangerous and provide healthy food.
- I'd be happy if livestock were permitted as long as they are well cared for and not a nuisance to surrounding neighbours.
- Urban chickens would be a great addition to the city
- The keeping of any form of livestock should only be permitted if the neighbours don't have any reasonable objections.
- I think it would be great for people to be able to own small livestock like chickens! Makes urban and suburban land more useful!
- May lead to more sustainable living.
- If they can fix any issues with the animal why take it away... just give a deadline for it to be done
- I vote only yes if the neighbourhood should has a say in these types of places and maybe it should be restricted to only certain subdivisions that have the space/capacity for such things
- Tribunal evaluations can be a review process as well when there is controversy
- I think urban hens are a great way for people to access sustainable food. As long as they are cared for adequately.
- I have no issues with livestock in the city as long as they are properly cared for
- hens yes, but not other livestock!
- I think it's a great idea, my only concern is that some people may get carried away and end up having a hen farm in their backyard.
- Would need to pay for ingestion on annual basis and respect Neighbours issues
- Urban hens would provide eggs for the owners, which could theoretically reduce the need for the industrial farming of chickens, and I see no reason not to allow responsible owners the opportunity to have chickens if proper conditions for the safety, health, and humane care of the animals is provide.
- Hens are very beneficial in so many ways.
- If someone is able to provide suitable living conditions and care for an animal, whether they are raising it for food or pleasure is a freedom in my opinion. Neighbours who cant stand animal noise should live in a no pets allowed complex and leave others to their freedoms. I would prefer my neighbours had chickens or pigs then screaming children but I dont have the right to stop my neighbours from having kids now do I
- Again. I have no issues with the animals. Control your humans.
- The ability to raise and properly care for personal livestock animals would increase general health of an urban population. As long as proper care and conditions can be met and the animals pose no risk to the general population. And that waste is disposed of properly and securely
- I don't feel as though I have enough information, but if there is a social or economic benefit to the community and it can go through some sort of trial or we can use another similar urban area as a case study then I don't have good reason to say no.

- So long as the animal and it's excrement is taken care of
- Chickens and Eggs are a food source and people need food security. If having chickens can help someone make ends meet of kids have food, then I support it.
- hens are great pets, and fresh eggs, and teach kids to care for creatures. I've had hens, they are easy, quiet, and fun.
- good to have hens in the city. it has worked well in other municipalities, like Edmonton
- I am in agreement if support from adjacent neighbours is first obtained.
- there are great benefits to keeping hens (in proper habitats) including the fresh eggs, learning responsibility for children, and an alternative to composting for kitchen scraps.
- I don't mind animals but I don't want a rooster crowing or the smell from a pile of manure left.
- You have been "exploring" this for a decade - perhaps you can just get with the 21st century and make it happen
- "Urban hens is a phenomenal idea.
- These animals are excellent livestock, and also provide a multitude of benefits such as natural pest management (for gardens, etc.)."
- As long as the above criteria are covered. Neighbours must be consulted. Chickens can stink and make a LOT of noise. Case-by-case scenarios would be a must.
- With restrictions on numbers, noise, and smell. Distance from property line. Etc.
- I think people should prove that they have adequate space and clean living conditions for these animals
- "As long as owners act responsibly and take care of their pets, along with respect for their neighbours, a pet can be any animal. Why restrict ""pets"" to cats and dogs?"
- This does bring about some limits. It is not feasible or responsible to have a horse or cow on the average city lot."
- Why not. Grew up seeing people have hens and pigs in back yards where I spent my summers in Europe.
- It is important that the well-being of animals is looked after and that issues that may arise from livestock or animals of that nature living in the city are reviewed in an appropriate manner.
- I think calgarians should be able to have some smaller livestock in the city such as hens
- I would support this initiative if it was limited to hens. I think raising of any animals in the city for food will eventually create problems. For example, in the instance of perhaps goats, could lead to people owning far too many goats on one fenced property. Roosters are noisy, and would result in increased noise complaints. Most people have good intentions when the first put in that chicken coop, or goat shed, until all of sudden they have 3 yards of rotting manure, that they cannot transport or are not willing to pay to have removed. This will result in nuisance complaints and possible health risks.
- I think this is a wonderful idea !
- I don't understand why there's such a big issue for chickens specifically. I'd sooner have a neighbour with a few hens than a yappy loud dog. We have a green bin program that can take care of the manure from a few chickens so smell isn't likely to be a big issue. Obviously the same rules would apply regarding noise, smell, etc as with any other pets. Consider separate rules for roosters, but consider allowing them, because no roosters, no new chickens.

- It's dumb folks can't have hens or a small pig, or what ever. Use guidance numbers of pet per yard/home. And make it so reasonable folks can have what they take care of. Throw a bylaw in to prevent smell/noise and each animal needs some licence, or licence the home.
- Blanket bans on moderate animals do not solve a large issue. People complain about roosters because they are loud by-nature. This is a reasonable complaint. People complain about hens because they naturally slightly smell, and are visually messy. This is an unreasonable complaint. Both property and people are imperfect, and this should be tolerated to a reasonable extent.
- Some concerns though for neighbours would be the smell and noise!
- I already have experienced neighbours with ducks and they cheer me up, there's no smell, and they are not too noisy.
- "I think any animal
- Is beneficial to have"
- I would love to have a backyard hen.
- If the owners are being responsible, the animals are happy and healthy, health and safety concerns are being adhered to, and theirs no extensive environmental harm then why not? Who are they harming?
- the community should be allowed to have chickens and other small animals on their property.
- This is a great bylaw to introduce as it's done in many municipalities around the world with great success (Melbourn, AUS... Portland OR, etc.)
- Not only dogs and cats etc can be pets
- I think having Chickens in the backyard isn't a problem at all as long as they are in a suitable living arrangement.
- I believe having animals in urban areas can be very beneficial to people and the environment.
- As long as the owner kept the property clean
- Provided the animals are not disruptive to neighbours and are given humane living conditions, I support this.
- Many cities allow this and it is great.
- Assuming the animals can be properly cared for, and are not a nuisance to neighbors, there is no reason not to allow "livestock" animals to be kept on private property in the city.
- People should be required to prove that they can responsibly maintain hens.
- Most important is support from the neighbours as they would be most impacted
- Don't see a problem with it
- As long as an animal isn't a nuisance, and is suitably provided for; it should be allowed.
- Need adequate space for these animals to live happily. While not effecting neighbors with things like noise or smell.
- It makes sense

- Support from Adjacent neighbors is important. Perhaps an application with signatures before approval of permit is required.
- The ability to own hens could help food security in the long term.
- OK to Chickens, ducks and goats
- I would like to think that most people are responsible
- There should be standards for the welfare of animals.
- As long as it did not become an issue to neighbours by way of smell, sound or destruction of the property being housed on.
- So long as suitable living conditions are provided
- Urban farming is a great idea.
- As long as they are housed and cared for in a humane and clean environment. Additional conditions and criteria need to be in place for winter living as well.
- Should be allowed only if neighbours consent to it
- Urban hens would be great for sustainable agriculture.
- No issue with it as long as there is a way to address issues and enforce people not following the rules.
- Hens eat a lot of nuisance bugs. A natural way to treat the problem
- I think hens, chickens, goats and pigs would be great addition, with rules in place to ensure they do not cause nuisance to neighbors
- People should be allowed to raise chickens if it doesn't impact their neighbor in a negative manner.
- Noise wise, I find a barking dog more offensive. Plus the hens can eat garden pests and provide eggs.
- I like the idea of safely/respectfully having animals in the city
- As long as the homeowner can produce proof that they can provide suitable conditions before they are given the permit. And a public notice supposed to be made to surrounding neighbors. A street sign of 30" x 30" should be put on the lawn of the homeowners property. 30 days prior to being given the permit. I would put an email on the sign. That would be attached to the homeowners email address. But an email issued by the city. I believe we have some thing of my account profile. That email will go into the homeowners email. It would be forwarded to their actual email. By doing this, it would allow surrounding neighbours to try to take their concerns up personally with the homeowner. The homeowner may be inclined to adjust the potential conditions to make it more suitable for neighbours support. However some neighbours are just unreasonable. There's nothing that can be said. Their concerns would have to be disregarded.
- More variety and eggs.
- Again, hold all owners to the same standards.
- As long as they are taken care of, provide a benefit other than companionship, and noise and nuisance is kept to a minimum, I don't see why not.
- Chickens are a great way to supplement the food needs of a home as well as emotional/ mental support for people.
- I think this is fine as long as you have enough space to house the hens.

- The proposed criteria are appropriate.
- As long as noise bylaws are kept intact. ie. no rooster crowing at daybreak.
- The owner needs to share with their community what is new and how to deal with new animal.
- If my neighbor had hens, and they did not disturb me in anyway (noise/smell) I would have no problem. However if a rooster is waking me up (as a shift worker at YYC airport) or the smell or hygiene is a problem then there needs to be swift and direct resolutions for that.
- Chickens don't make much noise.
- This would help families and communities to support local and to possibly make a business.
- Animals other than dogs and cats can be accommodated in an urban situation. This includes pot bellied pigs and other smaller animals. Feces management is an issue with some livestock (goats etc.) as it can get out of control rapidly. These animals should be required to be dewormed or show a clean fecal sample every six months or year. "Latrine" type animals such as pigs are easier to keep clean and maintain in a smaller yard setting. Hens are definitely fine to keep in the city.
- I think we should start and/or continue supporting local food initiatives within an urban setting. We are far too out of touch with where our food comes from.
- If the type of livestock would offer a community benefit I would support this.
- I would support urban hens as long as there are laws in place to prevent owners from neglecting their care
- If it can done in a manner that won't cause excessive noise complaints.
- I don't see anything wrong with having hens
- I'd like to see goats approved.
- We need to learn to live with the animals in which we share land with. This could start exposure for some that do not interact with animals.
- Max of 4 only in residences with back yards.
- As long as the animal is properly cared for and is not a nuisance to others living in the area most domesticated animals should be fine. Case by case though.
- I would love to have backyard chickens. They're a sustainable way to provide your family with fresh eggs.
- I see no harm if approval is required.
- As long as the animals have proper living conditions, this is great.
- With above stipulations
- Good idea
- The idea of the urban environment excluding many animals is changing. Permaculture is teaching us to grow our own food, store our own water. Small scale animal husbandry is another means of securing our own food supply plus add a level of interest and vibrancy to our communities. However, there are some ideas that need controls such as limiting certain numbers. Pigeons for instance.
- "People should be allowed to provide for themselves. Hens provide a food source, just as a garden would.
- FYI.. goats should be allowed as well."

- I believe that other livestock animals with the right husbandry in urban areas can thrive and live wonderful lives. Why should city folk not be able to enjoy these creatures in their homes?
 - we should get with the times of sustainable living. We just need to put limits on animal numbers to size of property.
 - Having a hen to supply eggs is fine with me.
 - People should be allowed to own animals they want as long as the living space is adequate for said animal, within reason.
 - Yes, I support it
 - As long as neighbours rights are respected
 - "There is ABSOLUTELY NOTHING WRONG with having pet hens in the city!!! The ONLY reason the idiotic bylaw was passed in the first place was that Council had a knee-jerk response to bird flu many years ago. This is a fact! I was there!!!!
- If pet chickens are not allowed in Calgary because of zoonotic disease risk, then dogs ABSOLUTELY MUST be banned immediately, because they can transmit MANY more zoonotic illnesses than chickens do. You would also have to ban parrots, budgies, lovebirds, finches and canaries for the same reason. Any claim that public health is the reason for the ban is patently unfounded.
- The chicken ban was enacted by [removed] council members, and was opposed by medical experts themselves. It was a stupid, regrettable action, taken by people who were pathologically clueless.
- There is NO reason whatsoever to prohibit pet chickens in Calgary when there appears to be no limit to the number of dogs, cats, ferrets, birds and other pets.
- Want to keep people from exploiting chickens? Limit the number to 4 per household. While you're at it, dog breeding in Calgary is FAR more obnoxious, unhealthy, noisy and dangerous than chickens will EVER be.
- Allow pet chickens, and specify that their care MUST follow all current animal welfare and wellness laws. Preventing cruelty is a must, just as it is for cats and dogs."
 - Having small chickens and ducks or one goat would not be harmful to the neighborhood.. but maybe a cow wouldn't be.

- Urban farming should be given a fair chance.
- Think that this is a good idea
- Urban farming can increase community engagement and learning about food and health
- Unlike a dog for example, productive livestock offers a means to sustain our community.
- Chickens should be allowed
- I think this is a great thing as long as the owners are taking care of everything included cleaning up after them
- As long as the animals had acceptable living space.
- I think sustainable living is a positive approach, as is an increased understanding and awareness with where we get our food (i.e. eggs).
- urban farming has created many positive outcomes. I lived in Vancouver for a few years and saw how urban or shared garden concepts and increase happiness and community involvement from a base level. It should be noted that with animals an livestock proper education is required for the success of raising animals in this way.
- If there is suitable space and pen and the approval of immediate neighbours and regular check ins for maintenance.
- Chickens are a good source of nutrition and keep insects and ticks at bay.
- I believe this should be allowed but permitted at a community level
- With regular inspections to ensure the above is being met.
- As long as neighbours have a say and can have recourse if it doesn't work out
- people should be able to have livestock as long as they have the space
- As long as health and safety standards are met, I have no problems with urban livestock.
- This really does rely on people being held accountable and responsible, and if they are, having chickens in the city would be wonderful. This will encourage predators so as long as coyotes or other animals coming in are not killed for doing what is natural for them.
- some small livestock is beneficial to the environment.
- There would need proper upkeep of pens and not bother others.
- Please keep urban support animals allowed for the vulnerable population who requires this unique support.
- I think that urban hens, provided that they have the suitable living conditions that need like space, then I agree. Urban hens could provide people with eggs for personal consumption
- Na
- As long as there is enough room, adequate nutrition, and they are cared for, they should be allowed.
- I like the idea of people having the option to have livestock in Calgary
- I would like to see ducks allowed as pets in Calgary
- Being able to have hens for eggs is awesome if they are freeroaming in your backyard. They must have adequate housing and space though. I imagine many people would complain though about noise and maybe smell.

- As long as suitable living conditions for the hens are provided, including indoor shelter in winter this would be a great way for people to have access to fresh eggs and meat.
- Ok but neighbours cannot be disturbed by smell or noise.
- As long as the animal is not causing disturbance, destroying property or violating noise by-laws. This will give our residents opportunity to potentially eat better (eggs) at a lower cost.
- Provided the hens and livestock are properly contained, keeping them from private property and roadways where they could cause traffic accidents.
- Eggs are good
- As long as the livestock are for personal use in residential areas, not for breeding/ sale of the animals or their products (eggs, etc.). For restaurants or markets, then the sale/use of their products would be ok by me as long as rules above are followed and enforced.
- As long as the animals are well cared for and the owner's know how to care for animals (including respect for any affected neighbours) I have no trouble with the amendment.
- If the live stock is too loud they should not be allowed within a certain distance from neighbours
- I support people being able to feed their families
- Great idea
- animals of all types have been raised in all environments for as long as we have recorded domestication. As long as hygiene issues are resolved and this doesn't impact neighbors. There should be no issues. There are many benefits to urban animals
- I believe urban hens, have the advantage of being both pets, and, providing fresh eggs. Other livestock, e.g. goats may be beneficial on larger residential lots for environmentally friendly weed control. Any individual(s) who have urban livestock would need to have appropriate knowledge for care (it would be wonderful to have some City sponsored education and support programs), and, have the appropriate amount of space for the well-being of the animals.
- As long as the animals are not a nuisance or disturbing the new neighbours then they should be allowed. The initial consultation should be with neighbours adjacent and 2 doors down then make it known when selling the house that there are these animals and the new home owner can't complain about them being there as it was an existing condition prior to them owning the property.
- If small livestock is allowed it's crucial to have Bylaws in place to insure the well-being of the animals and insure livestock isn't a nuisance for neighbours (noise, smell, etc).
- People should be allowed to she any animal they want as long as they take care of it properly and it doesn't bother anyone else.
- If adjacent neighbours approve it and the owner can demonstrate safe, healthy living arrangement for hens then I think there should be no problem in allowing them
- "nothing wrong with having chickens as long as the neighbours don't
- mind"
- Food diversity and sovereignty for at risk communities and everyone in general benefits from less strain on food chain supply.
- Exception-only permission to be granted, only upon evidence of (i) noise/smell/pollution mitigation measures; (ii) animal-welfare measures; and (iii) informed neighbour support.

- I would support this amendment because of the case by case evaluation. I have no problem with urban hens.
- Hen laying eggs are a great asset
- Urban farming is a great way to be sustainable
- Yes, but only if living conditions for that animal are met.
- Hens, provided their housing facilities are kept clean, are a good source of eggs. They are also very calming to watch. I love hens! And bumblebees.
- Support from adjacent neighbors - not including rental neighbors. Even if the neighbor has been a long-term renter, I don't think a renter should have a say in what a permanent resident is doing. It is much easier and cost-effective for a rental neighbor to move if they don't like it. Plus, a rental can change tenants and the hen owners shouldn't have to get rid of their hens if the new tenants don't like them, nor should they have to wait until new tenants are there that support it. Tenants should not have a say.
- I have no problem with people providing themselves with other means for household food. As long as it's clean and humane.
- As long as the owner is able to properly care for the animals and they are determined beneficial for the community it is a good idea.
- I have seen hens kept successfully at several houses in Victoria BC. I think it is a great way to promote food security. My only concern is that the chickens be provided proper protection from wildlife and the elements.
- It will increase food security, connect the owners to animals and their food and just improve the world in general.
- If done properly, this could lead to healthier lifestyles
- I love urban chicken coops! Lived in a neighborhood that had many in Somerville MA and it was delightful
- Are roosters included? They can be loud. I would support hens but not other livestock.
- Only if criteria are strictly enforced. This has the potential to flood CHS with surrendered and seized hens. Could cause significant impact to neighbors if left unchecked.
- Hurry up with this, please.
- Hens can be used for emotional care and city farming should be permitted at some levels. weed growing is allowed
- Urban farming is something that Calgary should be embracing much more and the fact that small farm animals aren't allowed has been beyond frustrating. Goats, hens, and other small livestock are not only fantastic companions but useful and can provide nourishment.
- Urban hens allow people to meet their food needs in ways that should be accessible to more people. So long as the animals are cared for and the neighbours needs are met this should be allowed.
- Increases the ability to have a self sufficient lifestyle
- I think many city properties should be able to create pathways for sustainable living. Having small animals to assist in providing food for families should be encouraged.

- Livestock should be allowed in city limits to an extent. Having consent from neighbors is good. What would the legal tape to get through be? Will the city make the process so difficult that no one will be able to acquire livestock? How expensive will the city make it to get livestock? Will a permit be required? Will you have to register the livestock with the city? If so, what are the related fees?
- As long as a livestock animal can be properly cared for in an urban environment, I can't see a reason to exclude them
- This would need to be strictly enforced and licences issued, neighbors in agreement etc.
- Hens are good for the environment and provide a stable food source, especially to those who are lower income.
- I want chickens.
- Hens are quiet and easy to maintain. We have chickens on our acreage and they are wonderful!! No roosters though :)
- As long as the existing neighbours within at least a 5 house radius agree with a household having chickens, then I don't see a problem with it.
- Immediate neighbours should be afforded greater veto powers
- I would like to raise Hens for the potential food & health benefits they could provide.
- support from neighbors must be obtained
- As long as there's a limit on how many per household
- It should be a human right to keep livestock on private property
- As long as animal needs are more than met and these standards are upheld, I see no problem with it.
- Makes sense
- Provided that conditions are in place for properly housing urban hens, I believe this can have positive impact on people's lives. Having said that, support from adjacent neighbours has to be in place to avoid conflicts.
- I think urban hens are a lovely addition to neighbourhood - obviously granting that they are well homed and properly taken care of.
- Chickens all the way!!!!
- All animals deserve a good place to live.
- I support the consideration of neighbors, as well as the possibility of exceptions. Some clarity as to what "offers community benefit/positive impact" is could be useful.
- I believe that, as long as the animal is properly cared for, people have a right to choose what type or breed of animal they wish to care for.
- Any law that involves animals being treated with respect and having homes is a good law to me
- Anything is worth exploring and trying out.
- As long as the hen cages are kept clean, there is no detriment to having a supply of fresh eggs.
- Provided they can supply and keep up with the animals needs with ample space and time I think small livestock would be acceptable
- Urban agriculture is a positive movement for cities!

- Having hens on property is a good and healthy way to grow your own food and if cared for properly don't cause any harm
- I grew up with a chicken coop in my backyard in a densely populated European village and there was no nuisance, only fresh eggs
- As long as the welfare of the animal is continually checked upon. No residential killing of the animals should be allowed ever.
- Yes but would limit the number allowed per household
- It's not okay to disallow people from providing themselves their own food.
- As long as the animals are not being abused and have the space/ needs met then I support it.
- I think as long as the above criteria are followed livestock should be allowed.
- It would need to be highly regulated as the privilege could be abused and the animals may not be cared for correctly.
- People should be able to have hens if they desire
- Many different species of animals can add to the quality and enjoyment of human life. It would be beneficial to add this small rural value to urban living as long as it was not a nuisance to the community and neighbors.
- If a plan can be presented where there is adequate space/shelter/care provided for the livestock and impact to communities and neighbours is positive the livestock should be approved by the chief bylaw officer after reviewing each case application.
- Any animal can be a pet.
- Yes.
- What if the citizen is an excellent poultry parent and you have a crappy neighbour?
- I support any animal ownership that is in the interest of improving health and in the animal's best interest.
- This sounds like fair evaluation criteria.
- With restrictions
- Great Idea
- Only if the owners are responsible for mess, noise and other costs. Owners must be responsible chicken owners.
- Only with proper restrictions, licensing, insurance and enforcement.
- I believe if a suitable living condition is met and neighbour's are supportive, why not!!
- Yes, as long as they aren't a nuisance to neighbors and smell.
- As long as proper care and cleaning are done to minimize odour and disease
- there can be any benefits to having controlled livestock in the city like many other places in the world, including food security, agree with above criteria and kept to a limit.
- They dont hurt anyone
- as long as the correct living conditions can be provided the animals should be allowed
- Being able to sustain your family is not a government right to be given or taken away other than for the safety of the animals.

- There should be yearly check ups on the proper way of housing livestock and their needs.
- As long as hens are taken care of and in a suitable coup i have no problem with this
- "As long as hens are used for eggs and not meat. I would not want my neighbors killing hens next door. The smell and screams would be unbearable.
- Otherwise I think this would be great."
- Positive impact for community but must ensure safety and care or animals.
- So long as the animals are well cared for, their coop/living area is kept clean, and not causing a disturbance (ie: escaping, destroying property, smell becomes pervasive).
- Other small livestock in very restricted numbers.
- Urban hens can provide citizens with eggs which is a source of good protein.
- many people can benefit from this!
- "Limit #s of animals based on size of property.
- Licensing required"
- As long as neighbors agree and living conditions are suitable there shouldn't be an issue
- Calgary is so far behind in allowing urban hens compared to other districts, the city needs to catch up on this, however licensing of chickens should not be needed or required, only approval of the neighbours. Other livestock should be allowed provided they are not a nuisance to the neighbours based on noise and smell concerns. Example: horses and mini-horses, donkeys and goats allowed, pigs, roosters and cattle should not be allowed.
- As long as the adjacent neighbours are not negatively impacted then it should be fine. Dogs barking every time someone walks by and cats roaming are dealt with through enforcement, noisy chickens or odours could be dealt with the same way.
- As long as the animals are well taken care of I don't see an issue
- My answer is contingent on Case by case support - the degree to which this is acceptable is case dependent
- This is a great idea!
- Yes, especially with COVID being more self sufficient is an important thing. Animal health and safety should absolutely be top priority
- Hens allow for greater self-sufficiency and joy
- Regular inspections should be a condition of annual licensing.
- Could be good idea if criteria are followed properly
- It is important that neighbouring property owners are notified and are supportive.
- Suitable living conditions are key. A horse obviously would not do well in a city. Therefore, I feel with this provision, any livestock to be approved would not be inappropriate in a city neighbourhood. Support from the neighbours is also extremely important. Livestock can be loud and smelly.
- Yes! Having worked on farms myself as well, and lived in places where most people have chickens, I don't see it being a problem at all. I would say it's more important that we educate people as to how to take care of them, just like pets. It's not the hens or livestock that are problems, it's the negligence of the owners. It's important for community resilience, and food security.

- Calgary is far too populated to have livestock in most areas. This should be looked on a case by case and possibly limiting the numbers
- hens should be allowed to be owned by everyone
- Provided the livestock have appropriate living space, quarters, healthcare I would be fine with people having them
- I would accept this as long as they have a clean living area
- If people want livestock let them have them
- Urban hens should not require support from adjacent neighbors. Would 'other livestock' be a defined list of species? I support a flexible law able to accommodate unusual situations.
- Domesticated animals should be allowed in domesticated areas as long as they're properly cared for and not a nuisance to adjacent properties.
- If someone wants a chicken or other livestock as a pet or otherwise they should be able to, so long as the relevant bylaws are followed.
- So long as neighbours are okay and it provides mutual benefit
- I've wanted urban hens for years and think it's great for sustainability and self-reliance.
- I have no problem with this.
- Livestock have practical benefits and are less of a nuisance than conventional pets. Dogs bark, cats often wander or get into gardens. Hens are quiet and provide a source of food/income, as well as properly maintained goats.
- Producing local food is better for everyone and the environment
- I fully support this bylaw and would more than like to take part in this
- Only if there are strict protocols about manure disposal and noise.
- This would depend on how many, property size, cleanliness
- There are certain livestock that provide opportunities to reduce our environmental impact.
- I think it would have to be pretty seriously regulated so that chicken illnesses don't affect farmers
- Hens must be kept in community 'housing or spaces'. Not allowed in each person's yard, as that would cause more problems than what a pit bull causes!
- Food is expensive and people want to be able to grow and support themselves and shouldn't be fined for doing so. Many of my friends want to have chickens and can't for fear of bylaws
- Providing hens are monitored to ensure adequate conditions. Should be a site inspection and permit granted.
- It's time to change the way we think and this helps
- Depending on the space available and living conditions for the animal can be supplied and they are not a problem for those around them
- If the animals are treated humanely and if it reduces the purchase of people buying animal products from slaughterhouses e.g. eggs. Then I support this. Again as long as the animals are taken care of and not abused
- As long as animals can be cared for properly and are not a nuisance to neighbours then they should be allowed.

- everyone should have the right to grow their own food and if they can do it safely then it should absolutely be allowed.
- Owing chickens is fantastic. Fully support that. Not sure what other livestock could be applicable but the criteria sounds reasonable.
- By having hens we are allowing people to have a healthier option for fertilizing lawns and gardens as well as food source.
- As long as everything is regulated.
- OK with this if noise and smell are controlled.
- Love the idea - locally sourced eggs to share with neighbours etc - as long as they do not become a nuisance to neighbours.
- As long as there is space, I see no issues with this.
- Having chickens is a delight. Source for eggs and improves soil
- I don't wholly support it but think there are circumstances it would be beneficial.
- "I don't believe we should be restricted from raising chickens as pets or as a potential food source. As long as the situation doesn't get out of hand and affect o
- Neighbors negatively, it shouldn't matter what animals
- People choose to keep if they're caring for
- Them properly."
- As long as a household can properly care for and maintain said livestock they should have the ability to do so as long as it does not impede the welfare of themselves or others
- Yes bc it's okay.
- Chickens are by no means mindless farm animals. They are incredibly smart and so long as adequate care is provided and the chickens are not used for food, they may be allowed to be pets. However, they should only be allowed on their owner's private property.
- I think it's a great idea! Hens are awesome and are a sustainable food source!
- Encourages those hoping for a more sustainable lifestyle. Should be regulations for space, noise, smell but neighbours should not be part of enforcement
- Citizens should have the right to self provide.
- Animals' needs are important. They don't have a voice so we must give them one.
- It would be nice to have chicken to supplement our food supply.
- As long as the animals are well cared for, and not a nuisance to the neighborhood I am all for diversity of animals. It teaches children about other animals and can provide animal byproducts you would normally buy from the grocery store, making your life a little more sustainable.
- Chickens are not a problem
- Backyard chickens and ducks would be great pest control measures - limiting the numbers of animals each yard is allowed.
- They don't harm any one
- I'm all for more farm animals living around us. It's urban farming. It's a great way to support the community, eat local, and hold onto useful historical knowledge.

- As long as there are strict rules
- Goats maintaining grassed areas are cheaper and more efficient than City of Calgary employees.
- I think it would add value to our community and offer greater focus on gardening, growing our own food and connecting to where our food comes from.
- I believe that chickens in a back yard coop would be very beneficial. However I wouldn't extend it to any livestock
- I think this would have a positive impact on food security, etc., but perhaps the tribunal option could be employed here as well, to ensure impacts on neighbours are reasonable. And to ensure that every NIMBY doesn't get their way just because of their tenacity.
- Again responsible ownership and this could be an extremely good thing for Calgary.
- I don't think that owning hens should be at the whim of my neighbours. There are already provisions for my neighbours to make a complaint to by-law if I don't care for my chickens properly.
- As long as these conditions are met it's fine
- Should review living conditions prior to owner getting hens
- Yes, only if these animals would not be a bother (sound, smell, digging, etc.) to neighbors
- I think that properties being allowed to have chickens is a great idea. I would hope the city would support in providing informations for enclosures that made the chickens safe from coyotes and predatory birds, as both are prevalent in my area
- Okay
- Each case needs individual assessment to make it more efficient.
- I always support growing/producing local food (grow food, not gardens!). We would love to have a couple hens.
- the animal needs certain things to keep healthy and if you have chickens they need specific requirements to stay healthy, like cleanliness
- Backyard chickens and pigs!
- "Support from adjacent neighbors is really important as they will be the secondary most-impacted people by livestock animals.
- But all neighbours on the same block and the immediate block behind the house (livestock will typically be housed in backyards) should be able to protest or appeal the existence of livestock animal should they become a nuisance with a majority vote."
- I think all the listed conditions are reasonable
- I have no issues with it. My concern would be to ensure that if a complaint is received that more extensive research/investigation be done before jumping to conclusions.
- Would need to have regular inspections and be licensed.
- As long as everyone agrees then you should be good until someone move and the new people moving in have a problem
- As long as livestock are not making unreasonable noise or smell, I see no reason to keep them out.
- But should have noise levels checked as cockerel s could be super noisy

- People should be able to keep hens as a pet provided they are in humane conditions and relatively safe from stray animals attacking them
- For the most part, I don't believe that livestock would be comfortable in someone's back yard, but hens could potentially be an exception, as long as the chicken coop smell can be fully controlled.
- If neighbors are ok with it and there is bylaw enforcement
- Must have approval from neighbours. They should be subject to inspections for hygiene and welfare. They should be required to obtain a license. (Similar to dog/cat owners). Not on every animal but the herd.
- It could be beneficial to families and the community.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for, and aren't a disturbance to neighbours (excessive noise, etc)
- I think it will be a great bylaw as long as it is kept an eye on
- We need to move away from the mass consumption and slaughterhouse economy and get people back in touch with sustainable farming.
- Depending on what type of livestock you're talking about! I don't want cows as neighbours. Also neighbour consultation and agreement must be part of the plan.
- It is needed in the times we are in for sustainability. Growing our own food. Reducing or completely eliminating the use of pesticides. Goats and chickens are useful.
- Blanket prohibitions on wildlife in the city make less sense as the size of the city grows. As the city themselves have demonstrated with their weed eating goats, there are some really strong reasons "livestock" should be in the city. I know many people who would like to purchase chicken manure for their gardens, and would be happy to have a local supply. As long as the decision is made on a case by case basis, I have no problem with allowing different animals in the city.
- let people have livestock even if they don't benefit anyone.
- Urban farms are a great way to teach kids where our food comes from.
- Urban farming is an important piece of our food system
- There are many "livestock" breeds that are great house pets and backyard chickens are great for providing eggs
- As long as the animals are well taken care of and there's no disruption to the neighbourhood, then why not?
- Urban hens and small well cared for small scale urban farming are a wonderful addition to add food sources, engage children in food production. Eliminating or reducing traditional grass lawns that negatively impact our environment and are a drain on water supply's for more beneficial ones or alternative yard spaces should also be included
- Urban farms can be great if the animals are cared for!
- Having hens could be beneficial to others.
- If they are being properly cared for I don't see a difference in having them from other pets.
- Only if suitable living conditions are provided for any livestock and follow ups are enforced to ensure living conditions are actually what household said they would be.

- Responsible owners should be allowed the chance to Show that This possible and a viable practice with hens
- Hens don't stink, they don't need a lot of space and they provide great benefit in eggs.
- I feel there is no downside to having hens. I don't want to have them for myself, but I wouldn't stand in the way of my neighbours.
- These animals can be used for therapies also some provide food
- Some people have the maturity and the urban space required to give other animals a happy life. We should let them.
- As long as winter/cold accommodations can be made and are sufficient
- Properly done, urban farming is a asset to the community
- Sustainability to grow and provide our own food is a wonderful idea.
- It is not an issue to allow other animals within the city so long as the needs of the animal are being met.
- Urban hens are an amazing idea, as long as they have proper living conditions and regular cleaning.
- They provide more food and are beneficial to the community.
- Make for a more self sustaining people. Need to ensure there's limits and officers to ensure the potential hen owners have created a proper setup for the birds.
- Hens and other livestock can make good pets and generally are not destructive if given the appropriate care.
- If there is approval from neighbours I don't see an issue with it as long as they don't have a whole farm in their backyard
- need to manage number of hens, the city is already making a mockery of this with the Goat heard for weed control (wast of taxpayer money)
- Yes, however, I cannot see why neighbors must consent to this. If the hens remain on their owners property, it should be the owner's decision. However, having a limit on the number of hens is fair.
- As long as they meet a certain criteria for owning livestock. Example: Own an amount of land feasible for owning animals, proper shelter, food, and water, Coop/Barn standards
- Anyone that cares for a living animal needs to provide for its need.
- All for urban farming
- Ot all depends on what the animal is. Small animals, like goats aren't so bad. It's the larger animals that most likely will be an issue.m due to space.
- As long as the living conditions were suitable people should be allowed livestock. If they cannot meet certain strict standards they should not be allowed animals
- It would be amazing to be able to get fresh eggs; however, only if it is not a nuisance to neighbors.
- Great way to help out for families that may to reduce their grocery expenses. Also good foe pest control as they eat a lot of bugs.
- As long as it doesn't impact my ability to move about the city with my dog I don't care what kind of pets people have.
- This allows for individual families to become more self sufficient. I support urban livestock practices.

- Yes, urban hens should be allowed to be kept by homeowners as long as the animals are adequately cared for and do not become a nuisance for neighbors.
- If someone wants to keep hens, why not
- Provided that people have gone through the correct channels and there are follow ups to ensure the health and conditions of said animals.
- Personally I just think that would be cool. " wanna come over and see my livestock "
- Back yard chickens are a great idea!
- Animals can enrich a neighborhood and give those who don't have pets of their own a chance to learn how to be responsible around them
- If someone wants to own animals and can care for them, I'm ok with that.
- backyard chicken program
- Hens and Ducks
- I believe people should have the right to raise animals, including chickens, game birds, or small livestock, such as sheep or goats, as a method of land maintenance, and as a good source for their own family use. This does not include raising animals for sale.
- Small farm animals can be positive as long as there is no overt smell or noise.
- Great idea :) sustainability
- I think urban hens are a great idea.
- it is important for people to be able to feed themselves
- As long as conditions are controlled to avoid creating a problem for adjacent neighbours, permitting urban hens should be allowed
- Khaki Campbell ducks also do well in an urban setting and produce large alkaline eggs
- Hens are kept to provide a healthy food source to family's if everyone is in support I don't see a problem. With a healthy home provided for hens
- "We had an incident with an orphaned calf, we own livestock out of city limits. This orphaned calf needed care , milk and warmth and due to no other cow accepting this and weather conditions and no home on farm for us to stay in. We had the calf at our home in order to care for it and improve its survival. We had all the proper needs in order to assist in this calfs growth at our home in Calgary and no bother to neighbors. Our only intention was to assist in its growth and health, until such time it could join the herd at 3 months of age. We had many concerned citizens calls, complaints if you will. We had stipulations in place, but the time line was only 30 days to have calf removed. Fortunately for us by the 30 day our calf was old enough and healthy to go back to our farm. But what could we have done if the 30 day notice was not enough time?
- I also feel chickens would be wonderful to have as either support animal or peovide eggs. No roosters as they can be noisy. As long as the owners follow the guidelines of city bylaw"
- I love that so many regular people in England have hens to lay fresh eggs in their yard, and they seem perfectly happy
- Hens are great!
- As long as the environment is health and neighbours are in agreement
- They need to be kept in suitable areas, not a tiny cage

- If the animals are well cared for and their presence doesn't disrupt the neighbours within a one block radius, they should be allowed.
- It might be better for some pets to be rescued from farms/kill houses.
- Chickens will not hurt anyone, as long as they're well kept why not.
- As long as it is done ethically and that the needs of the animals are top priority
- Sustainable options need to be more available for people given the climate issues.
- T
- With proper guidelines in place, this amendment allows for diversity and sustainability
- If someone wants fresh eggs who am I to crack up their plans.
- Urban hens can be wonderful for the owners, but they need to be cared for properly and having neighbourhood support is important for the safety of the animals.
- Responsible owner should be allowed to keep hens
- We are becoming too disconnected from nature/animals in a natural environment. So anything positive to re engage is good.
- More people are looking for ways to be creative and manage their needs locally. This could help that happen. The only concern, as with any pet, is noise/ smell/ and conditions. I would expect that to be heavily monitored.
- Chickens are wonderful
- As long as the premise is maintained in a healthy manner I see no problem.
- Sounds reasonable
- Yes
- I want a chicken in my backyard.
- Pets may chase them so they'd need to be in a fenced off area/out of sight.
- I would like to keep a small coop in the city. I would love to see limited livestock available for inner city limits
- I like the idea of being able to raise chickens at your home.
- Small pigs are like dogs and should be allowed, therefore, I am sure there are other animals that this would apply to. It is not always easy to say specifics and perhaps these bylaws need to be flexible and reviewed like mentioned one a case by case basis.
- chickens are good
- I am uneducated on the topic. It does sound like a plausible idea.
- I think that livestock add a great deal, not only to individuals, but to the community as well. They provide the same pleasure and enrichment that any other pet would. They add fertility to gardens of all kinds, and encourage healthy soil structure. And mostly, people need to have some connection to where their food comes from. As long as the animals are well treated, housed and cared for, they will lead a good life. And as long as they don't make more noise than a gas lawnmower, a barking dog, or a party next door, and smells are kept in check, then no one should have cause to complain.
- as long as the animal is cared for i see no issue with them being in the city
- I think it would be amazing to have chickens and different livestock in Calgary.

- Have a few hens without any roosters (due to noise), could indeed help utilize available yard space (e.g. below deck area) and help people in this current pandemic stay sane while getting some comfort from taking care of their own hens (and obtaining fresh eggs in return).
- If animals are being treated with compassion and respect and responsibly than I do not see the issue.
- Pigs can make great pets
- "Yes to livestock.
- People should be able to have whatever they wish on their own property as long as care is taken of the animals and it does not harm your neighbour - harm, not "annoy" or something based on aesthetics."
- I am not knowledgeable on the specifics of keeping alternative livestock such as hens. As long as the rules are reasonable and actually enforced I don't see why not.
- If it doesn't cause harm to anyone else, then they should be entitled to it on their own property
- Caring for animals has proven community and individual mental health benefits.
- It's just a small animal and as long as they are well kept and don't make a nuisance of neighbors they should be fine
- Sure, seems like a positive thing for us Calgarians
- But how is agreement from neighbours obtained. Can it be reversed and what if owners and neighbors move?
- As long as it's well maintained supporting the ownership of hens could be a positive feature of living in Calgary
- As long as the animals are being tended to properly and not causing any issues for anyone else, why not.
- I don't see why not.
- Uh, hens are amazing. Incredible animals to have in your yard. Absolutely integral for composting and for food production. Plus they don't really make noise? My backyard neighbours have parties every weekend, that's way worse.
- ONLY if a solid and VERY STRICT animal welfare system can be in place with standards and monitoring. Pets are mistreated and breeding is not regulated, until that can be changed - no need to add more animal welfare issues to the table.
- I would rather see a hen house in my neighbor's yard than the pitbull puppy mill that is there now. Also many people use different animals as therapy pets and that is important
- Hens are great animals, they can be lovely pets and laying eggs can also save money in the long run for citizens.
- If they're cared for properly I see no issue
- Properly maintained chicken coops would be acceptable
- Fully support so called hobby farm for personal use. Especially to cut down on expenses in this inflated market we currently have. Even more so important with the lack of jobs and work due to covid
- Chickens should be allowed in Calgary.

- If people are able to take care of these animals and get food from them at the same they should be able to
- If people clean up after their animals, why not allow them to have a hen, goat or pig.
- Great source of food and a connection with the animal that provides it.
- Case by case
- Can help sustain the owners a bit more
- Yes, however I don't think large livestock such as cows should be permitted.
- Keeping animals that can provide food: chickens, goats eases the financial strain on urban families.
- Decision not by the Chief, rather by community group affected
- As long as they are responsible owners and they take care of their animals for their health be as my d well being and make sure they're not a nuisance, I don't care what kind of animal they are
- In theory - as long as the list of livestock doesn't get too long and that there are strict requirements for keeping livestock in an urban setting
- I have no issues with urban hens! More locally sourced eggs and food :)
- Emphasis on neighbors supporting it.
- As long as the animal is cared for in a suitable environment and is not a nuisance to neighbours, I see no problem with considering allowing other animals to reside within the Calgary city limits.
- It's a good idea. Some people use them as support animals. There should be a limit to how many can be housed to prevent abuse and noise levels
- If the animal has enough room and a good life, yes. However, no large animals like cattle or horses.
- I believe hens should be allowed within the city limits.
- I think small live stock that is properly cared for would be fine.
- I really support hens in Calgary (not roosters). They are no dirtier than parrots providing the owners are responsible and they do not make nearly as much noise as parrots. Yet parrots are legal. I strongly support allowing up to 3 hens per household.
- This would allow animals to have a happy life away from a factory.
- Hens can be really great pets so can goats, pigs and sheep.
- Hens well cared for are great addition to life in a neighborhood.
- I think allowing hens and other livestock in the city is an excellent idea. I would support this bylaw amendment.
- Yes, but with education around this and some follow up to ensure compliance. Close neighbours would need to be agreeable.
- As long as 2-3 neighbours on each side did not have objections. Noise/smell carries and can impact a person's ability to enjoy their home
- As long as there is some oversight and this wouldn't cause issues with neighbour's, people should be free to have their own pets on their own property.
- If the owners of the animals are taking proper care of the animals and they are not a threat or cause disruption in the said community, then it's fine to have hens and other livestock on property as pets.
- It seems innocent enough but i wonder about noise.

- I would love to own urban hens if i had the knowledge and space.
- As long as the owner and surrounding neighbours are okay with it, and the owner can properly care for it, this should be acceptable.
- If you're going to consider doing this for livestock, please do this also for household pets.
- If it's not bothering anyone it's fine
- I like the idea of hens! Would hope there would be a limit though on the number that can be kept at any given time. Just because you have the space doesn't mean you need dozens of birds in your backyard.
- If it harms no one, then why not
- Depends on what the livestock is; I wouldn't want to live next to a noisy or smelly yard. If livestock benefited whole community then maybe it would be ok
- As long as owners can provide a safe and comfortable living space for the animals, they are not a nuisance to neighbours and not detrimental to city infrastructure, smaller livestock should be allowed.
- We need more opportunities to expose our children to animals and have animals (that are not a nuisance) for ourselves. Lot sizes need to be considered.
- If a person can safely raise a goat or chicken on their property they should be able to. With that said they need to be held responsible for the cleanliness the pens and noise caused by their urban farming.
- As long as the animal can be properly cared for, and doesn't impact the health/safety of others, I see no problem
- I think there is a distinct benefit to have some livestock animals in the city. Hens for fresh eggs is one, a goat or two for yard/weed maintenance and companionship can be another. Miniature cows are apparently excellent pets.
- Bringing nature and more natural approaches to food production into our cities is a good thing.
- Not my business as long as they don't exceed a certain amount of noise.
- Easy way to provide food to the surrounding community.
- N/A
- If neighbors agree and animals aren't creating disturbances all night
- People who can care for chickens should be allowed to.
- AS long as all avenues are discussed properly and thoroughly. I would have no problem unless a rooster moves in next store..Then I may an issue.. :)
- I've been in communities with chickens and there are far more benefits .
- I think it is a positive thing for people to understand more about where their food comes from and I support this initiative.
- If people keep a clean and happy environment for the animals, there should be no laws against having them.
- Provided the above criteria, it seems almost a non-issue that someone should have personal chickens on their own property. Chickens in particular are not any louder than certain dogs.

- But perhaps a licensing agreement to ensure hens or other livestock are cared for properly
- It should have positive change within pet owners
- I would support the relaxation of the bylaws. This could help to provide food security but needs to be done carefully and no roosters! Dog warning system good but not fine-able. Do not single one dog breed and focus on education and training were possible.
- There is a large movement for being able to support the household yourself (yard to table)
- I don't have a problem with this.
- This all makes sense.
- As long as people take care of the animals small animals/livestock can contribute to a person's food supply and well being. As long as it doesn't interfere with their neighbors enjoyment of their yard and home. Smell and noise...
- Sometimes having livestock such as chickens can help feed the family.
- Please stop classifying pot belly pigs as livestock
- If an animal is able to have reasonable living conditions and is not disruptive to the community I do not see an issue with someone having hens.
- As long as there is adequate space for the animal, why not?
- I think most livestock, if properly cared for and in suitable housing, is no different than having any other outdoor pet
- I would love to have egg laying hens! I have the space in my yard! They are also very affectionate and great pets .
- Could be a Natural, valuable and vibrant addition to our communities.
- I would imagine a well maintained chick coop would no more of a nuisance than a neighbour with pigeons.
- I don't have any issue with it as long as it doesn't create issues with neighbours and that owners are properly educated on what they are getting into. My issue with urban hens is that chickens don't lay eggs for their whole lives and people need to be signing up to take care of the chickens throughout their lives.
- As long as the owner is responsible for the animal and can provide the proper living space it should be fine. The owner should also be able to prove that they can properly care for the livestock before they are issued a licence.
- If they are contained and not noisy I don't see a fault.
- As long as the hens are cared for, fed and kept in a clean coop I would agree. Any animal must be cared for properly
- Assuming the person has the land and a considerable amount of space, seems fine.
- Secured for the animals sake
- I think hens should be allowed within city limits with responsible owners.
- As long as its suitable to the hens I see no issues with keeping hens within urban areas
- Yes

- Use animals in a respectful manner to provide food for human is a ideal way to avoid food storage and a way to educate people where food are coming from
- Everything looks good.
- Some apartment buildings dont even let animals at all (even for anxiety related reasons). To allow livestock of anykind should be allowed so long as it can be managed in the city
- Proper living conditions/room/ respect for animals are necessary. Not using these animals for food(eggs could be exception but no butchering). Apart from that, sure.
- If It's fair and unbiased with no harm to any animal
- As long as the animals are suitably cared for, and the neighbours are in agreement.
- A hen is far more benign than most other pets and far more pleasant than my neighbors. It makes no sense they are not currently allowed.
- With the current economic conditions aggravated by Covid19, people need to be able to find some sustainable source of food and livelihood. Of course, there should be a limit to the number of hens that can be raised in an urban setting as the noise and smell could become a source of disputes between neighbors.
- How cool would it be if everyone in this city could eat local eggs?! raising hens is also such a great learning experience for children and will help bring communities together.
- support local
- As long as they follow the bylaw people can own hens in the city.
- As long as there is follow up from bylaw to ensure that the sanitation is being upkept and the quality of life for the chickens is humane it would be great. Perhaps quarterly visits or twice a year.
- I think as long as it can be shown they are responsible livestock owners and the neighbours are ok with this.
- As long as the neighbours are ok and the animals can be proved to be sanitary and clean environment. If not, no animals.
- If it were a possibility for ourselves, I would have urban hens as I like the potential of gathering my own eggs. Any other animal(s) to be considered should definitely be ensured safety, shelter and complaint free.
- With a limit as to how many on each property and if any issues arise they are dealt with fare and equal for everyone.
- Any household should be entitled to have livestock on their private property as long as other properties are not physically damaged. Smells and noise don't count as a nuisance.
- If having chickens is feasible for a property then I think it is great that people can be more self sustainable while living in a city.
- Makes sense
- Why not? My mother grew up on a farm south of Calgary. She has fond memories of tending to the hens, goats, pigs. Not so much the geese and larger cattle. Hens create no issues - mean dogs do.
- I'm in support of responsible ownership of urban hens - eggs are delicious!
- Limiting numbers of livestock and it would be important to monitor their upkeep to ensure they are inhabiting a clean living space. Like any animal, not neglected.

- I don't understand why we aren't allowed hens in the city - they're not loud, or messy outside of their enclosure... I would love for this to be changed!
- Hens on private property is reasonable. Fighting cocks? Maybe not. This one's a no-brainer; let people raise hens at their private homes.
- Provide a list of acceptable livestock. Ensure issues such as number of animals, smell and noise are considered.
- I would be happy to be able to raise my own hens for eggs in my backyard. I love hens. But they should be well kept and cleaned up after.
- As long as animals are not kept for meat consumption and for pets only.
- Keep people in touch with where their food comes from.
- I support the introduction of goats in communities/parks that will benefit from them.
- Providing animal does not damage property and or break house and waste bylaw.
- Na
- In so far as animal welfare is a priority and neighbours are unaffected by noise, odours or sanitation issues it's ok.
- Eventhough it might be hard for neighbors to support this I think it would be important for the community dynamic
- So long as there are clear requirements for parties interested in raising animals- including how to exit the strategy if it's not as attractive as it seemed at the time of conception...
- Yes, as long as they are not a nuisance.
- The animals should be protected as best as possible
- Depends what the "other livestock" are
- Yes but suggest with restrictions on lot sizes. I wouldn't like to see livestock on inner city homes such as duplexes or fourplexes where they have no room to to be free
- I think that would be a benefit to the local economy, selling fresh eggs
- Ok with chickens
- Why not. People need food animals and they can't be more annoying than the barking dogs in my neighbourhood.
- No cows please!! Unless on a LARGE acreage of land. Minimum land requirements for large livestock than chickens.
- Provided noise bylaws are amended to include nuisance noise associated with urban hens and other livestock.
- As long as the support from the community is updated on an annual basis.
- It would be nice for people who want to have livestock to be able to choose to live in a part of the city where space/ provision exists for such an endeavour. It would give people the ability to provide food for themselves and have more autonomy.
- Help the animals, not the humans.
- Property owners should be allowed to raise hens as long as they do not affect the quality of life of their neighbours.

- Any support system can be beneficial, the system should allow and require approval from neighbors/neighborhoods. Consent should be required by adjacent neighbors or those that may be impacted.
- Fair for the animal
- As long as the animals are taken care of I see no reason why not.
- Not a strong opinion but would support.
- Limit per household required
- Seems fine, helps create more sustainable food sources.
- That's a great idea. Allow people to grow their own protein.
- I think allowing hens in the city would be an improvement
- I don't see the big deal with allowing urban hens.
- Legit who cares
- Chickens would be fine as long as there are limits to numbers per property or per grasses yard area.
- as long and scent and sound is not much different from dogs / cats / birds or other common pets, not sure why other animals would be prohibited.
- As long as surrounding neighbors agree I see nothing wrong.
- As long as they are well cared for and surrounding community agrees, I don't see why it would be an issue.
- Chickens are tolerable, beneficial, and harmless.
- I support having hens only... for now
- I assume "adjacent neighbors" will be defined based on expected range of sound or air pollution for each type and number of animals.
- I think urban hens and other livestock like ducks can be extremely beneficial for individual households and communities
- "People should be able to have a couple chickens for eggs
- If people can have pigeons flying through the neighborhood shitting on things why shouldn't responsible people be able to have food bearing animals"
- If someone wants to breed cattle in their yard they should be allowed, it's their property. Is [personal name removed] paying their mortgage? I think not
- People are starting to want to more organic products so if they can have their own livestock, this will allow people to live a healthier lifestyle.
- I think if people can prove they will take good care of their hens and get neighbour approval there is no reason not to offer it.
- I want chickens!!
- If you can responsibly house and care for hens without disturbing your neighbours you should be allowed to have a couple.
- As long as responsible animal ownership is established, I am supportive.
- I want a pet goat or chicken one day and it would be awesome to be able to have them in the city
- All that matters is that the animal is properly cared for and in a safe and healthy environment

- No hens running down streets. They need to have proper fences and be treated with space and good food but not allowed to run wild. Hens running wild could cause increased animal attacks from other animals towards hens, and would be unsafe for those driving, young children, etc.
- I would be interested in keeping hens. I would be willing to pay a little for a permit for them - could be a small source of revenue.
- I think it's perfectly reasonable to raise your own chickens
- As long as the don't disturb neighbours.
- No explanation needed .
- I think that urban livestock can be very beneficial if properly set up
- there are many other animals that can be amazing pets and sustainable food sources that do not cause any issues and are sometimes far more clean and quiet than cats and dogs
- As long as the animals have a decent living conditions.
- If people want chickens, live in the country. Chickens require room to move and many city backyards do not have room for this. Also, I wouldn't want to live next to a chicken coop.
- If people intend to raise livestock, they should be responsible for all actions and care of the animals. Including their affect on the neighbours.
- As long as the number of animals are limited by the space/needs of the animals. This would need to be very well waatched.
- Hens are dope AF
- With strict enforcement of criteria. Otherwise owners may surrender or provide inappropriate care resulting in overwhelming shelters.
- New owners should have to take a course of some kind on how to care for these animals.
- Having lived in Australia we saw the benefit of backyard chickens, a great idea!
- Many animals have a positive impact.
- I think as long as the animals are being taken care of and aren't causing harm there is no reason to ban them.
- This will ensure other livestock live in a healthy environment and are taken care for.
- As long as someone has the ability to properly contain the animals, they are no different to having any animal.
- There would need to be a system in place to ensure that the hens are cared for in a manner that provides a low risk for transmission of disease from hen to human. It also needs to ensure that the hens are not bothering the community/neighborhood with smells or noise.
- Citizens should be allowed to own some livestock within city limits when certain conditions are met.
- I'm ok with this
- I cannot see any reason why not
- No roosters.
- I think as long as the livestock are well taken care of and don't negatively affect the lives of neighbours or the public, it is good for people to be able to keep livestock in the city. Hens are especially good for this, as it allows people to access eggs without worrying about how the hens who produced it were treated or what hormones they had been injected with.

- Animals that make produce, such as chickens, would be great for many people in Calgary to have and fairly low maintenance.
- As long as the hens can be cared for and are not a nuisance to the neighborhood, people should be allowed to own them and support self sustainability.
- So long as they are not a nuisance in terms of noise and smell I have no issue with this bylaw amendment.
- Hens only, no roosters. They serve no purpose.
- I would support this.
- Should be able to have hens because could have eggs. Would need to ensure a limit on amount and space so it didn't get out of control
- So long as owners are responsible I see no issue.
- It is no ones business on what others do, as long as the animals are safe.
- It is no ones business on what others do, as long as the animals are safe.
- As long as the livestock is not hindering neighbours I think we should encourage self sustainability via livestock.
- Fresh eggs!
- If you want to have livestock go ahead it's your life just don't disturb the peace.
- As long as all factors are considered and reviewed, I don't see a problem
- Hens provide food for families. No roosters should be allowed in the city.
- As long as bordering properties have no objections
- As long as calgarians and the animals can live cleanly together.
- I love the idea of having hens as a source of eggs.
- Not all livestock is suitable for urban environment
- As long as the animal is not a nuisance in the neighbourhood and it properly cared for to limit risk to the animal and others. I don't see why it would be an issue.
- I have no objection to urban livestock provided the proper controls and approvals
- As long as the animals have ample space and proper care in an urban environment! Having some training and education sessions prior to giving licence to people to have such animals in the urban environment could help reduce bad situations for the animals
- Raise goats in the proper fenced yard to reduce compost and fertilizer usage. Chickens if one is permitted for eggs.
- Caring for, and raising animals, pets and livestock alike, provide a mental health benefit and lead to more balanced children. Understanding where our food comes from is also crucial for urban children. Urban livestock must be monitored closely however both for the welfare of the livestock as well as the potential for nuisance in close quarters.
- If they are well cared for I think hens is a great idea

- As long as they are provided food, water and shelter and odours are managed then it shouldn't be a concern.
- faster processing i would assume.
- No roosters
- Will be a positive addition to many communities
- I think people having little urban farms is a great way to engage with the agricultural sector
- I support multiple uses in the city, so long as they aren't a nuisance.
- Opens doors to other pets to be kept responsibly
- About time
- There is nothing wrong with having hens within city limits
- Had Chickens all my life it was a positive experience
- Finding ways to be able to sustain ourselves without putting other people at risk is so important. As long as each animal has a registered owner, go for it.
- Ensuring that the health and wellbeing of animals is taken in to account, the presence of small livestock animals within the city would likely be a net positive - increase organic food production and local merchants, individual awareness of agriculture and livestock, increased youth engagement.
- This sounds like all bases are covered, concerning all involved.
- Responsible pet owners should have the ability to raise urban poultry in order to increase food security
- I have known a few citizens that have hens but they are on large properties and are responsible pet owners. Neighbours must be in agreement before hens are allowed on adjacent properties to keep all parties satisfied.
- If animals are being well cared for and are not causing problems with neighbours, it shouldn't matter what species they are.
- Nice that neighbors have to be contacted as some animals can become extremely annoying
- It may be difficult to get support from neighbors, especially if neighbors are at odds before this. an issue may arise if the owner moves and wants to take the livestock with with to an area where it's not suited; would have to be reviewed again. Neighbor has homing pigeons which do not harm anything ; they circle around in flight and return to his property. Wild pigeons are becoming more prevalent and are dirty. For Q7 below, answer refers to homing pigeons.
- They feed people, provide fertilizer and self sufficiency
- Why not it's 2020
- Given relevant community support and animal needs are met, I think there are many benefits. Food, companionship, and promoting the skills of caring for livestock.
- if approved by immediate neighbors. Times are hard, fresh eggs are healthy and cheap
- Biodiversity
- "And please, let's allow backyard hens!!!!!!!!!!!!!!
- Let's stop just asking this question on surveys and make it happen!"

- Other kinds of animals other than dogs or cats can be very beneficial to a person's life if they cannot have those types of pets for whatever reason
 - Ability to leave about animal husbandry
 - Hens can be a soothing animal for people with anxiety issues
 - It's beneficial to allow homeowners to raise their own food source on their property, While ensuring the animal's welfare and containment.
 - As long as the animals have freedom in their land and are not pestering neighbors
 - Chickens are a great idea, I support.
 - As long as it has neighbours approval too I have no issue with this
 - Love eggs
 - if people want to own livestock why not
 - It depends on the size of the property and the responsibility of the owner.
 - Got years I wanted to responsibly own a pet pot belly pig (don't care if it is 600 pounds) i earn my money and should be allowed to spend it on family pets of my choice as long as neighbors are not put out by it
 - "If the rules above are followed then I see no issue. Rather be woken up by chickens compared to the drug addicts breaking into my car, garage and yard.
- Yard protection chickens."
 - Owning hens and other livestock could be a source of food stability as well as a good learning experience for children. The needs of those animals must be adequately met and neighbours must be considered prior to acquisition.
 - Grocery's are becoming expensive for some people and providing for themselves would help them
 - Chickens or other livestock should be permitted. Limits on numbers could be established based on property size.
 - I think the possibility of allowing livestock in the city would open doors to community building and engagement, learning and education, and new approaches to food
 - Urban owners can be responsible livestock owners. Make it a requirement that the housing is appropriate with the discussion of a veterinarian
 - As long as the animals are well taken care of and not impacting nearby neighbours negatively.
 - Urban farming is needed.
 - I think people should be able to have those animals so long as they're responsible with them.
 - The impact of livestock in Calgary would be quite large considering how many neighbours would be impacted. Considering many people are not responsible pet owners, livestock would have to be watched carefully. A case by case evaluation would be definitely needed.
 - If the neighbours and community are supportive, this sounds sustainable and better for the environment and increased education/awareness
 - Cause it does not hurt anyone.

- For people that can find relief in having any animal that helps them why not. Dogs have helped me through so many things why should it be restricted! I've seen chickens, goats, mini horses, chickens, pigs etc help propel
- Nothing better than providing fresh eggs, meat and milk to your family
- I would support small animals, provided they aren't noisy.
- As long as people are informed and allowed to say yes or no.
- Permission of neighbours sharing property lines would ensure it's not infringing on other people's ability to enjoy their own property.
- I think it is a good idea.
- Provided they do not attract coyotes to the area I'd support hen houses
- Omg, I love this idea! They allow hens in Victoria and it's such a great idea. I'm so game! I love this!
- Least amount of city restrictions should be the starting point.
- I think that as long as the animals do not cause issues and have a proper living environment there is no issue with having livestock within the city, and there is a possibility that it would help to boost the economy as well.
- If neighbours are supportive, and a suitable home can be accommodated for the animals, I don't see an issue with having livestock in the city.
- I feel everyone should have the right to raise chickens provided they are well tended and no roosters.....no goats and sheep or cows either
- Neighbor approval is MUST
- I would say yes if they have the support of neighbours within a 2 block radius. Also if having livestock subsequently creates a problem, there would have to be measures to deal with it. For example, what if a neighbour sells their property and the new neighbour does not support having livestock next door? How do you address it?
- So long as approval was not revoked if neighbors moved and the new neighbors didn't approve.
- As long as animals are care for properly and neighbors aren't disturbed i see no problem this type of scenario.
- I believe this will have a positive community impact
- I think it would be a more ethical way of getting eggs
- I think that hens are a great idea for urban owners.
- There are other animals that can be wonderful pets. Pot bellied pigs. People are a loud to have Parrots why not Chickens.
- Like the request of a business in a housing neighborhood. Their should be no objection by neighbours. There needs to be a limit of how many animals are in one place.
- You should be allowed to produce your own food, chickens, eggs, honey etc.
- Important to ensure that the animals will be properly cared for (ie shelter, food, etc).
- Livestock can be beneficial in an urban environment.
- We support community sustained agriculture through a farm so this would be under the same category!

- Homes and yards can be big enough to support small livestock. It should be reasonably expected that neighbours can coexist with livestock.
- interested in permitting chickens for eggs.
- As long as the hens or other livestock are well cared for and the yard is kept clean, I think this is a wonderful idea!
- As long as living conditions are healthy.
- I'm fine with hens. But I can't imagine having a cow or pig or horse or whatever next door.
- Hens are a benefit in many ways. Food, insect control and as pets.
- But once you have been approved to have whichever livestock on your property it cannot be reversed because someone in the area disagrees with it.
- Size and quantity restrictions
- I say yes but strict policies must be in place for hygiene and cleanliness. If a person fails the guidelines set out they must halt operations immediately. Basically 1 warning and that's it!
- Goats, pigs and more should be allowed in proper enclosures on private property.
- Yes only to hens, as their waste and noise is minimal with only a few hens. Anything larger and there is manure to deal with. Do we really want manure piles in people's yards? That will attract flies and will stink. And other livestock can be noisy. Goats can be very noisy in particular. Pet goats tend to be spoiled and will yell for food and attention at the sight of people. Hens however tend to only get noisy for a brief time after laying an egg, their 'eggs song'. Not nearly as obnoxious or continual as barking dogs.
- Do the same in the above as well.
- I support the keeping of hens in the city if the owner or renter of the property is caring for the animals properly
- As long as it's not causing harm or bothering others then it's fine
- If the hens are safe, why not?
- I really don't care about this one.
- Really
- The only issue would be a new neighbour moving in to something they had no control of.
- As long as we can enforce the bylaws I have no problem with other species being allowed
- Hens are often treated inhumanely, so this sounds like a positive alternative as the living conditions would likely be required to be humane.
- I believe everyone has the right to fresh products.
- if the neighbours are ok with it why should it matter
- Urban hens would not bother me.
- Hens may be okay, but anything larger is going to have noise and smell issues that may not be appreciated by neighbours
- Just limit this to urban hens. No roosters.
- It would add more to the quality of life Seniors, Persons with Disabilities... something to care about when no one gives a [removed] about you.

- More hens please!
- As long as all who would be effected (ie listening to the noise) are in agreement
- Not sure of the pros and cons. My worry: who would oversee the well being of the animals. Would the animals be treated kindly? be slaughtered at home?
- Again this is very situational. I think a case by case process is the correct manner. People should have power over their own property but not at the detriment of others
- Chickens don't hurt anyone. They are great to produce eggs.
- Positive impact on urban environment.
- With the caveat that the living conditions are properly maintained and do not impede the quiet enjoyment of the adjacent neighbours.
- It all comes down to responsible animal care.
- Within reason for space, smell and noise restrictions
- Might be a great step towards reducing factory-farming, and foster nicer communities (sharing eggs, teaching neighbor children about raising animals for food...)
- Should be a low maximum number of animals per property.
- People should have the freedom to care for the pet of their choosing.
- If there are rules that keep the owners responsible for a clean and well maintained hen shed, I would support it
- Hens are harmless
- I think you should be able to have a chicken on your own property if you are able to care for it properly
- Chickens, and other small livestock should be allowed within city limits
- Provided that urban livestock, as well as any other pets, are cleaned often and well cared for, including having appropriate access to veterinary care, there is no reason to exclude any kind of pet within the city.
- Providing all recommendations are met, licensing should apply here too
- Would like more information.
- If the neighbours approval range is wide enough to cover smell and noise.
- Hens are great. Less of a nuisance than most other animals and they provide food. Granted they are taken care of properly.
- As long as the animals are not a nuisance or create noise that can disturb others
- I have always found it strange that Calgary doesn't allow some animals, which have been used as pets in many other places (pigs, goats, hens, etc.). As long as the owners have the space and means to take care of them and can ensure that the neighbours are not disturbed it shouldn't be a problem.
- It depends on the size of the yard and how many hens. They do have an odour so that would be a concern
- Local food sources are better for the environment and climate. Contributes to a culture of symbiotic living with the natural world.

- neighbours are disagreeable and can be vindictive. there should be rules and guide lines to the number of livestock in the city and it should have proper housing and space.
- Great idea. Suits broad values of Calgary having roots in farming background
- As long as neighbours have no problem
- As well as licensing and maximum number of chickens per household and proper accommodations
- If it's done properly and the hens are cared for and not disturbing the neighbors it seems fine.
- how/what defines "community benefit/positive impact"
- chickens are fine, however we live in an area close to fish creek and can already hear the coyotes at night. It is important that wildlife is not attracted to the hens/hen house
- There are many animals beyond the normal hamsters, mice, ferrets, cats, dogs etc. that can be great pets. Like with any animal, if you can fulfill its needs and provide a good quality of life for it without interfering with people living around you, why not?
- If all criteria are met there should not be any adverse effects
- As long as the above is taken care of and the surrounding community members aren't bothered by pet waste, noise, smell, etc.
- Urban hens are fine if they have a suitable area to be at large in. Cockerels are not a good fit because they do wake up very early and crow a lot!
- Hens and other livestock provide multiple benefits if raised and cared for responsibly
- As long as the livestock are not overcrowded I think this is fine.
- As in any animal ownership there needs to be laws to protect these living creatures, even if they are to be used for human consumption at some point.
- I would support urban hens so long as the adjacent neighbours are supportive and there is sufficient space and infrastructure for the hens.
- As long as animals could have proper care and not be a nuisance to the neighborhood. Periodic checks or licence renewals based on these factors would be helpful.
- I don't see why there should be a prohibition of hens in urban areas as long as the owner is adhering to bylaws and the hens are treated humanely and live in quality living conditions.
- With bylaw ensuring that it is acceptable. Hold the OWNERS responsible!! The animal only does what OWNER makes them do. They are very complicated with that....
- Provided neighbors approval was a mandatory part of this process, this bylaw amendment is agreeable.
- n/a
- As long as they are taken care of and people can call and complain about poor conditions. Maybe they would need a license and some sort of inspection scheduled
- Pending neighbours approval
- I support this bylaw amendment if all the above criteria is met and the welfare of the hens are ensured.
- Enforcement shall be paid for by noncompliant owners. Foul smell is cause for closure.

- Totally depends on the animal. Chickens provide eggs for people and are relatively easy and clean.....clearly pigs wouldn't be the best of ideas.
- It would be great to have that in the community; however, it should not be up to the neighbours or neighbourhood association because it's not fair to let them have that much control over your life.
- I agree
- I don't see any issue with people having hens in the city so long as they are being probably looked after and cleaned up after
- These are the type of changes we need to explore when looking for lower carbon solutions to the environment. Done right this could have a very positive impact on a communities wellbeing. Done wrong could set it up for problems. The risk is worth the return.
- As long as these rules are actually going to be enforced via permits, etc. and not having to tattle on the neighbours for keeping a cow in their backyard...
- Having other animal options, public will consider other than dogs which are usually aggressive
- We want backyard hens!
- But noise and odorous must be contained
- Livestock can pester neighbours.
- If the coop is clean and hens are well treated, why not?
- Owners should be allowed small livestock as long as they are not a nuisance
- Why not?
- N/A
- People should be able to raise them if they are properly cared for
- As long as these conditions are met I would see no issue in owning hens.
- As long as the animals pose no threat to the community and the owner can meet the 5 animal welfare laws, there should be no issue. However for animals that are non-native or exotic, pet owners should have to apply for approval prior.
- As long as neighbours support and good conditions are found it would be of minimal disruption.
- People should be allowed to raise animals as they wish within reason.
- Noise and cleanliness will need to be taken into consideration
- Exclude neighbors , too many nimby jerks.. actual judge noise levels when there are complaints
- need to be done
- All support animals and maybe others should be allowed.
- Dog, cats, rabbits, hamsters, gerbils and fish are not the only companion animals for humans.
- I have always liked the idea of urban hens and I think Calgary is way behind the times making them okay.
- Livestock can be kept in city if done properly and should be allowed if done properly
- As long as their are evaluations on a case by case basis
- I support the ownership of backyard hens and other agricultural animals: goats etc.
- Why? It seems simple enough.

- I am a little hesitant about this proposal. But as long as people are responsible and dont bother the neighbors with smalls or noise.
- As long as there is a cap on how many hens and coops can be on a property.
- I think this is a good idea
- As long as there is a cap on how many hens can be on a property
- I see no reason to shoot this down. It could be beneficial to all involved and very educational for children
- I suspect that as long as the 'hens' were not too much a problem with noise, etc., no one would mind.
- Self explanatory
- Animals such as pigs & goats can sometimes make lovely household pets
- As long as the livestock is well kept and not greatly disturbing anyone I dont see why people shouldnt be able to have a hen house.
- As long as communities are in support and the animals are not disruptive ie through noise or odour issues, livestock should be permitted.
- Absolutely... there are pros to having certain animals available if desired.
- Sure I guess.
- Yes as long as the noise and other byproducts of these animals were regulated
- They can be very beneficial to have, but we would need rules in place to ensure the health and cleanliness of the animals as well as a maximum limit to ensure there is not too many on one property.
- Yes as long as no smell or noise from animals
- If it is done well this would be amazing for our city
- I think we should be allowed to have chickens, creates a healthy ecosystem and allows healthy food for owners. other livestock- no.. ability to maintain physical barriers is not as easy. chicken coop and chicken house is an easy build and doesnt take up a lot of space.
- Fresh eggs
- There isn't only one way to do things.
- Love this idea. Support that neighbours must support.
- I would support this but it should have a maximum number of hens that can be raised. Large numbers should be in farms and not in the city. Large numbers could disturb and bother neighbors when it comes to noise and smell.
- As long as there are limits and guidelines out in place so that people don't end up with too many animals
- Hens aren't super loud or make much stench, they produce eggs and are a better alternative than store bought eggs.
- "I believe that if the animal is taken cared of is given the room to live a good life (no tiny cages or multiple animals to 1 cage) then I am ok with this.

- There is not a place for any additional comments. I think that all dogs at parks or even when they go out on walks should have a mandatory traffic light flag."
- If homeowners have the reasonable space to accommodate, they should be able to house them. Homeowners though will have to be responsible to keep it clean and managed.
- People should be able to provide food for themselves if they so wish
- Support of adjacent neighbours is critical and extremely complex, as residence can change. If this law is passed, these agreements should become part of the documentation share with new home owners or residence (renters). It would be unfair to permit this, have a neighbour move out, and then new neighbours be unsupportive and the owner required to divest of the significant investment they may have made when all neighbours were in agreement.
- As long as there is a guarantee that the neighbors or adjacent home owner won't be experiencing noise of offensive smells.
- Backyard chickens etc aren't a Nuisance
- If the animal is safe and well-cared for and does not cause a disturbance to others, why wouldn't it be allowed?
- I come from a small town farming community. Animals almost always benefit the owner whether it be companionship or meat. As long as animals are safe and healthy I would love to see more in cities.
- Would love to see urban hens and agree that there will need to be balance. Education and limits on numbers would be key with reasonable enforcement. A detailed info package and waiver might be nice when purchasing a licence.
- The suggestion that hens smell and are loud is spurious at best. any animal kept in excess numbers or in unsanitary conditions will become an issue whether that animal happens to be; dogs, cats, chickens, or elephants. common sense regulation, limits on numbers per household, and enforcement are the answer rather than an outright ban.
- Yes, providing the conditions for the hens can be monitored and there can be a dispute resolution process for conflicts within a neighbourhood
- Chickens are beneficial and can reduce food costs
- You want chickens? Get chickens.
- Other kind of livestock can be very beneficial to the people who own them for example if you have a problem with overgrown bushes goats are an easy way to fix that problem
- Yea
- No additional comment.
- I believe that animals are an important to people's well being. Not everyone has a cat or dog as a pet, companion or therapy animal, so allowing for livestock is crucial to people's mental health and wellbeing.
- We need livestock in the city it helps people be self sufficient (food secure)
- Works in other jurisdictions
- As long as neighbours agree and animals have appropriate living conditions.

- Hens and goats can make great city companions but should be housed properly and living quarters clean and not smelly. This should not turn into people having mini farms either and there should be limits on the number of animals.
- It's a good idea
- Emphasis on requiring the support of neighbours, as it can be a polarizing topic
- I would like to see chickens, bees, etc. allowed on private city properties, but not to slaughter. And consistent check-ups put in place and performed, regarding the quality and welfare of the animals.
- I have no issues with this if people take care of animals.
- I think livestock provide the community with a lot of benefit. I.e. like community gardens, community live stock. More about local produce and products
- Chickens, if well looked after, are like any other pet or garden!
- I support responsible ownership of other types of animals - provided the owners are not infringing on the enjoyment and quality of life of neighbours. My biggest concern would be noise and smell. Many communities are built too close to each other to accommodate a lot of animals.
- The people who want livestock are absolute whack jobs, usually people with mental health challenges who won't be able to care for any animal let alone one not traditionally domesticated, but I am in general in favour of fewer rules, so sure, loosen things up.
- As long as they are kept under humane conditions. It would be good for family and children to learn the importance of providing food and taking care of animals.
- Fully support this bylaw so long as there are limits to the number of animals based on type that can be kept.
- I see little reason why a responsible owner cannot care for livestock on their properties if the animal has its needs met, including appropriate habitat and being reasonably protected from wildlife such as bobcats, coyotes.
- Regular assessment needs to be done to ensure that standards are met. Courses completed for proper education
- I think it would help to diversify the city and allow people who would like to care for chickens the opportunity to do so with out having to move out of the city.
- If animals are taken care of and the immediate neighbours are okay with it, then it should be allowed. However, I would make it a yearly permit approval as neighbours change along with the promises made but not kept by the owners.
- There would have to be rules in place and be regular checked by city personnel for this to be ok
- In this day when we want to be more self sufficient it would benefit those wishing to raise their own food.
- Sounds good!
- I think a certain number of chickens would be okay for egg laying. Like up to 5.
- Backyard Hens are great!
- I don't think there's any good reason why some hens couldn't be kept. Many other large and small cities have done the same thing. It's green and low risk.

- Only if criteria are strictly enforced. This has the potential to flood animal rescues/services with surrendered and seized hens. Could cause significant impact to neighbors if left unchecked.
- Hens don't take as much room to have a good life as other animals. And if would offer a good way for people that love animals to have animals other than cats and dogs
- I honestly just like the idea of chickens in the neighbourhood. I think it is also good to let people have the opportunity to be more directly involved in their food production.
- Neighbors should have the right and opportunity to oppose legally.
- Agreement by neighbours are important with agreement by hen owner on conditions, care etc... think it could be worthwhile to have a contract in place in an effort to protect parties should a neighbour move
- urban chickens are a great idea for food security so long as it can be done humanely
- Hens are fine. No roosters.
- As long as the owner takes care of the livestock and that they are not a noise problem or problem to the neighbors....
- I would look at Kamloops urban hens bylaws seems like they have their crap together.
- I just really want a pet goat.
- Only if criteria are strictly enforced by Bylaw officers.
- If everyone affected consents then I can't see the issue.
- I have zero issues with prudent and respectful management of livestock in
- There's no reason not to support this--I would love fresh eggs from my neighbour!
- I believe Calgary should allow more livestock & bee colonies etc. on more properties, provided the maintenance and care of those animals does not create increased noise (audible machines, construction sounds, vehicles, etc.) for the neighbours.
- I want hens.
- As long as they are properly taken care of and sanitary
- Why not
- Nothing to add
- receiving Support from adjacent neighbours
- I do not see how urban hens would harm anyone, as long as there are standards for their living conditions to prevent maltreatment of the animals.
- SO long as the animals are being well cared for and the slaughter is humane and not done in view of anyone who could be disturbed by the sight.
- let people have their criters
- it will be good to have fresh farm eggs on the back yard
- I honestly could not care less about urban hens and other animals as long as they are well taken care of, have enough space, and the smell/noise does not bother neighbours.
- with the exception that we should not allow livestock everywhere. I believe it would be better to have neighborhoods that allow livestock while others can refuse. If I can get in trouble for having grass grow higher than 10 centimetres to save on watering I believe having livestock should be looked upon as something more than just something somebody can have in their yard in any neighborhood if they so choose.

- Times are tough, help people get the resources they need to support themselves
- Could provide food for people
- Hens, ducks, etc = self sustainability
- So long as the animals in question are not being placed in detrimental living conditions, I see no reason that responsible ownership and urban food sustainability initiatives can't proceed. An urban hen is much lower maintenance and threat/nuisance than many dogs, so opening bylaws to accommodate a greater range of animal companions seems logical.
- Animal ownership should be based on merit and outcome, not species. Any animal that provides net benefit and causes little to no harm should be permitted, regardless of species. Any animal that causes harm should not be permitted, regardless of species.
- Keeping hens is a great way to cut down on factory farming, provided the hens are properly cared for. Chickens are sensitive creatures who need to be recognized as more than a profit margin.
- Provided there is a numbered limit allowed.
- But it HAS to be case by case.
- It can have possible noise complain. But as long as neighbours are supportive, it should be allowed.
- Provided poorly kept hens or other livestock is addressed by city should a neighbor complain.
- I would support any grow your own food program.
- Allows for those looking to integrate a sustainable life style into the city, cuts down on costs of food
- Don't see why not.
- As long as it's managed properly I see no issue with this.
- Livestock should be allowed in calgary as long as they have the proper living space.
- People should be allowed to provide for their own families in a way that does not increase the damage currently being done to the environment.
- Some animals are used as comfort / support people (Mt. Royal University) during exams. I do not have a problem with my neighbor have chickens, rabbits, pig, mini horse. I would not want a Rooster (morning call) and they do not allow a smell to permeate the area. Responsible pet ownership regardless of animal is the key.
- Times are tough and fresh eggs would be great!
- The proposal, as outlined above, would allow Calgarians more latitude for meeting their needs/chosen lifestyle, while prioritizing the needs of the animal(s) and considering the needs of the community. Case by case evaluation is definitely called for given the broad scope.
- Honestly, as long as care and a good standard of life for hens / other livestock can be DEMONSTRATED, I'm all for the bylaw amendment.
- As long as conditions for the animals are good and neighbors accept this seems reasonable.
- Money is not flowing for people right now, If they can grow their own food on their owner property, then why not! I'd rather spend money to feed my food, than grass that does nothing to improve my livelihood

- As long as the owner can responsibly provide for the animals needs they should be allowed to keep the animal
- Urban farming is a safe practice that can also be used in early childhood education settings too!
- We need to be allowed to be self-sufficient. Eggs, chickens, rabbits, goat milk eg.
- People should be able to have the animals that they want as long as the surrounding community approves it, the animals have proper living conditions and the owners have proper knowledge and training.
- This all seems fine to me.
- This is a great opportunity for children to learn responsibility and to assist with groceries and natural food sources.
- As long as there was not an increase in unsanitary conditions and more pests (mice, rats, squirrels, etc) are attracted to neighbourhood.
- I have no problem with urban hens / small livestock within city limits, as long as certain criteria is met including: animal welfare, size of lot, animal housing facilities.
- Chickens provide more organic resources the public can use to their benefit. They can also be used for social innovation to all public communities
- Other animals ie. Hens can help provide healthy food for families and neighbours, and help the public appreciate the benefits of other animals not typically found in the city.
- Hens would be okay if properly done. It's done successfully elsewhere. "Other livestock" is so broad a term, I'd need more details.
- If all the conditions listed above are met, it seems reasonable.
- If the right conditions are met. Why not?
- It is good for people to know where their food comes from. Our food supply is often contaminated with toxins. It also makes people give farmers of free range livestock more respect as it is a lot of work to care for animals properly. Good education for children as well.
- If it doesn't affect others then why not?
- Hens are fine. Pot bellied pigs are fine. Miniature horses are fine. Roosters - nope :-)
- If we are able to keep small livestock like chickens, we will be able to be more independent of stores, and be able to sustain ourselves using the space on our property.
- This is done in other cities in Canada
- As long as it does not affect the peaceful enjoyment of properties that are nearby, smell and noise
- As long as people know what they're doing, follow the rules and take good care of the animals I don't care if people keep animals like chickens.
- I think it would be great if we could have our own chickens! I love fresh eggs.
- I lived in a residential agricultural neighbourhood in Powell River. Loved buying fresh eggs off neighbours on both sides, They also had rabbits and all kinds of food! We need more local sources of well treated animals for milk, eggs, and meat.
- Livestock is great
- if CBEO can support his decision with fact-based reasoning and there is a review possible

- Only if there was a limited amount of hens and they would need adequate living and roaming space.
- urban hens would be great
- Should have human rights to food
- Any livestock would need to be properly fenced or cooped in to prevent noise from roosters and attracting of predatory wildlife to urban areas
- Chickens are fine.
- I like
- Calgarians want to be more self-sustaining and support local. This by-law would encourage that and set a positive precedence for economical and environmentally progressive urban living
- As long as long as the animals are well cared for.
- The ban on urban chickens is antiquated and should be updated to align with modern trends and demand.
- I see no issue with responsible pet ownership or livestock ownership.
- As long as the animals have the space and care they need.
- this is SO progressive. Having urban livestock can help urban citizens become less disconnected from our food. We are a farming province, why not. Plus chickens and goats and pigs are awesome.
- As long as the neighbors are fine with it
- A small amount of hens should be allowed on properties in Calgary. Other livestock should be considered on a case by case basis.
- Only on approved land and with a maximum amount no sales to be made from the property
- People who pay taxes should within reasonable limits, be allowed to utilize their land the way they choose to as long as noise and sanitary levels are adhered to.
- Neighborhood should have a say for allowing livestock. There should be limits in place per animal type and an overall limit of animals per household.
- I agree with the above criteria as being reasonable for allowing additional livestock
- I think support animals are very important and much needed resource for people suffering from mental disorders. The animal must be well cared for with proper living quarters etc pen/hutch and animal waste left on property for out if respect to all neighbors and community.
- hens and potentially other livestock may have little offsite impacts, but may be a fantastic addition to certain households
- Sure for smaller animals or ones that wouldn't interfere with neighbor's enjoyment of their property
- As long as the animals are properly contained and trested well, not a nuisance to the public.
- As long as the animals are cared for properly, I don't see why people can't have them.
- Conditional approvals with a 1 year evaluation period. During which neighbours can rescind without justification their endorsement of the permit
- I think it can be done without disturbing others and will contribute to sustainability. Hens are not more annoying to neighbors than pigeons or dogs that bark all the time etc.
- It is time

- Not all people can afford to buy land or farm in order to own 10 hens for fresh eggs. No all people can live in rural areas. I am a nurse and need to live in city, but would not mind to have few hens in my back yard.
- I support urban hens. I'm not sure about other livestock. Depends what you mean. I would not want people to start buying pigs as pets that would then end up in a shelter.
- As long as there are rules regarding the number of hens allowed in a yard I don't see how this should be any different than having a different type of bird.
- If a safe environment can be achieved, why not?
- Chickens can be a healthy part of a productive garden. I would worry that many would get chickens without proper heated enclosures in the winter or space for the chickens to roam freely.
- Livestock do provide good things to the community.
- All animals, including birds should be properly cared for. There is no acceptable reason to have any living being housed or confined in poor conditions
- As long as they are housed in a humane and clean environment and there is a cap on how many one can have
- This doesn't sound like it is opening it up for just any property. I support a case by case decision making. This will ensure there is enough property to house and care for the animals properly.
- Appropriate policy should be in place to ensure that the needs of each animal is met. IE, guidance on the requirements of a chicken coop that ensure the hens can survive the winter in the coop. Also clear guidance on how to dispose of a dead hen.
- Not animals to be butchered only eggs/pets
- Prevent roosters or limit to 1
- As long as suitable living is provided I think it is a great idea.
- As long as they are being kept as a pet and not being used to sell their eggs and etc
- Love the idea of back yard chickens
- Give people a place to go with their pet pig etc
- I support hens but not other livestock just yet.
- Seems fair. Worried about noise levels.
- If people can support local and NOT horrific factory farms then yes yes yes allow hens to be cared for WITH SPACE to roam in people's backyards.
- As more people strive to improve their own access to food and teach the younger generations how to manage this, I have no issues with chickens as they aren't a problem. Roosters may carry some noise concerns but are only needed for breeding, so aren't mandatory when having a back yard chicken coop.
- Support from neighbours should be optional if the owners of the livestock can provide for the animals on their own.
- Hens are useful and do not crow like roosters
- I don't care what pets people have as long as they are properly fed, sheltered, clean and reasonably quiet.

- As long as they don't have a rooster that crows loudly
- Seems to work well in other municipalities; supports policy reason of eating locally produced food
- Urban hens, as long their numbers are controlled should be beneficial.
- Self sufficient neighbour's will equal in a stronger neighborhood
- They are relatively quiet and provide eggs to family and possibly neighbors, it could be the start of us cooperative to help each other
- Yes if this includes goats
- Hens and any other sort of livestock should be allowed as long as people have space and take care of them. Not everyone can afford to go to the grocery store every week and it's also a healthier source of food.
- So long as all affected parties are happy, it shouldn't be an issue
- I would like to buy locally produced eggs, or raise my own hens.
- I am ok with hens and ducks, not ok with larger animals...people would get ridiculous ideas about having cows and full sized pigs.
- People must ask all effected neighbors if this is acceptable with some sort of form to be signed by all of them.
- Makes sense
- People should be able to responsibly have chickens and small barnyard animals (goats and sheep - not to exceed four per household); but only if they have at least a quarter-acre of land for the animals to roam in and the appropriate shelters.
- Goats are an eco-friendly way to keep grass short. Hens provide eggs/food. As long as noise and upkeep of property bylaws are enforced like all other property, why not?
- If people are able to properly care for animals in an urban setting and not cause damage or harm while doing so, why not
- Why not really
- I believe that as long as any animal's needs can be sufficiently met by the owner then they deserve the privilege of housing any animal they so choose.
- Safe living environments for all animals
- If handled responsibly, I think it's fine if people want to keep a few hens and produce their own eggs.
- So long as the animal is treated humanely, they should be permitted in city spaces.
- If suitable and supported, count me in.
- If everyone in the area is on board then why not?
- So long as it doesn't impact my property value.
- As long as rules are followed and the chickens/hens are safe and healthy why not!!
- Yes, if you had to meet with an bylaw officer and prove that you have sufficient living conditions for chickens.
- People should be allowed to have animals if they can take care of them and have appropriate comfortable living conditions for the animal. As well as on going vet care
- If people have the facilities to house them within city limits and want them let them

- As long as the process is fair for everyone involved
- Assuming enough guidelines are created to ensure proper care, noise, waste control
- chickens are cool. as long as these chickens do not disturb the neighbors, are provided with a proper living condition and treatment it will be alright. but there needs to be a way to monitor whether these chickens are being properly cared for
- I don't have a leaning one way or another on this matter
- Detachment of society from the basics of nature is damaging to the human physic and turning us into a society of nieve twits.
- Nothing a prior wrong with livestock. Regulate and enforce but do not ban
- Yes/no is too broad. Certain livestock (goats/llamas) are cost effective for landscape control. Aviary (chickens) can cause noise disruption. Therefore, my current answer is 50/50 split with your current answer system.
- Anyone should be able to own any animal as long as they have the required space and supplies to care for the animal. Aka, not having a goat live in your apartment, it needs so many square feet of yard and outdoor home for it
- I don't mind when people keep livestock as long as they can prove that they have the proper resources to care for the animal.
- Livestock is too broad a term, it needs to be specified so we are not greeting "barnyards" in the city. This is a major metropolitan city-not a good old western town. Absolutely neighbours need to be consulted and limis put on how many of a species in a specified area.
- I believe we should consider this as there are benefits to the community (education of our food sources for example) that should be investigated. My concern is - we can't control dog issues. This is an added burden on bylaw staff. More would have to be hired to handle the increased work load.
- Depends on the livestock and size of property
- If the number of coop permits are limited and dispersed broadly through a vicinity. Neighbors must agree. The area must be well kept, the animals must be in good health and it must not be in an area that attracts coyote or dangerous animals.
- Hens provide no disadvantage to surrounding neighbours
- I think all the above criteria would address concerns about having livestock in Calgary.
- I would like the option to own some chickens
- Hens should be allowed not roosters.
- As long as there is a limit to the number you can own, I support this
- I support responsible ownership of animals, like hens and other small livestock. Owners must ensure enclosures are kept clean and that smell does not become a problem.
- Hens and other live stock should be allowed in homes because they can give resources to the people who might not have the money for the resources living in the home
- Humans should not be prevented from raising livestock for food, eggs, etc. if they are doing so while providing proper care, feed, living space, shelter, etc. for the livestock.
- animals such as pot bellied pigs, miniature horses and donkeys, or rabbits can be considered as pets. As long as breeding of these is excluded,

- Yes.
- If done responsibly, this can be beneficial.
- What is there to explain? As long as people are appropriately catering for their animals why can't they have them?
- I believe urban hens can be a great addition to a home, so long as the owner is responsible in ensuring the hens are in a suitable environment and that they practice appropriate cleaning of the chicken coup/yard.
- I see no problem with this if supported in the above mentioned manner
- Sure why not.
- Allowing people to be more self sufficient by growing more vegetables and/or having hens is beneficial to everyone in the long run.
- I too would like chickens.
- Only so long as every neighbor within audible/scent range has input.
- I think there should be a mandatory course for these calgarians to take. It should cover material in the Canadian Codes of Practice for that specific species to ensure the needs of the animal is covered. They should also be obligated to vaccinate their chickens, since there's the risk of diseases spreading to/from the wild bird populations, as well as diseases spreading to/from people.
- I think it's a great idea to allow urban hens as long as the above is followed. It would be great for the community and also lead to more sustainability by less eggs needing to be shipped from other places leading to more greenhouse gases.
- With what is outlined here and given they have proper amount of land and distance between neighbours (roosters are especially loud) there should not be a problem
- I want a couple chickens
- Bring on the backyard chickens!
- My neighbour can have pigeons fly all over but I can not a few hens in a hen house. I do not understand how that is fare.
- However, there aren't enough bylaw officers currently to enforce bylaw offences for the many tens of dogs owners allow off leash in city parks, playgrounds and school ground on a daily basis so how is the city going to ensure hens etc are being properly housed and cared for on an ongoing basis.
- Health and safety of the community should be a priority when considering animals in yards.
- There needs to be some sort of mechanism to deal with potential noise/smells associated with urban hens as well as other livestock.
- It allows people to be able to grow and harvest their own food without the heavy cost and responsibilities that a large farm has
- Goats to mow the lawn
- As long as it's not causing problems
- I would support this given that animals receive adequate care.
- As long as they aren't disturbing the neighbours and can be properly cared for on the proposed property.

- Permaculture and self-sustainability are coming to the forefront of many people's minds. No harm in being ahead of that curve to layout guidelines before people go rouge first.
- While I would support it, this could be called teasing/feeding wildlife. I imagine there would be an increase in coyote/bobcat incidences.
- As long as the above conditions are met, I would support this amendment.
- As long as neighbours agree it should be fine. Neighbours must have a say.
- growing chickens would be an amazing. In addition, people should be allowed to have a pet mini pig or other small livestock of they can properly provide for them.
- Having a few hens in a large (not small) garden should be ok if kept clean. No cockerels.
- The lifestyle of the animals always need to be the chief concern but hens can live happily in urban settings.
- There can be zero disruptions of neighbouring property including sights, smells, and sounds.
- Would support free range hens and more local sustainability
- As long as a good standard of care is observed and neighbors support there should be no difference if it's a dog or a goat
- Only if criteria are strictly enforced.
- As long as adjacent neighbors are in agreement and all the requirements for the hens are in place this should be allowed on private property.
- Chickens are birds . If you can have a budgy. You should be able to have a damn chicken
- Needs to be closely regulated for sanitation purposes and waste disposal.
- This is very straightforward.
- I've had hens on a farm before and know that 2-3 alone are quiet and easy. Also, the animals have a good life, the eggs taste amazing and everyone involved loves watching their personalities and being active taking care of them.
- As long as they won't be disruptive to those living near the home in noise, smell or unsightly views that would detract from their ability to enjoy their own home. And the animal is being cared for.
- Neighbours must be on board!
- If you can provide adequate space and care for animals it should matter if it's a cockatiel or a hen, a pig or a dog. The only thing that matters is the animal is adequately cared for.
- Some livestock make great emotional support animals.
- Promotes food sustainability. Application must include proof of ability to maintain and support and of training on purposes livestock.
- If done properly certain animals can be quite safe and clean.
- Urban hens and other farm animals are usually only a nuisance when the owners are irresponsible. Perhaps a training course requirement before you can get a permit would be wise.
- No problem with people having chickens in the right environment.
- I support greater integration of humans and animals.
- Seems reasonable
- If the owner can suitably take care and handle the livestock it should be fine.

- As long as the manure is removed regularly, hens can be a great way of eliminating bugs.
- There are many people who would love to rescue animals who are unable to based on limitations.
- I support -
- As long as animals are well cared for and have adequate space, they should be allowed in communities that want to allow them.
- Homeowners should be allowed whatever they choose as long as the animals are looked after properly are they aren't a nuisance to surrounding neighbours
- Traveling the world where chickens are kept there can be more benefit than nuisance. Worry about them in our winters though.
- I have no problem with this
- As long as the livestock and other animals don't get out and begin roaming, this would be fine.
- Depends on what other livestock are and what rules and regulations are put in place to ensure animals aren't being a nuisance to other Neighbours.
- As long as there is appropriate space and does not cause problems for neighbours
- As long as it's a small number of chickens
- I think that as long as all of the neighbours (within a certain distance) support the hen owner, it would be ok.
- We should be allowed to have any animal we want if proper care and well being can be provided
- Good for sustainability though i support more of a plant based diet.
- For all dog complaints.
- Evaluated on a case by case basis makes sense.
- Everyone should be allowed to have chickens. Only roosters should need agreement from neighbors, as roosters are often [removed]
- As long as they are cared for
- With the assumption there would be a limit on the number of support animals in one home, and that the impact (odour, noise) would not negatively affect neighbours.
- I would love to raise a hen, collect the eggs daily
- As long as there are no unwanted noises, smells, or animal attacks.
- Townhouses, duplexes, multi family units should not be eligible to house chickens. Other than that I support chickens in the city no more than 4 adult hen's per house hold. Do the vets in the city know how to treat a chicken? Owners and care givers of chickens need to know what they are doing.
- Provided the owner took on the expense of insuring a safe and healthy environment for the chickens. Cleaning up after chickens is a big job.
- Neighbours must know and be in favour
- I would support this if there was an application process to have them on your property, and the application process included statements from neighbors on support or non-support. Also there would have to be bylaw enforcement follow up on complaints
- If there is adequate monitoring of the hens and perhaps a limit to the number of hens allowed so they are not considered a nuisance

- I believe people should be allowed to raise chickens if they have the space and numbers are controlled.
- The city limits are further expanding and it allows individuals with larger properties to have different throws of animals. Restrictions and bylaws would be needed to ensure people are following the rules and not causing undue duress to these animals if they are confined to small spaces.
- With a maximum number of livestock all animals should be allowed
- Leave me alone on my property
- People have differing concepts of pets. Non-traditional urban animals are not much different than a dog, cat or rabbit. There should be a limit on numbers for any animal type after which any higher number must be approved based on a knowledgeable assessment of living conditions.
- Although would be concerned about smell, noise and feed attracting rodents or birds
- N/A
- There should be some after-the-fact review capability. E.g. the animals weren't as quiet or contained as they were expected to be.
- Similar rules for other animals as long as looked after and not annoying neighbors.
- This could be an option for diet specific restrictions and help keep the importance of live stock in our chain supply
- I think people should have that choice
- I support this amendment, also limit the number of animals allowed given the living space.
- As long as the odours are kept to a minimum, people without AC, sleep with open windows, we don't need to smell the stench. Have you driven by a pig or chicken farm? Very stinky!
- I am not sure why urban hens are banned in the first place. I could be convinced by clear well constructed and logical arguments.
- Keeping your own hens would allow people to grow their own food and allow to save money.
- As long as the animals needs are sufficiently met.
- Keeping hens offers easy access to food (eggs), teaches children/families about nature/the environment/ agriculture, developing understanding and empathy for these things.
- As long as the animal is not a detriment to the neighborhood, ie smell, noise, etc I see no problem.
- Depending on size and safety of the animal. Supervision and strict requirements for environment and treatment be enforced and review on a timely basis.
- I agree with the limitations placed above, and would be ok with livestock being permitted, based on those limits. But even if you don't approve this, please approve the urban hens!
- I've experienced people having chickens in my neighbourhood (across the street) & there were no issues at all - a responsible owner
- Yes as long as there are resources to ensure adequate care.
- n/a
- Only with present and future neighbors approval.
- They can keep chickens in Vancouver, and there seems to be no negative association.
- educated hen ownership can be green ways of pest control and urban self sustainability

- Yes but “suitable living conditions” needs to be well-defined and must require owners to maintain conditions that don’t create a nuisance for neighbours. There will also need to be a process for when a new neighbour moves in. It wouldn’t be fair to the hen owner to have to get rid of their hens because someone new moves in next door. The new neighbour should be required to go through a trial period before rejecting the hens.
- It seems as though you have covered all you bases.
- As long as people are taking care of them and aren’t too close to their neighbours. They’re a lot of work and can be a nuisance quickly if people are allowed too many.
- I want Hens
- livestock have been in alberta since its inception. only recently have we not allowed it in city areas. As long as issues are addressed and cleanliness and noise controlled. this shouldnt be a issue
- we should have the right to grow/have our own food.
- As long as clean & hygiene and no noise or odour issues. A limited number of animals.
- Most cities allow small and quiet livestock to be kept in urban areas. The only issue I can see is an increase in pests & animal abuse by those not particularly educated in animal husbandry. Permits and spot checks should be utilised to prevent this.
- Why not? If you provide a healthy environment for an animal and it won't bother the neighbours, I'm all for it.
- no need for such strict measures. case by case basis is just bureaucracy; an invitation for bias and discrimination.
- Postive benefits
- Its just a good idea
- They are part of providing food!
- As long as they follow the laws and do things the way they are suppose to be done. I don't see the problem in raising livestock if one is doing it right.
- As long as they are properly taken care of.
- I see no problems with owning livestock and farm animals as long as they are well taken care of and live in safe, suitable environments.
- Hens are loving pets, but they have specific requirements.
- As long as the neighbours approve I see no issue.
- Urban chickens are a great way to support food security and contribute to a greener and more sustainable environment.
- IF: all neighbors within a distance that thec animals could be seen, smelled or heard we're approached and were in unanimous favor of the animals being permitted.
- I really want chickens!
- Hens can provide nutrients / organic food (eggs), for families / individuals.
- As long as the animal is cared for properly and neighbours are aware then i do not see a problem with owning "livestock" animals as pets.

- Hens could be introduced in certain neighborhoods and only if coops are pre-approved as humane and safe.
- Good idea
- As long as there is appropriate living conditions and appropriate care, why not?
- For anyone trained, with suitable housing, there is nothing wrong with having hens for the fresh eggs. No noisy roosters though.
- I find it could be recreational to have types of livestock in your backyard
- To me, an animal is an animal. As long as they are looked after responsibly and do not annoy neighbors, it should not be an issue
- Couple chicken in every other household should not be of risk to a large city
- People should have the right to raise small quantities of small livestock on their private property.
- home chickens would be a great local thing.
- Provided the animals don't make excessive noise or have excessive smell and can be reasonably cared for while providing companionship and food security, I don't see a down side to allowing them. Imagine, never having to mow your lawn again because your goat loves to do it for you. I don't even have a lawn, but I still think it would be great.
- As long as neighbours are not opposed I think it is fine
- As long as proper rules are in place, I see no problem with the idea.
- As long as all parties that may be impacted by someone raising livestock at their home are ok with it, and cleanliness, odours & noise are kept at an acceptable level
- I think everyone has a right to pets on their property, even hens.
- If suitable living conditions were available for specific livestock and public safety was not compromised.
- Hens are great for people, they provide food and can be incredibly helpful for this with mental illness.
- I lived with Chickens as a kid (not in Calgary) and there are lots of benefits.
- As long as proper precautions are taken into place I would support this. This means that prior to purchase, an official would have to deem the above clauses to be true.
- Na
- Chickens are great and can have benefits to lots of pest
- Community benefit
- Urban farming is a good way to alleviate food insecurity.
- That just sounds great! As long as all the conditions are followed.
- hens would be a good source of income for some (selling eggs etc.)
- Knowing that I could provide a loving and appropriate home to "urban hens", I would support it. However, knowing that some others on my street who have demonstrated horrible animal welfare would also be granted the opportunity to have these hens, I would not support it. Much like any animal, these hens would be considered pets and should be granted the same considerations as a dog or cat would be. There is also the risk of stray hens flooding either the shelter or becoming a neighbourhood issue.

- I fully support urban hens being allowed
- fully support this provided that owners are responsible. I believe a standard needs to be set in order to maintain and uphold the quality of care needed to do this.
- Live stock is a broad term used. If people care for their animals and take into consideration their well being we should be allowed to own them. In some countries rabbits are raised for food so they would be "live stock" yet we consider them pets.
- Some have allergies that make a dog or cat an unsuitable or unwanted pet.
- More control over no processed products such as eggs
- I think livestock is a great idea
- As long as there is not a lot of noise and they stay on said private property
- Animal livestock facilities in city should have an inspection performed and must obtain city permits.
- Why not. If a person wants hens as a pet, let them have it. But it should be kept to a certain number that isn't too high
- It is a great idea
- If owners adhere to bylaws
- Small, properly housed livestock should be permitted with neighbour approval.
- Urban hens is a great idea!
- I am for urban hens as long as they aren't noisy I suppose.
- Allow hens. Just noise levels should be maintained along with proper enclosures to secure the animals and keep out predators.
- I think as long as the hens were kept safely and their coops were kept clean and the smell wasn't bad for the neighbours, this would be fine.
- It will add freedom
- I don't see why not
- I think this can create strong community building, and aligns with the values of Calgarians
- That sounds wonderful! I love hens, my uncle has some. Let's please AVOID ROOSTERS though. Way too loud and they should be prohibited.
- Small flock 1-5 hens only. People are looking for greener gardening and self sustainability options now more than ever with food security being a growing risk factor for our population. Get Calgarians working again. Focus on attracting industry and safely opening businesses, lowering taxes. Don't allow pigeons, not a source of food, they easily can fly away and we could end up with large wild flocks causing damage and added cost to our city.
- I chose the answer yes, because what was proposed are red herrings to deter the person engaging in their survey about specific dog bans.
- I have no problem with chickens in Calgary
- As long as people are responsible and respectful, let them own what they want.
- Doesn't really affect me
- Very supportive of hens with proper care and proper building permits.
- variety in raising different animals can improve quality of life

- Citizens do this anyways without the bylaw. May as well allow it at this point.
- So long and they are cleaned up and cared after properly
- As long as the owner has a safe place for the hens and there would need to be a limit on how many can be owned. Again the chicks are very cute but hens can be noisy and a little messy but can provide food. I think a licensing system (questionnaire) would need to be in place to keep control.
- This is tricky one for me. I think having livestock can be done properly but I think this could also open our city up to lots of headaches between neighbors.
- Urban hens should be approved by a city representative and property owners should be subject to regular inspections.
- Only IF the city has the proper resources to ensure compliance and do welfare checks regularly.....given dog parks, green space off leashes are not monitored regularly....I'm skeptical that this can be delivered correctly. And the only ones who will suffer is the animals
- So long as the animals are well cared for and not a nuisance to neighbours than I see no issue. Though ideally you should have to apply for a permit. Show your space to an official, prove knowledge of the care of the animal, and check in with neighbours.
- Chickens and the ability to have your own fresh eggs
- Eggs for all
- Allow goats too.
- You should be able to raise and have a more sustainable life
- If it's of benefit for a person, animal and the community then it's an amazing thing to allow the freedom and options to have other types of animals on property.
- given the crisis we are in and the fact there were food shortages, this should be highly considered
- Adding hens and other animals that offer natural grass and weed control options would be a welcome addition to our communities.
- No roosters.
- People should be allowed livestock as long as the livestock is being cared for properly. This allows people to be more sustainable.
- I believe livestock should be aloud in any home as long as the owner can provide appropriate accommodations for the animal
- Absolutely because I think they could also be used as support animals
- As long as animals are appropriately cared for (and the bylaw states this), there is sufficient space for the animals, and they are not a problem for surrounding houses they should be permitted. Obviously not all animals could be appropriately cared for on a city lot. Laying hens would be a great start to this as would rabbits for meat.
- Fresh eggs.
- All animals show affection. Chickens are very affectionate and can help for emotional support. Chickens are quieter than most dogs so as far as noise level goes I wouldn't be concerned. Fresh eggs can help a low income household feed their family. Raising chickens is very inexpensive.
- I think having small livestock can bring more joy to neighborhoods and provide food (eggs)

- Must be a closely watched and extremely regulated process. Animals MUST have good living conditions and abuse should be completely unallowed, with permissions to have live stock revoked immediately, if not permanently.
- This would be a benefit to individuals and communities. The cities current restrictions are ridiculous considering we are a city that was built out of the agricultural business.
- My uncle had a hen in Calgary in the 1950's
- As long as animals are taken care of and being watched/maintained
- Support from neighbors essential. Suitable living conditions also essential. There would have to be a reasonable, timely way to resolve issues between neighbors should they arise after everyone has approved the animals. Ex. Maybe they aren't keeping things as clean as would be safe/reasonable etc.
- As long as said livestock is cared for and does not produce any undue disturbance, third fresh produce (i.e. eggs from hens) could be very beneficial for better eating habits and better knowledge of where our food comes from.
- I think hens in the city would be a great benefit to communities all over Calgary. So long as the hens are properly cared for. Nothing beats healthy fresh eggs from a happy hen.
- Long as it does not cause problems i see no issue with that idea.
- Providing ways for people to responsibly increase food security and local food production is a net positive in my books!
- some properties are quite large and have the rooms to be able to house a small amount of livestock for ex chickens for eggs
- However would be concerned about noise, predators, smells, sanitation (could be unfounded, just speculating). There should be some limit as to the number of hens.
- From what we have heard from other communities, having hens in cities has been successful.
- Responsible pet ownership should be mandatory as well as the animals permitted not being a nuisance
- People have been agitating for this for years. If the livestock is safe from outside interference (I don't want random weirdos feeding my hens corn chips or trying to "save" them) and is adequately cared-for, it would be a great addition to the neighbourhood. Would also welcome bees, as we have many fruit trees and bushes in the area.
- If it can be ensured that livestock owners are responsible and do not affect the neighbors around them I think it's a great idea
- As long as suitable living conditions are met it should be allowed. Also provided that the animal doesn't cause major odours for neighbours.
- Less cruel and eggs!
- When kept clean, would benefit both naturally and financially.
- This is a positive step towards food security
- Hens would be ok. Not as convinced for other livestock.
- If there are limits (reasonable amount, say under 3 chickens or other animals)and they are subject to the same nuisance rules

- yes
- I think if a person is willing to take in a livestock animal they should be allowed to. But I think they should be required to prove the animal is living in good conditions with proper food, and space. I know the Calgary humane society has previously had chickens up for adoption and I think it is amazing if people want to give them homes within the city limit, as long as the animals needs are being taken care of.
- Many other municipalities have successfully introduced these programs with rules and restrictions that also protect the neighbors.
- Hens are not a nuisance
- I believe if more people knew they could have live stock this would promote more a healthier life style. (Eggs, chickens, honey)
- No roosters. Just hens.
- I would be supportive of this so long as it did not cause harm or detriment to neighbors, including lowering of property value.
- Neighbors should be alright with it.
- Healthy eggs!
- Many cities have tried this and it is working well. I have no opposition to hens.
- On a case by case basis, some livestock is not meant for the confines of the city.
- Chickens
- Livestock can enrich the area
- Hens can be great pets
- Alberta should allow hens throughout the whole province as long as permit/processing approval is fulfilled, there's no harm.
- I would love to see this occur; however, training, and strict bylaw implementation would be required with limited number of hens (4 per household). I do have concerns regarding coyotes, or bobcats attacking them at night, and smell, noise, disease, neglect and other extended issues that may occur. (escapee chickens.....)
- I like the idea of a case by case bases and involving neighbouring properties. If you involve everyone in the beginning it's less likely that you'll receive complaints later on
- Additional livestock can be beneficial, as hens are, but taking the proper precautions like those listed (neighbour approval and suitable living conditions for the animal) seems essential.
- If the needs of the animals are met, then I have no opposition.
- This is a fantastic decision! Hens and other small livestock would be welcome and promote a healthy alternative for families to source their food.
- I would hope that if this was approved people would be required to meet Serrano requirements such as housing ect and numbers based on space.
- I have wanted to have hens in my yard for years - they are quiet, friendly and can contribute to a beneficial neighbourhood (eating food scraps, eating bugs, producing food, education for young and old alike about where our food comes from)
- I think the proposed stipulations adequately cover the potential concerns/problems.

- If all neighbors agreed. . What happens when my dog barks at the birds for half the day ?
- We all need to be a little more sustainable these days. As long as you're not bothering anyone around you and the animals are well cared for, where's the harm?
- Urban livestock is awesome
- I think it supports more sustainable living and potentially can improve mental health.
- With minimum property sizes and in predetermined suitable neighborhoods
- As long as animals are being cared for properly, I see no issue with this
- ,
- I support more forms of sustainable and small scale agriculture.
- Allowing raising of chickens for egg purposes ONLY would be acceptable but slaughtering of any kind should remain against the law to prevent inhumane treatment. Chicken coops should be subject to random by law visits
- I support any animal being kept as a pet as long as ALL necessary conditions are met to keep the animal healthy, happy, and safe. I support keeping chickens, goats, sheep, cows, mini horses, as long as there are proper guidelines met such as pen and shelter sizes, and an inspection once a year to make sure guidelines are continuously followed for the well-being of the animal.
- As long as it is done responsibly, I don't see an issue
- This is great financially & environmentally.
- I support urban farming in general. I believe livestock can be included as long as it is done thoughtfully and safely.
- As long as the animals have more then enough room to live happy and move And the owner can keep everything clean and not stinky. Smaller livestock would be more suitable.
- I agree that there should be hens in Calgary because they can be great support animals!
- I grew up with backyard chickens and rabbits they are no problem, as long as they stay on your own property.
- Unsure. Would need more info
- Hens can be safely and ethically raised within city limits without hindering neighbours and causing disruption.
- Having livestock would benefit the community and lead to a more sustainable alternative than just going to the grocery store
- I believe other animals can have a place
- Livestock should be allowed in city limits if properly managed
- I am all for this wonderful idea.
- No reason
- as long as said animals are being qell taken care of and all health and safety standards are being meet , i say to each there own
- had chickens beside us and no issues. quieter than others dog that was left out all day and noise from garage workshop, less stink than neighbours smoking.

- Calgary has a unique position in the use for livestock in urban settings, this criteria could potentially allow for such animals like goats eating grasses, or other exotic pets that contribute to persons mental health, such as a pot belly pig that grew too large
- These animals can be used as support animals and long as accommodation and no one is annoyed or harmed and animals is not abused
- The criteria makes sense and is good for everyone, not only the owner.
- I think that's great, being able to have hens gives us nutritional value and they are great to own.
- i believe that urban livestock would be beneficial for communities if the animals are properly housed and treated ethically. this would benefit communities by offering a supply that is more cost effective than grocery stores.
- As long as everyone around them is taken into account more livestock could only benefit us.
- I support having small livestock (hens) as long as they are cleaned and noise kept at a minimum
- Case by case
- It is mind boggling that this is up for debate..... with all the problems in this world and the crisis our city is facing, this is priority.
- If small livestock are properly cared for and aren't bothering anybody why not? Chickens make sense, they're quiet, stay in a hutch and can provide for their community.
- this is an excellent idea as long as the hens are kept in an nurturing, healthy and safe environment. no slaughtering. You have not defined the use for these hens. Use foe eggs and garden helpers only., otherwise this leaves a grey area for abuse.
- With support from neighbours, and suitable living conditions provided for the animals, this provides opportunity for Calgarians to work more closely with their community members as well as it allows community members to eat healthier and fresher food, increasing quality of life for Calgarians.
- Sustainability
- My cousin and her partner were involved in one of the City's pilot hen projects a number of years ago. I think it is a great addition to a community and enhances quality of life.
- If they are quiet, I think hens are good pets and egg providers
- Proper amount of land needs to be paramount, along with living conditions
- You can't have a pig in your backyard unless everyone affected agrees
- Pygmy goats make great pets!
- Hens are a very odd pet to have in a residential area and as long as it has to offer a community benefit as well as support from the neighbors I think this is a great way to drive community engagement up and brings everyone closer together
- as long as the neighbors are in agreeance and they are responsible, people should be able to own the pets they like.
- as long as they are not a nuisance have at it
- We have 3 dogs, I can imagine that well tended animals other than the typical can be equally well cared for and no more of a 'bother' to neighbours and neighbourhoods.
- Urban chickens are awesome!

- I think backyard chickens (not roosters) could be beneficial and also support food sustainability. In some circumstances, animals such as goats, could be beneficial in yard card.
- Strict sanitary measures must be upheld for odors/ noise etc
- Hens on private property should be allowed as long as they are not a nuisance to neighbors or other property owners.
- No roosters please! Noise and property damage complaints must be addressed.
- I really don't have an opinion on this.
- This would be so amazing and a great step in the right direction!
- Urban hens are an additional avenue towards food security for all
- Considering there are guidelines to ensure public H&S is considered, why not?
- As long as there is support by adjacent neighbours.
- Since people are allowed to own and cage birds from other countries and wolf hybrids it only makes sense to consider therapy animals or chickens for eggs
- I support Calgaryans owning livestock as long as they are following bylaws.
- I agree with chickens and potentially other animals under these conditions
- hens and chickens will provide fresh eggs, possible meat and help gardens.
- As long as the animal is properly cared for and the owners are respectful of their neighbours small livestock should be allowed. Again, assuming they are being properly and humanly cared for.
- just yes
- If the animal has the appropriate space, the owners are able to care properly and the neighbours don't mind, I think this is a great idea.
- The care for the animals should be ethical and humane if the requirements for the birds can not be met then the person shouldn't be allowed to own them
- My biggest concern is that the animals are well taken care of and that any mess or smell associated with the animals is taken into consideration (seen to regularly by the owners). It should be established that the owners are well versed in the characteristics of the animal, what is required for proper care and that they are prepared and willing to commit to the on-going care. If they are unable to continue care of the animal that they have to notify the authority and make arrangements themselves for someone else to commit to the animal's care. Also that they are financially able to provide the care. Also that those who are renting are not qualified for such animals due to the possibility of abandonment of the animals and the potential for damage to the landlords property. Abuse, neglect and abandonment should be dealt with swiftly and severely. The rules of care for all animals should be very strict and any violation should be promptly seen too.
- There are numerous benefits to having animals, including livestock, so if it can be done without compromising sanitation in the city limits it would be a good thing.
- Great idea. Would love to see more responsible owners have chicks or other livestock in the city.
- As long as the addition of livestock to an area isn't negatively impacting any neighbours I see no problem with this. I lived in an urban area that had them and the owners made it easy for their neighbours to accept their presence.

- It is well known that hens are very beneficial to a natural environment. It is also well known that few people take care of hens properly and the stench that can be produced. I would absolutely love to have hens and would support logical bylaws regarding their safekeeping and the sanity of neighbours
- Suitable living conditions is key here, but I don't see an issue with this.
- Truly believe that everyone has the right to try and grow or breed their own food in a sustainable and self sufficient manner where possible. As long as the animals were kept in suitable conditions and not harmed or caged cruelly or a loud nuisance to neighbors then it is reasonable to keep animals. Similar goats for milk and cheese and to keep grass down etc. This all should be determined by the outdoor sq ft available on a property as to what can be kept to reduce the chance of hoarding or animals living in abusive or overly restrictive conditions.
- as long as the animals are well provided for and kept in their designated areas I see no problem
- .
- The hens bylaw was poorly thought out legislation, by an uninformed and out of touch council. Only the " rich " areas and aldermen and women opposed it.
- I think hens for eggs would contribute greatly to our quality of life and it is a suitable animal in an urban setting
- I have many conditions to agreeing to this, as I am a vegan, which means I don't believe any animals deserve to be "kept" / confined, or used for any purpose. In an ideal world, no animals would need rescuing either (I do have a rescue dog!). BUT if it means some animals could be rescue animals, and maybe it would open up some dialogue around animals' roles in our lives... then I'm all for it.
- With strict conditions, and only certain types of birds or small animals.
- If the chickens are well cared for and have room to peck, I have no problem with this.
- The problem is that hens must be kept clean and in clean environments in order to reduce odour. How do you regulate that?
- The more people can provide for themselves and rely less and give less money to big corporations, the better.
- As long as the hens are kept humanly and not overbred, this should be allowed.
- If supported by neighbours, I support this
- Backyard hens is a great project, but there needs to be bylaws in effect that protect their well-being.
- Support farm initiative and letting people know where their food comes from as long as they follow guidelines set out to keep the chicken healthy.
- If it was limited to a small amount of hens.
- Urban hens and small livestock would be a lovely addition to communities, allowing education and stimulation. As long as animals' safety and welfare are taken into consideration, this is a lovely engagement bylaw.
- Anyone who chooses to maintain independence in food sourcing should be allowed to
- I think it would be nice for people to have livestock (fresh eggs) if they have the space for it and it does not affect their neighbours.

- agriculture is an important part of society
- Let me own a lama
- n/a
- the hens must not cause a nuisance-excessive noise, smell, attraction of other wild animals
- But only if they are not keeping the animals with the intent to harm them. Micro-sanctuaries are a great idea.
- As long as the owner is responsible and the animal is not overly loud, I believe small quantities of livestock should be permissible
- Yes but with approval from neighbors because of the increased risk of predatory animals, noise, smells, etc. I think this will be difficult to manage.
- I have nothing against chickens. I sleep with ear plugs so no one is waking me up
- Hens/chickens should not require neighbor support, like dogs, and nuisance compliant process should apply
- I would like some hens.
- I want hens
- People should have the right to source their own healthy natural foods free of preservatives and garbage ingredients. Its absurd we can not do this already.
- Nothing wrong with having a few chickens
- I think it's healthy for people to have their own livestock, such as hens to harvest eggs. However the criteria would absolutely have to be abided by and enforced to ensure the safety of the livestock and consideration of the neighbors.
- I have no problem with livestock, if they are evaluated on a case-by-case basis.
- As long as the animals don't become nuisances either by excessive noise or by unsanitary conditions.
- No reason to not have chickens in the city. A cap of maybe 10-15 hens might be good due to space
- Allowing citizens to raise chickens will allow people to be more self-reliant when it comes to procuring eggs and is a more environmentally friendly and humane way to have eggs without supporting factory farming. Arguably, chickens are less of an inconvenient animal to have than a dog or cat as an outdoor pet. Provided citizens must follow bylaw in regard to having chickens and neighbours complaints are taken seriously, I think chickens should be allowed in the city.
- I feel like if you own your property in the city, you should be able to have whatever you'd like if legal.
- Supporting livestock in the city should be considered. So long as it is reasonable based on space and the animals are kept under proper conditions and care.
- If a person wishes to own an animal within city limits, and the animal is not a danger to the public at large, I see no reason why they should be denied ownership.
- If the resources to care for the animal is in place and there are no objections from neighbours that may be affected by their presence then this seems acceptable
- It's about time Calgary caught up with urban hens!
- I especially support this because of the case by case basis. Urban Chickens should be allowed.

- I see no issues as long as the hens are taken care of properly and do not attack anyone or any animals
 - Love the idea of being able to be more self sufficient while within city limits.
 - I am against keeping animals within the city but if the city passes the law to allow it, it must be supervised tightly!
 - My speculation would be the people interested in pursuing urban hens & other livestock would be responsible.
 - As long as there are clear definitions around providing the animal's needs and also respecting neighbours I would support this
 - No roosters, just hens. So many people will have organic eggs, which promotes sustainable living.
 - Less noise than our neighbours barking dogs
 - This should be allowed as long as animals are not being grown for food and slaughtered on premises For support pets this is okay
 - As long as neighbours are not affected there should be no problem with having livestock
 - We need to try to educate people to get food from their own backyards. Hens is a great way for that.
 - I believe it would lead to better food security in communities where hens are present
 - If a person wants to keep chickens and collect their own eggs, or just have a chicken as a pet, that's fine, but like any pet. There is a reasonable expectation that they will be cared for, not abused, and that they will be kept off of neighboring property, unless it is already established that the owner of said property is ok with the animal on site.
 - All long as the animals were cared for appropriate living area and were not a nuisance, meeting the above requirements I would support it.
 - As long as the animals have enough space and will be adequately looked after, I don't have a problem with it.
 - animals when cared for properly cultivate better ecosystems, sustainability and education to communities
 - Urban livestock if managed properly is a great way to have your own sustainability
 - Sounds like a forward-thinking option!
 - Allowing livestock and in particular hen's provides the opportunity for more food security as well as a unique opportunity it for community support and engagement.
 - That's the best way to manage it
 - "Yes. I think that's fantastic. As long as people register their hens, just like they would a dog or cat and are keeping up with appropriate conditions for the hens., ex. Clean living space, appropriate housing from weather conditions, such as roofing, warmth and feeding, water etc.
- As long as there is a law in place that limits the number of hens allowed at one residence and upholds a restrictive breeding guideline.

- As long as there are laws to which restrict people from letting their hens roam out front of their house so that predators don't have as easy of access to them and as long as there we fines set in place if all the above laws aren't followed."
- ONLY IF the needs and health of the animals are priority (I.e. urban living is not particularly appropriate for livestock)
- Yes! What a wonderful opportunity to let people provide for themselves.
- I think people should be able to have a chicken coop if they want it
- I don't have an opinion on this section, but don't see it being a problem unless the hens roam to off-leash parks.
- All types of animals deserve a good home. If the owner is responsible, and has the space for them.
- However letting one person have the final say in whether or not animals are to be kept in a home isn't really fair
- I'm not really for or against this, as long as it's not posing any problems with the neighbors and community and the animals are cared for then I have no issues here.
- As long as the animals are well taken care of and do not cause a disturbance.
- So long as there is an understanding of how the noise bylaw will be an integral part of the process
- Raising livestock would allow for many families to save money and reduce exposure to grocery stores with Covid 19.
- N/A
- people shouldnt have to fight to provide themselves and or family with sustainable food options. Especially when there is no harm in doing so.
- I don't actually approve having hens or other such animals due to cleanliness, noise, smell and possible neglect of such animals
- Urban farming is the future and the sooner we get a framework in place, the sooner we can find what works for our city.
- As long as it did not effect those who do not own the livestock.
- It seems thought has been put into the living conditions of animals approved with consideration to the neighbours.
- If everyone in the living situation, Such as neighbours, are okay with it and the animals themselves are taken care of properly I don't have any arguments against this amendment.
- ONLY IF SUITABLE LIVING CONDITIONS can be ensured!!!! And the neighborhood agrees. Hens are messy, noisy creatures. The owners NEED TO PROVIDE PROPER CARE.
- Hens are mostly quiet and unobjectionable creatures, and no smellier than dogs. Roosters, on the other hand have no place in the city. Other livestock needs to beevaluatd on a case by case basis.
- I think people should be able to do what they want with their own property. As long as it does not infringe on someone else's rights and keeps to city code.
- This does not mean everyone gets to have pet anythings! The entire situation must be considered (noise, smell, etc) and neighbours must have a say! How about a minimum space area for different kinds of animals? Do not want overcrowding of animals/birds!

- if people want chickens, that's not that terrible a thing. We already keep all sorts of other animals, why not hens too.
- Let us support ourselves and become self sufficient
- I feel it's freedom for people to be self sufficient.
- If livestock can be properly cared for, there is no reason they shouldn't be allowed.
- Community livestock is a great idea. Helps sustainable living and teaches understanding between rural and urban communities. Ensuring noise and smell can be kept to a minimum
- Any time a person is looking at options to fend for themselves (food wise) it shouldn't be discouraged! Perhaps, if an abundance of eggs or meat from chickens is occurring- donations to foodbanks would be ideal.
- I support it but to your point, have to ensure the owner meets the standards and parameters that would allow for suitable hen housing/living. If not, then it will attract potential issue such as other predator wildlife into the neighbourhood because of hens...so need some safety measures. Can their property be secure enough that would ward off pests/predators that could pose danger to others vulnerable citizens (children, seniors, able-bodied, etc)
- I think urban hens are a great idea and other urban stock ideas should be explored.
- Priority on adequate space for livestock and proper fencing and care.
- My only concern would be the expense and feasibility of monitoring the animals in yards. Who is going to make sure the backyard coop is well maintained and the hens are well cared for?
- As long as the animal isn't causing undesirable disruption (smells and noise) neighbours shouldn't have a say about your private property.
- If the owner of the animal is demonstrates to be considerate and responsible, I see nonissue with owning livestock.
- As long as neighbourhoods are supportive and suitable conditions available, then yes I would be supportive.
- There's already a process for my neighbours to complain, I don't think they should have to give permission.
- Exceptions to be evaluated.
- I think people could own hens
- The conditions for the animal must be suitable, and the animal can't be causing odours or excessive noise that would annoy neighbours.
- It is good for people's mental health and financial budgets to be able to produce some of their own food.
- Food security is inherently valuable and sensible. Engaging in something responsibly and without bothering your neighbours is a no-brainer and should have been status quo years ago.
- As long as the farm animals are not to be killed on residential properties, animals kept for milk/eggs/wool/pets is the only accepted case.
- Urban chickens allow people to be a little more sustainable and rely less on outside sources. Especially when there are limits in the grocery stores like there has been under a state of emergency.

- I am not opposed to ownership of any animal, as long as the owner can properly take care of the animals in question
- As long as animals are being cared for and NOT used for food
- I want chickens
- "As long as these pet owners are responsible!! Takes one person to ruin for everyone that's why there needs to be more rules in place for people wanting to be pet owners.
- These animals aren't to be discarded when the person has no funds or just gets tired of it."
- As long as the community and neighbours allow, I do not see a problem.
- Only if feed was kept in closed containers or behind closed doors to prevent rodent infestations and if manure was disposed of in closed containers on a daily basis. Keep it clean.
- If an owner is giving appropriate care then good.
- Why shouldn't we allow them? It's common in most places for people to keep chickens, etc.
- Livestock if properly maintained in the proper setting would be great I feel. Sounds and smells would be an issue but if this is dealt with I fully support this.
- animals enrich community
- As long as things don't get out of hand allowing livestock to live in a urban setting and everything is well planned and properly taken care of i see no problem.
- If people want goats and can properly care for them and have the space- let them have goats. If people want a donkey and can properly take care of a donkey and has the space for it- let them have a donkey. Etc.
- As the world becomes more crowded and land for large scale food production is in ever increasing demand, I believe having fresh eggs, goats milk, etc., should be encouraged for those who wish to do so. Whether its for their own family or as a co-operative neighbour helping neighbour effort. As long as the animals care, comfort and health are maintained, I don't see a problem with wanting to have fresh eggs, etc. For those who have the space and time, providing as much as of their own food as they want should be embraced since sourcing food locally is an environmentally responsible choice.
- Urban micro farming is a great way to support food sustainability and biodiversity.
- Lots of positives
- Livestock are still yet animals, so before they die, they should have at least some sort of a nice life.
- As long as all the neighbours were fully made aware with a news letter or email that is confirmed to be received.
- Hens are a good source of eggs
- Hens and certain livestock should be welcomed into the community. I don't think it needs to be a community benefit I think even an individual family benefit is good enough. It also encourages people to continue farming. There are often livestock that are in shelters that may not be able to live in a farm like situation and there only other option is to be adopted by a family in a more rural area.
- It is important that livestock is taken care of properly
- I would love to see more of this!

- Calgary is one of the last cities in AB to not allow backyard chickens - many other communities are successfully allowing chickens. I think they can be a valuable addition in Calgary that will benefit families and communities, under appropriate guidelines.
- Na
- who would determine if the living conditions are suitable?
- It's a great idea, however the animals should have strict criteria for a clean and healthy environment.
- Animals have proven to increase standard of living both for their owners and their neighbourhoods. I have lived in areas where people were allowed to keep goats, chickens, even horses in appropriate backyard spaces and it was a wonderful experience. Furthermore, many people are trying to return to some forms of self-sustainability, which is increasingly important for our mental health and to be connected to the land.
- i think livestock should be allowed in calgary
- Also it depends on the type of livestock but the amount of land also needs to be considered as many livestock's animals need more land than urban suburbs can provide. Welfare of animals needs to be topmost priority.
- So long as its clean.
- This bylaw would ensure that if livestock is kept in the city, it is well cared for and not neglected
- Already allow other exotic animals, not sure why livestock that are beneficial for the community and adequately cared for would be a problem.
- If they are treated right then it should be fine
- As long as people treat those hens well and there is proper oversight to ensure this, we should totally let people keep hens.
- Canadian citizens have the right to decide how, when, and what they eat, including by providing food for themselves. As hens offer both meat and egg for citizens, such animals should be permitted within city limits, as they are an animal that can be humanely, cleanly, and quietly maintained within city limits.
- Home owners should be allowed to keep a few urban hens on their property if they choose to do so, if there are suitable living conditions for the hens and if the neighbours do not object. Keeping hens to supply eggs for the family is part of sustainable living and a good use of backyard land. Personally, I have been looking forward to keeping a few hens myself and look forward to the day when the bylaw is amended to allow for this.
- Only if neighbour's support is not required.
- Small animals should be allowed as long as they aren't causing problems in the neighborhood. Again, that would be an owner that's the problem and not the animal.
- animal rights ..
- More benefits to community. Local fresh eggs.
- I think urban hens are a great idea, provided they are properly cared for and managed
- Fair
- Doesn't seem to hurt anyone and can make people happy.

- I feel this is a good idea for a couple of reasons. 1 is so that families that have a tuff time can feed there families. The second is that this could be a great experience for kids to learn how to raise and take care of these animals.
- People can have a sort of food that will support feeding.
- There should be a maximum amount of hens allowed to prevent noise and overpowering smells.
- I like the idea of backyard hens.
- As long as there is a limit, set by knowledgeable persons, on the number of animals.
- As long as the animals have a healthy and suitable living environment. Except pigeons - they are an invasive species and carry communicable diseases.
- Great idea!
- Some 'farm' type animals can be beneficial in an urban environment, as long as they are properly housed and cared for. They must not be a nuisance.
- Hens are a wonderful for families to teach children about sustainability and care for animals.
- As long as the environment permits a healthy life for the animal it should be allowed.
- Case by case with all parties n agreement is reasonable. Perhaps there could be some sort of periodic follow up to make sure conditions are being met.
- There is value for children and adults to be around farm animals, learning more about where their food comes from and discovering their personalities, natural behaviours and the work involved in caring for them. Hens in small quantities do not make any more noise than some people's dogs. When cared for properly they do not impact neighbours in any way.
- People need to feed themselves
- So long the criteria is met I cannot think of a reason why this shouldn't be allowed.
- Chickens are small
- As long as there is limits and restrictions on the owner
- There should be enough support for sustainable living conditions.
- I love animals
- Allow people to keep livestock to support themselves.
- People should be able to support themselves how they see fit
- That's awesome.
- Only in support if animals are kept humanely and their well being and environments and health are being monitored by bylaw to ensure compliance from owners. Also, only if the owner has the adequate environment set up to house the animal safely and appropriately for both its physical and emotional needs.
- Natural laying of eggs would be good for everyone.
- Keeping hens is a sustainable low impact activity and should be allowed with conditions
- Hens are the cat's pajamas. Fire [personal name removed].
- Hens can provide healthy food and garden fertilizer. They are also excellent companions..
- Henson kept for eggs seems like a wise chose

- as long as they don't disturb neighbours (being too loud/smelly/escaping), I don't see why they are any different from another pet. Just as long as they have adequate living conditions.
- About time.
- It's a good idea
- As long as people are being checked on by the City on a regular basis to ensure compliance with safe and clean conditions for the hen's, this could be a good thing.
- With proper wording for care and not being a nuisance hens can be a wonderful way to keep a yard healthy without pesticides
- If there's no roosters crowing every morning at 4 am I have no issue
- I want chickens
- Freedom
- Livestock, when kept responsibly, are no more nuisance than any domestic animal. Roosters should be given special consideration due to noise.
- It might be more convenient and easier financially to keep livestock in the city rather than paying to keep them on a farm out of the city.
- There are many forms of livestock that could be raised within the city without causing stress the animals or neighbors if kept in suitable numbers, suitable facilities and suitable maintenance.
- As long as there is a coup for the hens and they are properly cared for, perhaps with legal inspections every few months of their living conditions, I don't see why not
- If people are able to keep livestock, they would be able to support themselves more independently, which in many people's lives, is a big thing. Not to mention that strengthening community bonds is more important now than ever.
- big emphasis on neighbour support/ approval
- I support urban hens. I have kept urban hens when I have lived in other areas of Canada. Urban hens provide access to eggs from a more humane source than factory farming, require limited land and are quiet animals.
- Animals best interest should be number one. Don't approve someone simply because having a pet chicken would be cool
- It's a step towards ending factory farming and may help reduce carbon emissions by cutting out the transportation aspect
- When dealt with in a way that both supports the community and the neighboring families, this would be of great benefit to creating a sense of community that people may be missing as well as beneficial to the owner of the animals.
- The future need for people to be able to grow simple food and provide for themselves instead of grocery store for basic human food requirements should be supported. Consideration for the safety and healthy living standards for these animals needs to be ensured.
- Too many animals are killed because humans are [removed]. If anyone can offer a safe place for an animal in need, regardless of their location, then it's our responsibility to allow that person/family to help.

- However, replicating factory farm type conditions is NOT what I have in mind. Any animals should be given good lives, what would be normal lives for the animals - not like factory farm hens, for example. Animals in the city should be more like well-loved pets.
- I believe in food sovereignty. Obviously there are constraints on a city lot but as long as people are respectful of neighbors, they should be able to provide for themselves as they see fit.
- As long as hen housing and keeping is well defined so that it doesn't result in people being able to log Bylaw noise complaints, I like the idea. Again, we need the experts to define what a hen house it, how far it should be from fences, neighbours, how to keep them in the yard, what to do if one or more escapes, maintenance information, max numbers per square feet, etc.
- Must have neighbor support
- Because the animals are no harm to people, unless in a non suitable living condition. Such as abuse, teaching the animals wrong behaviour or somewhere the animal can get out onto the road. I would definitely support this bylaw amendment.
- For the Keeping all animals In the city, you must have sensible laws
- It would be a wonderful idea if the property could support it. Add a bit of life to the city urban feel here.
- I just want to make sure that the animals welfare is taken into account (no animal hoarding)
- As long as there are no roosters and neighbours agree. I also support replacing noisy, polluting lawn mowing equipment with shepherds, sheep and trained corralling dogs to trim grass. This has been done effectively in Sherwood Park, AB.
- must have support from neighbours
- Only on properties large enough to not interfere with neighbours enjoyment of their own properties, or with the consent of neighbouring properties if smaller.
- It supports food sovereignty
- As long as you're not affecting your neighbours, and being ethical, why not?
- Some people are have a genuine love for different animals and that's fine as long as they're needs are met.
- I think it is fine as long as it is supported from all surrounding neighbours.
- I fully support chickens being allowed in the city. I am ok with other animals on a case by case basis.
- As long as they are not a nuisance to neighbours - dirty, smelly, attract bugs, noisy
- Absolutely support! Growing and providing your own food is great for the environment. I have a large garden to supply fruits and veggies for my family, and adding hens to that would be great :) There would definitely need to be clearly defined rules about what would then be deemed nuisance livestock though, and how to deal with that. I'm not sure I have any suggestions, but getting neighbour approval sounds good. Get an agreement that you can't teach a hen not to cluck or goats not to bleep!
- An annual inspection to ensure the health of the animal and the cleanliness of the facility.
- I support sustainable agricultural practices and enabling people to provide for themselves. I believe this can be done hygienically on a small scale in cities.

- My only concern is WHO would responsible to ensuring these animals living conditions are "suitable" and who determines what is suitable. A city official with no experience should not make this decision, rather a veterinarian or expert farmer with experience in observing and raising these types of animals in certain environments.
- I like the idea of community benefits
- As long as animals are supported with emotional well-being and physical care and exercise. Distancing requirements from neighbours. Neighbours should not be disturbed or bothered with noise, smell.
- Urban chickens can have a positive effect on a neighborhood, providing there is no rooster.
- As long as they are responsible owners and the odor doesn't become overwhelming.
- I don't care if people own hens in their backyard
- Great idea.
- Noise, smell, size, and cleanliness should be considered. Some dogs or cats can display worse behavior than other animals.
- If the hens aren't a nuisance to people near the henhouse then let them go for it
- Within reason - i dont wsnt my neighbor to have roosters crowing at 2am or a pet pig that is not clesned up after.
- Gimme them eggs!
- I'm just a bit concerned that allowing urban animals would lead to more being neglected/ dumped at the Humane Society.
- Urban chickens are very successful in many cities. There is no reason to ban responsibly handled chickens
- Responsible pen ownership is not animal specific.
- Chickens are amazing for bug control, and, given the right living conditions and care, are quite lovely animals to have around.
- Giving people the option to own livestock not only reduces the success of mass farms that use unethical techniques like battery cages, but helps people (especially low income families) to reduce grocery costs and their carbon footprint (less waste from grocery store packaging)
- Backyard chickens are great low maintenance animals.
- Even as someone with animal allergies - I highly support this proposal for all of the environmental, personal, and community benefits. Please do not let allergies sway a decision against this. Those of us who suffer animal and environmental allergies have to deal with trees and plants and domesticated pets (and wildlife) already. Having urban hens and other livestock in the city has many benefits to outweigh potential risks.
- Why not have some fresh eggs
- I see no problem in that happening as long as the well being of the animals is ensured
- As long as livestock does not impact neighbors, and the home is kept in standards of the neighborhood
- People should have the ability to self sustain.

- I believe people should have to take a course and get a permit before they are able to have live stock for 3 reasons. 1) most people can't properly take care of their domesticated animals 2) the course will ensure that people have full knowledge of the animal they are caring for, how to care for them and resources they can call upon if they have any problems 3) requiring a permit will keep most people from getting live stock because it "Trendy" and the permit fees can go towards the training course
- Yes if they aren't being used for human consumption.
- Hens should be allowed as a test run in City. Hens would be allowed only after owner proves they have proper location and set up. After 1 to 2 yrs the city can decide to continue or end the backyard hen test based on complaints and issues.
- This would allow people to have their own chickens
- I like the idea that people can have other animals
- So long as the neighbors are on board and all the bylaws are being followed urban livestock only serves to have a positive impact on everyone involved. It's also an excellent learning opportunity for children.
- It is great for mental health
- I support this if the criteria are strictly enforced. If left unchecked, livestock (chickens etc.) would become a nuisance to neighbors and potentially create a flood of surrendered animals to the city/ calgary humane
- We should be encouraging local food sources.
- If one chooses to raise show birds (rare or purebred chickens) and they are not for consumption but the owner also maintains a clean and odorless pen/hen house. I would have no issues. Someone not cleaning up and the pen stinks or raising them for food, then I'm against it.
- It depends a little on which livestock you are referring to and how many. But if the conditions above -- particularly the one about support from adjacent neighbours -- are followed, I don't have a problem with it.
- every calgarian has a right to raise an animal. Hens are quiet and eat kitchen waste that eliminates our compost and landfill sites
- People are looking for resources to be self sustainable and hens are a decent way to do this
- Other animals also make good pets
- Animals other than dogs can provide benefits to the community, such as teaching children how they get their food or in therapy settings.
- Chickens are food
- It is nice to be able to have your own hen and perhaps pigs for slater and also meat chicken, these last two take 6 months and 10-12 weeks for growth to slater, if the property can handle the livestock I do not see why not, pigs are very clean animals, not noisy (can get out) meat chickens are not noisy either, this way people can produce their own meat and now where it comes from and what it was fed.
- Why not?

- owned chickens and they are extremely beneficial such as educational, good source of food, eggs, and are wonderful pets.
- Within reason, noise and conditions are always a factor as they are with any animal. But i do believe people with proper knowledge can have "livestock" in comfortable conditions within the city.
- Provided that they are being properly taken care of and live in suitable living conditions.
- Due diligence needs to done to make sure there are little to no negative outcomes
- As long as it doesn't disturb anyone else - do what you want in your yard
- If they can prove the animal will be cared for then they should be given the opportunity.
- Individuals wanting to be able to support their own household (eggs, meat) should have the right
- If they have proper care, why not.
- I've lived in towns and cities that have allowed chickens in backyards and think they are very useful to the community. Free range eggs are better for you and chickens. You also do not need a rooster for chickens to lay eggs, so there's a lower noise risk.
- It would be nice for people to own alternative pets within the city.
- I think it will help with community food I. E. Sharing eggs with neighbours
- As long as conditions are appropriate that should work well
- "It for neighbours to agree and the conditions must
- Be appropriate to the animals welfare"
- We need to remain self reliant.
- The strong benefit of hens as a food source as well as a pet and potential learning opportunity for younger people greatly outweighs any concern of odour or nuisance sound.
- Fresh eggs are good and healthy
- Some houses are equipped for chickens. Good practice to incorporate local sustainability practices
- Hens are not disturbing if kept in safe enclosures and clean coops. Owners should be required to pass a test on chicken husbandry.
- Urban flocks have been successful in other settings. As long as there is a clear expectation for welfare and care including housing, feeding and veterinary care.
- I think it would be ok to have a few hens if you could look after them properly, also if the space provided and proper care a larger animal could be fine as well.
- Keeps urban dwellers in touch with nature and encourages them to learn how to farm/provide for themselves
- A long as a cow doesn't move in next door, and there isn't a noticeable smell from the chickens, etc... I'd be okay with it.
- Goats are great for lawn management and people should be able to know where their food comes from especially chicken eggs
- This would need a lot of work to put through, however, I can see the benefit of allowing a limited number of poultry to be housed in a residential area.
- If laws are abided by.
- Having fresh eggs is important & animals are a good learning experience for children

- Hens are great! Just no roosters and they need to be well cared for like all animals.
- I think having urban livestock is a great idea, as long as all the neighbours are on board and there are regulations in place for the long term care and treatment of the animals ie. What happens to the hen when she stops laying eggs? Is it acceptable to slaughter the animal or not?
- "Small residential
- livestock opportunities will positively impact communities and stimulate local markets and create independence from giant evil corporations."
- Are we talking goats or are we talking chickens. I think it should depend on yard space/ or coop space for number of chickens kept and neighbour approval for other livestock such as goats (they eat everything, and smell) or pigs (can smell). Not sure that anything larger should be allowed..
- The most important part about being an owner of any pet is being held responsible for your and your pets actions. Proper living conditions and treatment of animals is essential and should be top priority.
- There are too many careless people out there
- I think as long as they're cared for properly hens in urban areas are a great idea!
- Chickens and ducks can be wonderful emotional support animals
- You should be allowed to have whatever you want as long as it's not hurting anyone or the animal.
- A great source of good in an uncertain time and easy to keep with all of the land home ie eta have access to!
- As long as the criteria above is met, I think it is a reasonable amendment.
- Support the idea of growing vegetables and animals locally.
- Chickens kept properly should not be a nuisance to neighbours but would be beneficial
- Calgarians deserve the ability to have small livestock like chickens, quail, rabbits, even goats or pigs if they have an appropriate space. Many benefits could come from having the freedom to raise our own meat/eggs for our family. Pigs and goats are great pets too, with much less incidents of predatory behavior.
- As long as other people are not negatively effected
- With suitable living conditions and care, permitting livestock in Calgary would provide multiple opportunities for community education as well as personal benefit regarding physical and mental wellbeing.
- Maybe chickens. I think hens would be very annoying for any neighbor.
- Having personally had hens on two different properties in Calgary, I am strongly in favour of approving small scale urban chicken activities within the city. The sound/odor impacts on adjacent neighbors are both well below the levels associated with dogs. I would scratch the element of the bylaw which would require support from adjacent neighbours. If one does not need support from an adjacent neighbour to have 4 dogs barking in my back yard, I see no reason why one should require such support in the case of a few friendly birds. If it's rendered legal in the bylaws, then it is entirely inappropriate to allow a single neighbor who is opposed to the idea to shut it down. In no other instance I can think of do we give a single property owner veto power over a neighbours lifestyle choices/activities on their own land. Thanks!

- As long as neighborhood is okay with it.
- As long as the animals are cared for PROPERLY and have EVERYTHING they need and do NOT disrupt the neighbors I don't see any harm.
- "I have no problem with urban hens or small livestock within the city limits.
- I do not support pigeons in any way."
- With proper regulations, living conditions, and care, many opportunities such as community education and personal benefit could be created
- Properly cared for they should be allowed
- Fully support, as long as animals are safe and healthy.
- I think having hens would be awesome. It would support the community, and let people become more self sufficient.
- I like chickens.
- No explanation needed.
- As long as they are not a nuisance and causing an issue with the community.
- I think there should be more be keeps around. Especially with declining be populations.
- Beekeeping should also be allowed within the city.
- If it doesn't affect or on the other hand it benefits, don't see a reason not to
- If all needs are met I do not see an issue.
- People should be allowed to grow their own food. Even eggs. However, too many complaints of stench or odour should be grounds for removal of the permit. Oh, people should apply for a one time permit.
- Chickens to make good pets and they lay eggs
- Hens are no more a bother than the indoor/outdoor cats that people let roam freely.
- I like chickens.
- The case to case basis is the best option for this in order to prevent strain on shelters if an owner can't handle those animals
- If someone has livestock of any kind that were originally supported by neighbours they would be grandfathered in as acceptable even if a new neighbour moved in and objected.
- In an appropriate environment where the animals can thrive and the community isn't negatively affected
- We should be allowed to have small livestock, it is a smart way to live more off the land and have something to care for.
- Like the opportunity to have other avenues.
- Urban farming is the future. Getting ahead of this inevitability, creating education, standards, licenses...these are ways to make urban hens a positive situation instead of a nuisance.
- especially with Covid, we are seeing an increased need to be self sufficient. There does need to be a limit of the # of hens dependent on the size of the property
- If there is a need then I support it as long as the requester is responsible

- As long as the are is kept clean and the animals are treated well/humanely. This would require additional enforcement officers, however, and that would increase costs to the city.
- important
- as long as the person with the livestock abide by city rules and have the understanding of how to take care of them and they are not neglected or abused or kept out in unsatisfactory conditions
- I want some chickens!
- I dont understand why more animal types can't live in the city I think its ridiculous. Having many family from the country I feel we should definitely implement more animals allowed.
- I support the amendment to allow chickens and other livestock animals as pets.
- As long as hens and other livestock are quiet and well kept, and of no danger to the public, I see no reason not to allow them.
- I think we should be allowed to have farm animals in the city under the right conditions.
- Being self sustained is beneficial
- I don't know enough about animal husbandry but I would be willing to explore this bylaw amendment if the above criteria were reasonable and sound.
- Caveat - ONLY animals NOT raised for slaughter. Example, hens for eggs, or just as a hobby - no problem. There should be some discretion allowed for the types of animals, as long as everything is properly registered with the city.
- If problems arise from allowing urban hens, amendments can be made to address specific issues
- As long as criteria is met then it should be allowed regardless of neighbor support. Adjacent neighbor should not be allowed to deny ownership just because they don't like it or want it next door. They should have to provide ample proof of reasons why their neighbor should not be allowed.
- If the neighbors are okay with it and the living arrangements are suitable I don't see a problem.
- I was a farm girl growing up and I think it's beneficial for kids to learn how to take care of different animals and know where their food is coming from
- Would allow many families access to high quality protein, teach young children about food the the responsibility that comes with caring for chickens.
- Absolutely. Chickens are an important part of a healthy garden ecosystem, and I know there are ways to manage them so they don't become a nuisance to your neighbourhood.
- Fresh eggs
- Yes, I am in support of hens and livestock in my community.
- But only smaller livestock like chickens, anything bigger is just a tad ridiculous for 'in city' in my opinion.
- Urban hens are an excellent idea.
- Suitable living conditions would be critical
- As long as you are responsible, and follow the rules, you should be allowed to care for any animal.
- There's people who would like animals besides cats & dogs.. and we need to make sure they have the proper environment as well.

- As long as the animals are taken care of and it does have clear rules regarding animal care, removal of feces/manure and addresses noise, then it should be no issue. Include a minimum area by animal type as well for guidelines - ex a horse must have minimum 2,000m2 of pasture area to reside within city limits.
- Could be a good opportunity to encourage local food production
- As long as people are civil about raising their food, let them have the freedom to have better raised meat.
- With some great guidelines and rules, this can be a fabulous idea. Any owner and/or animal can be problematic. The balance of regulations and freedom is needed but should not exclude people being able to provide at least some food, practical assistance and enjoyment from these animals.
- I don't know enough about this but as of now, I don't see why not
- Neighbors must agree (smell/noise) - not just consulted. Animal welfare must remain a top priority.
- Helps us be more self sustainable
- "I don't agree with the neighbour part of community benefit - this is a personal opinion. All it takes is a neighbour to not like a tweet and you're done.
- The rest I agree with."
- If the animals are being cared for properly and they're not bothering anyone what does it matter?
- With proper living conditions, and the animal(s) not being used or worked to gain a profit.
- As long as not ruining the enjoyment to other property I don't see why not
- Alberta is a province with farming roots. Let's teach our next generation about responsibility and livestock wherever possible.
- Chickens aren't any different than rabbits or parrots.
- Local food sources are great!
- I think people should be able to have what pets they want
- Provided additional livestock requests are reasonable and slaughtering/processing is not completed on site.
- Given the changing situation on climate and food supply lines, it would be prudent to review a way to raise livestock on a smaller, urban scale.
- I support urban livestock, and agree with the above criteria except for support from "adjacent neighbours". There are already provisions for neighbours to make claims for loss of use and by-law enforcement of animal care. Why allow an unrelated poor relationship with a neighbour to dictate urban livestock ownership.
- I think urban livestock can be beneficial to both families and communities alike. Livestock can offer food for families and add to our local economy.
- Provided the proposed livestock is not a nuisance to neighbours and negatively effect quality of living in the neighbourhood (noise, smell, parasites, etc) there should be no reason for a species-specific ban.
- All animals deserve good living conditions... If somebody wants an emotional support animal, they should have one. Chickens included
- Responsible pet ownership isn't a crime

- He a can produce local eggs
- As long as the livestock is properly cared for, and is not disturbing any neighbours in any way, it should be allowed.
- chickens or any pet should teach responsibility and affection for another life.
- It sounds reasonable that all parties (owner and neighbours) are all in agreement and that the environment is most suitable for the chickens. I don't believe it is necessary to have the livestock needing to offer community benefit/have positive impact, but I can understand why that might affect the decision of the owner and their neighbours.
- Urban farming is great for sustainability
- As long as the coups are kept clean i see nothing wrong with people being allowed to raise xhickens for eggs or food!
- It's important to have a relationship with animals we eat. I have no concerns with citizens having a couple of chickens, I do think there should be a maximum amount though. There are plenty of benefits of having chickens - emotional and physical benefits!
- I want a hen
- It would be great if the city, after ammending this bylaw, could provide support (resources to gain care items, educational training, etc) for people wanting other livestock
- I would like the option to own livestock.
- I believe as we move to more sustainable ways of living this provides a viable way to house livestock. I believe weight limits combined with respect for the neighbourhood and agreed on inspections is key.
- They are a source of food
- With proper care and attention, animals like hens are a positive addition to a neighborhood. They can allow for more interaction amongst Neighbour a and can provide a food source (eggs) as well. Chickens cause less issues than cats can. Roosters(males) however I fell should not be allowed in the city
- Having hens in all areas should be allowed because in times of crisis they provide a source of food.
- As long as nobody suffers, why not.
- A thoughtful and objective definition of "community benefit" and "positive impact" is essential. These are very subjective terms and are an obvious point of conflict. It is also critical that any consultation process is transparent and fair for all parties. My experience with some City public consultations involving neighbourhood developments has been that the opportunity to provide input is short, access to information is limited, and there is limited notification provided to neighbouring properties. However, I think the additional criteria are reasonable.
- Hens can be excellent support animals and are not a nuisance to neighbours.
- I would love to raise hens
- It's good to encourage people to have hens and be self sufficient with eggs
- As long as the area is suitable to ensure safety from animals getting loose, and noise/cleanliness is maintained then Urban Henneries are a great idea!
- I would support this amendment as long as the animals are kept in healthy and safe living conditions

- There are livestock that can co-exist with city dwellers. But make sure the crowing of roosters does not become a nuisance to neighbours (hey, I should be able to use the CANADIAN spelling on a Calgary survey).
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and taken care of, I have no problem with this.
- When you adopt you are now responsible
- Yes, If it doesn't bother their neighbours
- As long as the animals are cared for properly and not a nuisance.
- Allows people to be more self sustaining.
- As long as there are suitable living conditions for the animal, I do not see why they should not be allowed to own them.
- Local and healthy livestock for the purpose of community betterment sounds marvelous.
- We are taking away habitats and farms for industry and selfish large homes. If people are willing to house them on their property, and keep the property clean. Then I see no problem with it.
- Yes, but there should be a certain amount allowed per property, and people would need to have proper housing/coops for the chickens. I would also think that a course in disease prevention would be necessary to take as many diseases jump from farm animals (including poultry) to humans and this needs to be communicated about properly (whether in a course or other ways) to prevent people from becoming ill.
- I'd like to have 3 chickens and we have enough space I think it's a great idea as long as the animals are cared for the same way inside pets are cared for
- Hens (not roosters) are less noisy than dogs and help contribute towards a self-sufficient and healthy lifestyle.
- If you want to have chickens and you have the room to properly look after them then you should be able to.
- Chickens/hens - as long as things are kept clean and under control. Limit to the numbers because they can get noisy.
- The more sustainable we are the better
- I mean a cow or a horse might be a bit much and I wouldn't really want my neighbors BUTCHERING and killing animals in the back yard. But for pet purposes I don't see an issue.
- Living conditions would be need to be inspected regularly to ensure the animals are well taken care of and ethical practices were in place.
- I like the idea of being able to keep some livestock in personal residences/yards.
- I think approval from neighbors are critical and, in my opinion, there should be a process developed that would allow neighbors to revoke their approval on a yearly basis
- having hens allows people access to fresh eggs and and in side the city many people would enjoy this and that's all the livestock some people want so there's no point in moving into an acreage or farm
- The process should be pretty rigid as everyone wants to be a 'farmer'. The questionnaire should be very detailed as to living conditions of the animals (especially in winter) and the number of animals should be limited.

- As long as there is a rigorous process for approval and these animals are being kept in good and healthy environment I would allow.
- I support all but the support aspect. People will not support it just because they feel like it.
- It's an organic way for families to supply their own food.
- I love the idea of urban farming and like the protection provided to the livestock by the proposed amendment.
- I think its good to have people connect with their food and nature in this way. This is also a way to reduce grocery costs with fresh eggs!
- I have no issue, as long as the owners control their pets and are held to the same standards as dog/cat owners.
- Responsible hen care can encourage food security, an understanding of animal husbandry, household efficiency and opens the opportunity to enjoy beautiful animals that easily and happily can coexist in an urban setting, as seen in many other Canadian contexts that have already allowed the ownership of urban chickens. The changing of this bylaw would be something we would joyously celebrate
- I believe we have enough bylaws and laws to ensure that hens would not cause any additional detrimental effects to neighbours, beyond what a fire pit or swing set already could.
- So long as criteria for living conditions are specific, and criteria met by the owner (with repercussions in the case that they aren't), I think this is a fantastic idea.
- Again responsible ownership should apply. Education courses to explain what's involved. Children would benefit from the experience
- As long as the livestock does not interfere with the neighbours. Noise, smell etc.
- If the space allows, hens are not a nuisance
- As long as they are properly cared for why not?
- Limiting the number of animals, and follow up if complaints by neighbours
- Must have support from neighbours
- I would support urban hens, a certain number depending on the yard size. Also, their coop would have to be away from the neighbours' property line. I wouldn't support roosters. I would support goats, again, the number would depend on yard size.
- There are many responsible people that can raise these types of animals. There should however be periodic checks on the living situation as they often will not meet the standards because they do not know any better.
- It's awesome to have different animals as pets but as long they don't have a certain livestock and up eating.
- Yes, dependent on level of support for adjacent neighbours.
- The properties need to be large enough for live stock to be well-cared for, i.e. older neighbourhoods or acreages. The newer subdivisions do not have large enough yards to maintain hens or any other livestock without causing noise and potential health issues to the neighbours. Pigeon cooing can be heard several houses away and can be just as disturbing to as dog barking or howling to some.
- As long as they are maintained responsibly I don't see why not

- also proof of vet able to care for animal, maybe online class covering basic needs and bylaws.
- Example is goats being used for grazing. It's important to limit the number to reduce waste management.
- Has to be livable conditions and not running rampant
- I support this if all the criteria above are followed, however this will require a lot more resourcing from community standards in order to follow up on complaints and/or applications.
- So long as the presence of urban livestock is mutually beneficial to the animal, the owner, and the community, I see no reason to oppose this ammendment, and exceptional circumstance may be evaluated
- We need to support a community that is self sufficient for basic food needs
- Hens are sustainable
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and are in a clean and safe environment, why not?
- Person should have to show that they have educated themselves on the proper care and treatment of any livestock animals as many have very specific care requirements.
- As long as the animal is able to have a healthy and happy life, and he does not disturb the neighbors or environment, it should be ok. There must be a distinction between pets and livestocks, and standards must be set for both. It is important that the animals have all their needs met.
- Limit number of hens to number in household. 1 egg per person per day.
- Don't care about hens. Keep it clean
- Provided the needs of the animals and citizens are balanced than I fully support this. Have the registered but not with any sort fo substantial fee. Have a system where in which houses with registered livestock can be sent a notice of inspection and have the inspection occur 24 hours afterwords.
- as long as the person gets a permit and has the proper space. Would be a shame to see hens kept in poor/cramped conditions.
- I think Calgary needs to move in a direction of sustainability, there is room for growth in our city. I don't believe everyone has the capacity to own Chickens. Maybe a submissions form before they are allowed to by them. Also a bylaw that you need to own the property.
- Although a neighbor might block due to SPITE, urban chickens are an asset in the community. Perhaps restrictions on roosters to keep noise down.
- I think it would really depend on the reasoning behind having the animals. There should be restrictions as far as what the living conditions would be and I think that strict bylaws on square footage should apply.
- Fresh eggs
- It comes down to justifiable need and owner responsible
- There is no reason to not allow other species, so long as they are properly cared for, conditions are maintained, and sound/quality of life of neighbors are not affected
- In don't mind supporting the Hen idea. Just with suitable living conditions etc.
- yes
- Good idea

- As long as there's not too many, I don't see how a couple of chickens are much different from dogs and other animals.
- If they can meet criteria then it's worth seeing where this will go in the future.
- Not much of a difference as to having dogs or rabbits as pets. As long as roosters are not allowed, since they would likely make a lot of noise crowing, I can't see why chickens shouldn't be allowed.
- so long as there are enough bylaw officers to enforce this and there are stringent rules that are enforced and if deemed the animals need to be removed then it is done very quickly and not drag on for months and months
- Love me some egg
- I think hens can be adequately cared in many family homes - but larger livestock can't so would require approval on a case by case basis.
- I would like the option to have other animals
- I would like the option of having additional animals
- As long as bylaw would be fast responding if there is a rooster
- As long as it is properly regulated I see no problems.
- Would love to have goats
- Hens are a great way to support sustainability and food security. I think this is a great idea but will need to have a strict and well thought out pilot program.
- Proper animal care that is not disruptive to neighbours should be allowed.
- Chickens are simple to maintain. But owners should be required to allow 'X' amount of space for chickens to roam. Not just their Hen house.
- I would love to be able to have hens for eggs in my yard.
- Depends on the livestock and the feasibility of managing it safely, hygienically and without it becoming a nuisance to neighbours. Things like chickens, goats, fish farms, etc should be fine at reasonable numbers and with proper infrastructure and procedures in place. Applications for approval should include handling procedures and plans for how the animals will be cared for when the owner is away and in the event of death or illness of the owner.
- It would be wonderful to finally allow hens, etc in Calgary, with their health and safety secure.
- People should be allowed chickens.
- It would allow for further alternative options for financial stability
- small flock chickens would provide enrichment and nutrition for families
- This is a benefit to health and would be the same as growing your own vegetables.
- I have no opinion on this subject
- Because it would increase the area in which the weed control goats can be used. Also, many livestock animals are no greater nuisance than other pets.
- I want chickens to be allowed
- As long as these animals are being cared for properly and do not become a source of food
- I think having animals enhances our lives, but also the animal must have enough room to live.

- Food security. Everyone is so disconnected from their food and the ability to have some hens to care for and get eggs from would help everyone who may be "stuck" in the city.
- Food, not pets.
- It would enrich the community
- As long as animal living areas are clean and well taken care of
- nothing wrong with letting people be independent. Government controls too much
- Why not?
- Many livestock animals have been deemed great emotional support animals and should be allowed.
- Having smaller farm operations for a single family household could be a good environmental option.
- As long as the livestock has enough space and are taken care of properly
- Case by case allows for most suitable homes to be considered and less suitable to not be.
- I believe that with some restrictions, urban hens can help offer a number of benefits to the household and the community. The number of hens, the type of enclosure and conditions that the hens live in must be monitored for both the animal's welfare and the community's overall well-being.
- raising your own food is a great idea
- Animals have coexisted with humans forever. Allowing backyard chickens, for example, provides some people with not only a food source, but the potential for education in the community and a positive impact mental health for some.
- If you are going to be bringing in farm life into a small cramped city property, sounds more like animal abuse. There needs to be strong rules for proper space required if having livestock brought into city properties.
- If the animal fits nicely in your yard, you can afford it and it doesn't hassle the neighbors, the choice of pet should be up to the home owner. With limits of reasonableness on quantity.
- It would be good for everyone
- As long as properly done why not?
- Support from neighbours is a big one if there may be a noise or other issues
- Let people have the animals they want-as long as their property can sustain them and they are not bothersome to others.
- chickens and other low impact livestock should be allowed to help people with self sustainable living
- As long as the chickens are in a suitable environment and are not an annoyance to the neighbors I support this.
- Hens provide fresh eggs and they are easy to keep
- As long as it is not disruptive to the neighbors I don't see an issue with having hens.
- As long as they are well provided for and not tied up outside
- As long as the person cleans and keeps a tidy operation
- only in limited numbers
- Zero issue with this - great initiative
- Fresh eggs

- If it was well regulated and would be held to the same standards as dog nuisance claims, I don't see why owning urban hens or other domesticated livestock is any different than owning a dog or a cat. That said, it would be important to hold urban livestock owners to the same standards as dog and cat owners, with similar regulations and consequences.
- It's fine as long as every case is evaluated and approved accordingly. Whatever animal they want to keep must have enough space and have its needs met. Personally I wouldn't want my neighbors to have farm animals hanging around because it would smell but other homes in the Calgary area that might have a bigger plot or better conditions to hold the animals in would be cool
- I am always in support of people having the right to keep alternative pets besides cats and dogs provided that they can properly care for them and they are able to keep them from posing a risk to public safety.
- As long as they are well-cared for, small urban "farms" can be beneficial in many ways.
- I think it is a good idea, but to limit the amount and size of animals to reflect the lot size and welfare of the animal..
- I think it's a wonderful idea if someone wants Henson or other manageable livestock to sustain a healthy and productive lifestyle.
- As long as the animals have suitable living conditions and neighbours aren't bothered, why not?
- I would support this bylaw, provided the Calgarians involved are able to provide proper care for the hens. The ammonia produced by their waste and the odor that comes with it will be one of their greatest challenges.
- Certain areas in the city where people have more space outdoors, they should be allowed to own a wider variety of animals as pets, if given the proper housing and husbandry
- It allows for zero-tolerance of animal abuse, even if the animals are livestock.
- Livestock keeping in city limits is highly beneficial to people and animals as a whole.
- All of the above
- If they aren't bothering anyone and they are being cared for properly, I can't see why hens wouldn't be allowed!
- A hen, living in appropriate conditions - is quiet, does not leave feces on neighbours lawns, no biting or attack issues, helps control insects and other garden pests, can help provide food and a little fertilizer. A hen makes more sense than most other pets.
- This would need to be looked after with extra care to ensure housing and habitats are kept to standard
- I think there might need to be requirements in terms of how much space is available and proximity to neighbors
- I would like my own eggs
- If the animals are responsibly cared for, and there are clear guidelines for their care, yes.
- Good for community
- I would support as long as proper animal care includes maintaining the living enclosure for waste and proper disposal to ensure no odours.
- It encourages sustainable living in the city.

- If a person can be found to care for an animal providing the appropriate nutrition, housing, and training if necessary I don't see why they should be denied provided the animal is not a threat or nuisance to neighbors.
- I agree with the community benefit and positive impact they may have.
- If the environment can be proven safe there is no need for this bylaw
- Should require support from a broader radius due to potential noise and smell.
- suitable living conditions must be met, no question.
- I have nothing against having hens in a city
- As long as it didn't create offensive smells or loud noise, then I have no issues.
- "Urban chickens are very environmentally friendly and can provide people with fresh organic food with a low carbon foot print and less food waste from the house hold.
- There have been many instances that this has been proven"
- People should be allowed to provide food for themselves, Calgarians are struggling right now and this could be very beneficial.
- I believe the bylaw should be extended to other livestock within reason - based on the property and yard size, the animal is adequately cared for.
- Goat fot it
- Na
- As long as people clean up and the hens have proper living space its fine
- Farm or not, Calgarians should be allowed to have whichever animals they choose on their property as long as they are not harming other people or animals and they are not endangered creatures.
- I have no issue with urban livestock as well as they're not overly disruptive.
- I have no problem with hens in Calgary, as long as their taken care of properly.
- As long as there is an enforced limit on the number of chickens and that they must be kept in a fenced area to avoid traffic accidents and/or incidents with dogs walking by on public property.
- Why not i guess.
- This helps families
- I think this could be a great way for neighbours to become more of a community.
- As long as the animal is well cared for
- I support all of the above except for the support of adjacent neighbours. There is too much NIMBYism in this city already and neighbours are frequently not very kind to each other.
- Hens yes maybe goats I think that's about it for livestock that should be allowed
- Given adouquate space could be provided. I feel there is no harm to allowing people to own select types of livestock to raise on their property for personal consumption only.
- Not noisy animals, substantial food source. Funny as it is, good companion animals.
- Some farm animals can easily be introduced to everyday city life without causing any issues
- You must follow proper animal rights and they must have a yard and room to grow and live. Not in a cage.

- So long as the animals are proven to have adequate living situations and are not slaughtered on an urban property.
- People should be able to feed themselves however they choose to.
- With an average person not having the proper educational back ground raising these types of animals, having something in place could be best
- Positive impacts help our city
- As long as there is no lingering odour and no noise.
- Limit the number of birds, allow for composting or disposal of fecal material, proper hen house inspections, and husbandry certification classes offered by Agriculture based retailers like Federated Co-operatives Limited and their retail Co-operatives Associations
- If and only if the neighbours have a say and the owner is responsible. See pigeon rules.
- Would love to be able to have urban hens! Fully support this.
- Many other Canadian cities and towns allow Hens. It would be a good step towards sustainable and ethical food supply, providing that the living conditions of these animals are suitable.
- The introduction of urban livestock presents profound agricultural and self preservational education opportunities.
- As long as well maintained, livestock is easy to manage and fairly clean. It poses no risk.
- The ability to raise hens encourages individual sustainability and which I believe will have minimal negative impacts to a neighbourhood.
- Chickens are rad and support sustainable cost effective living
- Small livestock would be great if taken care of properly.
- They would probably live better and happier lives then on a factory farm anyways. Laws have to be obeyed and regulations made and enforced though.
- Urban hens and other livestock can be fulfilling. Support from neighbours is a difficult item and can be a huge barrier if not written and enforced effectively.
- Urban chickens are a great and sustainable way to live, as long as the people who have them understand the needs of the animals and that they will only lay eggs for about 5 of their 10 year lifespan.
- I think it would be great to be a city that supports livestock including chickens, pigs, bees.
- conditions must be met and approved BEFORE such animals are allowed...not after the fact..
- explain why not exactly. Especially if the holding area is clean and well built.
- Permits should be obtained by those who seek to appropriately House such animals within the city, and would need to prove their care would be adequately provided.
- Seems overwhelming to need to get approval from all those parties! People don't need this approval for other pets! Why this special case for hens?
- I love the idea of having more urban farming/food production provided that nuisance to others is mitigated/avoided.
- Why not? People can have gardens to grow food, why not chickens to grow food?
- Why not? I don't see this being an issue to anyone.

- As so long as the animal has proper means of living and lives a happy life I feel it should be okay.
- Food security, fun for kids.
- House chickens are very useful to have around especially in poverty areas or as a community project
- "The livestock would have to be small and able to be reasonably kept in a back yard. Cleaning of penned/yard area would have to be frequent enough to avoid smell.
- Number of hens (no roosters) should be limited.
- Possible restrictions on certain types of livestock that are hard to control, noisy, smelly, destructive, and/or non-beneficial."
- I think well behaved animals and livestock that can be kept with community benefit and support should be legal
- Require all above criteria, including blueprints/plans of accommodations for animals. Require a minimum land size to have a certain animal type and/or number of animals.
- Urban hens are fine as long as there are parameters regarding number of hens and living conditions.
- I like the option of owning other animals.
- Self sufficiency for food is important
- I think people raising their own animals as pets or food source is likely to be far more humane than the commercial facilities offer. healthier for the animal and for people... on soooooo many levels
- If the hens are not causing problems, are properly housed, and the neighbours are not concerned, there is no problem
- People should always have the right to provide for themselves. Hens provide a good source of food in the eggs they lay
- People should be allowed to produce their own eggs in the city.
- As part of a sustainability and self sufficiency initiative, being able to raise hens allows for residents to be able to provide food for themselves, as well as their extended family.
- Would need to meet all those specific requirements. And be Licensed, cared for, contained, not attract wildlife, create undue noise, smell...could be very controversial/slippery slope given how small backyards are these days & how little regard some folks have for animals in general. Proceed with extreme caution.
- Hens increase sustainability
- I agree
- Would love chickens in city.
- Not really keen on having chickens in the city. If they are, there should be a designated area away from homes due to the smell, noise and other nuisance effects that will absolutely be a problem.
- Great idea as long as the animals are well cared for and their enclosures maintained.
- As long as there was limitations on the amount of livestock someone can have in a residential setting, I don't see a problem with it.
- My daughter has wanted ducks or pot belly pig

- Owning livestock can be very beneficial from person to person. Cut costs of leaving the home to go to the store.
- If a problem wants to care for an animal, as long as reasonable and safe living conditions can be met, let them have whatever [removed].
- I think this is a great idea so long as roosters aren't present. It's always fun to see some chickens since it's not a normal thing!
- If individuals are wanting a at home family based food growing opportunity then everyone should have the ability to do that such as having hens for eggs. It offers family building time, as well as a more affordable way to have certain food goods
- If the person is able to provide the right conditions to house said animal to help feed/support/sustain their family, they should be allowed. As per a case by case basis.
- Having the ability to provide necessary animal products to the public would create more competition within the market place therefore lowering the cost of food if people wanted to buy off of someone. I would say at that point the livestock owning party must declare this as a supplementary business on their taxes just like you would with any other business.
- If suitable living conditions can be provided for the animal.
- Properly raised chickens would reduce green bin waste and allow for more sustainable food source.
- Great way for people to raise their own food. I like that support from surrounding neighbours is required.
- Chickens have just as much of a right to live in peace and comfort as a dog or cat does
- Plenty of cities have urban chickens. They do not cause disruptions, they are regulated, and they are good for the environment. Need I say more?
- Chickens correct? I don't care as long as they're well kept for. But chickens will draw more predators into the city.
- Extreme case by case basis given only to people with adequate land.
- Not a bother
- I support live stock and think it's a good way for the community to come together.
- Yes, as long as no coqs are allowed and enough space is allotted.
- People should be allowed to have livestock as long as they are properly cared for.
- I would love to have my own hens.
- We have friends with chickens and all the neighbours love them
- We should all eat local
- Good for the city.
- I have a neighbour that clhas had hens in the past and we didn't even know. They can be great pets
- If the animal cannot be cared for properly with the provided living space or care it should not be permitted
- If the bylaws are followed I don't see an issue.

- Especially necessary for vulnerable, low economic, Calgarians or those with for insecurity. The bylaw should also cover people in apartment or condos who have limited space, so they can have an opportunity (space-wise) or by co-owning to have hens.
- I wouldn't want to see a yard within the city full of livestock, but I don't see the harm in allowing a few hens(say maybe 4 or so), and possibly a couple goats, or a pig as a pet.
- I think neighbors all around (up the street) not just neighborhoods right and left should be allow to say yes or no for it. Like a house party happens, the whole street notices, it's not just the neighbors beside notices
- Livestock within the city (chickens and bees primarily) can be managed safely and effectively with little impact on neighbours; strict rules around humane best practices for care of livestock are important, and there should be a process for inspection and licensing of these residences.
- As long as the animals were taken care of properly, everything would be ok.
- I think this encourages sustainable living and greater educational opportunities for children.
- Adjacent neighbor approval is key
- self-reliance should be supported.
- Local husbandry can be beneficial to all communities.
- Yes we absolutely should be able to have small livestock with the intent of providing food.
- As long as the animals welfare is the number 1 priority.
- I believe hens can be a beneficial addition to a community and do not present problems or risk.
- I think case by case is a good plan.. for instance Hen's eat the bad bugs in your garden and give eggs.. could be a good idea
- Although I don't see the need for support from adjacent neighbours as the same support is not required for bothersome pets such as chihuahuas
- There are many miniature animals that can be as affectionate as dogs and good for the environment as in eating bugs and helping to keep the grass short
- I don't believe we need urban hens, hens belong on farms, like you believe Pitbull type dogs should be muzzled, I don't like any creature with wings. Birds terrify me.
- Hens are not not a nuisance it's the rooster who like to do all the yelling. Other livestock is acceptable if the yard is large enough. The last thing I would want is a resident taking advantage of a new bylaw and putting the animal at risk.
- Assuming the animal is well taken care of and follows a regulated living environment and is not a nuisance I believe it should be ok.
- Having hens is an excellent healthy food option
- If people can have dogs (who can be noisy, messy, dangerous), why can't others have hens?
- Limit of 5-6 chickens
- Small animals like chickens are beneficial to society and to become more sustainable
- I don't see anything wrong with having livestock, as long as they're being taken care of
- "Only if criteria are strictly enforced. This has the potential to flood CHS with
- surrendered and seized hens. Could cause significant impact to neighbors of left

- unchecked."
 - As long as the rules set in place are obtainable, and not something completely far fetched that make using this new bylaw even possible, it sounds like a great idea.
 - This supports community engagement and provides a safe outlet for companionship and self sustaining as well as environmental benefits.
 - Provided the animals and yards are well-tended, I agree with this.
 - .
 - I think allowing urban hens will positively impact Calgary
 - If the animals have the appropriate accommodations, and are well cared for, what's the problem?
 - I want to be able to keep hebs in my backyard
 - It should be assessed on a case to case basis
 - I believe this is a positive progression bylaw movement.
 - Great for the environment, affordability, and mental health
 - Provided the animals are provided with comfortable living conditions and their presence is not disruptive to neighbors or their property I don't see an issue.
 - Assuming this would not be large livestock, or herds of animals.
 - "No issues with well kept hens.
 - And furthermore,
- Nobody here but us chickens!"
 - Expanding our ability to have gardens and self sustaining food sources
 - Look at Europe. Many countries have not had any problems with this.
 - the types of animals allowed in Calgary is far too limiting
 - It would be very good if Exceptions would be evaluaron a case by case basis
 - Because chickens and or ducks are very good pets. Stop being elitist, responsible pet owners are responsible regardless of species.
 - It is a natural way to maintain public spaces and I imagine would be a cost savings.
 - There are all ready hen owners in the city, maybe it legal that way the City can insure the animals are being looked after properly.
 - I believe that hens can be humanly raised in backyards (much more humanly than industrial farms). I also believe that it is important for people to be more exposed to where their food comes from and this is a great way to do that.
 - Only if livestock owners can be monitored at a reasonable cost to the city
 - If the owners are able to safely and effectively care for the animals without the ownership affecting other neighbours

- chickens should be allowed
- I would be in favour providing there was a specific number of hens allowed to be kept as well as a noise cancelling system is also being used.
- Neighbor support should be the 12 houses closest to the requestor. Clarify that NO harm can be done to the animals on the property or there will be consequences.
- As long as the smell and sound of the livestock does not bother neighbours, there is nothing wrong with having livestock around.
- Because someone wanting livestock for themselves as long as it does not negatively impact other around them sounds fine to me
- It's a great way to start raising our own food when we can't afford to move out of city limits
- Responsible owners should be allowed to raise livestock
- Eggs are great!
- Food costs are high, let's do what we can to support each other during these times
- If done properly, why not?!
- A few hens in my neighbours' yards would not bother me provided they were contained.
- Not a fan of beehives in town but other than that. All good
- Natural pets that could enhance living in Calgary. Strict rules should apply
- Healthy benefits family
- Hens are a source of health and happiness to those that are responsible. They don't cause damage and Calgary has limited predators. I see no reason to now allow this as its monitored for animal abuse.
- In these uncertain times, I believe living in a sustainable environment is of utmost importance.
- As long as the appropriate precautions are taken and all surrounding neighbours approve, they should be more than welcome to have livestock on their property.
- Let people have hens and chicken if willing to properly maintain the livestock.
- it depends on the animals. If they are noisy and disturb people sleeping after they work hard I would say no. If they are not causing disturbance to neighbors then why not.
- I am fine with livestock in the city as long as they prove to be beneficial.
- If the livestock is treated right and living conditions are conducive to the city. Ensuring that odor is controlled and yards are kept cleaning especially if owning chickens.
- If suitable conditions can be provided for animals, and these conditions can be reviewed yearly, then urban hens should be permitted.
- I've found this bylaw to be very silly and unnecessary for a long time. Having city hens can help teach self sustainability to Calgaryans.
- "As long as there is no issue for the neighbours and the hens are kept safe and well cared for.
- I do not know what "other livestock" would include. So I am only answering about hens."
- The suitable living conditions is the most important. Whoever has hens should be subjected to monthly inspections.
- Having chickens isn't a big deal as long as the number is controlled.

- A lot of people are allergic to traditional pets, meaning they would have to look at other animals to have a pet. If they are responsible and care for the animal, I see no harm in this.
- I believe that if someone has a suitable environment for the animal(s) and takes proper care of their animal(s) they should be able to have different livestock.
- I see no drawback to responsibly owned chickens within city limits
- People should be allowed to keep whatever animals they want on their land. So long as the animals are safe and happy.
- On a case by case basis and neighbour approval.
- These animals offer great potential for communities as well as allowing city folk to enjoy our Alberta roots for the love of livestock and for all the animal lovers out there. I do agree that living conditions must be suitable.
- I'd like to keep a couple of hens for eggs. My spouse's family had some on their farm, so we're pretty familiar with how to handle chickens.
- Many animals can be pets, why restrict which ones?
- The criteria listed sounds reasonable.
- YES! Please allow hens!!!
- As long as the owner is able to provide adequate care & the neighbours are on board I don't see how it is a problem
- Provided every animal is licenced or permitted so the city knows who to go to if the animal in question becomes a nuisance for the community.
- Hens make great pets to certain individuals and would have a positive impact on the community.
- urban foxes need more of
- Allowing people to raise animals can allow them to produce their own food, and food for the community. (Ie: eggs from chickens, milk from goats). This is of vital importance as food supplies around the world become increasingly unstable.
- ...
- Hard to draw line but if noise, smell, etc. can be controlled, I would have a problem telling someone they could not have ex. a duck or goose or a small goat. Compliance will be the most difficult aspect to control and so the manner of further municipal costs certainly come into play at a time when I believe municipal expenses need to reduce.
- Chickens don't cause too many problems in other cities.
- I have nothing against chickens.
- As long as there is a cap on numbers and the hens are housed in a clean and esthetic manner and no roosters.
- This seems like a balanced and reasonable approach.
- As long as there is proper housing and care for the hens. It should be checked first before allowing them.
- I want a pigmy goat!
- Fresh eggs

- Would provide a possible food supplement.
- As long as the animals are not at risk or put in harm and or danger and can be properly maintained then it should be allowed if conditions are suitable. There should be someone to assess animal welfare and conditions before hand.
- I like the case by case.
- I think having hens and other appropriate livestock is a wonderful idea to have in Calgary. There are other municipalities that already have this available and we could easily follow their lead
- I like the idea of having hens.
- That's great! Let's explore sustainable living options for the city.
- It just makes sense
- As long as the neighbors are ok with it I don't see why you can't have certain livestock this is Alberta after all.
- Odour management
- as long as the animal is properly taken care of, people should be able to choose whichever pet they like
- I think the opportunity to expand the urban ecosystem is great for community members.
- I support the amendment. People should be allowed to raise certain livestock.
- As long as everyone follows the rules and proper can
- It may be a nuisance to the neighbours.
- Dependent upon noise level of the animal. Approval from neighbors a few doors away not just next door.
- Hens allow for self-sufficiency, increased community awareness of the modern food supply chain as well as potential mental health benefits from the rewarding activity
- Families should be able to look as providing themselves with sustainable food sources.
- In other communities, urban hens have been a huge success, and if taken care of properly, will be a positive influence for other communities to pass same legislation.
- If the criteria is always followed then there shouldn't be any major issues.
- as long as the animals are for companionship and not raised for food and the living conditions provide for a good quality of life.
- Support from neighbours and suitable living conditions is key. Neighbours should be someone considered anyone within ear shot of hen noises.
- Let people have things and enjoy life
- people should be allowed livestock in Calgary as long as they have suitable conditions for them
- I would want assurance that urban animals would not be an attractant to other wild animals such as coyotes, which would put them at risk for more human wildlife conflict.
- As long as the animals are cared for and the neighbours do not object/are not in any way inconvenienced by the animal I don't see why this would be an issue
- I have no issue if direct neighbours support it.

- I don't care how many animals a person has as long as they are properly & consistently cared for on ALL fronts. Also, as long as the pet owners ensure the animals have sufficient dwellings & ALL odors/waste/noise are rectified daily. I'd like to point out, when having any birds or pheasants, etc. they can often carry harmful disease & parasites therefore, protocols must be 110% enforced to not just minimize this but, to 110% ensure any issues are ultimately rectified. We do NOT need another disease similar to Covid-19 generated by Calgary!!!
- I would want neighbour approval
- There are many rural communities capable of supporting a hen
- Let the people have chickens who cares
- Being self sufficient enough to feed yourself should always be allowed.
- I would support urban hens, but I would also have concerns. I am on the fence if I would like to participate in having my own hens. I am not against the idea. But, then my number one concern would be if my neighbours had hens and they were noisy.
- Having hens allows people freedom to grow their own food and increases food security.
- Urban farming/livestock is great for the ecosystem.
- As long as the animals and property are well-taken care of there should be no deleterious effects.
- should be able to have some livestock on your property like chickens but a larger livestock animal should get approved
- I think if people can keep them from wandering onto others' property, it's a great idea.
- Duh
- A limit on the amount of chickens, ie: only three. Stringent hygiene and no flies/mice issues must be in place.
- As long as it is regulated and permitted, and the animals' welfare is considered, we should have backyard chickens.
- If someone wants 1/2 pet chickens cool. If someone wants a coop then no way.
- No reason not to.
- As long as "support from adjacent neighbours" statement was clarified. In rare cases this could be used to exploit or manipulate neighbours, or be used in a vindictive manner by those who can suddenly retract their support causing the family to give up their hen(s).
- Hen doesn't do any damaged they would have to be in their yards as well as have proper housing built
- Shouldn't need support from neighbors.
- Hens are great, however, owners need to learn how to care for them to keep them healthy, contained and not disturbing neighbours. Like any other animal.
- I support the ownership of any animal as long as it is properly housed and cared for long as the neighbourhood is on board.
- As long as the people are responsible owners, maybe the people who would like some Hens registered to get approved as long as they have a proper set up for them.
- It would be fun, and allow for more diversity in the city.

- I think this is a great idea. Most farmed chickens are in terrible conditions anyway, but in a home farm (with suitable limits, maybe some type of licensing to show they know how to care for them) could be better quality of life for them. It also potentially allows reduction of carbon emissions due to transporting eggs to stores from farms.
- In an attempt to move towards a more sustainable city, this seems like a very good step in the right direction.
- Strict humanitarian laws needed though. Calgary gets cold, hens will die. Fresh eggs are a good sustainable source of food and if done properly more humanitarian than farms
- As long as the animals are looked after. Are clean. And do not interfere with my sleep. Like the cop sirens going at 3am for over 1/2 hour.
- All animals need to be treated with care
- Hens are quiet and clean. Roosters are annoying
- Urban hens can be a source of locally grown food for the city.
- I think it sounds OK, as long as it is not too noisy.
- because I would like fresh eggs too.
- Allowing alternative livestock within the city would help citizens be a little more self sufficient while at the same time saving money, knowing where their food is coming from and provide a broader understanding of how important farming and livestock are to us all.
- .
- Eggs are yummy.
- Hens are wonderful animals and they provide essential meat and eggs to households
- As long as they are well kept, smell isnt overwhelming and proper training on how to take care of and raise is taken. I also think it should depend on what type of livestock. Hens and Chickens make sense but not a cow in the city.
- As long as they're well maintained and taken care of it don't see the issue
- As long as they can support it, they should be able to own the animal.
- However if the owners of the hens want eggs I think they need a rooster as well and they can be noisy.
- Chickens are okay as long as it meets an expected level of sanitation, growing your food should never be wrong. Within reason, no to dairy cows.
- I love chicken
- This is a more organic, sustainable way of living. But what happens if new neigh doesn't like it. Not fair to allow it then take it away
- As long as the hens are well cared for and they are not causing a nuisance to the community I think it is fine
- I think this is a great idea. I would love to have hens or even honeybees- that would be another "livestock" I'd like to see considered.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and the noise doesn't bother the neighbours.
- Don't like vetoes by neighbours, but like urban hens.

- Chickens are great
- People should be free to live with as little government interference as possible.
- as long as they have suitable living conditions all animals should be welcome
- If there is community support and education, I think this is a great initiative
- It has been shown that there are many benefits of having hens/wildlife in urban areas. They provide a cost-effective and local source of food, a connection to nature, and provide education about our food system and animal care.
- Yes
- With proper living accommodations, hens are great pets
- It would be important to get support from adjacent neighbours.
- Only if there is a ban on slaughtering and harming these animals. They are not objects.
- Provided that noise issues and smell issues are taken into account, that's fine. Additionally, an appeal/complaint process that is robust for the neighbours needs to be in place - we have friends who were forced out of their own house by our weak cannabis bylaws (ie - no taking into account second hand smoke from their neighbour smoking directly under their child's window). Someone else's hobby shouldn't be given more weight in the bylaws than the neighbourhood's ability to enjoy their property.
- Chickens good
- Must be a maximum number per property but love this idea!
- Seems fine as long as its within reason and poses no threat to surrounding neighbours.
- As long as the animals have good living conditions and neighbours have no issues it should be okay.
- chickens are good for communities when kept in appropriate homing .
- As long as the livestock have suitable living conditions, then there shouldn't be any problem.
- I'd love to have a few chickens to get fresh eggs and teach my children about sustainable and ethical livestock.
- If there is a required class that people must take (and pay for) to ensure their genuine interest in the hens well-being, I think it could be beneficial.
- I like the idea that battery hens can be rescued and love out their days in someone's garden
- Self-sustainability should be promoted in our city, especially in light of certain highly publicized issues at various meat packing facilities during the pandemic.
- Positive impact
- As long as it meets all criteria, there shouldn't any problems.
- Does not bother me if they are quiet.
- I think urban farming and livestock can be achieved
- As long as the above stated criteria is met, I have no issue with this
- If the living conditions for this livestock is sustainable, they should be able to have them on their property

- As long as they are taken care of and their coops are cleaned regularly, they're no different than outdoor rabbits.
- As long as all criteria are met and confirmed, it should not be a problem.
- If someone is willing, able and educated enough to provide for an animal or livestock then why should they NOT be able to own one?
- As long as it goes for any breed or type of animal
- It is a good plan
- Urban hens that are properly kept can be fantastic.
- As long as they are taken care of I don't see why we cannot keep animals on private properties within the city.
- As long as the criteria are met and the livestock aren't bothering neighbours (e.g. noise, odours, debris/feces), I'm in favour of it.
- Criteria are thorough.
- As long as animal needs are met and they are not causing a huge impact on the neighbourhood ie extremely loud at all hours, horrible smells etc. Then I see no problem.
- Properly kept animals are fun.
- After living in Europe for 3 years, where almost everyone has backyard chickens and bees, it's a move in the right direction towards sustainable living
- We need more options for being self sustainable.
- If a party is going to take proper care of them and follow the rules and regulations laid out then they should be able to.
- However, my neighbours do not require my support when they decide to get a pet like a cat or dog, so chickens should be treated on the same basis. There are means to deal with complaints should the animals not be cared for properly. Also, the suggestion could be made by the City to only keep hens, as they are quiet.
- There should be a limit of number of hens based on yard square footage to better protect the animals but having a hobby egg "farm" would be good for the community and result in less mass produced eggs where the hens have very poor quality of life.
- good use of fowl
- I think as long as the animal has proper living conditions/all needs are met they should be able to have livestock.
- Decisions Should be on a case by case basis in regards to animal ownership
- Having livestock in the home setting would allow for a healthier and more sustainable food source for families and could potentially open a community supported / community oriented program for the adjacent neighbors to participate in. Creating a benefit for multiple households
- Have small farm animals in urban settings is inky a benefit to the city. The animals would need to be well cared for.
- "ENSURE the animals should have proper living/housing condition, perhaps enforce a standard.
- Odor management.

- Feces clean up."
- If their property meets requirements such as community support and adequate space.
- If you have the support from your neighbours - all of them (both sides of you and you backyard neighbours and they (owners) are responsible then fine.
- I see this decision the same way I see a vegetable garden. It is a sustainable and potentially cheaper way to put food on the table.
- As long as the owner is keeping things clean, urban livestock is great - it can help provide food (eggs, dairy, meat) for the owner, and can also contribute to community building (food exchanges, etc.). Plus kids think it's awesome.
- As long as everyone one was following the rules and regulations!
- As long as everyone is reasonable, it should be allowed
- Having a small number if hens is good for food accessibility. There should be strict guidelines as to the size and structure and ongoing cleaning of pens.
- I think this is a good education for kids about the ecosystem.
- As long as they are well maintained they are no different from taking care of a dog
- Urban husbandry is an excellent idea, and so long as their is sufficient owner responsibility protecting against nuisances and requiring registration and vaccinations, there's no good reason it shouldn't be allowed.
- As long as the animals are not a nuisance and are well cared for they should be allowed.
- There should be limits on the number of hens or other livestock.
- I agree that having hens should be based on support from adjacent neighbours due to possible noise and smell issues, ensuring that the hens have suitable living conditions is paramount.
- There needs to be a limit on the number of hens allowed on a property, but I'm ok with the idea.
- With the criteria of neighbour approval and official approval of living conditions and it benefiting the community I think why not.
- as long as a limit of animals is defined
- Why not?
- I think it's a good idea, provided the owner is responsible and the living conditions are suitable and not a nuisance to neighbours.
- If the animal owners are responsible.
- If my neighbor is looking to apply for the right to have hens or other livestock, I would like to be consulted.
- Not an issue if all rules followed.
- I support this as long as other neighbours agree to it and the livestock animal isn't a nuisance in the neighborhood (for example, a rooster crowing at dawn).
- "Support from adjacent neighbors.
- Suitable living conditions can be provided for the animal."
- A comprehensive evaluation of animal living conditions, owner's need to have the animal, nuisance to adjacent neighbors.

- Livestock do no harm. If you can raise local and feed local, why not?
- Livestock, such as chickens, encourages learning, responsibility and home grown food resources.
- I think as long as there aren't an excessive amount of SMALL animals adequately housed on private property, it's okay. NO COWS
- So long as the animals are able to be appropriately cared for and are not a nuisance I think it is a good idea to allow Calgarians to become more independent in their food collection.
- Chickens would be great and a max of 10
- Domesticated animals are just that. You need new people to update these ridiculously antiquated laws
- If it is done I a. Way that is cruelty free then why not
- Why not??
- If the animals are cared for, licensed, and have a safe home, it should be fine. There needs to be structure around this for it to be successful.
- Hens should absolutely be allowed in Calgary as long as it is not causing an issue to adjacent neighbours and they're being kept properly
- With the way the world is headed being able to raise our own food is important.
- I am fine with this as long as the animal is well cared for
- If the animal is living in a suitable living condition and is receiving what they need then why not.
- As long as the amount of hens are limited and the neighbours are happy with the arrangement and the chickens are well cared for I am okay with it.
- I have no issue with livestock-provided it is not to be eaten-rather for eggs-mowing lawns, etc. The exception would be a rooster as in my area, people would be ticked off with the cock a doodle do at 5 a.m.
- It's a basic right to produce food as long as it causes no harm to the animals and no significant nuisance to the neighbours. Also, frankly, dogs cause all kinds of nuisance, yet we have decided that they're worth it. The city needs to expand its views. I don't have hens but sympathise with those who want to own some. Kids live to interact with these birds. They can be used for clicker training etc... Hens can enrich lives in many ways.
- As long as the adjacent neighbours are supportive and the owners are responsible.
- More eggs are better!
- As long as the community supports it, they should be allowed.
- We have neighbours who have chickens not bothered by them.
- It would be great to have a hen
- As long as the animals have everything they need (enough space ex.) and the neighbours are ok with it I think there shouldn't be a problem with having livestock in Calgary.
- So long as the hens are properly cared for I don't have an issue. They should be inspected a couple times a year to make sure they are in compliance
- The case-by-case method should be implemented.

- Many people need a friend .. animals can be the stop gap. It helps reduce stress and helps people with health problems. Its science .. it works
- N/A
- What's wrong with hens!?! No reason not to have them, with some reasonable rules to follow.
- It really depends on the type of livestock and if there is a enough room for them to be properly cared for. There can also be a noise and or a smell issue.
- would be awesome
- Should to be able to have chickens in your back yard.
- I think it's a great resource
- Case by Case ONLY - with specific conditions, pending on the animal
- I'm unsure about this question in general as a "pet" and "livestock" are essentially the same thing. There is no difference in ownership of a chicken or cockatoo.
- I'm all for more urban farming if done properly with respect to other homeowners in the area.
- why not if people can have hens then why not other animals
- There are definite benefits to families both in terms of mental health and food supply.
- It doesn't hurt anyone for people to have urban hens and other livestock, with reasonable limits and pre-requisites to ensure that these are not a nuisance to neighbours.
- I grew up in a farm outside of Calgary. Having hens in the city are not an issues as long as their is education. A license should be required with proof of suitable housing and a chicken max per household.
- Hens would not be disruptive as long as they are cared for responsibly.
- Allowing urban hens would build a sense of food security and connection to land for Calgarians in a way that is appropriate for an urban context.
- As long as you were a good neighbor and responsible pet owner. Then a chicken or two should be allowed.
- The amended/clarified criteria, such as, adjacent neighbor support addresses a way to keep all parties appeased.
- Urban hens is a wonderful idea. I hope that the city is also cognizant of vehicles and pedestrians who may try to harm the birds. Please put in place protections for the birds to ensure their safety from anyone who may try to harm them.
- Goats for lawn maintenance.
- urban hens are the tits
- Designed properly, this shouldn't negatively impact the lives of neighbours to any extent. Consideration should be given to situations where neighbouring properties have pre-existing pets, such as dogs or cats. The presence of hens on the other side of the fence can instill or activate prey drive in the animals, creating unintended consequences (e.g. fences damaged, hens being killed).
- I think with proper inspection and care there is no issue
- Strong yes!
- As long as they are not bothering other I don't see a problem

- I'm in favour of having hens but not roosters as the latter are too noisy
- "There is lot of grass in calgary and goats are most beneficial and noble animals, so specially children will be very happy to manage and learn and there will be less mental isolation, stress and autism cases in children, while due to dogs children can not go outside and even adults avoids outside due to dogs, and dogs owners use their dogs for misbehaviour and threats to innocent citizens, city homes should be place for humans and benign animals and not for fierce and bloody dogs.
- I know that due to dogs children and ladies are unable to go outside , in fact dogs and their owners are vandals of our society."
- With the appropriate care hens offer a benefit to the community.
- It would have to be case by case and the people would have to pass some sort of course proving they are capable of caring for said animal. In reality a goat isn't much different than a dog for example
- I support radical homesteading
- It makes the neighbor safer for people and other pet owners.
- There are multiple benefits from allowing people to have urban hens, while the risks and drawbacks are minimal providing this is regulated closely and immediate neighbours rights are considered.
- As long as these animals are not a hazard or annoyance (ie extreme noise or smell) to their neighbours, I see no problem with this.
- Animal husbandry and alternative pets would be a healthy distraction from our Covid-19 situation and provide possibilities for struggling Students studying from home.....
- As long as there are provisions for odours. Some will care appropriately but some will not.
- It is important that livestock animals kept within the city are provided with proper space and care
- What people want to keep in their own back yard is none of my business, unless what they're keeping is somehow hindering the peaceful existence of everyone else. If my neighbor wants to stuff 10 cows into their yard, I don't care so long as their noise, stench, by-products, etc do not interfere with my activities. This is no different than the noise bylaw or unsightly premises...If someone was keeping all their garbage in their backyard and never disposing of it....that's a problem. If that garbage doesn't stink....and it's out of site...it's none of my business. Same would go with animals. This is very subjective and difficult to put a sweeping blanket on. Let people have chickens...if the chickens cause enough noise for the neighbors to complain, then handle it like any other noise complaint.
- I support any initiative that will integrate animals into our lives in a positive way. I believe it will be highly beneficial/educational for everyone to be closer to their food sources and hopefully will help with sustainability.
- Why not but noise could be an issue.
- If the ridiculous covid 19 enforcement continues with support from our Liberal Mayor, then people need to start relying for themselves rather than grocery stores. If the land owner has a proper set up and has proper shelter, feed/water and room for grazing, then yes. Or, if the animals will be stressed and are NOT provided for, then no!

- i'm all for chicken coops or other livestock as long as the animal is cared for properly and it doesn't cause a huge issue with the neighborhood. nothing wrong with this!
- Support from adjacent neighbours is tricky: how would one deal with renters vs landlords or moves?
- If they want a chicken let them have one as long as those regulations are followed
- I saw yes, but with a caveat. I would be to know if you are referring to cattle, sheep, goats, etc..
- But it would have to be a case where it's a very big yard and they are technically in town but not really near any other houses
- case by case, and if neighbors agree
- why not? Decided on a case by case basis.
- Maybe with a large lot and high fence. If it takes 10 neighbors to agree to remove a boulevard tree then livestock should take more than just adjacent neighbors.
- This is a great idea! I fully support hens and other livestock within the city limits and with responsible ownership. This gives people better control over their food and allows people to raise healthy local food themselves.
- Why not it's chickens not cattle
- It's ridiculous that chickens aren't allowed in Calgary.
- Why is it okay for people to have any animal under the sun except pit bulls? I'm all for allowing hens
- Times are tough. Let people raise chickens.
- Great opportunity to grow your own food.
- Reward responsible ownership
- It would allow more people to have access to the benefits that can be gained from owning hens/livestock
- Supports animal health as well as community.
- I support this with the exception that an adjacent neighbor would have to provide a relative explanation for any non support.
- I think as long as neighbours are okay with it and the animal has ample room to live and and be happy and healthy then this is great!!
- I think any pets should be welcome however some livestock ie. Roosters can create some unwanted noise for their neighbors, or the live stocks can be a little more stinky than others but it should be up to the owners to maintain the property and clean up after any and all pets
- I think hens are fine. People want to grow/produce their own food. I guess additional animals may be okay if they aren't an excessive nuisance.
- This sounds like a great way to eat local!
- as long as other community bylaws are upheld (noise, etc.)
- Hens can benefit a family, but strict care is of the utmost importance ...feeding, cleaning , housing, and noise control
- So long as there is strict enforcement of rules and it does not impact other people with noise and smell.

- I see no reason why a person couldn't have a couple laying hens for eggs. We grow gardens to reduce the cost of groceries, being able to have your own eggs would also help reduce grocery costs.
- As long as the animals do not interfere with the enjoyment of other people's property (e.g. noise, smell, etc.) I have no concerns.
- Positive Impact to the community and responsibility of the owners to provide the environment required to suitable for the animal involved
- I don't have a problem with people having hens or goats as long as they are looked after
- Every backyard & neighborhood is different. Case by case basis should be looked at.
- As long as they have the right facilities
- Having a small amount of Hens would give residents the ability to collect eggs and be more self reliant.
- The criteria make sense.
- Maximum of 4 and no roosters.
- There should be limits similar to the bylaw amendment for urban hens (limited number, verifiable reason for having the animals, vet care, maintenance and feeding requirements).
- I think support of neighbours is pretty important.
- I think it would be a very positive change to allow certain livestock within the city in designated "safe and approved" neighborhoods because it is an opportunity for humans to build an ethical relationship with animals and gain a new appreciation for their lives and what they provide us with.
- Offer community benefit.
- Absolutely people should be permitted to keep a limited number of hens for fresh eggs, and provided the conditions for care can be met, some other small livestock (goats, ducks)
- I think depending on the owners and the location, having animals like chickens, goats, etc would be an excellent community building opportunity and could possibly be operated much in the same way that a community garden is operated. It should be cleared by neighbours, and discussed in advance.
- I live in North Vancouver for a while and some people had Horses in community areas. as long as the owner took care of the animal and cleaned up, there wasn't a problem.
- Limited number of chickens that are well cared for should be home owners choice.
- But I don't agree with having to have neighbour approval. If there is a bylaw then use compliance with that as the rule
- That's pretty cool
- As long as it is supported by the community and everyone is on board.
- Urban hens are loud. Noise is my main concern. Unless the property is remote I can't see how allowing hens in an urban setting can be humane. Those applying for Urban Hens should cover the costs of administrations and the enforcement agency. Written approval for also be required all neighbours. It's easier to get their approval before than try to remove them and deal with complaints after.
- People just can't do what they want; there must be a process.

- As long as the animals are being treated humanely and are well cared for I have no issue with people wanting to keep them on their own property AS PETS ONLY. I don't agree with people wanting to keep animals on their property with the intention of raising them for food.
- If families want to be more self sufficient that is a good thing. It helps children of those families "know where the food comes from"
- As long as animal owners are responsible and know how to properly treat the animals I have no objections.
- however, suitable living conditions for the animal should be reviewed before license of "other livestock". Also, case by case review with respect to "other live stock" i.e. location, other pets in permises.
- I am okay with livestock in the city so as long as the property is maintained and the hens don't run amuck.
- Any amendment would need to take into account existing noise, noxious odours, nuisance by-laws.
- I am concerned about the health of the hens - requiring welfare checks would be a good idea. I'm sure there will be some crazy people who will jump on this band wagon.
- If the owner can prove that all of the criteria can be met, and continue meeting it I feel that allowing hens should be allowed.
- May need to give guidelines on minimum lot size and how to deal with early AM roosters. They can be disruptive when we rely on open windows for ventilation.
- I think it is great if people can have hens and create their own food source. There must be something down for noise if there are any issues with neighbors. I am absolutely against any kind of roosters, however.
- By allowing this you help members of the community become more self sufficient, it can supplement small amounts of income and reduce grocery bills in some cases.
- Why not give live stock a chance to be in a different environment.
- I think it can be a great way to support healthy eating and healthy communities, as long as there is some thought put into safe livestock housing;and cleaning standards) that would minimize the attraction to predators within neighborhoods.
- As long as the animals are cared for properly.
- I think allowing urban hens is a great idea, it makes people happy, gives them a way of being a little self sufficient and its also eco friendly since you would be able to feed a lot of table scraps that we'd other wise have ended up in the garbage.
- It's reasonable
- If proper criteria is met for animal welfare, I agree.
- I don't think anyone should be slaughtering pigs in their garage, but hens for eggs, and honey bees I see no issue with.
- Yes for a hen, no for other livestock. I don't want cows next door.
- "Urban agriculture and livestock has the potential to be huge boon for places like Calgary that have larger lots and areas to contain urban livestock.

- Additionally, The COVID-19 pandemic showed how unprepared many are in North America for disruptions of food shipping infrastructure. Urban agriculture and livestock rearing could be used to help bolster family food supplies in a variety of ways.
- Beyond just using animals for meat, dairy or eggs, their byproducts help immensely in terms of manure generation and rejuvenating lawns and plant beds."
- There is no concern for noise, there is enough space with the city, can have access to fresh "bio" eggs.
- I believe homeowners should be able to have backyard chickens/other livestock if they wish to, if they have the consensus of their neighbours and go about it in a way/build their habitat that is not a nuisance to their neighbours.
- I support this idea as long as there is control within the communities of these urban hens.
- If the criteria outlined above is met, there are no concerns. There should include a limit number of livestock per space available to ensure that it does not get out of hand.
- Those with livestock need to be checked in on. Owning just animals is not like owning a dog. I agree that they can be in the city, but owners must be ok with check ins
- If there is neighbour support and the owners can take care of the animals, I think this would be a wonderful way to have sustainable local food communities! A lot of people come to live in the city for access to city services and being closer to the work, family, schools, and the like. Many of these people (like myself) are already experienced with raising hens and livestock, so giving them the opportunity to do so would add to their quality of life, especially if they are elderly who are no longer able to live in a rural location, or have immigrated to Canada to join their children and grandchildren. I believe this would give a lot of elderly immigrants a sense of purpose and a continuation of something they have done at home, because many come from countries where having a garden, hens, and other livestock is quite common among people who are retired.
- So long as the animals are being properly cared for and residents are not disturbed having livestock in urban areas would be a nice addition to the community (sustainable way of obtaining eggs, good for kids to care for animals etc.).
- There are lots of injured livestock that need a home but can't live on a farm
- i think its a good idea for children to learn
- As long as the animals have good health and welfare and so there are systems in place to educate or intervene if these aren't occurring. I would also consult with poultry vets in Alberta to determine these needs, and community veterinarians who may suddenly have clients with the expectation to be treating these animals in the city. I think there needs to be a good plan for support and phasing it slowly.
- N/A

- Owners would need to maintain their property so that animal odours weren't noticeable for adjacent residences and if this could not be maintained the animals would be immediately removed.
- If neighbours are in agreement and the animals are adequately taken care of, supervised and do not disturb neighbours surrounding.
- With a permit and limit to the number of hens per property.
- I agree
- As long as there is a limit (ex. 6 hens max) and the household can properly provide and care for said hens, then I see no issue with them being within the city.
- I think it is important to allow people to own the types of animals they please as long as they are responsible pet owners
- ???
- If having livestock on your property can be maintained and clean. Then why not !
- Backyard hens are important for learning and experiencing about our connection to our food supply. It's also important for access to food.
- As long as it is not a nuisance to other neighbours.
- Sustainability is important and it's also important to encourage and support the community in that.
- Support from neighbors must be in writing. This cannot include animals that roam or are a noise disturbance such as roosters.
- Chickens are a great addition to family neighbourhoods.
- There should be a limit on how many hens. Big difference between two and twenty. Should be a plan for their manure.
- Neighbours should have a say as the noise and smell and mess could become a negative in market value of homes
- If your neighbors are alright with it. Good luck trying to convince them. Not allowed to get livestock till all the above is met.
- I would support this bylaw amendment as long as the appropriate background checks and regulations were in place to ensure the safety and humane treatment/care for these animals
- Sustainable alternative to factory farms
- If they are not a problem and well taken care of
- Chickens are fine, but larger animals like cows etc are out of the question
- If not disturbing others, there should be no issue.
- As long as licenses as required and bylaw officers can enforce standards.
- About time this happens! How can you have unlimited pigeons but not hens? It's outrageous and hens should be allowed. Neighbour consent should NOT be a factor as long as I follow the rules.
- Neighbors are involved; care of animals an important factor; case by case decision
- I think it's a good idea but Calgarians have to be prepared to overwinter the hens or butcher.
- I think homeowners responsibly having livestock like hens or other appropriate animals in the city is a great idea

- Having hens/quails in a proper domesticated backyard setup provides necessary self reliance skills and redundancy that our generation have lost. I think this a great idea!
- urban farming is very sustainable. If a resident is able to accommodate the livestock on their property, I think it is a viable option!
- As long as the owner is responsible and the pet doesn't cause problems for Neighbors.
- So good to have local food
- Urban hens are a good way to support sustainable and ethical farming practices.
- I think the criteria above is reasonable.
- As long as there is adequate provisions for their safe keeping and not a burden to neighbors
- There must be an explicit and mandatory process for consulting with neighbours and for addressing neighbour complaints.
- I think small scale urban farming is a really interesting and progressive idea that the city should allow under the right circumstances!
- within reason other types of livestock can be raised in an urban environment, but the potential owner must present a plan to control the odours emitted by droppings and bedding materials
- I don't see a problem with people having live stock as long as they keep everything clean and nice looking.
- If the property these livestock and hens are kept on is large enough so as not to cause annoyance to neighbours, then this is excellent!
- As long as the well-being of the animal is met then allow and treat the animal as you would any other form of pet.
- People have the right to own animals as long as it's in the proper living conditions suitable for the animals
- All for the urban hen! As long as people are educated on the needs of the birds. I.e. appropriate winter living conditions, dietary needs, etc.
- Hens are very peaceful and harmless. It is relaxing to watch them. They are not noisy, sometimes they cackle for a short time to announce they have laid an egg
- About time
- I am fine with chickens in the city under the listed conditions; however there should be a max per household i.e 3 as chickens can be disruptive and smell quite aggressively in the hot summer months.
- People should have chickens in their backyard! I like eggs, who doesn't?
- Having livestock in a residential area can be similar to having dogs and cats if suitable living conditions are provided. Allowing animals such as hens allows opportunities for families to provide food for themselves and others.
- it adds value and supports a quality of life improvement for Calgarians
- I like the idea of having goats permitted in Calgary, providing lawn care and joy!
- Yes as long as consideration is given to noise, smell, cleanliness etc.

- concern is that on smaller lots, the noise and smell could become a nuisance. Coops would need to be cleaned and I believe a minimum lot size should be required with placement of coop being important.
- Goats, for instance: they are quieter than most dogs and they smell better! They would cut down on weeds, naturally, too.
- Hens sounds great.
- Only if the living conditions for the animal are suitable! But goats as lawnmowers - wouldn't it be great for the environment if each community had a designated flock?
- My friend in London, UK raised urban chickens and had a wonderful experience.
- Chickens and other farm animals do not belong in city limits
- Small livestock animals such as chickens, rabbits, guinea pigs, mini or potbellied pigs, mini goats take up no more space than licensed cats, dogs, birds, or reptiles and are just as intelligent and deserving of a caring home.
- I would love if chickens would be allowed!
- I don't believe that you should require your neighbours consent to raise hens on your own property. I do, however, believe that should the hens not be taken care of and neglected or any animal rights have been compromised anyone who share concerns should be able to report the issues.
- As long as the neighbors don't care and the animals have enough room to be healthy and happy... Who cares! Let people have a goat if they want. :)
- If people want to raise hens and have the space they should be allowed to
- It is crucial that the animal's living conditions are suitable and the animal is safe. Living conditions should be monitored.
- I have no answer so I would rather vote yes in order to facilitate more research than no and potentially shut it down
- There would need to be strict regulations around this, such as ensuring cleanliness of the yard (neighbours shouldn't have to deal with smell, noise and disarray from other people's pets) and responsible ownership of the animals.
- Providing no negative impact to the neighborhood I would support small livestock in communities.
- Yes, but within a reasonable density and considering should be given to noise and pollution.
- As a responsible owner, you need to provide the proper conditions for the livestock. As a responsible neighbour you have to ensure that the livestock won't be a nuisance.
- I think people should only be allowed to have backyard hens if they do an online training course in animal husbandry and biosecurity.
- I don't see an issue with allowing small livestock as long as they are well cared for and are not a nuisance to the community.
- Chickens are a great idea for the city people to understand where their eggs and meat come from would reduce the need for these in stores, decrease transport and better the environment
- With the appropriate space, I do not see why having other livestock within the limits would be an issue unless odor was a concern. However, restricting excessive odour could be an amendment for restricting quantity or keeping a reasonable amount of livestock within Calgary.

- hens should be allowed as long as people follow the correct steps
- I don't have an issue with having urban hens
- It could be a way of boosting Calgary economy and providing Calgarians with fresh organic meat.
- No need to ban these things of animals from home owners. Builds resilience.
- If the animals are kept correctly then people should be allowed to keep them. Especially small animals that don't cause any large issues like hens. It's unfair to limit people so harshly if they keep the animals correctly
- I support sustainability and allowing (even city kids) the ability to care for various animals.
- They should be allowed.
- I'm not aware of this so I have no comment, I'm taking this survey to hopefully have a voice against muzzling and into more in depth reference checking to new owners
- Literally why not let people do what they want on their property?
- As long as the animals are cared for appropriately and being kept in suitable living conditions that do not impede of the health and living conditions of other people and animals, I have no concerns regarding urban hens.
- If it brings a community together and isn't a nuisance, I don't see an issue. However, I'm not educated in the subject so I shouldn't be commenting.
- some owners don't care about their neighbors while handling animals.
- conditionally, size of the animal, feeding area and animal waste would be limiting factors.
- Clean (vaccinated & cared for) animals of any kind should be permissible within city limits. I would support licensing (to ensure the vaccinations are up to date and ensure owners are keeping them in proper living conditions - ie. clean coop / room to roam etc.)
- Being able to grow one's own food should be a protected right as long as it doesn't become abused
- Dogs and cats are originally working animals, whether for herding, hunting, guarding, mousing, etc. To allow dogs and cats, which are traditionally farm animals, and not other animals is inconsistent and based on peoples' biases (eg. a dog is a family member, a goat is not).
- I think they are lovely and I hope my neighbours share eggs
- more people would be allowed to grow their own food and live off the land
- That would be a great sustainable way to get food for a lot of families/shelters
- People should be given more freedoms and coming up with alternative own food sources is a good idea. Obviously, those freedoms should be removed from those proven irresponsible, not everyone as a whole.
- so many varieties of hens- I want the ones that lay blue & green eggs! Hen house would have to be substantial due to calgary winter.
- As long as livestock is handled in a safe manner I do not see the issue.
- As long as neighbours are ok with it and is not disruptive (ie rooster crowing early)
- I feel this is a good move, as long as there are stringent rules to ensure the animals have suitable and ideal living conditions. I worry this will be abused and animals and neighbours will suffer

- I think small livestock is a good idea as long as animals are properly cared for, and backyards kept clean.
- Chickens are great.
- There are a variety of animals classified as livestock which could be reasonably owned within the city, especially near the outskirts. Also, services which use goats and sheep to manage lawns should be encouraged.
- responsible ownership
- I think this would be beneficial.
- While I can support keeping hens within city limits, I am not in favour of allowing other livestock
- In some instances urban chickens could be good, but other situations it would be bad. It would depend on space, security, etc
- It would not make a difference in my life if neighbours had livestock in the city limits.
- I would support it if the neighbours of the individual wishing to have hens is supportive.
- People are allowed to have rabbits; they too are categorically "Livestock". The only reason livestock was banned within municipal boundaries is because of the sounds and smells (a century ago). Times have changed over the decades. Especially since indoor plumbing and garbage/recycling/composting slowly came into effect in cities, towns and villages. Look at it in a different perspective, the homeless – people don't like seeing, smelling and hearing them; but the city isn't doing anything to help put a roof over their heads! As long as the area is maintained, people should be allowed to have livestock in the city. Pot-bellied pigs included!
- The criteria has the key points that matter to me.
- Animal is taken care of properly - neighbors do not mind - and exceptions are possible.
- Urban chickens provide healthy, local food and compost that enriches their community
- Livestock are great
- As long as the chickens do not smell, run free, attract other predators and are not noisy, go for it. Should be case by case though due to close back yard proximity in the suburbs.
- I support Clean well managed urban livestock of an appropriate density, the smell won't be any worse than the compost bins.
- I agree that people should be able to have hens for their eggs for sustainable living
- If he's unbiased and the livestock is not being hoarded, will not disturb or inhibit neighbors peace and quiet I support this. I do not support keeping pigeons.
- Neighbours support should be unanimous.
- "Yes" to a Trial period that allows flexibility for amendments to fine tune issues
- T
- As long as there is minimal impact to neighbors, people should be allowed to grow and harvest their own food.
- As long as the neighbours are okay, animals are registered and all is good, then it should work
- -
- Animals safe conditions

- Responsible ownership
- Only if humane living conditions were provided
- I love this! Some people don't like having dogs, etc. Others just love farm animals but can't afford or have the opportunity to live on larger land. So why not let me have the animal they want!
- Responsible owners should be allowed to keep hens
- I think urban hens are a great way for people to have fresh resourcing without shopping at the store
- Chickens are neither pit bulls not cats. Cats have been responsible for the decline of many bird species and should not be allowed to roam outside freely.
- As long as the animals are not overly loud, and the owner cleans after them regularly, so the neighborhood doesn't smell like a farm, there is no problem in having small animals on the property.
- I support. This helps support local and reduce emissions used in the harvesting/production/delivery process!
- Urban hens would decrease the suffering of hens in factory farms.
- If all requirements r met
- provided noisy roosters are prohibited and there are rules regarding cleaning yards to avoid deleterious odours.
- I support the initiative
- Hens add to the urban ecosystem and ar a great addition to Calgary
- Nothing wrong with growing your own food
- Edmonton has urban chickens.
- I think as long as the animal has proper living space, is properly maintained and is actually cared for this should be aloud. It will also likely cut down on the cost of food for those who obtain a livestock animal
- I think hens and other live stock would be a good thing as long as it's done right and not disruptive to the neighbourhood
- I had neighbors who had chickens for many years (not sure if they were legal) but they annoyed the entire neighborhood. Caused lots of cats to roam the area. And they were not cared for / cleaned properly. The next door neighbors said that it stunk terrible too, they couldn't sit outside due to the smell.
- Bylaw should investigate and approve every application to ensure proper care of the animals and agreement of the neighbors. As an aside, this should also apply to dog and cat breeders.
- I've been interested in urban hens and have been looking forward to a time when they would be allowed in Calgary.
- Yes but no roosters, they are too noisy in early mornings.
- This would be a good idea as long as two conditions are met. Firstly, as stated, neighbours must be okay with this. Obviously, not everybody is okay living next to livestock, which is why neighbour approval would be very important. Secondly, adequate resources must be in place in order to assure the livestock are being properly taken care of. Some sort of system could be implemented where bylaw officers come inspect living conditions every so often to ensure the animal is being cared for. Additionally, other factors than just the property itself should be included in this assessment. For example, a family could have a big backyard and neighbour support, seemingly able to care for livestock. However, if this family is VERY busy, and never has time for the livestock, this can lead to neglect and should be considered before approving livestock ownership.

- as we move forward as a city, many people are exploring new greener and more sustainable ways of living and feeding themselves. the presence of chickens or other small livestock within city property is not a stretch and would be an excellent way for calgarians to feed themselves.
- Very much support having different types of small livestock in the city as long as there will be rules for controlling amount, odour and noises that could annoy neighbours.
- Only if conditions are met to ensure this is not adversely affecting the neighbourhood.
- I believe it would benefit positively
- Bring on the hens
- If there are suitable homes within the City of Calgary that can provide for "other livestock" and have the support of neighbours/community, they should absolutely be allowed to do so.
- Hens perhaps, no roosters please.
- "As long as they are well managed I see no downside to permitting chickens and other livestock. There should be an associated increase in bylaw policing to ensure this is well
- Implemented and maintained. The impact on neighbouring properties must be well managed and policed with a clear system in place to manage complaints in a timely manner."
- Hens are a quiet and beneficial pet.
- Food production is important and hens don't cause many issues.
- Support it for livestock under 40 lbs.
- as long as they follow every bylaw and that is it taken seriously by all
- "Provided there is support from MAJORITY of adjacent neighbours.
- Agree with all other criteria."
- Only if support from adjacent neighbours and that the animals would not increase noise. Proper training and check-ins for the new animals to ensure they are being taken care of properly would also be helpful.
- The people most affected would be neighbours and this seems to cover that.
- As long as strong regulations are in place...
- people should be able to raise chickens
- there is nothing wrong with having fresh eggs :)
- I support people owning hens for collecting eggs. How would the City monitor livestock animals from being slaughtered? If the livestock animal is used for animal-assisted therapy then I support it. This might open the doors to animal cruelty. If the livestock animal becomes sick it is likely that the animal would be slaughtered.
- We should have the right given the appropriate space to raise animals that will benefit ourselves and communities.
- as long as proper care and shelter are provided in a home that and individual 'OWNS' for their livestock it should be allowed. Tenants of properties should not qualify as they do not hold the responsibility for the property.

- I like the idea as long as this bylaw is informed.
- Only if criteria are strictly enforced.
- I think as long as neighbors are okay with hens then there should be no issues. However the homeowner should be required to share the eggs with neighbors too lol
- "If the owners of the birds are able to care for them properly
- And neighbours approve they should be allowed to have fowl"
- Allow hens
- Case by case makes sense
- Only in specific areas. Not in areas where your backyard faces green space, apartments or in condos. If you don't have a fully fenced backyard or adequate space.
- As long as the animal is recommended in writing by a licensed medical practitioner to provide assistance to the owner
- When is providing even a small portion of your own food ever a bad thing?
- Only if mandatory visits held to ensure the health and welfare of the animals are being maintained.
- Limited to numbers
- I want to make sure the animals are taken care of properly
- On one hand I think livestock does not belong in an urban setting, however, if livestock is not disruptive to the neighborhood and is provided ample space and necessary housing, it's hard to disagree.
- I've been in favour of this for years.
- Strongly support!
- As long as they're not a nuisance (noise/mess) to other neighbours people should be allowed to have hens or other similar domesticated animals.
- responsible ownership is key
- I think it could promote positive and healthy relationships with the environment and provide people with other options for milk and eggs if they so desired. It would also allow a better pest and weed management alternative than toxic chemicals.
- Chickens are a must for food sustainability which should be a focus of all levels of government start at municipalities level
- hens and other animals can make wonderful additions to a family and neighbourhood. But they must be kept in optimal conditions. The animals needs shluld come first
- Lovely idea
- Lots of animals would be great pets and I'm fine with it, as long as people take care of their pets.
- As long as it's not damaging properties
- In the understanding that butchering should not be done at home and hat the bylaw is very clear on what animals are allowed.
- Great idea. Hope this includes bees.

- I love the idea of allowing hens in the city. I would be able to easily buy eggs and meet the hens and the owner to make sure they are treated well. Instead of buying eggs from the grocery store and I don't know how they treat their hens
- Chickens are pets too.
- We need more bees.
- Responsible ownership and animal husbandry should be permitted wherever an owner has the means and grounds necessary to provide and properly care for these animals.
- Yes, if strict restrictions on numbers are enforced. checks / inspections every 2 years
- I believe urban hens can be kept responsibly in Calgary.
- If you have enough space and it doesn't bother anyone, then why not.
- I think it would be a great addition to our city. I support the sustainability of cultivating our own food.
- I'm one of those people that would like to have egg laying hens in my yard.
- As long as there is neighbor approval this would be great.
- If everyone is in agreement I think this could be very positive
- Everyone loves hens, I bet the neighbours would get some eggs every now and again, and I bet the kids in the street would have a blast.
- Maximum of 3 hens, more than that the poop stinks
- There must be a maximum number of animals and a minimum distance from neighbouring properties.
- Tentative yes - I like the idea, but I don't believe most city properties are large enough to support suitable living conditions most other types of livestock besides poultry.
- The bylaw against urban hens and urban homesteading is outdated.
- Any hen ownership should require approval of adjacent neighbours
- I definitely think up to 3 chickens should be allowed, they are very quiet and add to a more wholesome lifestyle
- Fresh eggs are good for everyone.
- Nothing wrong with people having their hens as long as they have proper environment set up for them
- For thousands of years this has been the way of life it is only recently changed, and to the detriment of peoples health and well being. People want to feed themselves, it is a basic human right, even the poorest of folks can enrich their diets with livestock such as hens. It's dehumanizing to allow large corporations to have a monopoly on what we can feed ourselves and our children.
- Especially with everything going on it would be beneficial for people to have a source of food readily available.
- I'd like to have egg laying chickens
- As long as the birds are well cared for and not causing a nuisance to neighbours, people should be able to have them.
- Support people wanting to have their own sustainable options, like eggs from their own backyard

- There would need to be guidelines on the number of hens allowed and strict guidelines on the coop size and cleanliness.
- I think people need to learn to share space and responsibilities. Most bylaws are created to help maintain order it's people that seems to be the nuisance.
- .
- Chickens are fun
- No issue with hens - should have been allowed years ago.
- It holds owners more responsible.
- Having your own livestock would promote sustainable living, I 100% support this lifestyle.
- Hens are quieter then people think. This is also a massive opportunity for people to live more sustainable lives for food & eggs. With the pandemic on-going this would provide people a great way to lower the amount of money they spend on store bought eggs & poultry
- I agree in principle but would need more details on the proposal before fully committing to it.
- As long as the animals are cared for and not abused and the n3ughbours agree, there isn't any harm in having livestock but there shoud be restrictions like you can't own a cow or bull in a normal sized city backyard.
- It's difficult to see downsides to residents being permitted to responsibly produce their own food.
- I want chickens
- As long as all health and ethical standards are being adhered to, and different livestock at each household are known to be harmonious.
- Those with allergies cannot always have a 'standard' pet.
- Do not allow roosters.
- People should be able to determine their own lifestyle if they are not causing any harm.
- fresh eggs are way better than store bought and we should be able to raise and grow food in our yards. To a point of course.
- Pigs and chickens and other livestock should be allowed. You had a famous turkey in your city. Had people been able house him he may have lived a better life.
- The last 'expert' that testified determined that Backyard Chicken's could pose a risk of Avian or Bird Flu. I personally contacted the WHO who responded that there has never been a case of Backyard Chickens transmitting such illnesses or outbreaks. I invite the 'City' to contact the WHO themselves to confirm this, instead of basing their decision on the 'personal opinion' of one testifying 'expert'. Other municipalities have integrated Backyard Chickens with very few incidents, there is no longer a reason why Calgarians are being denied this right.
- For smaller animals - a size restriction should be specified and certainly the permission of the immediate neighbours.
- Urban livestock and agriculture are healthy and positive initiatives.
- Egg laying hens are a good option for food justice/security and are no more challenging than existing domestic animals that are allowed in the city.
- It'd be a great way for families to raise chickens and eggs!

- I think a couple hens would be fine if used for eggs. It could start getting messy if people started chopping heads off chickens in their backyard so they could at 5he chickens.
- Yes, Calgary is so large, this bylaw shouldn't limit those with adequate resources for these animals. If you have a good yard you should be able to have chickens.
- Chickens are as clean as you make them! Good hygiene and regulated living conditions for the birds makes for a healthy and environmentally responsible way to provide oneself and family with fresh eggs.
- Like all things responsible ownership is key
- As long as the well being of the hens are ensured via licensing, inspections etc.
- Everyone should be able to have chickens.
- I think that people should be able to have small livestock on their property as long as they have adequate living conditions for the animals. i.e. A yard that can support a chicken coop for chickens. There should be a limit to the number of livestock a household can have.
- Yes, but with the option to have the decision reviewed and reassessed if needed.
- N/A
- Livestock can be enjoyable and useful
- Having hens on ones property is a great method of insect control. Chickens will eat just about any insect in their path, including underground insect. Chickens are very easy to care for and it's an affordable source of eggs. They produce less waste and noise than a dog, all while eliminating pests and feeding people.
- I support animal welfare checks
- As long as neighbors are ok with it.
- It can be useful for some, given right and suitable conditions for the hens, to be able to raise them in their own backyards. Even more so now with covid. This is as long as guidelines are being followed and noise and odour are kept to a minimum.
- I would be open to it, but there would need to be a lot of rules, limited numbers of hens, a permit and inspections. Neighbors would definitely need to be agreeable. But how would it work if someone new moves in next door?
- As long as you require support from neighbors
- As long as it's responsibly pet ownership in safe and humane environments. They should be registered with the city as well.
- Responsible individuals should not be punished for their choice of animal
- Why not. Food prices are ridiculous and its private property, we should be allowed to do what we want on our own property anyways
- Bylaws are way to tight in this area on people who would be bothering no one else
- I believe there's room for this in our city and it could have great benefits in many areas if done properly
- As long as these animals are not infringing on other people's property or their enjoyment of their property the city should have no say on what a person does. That said neighbours should sort that out themselves we dont need the city intervening.

- If people are responsible for their animals, they should be able to have them within their private property.
- As long as the hens are not a nuisance and being well-cared for, this seems awesome.
- I would like to raise hens, they don't require much, they don't make big mess plus you get organic eggs
- as long as there is enough funding to hire animal welfare officers
- As long as someone isn't interfering with the enjoyment of others property, let people be responsible.
- Hens provide sustainable food for families and are a reasonable animal to keep within city limits.
- Case by case, taking neighbours views into account.
- I think urban farming is awesome
- Seems good with consent
- If the community, especially surrounding neighbours, is in support of the addition of livestock, the people should be allowed to keep them on their property.
- Yes as long as it is heavily regulated and I would say that this bylaw should be reviewed after a certain period of time to see if it is still a good idea because I am worried about the smell/noise
- Urban hens are FINE, as long as proper sanitary measures, upkeep, and inspections are done to prevent the spread of disease.
- If an animal can be loved and cared for in a humane way, Doesn't disturb the neighbours why not?
- I believe local livestock is important and being able to farm at home.
- I would love to be able to support myself and the community. Bee Hives should be the same!
- Yes. Rules such as limit of numbers allowed (possibly dependent on location and size of property), breeding and roosters (noise complaints will rise if roosters are allowed).
- With the shortages of food we have seen with Covid, and the massive increase in cost, we need the ability to produce our own food. Chickens, rabbits and even goats can easily be raised within the city. We already allow flying rats (pigeons), that defecate all over neighbours property, so I do not understand why simply livestock that are maintain on ones property are not allowed.
- Hens can be a vital resource of food for some families.
- Yes as long as the noise can be managed at nights.
- This allows for sustainable living, and would provide healthy and private alternatives for dietary needs and wants.
- Animals can greatly enhance people's lives. The City should not legislate the type of animals people can have as long as the animal is well cared for, housed appropriately, there is no potential danger to other people and the neighbors are in support.
- Only if they were not a nuisance to neighbours with noise, smell, etc.
- Evolution comes with change and so does opportunity. Encouraging urban farm-steading is one initiative to help younger generations grow
- As long as measured are taken to prevent nuisances to neighboring houses (such as the aforementioned support from neighbors) I support this amendment.

- Chickens etc can be useful / supportive to communities. So long as it is hygienic, non nuisance and is humane.
- All points seem fair and reasonable
- Less chance for strays or wild animals to become hostile and more frequent
- Responsible hen ownership can have positive and sustainable impacts on the community.
- Only if appropriate land to house animals...
- I believe certain breeds of hens would be a great addition to calgary
- Would depend on existing zoning for what livestock is being considered.
- Would like to see diversity in Calgary, including unusual pets, if they are safe and well-cared-for, and have support from neighbours (with grandfathering, to avoid problems if neighbours change over time)
- Yes. Eggs are expensive
- Yes only if guidelines are followed and TRIALED first. I grew up on mixed farm, all animals have excrement, chicken shit stinks to high heaven if out of control, trust me, and I will feel very sorry for a neighbour living next door to anyone not following guidelines, however it could be wonderful if done right
- Hens provide food - eggs and meat - and are excellent at managing garden pests
- It would be a good opportunity for people to raise their own food
- Sometimes livestock animals have much to offer and in some cases are therapy supports for individuals.
- Many livestock animals can be a benefit to humans beyond cats and dogs if they are provided for appropriately and responsibly.
- No reason families can't have a few chickens in their yard. This is not a hazard to anyone and certainly not as much as the many dogs which bark constantly at neighbours or anyone walking by.
- As long as the animals' welfare is assured and there is agreement from neighbours.
- Responsible ownership is key - those owning hens must follow these guidelines and ensure the health and safety of both the animals in their care and neighbours in their community.
- If the animal can be well cared for and is not causing an issue in the surrounding area, I don't see a reason for someone to not have any animal
- as long as the animal can be kept healthy and happy, and is not a nuisance, i think it should be allowed.
- Could give some hens a much better life than in a factory farm, I would love for factory farms to lose business! Would need vets available in town to work with chickens and regulations to make sure they are properly cared for
- Provided animals are cared for and rooster is a late sleeper...
- Hens don't bother anyone as long as they are flightless breeds. Certain heritage breeds should remain banned. People are screwed by government price fixing on eggs so they should be allowed to raise them this isn't Nazi germany
- Other large cities allow hens in city yards, and have found positive impacts of this bylaw.

- As long as the by law officer is trained properly to assess the situation, (ie genuine care for the animals life rather than their personal beliefs of the owners) then I believe it could work. Only if they are trained with empathy for humans and animals
- I think urban hens are a great idea. The lock down has revealed food insecurity is a problem so having eggs from your own hens would be helpful to any family.
- as long as they have adequate shelter, especially in winter
- Why not? It sounds fun and healthy.
- Just support it no explanation
- Responsible ownership
- I think chickens or other livestock should be allowed to be kept as food sources, BUT they should be restricted to a maximum number of them per home.
- I feel unable livestock is a great investment, again making sure responsible ownership including duty of care is met for the animal and neighbors.
- Hens would give our city a lot more character if we had domesticated ones roaming around. I think it's a cool idea. But just like any other pet they should be given proper shots if necessary and they should be chipped.
- Livestock like chickens are increasingly being seen as pets and are part of life. As such they should be allowed to exist in homes and backyards if well cared for
- Not every one wants a dog or a cat. There are plenty of animals eg) pigs.. that ppl should be able to responsibly owned
- If people would like to own other types of animals on their property and can provide suitable and positive living conditions, I am all for it
- Hens provide a natural, organic food source and it goes hand-in-hand with growing a vegetable and/or fruit garden for fresh food. I do believe that the animals need to be well cared for properly and not create a disturbance to the neighbours.
- Provided the animals are kept for pets only and are well cared for.
- Other city initiatives people have been against something on their street passes anyway
- Hens are intelligent and emotional animals
- Urban hens are a fantastic idea although I wonder if it would draw more wildlife into the neighbourhoods? Coyotes and other predators may become more problematic.
- I would consider this only for chickens.
- Chickens can be kept for food security/egg production and make less noise than dogs. They can make great pets if kept in a clean manner.
- Criteria proposed is mindful of the community and the neighbors of the individual whom desires to have urban livestock as well as the livestock's needs. As long as the individuals with the livestock are limited to number of livestock allowed and they do receive periodic inspections to ensure the livestock is being properly looked after I don't see a problem with it.
- As long as people are aware of the needs and space needed for the animal. It is worth trying. The owners should be willing to have inspectors see if they are following the rules.

- I'm in support of urban livestock as long as the sound/smell is not negatively impacting or disrupting neighbours or the surrounding community.
- More animals, the better. Also, grazers could help build sustainable city development.
- I like the concept.
- As long as the animal is taken care of and not caged it should be okay for other animals besides normal house pets live at your house.
- Urban chicken raising is a fantastic idea as long as reasonable standards of care are upheld.
- I am in favour of backyard hens IF: 1) they are cared for and housed in the excellent way as in the case of my acquaintance who has the emotional support animal hens, 2) there is no mess or nuisance odours to bother the adjacent neighbours.
- Yes as long as they are looking after the animals and none of them are dangerous.
- require all urban poultry owners to take a course in looking after urban poultry
- I think any livestock should be permitted in Calgary if the property has a suitable space for it and if the owner takes responsibility for the behavior of the livestock and for the consequences.
- Providing the owner has neighbour support. Also adherence to detailed documents on suitable living conditions
- I would only support hens with strict bylaw conditions,
- Yes as long as the animals are being kept properly!
- I 100% sport urban hens. If people can have dogs, cats, snakes, parrots chinchillas, etc, they should absolutely be allowed to have hens.
- Hens are useful
- as long as they are considerate od neighbour's, this could be a nice benefit for the communities
- If the people want it...
- Limitations need to be made a head.
- I think allowing other livestock is a fantastic ideas, as long as it's not a nuisance for the neighbours. Eg. chickens, goats, piglets etc. :) And as you said, as long as animals are provided with adequate living conditions and not crammed in in a tiny urban yard. There should also be procedures in place for assisting abandoned or neglected animals, and animals in distress. Also, please no killings of animals on urban property (e.g. a chicken for dinner), for some people this could be highly distressing. Licensing livestock would bring another revenue to the city.
- Absolutely support! We are losing our rural culture!!
- If the neighbours are okay with it, the birds are properly housed and cared for, then why not?
- Chickens are just as "clean" as cats and dogs when cared for properly. They will increase people gardening and interacting with the land, which will improve health and wellbeing for everyone.
- As long as there is no negative impact to neighbours and the community at large, there is no down side to this. If people want to have hens, they should have hens
- Pet pigs can be house broken and be socialized to get along with the public and other animals. They are smart and can provide a great deal of comfort and pleasure to their owners; they shouldn't be relegated to homes in the country only. And having one's own hens guarantees a supply of healthy eggs that did not originate from any kind of mass-production facility.

- Hens but not roosters are okay as long as they do not get out to disturb the neighbours or attract predators like coyotes & bobcats to the neighbourhood. Other domesticated animals that are pets rather than livestock could be considered.
- we need to evolve, and work together. As long as owners are responsible and adhere to procedures, there should be no problem to co exist
- I fully support managed urban agriculture. Limits to animal populations and each species assessed by size and purpose.
- Providing the living conditions and suitable for the animals and not a nuisance to neighbours. The city also needs to be active if animals are suffering and not just give warnings until the animals die. If you let people do this, you need to take care of the animals.
- There are a lots of different livestock that would work well in the city, as long as they are looked after. Goats could take over from lawn mowers, etc.
- "Chickens can be quite smelly, need to ensure they aren't a nuisance to neighbours.
- For fines (noplacelse to put this), the fines need to have a range for first attack vs a subsequent one. Puppies can cause minor injuries unintentionally. Has to be some consideration for cases where a person was antagonizing or hurt the dog first."
- If a person can care for and provide the adequate level of support for an animal, while ensuring that it's not a nuisance for their neighbours, I feel they should be allowed to have it.
- Hens lay eggs and can also be used to supply meat to a family
- Hens/Livestock cannot create noise or odour problems for any neighbours.
- As long as the amount of livestock is limited and the ownership does not generate any issues for neighbours (e.g. extra noise, smell, etc.) I don't have any issues with this.
- Chickens make great pets that contribute sustainably to backyards. For the people who want chickens having bylaws in place protects them and others from irresponsible pet ownership. Having bylaws allows proper guidelines in place for people wanting to have pets.
- if done responsibly for animal and neighbor impact, I think there is no reason not to allow.
- I am assuming there are other animals similar to hens that fit the criteria
- There should be support from neighbors in case of noise.
- It is great to see people trying to engage in at-home farming and providing food for their families. Self-sufficiency is a wonderful tool.
- good conditions for animal, respects neighbors, food security
- All of above
- Reasons stated above
- If the animal can have a good quality of life in the city as they would in the country it should be allowed
- Yes to hens! But no other livestock
- As long as there is no negative impact on the neighbourhood or community what would it matter
- I think a person should be allowed hens and livestock if they have space.

- As long as the hens and/or livestock is in a suitable living environment and is being taken care of I believe it is a great idea and opportunity.
- yes yes! Food security, beneficial to gardens, teaches city kids more about caring for nature! 100% onboard
- urban livestock should be allowed if requirements are met
- ok...as long as the owner keeps the smell and noise down, and cleans up regularly. In close city neighborhoods, poorly maintained living conditions can make it difficult to enjoy the outdoors, if your neighbors are not keeping it clean.
- Chickens are awesome! If your neighbors are okay with you having chickens then I think it should be allowed, up keep is a must!! Clean their pen often!
- Sustainable source of eggs and poultry for families of different incomes. They're cute as hell.
- I believe people should be able to have laying hens/fresh eggs but a maximum # based on space.
- absolutely support this effort to increase food security and support local food production
- The current bylaw is outdated and does not directly address the perceived problems. Urban hens have been allowed in many major Western cities, successfully, for decades.
- As long as the animals are being cared for in a proper manner and are not disturbing the people living in close proximity.
- Having hens would be fantastic for everyone who wants one.
- Owners should apply for a licence which will allow these situations to be monitored.
- This could be highly beneficial for Calgary and with the city feeling financial pressures it could save the waste management department a bunch of money as the birds can be supplemented with food scraps. There is a great example of a city in Belgium that had 6000 birds put out and the first month they reduced their organics to landfill by 100 Ton.
- As long as someone is monitored on how many they can have and checked up on to make sure they are not breeding in large amounts therefore to reduce the quality of life of the hens then I see no problem. They should be kept as pets and to take the unfertilized eggs for eating. But not to slaughter themselves or at all, urban hens to be as pets and that is it.
- I think the idea of back yard chickens is great
- So long as they are only used as pets or free range eggs
- Chickens are a great learning opportunity and good source for families. And great pets
- If owners are required by law to consider the needs of both their neighbours and livestock, this amendment would make Calgary an even more progressive city and would enrich the lives of many of us.
- Limitations should be placed on the breeding of 'agricultural' pets.
- So long as the hens are treated well and have safe/comfortable living conditions. There is no where to provide an explanation for question number 8 so am doing so here: children should be taught not to approach any dog without asking an owner for permission first so I think the 'early warning' is redundant - they should be taught to be cautious of all dogs that they do not know.
- Calgaryans should be allowed to have hens and other livestock like small ponies etc.
- Chickens can be easily taken care of as long as people only have 3 or 4

- Urban hens are great in small numbers. There is no reason a family shouldn't have a small flock of no more than 6 hens, provided they have adequate space and then animals are well taken care of.
- As long as it is a limited number of livestock and the adjacent neighbours have some input, I believe this makes sense. I do believe if new neighbours arrive after the livestock is already established (ie/ house is sold, new renters), they should be able to have some input as well, but it should be very limited, and mostly if there is concern about the animal welfare.
- Having fresh eggs is a huge benefit
- They need places to live and sometimes they can't afford out of city
- City dwellers need to be able to grow their own food...whether it be vegetables, fruit or chickens, eggs etc.
- Hens would be a great source of cheap eggs/protein, but each community should be able to vote on/enforce their own acceptance/adoption of this by-law.
- Supply food.
- I am in support if the people are being responsible. But, again this is a big "new" area that could be a big can of worms.... and need a lot more enforcement officers....
- I agree with the criteria however, suitable living conditions should be a top priority in granting approval.
- Have chickens is extremely beneficial to food security and permaculture a like.
- I think hens, etc should be allowed.
- It's a human right to grow own food
- adequate space must be determined and available for said livestock.
- it is time
- As long as noises and smells are managed also
- Need limits on number of hens allowed, noise levels need to be evaluated as well as strict clear rules on unsightly coops. Maybe have a predetermined minimum sized property before allowing hens?
- As long as the individual is responsible
- If set up properly and noise/smell was taken into consideration.
- Should not need neighbors approval
- Livestock can be companions just as well as a dog or cat can, as long as they're being taken care of properly of course.
- I support urban hens. It used to be common to have urban hens. I support a wide range of urban animals provided that the owner can provide the animal with a good quality of life.
- It seems a positive BUT I believe it should be conditional to owners having to provide suitable accommodations for the hens (or other livestock) to meet the needs of the animals having a healthy lifestyle. People should never get "pets" on a whim and must be responsible for their well being. The City should review an owner's setup before allowing hens etc. to be allowed in an urban yard.
- "As long as the living space and conditions are suitable for the animal.
- Ensure the living space of the animal is not offensive to neighbours."

- Chickens (hens) are great for gardens. They eat insects and fertilize. No roosters!
- I want my own hens
- Our communities can benefit from allowing Responsible Owners to keep livestock such as hens and goats. The property would need to be evaluated to ensure the animals will be well cared for and that surrounding neighbours won't be negatively impacted by sounds or smells.
- please please please for non rooster fowl in calgary
- As long as the animals are kept in clean and safe conditions I don't see a problem with having chickens but no rooster. Looking at the next question concerning pigeons, they can be a pest and can be very noisy
- We should have been allowed to have hens a long time ago, this is 2020.
- I would love to have a back yard hen. So this is an easy yes for me.
- Well cared for livestock would be a huge step forward for the city, helping lessen the global problem of large scale commercial animal facilities.
- A lot to consider here. A limit on # of animals. Welfare of the animals in questions comes first > I believe people should need some sort of training/certificate to do this (all in contact with the animals) that covers animal care; city bylaws; hygiene, etc. Do you have enough Bylaw officers to investigate your "case-by-case basis" in timely manner?
- Hens are a sustainable food source for the environment and can provide food for low cost.
- Having the option of providing your own food source, ethical livestock raising, and the decline of factory farms is important for the health and wellbeing of society and the environment. Also Calgary needs some equestrian facilities that are within city limits, especially as the city seems to expand ever outward, causing existing facilities to move further and further away. Participation in activities such as 4-H, or horse riding lessons, is something that has been proven to improve the lives of lower income families and children, but its unrealistic for many families in the city who rely on transit or can't afford the time to drive 40 minutes out of the city to attend such activities.
- As long as the owners of the fowls (hens in this case) are responsible and loving.
- If neighbors are in agreement and safe and suitable living conditions are provided there is no reason why they should not be permitted.
- As long as we can truly implement the law and have enough staff to follow it.
- Backyard hens are great for pets and eggs. We don't need approval from a neighbor to get a dog and shouldn't need to for a hen. They are no more disruptive, less so actually.
- The criteria seems acceptable
- It has been a dream for me to have a few hens in the yard. There are many options such as rent-a-hen for the summer. They eat bugs and fertilize the yard. Less pesticides used.
- I would support hens and pigeons with a limit. Not with neighbor consent. No other livestock.
- Hens would be an amazing change for many Calgarians
- As long as conditions are good and terms are acceptable
- Hens would be a lovely and welcome addition to the city.
- "Animals can support the mental health of their owners, which is very necessary (and not financially supported) at this time.

- Re support from adjacent neighbours: I think this should depend on the size of the owner's property. If the animal needs the whole range, then the owner needs support. But, if the animal can be kept from the neighbours (for destruction/noise purposes), then the owner shouldn't need neighbour support."
- I do not think neighbour support is necessary and would be an obstacle to housing/owning urban hens if relations between property owners were already not good.
- Animals other than cats and dogs can be beneficial companions. Now that covid has restricted travel this would be a good move, and also more gardens replacing lawns should be considered.
- As long as animals are not disturbing those who live nearby and do not have nuisance behaviors there is no reason to not allow them.
- Everyone benefits assuming the animals specific living conditions are met.
- As long as those living near by agreed and there were no issues - smell, noise...
- People should be able to raise hens on their property, and not require neighbors permission
- I agree
- Hens for example can have a community benefit.
- As long as the animals welfare is appropriate for the type of animal and the existence of them in the community doesn't negatively impact normal living conditions for our fellow neighbors. ie smells / noise / faeces complaints etc.
- As long as it does not impact the neighbour's livelihood and peace of mind
- That would be a good benefit. For all
- I don't see why people can't have a chicken or a duck as a pet. a maximum should be enforced for sure. but i don't know what that number is.
- They must be kept clean so as not to attract rodents, insects, etc.
- As long as the animals have a good quality of life - are well cared for, have enough space and environmental enrichment.
- "but with the same rules as for pigeons:
- Locating the coop within a specified distance of adjacent houses
- Odour management (eg. clean coop, etc.)
- Enforce coop standards
- Removal of some or all birds if problems arise
- Cleanup of feces"
- Having hens or other livestock is a good way for people to "grow" their own food.
- With care and hygiene, hens are no nuisance. Lots of cities allow hens.
- I feel if there are rules to address animal welfare and possible nuisances to neighboring houses then Calgarians should be afforded the positive rewards that come with other livestock... within reason of course.
- Hens should be allowed but perhaps there should be a limit of the total amount allowed on site, depending on their living conditions and amount of room for them to roam their yard.

- Poultry would enhance food self-sustainability for families and could benefit children in that they could learn more about our foodchains. They could also build greater empathy for animal welfare through hen care.
- Only concern is difficulty of enforcement if conditions are not met.
- Seems reasonable
- As long as there's a maximum number allowed and the animals are treated properly
- As long as you have the support of your neighbours I'm fine with it
- Hens, rabbits and maybe other livestock should be allowed in Calgary backyards to provide local food and reduce emissions.
- Yes, but if someone with medically provable allergies lives next door they should be allowed to veto.
- I love this idea. I hope if this amendment goes through that the city will mandate minimum sizes for the coup and enclosures as well as guidelines for ensuring their feces are cleaned up regularly.
- I believe it is positive for individuals to be more self-sufficient if they have the means to be. Urban hens would be a positive thing for Calgaryans!
- Fresh eggs!!! Chores for kids that belong to parents who let them play games on internet all day!!
- It is a fair amendment.
- If someone wants a chicken or other livestock, I don't see how it's any different than having a dog, iguana, horse, etc. As long as the animal is cared for and happy/healthy, as well as not bothering neighbours, power to them!
- livestock can be very beneficial in the right setting. I do think it needs to be closely monitored though
- I believe there are a number of benefits to having a variety of small livestock within a community. I agree with making sure there is a balanced approach and that neighbours are consulted.
- Food security
- I have no problem with people raising livestock as long as the animals are treated humanely, it's a clean operation, and it doesn't disturb the neighbours.
- Only provided that the livestock is monitored regularly for proper living conditions and limiting the number of complaints before following up with the option of revoking permission for the animal to reside there.
- As long as you have the support of your neighbours.
- Access to more sustainable food sources in urban areas is a must. Chickens make interesting pets and do not carry any more inherent problems than other animals considered pets do.
- I feel urban hens add to the pleasure of a city. Fresh eggs are wonderful. No roosters are required. Proper checks must be maintained to make sure that cleanliness and proper feeding is followed
- Certain areas have the required yard space for larger /different types of animals
- Urban hens would fill a much-needed void in local, sustainable gardening. In addition to providing eggs they would also provide natural pest control from garden visitors such as slugs, cabbage moths, and aphids, as well as fertilizer and the scratching up of space to prepare it for planting. It will also give families, especially children, the opportunity to experience first-hand where our food comes from and the cycles of Nature.

- will permit be required?
 - I think it is great to have more urban hens and other livestock in Calgary. it adds to food security and it is great for kids to see where their food comes from.
 - Hens provide households with natural and organic food source. It is very valuable support during challenging time like Covid-19 pandemic.
 - For chickens if there was a cap on how many they could have, and bees if they are classed as livestock. Do not support larger animals, e.g. pigs, goats, cows, horses etc.
 - Sounds fair
 - Hens can be good pets if well cared for.
 - responsible chicken ownership is a benefit to people and communities
 - As long as they are kept in manner that they remain relatively quiet and no smell - I think it helps promote local food production.
 - a couple of hens ok, but many more hens and other livestock no
 - "I support this bylaw if the animals are properly cared for and the following needs are met: shelter from weather conditions, food and water, social and emotional, physical and medical, and they do not cause an excessive disturbance to neighbours in comparison to other domestic pets. (For example, a pet pig that is loved and properly cared for is akin to a pet dog and there is no reason the guardians should need to move outside city limits.)
- Regarding the number of pigeons allowable on a residential property, I said zero because I'm not well enough informed and don't understand why people are allowed to keep wildlife captive on their property."
 - if the environment is safe I have no issue
 - As long as the animals don't bother people are aren't being abused it should be fine
 - Some emotional animals are not your average pet for most people
 - I think allowing people to have livestock is perfectly ok if it's done in a sensible manner.
 - I have no opposition whatsoever.
 - "Quiet, clean, and managed livestock, with consideration for neighbours should be permitted.
 - Roosters waking people up at 5:00 AM would not be considered appropriate."
 - Based solely on the welfare of the animal, if you can afford and provide proper care, why wouldn't it be allowed? It's just an animal like a dog or cat.
 - I am interested in this idea. Even if I were not I would not want to deny someone else the opportunity. I don't know if it's economically a winner, but it is emotionally healthy and a character builder. Locavore.
 - Assumes that there are limits on numbers and that the definition of adjacent neighbours is clearly defined.
 - If the animal and its environment is being cared for, the space is sufficient for the number of animals, the animals' Five Freedoms are fulfilled, and it is not causing the neighbours any harm, why not?

- I support having egg-laying hens in the city. If you can have a potbellied pig why not chickens or other livestock if they are being taken care of in a suitable manner.
- I support city hens provided they are not causing disturbance with too much noise, smell, or distraction of land.
- As long as the owner of hens has approval from neighbors surrounding the owner's property
- If it benefits the community and animals are well treated
- If people have urban hens responsibly then that's a good thing to do. Expectation of specific rules for having urban hens kept must be communicated clearly.
- If there is a suitable environment established for the animal I would be okay with other livestock. Noise considerations for the community should be considered.
- I think that having livestock increased mental health and in the case of children is very educational.
- As a community we need to be supportive of our neighbors with mental health issues
- Lots of folks like to have livestock as pets or to supplement their diet. As long as they can do so without being a bother to their neighbourhood they should be allowed.
- If people can provide good welfare and conscientious humane care to other domesticated animals without undue inconvenience to surrounding neighbours that should be allowed. Loud children, fire pits, music and parties are far more annoying and disruptive than animals.
- As long as they have support from their neighbours, go for it.
- Hens are a great alternative to other in-home pets. No roosters!
- We are not food based agriculture. I would only support the keeping of hens or pigeons or duck as pets, not food animals. And so I support a limit of pet numbers just as with other pets for the well being of the animals.
- Chickens provide a food source, reduce unwanted pests require little space and are reasonably easy to care for. They are a great learning experience for families.
- What other livestock is being considered
- Hens are cool, lay eggs and eat garden pests, even NYC allows residents to have up to 5 backyard hens (no cocks).
- Why not? Makes sustainable sense and good for communities.
- choice and freedom if controlled
- As long as there is no significant detriment to neighbours and the livestock have enough space.
- "Except for roosters and other very loud livestock."
- I would want the same bylaw process as is used for a home business (placard announcing the request, opportunity to oppose it, etc.)"
- The animals should still be cared for and there should be penalties for not providing adequate food and shelter and care.
- An animal that is considered livestock is only considered that because we use them for food or profit which doesn't mean they will be a nuisance or destructive, etc. Pigs for example can be great family pets as they're incredibly intelligent, can be housetrained, and don't bother neighbours by barking like a dog might. Some cities in BC allow residents to keep hens on their property and as far as I know they haven't had any problems. It's a great alternative to store bought eggs as egg farms are incredibly cruel to chickens (even free range). Maybe if there was a limit to the number of hens per household or per square foot of land.

- As long as the birds don't encourage coyotes and other wildlife from coming into Calgary to eat them it should be ok.
- support animals should be allowed, hens can help provide food (eggs) for people - do not support killing & butchering on private property (there has to be a solution to the ultimate requirement for this)
- Hens for sure
- "Strict rules should be made regarding cleaning routines and coop distance from the house as the smell could affect neighbours. In addition, if someone makes a smell complaint or one chick turns out to be a rooster, which is crowing at all hours a prompt response and clear criteria should be signed off on by potential owners before being allowed livestock.
- The majority of people are responsible, but there are always those who flout the rules and no repercussions are followed through."
- I think this is great
- People interested in having urban hens should be required to prove they have sufficient training and approved set up for the safety of all concerned.
- Many major N. American cities allow chickens and it seems to work.
- As long as the hens have a good shelter and are treated fairly
- We need to develop food sufficiency
- I think all the criteria mentioned is important.
- I would love to have hens for fresh eggs.
- Seems like a good idea so long as the above criteria is met and that the ongoing well-being of the animals is being met and followed up on on a regular basis.
- I support self-sufficiency and self-sustainability with regards to food sources.
- Any measure that enhances a family's capability of self-sufficiency should be vigorously supported.
- Support from adjacent neighbours that may be impacted by noise or smell must be required. But I agree there are some community benefits when this support exists.
- If your willing to properly take care of a pet and give it a good life then you should be allowed to do so
- Calgary needs to allow hens
- As long as the pets are not being kept as a future source of food. Hens can used for their eggs.
- Yes
- I like the idea of hens within Calgary limits, as long as the hen owner is taking good care of the animals and being respectful of neighbours (odor mgmt). Meeting a neighbour with hens would be a good learning experience for young and old. Am curious about what other livestock would be considered. Alpacas? Goats? Geese?
- Providing all the aforementioned criteria are met and owners are monitored for compliance.
- As long as neighbours (right next door - assuming a typical yard size) who do not want to live nearby to livestock (I personally don't want to live beside chickens) have their say and can veto a request then yes. The neighbours should have a more powerful vote than the requestors as it will potentially be a major interruption/inconvenience to them.

- Responsible urban farming should be allowed
- With neighborhood consultation and buy in and with consideration of medical issues (allergies eg), neighbours who can agree on things is always preferable to enforcement. However, we have not had good success with Bylaw enforcement on other issues illegal suits etc. So beware!
- Hens are much quieter than dogs. Hens increase meaning and purpose in life. They also lay eggs!
- Rules must be followed and enforcement when necessary
- Clear guidelines would need to be established by the city so everyone is on the same page. There should be city inspections to ensure animals are treated well and are healthy.
- As long as all the criteria are met, I see no issue.
- If done right (for the animals mostly, but also for residents) certain types of livestock encourage sustainable, local food sources and food security that should be a priority for all cities.
- I kept four chickens while living in Victoria, BC, and never received complaints from neighbours. They are quiet and sweet animals. They also provided eggs for us, and anything that can increase food security during the time of climate crisis is a good thing.
- as long as there is enforcement of conditions that would allow urban hens etc. This might be problematic as enforcement of off leash dogs is lacking.
- As long as the welfare of the hens is paramount.
- Yes to all of the above except adjacent neighbors' permission. A bylaw should impose standards and if it's met then a license to raise chickens will be granted.
- Support from adjacent neighbors, suitable living condition reviews
- They have to share the eggs!
- The real answer is maybe. It all depends on the type of the animal and the reason for having. I can tell you that in order for hens to be productive, you need a Rooster. Roosters can be quite loud.
- as long as the animals are not in distress or extra mess is affecting their neighbours.
- Food security, connection with nature, diversion of food scraps from the landfill into compost that can be used in the garden! Yes!
- I would love to eat eggs from healthy happy loved chicken. We need to get rid of some of these huge warehouses filled with chickens that never seeing the sun. I've already talked to my neighbor and we would love to share the chicken responsibly and eggs
- Case by case is the key. Time intensive but necessary.
- limited to 8 hens per household
- Personal property should be used for personal purposes-while not being a danger or nuisance to others.
- Needs to be licensed to allow, needs to be in proper care for the animal(s), need to be aware. of a bylaw for best neighbour practices.
- Livestock can offer great benefit to agricultural practices, including increasing biodiversity, developing richer soil, and reducing waste
- Providing needed food for families, we need to support our neighbors

- Let's limit the number of hens. What about roosters?
- Support from neighbours is important, unless the animals were there before the neighbours. Then a lack of support is less important.
- Only if these animals were kept in human conditions and neighbours were in agreement.
- I think that it's important that adjacent neighbours are kept informed and are happy with the situation. Also, it's important that the animals are treated properly.
- We would finally follow in the footsteps of other communities across Canada. Hens can pick up bugs (one can deal with bugs in the yard in an environmentally friendly way), hens can act as support pets, kids can engage in taking care of them, etc.
- If animal can save people's life in any way, why not.
- Should have very specific rules around acceptable species, space requirements (x square meters of fenced yard per animal depending on the species), maximum number of animals, noise and odor limitations, aesthetics and location (e.g. backyard only), caging & fencing requirements, etc. Process for concerns to be raised by neighbors should be very simple, and investigation/enforcement should be very quick. Must not have an unreasonable impact on neighbors' ability to enjoy their own property.
- As long as each request is evaluated on its own merits and common sense is used in the decision process I see no objection.
- Other types of livestock can be beneficial to Human population and to the environment | lawn and weed control without any pesticides or chemicals needed with the use of small livestock
- emphasis on suitable living conditions
- As a gardener, I am interest in the hens to provide removal of pests to reinforce organic gardening
- Many other municipalities are allowing urban chickens. I strongly support having urban chickens because it's a great way to educate children, they are quieter then a barking dog and they make great pets in normal households!
- I support hens in an urban setting but I think only emotional support livestock animals should be in an urban setting. Most people do not have the space or knowledge to accommodate livestock
- Many orher cities are doing it successfully for a long time. Time for Calgary to catch up!
- Hens would be a wonderful thing for the residents of the city
- When livestock are properly managed and taken care of, they can bring a lot of community and family benefit. Creating a more sustainable food environment (ie. hens) and community engagement
- Good for community engagement
- Hens are a wonderful idea as they are fun and bring community engaging for people of all ages
- I think that people who'd like to be more self sufficient should be allowed to do so, provided it doesn't negatively impact the animals or the neighbours.
- it brings in rules so everyone feels safe
- OMG YES!! As long as people are providing a decent living environment and are caring well for them, we should be allowed!!!!
- My daughter is autistic and would benefit from caring for a chicken as a pet
- Hens are an amazing contributor to food security and they are great pets.

- I am in support of this as long as the owners are responsible for the care and maintenance of their animals and are held accountable if they don't
- Additional criteria maybe required moving forward.
- Chickens are a great source of protein with providing eggs for the family!
- Chickens should be allowed
- We need to become more good self sufficient and quit importing from so far.
- Backyard chickens and other support animals should be allowed in Calgary city limits.
- I believe there would have to be rules and regulations that has the health of the animal and the consideration for the public first and foremost
- Pending noise/nuisance complaints. Extra insurance for having them.
- I know that people are different and have different interests and find other animals more to their liking. As long as the animals are properly cared for (standard of care must be defined) and the community can support these animals with a responsible owner (responsible must be defined as well, i.e. proper maintenance and care to not affect neighbours if possible, etc - must be understood by animal owners before animals are obtained), this could be beneficial.
- If they are useful and all neighbors consent, there is no reason they shouldn't be allowed with the restrictions above.
- Seems fair
- I believe urban livestock would be a positive impact in calgary, it would create new job opportunities and could possibly help individuals in personal ways such as, personal controlled food sources, give people new hobbies, and in some cases emotional support.
- Would not be opposed to neighbours having hens (limited in number). Would be more concerned about allowing other livestock.
- Seems reasonable
- So long as it provides for a full assessment of animal welfare and animal purposes are verified to be just. (Not just backyard breeding and selling animals whatever species)
- Just yes for now
- I think allowing people to keep chickens and other small livestock will encourage people to be interested and respectful of the agricultural industry. Having animals around also provides emotional benefits to people.
- Neighbour support within a one block radius - these are not quiet animals, nor are their living conditions particularly 'good' smelling. This will impact many more than just adjacent.
- Hens are the best.
- Need to be limits on number and type
- Having the opportunity to incorporate chickens in the by-law is forward thinking on food security, and catching up with cities who are already doing this successfully.
- As long as the animal is well taken care of, not a bother to the neighbourhood, and is not causing the homeowners yard to be unsightly (mud and unkept yard because of the animal)
- There are lots of livestock that could be safely and enjoyably kept within city limits. I currently keep livestock outside of the city on an acreage but would love to have options.

- I think as long as there is appropriate space and care, chickens should be allowed.
- Animal safety, community benefit most important.
- I don't think that support from adjacent neighbors needs to be a requirement - there is no such requirement for dogs or other domestic animals
- Hens for non-commercial use or for small operations could improve food conditions, decrease ecological footprint of industrial farming practices.
- Survey all neighbours not just complainers if a report is filed
- I would personally like to own a hen. I keep a very clean yard and would continue to do so with a hen in the yard. I think that a hen would work well to improve the biodiversity of my yard and soil and at the same time help to manage nuisance insects such as mosquitoes and slugs.
- Urban kids need exposure to animals we use for food.
- I support laying hens in urban backyards provided there are restrictions in place regarding their care and numbers allowed per household.
- These owners need to be held to the same responsibility for their pet as the owners of dogs and cats.
- If the animal is well taken care of and neighbours are supportive then why not
- Conditions would have to be set to ensure neighbours are approve of any application to allow live stock
- Backyard farming has multiple benefits.
- POST-COVID-19 URBAN LIVESTOCK WOULD SUPPLEMENT FOOD SUPPLIES ESPECIALLY FOR LOW-INCOME CITIZENS.
- Yes, except support from neighbours. It isnt required for acquiring cats or dogs and would be unfair gor hen ownership.
- Raising chickens can be done responsibly and safely within the city limits. Important for food sustainability.
- I think as long as those who are responsible for such animals are actually held responsible.
- Hens are quieter than other animals allowed and humans. They ate absconded creatures and I'm surprised this is even a question.
- "In theory I'm not opposed but as a native Calgarian I've never lived next to chickens - Are they loud? Stinky? Do they escape and possibly hurt people? Do they carry disease? Also - what is included when 'livestock' is mentioned. Donkey? Roosters? Pigs?
- I'm not able to answer question 7 - I don't have any experience whatsoever with pigeons as city pets. Wild pigeons in my neighborhood are messy and damage eves and rooflines and are difficult to 'evict'. I can't imagine how pigeons as pets in the city might be different and can't begin to suggest a limit. What do people do with pet pigeons? Send messages to their friends via pigeon? Do they leave the property? So many questions!"
- Support from neighbours is essential, and this proposal has this
- Hens or even mini cows are fine. Mostly herbivore mamma or birdl pets are acceptable.
- benefits owner and have positive impact
- I think it is a good idea, but must have rules, such as these.

- Can provide eggs to owners which is good.
- I feel if someone wants livestock they should get livestock, as long as said livestock is properly cared for.
- This is a fantastic idea. I don't see why hens are not allowed, yet cats and dogs are.
- Hens, if handled properly, can be no more or less annoying than dogs that bark a lot. It seems odd to not allow hens or other livestock that can actually benefit the community when we allow dogs to many benefits.
- No roosters. A part of the bylaw should state what the process is to get rid of the rooster, if it is found that a rooster exists (hard to see when they are little). Rules as to how many are allowed.
- As long as the livestock is not disturbing the neighbours with excessive noise or causing offensive odors due to cleanliness issues, I would have no problem with it. For instance, a rooster crowing loudly at regular intervals would not be desirable. I would prefer that the decision not be made just by one Officer; I would prefer a decision be made by more than one person.
- Bring in the chickens
- No harm, no fowl. :)
- I would support a limited number of Henson.. they are great eco friendly pest control for gardens and fresh eggs is a plus.
- Don't see anything unusual about allowing hens.
- Positive community benefit is a very good thing.
- There would be another source of food
- As long as proper shelter and husbandry is followed and supported in the community
- If people treat and look after the animals they should be aloud to have certain pets other than just dogs and cats bunnies birds
- Proper living conditions for livestock is important.
- I would add the criteria that the animal(s) are humanly contained (containment not potentially injurious to the animal), and clarify that the "living conditions" include proper nutrition and "reasonable" protection from predation (it would be difficult to protect hens or pigeons from hawk predation).
- As long as guide lines are strictly followed livestock should be permitted
- It could help people be more self sustaining.
- Love the idea of having more livestock
- I absolutely do not want chickens next door to me. It's bad enough that I have to deal with roaming cats driving my indoor only cats crazy and not being able to keep my windows open in the summer because of neighbors dogs barking outside all day while their owners are at work.
- Chickens are awesome!!!!!!! As long as the people who want to keep them are ACTUALLY prepared (no weird puppy-mill-like operations.
- promotes eating locally, potentially reduce reliance on factory farms/animal abuse, supports food security.
- Common courtesy

- chickens provide not only food, but pest control and can be considered support animals
- Depending on the situations though because livestock can be very loud and messy.
- As long as they keep their yard clean just like a dog owner should
- I have always wanted a couple hens, so I am not opposed. But it could cause homeowner disputes, because of noise and smell, so adjacent neighbors would need to be on board.
- People can own what they want as long as it meets bylaw restrictions
- people should be allowed to grow their own food
- The current criteria makes sense.
- All animals have souls.
- I'd strongly support having hens and other smaller livestock on city properties. Would like to see restrictions on numbers and a way to make sure living conditions are appropriate and humane.
- Access and provision for care must be regularly monitored. Continued needs of neighbours must be evaluated and re-evaluated
- Chickens are good for eggs. They offer great fertilizer for the garden.
- Hens/Chicken can be beneficial to gardens. Also provides food (eggs). Best to be controlled and monitored.
- Without neighbour approval
- Hens have been successful in most major cities all over the country, we are far behind the times on this issue.
- In appropriate settings livestock can offer practical and emotional benefits.
- Allowing urban hens creates a food source for low income families, and teaches young children the value of food and caring for an animal that provides.
- As long as neighbors have a true opportunity to refuse. I don't think anyone in the city should have to live next to livestock if they do not fully consent.
- I feel that this is a great opportunity for a city such as Calgary to have the opportunity for residents to participate in urban hens which I feel would be a great idea to explore.
- This allows Calgarians to provide food for themselves.
- I don't have an issue with people wishing to keep small livestock as animal husbandry can be enormously beneficial on numerous levels e.g, education, teaches responsibility, food source (eggs or milk), emotional comfort, gratifying experience, natural fibre source (wool, fleece)
- [removed] Seriously we need to have rights to have these animals [removed]. And question 1 was [removed] don't give fines and don't chop the balls off of cats just let them be geez
- I don't have enough knowledge in this area to provide an explanation, but it seems like a reasonable exploration with the appropriate guidelines.
- Many cities are allowing hens in their communities and presently there has not been negative comments in the newspapers. I believe the hens must have a proper pen and that the City is allowed to inspect them from time to time. People tend to want to have eggs but do not know enough about the care of hens. Education is essential.
- Let people have chickens.

- Chickens are generally friendly and super harmless to neighbors and kids.
- "doesn't matter to me"
- let people do what is best for themselves and their families.
- i just dont want to smell the chickens"
- Allowing people to harvest their own food is an excellent idea, provided the hens are properly taken care of and sheltered.
- I think something like this would be beneficial for younger people as well as adults. There is a big disconnect between where food comes from and this will help to build a more conscious community. Goats used to help keep down grass or weeds in certain areas can also cut down on emissions and would also allow for employees to be put elsewhere that may need extra hands while also creating jobs(Shepard's). Also who doesn't like goats or chickens?
- If a bylaw is in placed, only responsible owners will be given licenses to keep chickens. We don't need our neighbors permission to keep chickens. It will only create friction among neighbors.
- I support this idea, however it must be easily accessible public information where these exist, possibly on the property listing like an easement? ie: my neighbours may approve now, but if they sell their house, potential buyers must be aware of the situation otherwise if they don't, will I have to get rid of my animal?
- Neighbour approval should not be required.
- I support hens and other livestock in the city. People need to move toward home grown food and a more natural way of life with less dependence on commercial processed food.
- .
- Cool
- as long as no one else is negatively impacted, persons who can properly care for animals should be able to have them. Am i niave to assume that you would not keep animals unless you knew what you were doing??
- Seems reasonable
- Hens should be allowed. Support from neighbours shouldn't matter if people take care of them and clean up after them. It's their property, not their neighbours
- if all are in favour and the criteria set out is met, I feel this could be beneficial
- Hens make great pets and we can educate our children on where our food comes from.
- Calgary residents need chickens, but we shouldn't be subject to neighbour's consent.
- Anything that promotes living with animals, especially when children are involved, would promote a kinder way of treating non-human beings.
- I think we need to have some flexibility, however, I do not support an environment of unregulated livestock ownership.
- As long as the hens have proper care and housing, are taken care of and not a nuisance (not running around outside of a yard or noisy) they should be allowed.
- If proper restrictions are in place, why would neighbour support be required?
- people should have the freedom to do this if it is not creating nuisance or hazard for neighbours

- Hens should absolutely be permitted. I am less concerned with other livestock, though given proper care, suitable living conditions and in appropriate number, I support a citizen's choice to own other animals as well.
- Unless they are pets and not livestock! Backyard chickens for food (meat/eggs) is not good I don't want small slaughter houses in homes,
- People should be allowed to keep hens as long as they know how to properly care for them
- No need for neighbour approval. If there are neighbour concerns, it would only be because people are not caring for chickens properly, which is already a condition of having them. Unnecessary bureaucracy.
- noise levels need to be low, odor needs to be minimal - treat them like pets. They are not livestock if within the city and should be treated as a pet and follow the responsible pet bylaw
- "Local, sustainable, (potentially) affordable food production should be important to the city. This is a good way to start the conversation and develop strategies for the future.
- The expansion of urban livestock will enrich childrens experience as they learn about animals and farming."
- Livestock animals should only be located on properties of greater than a quarter of an acre in size.
- Hens could be a great addition especially when protected from cruel conditions.
- It should be allowed to have few hens if the owner keep them in good clean environment
- Strict inspection schedules must be maintained by the City to ensure the health and safety of the animals. Surprise drop in checks should also be part of the program.
- We want backyard chickens for eggs and how about a goat to mow the lawn?!
- Please allow chickens!
- they can be very good benefit
- This is a great way to help communities
- Chickens for eggs should be allowed as long as they are properly cared for
- With annual permit applications and monitoring I think this would be feasible, along with annual feedback and support from the livestock owner's adjacent neighbors.
- It potentially offers a community benefits or create jobs for people.
- Kept properly for species on owner's property and not bothering anyone else, why not?
- Only is this bylaw was properly enforced and livestock was properly cared for at all times!
- Provides a means for sustainable living
- Hens are quiet and harmless, and owning them increases individual food security.
- I personally think allowing livestock could benefit our city in multiple ways. In light of the current pandemic it could help with food security and sustainability. It has the potential to positively affect mental health issues such as depression. I believe it would provide opportunities to youth and adults to connect with their roots and the cycle of food. I do however have some cautions that butchering of livestock either be done by a professional butcher or that an owner prove adequate knowledge of butchering for personal consumption. I do think the number of animals should be determined by factors like space, food availability, care provided, shelter. The owner I think should have to inform neighbours but not that neighbourhood approval be required to own or keep livestock. I think it wouldn't be a bad idea to get care plans and purposes for livestock animals. I think if someone intends to slaughter animals that those animals should be counted differently that something more permanent like egg laying hens. I also think it might be a good idea under some extra laws to make use of livestock to graze certain areas of the city. Obviously there would have to be rules about how close and fecal matter management if they are on public land. Something to consider though for some of the larger grassy areas of the city. Not in parks though just in like sides of roads or other low use grassy areas.

- Man the more hens we can get in backyard situations the less hens are being crammed, tortured and abused in large scale ag operations. [removed] I would love to have a Nigerian pygmy goat chomping my grass. Cute [removed]
- Chickens are a very therapeutic and gratifying animal to aid in emotional and mental stress for many people. They are a low maintenance domestic animal that provides companionship, natural human-animal bonding, and are a physical and/or mental stress to no one.
- Small pigs should also be permitted
- It allows Calgarians to sustain themselves in a positive way. Less environmental damage, etc. As long as the animals are properly cared for, who cares?
- It is ridiculous that hens and other small livestock are not allowed in the city. The benefits would be great as long as the animals are cared for. Bylaws should support this and be enforced.
- "There is an increasing trend for many types of 'assistance animals' which I feel is valid.
- And many people are keeping pets/participating in activities which were once considered rural but are now urban such as pot-belly pigs and bee-keeping."
- Hens without Neighbor approval.
- n/a
- I love the idea of backyard hens. To protect people who have chickens, there would have to be strict and clear guidelines in place for building chicken coops so people before proceeding so they wouldn't have to change everything later on. Likewise if new neighbours moved in next door to where hens were already living, there would need to be protections in place for the chicken owners.
- Limit number...maybe miniature goat, or pot belly pig or 2 ducks if backyard big enough. In the house at night since a pet.
- Great idea
- fresh local products greatly improved many community's and will do the same for Calgary
- Proper licensing would be needed.
- Why not ?
- I don't know enough about the pros and cons of urban hens to offer anything of substance. However, I'm willing to accept it as a trial if the idea is popular enough, and the regulations can ensure that problems don't arise as a result.
- I would like 1 chicken
- I think small quantities of small livestock animals kept by people in the city is okay. I expect there would have to be a more extensive registration process as well. My one concern would be that regulating, monitoring, and policing of these types of animals might be more costly for the city of calgary. Would this be offset by higher registration costs to owners. I think livestock can become a nuisance (noise/odor, etc.), I can see people setting up coops without going through proper protocol and that can become a nuisance quickly, that will require policing/bylaw enforcement. I do have a concern about what rules would be placed around where one could keep a hen or other livestock at their residence. I think these types of animals would need to be prohibited from high-density communities (apartments, townhouse/rowhousing style living, etc.) I would not want to live in a dense neighborhood with sounds and smells of livestock.

- I think urban hens is a great idea!
- Urban agriculture is a good thing and we can look to Australia as an example of successful urban chicken keeping. There should be a bylaw in place for abuse and suitability of living conditions. Neighbours should not be given control.
- Chickens are wonderful. They don't harm the environment. They give fresh eggs.
- Chickens can be useful in the garden. Most chickens only live 2 years. People who interested in chickens are likely responsible. Also chickens can't get far. One risk is drawing in predators.
- I agree to this but only with responsible owners who will feed and clean up after their owners.
- Only for hens though. A limited number. No other livestock
- In order to support this bylaw, ALL neighbours would have to be in agreement; the person wanting the hens should apply for a permit and all neighbours would have to agree. There should be full disclosure to all neighbours (i.e. not just adjacent houses but 2 or 3 houses away) on what will happen (i.e. noise, smells etc)
- This is how we feed ourselves. Neighbor approval should not be required.
- I think other animals can be beneficial to the city as long as the owners are responsible, and they do not disturb neighbors
- If it's beneficial why not!
- As long as everyone is okay with it and the animal is healthy and living a quality standard of life then it's fine.
- Emotional support animals might be one good reason to have them and I think as long as there are not any horrible smells emanating from the property, then allow hens or pigs or lambs or other livestock. I would personally love to have fresh laid eggs from a hen, although my current lifestyle would not allow me to have them as I would not be able to take care of them.
- If there are more livestock it would overall bring the community's moral up.
- Dogs, cats and birds aren't the only things that act like pets.
- The measure of animal control should be a question of nuisance. If my neighbour wants to keep a few hens that's none of my concern. Live and let live.
- This kind of animal is beneficial to the community and individuals. This should have been done decades ago.
- I think that animals provide a lot of good. Properly cared for and loved animals of any variety is a good thing and will create more diverse and interesting neighbourhoods.
- If people have large yards or space for other types of animals on their own property, it should be allowed (if not deemed a nuisance animal).

- As long as there is consultation with neighbours and no complaints
- As long as the conditions above are met. However, there is additional risk of the hens being attacked by dogs or other animals with high prey drive or attracting in wildlife like bobcats. So that would need to be considered.
- Food security, connection to growing food and livestock, (provided suitable living conditions are provided) are tremendously good reasons to support having hens / other small livestock in our City.
- Care for animals and increased self sufficiency (food wise) are important skills for critical thinking for all citizens.
- Hens should 100% be allowed in Calgary outdoors. They cause no smell, no noise and provide food and emotional support.
- Government needs to educate the public on how important animals are in an individuals life.
- I have no problem with any of that provided the City carries out frequent checks on the proper care of such livestock and prosecutes cases of neglect or abuse, as with any other pet.
- Responsible ownership of livestock, especially laying hens, should be allowed. Permits, living condition inspections, etc. are a good way of ensuring animals are being raised in a suitable environment. I do not think support from adjacent neighbours is needed, as proper care of the animals should cause few problems, so long as reasonable numbers are being kept.
- Urban Hens are an excellent addition to our city.
- Chickens are amazing ! They are not at all noisy it's a miss conception! They provide eggs and are very low maintenance. They free range and woykd be way more beneficial to a back yard keeping mice and pest pipulation down. All major cities in Canada like Vancouver and Toronto allow this. Calgary is way behind .
- If there are appropriate bylaws surrounding livestock, I don't have any issues surrounding them being permitted
- [personal information removed]
- Can keep hens safe and neighbour's are fine.
- My neighbors and I are looking forward to having hens. We promise to be responsible pet owners.
- I love the idea of urban hens. I think this provides a great opportunity to Calgarians. I am uncertain about the neighbor approval though. What methods would we need to prove the neighbor agreement and what happens as neighbors change?
- All livestock need good living conditions
- Excellent idea! Makes use more sustainable in our own community and can help bring neighbors together. Also a great learning experience for the children in the community.
- Fresh eggs for myself. Share fresh eggs to neighbors too. The bylaw will help in the promotion of the hen's welfare. Gives guidelines to best practices in keeping chickens. Owners don't see the need to ask permission from neighbors as long as the chicken owners are compliant to the bylaws or standards set by the City. Chickens are generally harmless, quiet, and clean. ONLY RESPONSIBLE OWNERS can be allowed to raise urban chickens.
- As long as chickens are maintained they shouldn't be a problem
- It's not my business what animals my neighbors choose to have.

- in limited numbers per household.
- This is a successful program in many cities and towns across Canada; there is really no reason to deny hens. As for other livestock, the odd goat to keep grass down, but I'd suggest nothing bigger or bovine.
- No explanation needed. Calgarians need this support to have the right to own one
- having eggs available out my back door would be awesome. but i would have to ensure I clean up regularly and they do not become a nuisance.
- Like the idea of Hens, as long as numbers are limited
- With urban hens my counselor Ward [personal name removed] issue is the protocol that keeping chickens requires. It is very easy to create an urban backyard chicken manual that people would have to complete in order to house chickens in their back yard. This would alleviate [personal name removed] concerns. This is akin to what is happening with ABC Bees and the training that is done there. Already there is a vet keen to be seeing that the health of chickens is maintained. I am sure there are several people that could assist in developing these protocols (that incidentally will improve upon the industrial system and thus the quality of the benefit to everyone).
- I don't feel I need to
- If the person has the proper facilities, can supply the care necessary for the animals and is responsible enough to respect the neighbors. Also they would have to be willing to have the animals in moderation and not have more than they can handle.
- If the number of hens are limited, and the living conditions provided are excellent, not just OK, having hens can be a wonderful experience for everyone.
- I'm 50/50 on urban hens. I worry about the hens being attractive to bobcats and coyotes. The hens would need to be in a large enough enclosure that they do not spend unsupervised time loose in a yard. I'm also not sure if people are prepared to deal with their hens as they get older and produce less eggs. Keeping hens requires daily work and I am concerned that well intentioned people may end up neglecting their hens as they are out of sight in the backyard especially during the winter. Urban hens are presented as a way to increase local, sustainable food but there are other sources of local, free range eggs. On the other hand urban hens have worked in other cities so I'm willing to support the initiative.
- I think allowing livestock within the City limits could provide a huge community benefit and I support the involvement of Bylaw Enforcement Officers to ensure living conditions are optimal for the animals involved
- As long as animals cannot be killed for food.
- If it will have a positive impact and provide better living conditions to the animal, I don't see a reason not to support it.
- I disagree with having to get approval from adjacent neighbours. I didn't get to decide whether or not I wanted partying, drug dealing, renters beside me! Or a group home for "troubled" people. I would take chickens, pigeons, pot belly pigs etc anytime over that!
- Urban hens provide some food sustainability in the area and independence as long as proper conditions for the hens can be upheld

- As long as all the above rules are followed, I see no issue. Maybe there could be a minimum amount of acreage requirement depending on livestock?
- I think that there needs to be support from the neighbours considering the possible disruptions. I think it would have to be at the discretion of more than one officer however.
- Without needed support from neighbors.
- I don't have any issues with people having livestock as long as they meet the above criteria and it does not create an issue for others
- the need for urban farming is going to be a growing need and if it has positive impacts then there shouldn't really have any negative results to be included in the City bylaws
- Having livestock is great as long as they have proper living conditions and it's not to the detriment of your neighbors.
- Egg laying hens are not just sustainable food source, they are also excellent pets. Having the ownership legalized, it will enforce that owners must be knowledgeable, responsible and accountable for the wellbeing of the hens. That is in parallel to their responsibility as a good neighbour and citizen.
- What a great idea!
- Yes, people should be able to have hens as pets
- In this day and age, people should be allowed to keep livestock that is used to feed and provide for their families needs. Of course numbers of any livestock would be restricted dependent on the amount of land needed/recommended by current Ag practices/standards (i.e. 10 acres for each horse, 5 chickens per 1/5 of an acre, etc....)
- Small backyard animals, like goats, have to be shown to have a purpose
- I love my chicken and so does my neighbour, not to mention free fresh eggs every morning
- Hens are hardy animals, easy to care for and a great source of joy. Plus, they produce eggs for food and can be butchered for meat. Properly looked after, there is very little noise or smell.
- Chickens are super cool. Heck yeah. We should allow waterfowl as well if we're allowing chickens, cause waterfowl are significantly more intelligent.
- Chickens are great to have!
- I'm fine with hens in the city as long as the animals are well cared for
- It allows for animals but keeps the neighbors and community in mind
- The private keeping of livestock, when kept in safe and suitable conditions, can greatly benefit the environment and contribute to a more sustainable future.
- I am in full support of urban hens. But, neighbour support should not be needed. Instead, you could put bylaws in place to regulate potential issues a neighbour may wish to report.
- Yes! This is awesome!
- City livestock is supported by many cities with amazing benefits. Calgary is behind the times on this one
- let people have animals if they can care for them [removed]
- Hens are quieter than dogs.. You won't hear a hen at the end of the block at all hours of the day or night.

- Livestock are a wonderful and enriching asset to any community.
- They are better than pesticides for a lot of cases
- Sustainable and enjoyable. I'd love to see goats considered as well.
- Covid has highlighted the importance of citizens being able to produce their own food. Backyard chickens are an essential part of this.
- If the owner can provide suitable living arrangements, and the adjacent neighbors have no problem with livestock, I don't see why it would be an issue.
- I support the idea of urban farming, but a balance bylaw is crucial.
- If they have the space and neighbors are ok if close by, why not
- We need the option of growing our own food in every way. The law should not prohibit this.
- People can have a goat which is considered live stock.
- If all the requirements are followed, there shouldn't be an issue.
- We must support urban self sufficiency
- Because
- Hens are quiet and useful. No roosters, though.
- I see nothing wrong with it
- Urban livestock would be good. But there shouldn't be a herd of cows on a roof.
- More people should provide for their own needs.
- Chickens would be a wonderful addition to backyards. This would encourage and teach agricultural growth for children especially being able to care for and produce ones own eggs. Not to mention chickens make wonderful pets and can offer calming outlets for our growing anxiety.
- It has to be case by case but it's good to make sure they have healthy living conditions
- I think it would be nice.
- I would support this amendment only if it doesn't cause any Abuse, Neglect, or Slaughter of an Chickens, Etc. on the property.
- Unsure as to what livestock would be permitted and how "suitable living conditions" are determined. However, so long as individuals are screened, it seems reasonably likely that the animals would have a better life than those in factory farms, but I think this question needs to be flushed out a lot. I would support further exploration of a possible bylaw amendment.
- As long as the hens do not become a nuisance and are taken care of properly I would not have a problem with my neighbours having hens. Depending on the definition of other livestock, I would prefer the bylaw to be restricted. I do not like the idea of my neighbour having a wallow of pigs or other various animals on their property in an urban area due to the close quarters and spacial needs of the animals.
- There would have to be a curfew to ensure they are not making noise while others are trying to sleep.
- Hens are very affectionate creatures. I believe we, as a whole, can benefit from being around hens and other livestock. As long as the animals are cared for and the neighbours don't object, there should be no problem.

- If all requirements listed above are met, allowing urban hens seems reasonable.
- If people can properly raise hens, they should be allowed to.
- Space would need to be part of the suitable living, number of animals, size of space and distance from neighbors.
- Hens are great for the community as long as their living conditions are closely monitored. No roosters please.
- As long as the animals are not a nuisance and neighbours are not inconvenienced
- I think the consent of neighbors would be given significant weight.
- On a case by case basis given the property.
- If the hens will be considered pets then yes I am ok with it. I am not ok with people bringing hens into the city to use them as food.
- Research documents mental health benefits when a variety of animals allowed to coexist with people
- Hens are fine.
- An orphan infant needs a loving home and so does livestock.
- Animals should be properly taken care of.
- Having livestock can be beneficial for many reasons
- But they must be registered with the city. If not registered there should be fines given out.
- Provided that appropriate measures relating to hygiene, noise and safety are taken, people should be free to own whatever animals they want
- Absolutely!!! This should be in all cities!
- It benefits people and potentially ensures the animals are well taken care of.
- People should be able to have hens and other livestock on their property as long as they are not a disturbing the neighbourhood and kept clean
- Seems reasonable as long as getting permission isn't a long process and if current owners are notified of any changes.
- With the caveat that there are regular inspections and follow-up to complaints (smell, noise, vermin attracted)
- Main priority must be the welfare of the animal and no slaughtering allowed. Must be enough in the budget to support monitoring and enforcement of regulations.
- It's only right
- .
- I would support this if the hens are required to have a set amount of space in a coop (not cramped).
- They allow sustainable to living for households
- From what I have read and heard from other municipalities, holding hens causes no issues to neighbours. We live close to dogs that bark constantly, owners that don't pick up dog poop in the public field behind our house, cats that use our property as a potty - how could hens possibly be a concern?
- Keeping livestock in an urban area is an important step towards sustainability.

- I am not aware of any specific issues as long as there is enough space.. possibly a case by case basis.. neighbours would have to be involved.
- they can be pets.
- anything to move forward using environmentally sensitive remedies.
- Yes, if the people living next to you are okay with you caring for livestock and it is beneficial to the community I do not see a problem as it is not causing issues or harm. Reconsider if harm or if I creased nuisance.
- I support the bylaw because as long as they are being taken care of and they are living in the right conditions there should not really be a problem with this.
- Yes, as long as the animals are not a nuisance to neighbours, noise, smell, waste etc.
- This is great! People should be able to have hens (within a reasonable number). Some people would want chickens or dwarf goats as emotional support animals.
- As long as they are caring for the animals properly and they aren't disturbing anyone, then I don't see why there would be any issue with keeping other livestock.
- It's a very good idea.
- A household should have the option to provide their own food for the family, especially in the event of a pandemic such as the one we are living through. Thank goodness people only got stupid over toilet paper this time... what about next time?
- If the person can provide an adequate living space that the animal requires they should I be allowed to have it
- Hens/ducks would be a wonderful natural pest control method
- I do not believe that livestock of any kind are suitable in a city.
- Hens are good for slugs! Also good to teach responsibility to children.
- You appreciate food more if you raised it.
- I feel like all critters have a place with humans
- If someone wants bens and it doesn't cause others any problems, then they should be allowed to have hens
- Animals need to be in a place that is healthy for them.
- As long as all needs are a balanced and benefit the local area and animals
- Only with very specific rules to make sure it doesn't become an issue for neighbors (noise smell etc)
- If noise and smell are not a problem.
- Eggs!
- i like this idea
- As long as the animals welfare is top priority id support
- I think it is time to allow this amendment to allow people to be more self-sufficient as long as rules are followed and animals such as hens are kept safe from predators.
- Having locally sourced livestock products can greatly improve people's diet and cost managements
- I would support this law, but if I may suggest that if livestock is found in other property, and dies, this is the owner's fault for letting their live stock out into other's homes.

- If more pets can have suitable living locations where the owner can take care of the pet properly then yes
 - I've heard they're really good therapy animals for children with disabilities.
 - Urban hens are less noisy, less messy, and less dirty than your average dog. I do feel that the coop needs to not be an eye sore though.
 - Urban hens are a great way to allow those who want to be more self sufficient to do so and are a great resource in an emergency
 - This is an amazing idea!
 - people should be able to make their homes more sustainable for living which includes growing gardens and some livestock
 - Those who want to keep chickens etc. Should know what's involved and that it's a huge commitment.
 - Chickens would be beneficial addition to back yards
 - I am curious how 'support from neighbours' will be measured, and what the threshold would be for positive impact. Why is positive impact (and not simply the absence of negative impacts) required for these animals?
 - I think it's perfectly fine to keep animals like that on a Property.
 - The animal should definitely have safe living conditions. As long as the animal isn't disrupting anybody else, it should be fine. Any issues with the animal should be solved out by an officer
 - I don't support "Support from adjacent neighbours". Hens are not a problem for others. If a person is already dealing with a difficult neighbor BEFORE having hens, they would only protest again, to be difficult.
 - If suitable housing is required for livestock, it can increase the health of the livestock
 - "I think if the neighbours
- I think if all the above criteria are met it should be fine"
 - In today's day n age, to see people going back to their roots and working to support their household with urban hens is a breath of fresh air. As long as the animals are not mistreated or neglected. I'm all for the people to be able to do more for themselves in supporting their household.
 - I support hens, but our neighbour feeds the pigeons and we sometimes have upwards of 25 pigeons on our roof. It's loud and there's shit everywhere. Our neighbour doesn't have the same problem. They eat at her house and [removed] and hangout at our house. It's brutal.
 - As long as they are properly taken care of then there is no issue
 - If you can provide proper care of an animal, especially if it provides a benefit, I don't see a problem with people owning some livestock.
 - Chicken yes
 - I don't think the livestock has to have a positive impact for the community but should not have a negative one either. I think the neighbors should be able to object, with good reason.

- People are allowed to keep very large pets within the city, and urban hens (when kept properly) would create a positive impact while still having less of an impact than certain other large pets in other instances. However, neighbor support must be obtained to a certain degree.
- All animals deserve a home as long as it's safe and suitable living conditions.
- This is so important to me and my family as we do our best to eat as locally as possible. Put a limit on how many per family, say 2/3 and let us have our hens. This will have so many positive trickle down effects on our environment and food. It will increase people's awareness around food and get us reconnected with where our food comes from.
- I think this would be a positive change as it would allow people to produce their own eggs and have a better understanding of where their food comes from.
- Source of income and food
- It just sounds nice.
- I like to keep hens
- Chickens are no problem. If we don't need neighbour approval for cats and dogs, shouldn't need it for hens either.
- I have no issue with this
- Quieter and cleaner than dogs, don't jump fences and bite people. Why are dog owners so privileged?
- chickens should be allowed as they are quiet and unobtrusive and not a problem.
- I massively support this! We need access to healthy local food and this would be a great way to get people into raising their own food (eggs in this case) but it may have effects like people growing more food to feed the Hens and things like using less pesticides and herbicides because they would be conscious of the effects on their hens and the food they eat.
- it seems fair
- Individual livestock (hens) for those who can provide proper care can have a positive impact on not just the individual but the community around them.
- if chickens kept properly on property where no predator can come in or, they not escape.... i think it would be great, for eggs, for teaching kids about life cycle, where our food comes from etc.... great compost for the gardens that are 100% organic.... but here should be a limit on how many. and there should be fines if they are not properly maintained as flies and odors could possibly offend neighbours.
- If a person would like to have an animal as a pet, and can have the proper means to take care of said animal, then it should be ok.
- Yes as long as proper care of animals is maintained.
- I would support the law
- Due to our relatively small urban lots, neighbour impact can be substantial when noise and offensive odors are involved. Neighbours must be advised and have veto power.
- Lots of cities allow hens so why not. why not try out other livestock under above rules and see how it works. Hope we don't have unpicked up horse dung on the roads or pathways! Actually we probably don't want horses on pathways - too much other traffic.

- It would help to improve the lives of animals
- Urban hens are no different to other animals currently allowed on private properties with added environmental and food supply benefits. It has been demonstrated to be an easily implementable program with a lot of community support in numerous municipalities across North America.
- Raising hens is an excellent activity/responsibility for children. It also allows people to have fresh eggs!!!! They are no noisier than dogs!
- Urban livestock Cultivation on a case by case basis seems like a great idea with the right measures in place.
- People should be able to raise hens
- Hens are harmless and if you keep them in your yard it should be fine.
- Seems reasonable
- Support in principle but there must be serious considerations regarding cleanliness, health and pest considerations. How would the City enforce this is unclear. City has trouble enforcing the myriad of by laws it already has.
- There are many benefits to allowing a small number of Backyard hens (should depend on yard size). Should not need neighbour approval.
- You should not need neighbours support. The purpose of the rules is to make sure there is no impact to neighbouring properties.
- Support from neighbours and suitable living conditions is a must.
- You should not need support from your neighbours to have chickens. If people are following the rules, there will be no impact to neighbours at all.
- Yes to backyard hens. The neighbour consultation can be removed. If the acquisition of a new pet meets bylaw requirements of housing and husbandry then neighbour opinion is irrelevant.
- I think certain livestock like domesticated pigs would be acceptable
- As long as the animals are well kept they should be allowed.
- We own our property, so why we are not allowed to have hens on our property. Disagree that there is a relation between rats and hens. My house my rules.
- I think letting people have pigeons is a good idea.
- As long as the animals can be cared for properly, there's no reason for them to be prohibited.
- You are actually trying to take care of a dog instead of hurting it like you would if this bylaw was accepted.
- No reason for hens not to be allowed if cared for properly.
- As long as animals are well cared-for and do not create a noise or smell issue and can be seized if owners do not comply
- As long as the neighbours are in agreement and the animals are looked after the city shouldn't have an issue with what people want to do
- People should be able to have livestock to provide, or just for the experience. I don't really like the support from adjacent neighbors part, I don't think they should have to help you if they don't want to, it's not their livestock.

- Animals are living things like humans therefore they should have suitable living conditions and should NOT be treated poorly or live in a poor condition that does not suit the animals needs
- We should make sure their needs aren't overlooked
- Keeps it all to one authority
- Yes if it is safe for the animals it would also be a more local source of food.
- The neighbour consultation should be withdrawn if all other measures of responsible ownership are in place it is not the business of neighbours if a citizen can have pets on their own property. I do hope housing type is considered when putting this in place. A. Single family dwelling can better sustain than an apartment or town house.
- Animals must be well cared for, healthy and have enough room to move freely and conduct natural behaviour necessary for the physical and emotional needs of that species.
- As long as the animal is being taken care of, then it shouldn't be a problem. And if it can benefit the community, win win.
- Any domesticated animal should be allowed to be a pet under proper conditions.
- It's a great way to ensure some food security while having a pet. With proper bylaws in place chickens can be incorporated like any other pet! Its up to the owners to be responsible and take care of their animals!
- I think the criteria are sufficient to address the issue.
- As long as the owner of these animals can take care of them they should be able to house them.
- I think as long as the animals are well cared for and given proper shelter and the property is kept clean, such as raising chickens for example, I'm fine with it.
- [removed]
- I said yes because certain livestock animal can live a comfortable life in an urban environment.
- hens and other farm animals are not welcome in the city. If someone wants to own farm animals, they should live outside the city.
- Provided it could be established that the correct facilities were available to the animal.
- As long as they are being well taken care of and are clean I don't see why there would be an issue.
- If all conditions are met this should not be an issue
- As long as it doesn't adversely impact neighbors etc
- Again.. just yes.
- if you want to own an exotic animal, that's amazing as long as they are properly taken care of and you know what you're doing.
- Yes
- Hens can restore soils and reduce pests like insects naturally. They benefit the community as a whole
- I think it's awesome chickens on their house but they need to have a lot of land as they have to be free range and have a certain amount of footage chicken
- It seems reasonable
- Yea

- They don't do anything harmful so why not
- Livestock can be good
- As long as everyone agrees then why not?
- Hens are a great way for citizens who have the opportunity to make some money and learn to raise animals other than house pets.
- I see no issues in keeping chickens as long as there are rules about how many, how they must be kept, and the support of neighbours.
- This amendment is overdue. In as much as the owner is responsible and conscientious of neighbours, there is no difference between currently allowed pets (cats may arguably even be more detrimental) and any other.
- Urban hens that are looked after properly may be less troublesome than some dogs that bark and owners who don't pick up after them and roaming cats.
- I think allowing a small number of hens (perhaps 6) in urban back yards would be beneficial (environment: hens can contribute to local food production, recreation & mental health: caring for animals can help keep people active, and small livestock could provide the same mental health benefits that pets in general do, particularly for individuals who cannot have a cat or dog). Roosters should possibly not be allowed due to noise issues.
- Sustainable food systems
- It should require a license and inspection of housing for the hens as well as a course/test offered by the city. We have enough animal cruelty in Calgary, we don't need to add abused, neglected and frozen chickens to the long list!
- Urban livestock has many benefits to individuals and neighbors
- Minus support from neighbors.
- Yes, but - why need support from neighbours? That's a nice thing, but it isn't required for dogs and cats, both of which can be trying for some neighbours. Chickens are often less obtrusive than dogs and cats.
- In Red Deer County - they only allow 3 hens for property larger than .5 acres and smaller than 2 acres so hens have ample space and resources to roam and eat to be healthy...with backyards being so small in the city - what is the responsible number for a city lot?
- I believe individuals have different needs and if a goat or pig makes someone's life better then I am supportive
- If the animal has the space, shelter, living space is cleaned regularly, will not be a nuisance to neighbors (e.g. roosters would be a nuisance or excessive smells that cannot be controlled by the owner) I would not care what animals my neighbors would have.
- Hens are fine, don't like the idea of roosters
- Hens, bees and other beneficial animals are awesome.
- Only with support of adjacent neighbour and only if they are properly educated on the care of animals
- I have no issue with someone keeping chickens as long as they keep their living area clean.
- Only for a limited number of livestock or birds

- I believe hens can be part of a healthy urban garden, which I would like to see tried in Calgary.
- Support from neighbors is important
- Suitable conditions and care of the animals being the most important
- The issue should not be type of pet, but ownership. A responsible owner of urban hens should be ZERO issue for neighbours. They can be clean, quiet and beneficial in so many ways
- Two chickens per household is reasonable and minimizes noise and odour
- But very important to have full support from neighbors
- Owning livestock can have many benefits in urban areas. Knowledge for children, more fresh organic food, more options for farmers market businesses.
- I'm not sure why this isn't already allowed... folks should be able to carry out these types of activities on their private property as long as it does not cause harm for the animals or members of the community (just like domestic pets).
- If reviewed first before giving the go ahead.
- People should be able to have hens or small livestock such as goats if they follow all of the guidelines provided by the city.
- I would support allowing livestock as long as certain appropriate living conditions are met much like having a regular pet. As long as needs are met and neighbors are not disturbed by the ownership then it should be fine.
- Hens should be allowed as long as proper living conditions are provided
- If some one can keep pigeons, why can not some one have a couple chickens?
- I feel that urban hens, as well as other small livestock should be permitted because pets come in all shapes, and if someone wants home raised eggs, it shouldn't be a problem
- Support for this as long as all adjacent neighbors are in agreement.
- Great opportunity for kids, local food, can eat scraps (good for the environment).
- New home purchases should also be notified if their adjacent neighbour has hens. This will help avoid any disputes and prevent the hen owner from having to re-apply.
- As long as there is suitable conditions and none of the neighbours mind then why not? It's not hurting anyone.
- If all above criteria are met, urban livestock could potentially provide more positives in terms of health, wellness and community.
- I am thinking of potbelly pigs which make ideal pets.
- Having animals as pets is beneficial to people. The key point is that the animal is considered a pet and not livestock. They would have to abide with noise bylaws also.
- If all above were followed.
- As long as there is a limit and their area is kept clean and organized
- Provide a budget for bylaw officers to check approved properties (once every six months) to ensure animals are well cared for and neighbours are still supportive.
- Sounds fun! Fresh eggs, cool animal friends. WHats the downside as long as the homeowners comply with the applicable bylaws.

- "Depends on where exactly.
- We have to consider the living conditions for animals first."
- My only concern would be increased bobcat activity trying to get a people's chickens
- So long as livestock is managed properly, no reason to oppose.
- Many smaller livestock can live and even thrive in city environments, which has been proven many times. Cats and dogs can prove to be just as much of a nuisance as any livestock if they are not properly managed and maintained, so I don't see the necessity of disallowing livestock in the city.
- Food shortages will likely be an issue in the future and increasing self-reliance in urban areas will benefit not only the owners of livestock but also society as a whole. Raising and tending animals responsibly can also be an amazing educational and emotional experience in sustainability for children.
- I would so love a little hen to love.
- All points have been proven over and over again that backyard chickens are a POSITIVE. I think it's a little shameful that Calgary is so far behind on this.
- Backyard chickens is something that has worked well in other cities, and I would be in support of it happening in Calgary. I am currently a renter of a shared unit with no suitable outdoor space of my own, but I would be interested in having backyard chickens if/when I move to a more suitable property. I would be 100% supportive of my neighbours' decision to have urban hens - families being able to be more self-sufficient is hugely important when you consider the cost of food.
- Suitable living conditions MUST be provided for livestock.
- We fully support allowing hens in Calgary with appropriate owner education/living condition requirements.
- Small livestock are decent community builders, hens are generally not super noisy. Who doesn't want neighborhood eggs?
- this must have severe restrictions. The neighbours must agree, in writing, before allowing any livestock in the city
- Within reason
- There should be more acceptance of hens - ie eat slugs, provide eggs
- I support hens in the city if housed safely.
- allowing hens into the city fosters relationships between people and animals. Often we take for granted the 'work' or important role animals perform for us just by being present or there. It is time we looked at integrating animals more in a respectful, compassionate way.
- If the animal is there for mental health support, maybe that's a good thing. It would also depend on what other livestock we are talking about which is not clear in this question. Still has to be fair to adjacent neighbours and noise.
- as long as they are not neglected and/or butchered. Pets only. Milk and eggs are not an issue.
- I think that allowing for small livestock, such as hens and some pig species, would be acceptable.
- I think there has to be strict and very clear regulations on this for the number of animals allowed, the size of the animal, how much noise they make if outside, and the how "suitable living conditions" is defined. Plus, would it be a requirement to disclose to for potential home buyers that livestock was living next door? Current neighbors may agree, but what about new homeowners?

- Local sustainability can come from some small ag projects
- Livestock done properly and at the right (small) scale will enrich households and communities in Calgary.
- Provided hen ownership also needs approval from adjacent neighbours, suitable living conditions
- Yes to an extent- neighbours shouldn't have the power to decide. Limit the number of hens to 2 and there will be no problems with noise, mess, etc.
- Chickens make for great pets that add to a sustainable lifestyle and help take power away from corporations that abuse the lives of farm animals
- I think backyard chickens should be allowed. It's a great way to get fresh eggs and they make incredible pets. AND they eat slugs and mosquitos apparently. Like any pet (like dogs) owners should have to ensure they manage odours of poop
- Would need to have a license, and register and be subject to all sanitation protocols, inspections etc to prevent spread of diseases like avian flu. Same goes for beekeeping. we need to protect agricultural producers. Is there a club or association that hen owners could join? Public education necessary. Is there a facility that spent hens could be taken to for killing, butchering? I support urban food production but there are many questions regarding food safety and production protocols that need to be addressed. Any bylaw should be supported with education enforcement and inspections that would be said for 100% through licensing fees or non profit societies. Good opportunity for kids through 4H type clubs. Good opportunity for new Canadians to learn about Canadian agricultural standards. Good opportunity for food security and supporting local, self sufficiency.
- As long as they do not be one an attractant to wind life such as coyotes/bobcats.
- Livestock is a great way to achieve self sufficiency. Cleanliness and humane/considerate (of neighbours) practices are required for keeping any animal. Why should chickens be any different? Having been on many properties that keep chickens I can say from experience- they only stink when they are not properly cared for. No different than any other negligence. They are not disturbing with noise (without roosters).
- As long as animals were well cared for and it's not exploited in any way
- I support allowing urban hens
- Just have to be aware of the hens at all times and make sure they have no way of wondering around
- Hens, pigeons should be allowed as described above. Other animals on a case by case basis with a limit per property.
- This would provide individuals with food security, and other options for companion animals. Animals have been cited as an excellent tool to reduce stress and anxiety. Two conditions that have dramatically increased during the pandemic.
- sustainable food resources.
- It makes sense to allow Hens in backyards within appropriate enclosures in Calgary.

- Yes with limitations on numbers of animals on a property and an official process for handling any complaints. Bylaw would also need the authority and power to ensure animal welfare is balanced with neighbours wanting to enjoy their homes.
- Sometimes it's not about what breed, but how it's been trained.
- Provided, as I already stressed, that the city look into the PERSON requesting application and assess experience and criminal and mental health checks
- Chickens and other animals inside Calgary make 100% sense. We should be moving forward as a City. Especially with sprawl, many areas would do exceptionally well with this regenerative and self sustaining practices within a larger community. It's a great thing!
- Hens would be pretty cool
- The concerns most people express about hens are applicable to all pets; noise, smell, general care. Bad owners are bad owners regardless of the species. There are dogs the size of small horses and no restrictions to ensure they get the appropriate care. We just trust the owner to be responsible, hen owners should have the same level of trust.
- Allows for a variety of experiences for city residents
- this is a difficult answer because I have excellent arguments from both sides. And who will be making sure these animals are well taken care of?
- We need to move forward with this, food sovereignty is our right as humans, this would be a very positive step forward for our communities. But this should not be at the discretion of one person, One person should never get to choose for everyone else.
- Anything people want. Freedom is important.
- Their needs to be a maximum number of hens allowed, as well as education ensuring the well-being and needs of the hens are met (food, water, heat in winter, etc)
- traditional part of city life
- I am pro the idea of having chickens and 1 rooster
- I support for smaller animals such as bees, chickens, rabbits. I do not support for larger livestock as City yards do not necessarily provide the space and living conditions that they require.
- Chickens are a great animal to allow with parameters around the world keeping them
- yes. But I don't think you should need to get a permit. Also goats.
- I think owning chickens in this day and age is a fabulous idea that can only help the economy, as well as people's emotional health.
- Support from adjacent neighbors should not be a requirement. Just that the animals be kept clean and proper
- With provisions to ensure cleanliness and minimal impact on neighbours, I think backyard hens would be beneficial.
- COVID has highlighted the limitations of our food system. Backyard chickens provide eggs and possibly meat bringing homeowners greater food security
- If the above criteria are met, I see no issue with allowing other livestock within the city limits.
- It's an opportunity for animals to positively engage with the community, let's give that a shot

- I think it's more important to focus on the living conditions of the animals. Good living conditions would improve community support as well as maintain a high level of care for the animals.
- I think given the potential food shortages we faced during Covid this could be a good alternative.
- Support from neighbours and suitable living conditions
- There should be a limit on the number of hens. No roosters (noise in am).
- This could be done with proper criteria met on an initial assessment and occasional check ins as followup.
- I think as long as the adjacent neighbours are in support, it's a lovely idea.
- Chickens, goats. Anything that can be penned, does not make a lot of noise, and can be kept relatively clean with caregiver upkeep.
- People should be allowed to have alternative types of pets (ie chickens). Especially with COVID, concerns around food security etc.
- Yes, with the exception of feeding animals on my private property.
- I firmly support Calgarian families keeping hens.
- Numbers would have to be limited
- I have no issues with this amendment, as long as owners are held responsible for providing appropriate living conditions
- Chickens should be allowed based on sustainable living resources if provided with sufficient living quarters.
- Provided the neighbours supported having the animal next door, and could rescind the support if it becomes apparent that noise, smells, etc. negatively impact the use and enjoyment of their home property.
- Hen's are a great source of food for families, and people shouldn't be restricted by the government in how they grow/raise their own food (provided the animals are being properly cared for).
- We really want to own urban hands so we support this amendment.
- As long as the animals are cared for and the property is well maintained, I see no reason to ban.
- As long as it is not a public nuisance (noise, smell, aggressive/dangerous animals, etc), I support this.
- with all the criteria mentioned it would be ok.
- We need to be able to take care of our own food security, and rebuild the basic skills of self sufficiency.
- People should have the right to be self-sufficient, but NO Roosters!
- Growing your own meat is a human right, but maybe we can have some bylaws about keeping roosters quiet!
- I think this would be a great opportunity for people to produce their own food at home and for kids to learn more about our food. Not only that, but people raising their own chickens would surely treat the animals better than giant companies do, therefore a better source of food for Calgarians.
- Please don't let my neighbour's stop me from having chickens

- Chickens and possibly goats are no more a nuisance than cats and dogs and yet can help provide food for a family
- Food security! Chickens are much quieter than most dogs!
- If same bylaws applied to livestock as they do to cats and dogs, acceptable noise levels, not allowed to roam off owner's property, no stockyard smells.
- Allow responsible hen ownership. No different than any other pet. Allowing pitbull-type breeds that can cause injury and death to other pets or people, but not allowing hens, seems like a gross injustice!
- I'd like to have some chickens myself.
- Again, as long as the owners are responsible and there are no implications on others then I would think this is acceptable.
- I think it needs to be explored as you plan to; can't say I would support it until the actual bylaw was ready for passing.
- I think chickens can have a positive effect in terms of providing food, slug control and the joy of a creature in your yard. There does need to be a limit of the number of hens. Animals are our relatives. We just need to consider what they need to live well in a community of humans.
- Given success in other municipalities and the need to ensure balance in all types of urban animal interactions hens are potentially a good thing when managed well.
- More hens
- There is no reason to prevent responsible owners from having hens on their property, and many reasons to allow it.
- I like the idea of a case-by-case basis rather than a rote decision.
- Hens provide valuable food and provide education/compassion to children. Hens should require to be in an enclosure.
- Urban farming in general is a fantastic idea. However, regulations would have to be put in place to deal with the noise nuisances of roosters.
- If the person can properly care for the animals and the neighbors have no objections, then it should be approved
- I'm ok with hens but I believe if it causes problems for neighbors (smell/noise) then the approval for that location should be re-assessed.
- This seems reasonable if everyone else around approves too.
- Allowing urban hens in Calgary would be beneficial to individuals and communities providing they can give the right care to the animals. It's a sustainable way to provide yourself food. So long as individuals are respecting the bylaws in regards to owning livestock and respecting noise bylaws and their neighbors' property.
- This is an excellent idea and anyone who wants hens on their property should be allowed, as long as they have a yard that is suitable.
- As long as these criteria are met, I don't see an issue with this. However, the owners of these hens need to be aware that there are feral cats that roam the neighborhoods, as well as coyotes and bobcats very frequently. This could in turn cause many more issues, therefore this needs to be a consideration.

- I support anyone to have any animal as long as they are educated on how to properly care for it and they are financially prepared to spend the money to ensure the animal has a high quality of life including medical and nutritional care.
- AS long as support from neighbors and the animals best interest is involved then I support this initiative. There should also be a measure to report and remediate noise, poor living conditions, etc. types of complaints
- self sufficiency should be supported to the best degree possible. A self sufficient person/community needs less help from the government when [removed] goes sideways, freeing up resources to help others/reduce overall costs of aid. It's a win/win.
- Hens are fun to keep If kept in good conditions. Must be kept clean otherwise they smell though.
- "As an owner of hens* (not roosters), I can confidently say that if kept within reasonable numbers (ex: 2-3 hens per household), noise impact remains low (for instance, compared to a hound dog) and if a responsible owner can clean up after their dog, they can easily clean up after hens. I would support annual licensing for hens as is expected of all pet owners (dogs, cats...).
- *outside city limits"
- Chicken good
- But eliminate "Offers community benefit/will have positive impact". The benefit is for the owner, not the "community".
- People should have the opportunity to own hens
- As long as the animals are not a nuisance and stay on private property I see no issue with it
- Ensures all livestock and other animals that may fall through the cracks are accounted for to ensure they are reasonably cared for and housed.
- I totally think chickens should be allowed! Had them as kids and they are easier than most animals
- Neighbours need to be involved, as these animals cause noise, can carry pathogens, and can attract wildlife depending on the area.
- The community benefits and advances in urban food security vastly outweigh any argument against the amendment. 100% support.
- As long as there isnt a disturbance to the neighbors then there arent any issue.
- I would add humane care and living conditions for he animals be ensured.
- Backyard hens and potentially other animals would enrich the community, giving people the ability to connect with their sources of food. They can help take responsibility for feeding themselves and their families as well as feel confident about the comfort and safety of their livestock. It would also be very fun and satisfying the get to care for such lovely animals and get to enjoy the results of their care in the form of fresh eggs!
- important for food security
- Except suitable living conditions for the animals, which must be provided, the other criteria such as community benefit are unnecessary.

- Hens can provide a vital and nutritious food source with little to no impact on the surrounding community.
- Allowing urban hens could allow fulfillment in the community and for individuals who have them granted they provide proper care and have space to provide a good quality of life. The old ways of living provide purpose, joy, and a sense of pride in doing a small part to provide for oneself, especially for those who cannot afford to live on an acreage close to the city where they work. Nowadays people have distanced themselves so far from how their food is produced and obtained. I have personally seen the joy and excitement people get from obtaining or growing their own food.
- Our family would definitely have urban chickens if it was allowed.
- I think that if someone wants livestock on their property they need to be monitored. I think the licensing fees would need to cover this additional cost.
- The integration of domesticated animals like chickens offers so many benefits. Urban chickens contribute to localized food resiliency, provide free and organic fertilizer and pest-management services, and provide plenty of opportunities for children and adults to learn more about where their food comes from. I would love to see backyard chickens in Calgary!
- This is a wonderful way to connect people with their food and gain some food security.
- As long as the chickens are well cared for.
- Feeding your own animals ensures they are taken care of well. I'm nervous of people who could abuse this rule.
- As long as animal welfare and hygiene are ensured.
- Would need to be with in reason the # of birds. It would come with a cost however as I think more bylaw officers would be needed to check on the condition of the birds. It quickly could become a hoarding or neglect situation.
- Some livestock animals should be permitted - so long as standard of care implemented and maintained. However, if the city is already struggling to enforce current bylaw - should additional items of inspection really be added to that list of responsibilities??
- I support it as long as they are well kept and do not cause harm to anyone or pets. The living conditions must be kept extremely clean as to not cause smell etc to the surrounding community.
- It's the right thing to do.
- As long as their is support from adjacent animals and the yard is a suitable size to support the animals
- Sounds cool
- Properly looked after and with the right amount of room, livestock can be beneficial. People do need to be properly educated in the husbandry of the livestock they want to own.
- There are some livestock that aren't noisy and as long as the owner takes proper care of the animal(s), then there shouldn't be a problem.
- I don't care what pets people keep, as long as they don't annoy me. No pigeons though!
- I would suggest it would need the approval of neighbours within 50 metres, AND the approval would need to be reviewed every 2 years, and the suitable conditions evaluated at least annually.

- If there is sufficient space for the animal(s), and if the animals aren't being a nuisance to neighbours, then sure. But with a limit
- Seriously, hens?? This is a farm animal and belongs to farm belongs to a land where they could freely walk it doesn't belong to a small backyard in the city! cats and dogs more than welcome but not hens its farm animal.
- Chickens should be allowed provided people do not own more than 5/property within the city.
- Certain livestock with the right conditions would be less disruptive than other "pets" and contribute to sustainable and environmentally friendly food production
- Fully supportive - I hope my neighbours get hens; share eggs, and build friendships. So much added value to the city!!! Please do it!
- Because no pet should be treated like it doesn't matter
- Based on the conditions outlined, i feel this would be a very positive step
- A process would have to be provided for people to deal with the issues, smell, noise, and insects.
- Nothing to explain!
- As long as the Criteria Above is followed
- Backyard hens should be allowed
- People should be at liberty to do this.
- It's time to allow citizens the ability to feed themselves via the extras that chickens or other animals provide. Excellent for eggs, pest/ insect control, fertilizer, calming for the soil. No different than Owning a cat or dog.
- All the rules sound responsible
- Of course I worry about it being approved by the neighbors and then somebody else moving in next door but if it's going to be monitored and approved then why not
- Only if all the listed criteria was followed and all close neighbours are notified to respond.
- Hens would be welcome, larger animals not so much unless on larger pieces of land within the city.
- Why should they not be allowed? They benefit greatly, they aren't a nuisance, they can be like a pet as easily as a cat or dog.
- There would have to be a comprehensive approval and review process to make sure animals are safe and well cared for and not hoarded or a nuisance to neighbours.
- I think it's a great idea to have backyard hens as long as people keep them clean, safe, and well cared for.
- Keeping a limited variety of species in the city would create fewer problems especially with human responsibility waning these days.
- People need to know where their food comes from. By bringing livestock into the city limits it helps to educate the public.
- No neighbour approval
- "Community engagement is key. Neighbors must support it. (Example allergies)

- Experts need to explain make rules regarding easily accessible through multiple formats. Example living conditions, to many google opinions to decide. Once a city group of experts comes to a conclusion, the motion should be adopted.
- Finally For the same reason I don't feel feeding or teasing wildlife is appropriate. Like all things in nature balance is key."
- Backyard chickens are a benefit to many families, providing eggs, fertilizer for gardens, entertainment and pest management. They have been incorporated into many municipalities successfully throughout the world. Calgary is at a point where we cannot afford to lag behind in terms of food security and progressive ideas.
- If there is regulations and monitoring i think it would be a good idea
- Live stock within inner Cory limits is fine within reason
- No issue with urban hens.
- If the animal is healthy and taken care of it's fine, as long as it's not causing problems for the neighborhood such as noise or smells
- "No stipulation needed to ask neighbours.
- Maybe a license or permit of some kind needed like for dogs to ensure people are committed to caring for them. Or use the rules listed below for pigeons."
- If the livestock are for community benefit and could provide opportunities for work, food for homeless and low-income.
- I see a plus for fresh food and children to learn about where it comes from. As long as they are humanely housed.
- Small animals that can be cared for properly.
- Allow chicken and other animals. And do not make it reliant on "permission" from neighbors. We have a right to grow our own food!
- If the environment and habit are suitable people should be able to own these animals.
- Yes! I believe that accessing cruelty free animal byproducts through the responsible ownership of livestock is an important part of living in a community. Of course, there would need to be restrictions in place regarding roosters (noise) and to ensure the wellbeing of the chickens.
- "Chickens are better than most house pets!
- Limit roosters.
- A progressive community acknowledges chickens are welcome in sustainable gardening and food sourcing."
- No roosters please.
- BUT, Urban Hens should ONLY be zoned for specific neighbourhoods or lot size of the property.
- as long as it doesn't interfere with another person's enjoyment of their own property, there's no harm in it. Smell might be an issue in tightly compact neighbourhoods. Chickens stink.
- Chickens are absolutely harmless.
- I support people wanting to be self-sustaining and having chickens and whatever small livestock is a great idea. As long as their are regulations regarding health and safety.

- Within reason ! Cleanliness is huge !
- If owners can meet criteria outlined, yes.
- With proper care and space, there should be no limitations on animals.
- If they are not a nuisance why not.
- urban hens are a great way the city can reduce organics being trucked to the compost facility, provide food security to dedicated, educated people who are passionate about urban homesteading and sustainable lifestyles. To ensure compliance with standards, the city should require people to complete courses, inspections in housing, care and maintenance.
- I believe that hens can be beneficial to the particular individuals who may be keeping them--they fertilize the ground, eat insects, and lay eggs!!!
- I like urban animals if kept responsibly.
- I believe it is the right of a citizen to have appropriate livestock on their property. I do support regulations involving how the animal is sheltered, but believe these regulations should be accommodating and simple while doing the best to ensure animal well-being.
- raising chickens for eggs only, qand in very limited numbers. Ruled by hygiene and noise.
- As long as proper set up and conditions are maintained.
- I would only support this with a ban on chickens in multi-family complexes such as condos, townhomes, etc
- Chickens I think would provide great help, just have to be mindful of coyotes.
- I have no problem with any type of animal being within the city limits as LONG as he/she is loved and well looked after.
- Provided that a reasonable case can be made, little too no nuisance is caused, and the animal is well cared-for people should be able to own animals categorized as livestock.
- I like fresh eggs
- Hens are non-invasive. We have hens in our community which are not heard or smelt.
- balanced human vis-à-vis hen needs is an appropriate starting point.
- hens are not as noisy or messy as people seem to think. However they can attract predators such as coyotes so large fences and/or pens are needed to contain the hens
- As long as neighbors agree and the smells/ noise is kept to a minimum
- I would like to have hens for eggs permitted withing the city
- "It's a food source
- They keep unwanted bugs under control
- A first hand learning experience for children"
- Hens are a great way to start with urban livestock, very easy to manage and make great pets. This would give people a chance to learn about them and help alleviate the misconceptions.
- Hens are much quieter than dogs. They help keep pests like slugs and insects at bay. Their droppings provide a natural fertilizer for the garden. They provide eggs to the community. They also teach our children about where food comes from.

- This could be a good source of local food for the individual or the community provided they are well treated. Hens are also used as a natural agent against bugs in protecti fruit trees such as blueberry bushes
- Only for duck, pigeons, etc. I don't think it should be for larger mammals (i.e. goats, pigs).
- So long as the quality of life of the animal is sufficient and they do not bother neighbors, this is good. Especially if it helps reduce the amount of food/items imported, which causes pollution.
- All animals should be allowed
- Having a few random hens is fine with me, but we need strict laws regarding animal noise/waste/treatment. There should be no more than a few, as in 3-5 max. There should be a requirement that you actually own the property, and that you have an appropriately sized yard. The coop should also not be positioned close to your neighbors property. The last thing I want is a chicken pen/coop up against my kitchen window. It should be placed centrally in the yard.
- Yes because animals/pets need the best caring and treatment they can get.
- However, I wouldn't like to be waken up at 5 in the morning by a rooster...
- If the animals are safe and treated well and it is agreed upon by neighbors, then what's the harm?
- Provided the animals will be kept in a caring, humane manner, the neighbours are ok with it, and by-law will consistently follow-up periodically to ensure animals are being cared for properly.
- As long as living conditions are regulated I have no problem with this
- This seems reasonable although I am not here for this portion.
- Improves community life!
- Livestock animals are wonderful for educational purposes and for mental health! Coming from a farm, livestock animals don't roam much (if properly introduced to the area) and provide a lot for people and communities including field trips for kids, educational purposes, and for volunteers!
- I support all of this other than no approval needed by neighbors. I don't need approval from neighbors to own pigeons, cats, dogs etc. It would be unfair to require this for chickens.
- As long as the animals can be taken care of in the proper way.
- Nutrition.
- There are no drawbacks to urban hens
- Bring it on!
- the law sounds as if it would be fair
- I would love to be able to own a chicken or duck, but don't live on land. If taken care of properly I think we should be able to own any sort of live stock. It is quite common these days.
- This bylaw is sensible to my thinking.
- Our daughter lives in central Auckland, and many neighbours have hens in their backyards, apparently without issue. We support it, as long as there is a reasonable limit on the number of hens in any one yard.
- I think there is a movement towards "grow your own food" and this could be a part of this movement. Very important that neighbors support.
- Everyone else does

- I do not think having chickens on someone's property would be a disturbance to their neighbours. As long as they are not disruptive or offensive by noise or smell, I would support livestock on personal property.
- Only for chickens and no roosters
- I don't see a problem with it. I certainly wouldn't have any issues if my neighbour decided to do so
- I assume the Chief Bylaw Officer will be reasonable in assessing 'suitable living conditions'.
- Chickens are great
- Within reason. If someone wants to have 3 or 4 hens on their property is a very different thing to having 30 or 40. Cleanliness of the coop and smell to neighbors should also be a consideration.
- I would support this as long as the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer has proper training and be knowledgeable about livestock
- We are interested in keeping urban hens
- A limit of 6 - and no crowing roosters! - is tolerable if the birds are cared for properly and kept under control
- As long as there is continued support from all neighbours.
- I especially support hens (for laying eggs).
- I am ok with livestock being in the city, so long as the living environment is the appropriate size and proper measures are taken to keep the animal safe and secure on the homeowners property. Depending on type of animal, a limit per household should be in effect.
- Hens are a great addition and I would be happy to consider other livestock to support families.
- As long as neighbours are consulted - sound, smell would need to be considered
- There would need to be restrictions on the number of animals or birds, etc.
- Smells and noise should be not a nuisance to neighbours - there should be a process to address this.
- If the hen is a pet and not killed for food
- I have no issue with folks enjoying their yards as long as it does not materially impede my enjoyment of mine. The rules being proposed would seem to create that environment.
- It is possible to keep hens in proper living conditions in an urban setting. Also, I support families who are trying to grow and harvest their own food at home.
- I would enjoy hearing hens clucking in the neighborhood but NOT rooster crowing at 4 am. Also would have to keep pens clean to avoid the smell chickens have if not cleaned regularly.
- I think any animal should be allowed to live in urban areas as long as the above criteria are met. There is no need to discriminate based on species, but rather on the impact it has to the community. For example, noisy dogs could have a bigger negative impact on a community compared to a pair of quiet chickens in a backyard.
- I think so long as they aren't a nuisance, smaller livestock should be allowed
- When properly managed and enforced allows people to grow their food at home.
- Why not have chickens as long as they are not a nuisance to neighbours. However many inner city properties have covenants which disallow any farm animals.

- This decision is a tough one. I care for the well-being of the animals and I can see a hoarding situation happening. And who will enforce proper care and yard cleanliness? Nobody enforces bylaw now.
- As long as taken care it appropriately and sound and smell not an issue. There should be a maximum amount allowed
- I think neighbours must be on board as they are indirectly affected.
- I feel support from adjacent neighbors should not be required. I feel that the person must properly take care of their Urban hens and if they are in violation they may lose this right. None had to get approval from their neighbor to get a dog or a cat, so I don't think you should have to get approval for chickens.
- Chickens are great for urban Families
- "Securing sustainable local food is important. Demonstrating proper care or mandatory education should be conditional of ownership of small livestock to ensure its' safety, well being, health, & neighbour relations.
- Hens are quiet, easy to care for, free ranging on property can reduce vectors such as ticks."
- "Food sovereignty for our city is very important urban farming and gardening is a growing and a much needed resource in our communities
- we need to move forward and encourage resilience and responsibility within community
- I believe this would be this would have a very positive impact intertwined into our communities"
- I do support this amendment but also realize that having more livestock in Calgary will increase the bylaw officer's work load.
- Only if animals are in humane conditions
- I think people can responsibly have hens.
- As long as they are respecting their neighbours around the area I don't see the issue with having hens on the property
- Ah long as space allows it.
- If the property is large enough that they have space to move around, but the owners must control the smell as it can be offensive.
- I think that this is a great initiative, as long as people are following bylaws 100%.
- If not an issue for neighbours and community neighbourhood
- Backyard chickens are overdue to be allowed in Calgary. Food security is a human right.
- Neighbor support for this would be essential.
- Yes to urban hens but I have great difficulty imagining other livestock in a neighbours backyard.
- A limited number of hens of 2-3 per family would allow them to get healthy food at lower costs and easy access and also hens are fun to have for young's and adults helping in a great problem today which is mental health.
- The majority of city lots should not support "livestock", but in semi-rural areas of city owned land, the Owner should have the ability to work through the above stated criteria with all (not just adjacent) neighbours.

- If properly cared for, hens are not a nuisance and they can provide sustenance and education to families.
- "Great idea!
- And keep the bee hives allowable."
- Personal Opinion
- Given Calgary's current economic freefall, we honestly need all the side-jobs and produce we can get.
- If the care of the hens is regularly monitored, then theoretically having them would be a positive thing.
- I support responsibly owned pets of any kind
- Proper hen houses and animal enclosures would be appropriate with neighbors approval.
- Food sustainability should be a top priority. The fact that we are not yet allowed is so outdated!
- As long as the animals are being kept in a suitable humane environment, are cared for properly and are not causing problems with the neighbours and community.
- As long as there are not any excessive odors....ie smell like a barn/farm
- Chickens are minimally noticeable, they can easily incorporate into an urban setting without neighbour disruption.
- Consent from neighbours shouldn't be needed. A hen makes as little noise as a dog. I don't need consent from my neighbor for that.
- Food security is so important and should be a top concern for large cities like Calgary, we are faced with low employment and expensive housing we need to support food security.
- Livestock can be safely incorporated into city living with many benefits to society
- Must be kept on site. Neighbour support needed be unanimous; i.e. a single no should not necessarily rule it out if many other neighbours support it. Noise, odor, and pest (insect) control must be maintained. Don't limit it to chickens, allow other critters and even worm farms.
- Sounds reasonable.
- Limits on the number and approval needed from all neighbours at least 4 houses in circumference
- I fully support hens and other livestock being permitted in Calgary. I see this as more beneficial than pets as it offers food security and companionship / connection with other species at the same time. It also empowers people to have access to healthy food without income being a barrier.
- All people should have a right to raise their own food on their own property, providing all the animals needs are met.
- seems fairly comprehensive and reasonable. if the animal is not creating problems for anyone, and indeed a benefit to the owner, why would we want to get in the way of that?
- There are only two choices supplied. I would prefer to answer "Not Sure" but I don't have that choice. Poor construction of the question.
- I think if hens are properly cared for they should be allowed.

- Backyard hens are great, we need to allow people to live on their property as they want. Hens do not disturb surrounding homes people just don't understand yet. We can show them. We should not have neighbours preventing people from approval, they won't understand until they see it.
- As long as it is on their private property and it's not a massive, stinky animal like a cow.
- Hens are an amazing addition to Calgary, what a forward thinking future minded way to support citizens.
- I do not wish to have hens but I fully support and encourage anyone that does, it is a great way to help reduce poverty and support the community.
- there can be benefits to having live stock in a community as long as neighbours agree.
- Rather have a chicken coop next door or Hundreds in the neighbourhood than One pitbull or nuisance dog!
- Would love to have my own eggs. They eat bugs that would destroy vegetables and plants.
- Backyard hens were allowed in Calgary for years and supported families, we need to support food security. Neighbors should not be able to refuse, hens are far less disruptive than dogs. We need to foster good neighbour programs not encourage NIMBY behaviour.
- I grew up on a street in Calgary with chickens, and they were no problem to anyone. If other livestock is not creating a problem, they should be allowed.
- Chickens are so important to food security. I do not feel that neighbours should be able to restrict someone from having them, too many do not understand that it is not intrusive and can be a great community builder. People will need to see how easy it can be incorporated to understand.
- If we had a small number of urban hens this would help with food security and help with controlling insects in our backyard.
- However the housing and general well being of the hens in question must be vetted by a qualified person (vet ?) The city allows urban honeybees; small scale animal husbandry as I see it. Roosters should not be allowed in the bylaw.
- I support backyard chickens
- If guidelines are followed and enforced Hens can bring value to a community
- Smell and noise must be considered. Also, possible a size limit. No horses, cattle or 300 lb pigs.
- The more people can provide for themselves the better... that includes hens kept in yards etc.
- Gone are the days of green grass mowed and watered frequently. Today, and the future are about sustainability: gardens to grow your own food, and hens to help with slug and bug problems, plus provide food as well. Keep neighbours noses out of each other's busy please!
- As long as it is okay with the neighbours and the animals are happy and well cared for.
- Hens can play a crucial role in a self sustaining house hold. It is cost efficient and environmentally safe and friendly.
- why should my neighbour have to support my right?
- Urban agriculture is awesome! If we can have gardens, hens would be lovely.
- I support this, however only with additional funding to Animal Services and Bylaw enforcement, as it would certainly increase their workloads.

- Hens provide a sustainable, local food source. However, they should be subject to the same regulations regarding noise as other animals.
- If my neighbour wants a hen and provides adequate care who am I to judge
- As long as there is suitable living conditions I don't see an issue.
- I think hens should be allowed with a permit.
- Neighbours need to be included. Not many people would like a rooster crowing early in the am
- Urban hens are part of human life environments - I grew up with most of my neighbors keeping chicken for eggs and for meat and it was very educational and beneficial to a healthy society. At least people understand where the food comes from.
- Provided the animals are appropriately cared for and there is no increase in danger to the surrounding residents (i.e. an individual setting up beekeeping adjacent to an individual allergic to bees), personal livestock maintenance is an appropriate step towards self sufficiency.
- Would love to raise my own meat and have fresh eggs each day. would love to have a goat to mow my lawn
- Small and managed well would be the key for me.
- I would say yes to hens but not roosters
- Urban hens have been allowed in other areas to great success. They should be allowed here too.
- As long as the animals are properly cared for and they have a proper living situation, I see no issues with other livestock being allowed in the city.
- Yes-absolutely I support this bylaw. For some people pets are a vital part of their life no matter what it is!
- Definition needs to be developed to allow personal use holding of hens, if it is for a home based business then different criteria should be used for assessment.
- Appears that ALL Neighbors must be satisfied as to Noise, Smell, Etcetera....
- Some can't have "fur" pets due to allergies, and have knowledge of caring for other "farm" pets. This is a fair option if the family can adequately care for the animal.
- i would consider chickens if allowed
- Whatever the animal, adequate food, shelter and attention to well-being should be contingent on ownership. I see no reason why back yard hen houses should not be allowed, as long as extra care is given to the hens ensuring their survival during Calgary winters.
- Yes as long as it is not a business for selling the animals or products produced by the animals.
- All neighbours should have a say and understand how the animal is living, why it living in an urban setting, just like a development notice on the front lawn does for changes to homes. I would be concerned about noise, and smell coming onto my property so would want to have say as we live in very close quarters with our neighbours.
- needs a bylaw and officers to investigate complaints and check on compliance
- Livestock on private property would be acceptable as long as living conditions and any other bylaws are not impacted. Other impacts would include an over abundance of smell or noise, which may be disagreeable to many.

- Long overdue, but can't be left to the "discretion" of the bylaw officer. Evaluated on a case by case basis with criteria that can be flexible to a limited degree.
- There is no reason that chickens etc should not be allowed
- I am very much in favour of properly managed livestock in the city, especially chickens.
- The bylaws should address the factors that affect others: noise, smell, danger, etc... If my pets are not bothersome or dangerous, why should anyone care?
- Responsible ownership is responsible ownership
- It has worked well in other communities.
- People have the right to have livestock if they can do so in a humane way while providing minimal intrusion to neighbours
- If you can manage noise (hens vs roosters) I think its kind of a nice idea
- Provided animals are adequately cared for in an urban environment, producing more food locally is a vitally needed step towards increasing sustainability.
- Again, assume people would/could be responsible/respectful.
- If properly implemented, neighbourhood chickens could be a benefit to the community.
- Have limits on hens, noise level, proximity to neighbors; ensure sanitary and suitable living conditions for the birds.
- As long as suitable winter accommodation provided and licence
- Fabulous idea! This would cut down on dangerous pesticide use!!
- Increased ability to provide for our own food needs leads to stronger communities
- This bylaw would help protect all involved. It only makes sense to protect the animals and hopefully limit "mills" popping up.
- Hens should not require support from neighbours. They make less noise than dogs, are easily contained in a fence (unlike cats).
- I have no problem with this
- As long as the hens are not a nuisance to the neighborhood, noise, smell etc.
- Why not as long as proper care is taken regarding health hazards and possible contamination
- Must have strict restrictions & actionable penalties relating to noise, smell, etc. No roosters allowed, no peacocks etc.
- people should be allowed chickens.
- If they were maintained properly, they would definitely be a benefit for the owner and Could be for the neighbours.
- As long as they do not pose a threat to surrounding humans as a vector for disease AND are not likely to prove a nuisance due to smell, noise, or containment there are gains to be made from bringing back a little bit of what life is about outside of urban centers. It's easier for some people to find comfort in a pet than in 'neighbors' and the learning potential for children is immense.
- If living conditions are not maintained the permit can be revoked.
- Hens can provide comfort for owners
- I support this amendment as long as all rules and regulations can be enforced without delays.

- This would depend on the animals in question and the potential impact on the neighbourhood.
- Hens would be ok, but no roosters please, due to noise
- I see no problem if just a couple of hens.
- "Chickens lay eggs = Food source.
- Chickens create excellent fertilizer.
- Chickens make great pets.
- Chickens help clean your yard.
- Chickens are like a natural garbage disposal.
- Chickens are fairly easy to take care of.
- Chickens help control bugs and weeds naturally."
- I fully support having livestock as long as they are taken care of the way they deserve to be and have all their needs met
- Hens can be a benefit for providing food and a comforting creature.
- Assuming animals are well cared for and don't disturb neighbours (noise, smell, etc) a property resident should be allowed to use their property as they wish.
- Livestock such as chickens, ducks, geese and turkeys could be allowed but with a number cap such as only two. Roosters should not be allowed or any animals that are too noisy or too smelly for neighbours. Then, as they say, "get a farm!"
- As long as they are treated humanely and do not cause issues with neighbours, I support
- We are facing a food shortage and other shortages due to Covid. Our governments overreacting to this concern will leave us without resources. Backyard hens, bees and other resources can only help this issue.
- As long as livestock can abide by the city's bylaws concerning noise, living conditions, or issues over cleanliness and odor, I think they could be a good addition our city. Are beehives considered livestock?
- I think hens cause very little issue and backyard Ben programs thrive in other areas.
- my answer is really ---I don't know. It depends on the size of the animal & how noisy & if it is for therapeutic reasons
- support a small number of hens
- Provided all criteria are met by those wishing to raise them, I have no problem with hens in the city.
- What's the difference between someone raising a few pet rabbits, and someone having a few pigeons or hens? As long as noise, cleanliness and odor are not affecting neighbors and the animal (hens or livestock) is being housed and receiving good care, it shouldn't matter. Admittedly with pigeons, there is more of a risk of impacting neighbors simply because they can fly beyond the confines of their property.
- Noise would have to be part of the amendment. Hens should be OK though.
- "I have no problems w hens.
- Is this considered ""baiting""? Does this attract bobcats, coyotes etc."

- This is something a lot of Calgarians want and offers great value to the community. Goats would also be a great addition.
- YAY! I miss this so much! Growing up in BC I had a small group of 4 and had all the eggs all year round. They should require a license to legally have that required proper living conditions and cleaning and vet routines. The last thing we need is another Turk RIP.
- I feel that if the livestock is well taken care of and the owners clean up after the animal then there shouldn't be a problem with them having the animal.
- I would like Hens
- would love permission to keep chickens
- I believe this will benefit the community in many ways, and allows novel education of urban children. However, noise and smell pollution affecting neighbours must be considered carefully. Also, how much space is needed per animal, and this needs to be carefully monitored. Too small a space will cause more problems for the animals and neighbours. I feel that goats used by the city to control weeds also needs to be more widespread, with a view to ending the use of pesticides completely
- Would love to be able to get fresh eggs from the neighbourhood.
- As long as the animals don't pose a problem for neighbours and the property is large enough to support the animals and the people can afford to look after the animals, I would support the bylaw.
- I would love to have a couple of hens! No roosters though as they are far too noisy.
- Food prices going up. Increased food security for many households. Many calgarians losing their jobs. Global food supply chain disruptions an increasing concern. Those that can raise their own hens and grow their own food will reduce the current strain on own food supply system.
- I support livestock on personal Property as long as the property size supports the type and size of livestock.
- As long a roosters are prohibited
- However, I am concerned about noise. IE Roosters crowing at all hours of the day. Additionally if people are raising livestock in the city, are they processing these animals (killing them and disposal of remains)? I would also be concerned about the smell of chickens and other livestock.
- Hens, and other reasonably sized livestock, if cared for properly, and kept clean, can be of significant benefit to the community, both through tangible and non tangible effects, including mental health.
- Chickens and goats are beneficial.
- With limitations. We do not want commercial operations in backyards. Perhaps "less than ten" birds, or something similar.
- Why not, this is quite common in other parts of the country and world
- I think small amounts of small livestock can be accommodated without concerns.
- As long as ok with neighbors and suitable conditions
- Love the idea of sustainable living, great for the community and children, fully support this!
- Roosters...no. Don't need crowing at sunrise
- Chickens or other domestic animals should only be permitted where they can be appropriately housed and do not create an issue such as noise or excrement or property damage for neighbours.

- It's very important to inform the neighbors.
- I think a lot of thought should go into this...maybe community Hens .
- The Calgary Stampede, U of C Veterinary program, Butterfield Acres, all of the rural properties annexed into the City of Calgary...etc. may all have livestock. The noise and healthy conditions of keeping livestock need to be enhanced by this bylaw so that manure, cleanliness and best practices for keeping livestock are defined and enforceable. The standards for care and maintenance need to be defined.
- Goats and pigs are cute, but support from adjacent neighbours is essential before introducing these smelly animals to a backyard.
- My main concerns would be mess, smell and noise. If an enclosure can be kept clean, and as smell-free as possible, in addition to keeping noise at a minimum between 7am and 8pm.
- Responsible hen and other animal ownership and to provide suitable conditions for these animals.
- benefit--limit the numbers
- Only if people had a large enough back yard to accommodate livestock.
- As long as there are no roosters I don't see an issue with a limited number of hens in Urban back yards.
- Obviously having livestock on private property within the City Limits would need to be governed properly and closely, but other Municipalities have made this work. Many Calgarians are returning to being partially self-sustaining with gardens. Perhaps this could be encouraged with laying hens. In fact, maybe some could own goats to deal with nuisance weeds on their properties as well - reducing the use of electric and gas mowers that are noisy and produce green house gas emissions.
- I would support this only if the animals were being properly cared for and not attracting pests due to availability of feed. For example, backyard chickens have been known to attract rats in some urban areas.
- Overall, I do support this idea. However I think "livestock" should be defined; there should be limits set as to how many would be allowed per household; there should be bylaws regarding the type of housing "livestock" would require; there should be some sort of licensing
- As long as neighbours are in agreement, and conditions for the hens are inspected to ensure they are good for the hens, it should be fine.
- If the animal can be cared for properly and is not disruptive to neighbours, I see no issue.
- I like the idea of appropriately considered livestock in Calgary in appropriate private residence scenarios with the unconditional support of adjacent neighbors
- No concerns as long as basic cleanliness and security protocols are followed to minimize predator draw.
- Subject to appropriate conditions as noted above, I support urban hens.
- I see no problem with people owning farm pets as long as they are being kept responsibly and not harming anyone else.
- As long as its within the rules and reason and it's a nuisance to neighbors, I dont see why not.
- Anyone with sufficient land to support a few domestic animals in a peaceful manner should be allowed the opportunity.

- I think that this could work if the right conditions were imposed and there was support for it from neighbours. It would meet a food need and a human one.
- There is a benefit to having urban hens in communities.
- Other animals should be allowed for mental health.
- The potential for community programs/enrichment programs is great here. The safety and well-being of all involved (animal and human) would need to be the main focus, however.
- Hens clean the yard and eat lots of insects.
- Good to be respectful to neighbours while allowing the possibly of the meeting the owners desires.
- I like the idea of having my own chickens and bees
- Hens should be permitted within city limits- weed/pest control, sustainable living and well-being of those who care for them are all reasons for.
- I am into local, healthy food and the best can come from your own backyard. The ability to have chickens would be amazing
- i would love 2 or 3 hens for my garden and eggs.
- Hens would be amazing as long as they were looked after properly. Eggs for everyone!
- A mix of biodiversity helps the planet and people.
- Yard chickens are awesome, eggs are great, they provide pest control, they are so quiet!! They are excellent all around animals.
- Urban chickens provide more value than pets that are already allowed and are less or equally disruptive (ie barking dogs are more of a nuisance)
- There should be a limit on the amount of hens allowed per size of property.
- As long as the animals are not annoying the neighborhood or attracting other wildlife I think it is ok
- This should only be allowed if the animals are rescues and not being used for food.
- Neighbour support should not be a requirement. Individual property owners have landowner rights and neighbours should not be entitled to veto or decide what landowners are permitted to have on their property. I agree with the other criteria listed (except neighbour support). Having said that, neighbors could be informed but should not have any weight on the decision. This idea of neighbour support can result in “complainers” getting their way.
- I support urban hens as it allows people living in the city to be more self sustaining.
- Animal conditions are very important and I think a critical point of enforcement to make this change a long term success.
- This would have to be strictly monitored to prevent ANY harm coming to the chicken. Also, the smell from a poorly kept coop could be problematic.
- If it harms none, what's the problem? Chickens have been shown to express emotion and make wonderful pets. Same as goats.
- Limit the number to two (2) hens per household.
- I have no problems with any animals as long as the owners are responsible.
- Its private property, unless thier livestock is disturbing the peace it isnt right to dictate thier rights to responsible ownership

- Chickens are wonderful animals that make great livestock and pets, and can provide much-needed sources of ethical protein through egg and meat production. Divesting from factory-farmed egg and poultry production also lowers COVID-19 exposure risks for workers in meat production.
- As long as its noise level is treated like other loud animals (dogs), and they have fencing capable of keeping them in the property, I see no reason why no. Mess with these animals can be toxic and easily spread
- yes, yes, yes to this enhancement
- With in reason. Downtown City living is not Country Living. Meaning. You need to have proper space and accommodation so to speak. Animals need to be in the Country. Cows chickens pigs etc..Lets be smart here.
- Avoiding noise related nuisance is key (e.g. early morning rooster noises)
- More urban livestock and farming/gardening should be encouraged for food sustainability
- Can be a source of food and a hobby that can help alleviate mental issues
- People have the space & ability to look after animals like miniature horses/donkeys/pigs etc. Not everyone wants just a cat or dog
- Need to restrict number of hens/animals and have a good escalation process for neighbours that have issues.
- If the animal and the neibours are all benefiting there is no issues in my opinion.
- Only hens
- As long as the negative aspects are controlled, i.e., smell, noise, look of the property, and doesn't affect house prices.
- If it's not bothering the neighbours, I don't see why someone wouldn't be able to care for them.
- On the conditions that owners would need full approval of all surrounding neighbours, there would be strict control over any nuisances (noise, smell, etc.), cleanliness of habitats, quantities of animals, and that all sites would need to registered with the City.
- As long as bylaw is strictly nforced
- It's 100% about the well being of the animal. As long as the animal is well taken care of and not in crowded, cramped, and dire conditions then, yes.
- Provided there's room and in the yard and the owner provides adequate shelter this would be a sustainable way of proving food to ppl.
- Hens or livestock could not make any noise, smell or danger to anyone in the neighbourhood.
- I hear more and more positive experiences with people raising hens and I think it can be a good thing.
- Hens for eggs but not for slaughter
- Urban hens are a great idea! However, just like any pet proper research and care needs to go into them.
- Carefully granting permission for backyard hens would be a good way to go.
- Great for community
- I would especially support having urban hens since they provide a beneficial food source of eggs.

- I would support the amendment based on the type of animal. Some people have pet pigs which are very similar to dogs. I'm ok with this. I'm not sure I would be thrilled with a crowing rooster throughout the night. Also, there should be requirements on daily cleaning up of fecal matter, so the property does not resemble or smell like a barnyard.
- Other communities successfully have allowed hens in urban settings and Calgary should too.
- as long as it doesn't cause too much noise (ie roosters), or affect adjacent property. I would not support keeping pigeons or other birds that can fly
- Having chickens kept in tandem with community garden or school garden would promote healthy outdoor schooling opportunities. Plus I have a larger (almost 1acre) lot and would love to have a couple chickens for household needs. Or community!
- Provided the animal has enough space and is properly being cared for then I don't see why people can't own the animal on their property. I come from a small rural town being living in Calgary where my neighbors were an auction mart the smell for 1 or 2 livestock is not going to cause a problem if its being cleaned up after like a responsible owner would have to do anyways.
- Limit number of hens but I don't mind a few
- I believe that having properly kept livestock enriches the community
- As long as the animals are properly housed/cared for, smaller than a large dog, limited in number, and they do not disturb the neighbors then I think people should be able to have hens for eggs or other animals considered "livestock" as pets.
- a couple of hens would be great.
- As long as the animal isn't going to negatively affect neighbours (ie a rooster crowing at 5am etc...)
- This amendment is long overdue and I support most of the criteria above with the exception of support from adjacent neighbors. We've been dealing with blatant discrimination from ours for years, it's highly unlikely we're the only ones and it takes little imagination to see this as another way for people to continue such behavior. However, in a rental situation the landlord would need to supply consent
- "Having chickens is an important aspect to food security. With economic insecurity on the rise, a simple alleviating measure the city can take is to allow people to have a consistent source of eggs.
- Calgary is a uniquely situated community to responsibly raise other livestock as well as chickens due to the strong rural connections and farming backgrounds of many Calgarians."
- Not every situation is black & white. Sometimes there needs to be discretion.
- I support the overall bylaw amendment, but I don't think permission to have chickens should rest with the neighbours. I don't think neighbours necessarily need to have a say on whether or I should be allowed to have chickens but I do think ALL pet owners need to be mindful of their pets' impact on their neighbours and their community. Chickens are a very quiet, low impact animal, and are much less of a nuisance than many barking dogs. And my neighbours who have dogs don't have to seek my approval before getting a dog - so I think this is an unnecessary bureaucratic hurdle.
- It would have to have little impact on neighbours much like having a dog or cat next door.

- In my neighbourhood, there is a lady with support chickens. She provides excellent care for them, and they improve her quality of life. Everyone should have the same opportunity - with proof, on a case-by-case basis.
- As long as there are a clear set of rules and the animal owner is following those rules
- No roosters. Just hens to produce eggs.
- This is a great idea provided the talking points above are followed.
- I'd love to see urban small-scale farming
- chickens are relatively quiet and I don't see any harm in having them around. As long as they are well taken care of.
- I think this needs to be on a case by case criteria
- I am fine with urban hens as long as there is a cap to the number that can be kept, as well as the size of the yard and proximity to other houses they are.
- It would be great for people to be able to source eggs from their own chickens that they know are treated humanely as opposed to from battery hen operations. However, I think there needs to be a pilot project. The Montreal SPCA has recently been inundated with abused and abandoned chickens, so I think we need to proceed with caution. In terms of other livestock, I think there should be discretion to grant exceptions in extremely limited circumstances where it is absolutely clear that the people seeking the exception have the means to adequately care for the animal. I would suspect that this would be rare and would be concerned that trendy pet livestock (such as "teacup" pigs) would be at risk of being quickly abandoned in many cases.
- I agree provides that there is a limit and there is adequate cleaning of waste. It doesn't smell up the neighbourhood.
- Domesticated livestock is not very different from a cat, dog or other more typical "pet like" animal.
- I am for urban chickens.
- So long as there's a good system in place to insure proper treatment of the animals, why not give people the means to provide for themselves and community members?
- "As long as the owners great the animals in a humane way.
- Which is why I believe would occur with animals raised at home. Inspections should be made mandatory."
- No explanation needed, all around YES. I want to rescue chickens and have a pet pig!!
- Noise and smell have to be acceptable to nearby neighbors; animal has to be well cared for.
- Neighbours should not be inconvenienced by livestock
- Hens help to keep bugs down and weeds but, I don't think it would be wise to have a rooster included in that.
- I support this because it encourages local food sources / community markets
- Keeping backyard chickens allows you to become a food producer and not just a consumer. In addition to fresh eggs, there are a lot of benefits to keeping chickens in an urban setting.
- I am in support of livestock in Calgary as long as it doesn't impact neighbours (noise, smell, etc), attract unwanted predators, and ensures that the animals are well cared for.
- As long as it is done responsibly then no problem

- Make allowable on applicant basis, case by case investigation, with decision at the discretion of the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer.
- Currently a resident can have a large number of dogs, typically causing a nuisance in the neighbourhood with barking, greater chance and frequency of feces left in public areas etc. Hens are quite, and don't leave the property. Likewise goats, sheep, miniature horses etc. Unlikely to attack and bite anyone. Why do dogs get such latitude?
- As long as the hens are properly cared for and they do not become an issue for neighbours, I don't see this being a problem.
- I'm in support of small collections of non-destructive livestock. For example, 2-3 hens (NO roosters!) in a back yard would not do damage to the neighbor's property. However, goats are known escape artists and I would not support city goats. The potential for damage to a neighbour's yard, as goats eat everything, is high.
- As long as owners are providing proper care and Suitable living conditions for hens ... maybe making owners apply for proper licensing to prove that they are willing to provide proper care as suitable living in order to have hens on the property
- There are huge benefits to allowing city dwellers to become more self sustainable by providing more of their own food sources. It's important that the animals aren't a nuisance to neighbours and are kept in a safe, clean environment.
- If someone wants to have a couple chickens and has the ability to maintain a clean space so that the smell does not affect their neighbours and the health of the animals is number one, then I support this. If people are lazy and just want to have fresh eggs but do not want the responsibility of cleaning and maintaining that I do not support this. Also no roosters! Too loud!
- "The cost of living is getting greater and greater, so anyway some can offset the cost by growing or raising at home is a benefit to lessening the stress of the community. Having said that, if you choose to get hens for egg laying, then you must take a course (in person preferably). Where an expert will show you different hen house models, cleaning, caring etc. Once you have taken the course then you can get your licence to have hens.
- This should really be the same for dogs! Even basic dog training should be required within 6 months of getting a dog, or your licence cost increases."
- People should be entitled to keep any animals they see fit and can reasonably provide a good life for.
- As long as animals are housed properly and they are used for proper means I think it would be ok. I don't know enough about livestock in urban areas unfortunately to provide a better answer. It might be necessary to check on these homes and animals
- One household keeping hens, or other livestock, can impact multiple, adjacent, households with issues that include: sanitary conditions, potential for viral/bacterial outbreaks, noise. Any consideration of keeping livestock within the city would have to be accompanied by strict bylaws concerning the health of livestock, livestock living conditions, licensing, and the opportunity for input from adjacent neighbours before a license is provided.
- Hens are not a nuisance to neighbours

- I would love to see urban hens and other livestock within Calgary
- as long as the hens have a good environment I see no problem with it.
- Other big cities like Edmonton and Vancouver have legalized urban hens, so Calgary can use them as models to form our own livestock bylaws.
- Having hens would be beneficial to low income people to access food
- Hens only. Absolutely no roosters. For those of us with allergies, only small numbers of hens should be allowed.
- As long as rules are being followed, I don't see why not.
- if the neighbours are OK with chickens and precautions are taken to discourage wild predators raising a few chickens seems ok
- So long as the animals are being well kept and healthy, and are not causing a nuisance for the owners neighbours, and the property is kept clean then I believe having small urban "farms" would be great community benefit.
- It makes sense for more of us to grow food.
- If the animal is well taken care of and not a nuisance why not.
- I think case by case is wise. Not every home or set up is the same.
- It would be nice for family's to collect their own eggs.
- Raising your own livestock is a healthier lifestyle and I support local food
- hens are a great addition to the house for supplying eggs, eating organic waste, and for the yard
- As long as they follow the guidelines outlined
- I support urban hens. Maybe just have rules about how many hens people can have so it's not too loud.
- provided there is a limit in how many hens can be on any one property.
- No explanation needed
- If hens can be kept in clean environment, sure.
- Case by case. We are more concerned about chickens than miniature goats for example.
- As long as proper living conditions can be created, it should be up to each individual what kind of animals they wish to own.
- Why not
- Because livestock are animals and have rights too.
- As long as the livestock isn't causing a major inconvenience or hazard to the neighbours they should be absolutely allowed. Allowing residents to raise their own food is a good way to make the city more sustainable.
- We have raised egg laying hens outside of the city limits in recent years as well as in Calgary before livestock became prohibited in early 2000's. Several noteworthy positives were a result, in particular positive interest of the community, especially by children, who within the city limits have little exposure of where food comes from. Neighbours were delighted with fresh eggs when offered to them and we became more connected to them due to the chickens being a point of interest and a topic of discussion. Neighbours made a point of stopping by to chat when walking by. It also created a greater interest in responsible food production because our chickens had significantly more space than the majority of store bought eggs. It created an appreciation of responsible food production and added to a connected community.

- I agree with the criteria as outlined.
- I see no reason that responsible and ethical ownership of small livestock can't be integrated into the community as long as there is no tangible impact on neighbours. (noise, smell etc..)
- As long as people are taking care of the animals and it doesn't start to smell i would be fine with it
- Having hens in an urban yard is a fantastic idea. It builds community and provides eggs for families. No harm to this. Crazy rule that is in place and I don't have and would never have hens - so I am speaking as a neighbor who would be totally thrilled if my neighbors had hens.
- IMHO - this enriches the experience of living in a neighbourhood. I grew up in a "rural/urban" setting, and we were the lucky recipients of their labour!
- allow reasonable freedom to do as like on own property
- I would like sheep to cut my grass. It would reduce the clippings that require to be picked up
- As long as the animals are housed appropriately and do not bother neighbors (noise or smell) I am fine with other animals in the city.
- "I have personally experienced having neighbours with urban hens.
- They followed all the rules and it was a nice experience to have them in the neighbourhood."
- I support quiet egg laying livestock but not livestock that would be killed for food. I do not support roosters.
- Fully supportive
- Fully support chicken coops.
- Support as mentioned in criteria and have limits to the number and types of animals. Odour management, cleanliness
- I strongly agree that urban hens would have a great benefit. However I believe that the limit should be lowered to 2-4.
- I shouldn't have to move out of the city to be slug sufficient when it comes to feeding myself.
- This idea makes sense environmentally and provides an educational opportunity for young and old alike.
- As long as there is enforcement and make the owners responsible.
- As long as the criteria are met
- As long as people follow the rules, I think it is a great idea
- Backyard hens were a part of Calgary since inception, many families relied on this to support food supplies in their homes. It is only recent that people became disengaged with the food system and it is very harmful. We need to support a healthy understanding of the food chain and allow families to create anti-fragile systems. This would support community engagement and anti poverty initiatives. We have a future with uncertainty, we need a city that supports initiatives that help to create food security.
- Support from adjacent neighbours is crucial for all livestock including chickens. If support is not given then the permit should be refused.

- As long as people can care for the animals and not disrupt the neighbourhood, people should be granted the responsibility to take care of these animals.
- On the condition that the livestock owners' rights to enjoy their animals doesn't impinge on the neighbours: odour, noise or safety
- There should be a restriction depending on property size and if cleanliness is not maintained they would lose the privilege. (chickens are pretty stinky)
- Sustainable lifestyles are a good thing, let people raise their own micro agriculture
- There must be a positive impact from alternative animals.
- I think it should be treated similarly to a building permit
- Urban agriculture is important for many reasons.
- Food security is an issue for some Calgarians; as long as owners are responsible, raising hens can help this issue.
- Proper housing and husbandry are my main concerns who inspects this? Housing needs to be predator proof and feeding method pest proof (they cost more but pest proof feeders exist). Fly control, traps etc. This is important as pests and predators are attracted by hens and could ruin home enjoyment of neighbours too.
- Having animals other than your typical cats/dogs would be beneficial as far as food (ie eggs) and education for children
- Chickens are a great source of fresh eggs and poultry, especially for lower income families.
- I think it could be a positive experience for children learning to care for them, and like a garden, gathering eggs is a good food source. The smell can get quite bad quickly, and if conditions are found unclean, the city must revoke the privilege. I would like to see a more stringent application of dog feces in back yards as well.
- Only with support from adjacent neighbours!
- It would depend on the type of livestock and how large the lots are.
- A limited number of hens per household should be fine in the city. They don't generate noise, but if there should be straight enforcement to allow by-law officers to enter to count the number of hens if there is a complaint.
- If anything, we need now more than ever to support local food production.
- I can see no downside based on the criteria listed above.
- Not offended by this bylaw
- Depending on conditions. But if done correctly, chickens would be a lovely addition to some families.
- I believe people with their own property can decide what to do with it under certain conditions as were listed.
- I strongly support urban hens and community education around this.
- Food security, local food, there is a pandemic for heaven's sake please let people feed themselves
- I would love more hens in Calgary!
- Backyard hens would be a fantastic opportunity for communities.
- Hens can make wonderful pets. Fresh eggs could help many families too.

- Hens are fine, they can help us eat
- As long as they are not a nuisance to anyone else then yes I support this.
- I like these ideas.
- Chickens are awesome
- There should be a maximum capacity per unit of open land for livestock types (including for combined livestock) as determined in accordance with federal (?) agriculture standards, adjusted downward for urban livestock
- I agree that it would have a positive community impact!
- If supported by adjacent neighbours and securely restricted to the property
- Hens have a positive effect on people within the city.
- I grew up where chickens were allowed so it seems normal and natural to me.
- Don't see the harm
- Female chickens are fine.
- I believe there is no harm to hens on private property, assuming clean conditions are maintained, and there is no disturbance to neighbors.
- If home owners can have homing pigeons then why not hens?
- Definitely believe that animals, including livestock, are important for people with mental health, a which would apply to this scenario.
- I do not see an issue with an appropriately cared for animal, even small livestock. I do not feel large livestock should be included - nothing larger than a goat.
- There is great value in people connecting with livestock; we have become so urban and removed from animals and the land, that increasing access to these creatures would provide lessons and value. In addition, people's property is theirs to do with as they please, provided it doesn't harm others or the animal. Therefore, finding ways to expand what people can do on their property is important.
- The noise is the primary issue, but if that can be discussed with adjacent houses or properties and the solution is reasonable, people should be able to do this.
- It would be based on proper facilities of the livestock and no negative impact of the neighbouring residences
- Not all livestock would be problems to neighbors.
- I support urban hens and other potential livestock that would have a community benefit, such as goats.
- Chickens are way less of a menace than dogs.
- People can grow their own food but not every yard is a good space for rearing hens
- As long as they are being taken care of I'm for it
- I think as long as they are taken care of well and they have a suitable living space and that they won't disturb any other people.
- I agree with this as long as people have the proper housing and space and neighbors are consenting with noise etc.

- Owning hens has tremendous benefits in an urban setting, including food security, educational implications to children, sustainability and emotional wellbeing.
- If the neighbours agree, then, sure.
- Absolutely should be permitted. Nuisance issues regarding neighbours are moot - there will always be irritations in a community, so if they have problems with a few animals next door, they ought not live around other people.
- Not everyone can have the usual pet but still needs the companionship.
- There is a lot of interest in urban hens but they must not be allowed to negatively impact neighbours (smell, noise, predators)
- Yes to hens. Curious as to what other livestock you have in mind?
- If done responsibly, there is no difference between "livestock" animals and domestic pets
- I dont have a problem with people having hens or small livestock. They should be subject to the same rules as pets (eg fines for being too loud or attacking people) and there should also be bylaws governing cleanliness (eg cannot have excessive manure or smells that affect neighbors)
- It doesn't really matter what someone wants to do with their yard, so long as it's safe and sane.
- many people are returning to rural practices. The concern would be if they are a nuisance and if our climate is feasible
- I feel that people should be allowed to do this if it is okay with their neighbours. The welfare of the animals involved should come first in terms of their needs being met by the proposed environment and owner.
- The owner has to be responsible regarding their livestock for example be held responsible to engage in maintain cleanliness and order in their neighborhood without exception (no chicken / its feces in neighbor's backyard or on the street or public space) and there is limitation of minimum available space to rise livestock (fenced yard, not allowed in condominium / apartment / in confined space building, location of the animal cage the farthest from neighbor's property)
- I wanna farm chicken eggs. Also they cute.
- Some people are narrow minded and would not like to allow chickens, however, if it can be shown the person who wants them will be responsible and provide excellent care, maintenance and living conditions, they should be allowed to have them. In addition, if an owner is EVER reported to not maintaining their coops property (constant odour, noise that bothers neighbors, etc.) they should have the privilege of owning chickens taken away. No exceptions!
- This is a fantastic idea
- As long as an animal is appropriately cared for it doesn't matter the location.
- The approval of adjacent neighbours is key and should be in writing due to noise, smell, etc.. Also, should be some limits on number of animals (e.g. no more than 5 hens, etc.) as well as total number of animals on the property (including dogs, cats, etc.).
- Urban hens and other livestock is a great way to collect a simple food indigents and save the family money.
- Why not
- why not. If area is keep clean and no harm comes to the animal.

- I.e chickens
- but no wild animals - only those habitually kept such as by farmers. NO VENOMOUS SNAKES. Or no snakes at all.
- I agree with your criteria for other livestock.
- Good with that
- As long as it's not a nuisance, e.g., excessive feces.
- As long as there is a restriction on the number. Fresh eggs and bug control is always a benefit.
- As long as your neighbours are ok with it
- I have no concerns with animals in the city provided no undue deterioration of quality of life for neighbours.
- I have owned laying hens in the city for 4 plus decades, never had a complaint, only people asking for extra eggs
- Great way to teach kids about animals other than dogs or cats.
- As with any pet or animal being taken care of, as long as the conditions are suitable keeping livestock or other animals that benefit people would be an important step forward
- Each case needs to be addressed on it's circumstance.
- As long as the city follows-up at regular intervals to ensure the comfort of the livestock as well as the neighbours, to ensure that the livestock owner is not allowing standard-of-living to diminish for either their animals or their neighbours around them. This would include cleanliness of the area, smell, and noise.
- I think those conditions should provide an adequate framework.
- As long as the owner is properly informed on how to take care of the animal, and the hen becoming urban doesn't negatively effect its conditioning, than I support it.
- I fully support having backyard chickens. I think it's good for the environment, it's good for children and all people to learn where their food comes from. I think it's an important part of food management and is it benefit to all society.
- There must be a guidelines around the effect adjacent Neighbour's can have. One bad/overbearing Neighbour can be a problem for pet and livestock owners if they (the human) is not controlled or limited
- Hens are not well understood and are less disruptive than dogs. Families should have the ability to provide food and companionship.
- All for allowing hens.
- I see no problem with keeping a few chickens for eggs
- If agreement can be reached between the owner and the neighbors then anyone objecting should mind their own business.
- Support allowing urban hens
- There are plenty of different types of livestock that can be pets.

- I do not agree with support of neighbors being needed. As long as the animal is not a nuisance this should not be required and if it is a nuisance it should not be permitted. A few hens is not an issue as long as kept clean, a rooster on the other hand will be a nuisance each and every morning!
- Limited number but hens should be allowed if neighbours support or are not nearby
- The criteria all sound good!
- I think this is a great idea as long as participants have a license (small one time fee?)
- As long as neighbours are in support and there is no offensive noise or smell associated with the hens or livestock, and the property and surrounding community isn't visually negatively impacted by the presence of the hens or livestock and the structures needed to house them.
- Need a large enough yard and proper structure.
- Permit and permission from neighbours required.
- If the neighbours are in support, the living conditions are suitable, and cleaning/waste issues are dealt with, why would we not allow other livestock.
- If the neighbours agree and if the animals cause no NOISE issues or impact their neighbours in other ways. I have stayed in places where they have chickens and I do NOT appreciate a 5 a.m. cockadoodledo wake-up, and again at 5:05 and 5:10 and so on. The chickens did not bother me otherwise.
- As long as they're well cared for and not bothering the neighbors....it's all good.
- Livestock should not be in Calgary. Ridiculous!
- As long as the livestock are given good living conditions, access to ample necessities and the owners can afford veterinary care and a high quality of life.
- But please address noise and smells from chicken coops, especially downwind on windy/rainy days. Limits to number of chickens owned. Ability to address nuisance owners.
- I support it as long as long as odour management and is part of a condition.
- As long as the livestock cannot cause grief of ANY kind to neighbours, and it is contained in a humane way.
- Only if all criteria are met. Constantly cleaning and waste disposal requirements must be delineated too. Noise requirements must be delineated too.
- It would need to be regulated so that parasite and bug infestation does not occur.
- If they are properly cared for, there is no reason not to allow urban hens.
- What does everything in this city take 20+ years to come to fruition? I've been hearing about urban chickens for 23 years. I will be retired and living in another country before Calgary can make a chicken decision. Many other cities made the decision and their citizens have had urban chickens for decades. Calgary is still discussing it. Heavy sigh.
- I fully support keeping of livestock type animals so long as they are cared for and the yard is suitably sized to accommodate the animal.
- Meet some residents needs.
- They're just as, if not more, useful than companion animals. There's no real reason why Calgarians shouldn't be allowed to keep smaller livestock. Whether it's smell or noise concerns, those things happen with dogs.

- Let people have chickens
- If adjacent neighbours agree, living conditions for the animal are suitable then yes.
- As long as the animals are taken care of properly (limit the number of animals, appropriate space and shelter), the noise is minimal and the owners have taken the proper courses to take of the animals, I see no issue
- Keeping some fowl is reasonable if living conditions are kept high, and an enclosed roost is provided to reduce noise.
- I think with some careful regulation people could keep chickens
- all animals are equal
- Hens are cool. Fresh eggs? I'm all for it.
- It is important to get the support and feedback from the neighbors as they could be impacted from livestock either due to allergies or other ailments.
- I think small livestock should be allowed, providing they do not cause any noise problems or bad smells to neighbors.
- People should be free to keep whatever pets they wish to, as long as the pets, whatever species they might be, are not a danger to the community.
- I feel it's a positive move forward.
- I am extremely supportive of any initiative that allows for those living and working within the city to grow and produce their own food. Livestock plays a hugely important role in organic and self-sustaining growing systems and it makes total sense to allow it in the city, especially chickens. This could be a great way to help Calgarians survive rougher times a little more easily, if they are able to access locally grown, affordable protein like eggs.
- This will help healthy living, of to standard. No broad stroke of a good owner, and a "bad" owner.
- Any animal should be allowed if it is cared for properly and does not cause problems with the neighbours. This includes dogs and other 'pet' animals which often are smelly
- If everyone around is ok with it why not. NO BALCONY COOP
- I didn't realize chickens were illegal in Calgary as I used to live near people who had them.
- I think it depends on the livestock and the neighbour hood
- Allowing hens will not negatively impact most homes and will allow for sustainable urban farming
- As long as animal welfare is maintained - urban farming is great
- Helps families to provide for their families
- Regular routine visits from an official should be required.
- I would 100% expect there to be community/neighbor involvement, given the likely noise and smell concerns.
- If these Listed criteria are met, I can see no reason why a persons wish to raise such livestock should be denied
- I think it's incredibly important to have more hens in the city to provide food (eggs and meat) locally to families willing to put in the work and effort to raise them responsibly.
- live stock can be loud, and smelly. I think its good for community centres with a large property.

- as long as they are not disruptive to neighbours and there are suitable living conditions im all for it
 - I am all for urban hens with proper living conditions available and responsible ownership. I'm not sure what "support from adjacent neighbours" requires and I feel that some potential owners may be cock-blocked (HAHAHAH, sorry I couldn't resist) by neighbours they don't know or perhaps are not on friendly terms with. Also, how would this be handled with regards to renters, both as potential owners and/or as neighbours?
 - Hens would be fantastic as they are not noisy
 - Urban livestock is fine as long as the quality of life for the animal is acceptable and adjacent neighbours are in agreement.
 - De-emphasize neighbour support. Some neighbours object to everything. Detail the neighbours non support.
 - These animals have huge benefits for owners. I find livestock/poultry to be much more calming and far-less of a nuisance than dogs everywhere. We would love to have hens to help provide nutrient-dense food stability for our family as well.
 - I completely agree with urban livestock if done with the most humane treatment and as long as it is not a disturbance to others.
 - Yes, I believe there can be a lot of community benefit from supporting urban livestock
 - I think keeping hens would be beneficial for some people, as long as roosters are not allowed to be kept in residential areas.
 - YES TO HENS!
 - I think small live stock such as chickens should be allowed in the city for sustainable food production
 - Especially with support of neighbors
 - Hens and other animals are great support animals
 - "I keep bees in Calgary and have an extensive vegetable garden in the yard and have found both to be immensely beneficial for community building and engagement with neighbours. It seems to me in post-covid times its pretty difficult to argue against people's right to produce their own food and increase food resilience.
- I work on a small mixed farm outside of Calgary where we keep chickens and I can attest that chicken's needs are reasonably easy to meet and anyone capable of responsibly keeping a dog in the city is capable of responsibly keeping chickens in town."
 - I have owned hens in the past and enjoyed having them.
 - As long as the animal does not become a nuisance no problem
 - As long as there is no noise or smell or annoyance of livestock
 - I feel it should only be for home owners and not renters.
 - I used to have a pet pig that monitored my heart condition
 - as long as animals aren't a nuisance what is the difference between someone owning a large dog like a St. Bernard and say a pig or a goat?

- I believe the criteria set is appropriate
- I would support neighbors having chickens.
- Hens only and only with ongoing support of neighbors.
- Could be beneficial as long as there are limits on how many there are on a property, acceptable living conditions being provided for the animals
- I think there should be licensing required for any urban livestock and this would include testing of knowledge and/or mandatory education. I think follow-up inspections should also be considered.
- This is a fair way to deal with the requests
- I want backyard chickens and I am a responsible pet owner.
- I like chickens and they would be a good food source (eggs) for low income families
- As long as the animals are not noisy and the property is being kept clean and free of offensive doors to neighbours it should be allowed.
- Support in theory as long as owners are responsible & considerate
- Private individuals should be allowed to do on their property as they please as long as their actions do not affect their neighbours or the outlying community.
- Hens and small livestock are no different then owning a pet.
- I do not see an issue
- Chickens in, hens do not make a lot of noise and neither do goats
- so long as conditions for approval/removal included (as above), and perhaps mandatory training of how to properly care for the specific animal
- I absolutely think Calgary should allow hens and other livestock if adequate and comfortable living conditions are met and the health and well-being of the animals is maintained. I think Calgary is behind the times and needs to catch up on this!!
- I think people should be able to have chickens, ducks, and geese for eggs but also as pest control.
- I think this would be a benefit to all to allow livestock in appropriate locations.
- Suitable living conditions must be evaluated by bylaw prior to approving. Support from adjacent neighbours also needs to be documented.
- As long as I didn't smell them while sitting in my backyard I'm fine with it. Chicken coups can get dirty and stink if not taken care of. Would Animal Services/Bylaw check in on these barnyard animals for quality of care? Are they Licensed to have them ?
- As long as this has a positive impact to the community and the animals are living in good condition and this does not pose a sanitary threat to the community.
- We should be able to raise chickens in our yard. Food security
- I have no objections provided that the welfare of the animal is ensured and neighbours do not object.
- I love the idea of urban agriculture as a way to educate and increase stewardship of our relation to nature and animals
- If someone can meet all the required needs of a domesticated animal (suitable space, shelter, can meet their social needs, etc.) then why shouldn't they be allowed to have whatever animal they want on their property?

- I believe that as long as the animals are taken care of properly and have enough space on the property to not impact other neighbours this would be a benefit to our community.
- As long as they are properly cared for. This must be enforced
- This is essential in providing food security for families.
- Must be cared for in a manner that prevents adverse impacts on neighbors such as noise, odors and attracting pests.
- If you could provide animals with decent living conditions as well well clean up after if and feed it and it doesn't pose danger to others I have to problem.
- A reasonable number of hens for personal use would be good.
- I believe it could have a positive community impact
- As long as the animals are safe and happy I have no objections to them being within Calgary.
- providing there are guidelines for noise and minimum size of space and setback from neighbours.
- People should be allowed to have more control over their food.
- Only if annual reviews of the animals living conditions are completed to ensure welfare.
- As long as the owners are looking after and giving the livestock proper living conditions. They should be allowed to obtain such animals. In a town/city I would say maybe have a cap of 3-4 in city as sometimes they can be a tad clucky. Other than that let the folks have hens as pets/egg layers.
- Application and consideration would be best option.
- Some lots could easily handle a couple chickens, ducks or a small goat. As long as there is an approval process and rules, I could see this being beneficial, just like all the bee hives we now have around the city. I would not want a full farm on a tiny lot next door though, so there would need to be limits.
- Hens are a wonderful addition to a backyard and allow for local food and food independence.
- If the animals are treated humanly while alive, then there should be no problem having livestock. Why not? With so many dogs running around, why not have an animal that provides food, opposed to using the city as a huge dogrun/dog toilet.
- If the owner of hens does not follow rules they should then have to remove these animals.
- I believe if you have the space and means to provide for livestock, you should be allowed to have them, even if you aren't a farmer. Some people grow up with livestock and can't afford a farm or that many acres when they move.
- Chickens are awesome
- Hens and other live stock in reasonable numbers are less annoying than dogs who use my yard as a toilet and bark loudly. It seems preferable to have a pet that contributes food such as eggs or milk. The same number limits as for dogs or cats should apply.
- Lovely
- No to pigeons they too easily can escape and become a feral issue in the community taxing resources and tax $$$
- Bylaw should do regular checks to see if rules are followed.

- Many metropolitan centres in North America allow hens and it's not an issue... funny that animals that can maim or kill other pets, kids and adults are allowed (pitbulls), but the city finds hens so objectionable!?
 - I support this as long as livestock is not being farmed for meat - eg cows for steaks, chickens for chicken breasts. I would be deeply troubled to know that neighbors are slaughtering animals nearby. Also, number of livestock must be kept very low.
 - Miniature pigs are pets and should be permitted in Calgary.
 - "If properly housed and cared for a small number of hens based on feasible lot size to give neighbours privacy. Added expectation on pest and predator deterrents would be needed too. I.e. requirement for pest free feeders (they cost more but keep rodents out).
- Hens provide food security, natural garden fertilizers, insect control."
 - Why not
 - Freedom of choice is paramount. Guidelines would of course be necessary
 - Urban hens would be a wonderful option for many people. It would be great to be able to produce as much food as possible out of your back garden, eggs included.
 - As long as the adjacent neighbours are not identified if they disagree and they are made aware of the details: type of animal, number, etc.
 - Allowing urban farming practices (including livestock) would allow for residents to save money and rely less on industrial farming practices. I think it's a great idea, assuming care is taken to ensure animal safety and welfare.
 - It may be helpful to provide options where we do not need our food to travel as far as it currently does.
 - Yes... provisionally. Only if nuisance issues of odors, waste, noise, and potential harm/injury were mitigated. Case-by-case basis, as anything - even dogs or house cats - can be taken to the extreme.
 - Good food security. Not that smelly. Not that loud.
 - Why not?
 - I don't see a problem as long as they are provided for and offer some kind of community benefit. I do believe people should have a right to not want their homes disturbed by proximity to livestock however.
 - Livestock, if well cared for, can enhance the community, and also have a positive benefit on peoples mental health
 - I would not want roosters due to noise, but hens are fine
 - I think it would be fantastic to have Hens!
 - To a degree. There should be strong limits on what individuals can have. And it should be encouraged for communities to work together for larger co-ops or boards, just like the community gardens. For example my irresponsible neighbour should only have 1 or 2 chickens if they want eggs, not 20. If they want 20, it needs to be a collective effort for checks and balances.

- "If there is enough space for the animals to roam but also be contained on private property.
- A potential nuisance is Roosters. They crow so early on summer mornings."
- Only if they stay on owners property and are properly contained at all times. If they are caught off property they can be fined.
- It must be balanced- have to have ability to properly care for hens and not have their natural behaviors negatively impact others in the area
- provided they take proper care of their chickens and keep it clean i don't see a problem
- Base it on property (lot) size, and ensure that pens are set back a minimum distance from the neighbours
- While I don't want to own chickens, I respect a person's right to want them. Having said that, I don't want to be SURROUNDED by chickens. With the above criteria in place, I think we can work with more livestock around.
- I feel that this would provide a good opportunity for people to become more self-sufficient in an urban setting.
- Uncertain what is meant by "will offer community benefit". Perhaps "Family benefit" is a better choice of words? If animals are properly cared for, and do not disturb neighbours, then it should be fine. Nuances should be evaluated on a case by case basis.
- Urban hen keeping makes sense. They are less noisy than dogs and help provide food security.
- they are just fine and less noisy than a dog
- As long as there is the man power to assure that the above mentioned items are followed. If these item cannot properly be monitored then no I do not support this.
- Hens and other smaller livestock are a wonderful opportunity to bridge urban and rural communities in a small way.
- this is great
- As long as the livestock are well taken care of, I don't see how this could be an issue.
- Assuming the animal can be properly provided for and not being a problem for the neighbourhood than I don't see an issue.
- My main concern would be the well being of the animals. That owners know how to care for the animals they are bringing into their backyards.
- My rights should not be subject to my neighbour's whims
- I like chickens
- As long as neighbours are not bothered, chickens in particular are a good, healthy way for families to live more sustainably. I think there should be limits on how many chickens, though.
- If a property owner can maintain suitable living conditions for the animal(s), including proper sanitary provisions, and prevent the animals from being a nuisance in the neighborhood due to either noise, unsightliness or unsanitary conditions what harm is done? Violations of the proper guidelines for humane conditions, sanitary conditions unsightliness or excessive noise should never be permitted.
- Within reason and only if there are no concerns from neighbours for door or noise

- "Support from adjacent neighbour's could stall any plans that otherwise meet all by-law requirements. Make the by-law as such to thoughtfully address common good neighbour concerns and practices to avoid undue and costly tie-ups and processing.
- I oppose pigeons due to flight ability and ease of roaming communities, escaping owners and establishing feral flocks that become an issue and costly to cull and back within controllable means."
- The pandemic has taught us that food shortages are a possibility and many people can not afford basic food for their family. Having healthy, well cared for animals can help entire communities.
- Hens are just another animal that people can handle responsibly.
- If anything covid has taught us is that sometimes we will need to be self sustaining
- Hens are allowed in other jurisdictions.
- You have covered all criteria I believe is essential for this decision.
- I have had backyard chickens. They have been a wonderful addition and have not caused any trouble for neighbors. Additionally they increase food security!!
- No concerns as long as the animals are properly cared for
- Urban hens are a wonderful idea! Perhaps the city could consider which breeds may be most appropriate for urban life, such as breeds that are known to be quieter? Also, is it possible to create guidelines on how many hens a person may have on their property depending on factors such as the size of the proposed living space, as well as proximity to neighbours?
- for personal use only (can't sell eggs on the street!), "reasonable" number (not a herd of goats), Animal Control implications for escapees, noise/odor considerations, reproduction control
- So long as adjacent neighbours support the livestock, it shouldn't be a problem.
- So long as chief bylaw officer has final say.
- Livestock can provide numerous benefits from food security to waste management to soil amendment. If controls, restrictions & regular inspections are in place to contain noise, malodours, and health/safety issues, it's a feasible plan.
- I think that as long as the number of hens is reasonable and they are in clean healthy living conditions with limited noise, it is reasonable to have them.
- Fresh eggs is healthier than eggs that are several weeks old in the store.
- Allow farming experience in an urban setting.
- Could be positive for sustainable living, if rules are followed.
- Chickens, hens, pot belly pigs and possibly other smaller livestock would be great. However owners must take responsibility for proper care of them and the space they are residing.
- Chickens and ducks and pigs are fine as long as they are annually checked in or something. Last thing we need is a cock fighting ring in Calgary
- I support the option of hens but not large domesticated animals such as cows, pigs, donkeys, horses, etc as I believe you can not provide sufficient space and proper care for such large animals on a city size property. Also, neighbors have the right of refusal without fear of reprisal due to noise, smell concerns.

- "If hens can be raised in clean safe environment that is a supply of food
- Perhaps the hen owners s would share this food with neighbors and end up causing more goodwill to the community"
- I think that as long as neighbours aren't affected, it would be fine.
- Acceptable urban farming.
- Builds self reliance and healthier living.
- However it depends on the type and size of the animal. Also I would not need the neighbours support to be mandatory.
- I like the consultation with neighbours before allowing other livestock to live within noise or smell range, with ongoing engagement yearly
- Individual freedom of choice.
- Chickens should be allowed as long as they have a coop and are properly maintained.
- Birds/rabbits are easily raised in smaller spaces and provide food.
- A few hens or other livestock helps folks reconnect with nature. I had to be capped at a certain number of livestock, else the livestock may become a nuisance.
- I am a huge fan of urban gardening to ease the pressure on the food supply system. Eco friendly and organic should be a requirement as well as limiting the number of animals.
- As long as the animals are kept with a reasonable amount of quiet and cleanliness as well as no large livestock like horses or cows.
- The stipulations when adhered to are reasonable and would be fine with me.
- As long as the animals are treated humanely, given adequate space, and do not impact the daily living of others in the neighbouring houses, then yes.
- It is sensible to allow exceptions to this rule, and it should be subject to the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer's discretion. There should be guidelines published for their decision making though, and there should be some sort of appeal mechanism in case they get it wrong.
- Please consider a "grandfathering" clause for those pet owners who obtain(ed) neighbor support but then the supporting neighbors move away to be replaced by ones that do not support the situation. It would be unfair to everyone if this wasn't made crystal clear from the get go. It could impact people's ability to resell a property and/or result in some people in having to make a gut wrenching decision to get rid of their animal and/or move.
- As long as the animals are well cared for and do not disturb neighbours with smells or noise I am supportive
- As long as smell and noise can be mitigated
- If the animal is well cared for and has suitable living conditions and is not having a negative impact on the neighbours and neighborhood it is no different than owning a common household pet.
- Residential live stock can add not only food to the residents, but also greatly increases the quality of life for many.
- Be good for families to have fresh cheaper eggs from chickens, milk from goats etc.

- goats are awesome pets and deserve homes too
- Chickens would be alright
- I believe that as long as the animal has access to a happy and healthy life with the individual, and the individual is able to provide all necessary needs for the animal that this should be allowed
- We should have a choice
- I support the keeping of hens in Calgary. I don't think the neighbours approval should be necessary, any more than it is currently necessary for keeping dogs or cats.
- I support other animals being explored.
- Equality for animals
- Must be suitable for the livestock and the surrounding area
- I believe people should have the rights to raise and grow their own food regardless of where they live. I do not agree that a neighbor has a right to weigh in on this decision. With the condition that they may contact by law if there is a problem that cannot be corrected after a negotiable conversation is had with said neighbor.
- As long as it's limited so that neighbors aren't disturbed by the sound
- I have no problems with people keeping livestock in Calgary including hens as long as they are well taken care of and have suitable living conditions like any other pet.
- livestock functions like a small urban community, bring people (neighbors) closer together
- It would fully depend on what type of a "livestock" - small chickens are fine. But we can't have larger animals in unsuitable living conditions- they require land, it's why they live on farms. Not the city.
- no roosters and measures to reduce odour. should not be visible to adjacent properties or street.
- If someone is able to maintain an animal in the city while providing the correct type of environment for that animal to live, I don't see why we wouldn't allow them. As long as they are not noisy or disruptive of the community
- If neighbors on all sides sign off on it and if they are not a disturbance.
- Animals are an essential need in everyone's daily lives.
- .
- Livestock animals raised within the city can allow citizens to be more independent when it comes to food and should be allowed as long as they can provide proper care and living space and take precautions to reduce the chance of disrupting/ harassing neighbors.
- If the animals can be taken care of properly, and they are not disrupting surrounding neighbours. Then why not.
- Fresh eggs.
- I think raising hens would be a great way to engage in our food chain and allow residents the ability to have a hobby.
- Food security is a huge discussion the world over and our increasingly urban populations need to cultivate different ways of meeting local needs in a local manner. This proposal COULD help with this. BUT do I want any neighbor within 4 houses to have a rooster? NO thank you.
- No downside to allowing this

- if people want certain livestock given they have the adequate space, time and resources to care for the animal/s then they should be permitted.
- Yes, if there is the opportunity for input as an adjacent neighbour.
- It wouldn't bother me what other people have in their yards
- As long as the owner is maintaining proper care for the animal, as well as the environment surrounding others, themselves, and the animals. And disposing of waste properly.
- I mean as long as the animals are being taking care of. And cleaning up after. I don't see an issue.
- Having chickens is a great way to put food waste to use right away and to help people get access to awesome quality eggs. Any families with kids can be helped as well by this as it provides an opportunity for children to learn about raising animals that are not just pets.
- More homes for hens means more hens are taken care of. Hens can also be a great educational pet for kids. Its important for young calgarians to appreciate the farm life even if they cant get a whole farm.
- Go for it.
- So long as their living space is clean and they are quiet I think it could be a great learning opportunity for many people about where food comes from.
- I would have no problem with allowing urban hens in Calgary as long as the owners are responsible as far as keeping them on their property, cleaning coops regularly and not allowing them to be a nuisance. The downside I could see with allowing urban hens is if people get complaints or get tired of them they would probably get dumped on shelters which can be overburdened with unwanted animals already.
- This is a wonderful idea. It allows people to enjoy eggs humanely.
- I know of an individual that keeps urban hens. He does so responsibly and with the knowledge and support of neighbours. He also does it illegally. He, his neighbours, and his hens appear to have a positive experience, and I would like for that to be a legal activity.
- If the conditions mentioned above are met
- I like the ideas of hens, possibly pigs, and such being in an urban environment.
- As long as noise isn't an issue
- If a person owns a home and property than that person should have the option to own certain livestock, as long as it abided by the rules listed above. I would also say that they should need yearly, "check-ups" to ensure the livestock are still in conditions that abide by the rules.
- So long as the quality of life for the animals would be good, and people are respectful of the animals as well as their neighbours, I see no reason at the moment to not support this bylaw amendment.
- I see no concerns in allowing urban hens given the above criteria
- I support this as long as the animals are not a nuisance to neighbours and suitable living conditions are provided.
- As long as the listed above suitable care, houses, etc. Is followed.
- No need for support from neighbours - neighbours move, what happens then?

- I'm hugely supportive of urban hens and other sustainable urban livestock. If anything, I think these criteria are too restrictive - demonstrating community benefit/neighbour support is overstepping. I don't think my neighbours should get a say in what pets I have or what livestock I keep.
- As long as the animals needs are tended to and they are not disrupting the neighborhood
- Chickens Please!!!
- Please allow back yard hens
- Animal welfare would need to be ensured and monitored.
- I would support most incentives that move us toward improved urban farming and self sustainability vs. the large processing plant model which is abusive to the animals and, as shown recently, often also not providing good working conditions for staff.
- I would definitely support a limited number of hens as long as owners are responsible and clean.
- limit the number
- Bylaw will help ensure health of animal, since people will keep them anyways
- What pets people want to keep is their own business.
- You should be able to have livestock that are manageable in the city and provide benefits and nutrition
- yay, chickens!
- NA
- If people want to keep chickens and have their own eggs that's totally cool. I do not want to see my neighbors slaughtering them for food. Pets/eggs only.
- I do support hens being permitted in the city provided they are properly cared for in protective environments.
- If all the mentioned conditions can be met, having food security and connection to urban farming can be a positive experience.
- I would like to have some back yard hens
- I said yes I would support it because I believe that it is possible to be positive for the community to be involved with livestock. But at the same time, I grew up on a farm and I am concerned that there will be many people who with not be responsible or capable of handling animals. This could cause problems.
- Chickens are easy.
- If neighbours have also approved it and wouldn't become a nuisance. Ie smell /noise etc
- There should be a limit to how many hens you can have, and not have to ask permission from neighbours.
- Many cities in Canada have successfully introduced urban hens with great success. I think Calgary could be the next success on that list.
- I would like to have a few Urban Hens.
- Chickens make great pets, excellent fertilizer, help control bugs and weeds naturally. They clean your yard are a natural garbage disposal and are easy to care for.

- Support from adjacent neighbours along with suitable living conditions would be important criteria in my opinion.
- Must have adequate green space and fencing. People in townhomes for example would not have enough space, but someone with half an acre might. Very important.
- honestly, it would be interesting to see hens in Calgary.
- I feel if the livestock is only allowed because it will benefit the community and have a positive impact, why would we not allow this. If there is reasonable criteria in place, I believe this can be a positive decision.
- If all criteria are met the introduction to small livestock would be a welcome addition to the neighbourhood for both adults and children.
- I think urban hens, kept to reasonable numbers, provide multiple benefits.
- I think chickens should be allowed for pest management and eggs
- I would support having hens for eggs and having rescue animals but I would not support raising any animal for food other than eggs because I don't think it would be dealt with responsibly and humanely.
- More independence is better
- If people want to own livestock they should have that right, although there should be regulations such as size of pen, proper urban setting, etc.
- As long as there are no crowing roosters.
- "Why not? Care for animals is an important responsibility. This applies to dogs, cats, rabbits, chickens. If someone wants to have chickens, I expect them to care for them in a way that respects that animal as I expect folks with other pets to do.
- Chickens would add to the life experience of Calgarians and would be a testament to Calgary for the better."
- I support it
- Chickens can be properly cared for in the city. People need to be responsible and know there are consequences if they don't maintain certain levels of care/ cleanliness. Requires education to compliance.
- Backyard chickens will bring affordable protein to many, natural soil fertilizer, insect control, a closer connection to nature.
- Urban hens add food security to families going through difficult financial times. They are no noisier than dogs. There are many precedents of other urban municipalities allowing Hens across North America.
- There are other pet animals that provide mutual love and some are less destructive than cats or dogs.
- Projects like these done responsibly help encourage a green culture of sustainability in an urban environment. Very progressive and a natural step for our city.
- Necessary step to more food security.
- Obviously, putting a limit on the number of hens (4 or less).

- I think that it would be okay in some areas, but the owner must be held responsible, just as owners of dogs are. They must be accountable to keep their hens, a pet pig, or whatever, clean and fed and not bothering neighbours. But this is a big city now, and I can see the potential for troubles between neighbours. I think you would need to be specific to the requires for each type of livestock.
- But only in Single Family neighborhoods. Hens in a Townhouse Complex/Condo/Apartment etc, would be somewhat ridiculous and could cause unnecessary resentment and problems within smaller communities such as these.
- I do think hens would be acceptable if satisfactory living conditions are met for the animals, however do not think that any urban living environment would be suitable for animals such as pigs.
- Free eggs! Kids won't worry about break fast
- The more animals the better :)
- I'm in support of chicken being allowed under these conditions
- I think a licence should be required and those hoping to have hens should have to demonstrate that they have suitable arrangements in place.
- I don't think you should require neighbours approval as you don't need approval for any other animal or pet.
- They are good to manage pests in the garden and provide a food source at a time with a lot of economic uncertainty.
- Chickens are a good way to add food to a family whether its laying hens or fryers
- I see no issue with this bylaw amendment.
- I support urban hens, and other livestock
- So long as the criteria for livestock are met I support the allowance of these types of animals in urban areas.
- If the criteria is strictly followed. Bylaw officers seem to be extremely lax.
- I'm in support of the home grown food movement. With covid, we should be a more self contained society.
- I support it, but feel that there has to be a limited number maybe dependent on the area available for the urban hen.
- Nothing wrong with having your own hens. Why not !
- This is a long time coming. It is reasonable on a number of levels to allow basic livestock husbandry within city limits.
- Noise, smell and what the livestock attracts needs to be strongly considered. Neighbors shouldn't have to put up with any ill effects.
- Calgary needs to become more in-touch with nature and animals in general. As long as the animals are relatively small (no cows or bulls please, but goats and hens are fine), well cared for and the areas surrounding the urban livestock are kept clean, there is no issue.
- Chickens are a wonderful urban animal that helps with self sufficiency and brings great joy to people
- As long as animals are well taken care of and it helps urban and environmental sustainability, it is a good idea
- I believe the criteria is sound.

- What other countries/communities are doing, has taught us that we can grow certain foods and look after small livestock within city environments. Also with the COVID-19 pandemic, I think we need to realize that we can be a bit more self sustaining in certain areas if we have the right tools, guidelines, and community standards.
- I see no issue with hens they are less noisy than dogs and help compost food scraps and till soil so using less harmful chemicals or weed killers!! As long as maintained and cleaned there should be no problem what so ever with a few chickens or Rabbits!
- It would be great to have a sustainable environment for eggs as long as the animals are kept in good clean conditions with enough space.
- As long as the situation is humane
- I wish to have autonomy over my backyard choicecto raise chickens freely without municipal oversight. 9nly enough to be considered useful to support a family.
- I am in agreement to this as long as the livestock are properly cared for, don't cause excessive noise and their areas are maintained and cleaned properly.
- As long as the neighbours were in support and standards were met, I see no reason why someone shouldn't raise their own livestock
- Okotoks has had urban hens for 5 years. 4 hens. No rooster. $50 yearly license. They have a bylaw. It's going great!!!!
- As long as the animals are well cared for, this is good for food security, the economy, children's education and mental wellbeing.
- Food would be affordable for people
- City life was becoming too sterile -- allowing more animals is a good thing IF they are well-cared for and if, for any reason, a neighbour cannot handle it for health reasons, then a discussion needs to be had to mutually agree on a solution.
- Excellent proposal
- I should be able to have hens if I can prove i can care for them
- Hens yes, roosters no (too noisy)
- If all those requirement are met, this should not be an issue.
- "I think the primary factor involved would be the amount of yard space to house and support any animal, not just livestock. Many yards, especially in newer neighbourhoods, are nothing more than ""postage stamps"" and can't support more than a few plants, let alone any animals.
- So, some formula of available lot space to animal (domestic or livestock) ratio would be required."
- Hens are a great addition to our community and allow for urban food supply choices that are very beneficial. Soil improvement and pest control are also great benefits of keeping hens.
- There are many animals that could be very beneficial and people should be able to raise them (properly) on their own properties.
- Minimum sizes of enclosures must be met and restriction on number of animals housed together
- "The global pandemic, and the interruption that it caused to the food supply highlights the importance of ensuring that city dwellers have the opportunity to grow as much of their own food as possible. Furthermore, it is difficult to find eggs that weren't raised in a factory farm environment. Raising them yourself is the only way to ensure that they were raised in an ethical manner.

- Lastly, as omnivores, chickens are excellent for organic pest control, for things like mice and insects."
- Everything except support from my neighbours....
- as long as it is more so for pets, and not slaughtering livestock in residential areas
- Yes, however I believe a limit per household should be in effect.
- Should have neighbours approval
- Source of food, connection with nature, education, entertainment
- As long as they do not disturb and are properly cared for.
- If the pandemic has taught us anything, local food supply is very important. We need to encourage more people to produce some of their own food, not discourage it.
- As long as safe conditions for hens, bees, pigeons, pot belly pigs are maintained and they are not a nuisance to others
- Backyard chickens are a wonderful source of fresh, inexpensive eggs. They provide a great learning experience for children.
- Chickens should be allowed within city limits as long as the coop is kept clean
- If we're talking 4 or less hens they are much less disruptive to the neighborhood than a dog or a free-roaming cat.
- Hens are OK, no rooster. Maximum number on one property.
- People should be able to own whatever animals they want, so long as those animals are well taken care of, fed, watered, kept warm in the winter, and have enough space to live comfortably.
- I lived in Europe and I really like the idea of chickens. Communities in Belgium give them for free or very cheap to citizens as an excellent way to better manage kitchen waste.
- This should only be allowed on single family homes AND for those homes that have a specifically large property size (ex. 1 acre). This rule should apply for pigeons as well!
- The approval from neighbors would have to be included
- Each community should have a chicken & hen coop where the community can pay to help with the chores and and then in turn get to eat the eggs for free!
- Why not?
- I would love if chickens could be allowed in Calgary
- This was common practice before and hens are no different then other small animals. But I do not believe that exceptions should be decided by just one individual. This needs a panel to remain unbiased.
- I support people having a limited number of hens on their property. I also support allowing other livestock based on the criteria above.

- I think owning chickens could be a wonderful addition to many peoples lives. I definitely think proper care is needed and they must meet the criteria laid out for owning the animal. I believe there should be guidelines for owning any animal and that people should be able to meet the basic needs of the animal to own it.
- It is better for hens to be kept by responsible owners as opposed to factory farms.
- Private property rights should be respected as long as don't interfere with rights of others. Hens or small animals (pet pigs) should be at the discretion of property owner not city.
- Local food is important, and as long as there is no mistreatment of animals and neighbours are inside, this is good.
- provided it does not become a nuisance for neighbors
- Backyard chickens ... all for a few in one yard. Chickens can be dirty....strict guidelines would need to be In Place
- If a citizen can provide proper care for any animal they should be allowed to do so. Small livestock can provide comfort to some people.
- There shouldn't be a restriction on livestock permitted if proper criteria are met. It is not the animal in question - it's the responsibility of owner regardless of hen, or dog/cat or goat.
- Self sustaining lifestyles should not be limited to rural areas. Everyone has a right to live off their own efforts in their property wherever they are.
- As long as there is no nuisance element for the rest of the community.
- More sustainable food resources are need as peoples incomes go down.
- nature
- Why is neighbour support a requirement? Fulfill the other asks of the conditions. Number of livestock i.evhens should be dependent on space requirements To humanely care for the animal and lot size of dwelling to a percentage of use calculation. Rules should differ for housing types and density on number of animals etc. No to pigeons as the can easily fly away from owner property and escaped/ released pigeons can easily multiply to disrupt local wild species, cause property damage and hazards and be costly to regain control if wild flocks establish.
- i dont raise hens bit why not its a hen gives eggs to people helps low income folks eat better
- Stated conditions are reasonable.
- It would be great to have a few hens in the back yard for eggs. If people while hens then they will have to follow the guidelines for having them as well as having to clean the cages.
- I think anything that supports urban agriculture should be considered by our city.
- so long as the animals are probably penned and being treated humanely then yeah livestock is fine.
- Only if the animals are being given enough living space and are not infringing on others
- if urban hens are done in a modest, back yard scale and with enforced cleaniness they are helpful to the environment, to the overall community and to cost saving. The documented consent of adjacent neighbours is an absolute requirement and if such consent is withdrawn, the raising of urban hens must cease. Odour managment, clean up of feces, no roosters (noisy) must be respected.
- Having a reasonable number of certain farm animals is an excellent way to encourage wholesome food options within the city! Excellent idea, obviously with guidelines.

- If someone is willing to properly care for and respect the impact of animals on their neighbors, I don't see why they shouldn't be allowed urban hens.
- As long as they can care for it shouldn't be a problem
- I would support my neighbour if they wanted to get a hens or a goat as long as they provide food, shelter and care of the animal. As well, they would be respectful of their neighbours if their animals get out of hand or make too much noise.
- Currently accepted pets, dog, cats, birds, reptiles, fish, provide so much enrichment for people. Hens, as all animals, have individual personalities and would also contribute to enriching peoples lives. And as long as Hens were designated as pets, with a benefit of producing eggs, and not butchered after the egg laying days are done I would support the bylaw amendment. This would go for any other future urban livestock, it would have to be designated and raised as pets and not raised for food, to be butchered when they reached the age or weight for butchering.
- As long as the urban hens are kept in sustainable and comfortable environment, I would view them as a great benefit for the home and garden. Obviously not all yards will be large enough to house a coop and they will require a type of veterinary care that would need to be established and laws for the number of urban hens allowed in space. But I personally very much support the diversity in this type of livestock in the city.
- Why not If it's not hurting anyone? Let's have a bit less regulation into peoples private lives . If they wanna share their yard with hens , so be it .
- I have raised hens (illegally) in a city and they are calm, quiet and friendly and provide food for owners. If done responsibly, there is no issue with them. Problem dogs are a much worse issue.
- If the adjacent neighbours are okay, the city should be okay
- I dont think the next door neighbours should need to agree with the chickens, as long as there are no problems with them.
- Chickens should be allowed without the need of consent by neighbors. Hens could be limited to 6, roosters should not be allowed due to noise. A well kept hen house doesn't smell and has very little noise. There should be no need for neighbors to be consulted.
- As long as the animals are quiet and not disturbing and maintaining a clean environment it shouldn't be an issue.
- Urban hens could provide stimulus for children and promote a caring attitude towards animals, providing the urban hens are not for slaughter.
- You should be allowed to own hens on your property so long as they are not a nuisance to neighbors. I do believe however that neighbor should not be able to outright veto the decision to put a hen house in. there must be a reasonable reason why one should not.
- I support allowing hens in backyards, but this question, like many in this survey, is woefully poorly written and the epitome of ambiguity.
- As long as the hens are receiving proper care and love, I have no problem with the amendment.
- Urban hen keeping is already being done in other major cities in Canada to support food security and establish ecosystem services that have been and will continue to be desperately needed as we deal with the effects of climate change and increased economic instability in the years to come.

- Dogs are more of a nuisance than chickens! If people are allowed to have their dogs out an about all the time I see no reason why we can't have backyard hens.
- I AM OKAY WITH IT
- Let people have their chickens!
- Implemented with a descriptive, principle led mindset this could be a good way of promoting neighborhood cohesion. Maybe even allow Coasean like solutions to occur given the small number of actors involved.
- Urban hens are a great idea. Case-by-case for other exceptions makes good sense.
- Since the pandemic, a lot of people are taking up gardening in their homes, and community gardens are already well established all over the city. There are more and more people interested in urban homesteading. This can be an incredibly positive thing to help offset spending on groceries, encourage local trading/markets, enhance connection to community and nature. I already grow a small food garden in my back yard and love a couple of hens and even a goat. We have a very steep hill in the front yard and it's hard to mow/landscape. It would be really nice to have a goat help eat up weeds and trim grass.
- A small number of backyard hens for education/eggs/companionship kept properly away from houses in a suitable hen house and looked after daily is only a benefit. I would say no to roosters however 3 to 4 hens would fulfill a families egg needs as well as the birds social and mental health needs while still being quieter and less intrusive than many dogs. They are also great for helping with pest elimination and fertilization in home gardening. I would say they must be well maintained and contained always within the yard they belong in. A great addition to many families and individuals when undertaken with proper education and responsibilities.
- The bylaw amendment covers all sectors
- "greater food security and keeping people closer to their food sources is an important step.

- I would want it to be very easy to gain approval for backyard chickens specifically, and a clear program for people to follow when adding other livestock."
- As long as the animal is treated humanely, is capable of being domesticated, and does not present a serious threat to safety or health, livestock should be permitted.
- I don't mind this as long as there is a strong education piece attached to the project as well as ongoing visits and follow-ups. Many of us want to be farmers or ranchers, but not all of us SHOULD be farmers or ranchers. People have good intentions, but with poor education and monitoring, livestock may actually suffer in the hands of well intended uneducated individuals.
- No neighbour support required.
- Many responsible people would love the opportunity to have Hens producing fresh eggs & possibly meat also.
- Please do not require neighbor approvals. Good neighborliness is expected, but a requirement makes people's rights different depending on who their neighbor is.

- I think hens would be totally fine, provided they are cared for, inside the city. Ensure space is adequate and maybe have someone apply and take an online course before getting them?
- As long as they don't become a nuisance to other residents and they are well cared for, I see no issue.
- People should be allowed to own and maintain a limited number of hens as long as they are well looked after and housed to a minimum standard.
- I think it's reasonable for people to own a small number of these animals for food and or emotional support.
- Urban livestock in the right conditions can contribute to food security and promote learning where our food comes from.
- let people do what they want
- The hens would provide eggs that I could trust, knowing that I fed them organically.
- Suitable living conditions should be weighted more highly than the first two factors.
- I support bylaw amendments that allow individuals to grow/raise food outside large scale commercial practices.
- I have raised hens on a farm for 8 years, and they are quite, docile creatures. When taken care of well the cause less disturbance to neighborhoods than cats or dogs with a much higher reward. We have cats in our yard unwanted daily and dogs barking and have no choice to put up with that. Hens, no roosters, would not cause any inconvenience to our surrounding neighbours.
- rules needed to ensure the humane treatment of hens and more food security for citizens.
- So much community benefit! Great education for kids too!
- Annual bylaw visit to confirm living conditions of animals are adequate and safe
- There are livestock animals that have shown to be great pets and service animals. It's time to start breaking down the barriers of what is considered a pet and get away from speciesism.
- Hens can provide localized food sources for residents while contributing to fertilizer for gardens and our green cart program.
- Urban hens are amazing, they provide food for families, and they live a life of quality. They make lovely pets.
- I think backyard chickens and livestock can be a positive addition to a community. We have had a neighbour with a goat (LESA) and it was positive for our community.
- As long as the owners are responsible and doesn't affect or interfere with my living.
- Animals are animals. Why can dogs and cats be pets, but not other species? People should be free to care for any species of animal in need.
- I think Calgary is very behind the times on this amendment. Only good can come of urban chickens and small livestock
- Urban hens can provide both monetary reward and in lieu of typical domestic pet can be quite engaging depending on species.
- Other possible factors can be taken into account this way
- The measures are reasonable

- I strongly feel that hens should be allowed.
- I like the thought of having a community egg house.
- Numerous city already allow chickens with very few if any issues. 6-8 birds should be allowed to provide good flock size for wintering, flock health and production.
- Chickens are much less of a nuisance than other pets, don't kill songbirds, bite people, and they're an important part of food education and security. It's bizarre that they aren't allowed.
- This criteria allows for community involvement.
- Needs careful consideration especially around sanitation, smells, and disease.
- I think it makes sense from a food security standpoint to raise food close to the home. I raise chickens in my farm and I think a reasonable number of chickens would do well in most of Calgary's backyards.
- I like farm animals
- Yes, a small number of hens treated properly and housed properly can be beneficial
- No explanation required.
- Who is the City to stop us from producing our food on private property.
- Local food and an increase in biodiversity are things we should be encouraging whenever we can. In the past we had hens and they were fine from the perspective of neighbours. They were however another responsibility and I doubt many Calgaryans would choose to keep hens. Those few Calgaryans who desire to keep hens should have the right to do so. We also keep bees and have done so for years. It is satisfying to produce honey and we have never had any issues with neighbours
- "Owning hens or other livestock:
- Only on the condition that the eggs/livestock are for personal use and not for sale and consumed only by immediate members of the household that the hens/livestock reside. Owners must go through adequate training based on the livestock they are raising, and learn of proper hygiene, maintenance and be comfortable with random and unaccounted checkups, learn how to properly house the hens and other livestock and must have adequate and safe spaces to maintain the hens/other livestock. A balcony would not seem adequate, so types of dwelling need to also be considered. Weatherproofing and appropriate care should span across all weather conditions. Ongoing mandatory training for owners should be implemented at no or little cost. When cleaning the areas of the hens/livestock, nothing should leave the owners premises and overflow to the neighbouring properties through water, etc. Areas must be safely disinfected at all times to prevent diseases or infections since urban living has exposure to a larger population than rural lands would."
- Backyard hens increase food security and do not cause noise disturbances.
- I think it's high time we are allowed chickens. Especially in a pandemic world where food chains may break, having access to chickens and eggs could be very beneficial. I believe they're an important part of a vegetable garden ecosystem, and help individuals be more self sufficient
- I support backyard hens/ducks, but would suggest 1. a cap on the number kept (e.g. 4), 2. setting a minimum space requirement (e.g. 4 m² per bird), and 3. it should not be necessary to have support from neighbours to possess the birds.

- I would raise hens to provide food for my family.
- I want a chicken.
- Having chickens is acceptable as long as the number are restricted.
- I think this is a great idea for local food security.
- no one wants to buy for expensive retail chains with hens fed by antibiotics. there is a healthy trend to get rid of greedy retailers and take control over feeding family by healthy food
- If all of the above criteria are met, then I have no issues. Chickens SHOULD be allowed, without a doubt! They provide food (eggs) for those that are not financially secure.
- However I think the neighbors approval should be evaluated as some people have bad neighbors no matter what.
- Understand that not everyone wants a dog or a cat and that other cultures privilege livestock that feeds their household. Understand also that this runs counter to white Anglo expectations - a laying hen that is past her prime, or rabbits in a hutch are often destined to end up on the dining table. Accomodate these realities.
- This is just an extension of changes that have already been made within the City when it comes to livestock ownership.
- No one should own farm life within the city of Calgary
- They can provide nutrition (eggs & meat). Can help with social isolation. Provides a companion role. Gives meaning to people who need an activity as well as to reduce loneliness. People can have something to look forward to on a regular basis. Can reduce insects, pests, rodents.
- A case by case evaluation would seem to be the best course of action.
- This could be a very positive benefit. Need to have input of those wishing the animals and those neighbours affected.
- Urban chickens should be available and permitted as long as the community AND chicken are both supported and happy
- As long as it doesn't impact neighbours
- The ability to have Hens supports anti-fragile food systems and is critical for future supply chain.
- As long as owners are reasonable, i see no problem. Enforcement comes from irresponsible people, not animals.
- This criteria should be strictly enforced to prevent an influx of animal surrenders.
- It should be approved on a case by case basis and neighbors need to be consulted and considered.
- Hens are an important part of food security as well as being an important part of food recycling!
- I support having any animal as long as owner is willing to obey bylaws.
- We should be allowed to grow our own food, on our own property. They are not as bothersome as most people think
- Provided the applicant has the support of their neighbors and sufficient living conditions and ample space. Owing livestock shouldn't be any different than owning a dog or a cat.
- I am happy to support others having small livestock
- Having chickens is a great way to teach children where our food comes from.

- Other animals are important and should be allowed within reason.
- All animals should be considered as long as their needs are /can be taken into consideration.
- Only to ensure the animals have proper living conditions and neighbours don't have to deal with smells or waste on their property
- case by case this could have a beneficial impact on communities
- As long as the hens or other livestock are not noisy or smelly. Has to meet existing community bylaws.
- If citizens are responsible and considerate of the community, there is no reason they should not be free to do as they please on their own properties.
- Allow more flexibility and permit people to enjoy their ability to raise food. But also provide limitations for eg neighbors to protest
- There's no reason chickens should not be kept in the city as long as they are not creating a nuisance.
- i've been wanting chickens FOREVER
- Fabulous idea, about time. Chickens would compliment our home grown veggies and be a real asset to the community as well. No cruelty egg purchases from industries.
- I support if it is not a nuisance to neighbours and has adequate living facilities (is humane).
- As long as it's done ethical and animals are treated humanely, not allowing individuals to own hens or other livestock within the city is absurd
- there is no good reason that this has not been undertaken in the past..
- However, if you're going to allow one household to have livestock then all households should be allowed. The only reason why they might not be allowed should be if they're neglecting said animals.
- As long as bylaws will be enforced if unforeseen consequences arise: noise, smell, belligerence by owners, etc.
- Depends on other guidelines, size of pen for example. I've heard from others that chicken coops stink and I have enough issues with my neighbours barking dogs.
- Local, small food production should be incentivized. Hen eggs are a great source of protein. Local food production reduces the carbon footprint of the city.
- Hens, but no roosters.
- As long as the owners of the livestock clean up after the animals.
- Hens are a sustainable source of food which don't take up much space. It's not like having a whole cow in your backyard. I think there should be a limit to number of hens per household as to reduce noise or other issues. But why not have fresh eggs for breakfast
- I like that you would need the support of neighbours, but I think it would need to be more than just adjacent. Animals can be noisy and pungent, both of which can disrupt more than just a next door neighbour. I agree there has to be a positive reason for the livestock, though I'm not sure where I would draw that line. I think there would need to be 2 additional measures included in the bylaw: 1. There should be a trial period before complaints can be made. I suspect there will be a lot of people who will outright say no to livestock two doors down, so I would try to make it so people have to 'give it a chance' before they complain. In conjunction with this, I'd like to see examples of what this actually looks like and studies done regarding the impacts. So realistically, do a trial run somewhere in Calgary, see how that goes, and then expand it into an actual bylaw. 2. There needs to be some kind of regular inspection or checks to confirm that the animals continue to have a positive impact and that conditions remain suitable for them.

- Some yards in Calgary would allow for small amounts of livestock without the noise or smell.
 - If the animals are being properly cared for and do not impede the comfort of the surrounding neighbours I do not see a problem.
 - "I think having hens is a very positive thing for the community for many reasons including increased food security, food awareness and just general knowledge and life experience. I have personally kept chickens in another city and had no issues at all.
 - I think it is actually a bit of a crime that people are as of now not allowed to keep chickens on their own property."
 - Would be great to see.
 - We must support community agriculture as a means for low income families/individuals to provide nutrition for themselves.
 - "I absolutely support backyard feathered friends! For emotional support, fresh eggs, and fun! As long as they are cared for properly ! ^_^ ♡"
- I do not support the need to have neighbour's approval though. As long as the hens are housed and being cared for properly, everything kept clean, there should be no issues! :)
- Educate and inspire! ^_^"
 - Everyone loves their pets (even hens or other livestock) however I do think it is important to obtain permission from neighbours and to ensure living conditions for the animals is suitable
 - As long as basic bylaws are met and no disruption to neighbours there should be no problem.
 - Absolutely! As long as the animals are well cared and not a nuisance, they should be allowed. Particularly hens. People should be free to source their own sustainable food
 - I would love to have backyard chickens
 - As long as they are in ideal living conditions, it seems a positive move to allow this.
 - Animals are animals. livestock is not extremely different from domestic household pets. As long as they are properly cared for there should be few issues
 - Adjacent neighbors definitely need to provide approval because they will have to live 24/7 with whatever animal kingdom that person wants to have.
 - As long as there is a limitation to the number of birds and no large scale commercial entity associated.
 - I'm fine with chickens as long as they aren't disruptive.

- I wholeheartedly support the allowance of urban hens. This is an important step to encouraging Calgarians to become more connected to their food system, increase food security and also has the potential to act as a community-building activity if done right. I think having this allowed would decrease the chance of urban hens that are not kept in the correct conditions or treated well and would increase public literacy about caring for this type of livestock humanely and hygienically. Urban hens are not disruptive and the benefits are myriad.
- Would need to be strictly enforced. I would like to have more information about how other municipalities deal with this.
- I fully support this amendment as long as the needs of the animals are met and maintained.
- I see no harm in this as long as hens are properly cared for and do not become a nuisance.
- As long as neighbours are all in agreement with owning any livestock, I think it would benefit the community because having chickens that lay eggs can be an income for low income families or they can be gifted to families who are struggling to feed their families in the community.
- I am all for urban chickens as long as they are regulated that proper care is given (as with any animal/livestock)
- Provided adequate housing and living conditions for the animal are met as designated by vet or safety protocols. As long as the animal is not a nuisance to the neighbourhood (either noise or smell).
- With food insecurity looming globally, calgarians need a chance to secure a food supply they can count on, such as eggs and meat. Hens are an integral part of urban farming and we all need to be able to learn to not count on the food supply chain for survival.
- Diversity and inclusion.
- Chickens keep bug populations down and people need to be able to use their yards to produce food for their family.
- Responsible ownership and production of foods at home, especially now, should always be a top priority and the many should not be punished for the few who didn't do things right in the past. This is the way of the future and many places are allowing it around the world.
- Options to have different animals is good
- "Followed for a while to see if there are any 'harms' to the community, I.e. having higher numbers of predatory species (Bobcats, coyotes etc) popping up because of livestock.
- Evidence would suggest it is a benefit to community and sustainability having such animals in communities."
- What happens if neighbours change?
- Good compromise
- I myself would like the option to own a couple of hens and would follow any rules that were in place.
- Hens and other small animals can be an important food source, and greatly reduce numbers of bugs and pests like slugs.
- Let's urban urban farming and greener communities
- other animals are OK, as long as they are do not disturb neighbors

- Hens don't really fly and can be contained to the owners yard. It really doesn't hurt anyone if the owner maintains conditions of the chicken pen.
- I support being able to grow/have my own food sources instead of having to buy at a grocery store (ex hens). Creates a more sustainable future.
- Urban chickens are an excellent way to provide food as well as learning opportunities for children and families. Provided other animals are receiving the support needed in terms of appropriate care and housing, I would support their inclusion as well.
- I had hens in our backyard as a young child in the 80s in Australia and they were perfectly fine. I do not understand why Calgary remains one of the few municipalities not to allow chickens in backyards. Please change this!
- Love chickens & would love to have them in the city
- If standards are met why not have fresh eggs
- The support from adjacent neighbors is a bit vague.
- hens are a great idea!
- I feel chickens will be a positive addition to our community. Other communities like Edmonton and Vancouver has successfully allowed chickens. I would like to add however that people in the community interested has the right to raise chickens in their backyard without the consent of their neighbors.
- Backyard chickens enable Calgarians to secure our own personal food supply, something we all started thinking about a lot more after the covid onset. It's time for this. it's the right thing for folks willing to do it safely and humanely.
- If allowed hens should be registered and facilities should be regularly inspected
- I'm really not sure why keeping chickens isn't allowed in the city already.
- Before a permit is issued the applicant should have to prove they have adequate space, appropriate housing for the animal, knowledge of how to care for the animal, and approval from neighbours.
- I want to raise my own chickens
- I am not sure why this was ever disallowed. EVERYONE benefits from being able to have a small chicken hen. It must be kept small and clean though! I would say no more than 5 chickens and 1 hen per dwelling.
- Backyard chickens being allowed is long overdue. I fully support this
- As long as these are not being used for food
- Hens would be better cared for in backyards than factory farms. Responsible animal ownership should be permitted
- Neighbors should absolutely have a say.
- Great education for children!
- I think certain animals, especially hens, offer many benefits and and certainly no more of a nuisance than other animals allowed as pets.
- As long as it is not for food
- If immediate neighbours are amenable, and there are suitable living conditions, it makes no sense for the city to get involved.

- Yes. But I would only agree if it was with a farmer or someone who owned enough area to make sure living conditions are met and everything else. I wouldn't agree to just anyone in the city owning livestock
- I think it could be important for some Calgarians to be able to raise chickens for eggs/food. Support from their community/neighbours would be important. Chickens may also help reduce some insects and slugs in a local green space.
- Hens for example provide an opportunity for additional sustainability for a family, education, enriched fertilizer
- Any animals should be allowed as long as the owners provide suitable space and conditions for such
- Going to your next question. I think chickens should be allowed before pigeons
- I believe there are benefits in having other livestock
- I think fresh eggs are a benefit
- A better free-range environment for the hens.
- Urban livestock in, reasonable numbers and on properties that have complimentary lot sizes, are beneficial to communities.
- I absolutely feel that is a wonderful, and very progressive idea. Many livestock animals are not a nuisance when in small numbers and can be helpful in providing healthy, home raised food. Many livestock droppings are also excellent for the soil and for compost. Hens are an excellent source of fresh, daily eggs and to be honest, they are amazing for your mental health. I would not allow roosters at all within city limits however, and pigs are something that should be looked into closely before being allowed, as even the miniatures can get quite large, and most start as pets but end up on farms anyways as they are difficult to manage when they get big.
- Owners must be required to keep animal enclosures a certain distance from neighbours' air intakes or windows.
- We should be allowed to create our own food source in the city it's a right.
- There would need to be rules and regulations in place that people would have to abide by if having livestock on the city, including rules that pertain to not disturbing other neighbors
- I feel it is important that adjacent neighbors have a say.
- Possibly OK in small Numbers, I.e. 2-4 hens.
- As long as people are responsible then I have no issue with other livestock.
- Sustainable resourcing
- Small livestock are acceptable, so long as they are safe and happy and not disturbing surrounding residences.
- Yes, if the it is on a case by case basis to establish a proper environment to support the animals. Hens and other livestock or not kept in the house and should have their needs met for living comfortable in a yard setting. It's kept limited amount of hens and other livestock.
- People are looking for healthier lives, lifestyles, and being able to have ones' own eggs (from one's chickens) is one way to do it.

- No to pigeons as they can easily escape and overpopulate as feral wild birds within our communities. Yes to hens in limited numbers and only at properties with adequate yard space to limit proximity to neighbours such as large traditional single family lots. No zero lot line or smaller for outside year-round keeping. Regulated to pest proof chicken feeders, pear control and predator proofing.
- A limit of both numbers and types of animals must be set.
- good idea
- We would love to be able to have chickens. Having our kids involved in the raising of their own food is important to us. We, however, do not support our neighbours having any say in this. We believe there should be guidelines for what is expected, if we are in breach then neighbours should have the right to report it.
- If animals are well taken care of and not bothering neighbors they should be allowed.
- Animals would need to be quiet and no smells that would bother anyone in that community. Wind carries sounds and smell so approval from community neighbours, not just adjacent neighbours would be needed.
- If rules are met this could be a positive for the owners.
- With proper laws and licensing in place, I think it would be a great benefit to have urban hens
- Availability of qualified vet care for the species nearby - or all vets are knowledgeable about all species
- Limits to how many, proper enclosures and clean up and neighbour approval
- Would support some/small allowance for chickens/birds within reason and well cared for.
- Yes as long as the laws are very tightly strict and applied probably in all time. And assure that animals are never in poor living conditions and disrespect.
- urban hens and ducks should be allowed . They are good pest control and provide local food options
- I support limited urban animal husbandry as long as the above animal welfare guidelines are adhered to
- As long as animals' welfare is taken care of and there is no nuisance factor such as increased noise, disease or harm to people. I don't think neighbours should have to approve for hens or bees, but should be informed and have the right to complain where necessary if issues arise.
- Doesn't matter to me.
- I don't think the issue should be geographical restriction. As long as the right infrastructure can be set up in an urban setting, this is ok.
- The enforcement Officer must be aware of the actual need of this particular species in order to adequately assess its needs.
- There are already rabbits and pigeons, why not hens. Not supportive of larger livestock.
- I think if there are suitable and safe conditions there shouldn't be an issue
- I am fine with people owning approved livestock under specific criteria
- Fully support the allowance of urban hens in Calgary. My wife and I have done some research on this topic and hens make great pets, provide (limited) food, do not smell, and do not make noise. If cared for in a responsible manner, urban hens would only enhance quality of life for those who choose to keep them.

- I think if people would like Chickens to provide eggs or have as pets they should be allowed to. Rooster are often required however for pecking order and protection of the flock from predators so people should be able to keep them as well. If it's ok to listen to loud neighbours music and mufflers than how is this any different than listening to a rooster? I would rather hear a rooster than loud mufflers and construction.
- So long as the owners are responsible and the hens are clean
- We should support urban farming and support as much independence and local food sources
- Hens are quieter than dogs which are already permitted in yards. Chicken owners shouldn't need special permission but they should be held accountable for adequate care as should dog owners. I wish our neighbors would clean the dog shot out of their yard. It stinks.
- I think people should be able to keep chickens and other small livestock, as these are profitable and positive contributions to the community.
- Chickens make good pets, as well as providing food. I would like to see included the right to raise chickens in your backyard without the consent of your neighbours.
- Calgarians should be allowed to own and care for a maximum number of 6 hens
- Hens are an excellent addition to a family. They are great pets, quiet and less invasive than most dogs and cats. I do believe all animals should have permits as there are too many people that have animals that shouldn't.
- Many folks rely on animals for emotional support, as long as the animals are well housed and properly cared for and as long the owners keep up with their responsibilities of what it takes to have those animals on their property I see no issue.
- I believe this is ok as long as the neighbours approved. There needs to be in writing that if at any point the neighbour is not ok or the animal becomes a nuisance or ownership of the neighbouring house changed that your right to have these animals could be revoked. The city would also need to have a backup plan for how those animals would be cared (an organization or farm willing to take them) if the owner was no longer allowed to house these animals.
- Chickens are clean and provide great benefits. Responsible ownership is important, but especially in these times can provide so many benefits to people
- Chickens are quiet, and eat garden pests. People should be able to raise their own food in their backyard as long as conditions provided are clean and the numbers of chickens allowed is controlled.
- I like the idea of keeping small livestock like hens and I find the idea of harvesting eggs from a hen I've raised very interesting.
- If the neighbours are agreeable (on both sides) and the hens or other livestock do not impact on the neighbours and are regularly cleaned up after then they should be allowed. It might even be a learning experience for children and during Covid when so many of us are expanding our backyard gardens and planting fruit trees to help with food expenses adding a few hens would certainly help us out. I would rather gather my own free run eggs and use my own hens for meat. At least we know where they come from and what they have been fed. Regular inspection by bylaw officer might be a good idea where they could inspect what is going on once a month or so and make sure that there are no complaints. A milking goat doesn't take up too much room. Would that also be a possibility?

- I support backyard chickens 100%. It's important that people have the option to raise them for meat and eggs. Shortening our food lines provides many benefits to the people who own them and our environment.
- As long as the hens are housed and cared for appropriately and any associated smells are contained I have no problem with urban hens.
- As long as the standards of care are high, I do not see an issue with it
- As long as noise is kept to minimum (no roosters, for example), and the owner is responsible for care and upkeep (with periodic checks) then I am all for it. The right of people to feed themselves should never be abrogated. Also, instruction in the care and keeping of chickens is very important!
- If there are suitable living conditions and they are responsible owners the community could benefit from urban hens.
- do not require neighbours support
- Hens are quieter than dogs, easy to care for and provide food. One should not require neighbours approval to keep hens as they are often less a nuisance than dogs, which do not require neighbour's approval.
- "Hens should be allowed without the consent of neighbors.
- Containment and cleanliness need to be defined."
- With food shortages, it would be beneficial for a household to have this kind of opportunity.
- Small livestock such as hens, rabbits, goats, etc. That can provide positive neighborhood impact and be kept safely, humanely, and nuisance free in an urban setting. Should be considered for allowance within the bylaw.
- As long as these are not being used for food.
- I don't mind if people set up proper chicken coops.
- Great to have to maintain weed, grass clipping, leaf and insect control. And of course eggs!
- I see the benefit of more people being connected to their food source. I see benefits to communities that embrace our relationship to animals. I do not think chickens would be any different than any other animal.
- My choice to have chickens should not depend on my neighbour's consent.
- Don't personally care and likely won't have hens, but for those who like I don't see a problem with it.
- Hens are a vital part of a permaculture garden, offering valuable organic fertilizer, speeding composting times, and reducing harmful pests without harmful chemicals. It's a no-brainer.
- Urban hens should not be a problem as long as neighbours are consulted.
- I strongly support citizens ability to have hens and other livestock. It supports the ability to provide for family and builds community engagement.
- I'm concerned however about stink and mess affecting neighbours. Same kind of things you listed with pigeons below.

- Hens are quiet and easily kept.
- A chicken is similar to a cat or a dog in the care that they need. A chicken can be beneficial to a family and the yard. Chickens help reduce waste that ends up in either the compost bin or garbage. They help keep yards cleaner as they eat grass clippings and weeds. They also help to reduce the bug population that can occur during the summer months. If you are a gardener they also produce great fertilizer. They teach people about where food comes from and allow for families to become a little more self sustaining. On top of that due to their personalities they become excellent therapy animals. Please pass this bill so that people can have chickens.
- Chickens are less dirty than a dog shitting all over the place
- This is a good initiative.
- Animal welfare should be enforced
- If done right is a cheaper and safer way of feeding your family
- Only if the animal is under a certain size/ height/ weight ie. the space it has to live in must be equivalent to what it would have if it were a wild animal or the same requirements as a farm.
- I love all animals, and if skunks can live next door in harmony, so can goats (or whatever)
- Support from adjacent neighbors is the key phrase here. The number of chickens would need to be limited as well.
- I have space to support a hen
- Raising chickens can promote healthy eating
- Very strict rules needed
- if they are not bothering neighbours this is fine
- small animals only, like chickens
- Other cities have had great success with urban hen programs and I am excited to see Calgary catch up with other urban centres! Urban hens are one aspect of resilient, hyper-local food systems!
- I am most concerned about smell from live stock. I am also concerned that people will acquire these animals and have no idea how to care for them. I would recommend training program requirements prior to obtaining a license to purchase.
- As long as approvals are seen as exceptions and not the rule. I think farm animals as pets are reasonable but you shouldn't have a farm in the city
- If the guidelines are followed and does not cause any disturbances in the neighbourhood, I do not see why not.
- Hens could help sustain the family; taking care of some livestock animals can help emotionally
- Chickens in cow town
- It's important for citizens to be able to feed themselves incase food shortage becomes a real problem. Locally grown nutrient dense food is sustainable where shipping in food from other countries is not. Backyard animals help contribute fertilizer to home gardens (reducing productivity eliminating need for chemical fertilizers) and control bugs in a sustainable way.
- home-reared eggs have the potential to be much more humane than store-bought. and chickens/roosters are a good way of reconnecting us with the knowledge that our food comes from somewhere. that we are engaged in an ecosystem and must respect each other.

- Yes!!! Let's have city chickens and goats! I'll never have to mow my lawn again with buck the goat cruzing my backyard.
- Hens , to a limit, are good for all...
- Owners would need to keep odours and noise levels down. Proper containment would be required. I have a neighbour whose pigeons fly around and they freak me out when they all flap past my bedroom window at once.
- If living situation and welfare of the animals is good and the neighbours don't have a problem, I support.
- Ok but depends on 'suitable living conditions'. Minimum space per type of animal and living standards should be researched and implemented.
- Chickens are great backyard animals and it may help more folks understand where their food comes from.
- As long as criteria are met and everyone involved in proximity is in agreement.
- Animals can benefit the community so why not if it is done right.
- A small number of animals that are well-cared for supports mental health, environment, potentially food security.
- Might potentially be ok but should be subject to strict and careful evaluation of population densities, public health, potential for disease transmission, etc and with costs of application borne by applicant. Should not be for profit or for small scale revenue generation.
- Urban hens are a choice relating to sustainability which is something that should be promoted not just allowed.
- it seems entirely reasonable.
- Many livestock can be managed without much disturbance to neighbours and provide a number of benefits to those who manage them like extra income and a sense of responsibility.
- I think this could be a great way of teaching people self sustainability.
- If needs are met and there is support if surround property owners as well as proper care for the hens, yes this bylaw should be available to people with different animal needs or wants.
- I think the city will show a fair individual evaluation of each case. There should be a way to revisit the decision as well.
- As long as the animals are well cared for, their habitats are clean to avoid offensive odours, noise levels are minimal why not? To each their own. miniature pigs, goats etc.
- That would be amazing
- All these points are fair and extremely reasonable.
- Buck bocka bock bock
- As long as the animals are well treated and proper permits are in place, there's no reason livestock shouldn't be allowed
- As long as the animals are looked after and aren't really loud
- Raising hens responsibly would be a more sustainable way of living and obtaining food
- Hens if fenced in property can be great pets that can supply fresh eggs to the home owner.

- Keeping chickens (humanely and respectfully) should be a right, allowing people to appreciate agriculture and the feel more connected to food, as well as being able to supplement one's diet with eggs where one has total control over the process/enrichment and care of hens.
- Only on properties that are big enough so the livestock would not become a nuisance to neighbours. For example roosters noises, messy and or dirty backyards.
- I like the idea of urban hens and would love to collect eggs. Not sure how I feel about my neighbours keeping chickens but would like to try !
- Yes to chicken and goats
- Reasonable ways for citizens to responsibly ensure a portion of their own food supply should be encouraged.
- Things like chickens teach basic animal stewardship and important lessons in regards to understanding animals and where our food comes from.
- I have no issues with allowing hens etc being raised in the city as long as people provide proper space, shelter etc and city has clear guidelines on requirements.
- A neighbour had a few hens in a small heated coop and it was no problem for neighbours. Good idea really if well cared for.
- My concern is winter.
- There are far more responsible people in our world; we can not punish the responsible people due to a few irresponsible people -Most people want to get along with their neighbours - I like the idea that neighbours need to be on board with a majority rules rule (to weed out that one cantankerous neighbour who is never happy with anything)
- Being able to keep small livestock with support from your surrounding neighbors would benefit communities.
- I want hens
- "The mental health aspect has been fully explored and so long as neighbours and owners behave in a responsible manner, other livestock could be tolerated. HOWEVER< each request for unusual pets needs to be evaluated individually.
- Unusual' pet"
- noise and odor should also be considerations (ie, livestock ownership within the city shouldn't impact neighbors).
- Love farm animals In the city!
- As long as the needs of the animals are being met and they are safe, cared for and comfortable then people should be allowed to keep urban livestock.
- If the live stock can be cared for and treated properly it should be up to you to own them
- I want to raise rabbits in my backyard.
- Responsible pet owners shouldn't be prevented from keeping egg-laying hens to provide nourishment for their families if no issues arise from neighbours. This can be done responsibly.
- However not for food purposes
- Maximum 4-5 Free-ranging poultry only. No mammals used as livestock.

- I strongly support opening Calgarians up to keeping chickens and other small, domesticated animals, with reasonable restrictions on noise and responsible care of the animals.
- I believe this would have positive neighborhood and community impacts, provided the animals are in the care of responsible and caring owners. The animals would need to have proper and sufficient living space, with considerations for all types of weather throughout the year.
- I think that urban hens are a great idea, however, I think that it is important that checks are done to ensure that the hens are properly cared for and have heat and shelter etc. during the winter.
- Chickens can be great pets that supply food, but they need proper care.
- having your own source for fresh food would be amazing and help families put who cant afford certain foods , with prices rising .
- Urban farming is our right to sustainability.
- Pot belly pigs
- If they don't disturb neighbours by way of noise or smell.
- Support from neighbours would be a requirement and perhaps a rule on how close the facility like a hen house is to the neighbouring property.
- No hens in high density inner city neighbourhoods (e.g. infills)
- Livestock should have suitable living conditions
- As long as the animals welfare is the first priority. The law should be the same for everyone.
- I would support only if the animal's are cleaned regularly and the noise is not a issue.
- Chicken houses owned by large businesses are disgusting and a hazard to the environment. They can house 40,000+ chickens, and their feces can be smelled for kilometers around and is toxic to breath and contaminate the local water supply. ANYTHING that we can do to reduce the impact these large companies have by allowing small and local chicken ownership should be explored. Additionally, the supply chain between Canadian farms, to packaging plants in CHINA, only to be shipped BACK to Canada is a ridiculous notion and should be abolished. The impacts to the environment is too great. There should be more local support for neighborhoods to have their own small urban farms which would include local grocery stores within their local supply chain.
- as long as smells and noise are kept down
- I would like to see small stock allowed.
- I support small livestock ie pot belly pigs as intelligent companion animals.
- Helps with sustainability
- As long as cleanliness is kept up as smell can be an issue for unclean chicken coops
- I think having hen's in the city is awesome.
- Chickens, quail and bees are all less of a nuisance than dogs can be and provide positive impacts for the owner, the environment and the community by pest control, interaction/healthy hobbies, food security, biodiversity, nutrient cycle etc.
- I would support chickens and bees
- Chickens should be allowed

- I think everyone should have the right own or possess one a sustainable food source and second the right to possess what the earth provides there should be no restrictions on livestock or animals just the humans that possess them.
- I feel having hens would be an excellent resource for calgarians both for emotional support and as a food resource.
- As long as the welfare of each animal was being met, I fully support individuals caring for community-appropriate animals.
- If the neighbour's are OK with it, and the animals are well cared for, I see no reason not to allow them to be kept on someone's property.
- Would be nice to allow a three or four hen coop. Or to allow people to have pot belly pigs
- Yes providing sufficient room and housing accommodations for said animals can be provided.
- Having grown up in a rural community, I am used to having pets around. That said, there needs to be enough room, proper care and environment. I especially like the fact that there would be a support agreement required from adjacent neighbours.
- As a society we should be ready to try new ways of life, and learn from our mistakes.
- I think chickens (for example) would be excellent for keeping down garden insects and I would not see a problem if any of my neighbours had them.
- Hens are fine
- As long as the animal is well cared for and they are not a nuisance to the neighbours people should be allowed to keep livestock.
- I think it's good, but likely comes with a LOT of education on what "suitable" living conditions are.
- I've had chickens, with proper daily maintenance they are a great pet / provider
- Backyard hens provide food security. If it's done properly there's no smell or noise concern.
- Chickens provide huge benefits in terms of social engagement in the neighbourhood, food security, and reduction of pests in yards and gardens.
- Some livestock are beneficial to urban living. Chicken, goats can help a garden/yard. Just like any pet they enrich our lives and the people around us. I wouldn't keep chickens but if my neighbour did I would have no issue with that.
- We need affordable food in this very expensive city
- Love hens
- I see nothing wrong with some livestock as long as they are cared for properly
- people should have the rights to have any pet they want in their home and feed whatever wild life in their property
- Would only support this in a case by case basis as the animal needs must be met and neighbours agreement.
- Potbelly pigs are technically classified as livestock, although I've never heard of a hog farmer owning one. They can actually make really good pets. And miniature horses are the only animal besides dogs that can be classified as service animals, but are also technically considered livestock.
- Can't let it get out of control or we will have petting zoos all around.

- Finally!
- I support chicken raising.
- Allowing people to “farm” their own eggs or “chicken” allows for more financial independence and environmental sustainability.
- Makes sense to use the land we have...
- I want some hens myself
- goats for lawn and herbicide
- urban hens sounds like an excellent idea!
- There are so many unhealthy growth enhancements added to marketable livestock either through feed or injection that some of the food we eat is becoming unhealthy with negative repercussions on humans in the long term.
- food security has been highlighted due to Covid
- Community farming is excellent.
- I think there are no problems as long as their is proper living conditions and containment.
- Yes
- Great experience for kids to raise hens. As a teacher I think this would be very healthy for children and adults of all ages.
- This is out dated rule needs to be updated. Hens would provide a quality of life increase.
- Hens, pigs, and goats for example are all permitted in other manor centers in our country and those communities seem to do well with them.
- Urban farming is a valuable asset to the entire city in many ways. The more, the better - with humane and appropriate management of the stock and community highly important.
- Free the Hens. Increasing food security I think is more important otherwise I think the larger concern is animal welfare then if the neighbors like it or not. Quail and other quieter birds should be indicated as alternatives.
- My family keep hens through the 20's 30's and 40's, in Cresent Heights! Hens help with insect control. I can't speak to the "other livestock" are rabbits and bees livestock?
- End the stupidity of “urban green spaces” as the only viable option
- With appropriate controls other livestock can live in urban communities without cause for complaint from neighbors. I understand there is such a thing as 'therapy hens' for traumatized individuals. Why not?
- I think it's a great idea. I feel that there should be some kind of licence for the ownership and care of livestock animals to ensure that they have proper care, and cannot be exploited.
- People should be able to have livestock so long as they do not impact others (e.g. noise, smell). Allowing a limited number of backyard hens seems perfectly reasonable.
- it is not the place of government to limit the self sufficiency of the individual. Limited number of live stock, kept in humane conditions and not causing a loss of enjoyment of property to others, never should have been restriced to begin with
- People should be allowed to own chickens if cared for properly

- As long as suitable conditions are provided for the animals, I believe it will have a positive impact.
- Growing your own food is great! Having your own chickens to raise is important! But in winter's they would need good protection, and if left outside with no shelter the owners should be fined and no more animals
- With people wishing to have food that is grown or produce within 100 miles this would aid in supplying food especially for people who have been raised in this kind of environment.
- All animals can be emotional apart/ therapy animals
- Raising chickens and other livestock supports local communities, the economy, and reduces greenhouse emissions. It is a great idea!
- I love the idea of having urban livestock as long as they are kept in a safe, suitable environment! I personally would love to have my own hen so I am able to have eggs without worrying that they are from hens in terrible conditions in factory farms!
- Very few urban dwellers understand the complex needs of so called livestock animals. They need space, correct shelter, food, stimulation and should be allowed to live out their natural lifespan. This includes seeing a veterinarian when needed, and that can be very costly. I would only support this on a case by case basis, and there would need to be safeguards in place for the animals.
- Hens only
- Suitable living conditions is extremely important combined with adjacent neighbour support. If a dog owner isn't very responsible and they decide to get a few hens; it probably isn't going to work out.
- Urban hens and livestock can bring life back into neighbourhoods, allow for better self-sufficiency for some, and providing more environment-friendly means of garden maintenance etc. (like grass-grazing animals vs noisy and polluting lawn mowers)
- They are not as dangerous as other pets.
- Support from neighbours critical and support gathered regularly, should neighbours or conditions change. And would include language around eyesore, noise and smell obligations.
- If chickens/livestock are kept in an area where it's appropriate (not close residential areas) it could be feasible
- I think factory farming is terrible. If there's a way that these animals can instead enjoy a better life, then why not?
- I like chickens
- small numbers of livestock (hens, small goats, smallish swine) and, if kept in clean and suitable living quarters shouldn't be any different than owning dogs or cats.
- As long as the animals are living in safe and healthy environments, and are treated properly, I think it would be a great idea to allow inside the city.
- I am for allowing backyard chickens as long as the number of chickens were limited and/or no roosters allowed.
- I think that it can be an asset for communities if cared for properly and adequate space provided.
- Animals increase the happiness of people.
- "Support from adjacent neighbours should be mandatory and if this is not possible then permission should not be granted.

- Also, suitable living conditions-> needs to be very specific as to what is required.
- How many animals and what kind? No roosters for sure! Don't need cows and donkeys in the city either."
- it creates a stronger sense of community and can offer healthier food choices
- Only if inspections were regular
- As long as the Owner is responsible and knowledgeable in the care of livestock I'm in favour of people having livestock kept as pets.
- But there should be bylaw enforcement to ensure the livestock does not have diseases
- If they can make sure the animal is taken care of and has the proper necessities
- I feel like more local small farms could be good for the well-being of people struggling.
- As long as the animals are being taken care of, I don't think there should be any problems with it.
- Neighborhoods should have some say in chickens next door. They can be very smelly
- Only if the owner upkeeps the clean up of the waste.
- Provided the chickens have a proper chicken coop and are managed and fed, chickens would not be allowed in peoples homes.
- Reasonable measures can be taken to prevent disturbance, and it makes Calgary a more sustainable city.
- Only if proper arrangements are made. I would not want to be a neighbour to someone with livestock if they do not properly care for and clean the animals and their living space.
- I only support this if there are checks on the animals to ensure they have a good quality of life, and only if it is regulated.
- My answer is really maybe: I am unsure whether Calgarians have enough space in the city for hens to give a good life. It might be difficult to provide oversight to how they are treated, how the space is managed after approval is given by neighbours and others - wonder if community hens could be created, similar to community gardens.
- Chickens are cool
- I don't believe pet owners should be limited to typical pets. If a person can provide reasonable care and conditions for livestock in city limits without causing disturbance to their neighbors there should be no reason they cannot keep them.
- As long as it isn't used for farming meat and an excessive amount of hens where the smell becomes inhabitable, I'm all for hens.
- I would support this bylaw if restrictions on the number of livestock is enforced and if livestock is kept within owner's property, which must be fenced.
- I definitely agree it should be on a case by case basis. I like that this would include the opinions of the immediate neighbors, as well as property size and enclosure standards.
- as long as e1 is in agreement and the animals are properly cared for
- I'm all for it
- I have no desire for livestock but would not be opposed to someone having some ducks or chickens with the qualification that the noise and smell is not burdensome for neighbours.

- Don't make it hinge on neighbour support. Just make clear rules and consequences for not following. Someone doesn't have to get neighbourhood approval to have a kid or get a bunny or a cat....just make the rules explicit and prescriptive for animal and human health. (Structures approved, proximity to property lines, number of birds per square footage/property, etc).
- Providing the area is of sufficient size and offers suitable housing, I would be fully supportive. The only potential issue would be if hens were to be killed for food and blood/feathers were scattered around the yard with potential for blowing into other yards and surrounding neighbourhood.
- I think plenty of people would be able to raise hens responsibly. They're less dangerous and disruptive than other animals allowed in the city. I really don't see what the difference is.
- Chickens are great
- Chickens aren't inherently a nuisance, and with growing economic insecurity calgarians need service animals to provide them with food, and psychological wellness. Chickens have been proven to enhance quality of life and setting up grounds for proper care and training would create jobs for those with experience with poultry animals.
- As long as the hens are well cared for, we would be fine if they lived next door.
- Having hens live in suitable conditions is vastly better than the terrible places they live in chicken farms or egg farms. Anything to reduce animal cruelty is a win.
- People are allowed to grow their own gardens; why not have their own access to eggs? Plus some livestock would make great pets, like goats.
- It will help many to get emotional support and will bring the good change in communities
- Providing that the owners have a large enough space to accommodate suitable living conditions and it not impacting neighbouring properties. Support from adjacent neighbours is paramount.
- Pets and urban livestock are not an issue if properly maintained and the property has enough space for the animals. Proper bylaws need to be created and enforced for issues to be addressed.
- If adjacent neighbours are supportive and things are well maintained and not disruptive, supporting initiatives that help people support livelihood etc appears beneficial. I feel it would depend on the property as well though (size, fences with neighbors and to the alley, potential noise issues)
- It is a great idea to allow people to grow their own food.
- For the safety of the hens and the public please do not allow people to swap hens over Kijiji or online. This is how disease spreads. Basic livestock husbandry course should be mandatory to obtain a license. All hens should be vaccinated and provided a clean coop.
- I would support this as long as the animals are not being kept in Calgary to be slaughtered and eaten. This should be prohibited.
- I think the points above adequately address concerns and give Calgarians an opportunity for keeping these kinds of animals when it makes sense.
- If proper care can be given to the animal and property without disturbances to the neighbors, I don't see much difference than having a bunny or dog.
- More bees please! Provided animals are in a healthy environments. However I do not think neighbours should get to dictate /overrule as this will be based on personal bias - eg. "just don't like the idea of chickens next door" or "my kid has a bee allergy so no to a hive next door"

- I would support hens but only if the protocols are such that they cannot negatively affect a neighbor. Yards should be large enough, pens kept away from neighbours etc.
- See other cities.
- A few chickens for fresh eggs seems reasonable - only for that homes use not to be sold commercially out of yard -
- Except I think the 'support from adjacent neighbours' point needs to be considered a bit more. Many people do not get along with their neighbours for various reasons and I think that if someone interested in getting backyard hens/other livestock were to have to obtain permission from their neighbour, it could get even more contentious.
- A small animal such as chickens should be allowed in the city as they are able to produce food (eggs) without taking up too much space and are lower maintenance than other livestock. Before getting urban chickens, the owner in question should have their yard inspected for a suitable area for the chickens and checked in on after a certain amount of time to ensure the chickens are still taken care of.
- Absolutely! So many communities are allowing hens and they are great. Not very noisy, wonderful animals.
- Not for food
- Allowing people to provide for themselves, whether they are used for eggs or as support animals, only seems like a good idea.
- I think there's nothing wrong with owning hens as long as they are well cared for.
- As long as everyone (including hens) is happy with the arrangement, I see no reason to prohibit it.
- As long as this is not meant for food
- As long it is not affecting neighbors quality of life
- Animals can be a large part of a fulfilling life (e.g., mine provide emotional well-being, exercise, etc.) and there's no reason to limit that opportunity to your "usual" pets. Livestock can teach any age how to take care of animals, can provide food (chicken eggs, goats with milk, etc.), and can provide a positive outlet for energy and time that could otherwise be wasted.
- chickens are amazing for sustainable living.
- People should be allowed to have animals that do not impose on neighbors. Hens are quiet and provide many benefits.
- Gives people better access to healthy food and increase food security of our community so I'm all for it as long as not a health issue, overcrowding etc and animals are being taken care of humanely. And that City would then support more bylaw to actually enforce bylaw.
- Conditions would need to be purely recreational farming and humane
- As long as the livestock animals are not interfering with other citizens lives in a negative way, there's no reason to not permit them.
- The bullet points above seem to cover needful criteria well.
- i think fresh eggs would be very nice and all my neighbours would love it and also me as well
- Having hens in Calgary would be great.
- Sounds good to me

- If you're capable of great care of your pets why not if you can't then don't have a pet
- I think people should be allowed to own and care for a small number of chickens, on the conditions that they are humanely kept and have the correct living conditions and space.
- I don't feel I know enough about this matter to provide an educated argument one way or another, but I certainly have reservations about various livestock being permitted on residential properties. If allowed, would like to see strict criteria for what is allowed, a high level of enforcement of bylaws, and tight restrictions on the number of livestock permitted.
- As long as the hens are not causing a nuisance (smell or noise within reason). And are being kept humanly.
- Ensure bylaw remains a positive impact for the community. If at any point it becomes negative, restrictions should be imposed.
- As long as neighbours have a say and everything is kept in a clean state
- A case by case basis would be integral, I have raised chickens and in the winter mths in Calgary they need a warm coop or they will die a miserable death.
- hens are cute.
- Greater freedom of personal choice and seems positive
- Hens are fairly quiet and healthy fresh eggs is never a bad thing.
- There is a lot of community interest in keeping hens in Calgary. Keeping hens for eggs may provide economic and environmental benefits as the hens produce food very locally. I would, however, suggest that noisy and/or aggressive roosters are not kept regularly in residential areas.
- Urban hens have been successful in other cities
- Neighbour approval is very important
- Chickens are awesome.
- They are animals in captivity and must be looked after accordingly
- It would be positive to allow Calgarians have back yard chickens for a variety of reasons. It's important for people to do it properly so completing an online course and getting a type of license before would be good.
- Hens should be allowed in private yards if the homeowner is following proper guidelines provided by the city. As well, owners should not be allowed more than 8 hens. Owners should have a proper coop and appropriate space for the hens. Roosters should not be allowed in residential yards.
- Livestock in the city should not be permitted. My neighbour has a hen and a rooster and he's constantly making a fuss or whenever anyone walks in there home he just goes nuts and I can hear him even with my windows closed. Livestock is a nuisance in the city.
- I agree as long as it's allowed with reasonable thought. Ie. winter time and space for heated shelter on land, land space, neighbour proximity etc
- Livestock is a far reaching word but as many are finding they are urban contributors of health and welfare of a diverse animal groups. This may assist with connectivity to other animals and their well being.
- People should be allowed.
- I think this is a great idea, support community and possibly provide food for lower income families

- Communities and individuals can benefit greatly from having accessible livestock if acceptable conditions can be provided.
- Food grown at home
- If the animal is not a nuisance to neighbors, then they should be allowed.
- It would be important to ensure that each owner of hens or other livestock are well educated on the needs of the animals and are able to care for them for the duration of their lives. Similar to canine/feline adoption, evaluations should be done and possibly a training session (potentially ongoing support- i.e. health questions etc.) for those who choose to take on these animals, aiming to prevent abuse and encourage proper living conditions.
- I think this makes sense in our world of factory farming.
- I have no issues with a few animals as pets I just don't want farms in my neighborhood.
- Love this! As long as hens and other animals are treated well by people. Great for food security and fun pets for owners.
- Other livestock such as rabbits, turkeys, geese, guinea pigs, etc. should be allowed if space and accommodations are suitable, and if all nearby neighbours are fully informed of the possible issues (smell, noise, other pests, etc.) and agree that it is feasible.
- Livestock can be raised and treated like a pet
- I think hens are reasonably non intrusive and it would follow the lead of other municipalities.
- As long as there is sufficient space for the animal
- I like the idea of people controlling where their food comes from. Especially after COVID shortages, local is always better
- If they are provided adequate shelter and provided for appropriately
- This may open up suitable homes for many species
- As long as surrounding neighbours agree, they should be able to have chickens!
- There are no problems with livestock in the city, no more problems than any other animal as long as there are regulations, as there are with any other animal.
- Chickens are fun. But the term other livestock seems vague.
- I agree with this.
- Hens are pets that poop breakfast. It could enhance the community to share eggs. I don't really know about keeping other animals in an urban situation, but the amendments sound like they will be effective in determining feasibility.
- I am completely on board bringing live stock into the city
- There are certain areas that have large enough yards to support such an endeavour. With certain square footage and neighbour approval I support hens
- Its a beneficial situation for evryone.
- If this program is being enforced and monitored by the City, it would be for the greater impact on our environment.
- If people want chickens and other livestock living on their property, they should be allowed to do so as long as the animals are being taken care of properly and remain on the designated property.

- This will need to have an application policy, and will need to regulate the care of the animals and consideration for neighbors
- There is nothing wrong with people having this. The fact your asking this is ridiculous.
- if it can be done safely without reproccussion to others, there should be no reason not to be more self sustaining.
- As long as chickens amd other livestock have the appropriate living conditions and the correct amount of space given I don't see a problem with it.
- As long as suitable homes and large enough spaces are able to be provided for the animals, I support this.
- Like any other pet/domestic animal, the living conditions and general health of the animal needs to be upkeep. A mandatory semi yearly or annually checkup needs to happen. That being said - the checkup fees/cost should be affordable so people are able to keep up with the testing/vet care.
- As long as the livestock is safely contained in the persons yard I don't see why someone shouldn't be able to house them. That being said size limits should be considered, nothing larger than a large breed dog
- Hens rule
- As long as neighbours were good with it.
- Urban hens are both rewarding pets as well as contributing to the nutritional needs of households. They are also excellent educational tools. They also provide nonchemical mosquito control.
- You should be able to have livestock so long as your property can properly support them. I suggest a home visit occur if you apply for a permit to assess the property to see if it can support livestock.
- Animals should be allowed as long as they are properly taken care of
- I like the idea of having my own chicken. There are wild grouse around my neighborhood and don't find them to be bothersome at all.
- Ownership of livestock animals should be allowed as long as the owner can carry the burden of owning such animals. As stated prior ownership extends into responsibility and if an owner cannot carry said responsibility in regards to an animal they should not be allowed said ownership.
- Keeping hens seems like a great idea (more utility out of a chicken than any other pet), provided they can be managed so they don't attract coyotes, cats, bobcats, dogs, raccoons into the area.
- People have a right to grow and raise their own food.
- Smaller livestock can be well taken care of in the city with considerations for the appropriate space, shelter and basic needs. The owners of the small livestock should also be appropriately vetted and receive training before becoming involved in raising small livestock.
- Backyard chickens, love everything about the idea
- i think that small livestock could improve the quality of urban life.
- Limit on the amount of animals on a property
- Less reliance on factory farming is important for the environment
- Urban chickens should be allowed as long as the owners are responsible to both the animals and their neighbours.
- "why not? Chickens are dope.

- Leave the pitbulls alone."
- The hens must NOT be killed for food. That should be part of the agreement, and illegal. The commercial agricultural farmed animals industry is horrific and inflicts untold pain and abuse and suffering on all animals in it, but especially chickens. Canada is backwards in it's lack of protections for all animals. Owning hens, who may lay eggs, can allow them to be treated with some dignity, or even as a beloved pet. And it can help people to avoid supporting the abuse industry. There needs to be strict guidelines about the housing and proper care of the hens so they have access to being in grassed areas, roosting, and other normal hen behaviour.
- As long as the welfare of the livestock is monitored and thought is given to how these animals impact the neighbors and their property (potentially) I support all aspects of urban farming.
- As long as the animals are not a nuisance , not abused and bring benefit and positive impact to people or the environment, why not
- As long as there is some strict rules and bylaws limited amount of animals and proper treatment
- I think as long as the animals have suitable living conditions to thrive and the appropriate resources to be cared for (ie. vet) then it's okay.
- If having some hens brings my neighbours joy so be it.
- I have had backyard hens in other cities in Canada and I would LOVE to keep hens as pets again! But there should be a mandatory training to complete before newbies get hens to ensure they are warm in the winter and stay safe and healthy.
- If it doesn't bother neighbours, why not?
- It would be amazing for the neighbourhood to have people educated on how to raise hens with the support of your neighbours.
- My partner would like to raise hens for eggs
- Would not suggest cows or horses unless over 2 acre property, if applicable. May need limit on roosters.
- Urban hens can be lovely. Noise, smell, nuisance, and other considerations would be relevant considerations.
- Should be a limit on the number of animals aloud & how noisy they are.
- Welfare on the animals in paramount. The animals cannot be slaughtered on the property.
- with exception to larger animals cows, horses, and pigs... alligators, crocs, and poisonous snakes
- I support urban hens!!!!
- I disagree with support from surrounding neighbour's, it's incredibly frustrating to have to deal with those who nitpick or abuse the legal system to make your life more difficult. Almost as if they constantly need a holier than thou validation
- Where sufficient conditions allow, having hens or other non-obnoxious livestock would foster a more sustainable, and resilient community.
- We need to get back to basics of supplying our own foods. Gardens too should be encouraged and lawns taxed.

- Responsible guardianship is needed
- As long as livestock don't cause a nuisance to neighbours, citizens should be free to keep and raise livestock, like hens, as they would be both beneficial and, to some, companions to their owners.
- Hens should absolutely be allowed.
- I support opening up the bylaw to support households maintaining a SMALL supply of livestock. There needs to be a limit. My concern is the City's ability to enforce it.
- I think this is fine as long as it's regulated and the owners responsible.
- This would give people to have a home based food supply if the commercial food supply falls apart or not enough supply brought in like we have seen in the recent past due to Covid 19.
- I think if people responsibly care for urban hens that it can help address food security and allow people to be involved in their own food procurement process. I would also love a zero tolerance policy if people are not caring for their hens responsibly
- Small livestock should be licensed the same as cats/ dogs. No large livestock (ie. larger than dog breeds).
- Urban farming needs to be more popular. People need to learn how to feed themselves
- Many, many more goats should be used for weed control in public parks. Whatever by laws need to be amended for this to be possible should immediately be amended. This should happen irrespective of the results of this particular outreach.
- If someone really wants to have hens and it will not be a nuisance to neighbours, then why not? If there is a rooster involved, maybe not so much. But reasonably sized livestock suited to urban living seems okay if looked at on a case by case basis.
- If the needs of the animal are met and it won't cause any disruption to the community; why not?
- This in theory should be fine. But could be abused in the case of apartments or small farms ran in back yards. It becomes problematic when too many people in one area have a large quantity of those animals due to waste, feed, and inherent living conditions
- I would LOVE to have hens in my backyard, as they would be good for the garden and taking care of the bug infestation problem. Grew up on a farm, so familiar with taking care of livestock.
- As long as procedures protect against cruel conditions and the living does not become a health concerns
- Although I support the amendment, I would be concerned about possible noise and odours. Also, people move so I wonder how complicated it could get if adjacent neighbours move and new neighbours don't support the idea.
- Could help sustain families and possibly communities.
- I believe anyone should be able to have a pet as long as they're able to provide the correct living conditions.
- Gets Calgary more in touch with what is surrounding it. And pets are not just cats and dogs.
- With responsibility comes accountability. If they are properly taken care of this poses no issue.
- Why not! As long as the hen owner is responsible and CLEAN !! Must maintain CLEANLINESS !! Mandatory cleanliness!!!

- it's environmentally friendly. they may be using the hens/other livestock to try and live a more sustainable life.
- Cannot be a nuisance to surrounding neighbours and must be in a clean environment and properly looked after
- There should be limits on the number of livestock (depending on kind) and a requirement for suitable, clean living conditions
- Depending on how livestock are sheltered and cared for, they can have a positive impact on communities by fostering engagement and care-of-place in addition to the many ways that it could contribute toward educating people about food systems and creating food sharing programs.
- ...
- Home owners should be allowed to own their own small livestock as long as it is not disturbing the neighborhood, should be a limit on how many animals can be owned for smell and noise reasons and depending on property type if they can be there at all, should require a permit and only certain parts of the city can obtain the permit, ie. cant own on a townhouse property or close living spaces.
- as long as the possession of these animals doesn't negatively impact neighbors i see no issue. Eg as long as the neighbors can't smell the chicken or something like that its fine.
- As long as the livestock is regularly inspected for health and safety and good neighbor compliance
- Referring to the section below on fine increases for violations. It has been largely proven that fines are only a deterrent for those that can't afford them. Or in other words, if you have the money, it's not illegal. A different model of punishment and deterrence should be explored.
- If your animals aren't bothering other neighbours, then whats the harm? If you want livestock, you should have to have approval of all neighbours connected to your property, or potentially impacted by the animals.
- People should be allowed to own hens. People in England own them in their back yard why can't we here?
- The reason not to just never made any sense.
- This supports many food trends - local shopping, knowing what's in your food, etc.
- I see no issue with livestock in urban areas, as long as they have appropriate living conditions and access to waste disposal
- As long as all the above was met, and, like domestic animals there is some type of limit set to how many a home can have it can have a positive impact on communities. Education for young children learning how to care for chickens and benefit from eggs would be awesome!
- i think having animals like chickens within city limits could prove to be beneficial
- If the birds are supported by the relevant people, neighbours, etc. , then it should be fine.
- It has been successful in other cities.
- sustainable living
- Provided that there is oversight and review of urban livestock then this would be fine
- There should be a licence for flock/pack and quantity which finances possible clean up after a bad owner leaves and the hens remain. Note experience of meat pigeons left after owners let them go becoming a nuisance, and rabbits.

- I believe that urban livestock such as hens would contribute to food security and vibrancy for the city. As other municipalities have now demonstrated how to integrate hens successfully to urban settings, the information and blueprints exist to implement this in Calgary.
- Seems like a good idea
- Initial support from neighbors as well as support from neighbors on an annual basis (or every 2 years?).. people might not know what to expect but they'll know a year later whether that was a good decision..
- as long as the living conditions can be provided for the animal, people should be allowed
- Live stock can be around Calgary as long as our property taxes won't triple again.
- Some livestock animals are also pets.
- Individuals living in the city would be more aware and included in what they are eating.
- Chickens are awesome
- The cost of living in Calgary is too high. Keeping livestock in the city can reduce that
- If you have the proper needs for the animal and it doesn't affect others why not.
- Urban hens could be suitable so long as there is no detriment to the community and local flora/fauna
- As long as there were proper steps in place to ensure the quality of life for the animal; visits completed on an annual basis (at minimum) to ensure compliance.
- I think this is a good idea for people who can't afford to live outside the city. Small animals such as donkeys, goats, ducks and chickens are good for pest and weed control as well as mental health. With proper shelter and feed they would be fine in enclosed yards.
- I support this bylaw amendment provided that urban hens will be licensed so that fees can be collected to hire more bylaw officers and pay for training regarding the health and wellness of hens.
- I think some options could be explored with limitations to kinds of animals and amounts allowed to be owned
- Worth trying this idea given these criteria.
- I would love to be a chicken owner and would support neighbours who are interested as well.
- I would love to have chickens if I could!
- I do support, however I do know that livestock could create a bad smell for neighbours and the community if not tended after appropriately. My experience was on a farm with multiple hens, so maybe urban hens wouldn't be as smelly but I do not know.
- As long as the animals are taken care of and do not pose a threat or nuisance to neighbors, then they should be allowed.
- Hens are a safe low nuisance animal but required consent from the neighbours is a flaw. It will not pass the legal Department review (as happened in Medicine Hat). My neighbours can not decide what happens on my personal property. Additionally this is not a requirement for other pets and does not make sense.
- having 3 hens would supply a family with fresh free range eggs; this could be seen as cost saving -- but I would not allow any animal bigger than a goat. and the goats could be trained to go on walks on leashes; and as long as they are fed a vegan diet; their waste can be used as fertilizer.
- Good for people to be self sufficient

- Support animals of any kind.
- Community based, community supporting; self-sustaining;
- I think having small farm animals like goats and chickens in the City would be fine if they have suitable living conditions.
- I think allowing a small number of hens is a great idea
- You should be able to raise a few chickens for fresh eggs..
- Lots of people would like the novelty of having livestock but do they know how to properly care for them. Proof of a course in this should have to be provided.
- Urban farming can have lots of benefits
- hens should be allowed in numbers no greater than the number of people residing in the home plus 1. Area for the hens must be adequate to provide a comfortable space for the animal, and must be kept clean and safe to prevent the spread of disease.
- Why not allow urban hens. It is just like keeping any other animal captive.
- I believe in supporting self sufficient food growth. It's cleaner and healthier and we know where our food comes from.
- Adjacent neighbours should be left out of it: whether we like it or not, there are adjacent neighbours who unfortunately will not offer support - either because of mental health, whether they rent or own, just don't like you. If the adjacent neighbours offer support, and then move in future (unrelated to livestock), would realtors or landlords have to disclose where livestock resides if near the property they are viewing? - could pose difficulties in the long run (needing neighbour support?).
- Eating close to home is always best for every body
- Having small livestock, like chickens in your yard can be good for a family. Kids can learn responsibility as well as appreciation for animals. But I do think that strict guidelines on enclosures, care, noise and numbers will be needed. While I'd be ok with my neighbor having a couple chickens, I would not want to be kept awake by dozens of them as the noise and smell would get too much. Bee hives should also be allowed and encouraged. Bees are very vulnerable and so anything that helps sustain their numbers is a good thing.
- I believe as individuals we should be able to have a system in place to feed our families in case the chain of supply falls apart as we have recently seen with the Covid 19 pandemic.
- I think that just about the only bylaw I support for private property are noise and odor complaints. If your neighbors can't sleep because your chickens won't shut up, or if the smell emanating from your livestock permeates their property, they should have some recourse.
- As long as noise and cleanliness don't become an issue, I don't see any problems.
- This could lead to fostering more community enrichment and could also be used as a positive learning experience for children in certain situations.
- Hens can be a very valuable addition to urban properties, for the following reasons: 1) Food security. A steady and secure supply of fresh eggs for the residents of the property increases food security and reduces the number and frequency of trips required to the grocery store. 2) Food responsibility. More people in urban centres taking personal responsibility for the production of a portion of their food supply, means less environmental pressure is put on local and remote ecosystems that are facing destruction due to increases in industrial agricultural production. 3) Hens are beneficial to urban gardens and food production systems because they eat slugs and other garden "pests", and in turn provide nutrient-rich manure that can be used as fertilizer as well as a valuable addition to backyard compost. 4) Hens and other animals can provide companionship and caring for them can provide a sense of purpose for those who provide the appropriate care and level of responsibility.

- Promotes food security
- I have no issue having hens in the city.
- If there were only a certain amount of animals allowed on property to reduce the noise then I think it would be fine to own
- As long as the needs of the animals, public and wildlife (particularly with regards to health and zoonosis) are considered, I think this is great.
- I believe urban livestock could be extremely beneficial to the City of Calgary as it will allow for more people to purchase eggs from local sources rather than unethical farms selling eggs in grocery stores
- Some people claim these animals as pets. Supervision can help out.

Participants who indicated they would not support this bylaw amendment are listed here.

- I think people would own animals like hens to murder and slaughter for their own food. We come from a country who provides for us without our neighbors doing this act next to us. Don't allow it in the city
- Too small of lots in Calgary for this not to be a noise or odour concern for nearby neighbors.
- Farm animals should be left on the farm outside the city
- Just live on a farm
- We don't need to increase the risk of allergies and viruses if any due to livestock.
- It's so congested in an urban setting how are these animals not going to be a nuisance, plus have enough room to live comfortably?
- Most housing in Calgary is close together and dense (ie: shared fence lines). There is potential for additional parasites, infections and allergies. Farm animals do not belong within city limits. Bird feces is problematic (look at how many complaints there are for so few dove keepers).
- You can have an agreement with a neighbor and then they sell their house and the next neighbor may not agree with the livestock. Allergies to live stock and animals are a huge issue. No one wants to hear chicken or other livestock in the early morning, during the day, or at night.
- "It is no longer the 1800s
- Chickens and other livestock (pigs, horses, cows, etc) have no place in an urban setting as they attract vermin, cause bad odours and can be annoying noise wise. We had them on the farm and know what can happen with them. If people want livestock they should consider moving to the countryside."
- Too loud and smelly
- If I wanted to smell livestock, I'd live on a farm.

- Livestock belong on properties where they can be cared for properly. Not in backyards.
- I don't want hens in Calgary
- i do not think chickens, goats, pigs etc belong in a residential setting. people that wish this should buy a farm.
- there should be no farm animals too much noise and smells
- Farm animals do not belong in the city and if people can't be bothered to appropriately care for cats and dogs and respect neighbours I have zero doubt it would be different with farm animals. It would be worse.
- These animals belong on a farm they are smelly if people want them they should live in the country
- Hens are farm animals, a city environment is not appropriate. too noisy, not enough space to give proper housing and husbandry. I do not feel that this will be monitored by the city and properly enforced.
- Not at all excited about livestock being my neighbour. Isn't that what acreages and farms are for?
- Hens should be kept on farms and not in dangerous city limits
- Hens belong to farms. Really.
- Keep them on the farm
- Farm animals are not meant to be kept in the city and despite these stipulations, it will be increasingly hard for bylaw to keep up with the amount of people abusing this.
- I do not think we need any livestock living within city limits. This should be for farm or acreage only.
- Suitable living conditions for the animals matter. The opinion of neighbours do not.
- Noise, respect for neighbors, minor offenses and infractions usually go unreported or neglected
- Livestock are noisy and smelly and belong outside the city.
- I have been around chickens as a child as I grew up on a farm. They are noisy, stinky, and should be kept inside someone's home as the norm rather than outside when the weather is nicer. We have issues with coyotes and other nuisance domestic animals, why continue to attract attention?
- Livestock smells, and can be noisy
- Livestock should be given adequate space. Most city residents can not accommodate this
- I think it's fine to allow a small number of livestock for personal food consumption but I'm wary of exceptions being managed with full discretion.
- Smell, noise, disease
- This would attract coyotes which are already an issue in many areas
- Livestock do not belong within city limits. Even the largest properties within the city limits are not suitable for livestock. May also constitute problems with enclosures having to be built and maintained, etc...
- People don't pickup after their pets as it is have you smelled a hen house even when they are clean not a nice odor
- I don't want chickens.
- I do not support livestock in the city
- People shouldn't be raising animals to use them.

- We don't need more noise and stench in Calgary.
- People are going to get tired of having these urban hens. The animals could be treated wrongly and abandoned.
- It would be important to define livestock
- Neighbours are too close for additional types of animals. They would be disruptive
- they are messy, they attract predators like pigeon hawks.
- As I have grown up in a rural area, I know and understand the noise level that certain livestock, such as pigs and goats, have. They would be a nuisance.
- Hens and chickens should not be allowed in the city period. They attract unwanted wild animals like coyotes.
- An urban area does not provide living conditions suited to livestock.
- They smell and they're loud. I don't want to hear them or smell their scat. I don't want to have other livestock either. Go live on the country.
- They are dirty. And a loud
- Picking one breed and saying they can't do this or that is wrong and I'll leave Calgary
- Animals that can survive in small huts with minimal noise should be allowed. Other animals belong on large farm land with adequate care and owner having the expertise. Also don't want the smell in my neighbourhood!!
- Intice more animal attacks
- Support from adjacent neighbours isn't enough. What about when neighbours move and the new ones are stuck with a situation they didn't approve of? In addition, it wouldn't only be those adjacent affected by the smell, etc.
- Not all owners will abide by rules. Just see all the roaming cats.
- Unless there is enough space for the livestock, i.e. in rural areas, I don't see how they would not be a nuisance in Calgary and to neighbours.
- IF YOU WANT LIVESTOCK MOVE TO A FARM - SHOULD NOT BE ALLOWED IN THE CITY LIMITS
- Unsure of the practicality. So many people can't seem to care for their property, let alone livestock!!!!
- Livestock belongs on a farm not in the suburbs. Livestock cannot have a balanced life in 6x6 pen in a backyard
- "Could lead to people living next door to a big problem.
- Chickens are fine. Other livestock, just no."
- Chicken and livestock should stay on farms where they are properly cared for. Disease can easily spread through city populations through uncared for livestock and chicken.
- Yards are too small for livestock. Not fair to neighbors who don't want it. Chain link fences will not block the animals
- Bs
- They don't belong in the city
- Foreign animal disease

- With how many coyotes we have out, this is a recipe for disaster.
- You'll allow hens in the city which you damn well know will become a hoarding issue, but because people are ignorant and scared of the way a dog looks you're trying to enforce these dogs to be in muzzles. Disgusting and ignorant! You need to get some proper education on the breed, you small minded homosapians.
- Farm animals belong on a farm where they have the space to be happy and live their normal lives
- It would increase predator population in high populated areas of the city
- [Removed] [removed], chickens belong on farms.
- How do you enforce this. The city can't enforce and ensure safe living conditions for existing and approved pets.
- Chickens are noisy and annoying
- They are farm animals and no city animals
- I don't think in any situation having livestock in an urban environment is safe or responsible in any situation.
- Livestock belong on farms. Hens included.
- Livestock does not deserve to be in a crowded city. I don't believe it's healthy to the livestock.
- Livestock should not be on private property within the city. If you want to own a farm move to farm land
- Livestock don't belong in cities.
- I do not think livestock animals should be allowed. They are smelly and noisy.
- I do not feel that hens are appropriate for urban areas and belong in a farm. They are not pets.
- Hens don't belong in the city, they need a heated place that they can stay in during the winter. There aren't enough veterinarians that can care for these animals
- I do not need to listen to roosters at the crack of dawn.
- Noise. Smell. Small yards and lots
- You can't be serious. We don't live in acreages, we live on postage stamps. Too dense
- Tension is high enough amongst neighbors without adding this potential noise and odor conflict.
- They are gross and no neighbour wants to be next to it
- Hens have no place in a city and there is way more rural space available for them.
- There are not even proper laws to protect dogs and cats that are being neglected, abused, left outside summer and winter, inadequate food and water and bedding. Livestock such as goats or pit bellied pigs require specialized food and vet care. That is not even available within Calgary. Too many people think it would be cool to have one without knowledge or financial resources. Then what: abandoned, starved, sick, or surrendered (To where). Please no.
- People shouldn't be allowed to have farms in the city
- "When I consider that we are in the middle of a viral pandemic that began with animal to human transmission,
- this seems like a bad idea."
- I don't see this very feasible in the city.

- I don't see the benefits.
- I wouldn't trust humans to manage themselves responsibly, the chickens wouldn't be the issue.
- If I wanted to live on a farm I would.
- Livestock should not be allowed in city
- I don't agree with having other livestock in urban areas
- Humans are not meant to live with certain types of animals. It is in our DNA and Covid -19 is likely an example of what happens when humans interact with animals in ways we haven't quite "evolved" in to. It will open up "fad" pet owners who eventually get rid of their animals when they grow tired of them and it will be the start of widespread Calgarians eating their pets and that will add to our global image of being a redneck city which is apparently more Alabama than Alabama from the perspective of us being red necks. Let's become a less red neck city and not live with barn animals.
- I live on an acreage and people regularly complain about the smells of the farms. This smell could potentially be in your neighborhood now. Keep livestock where it belongs.
- I do not want hens next door to me, in part as that would be the trigger for my dogs prey drive and likely result in nuisance behaviour such as barking or increased aggression. I would also be concerned about how this might increase the presence of rodents seeking the food.
- Livestock in the city will only encourage more predators (cougars, coyotes, etc.). Small dogs and cats are already being preyed on by predators; allowing livestock will only make that worse.
- [removed]
- I feel that livestock need more area to live on then a property in the city could adequately provide
- Enough already.
- Livestock should not be allowed in the city our neighbors have pigeons and it just awful and bylaw has been called several times will not solution.
- Noise
- If they want hens buy an acreage
- I'd be concerned about the noise of such animals in the city.
- Farm or other similar animals, including flocks of birds, are not suited to city living when cages, odour and noise may be difficult to manage
- Noise bylaws in this noise are lacking. Imagine a person getting funded for clucking hens but not for installing an air-conditioning unit between two houses.... Ludicrous. Let people have chickens, crack down on noise pollution
- I do not want to smell livestock nor do I want the noise. People are complaining about coyotes and the safety of their pets. I grew up in the country and I know the coyotes and feral cats would love to snack on city chickens.
- Hens are livestock. Not pets.
- I do not support using animals for food production.
- "People don't pick up dog poop. They are not going to clean up chicken s#!t!

- Any additional animals attract more predatory animals into city."
- Move to a farm if you want chickens.
- "I am not sure what kind of livestock or what need one would have for it in the city.
- Hens can be an issue of the get out or aren't properly enclosed, goats are escape artists, eat everything, and like to jump on cars. Sheep you might be able to get away with. Cows need to be moved often and will turn grassy yards into mud. Horses maybe, but again need to be cleaned up after daily and exercised well. Most livestock are herd animals and don't do well alone, and all of them require proper shelter and feed/watering areas"
- Keep livestock out of urban areas.
- I don't want chickens waking me up in the morning!
- The idea seems interesting. However, the smell, mess and noise within a community with close residents would be terrible and frustrating.
- Don't want the noise or smell
- if I have chickens, and current neighbors are ok with it then they move and new ones do not like it? I would have to give them up.
- Livestock, their waste, noise and potential diseases should remain in areas zoned for agriculture not in urban residential.
- The presence of hens would be irresponsible with the population density of Calgary. It would attract predators in such as coyotes as most people don't have experience in making a secure hen house.
- No this is stupid it's not fair to the animals
- This would be the first step towards becoming a third world city.
- Chickens do not belong in the city.
- If I wanted to live in a farming community, I'd move to a farm.
- I'm not opposed to someone having one or two chickens but I would not want the noise and smell associated with hen houses in my neighbourhood.... even worse if it's a pig or pony.
- Noise and smell
- Having those animals in yards in a city only invites predators causing other issues.
- There's a reason they live on farms
- I do not feel that urban house yards are large enough to provide suitable living conditions for livestock, including chickens.
- I grew up on a farm. Hens in the city is not a good idea for neighbours or the birds.
- Livestock should live on a farm.
- Process sounds cumbersome and a waste of taxpayers money to allow someone to have chickens or other livestock
- You're discriminating a dog based on its breed
- Our city stinks enough farms belong on farmland
- Loud, smelly
- They are noisy and they smell, houses are too close together in the City

- People will get chickens thinking it's a good idea without understanding the sanitation required. I feel like the chicken coops will start to pose problems
- As a property owner I would not want livestock beside me.
- Hens/chickens are far too noisy to have in a community.
- This has the potential to cause conflict between neighbours and enforcement is very subjective. The bylaw officer may feel it doesn't warrant action though to the complainant it is a serious complaint and impacts their ability to fully enjoy their property due to smell, noise etc. The interpretation of too noisy and too smelly are subjective so there is a high probability one of the parties will think the outcome is not fair. Do not create more conflict by allowing this amendment.
- Livestock belongs outside the city.
- These are NOT urban animals, shouldn't be held inside the city.
- Livestock need a great deal of living space and specialized care, and since most of them are prey animals, they are high stress. A city is not a good environment for livestock.
- We have wild cats and other wild predators in our neighbourhood. I do not want them more interested in our area because of pet chickens.
- I do not support the keeping of livestock or hens in a suburban environment. These are farm animals.
- Farm livestock belongs on a farm, cared for by farmers who know what they are doing not city slickers who's care of the animals borders on animal abuse due to their lack of farm husbandry knowledge!
- Chickens are not clean animals and stink. Bad enough having a chicken coop on the farm let alone in tight urban spaces. There is not enough room in the city for residential coops.
- We live in a city for a reason. Chickens can carry disease and be a nuisance.
- I would not want to listen to half of the city with livestock as pets I would increase too much awful smell as well as extra unnecessary noise.
- "Suitable living conditions" for livestock are almost never "suitable" and do not promote animal welfare.
- Chickens are noisy, smelly, and can harbour all kinds of bacteria. If people want chickens. They need to move to the country.
- I worry about the smell and noise
- Hens should not be in the city
- We don't live in farms. If you want farm animals, go live on a farm
- Livestock belong on an average or farm. Calgary yards are too small and will affect neighbors.
- Chickens are filthy
- Chickens are one thing but not a lot of large yards to accommodate anything. Plus houses are closer. Can be more of noise complaints.
- I think there is a very small population within city limits that can properly care for livestock, they are also often kept as pets that people think are cool and fun and do not do enough research into their care. I also foresee lots of noise complaints with roosters because man are they loud.
- Disruptive in city

- There's no need for other livestock in the city, and no real way to police it. Hens are ok as long as there is no rooster and no more than a specified number of them.
- No need for hens in the city limit. That's what farms are for.
- I agree with all but the neighbours input. It isn't needed. Especially if you own your home or the landlord is in agreement.
- It may take too long for complaints of noise, smell to be addressed by the city.
- No chickens please
- I don't think livestock needs to be within the city.
- This could create problems with neighbours like odours or increase amounts of flies, etc
- We've seen the results of human animal interaction with Covid-19, why introduce this dangerous behaviour in Calgary?
- Attracts wild animals and are a noise concern.
- Chickens should not be in the city.
- That would be so annoying
- "Livestock belongs in rural areas not in a big city like Calgary.
- The negative impacts (noise, odors, reduction in property values, garbage, livestock feed attracting vermin/pests) are greater than the positive impacts.
- Calgary real estate is already depressed relative to other cities and if you permit livestock.....this may be a deterrent to living or moving here."
- I would worry about the living conditions these animals live in.
- The city is not a place for urban hens (noise, smells). It certainly is not a place for other livestock either (noise, smells).
- Support from adjacent neighbors could change over time. Just because a neighbor is ok with it doesn't mean that if they move the person who moves in after the will be ok with it.
- I live in Woodlands and we already see bobcats, and coyotes regularly. They hunt rabbits and cats in the area and having outdoor urban hen enclosures - my concern is that this will encourage more predators to venture into our area and I imagine all areas in the city.
- I feel this would cause more cases of neglect from people who do not properly understand care and maintenance of these animals. If this is allowed I feel the city should offer educational resources around this.
- I don't think hens should live in a city environment with the pollution and especially wildlife such as coyotes and bobcats would just be enticed to hunt/kill them therefore putting humans and pets more at risk
- Animal waste management can be challenging, and the definitions of suitable living conditions rarely define adequate waste handling criteria.
- Bylaw is already not keeping up with what is happening. How is adding more to manage going to help anyone or anything.
- While most people would take care of their animals properly, some would not and livestock can become a health hazard.

- I do not agree with urban hens in Calgary.
- "Living next to hens or other livestock in an urban areas would be undesirable and devalue property (noise, waste, odours, etc.)"
- Also urban areas are not ideal environments for livestock (lot size, etc)"
- The noise, the smell, the potential to bring predators closer to the city (the couotes are bad enough). And the potential for negligence.
- It will create more noise and odour. It will also creat more issues then benefits
- Housing devalued. Cleanliness. Chickens running in street.
- livestock have needs and requirements that can not be met in a city suburb
- Please ban campfires in the city.
- I don't think it would be good idea, they are more work than one thinks and what happens when people realize this? The chickens are set free or taken to shelters? Unclean dirty coops can lead to flies and rodent infestations. If neighbours have cats or dogs this could also be another problematic area.
- "Other livestock is too vague for me to support this.
- Can adjacent neighbours revolk their support?"
- People cannot pick up after their dog and cats. This will turn calgary in a pig pen and create even more unhygienic properties and lower property values.
- Livestock, by their very nature don't belong in small city yards. I want my urban neighbourhood to stay an urban neighbourhood. If I wanted to live near livestock, I'll move out to a rural acreage.
- I don't want smells and noises that cannot be controlled by the owners.
- this is a city, not farmland. If a person craves country living move there. I don't want to be woken up by a rooster or have a stinky pig next door.
- Certain animals really do not belong in a city
- Livestock in residential areas would be a pure nuisance
- Too much government regulation.
- Livestock belongs on an acreage or farm.
- people are lazy as it this woild jusy increase issues with other livestock. And neighbour's people live in the city to be away from farm animals
- Very few residences within city limits would be suitable for livestock.
- Noise would be a big factor. I would not allow it next door if they squacked all night, next you will be letting people have roosters, I see dead ones if this happened.
- I believe that if a neighbour did not support having hens/other livestock living close by, that it would not matter. I think this is just a way to allow this to be permitted and I don't want anyone living near me to have hens/livestock. The smell, noise of those animals, etc. is not something I want and if I did want that, I'd own a farm or live near one.
- It's a bad idea.
- Livestock do not belong in the city

- I don't think live stock or hens should be allowed in the city. They could attract more predators deeper into the city and it's not a place for live stock. Chickens can be smelly and noisy and if people want them they can move to the country where there is space for them.
- I value freedom
- Livestock of any kind does not belong in the city.
- I'm scared of birds. I don't want to see birds where I might be walking...like you lot have a fear of pit bulls, I was attacked as a child by birds...it's traumatic for me to see loose birds
- Smells get too bad
- If I wanted to smell a farm or have an abundance of flies around my home I'd live on a farm...
- Would require so much more bylaw and neighbors issues. People will dump them and abandon when tired of them.
- Don't want noise and smell and more potential for disease
- The amount of people that would just get certain live stock for "fun" and not end up taking care of the animal. Where would the live stock go? They would be released to the street.
- No roosters
- Diseases that we don't and know like SARS.
- There is no reason to include livestock. That's why there are farms. The last thing I need is to woken up by a roaster.
- They are a mess., the smell and are loud. I
- Noise concerns, attraction of other predators and wildlife
- If someone wants farm animals, they should live on an acreage
- Hens make a lot of noise
- I don't agree with livestock being within city limits.
- No they are filthy, smelly and noisy. We all should be able to enjoy our yards and and I don't want mine to smell like a barn. If I want to live on a farm I move back there.
- No, hens do not make anymore noise than dogs barking. If you own your property and have suitable living conditions then I don't see the issue
- Homeowners should not be put in a position to declare support or otherwise for their neighbour's infliction of livestock in a city environment. There is a good reason livestock are raised in rural communities.
- Seriously chickens are for farms. If you want a chicken move to the country.
- People can't clean up after their dogs and cats, why add more livestock. They are smelly and some are loud and annoying.
- At this point I don't think most people are set up for livestock.
- Livestock should be on farms
- chickens are loud and smell awful. Those living with zero property lines or shared dwellings such as duplexes would be significantly affected
- Calgary homes are in close quarters. Chickens and hens are noisy and often increase unsanitary conditions. I would only support this in areas where properties are further apart.

- Livestock belongs on a farm.
- Hens do not belong in the city
- Just one more animal for the city to have to govern. There is enough of a mouse problem in and around homes as it is, chickens and the feed are another attractant. Also potential for skunks and now present raccoons to be attracted to them. There will always be people who don't manage them properly or humanely.
- livestock not suitable for city life in terms of space, noise, attracting wildlife
- Hens do not belong inside a city. It is problematic enough with dogs and cats. Current enforcement is scarce enough.
- Too much opportunity for noise and odour.
- "People can be rude and while it seems a lovely sentiment to try and be an urban farmer and save the planet. What will actually happen is owners in over their heads will leave a mess of unattended fowl. Bird crap everywhere and unhealthy "livestock".
- Massive pass! Not appropriate for condos or apartments. Someone will want to break the case by case rules."
- Livestock doesn't belong in the city. It's cruel and they can be a nuisance for neighbours. Other than hens
- Chickens are loud and stink
- Will bring in more mice and voles. Already a problem this year
- Now houses are so close to each other . Smell would be too much to handle
- This could attract predators such as coyotes, bobcats etc into high density areas and put their lives, the lives of pets, and the chickens at risk.
- Livestock have certain needs and requirements. The city suburb is not appropriate.
- I do not believe hens should be in urban areas unless they are support animals
- I do not think appropriate living conditions is achievable in urban settings
- Noise and smell concerns
- Sounds and smells of livestock have potential to get out of control
- Neighbours change, so what was once acceptable by one neighbour will be a hassle/legal issue if a new one moves in and hates livestock
- I lived next door to roosters. They stank and were noisy.
- Noise, cleanliness, neighbour relationships and appropriate animal care are all significant concerns with animals in an urban setting.
- It is impossible to silence animals raised for consumption or for consumption of their byproducts. These should not be allowed within an urban development.
- The likelihood of unkept pens is too high and in a city the space is limited causing a nuisance to those nearby
- This would just create awful relationships between neighbors and community members
- Support from adjacent neighbours only works until the neighbour that agreed to it moves.
- Farm animals need space to have a full filled life

- Livestock of any kind do not belong in the city .
- sooner or later these animals would be neglected and hurt by other people. This will bring slaughter in our own backyard. No laws can protect these animals. Humans will always find a way to bend the law to hurt livestock. I have seen way to many.
- neighbours are too close in urban settings. add outdoor farm/ non domesticated animals and it's just not pleasant for us. extra tax dollars to support enforcement. You already jumped the taxes and it will only go up more.
- Raising farm animals involves odour and noise that is not appropriate for an urban setting. Children and adults often have allergies etc. that would be greatly affected.
- Livestock shouldn't be kept in Calgary. People can't control the animals we have, why add more into the mix?
- I don't see why someone would need to ask their neighbours for permission if the hens are stayed on their property. Everything else is fine.
- "It would ha
- Be
- To be heavily regulated"
- Zoonotic diseases should be taken seriously.
- Livestock does not belong in urban areas.
- I don't support any livestock type animals to be in the city at all.
- the city is not farm land,I could see this getting out of hand very quickly!
- Bylaws and standards for owning the livestock would be hard to enforce. Many people in the city have issues as it is properly caring for cats and dogs. I would not support introducing different types of livestock.
- I would not want the smell of a hen house near my yard!
- I do not want any other livestock in the city. Not really comfortable with chickens.
- I fee they are noisy, and add to an overpopulation of other animals, hence hurting the system with extra fines, peace officer usage, etc.
- I don't want to be around chickens. And I don't want to be singled out or asked about not wanting my neighbors to have them.
- Livestock does not belong on city residential property.
- The smell would be the biggest concern.
- I'm just don't know enough about hens and how noisy or smelly a hen house would be
- Chickens are can be loud, and they smell bad if not cared for correctly. Not everyone is going to be responsible and it can really bring down property values if abused.
- I have cleaned chicken coops before. Stinkiest thing in the world. What will happen to the chickens who stop producing eggs? Have prospective owners thought this through? Chickens simply aren't clean.
- Calgary's weather is too harsh
- Livestock do not belong in the city

- "If you want chickens live
- On a farm"
- They don't belong in a city
- My community is too small and the homes too close together to consider this.
- Farm animals can carry diseases that can be harmful in an urban population.
- Livestock belongs in a farm not crowded into someone's back yard.
- Try living beside this.
- No urban hens or roosters. No farm animals as pets in the city.
- There enough urban noise and problems eith pests and garbage, we don't need to add barn yard animals into the mix.
- SMELL. Noise, people are what terrible at being aware of cat/dog bylaws, and so I don't know that many people would offer proper facilities to these animals... maybe if they had to supply, like when you build over your garage? Then they have to know the expectations prior to setting it up?
- I believe people will take advantage of this.
- chickens can be loud and smell, they are a farm animal
- City is not the place for live stock and can create some neighbors issues and issues with domestic and livestock
- I think it's a nice idea, but property value could be decreased simply because a neighbour is keeping hens that might not be looked after as well as they should be.. ie. A mess, smell, noise, etc.
- Bad neighbours can already easily get away with being big problems in too many ways as it is. Why give them more ways to disturb others.
- Chickens require acres of space to be kept in humane conditions, and this is simply not possible within city limits. Furthermore, backyards chickens could be a nuisance to neighbours due to smell or sound.
- Calgary is a CITY not a farm. There is no need for any livestock to live in a city - they belong in the country. This is ridiculous.
- We should not have livestock in the city. No hens or any other livestock. The are too loud and since they live outside, you can't control the noise. They also can be messy and stink. Live on a farm if you want livestock, as that's where they belong.
- If my neighbor can have chickens, then I can have a burn barrel and a clothes line. I come from the country, if you want country, live out of town. Prey attract predators.
- I don't support the use taxpayers dollars for this. Pandemic costs have meant we need to focus on needs, not wants.
- The wants of few shouldn't supercede the needs of many. If you want to keep livestock, live in the country.
- Livestock will create a nuisance for neighbours.
- Noise levels would increase, especially in early morning hours. Would attract coyotes and other predators to the residential areas
- Lots in most areas of Calgary are not large enough for this type of occupancy

- If you want livestock, move to the country.
- Slippery slope. Besides hens for eggs, people don't need to keep livestock in the city.
- I don't like how your asking about muzzling pit bulls but then at some point it would be okay for my neighbor to have chicken? Seriously?
- This will only cause problems between neighbours
- I feel the city is not the place for livestock. Could they rent space outside the city for livestock? What happens if supportive neighbors move and the new neighbors aren't supportive? More conflicts for city to deal with.
- I don't think livestock should be considered pets. To many people will abuse this privilege.
- Not appropriate for city living to have livestock
- "The smell alone.
- Also, as with ferrule rabbits, having chickens attracts Coyotes to any neighborhood."
- Move to a farm i don't want neighbours who have them. They are loud smelly and a nuisances.
- If you want chickens, move to an acreage.
- this could get out of hand. More information would need to be obtained to make an informed decision.
- I don't believe there should be hens in an urban environment. Many people do not know how to care for them, or clean up after them. Also, there are not a lot of veterinarians within the city with the ability to care for hens, and not many veterinarians who would be willing to come in to the city to care for these animals.
- We aren't doing a good job with cats and dogs. Let's get that sorted first
- Do not agree with adjacent neighbors, must be surrounding neighbors regardless if they are next door, 2 doors away or even across the street/laneway
- Live stock needs to stay out of the city
- It's a city, these animals belong in the country.
- Hens are OK Don't open it to other livestock, people will abuse it.
- No I do not support this.
- I moved from the farm to the city - farm animals should be kept in the farm not the city. No need to add more stress to the stray population of animals like cats and now chickens or other farm animals...goats? Cows? Sheep? No thanks.
- People may not comply with the bylaw and Calgary does not do enough enforcement as is
- I do not want chickens next door to my home . . .
- "Livestock does not belong in an urban setting. We have
- Coyotes in our area and if livestock is lost, dog owners may be blamed."
- Poop noise and smell. That's all chickens are good for if not properly cared for on a farm set up for the purpose. And anyone who thinks a chicken is a therapy/support animal is a whack job
- We live in the city, we did not choose to live on the farm and be awakened by farm animals
- I do not support hens inside city limits. There are already enough problems with dogs barking, I don't want to hear hens while enjoying my backyard.

- The smell and noise is unacceptable. Grew up around farms.
- keep the farm out.
- Don't want or need livestock living next to me in the city
- inevitable smell. sanitary concerns. no doubt theft.
- I think will open doors for animals living inadequately or not being humanely taken care of. This would be too time consuming to police.
- Given that we have just had a pandemic related to the keeping of "animals", we don't need to add other creatures to the City limits. Leave them on farms where they belong. If ANY neighbour objects, NO exceptions made by any bylaw officer. There may be communities who would support hens, but again, if a direct neighbour says no, no means NO!
- Would only support if there was a mandated size of yard for each individual animal.
- Not in the city, move to a farm.
- Would support more if limited to certain identified communities. Although current neighbors may support it - new neighbors might not. By restricting to certain areas, people can make decisions on where to live based without worrying about re-applying for permit if they have to move or about future re-sale of their home if they support their neighbors permit.
- Chickens aren't city creatures
- Bring wildlife in, make noise, carry diseases and smell. I believe that this devalues property and gives the neighbours yet one more reason to fight over something new.
- Farm animals including chickens will bring potential health concerns with diseases, potential smell, noise, and will encourage more wildlife into the city where they do not belong and potentially threaten local domestic dog and cats. if you approve such a bylaw all neighbours within 3 or 4 houses in all directions must agree and the requesting must take full responsibility any wildlife attacks or damage..
- Farm animals don't belong in the city, period. There's enough problems with pigeons, we don't need to add chickens to the mix.
- Livestock do not belong in a city.
- If residents want to raise livestock, they should move to a property with over an acre of land.
- Livestock does belong in the city. People will take advantage and there will be way too many.
- We have already problems with a noisy dog next door. I can't imagine dealing with the noise and smell of chickens.
- Farm animals should not be allowed within city limits. They smell and their noises cannot be controlled as barking can.
- If calgarians want to farm they should do it in a rural area as there are already enough animals for bylaw to chase I don't like the idea of an escape artist goat running a muck in a school field.
- Farm animals do not belong in the city!
- "How would my owning a goat or pig ""Offer community benefit/have positive impact""? They will become dinner for me and my family.

- ""Support from adjacent neighbours"" clause. If my neighbour can own a coop full of pigeons that fly around the neighbourhood freely without consulting me or my other neighbours, I should be able to have a proper chicken coop and run in my yard without asking for my neighbours permission.
- There must be an appeal process in place if I feel the CBE Officer's judgement is wrong."
- Chickens (limited to 3) are reasonable. Pigs, goats, sheep, horses, cattle are not.
- "If pit bulls are under bsl we will move
- This is unacceptable.
- Very disappointed in calgary."
- I think our climate is too cold and I don't trust people to properly care for the animals. I also don't think people realize the smell chickens produce, and they won't clean often enough. I think it will breed conflict between neighbours.
- People can't be trusted to keep their cats safe, plus with ongoing bobcat issues this will be another reason for them to come to neighbourhoods
- i don't feel that livestock belongs in the urban setting with the care/upkeep of animals and their living areas, etc and due to the close proximity that houses are to each other
- This would cause more citizen disputes within communities.
- other animals should be on farms
- It's too easy for people to abuse because the lack of by-law enforcement.
- chickens do not belong in the city. They are loud and will cause more coyotes, foxes, and other carnivore animals to come into the neighborhoods more.
- Chickens belong on farms where people are experienced in caring for them
- I don't want chicken noise any where near my house.
- Raising livestock of any kind should be left to the rural communities and not a large city like Calgary. I certainly wouldn't want someone raising chickens living next to me.
- they belong on farms
- I do not support having hens or other livestock living in anyone's back yard. That is animal cruelty plus it's a recipe for feuding neighbor's.
- I live in the city for a reason
- Chickens and hens are dirty, stink, create additional noise. Seems like the city has enough issues with animal bylaws as is, focus on fixing what's an issue already.
- I can't imagine the nightmare of living next door to someone in the city with a rooster or hens r other animals that likely can smell and if people want an agricultural self sufficient lifestyle they can move to a small town or rural area.
- You should not be told that you cannot have a certain animal unless in the cases it is completely unreasonable. IE a cow in a .25 acre backyard, etc.
- Would need to figure out the noise and spread of disease from birds to humans. Birds are noisy creatures and I would not be happy to live next to someone with a hen.

- Livestock belong on farms not in neighborhoods. What will the penalty be if a hen attacked a child . Same punishment as dangerous dogs ? Hens can inflict just as much damage to a small child as a dog.
- This is a city not a farm.
- You can't control the noise of hens because they are hens. If a cat or dog is barking you can simply bring them into the house.
- livestock regardless of hens or cattle should not be in Calgary
- ownership of fowl is high maintenance. Dung is highly alkaline, stinks to high heaven. Many people "want" the idea of urban farming without the responsibility or associated work to maintain clean, healthy and odor controlled coops. (we did have a urban coop and between winter and dung - I consider this a urban fail) As well chickens may coo but their overwhelming response is to crow - depending on your tolerance this could be a noise issue at any time of the day.
- Our houses are so close together as it is, could not imagine the noise and smell if my neighbours had hens, chickens, pigeons! If people want this then go live on an acreage!
- Houses are too close together and lots are too small. How do you contain chicken or goat smell to 1 property
- Smelly and noisy m. Need to have land.
- People don't pick up after their dogs or stop their cats from roaming. The smell of manure wafting from a back yard, especially on a warm day would prevent people from enjoying their backyard or even being able to keep windows open.
- Can't say I wanna listen to chickens or hens all day long
- The noise, mess etc. We cant even get unruly neighbors to take care of their yards, noise etc. It would take forever to deal with these issues. If they want these animals they should be living in the country
- Livestock consumes large amounts of food, produces large amounts of waste, can be noisy. They were banned from city's for food reasons.
- Likelihood of disease transmission. Poor husbandry and noise and smell concerns. Also inadequate housing and attracting wildlife
- If people want chickens they should move out of city limits, they are loud and stink and I believe the resources required to police this would be better used elsewhere.
- We are an urban environment not rural.
- Animals shouldn't be kept in pens and small enclosures.
- Doesn't make sense.
- If you're trying to enforce laws about barking dogs to reduce noise, allowing squawking hens is contradictory. They will upset dogs, get loose, and will give another outlet for poor animal care to take place just so they can get "free" eggs. Bad idea.
- Livestock belongs on farms. I have lived in a farm, I'm not interested in doing it again, that's why I live in a city.

- It is an urban city and not a rural area. If you let animals that are not domesticated in an urban environment you risk the chance of those animals having diseases that city vets know nothing about it.
- Livestock belongs outside the city limits.
- If you want farm animals live on a farm
- Please look to the example of Toronto where allowing urban hens failed dismally. My family raises chickens and the average city dweller does not know what they're getting into.
- I believe this will cause more problems with other wildlife. Predators would be drawn in by the available "food" in people's yards
- It may attract too many rodents or predators.
- I don't want to hear chickens nor do I want to smell them when I'm in my yard or house
- Coyotes are already becoming a bigger problem in many areas in Calgary
- They're chickens!!! This is a city environment!! Chickens don't belong in an urban setting!!!
- Livestock should remain rural. Smell, noise has no place in a community.
- All adjacent neighbours must approve. With the case of chickens/roosters, it should be more than adjacent due to noise.
- Have neighbours that can not control there cats , am sure that they would not follow bylaws for chickens . Also , noise from wildlife
- Livestock should not be in the city. Noise, what is their quality of life, tidiness/mess
- It would start out positive but end badly eventually. Keep clean or healthy then start sliding with noise, mess, smell, animal abuse etc.
- We are already dealing with a household with 18 dogs ranging in size from Great Dane to Chahuahua
- Noise issues
- This is ridiculous! Only people with LESA permits should be allowed this.
- It's not the place to have these animals in the city.
- The city is no place for agricultural livestock.
- If people want to have these animals, they should live on an acreage.
- I do not want livestock next door.
- Live stock (chickens) should not be allowed in city limits
- You lower the property value and you won't keep control of it
- Live stock is for farms not for the city. If you want live stock buy a farm where you can have them. Neighbors should not be forced to deal with the neighbors live stock
- Farm Animals
- I'm not sure what other livestock could peacefully coexist within a suburban neighbourhood without disrupting those around it either by sight, smell or sound.
- The very last thing any community needs is a chicken coop.
- Livestock can be noisy, dirty and cause issues for people walking their dogs in the neighbourhood.
- No hens please

- This is exactly how disease is transferred to humans. Absolutely no chickens, pigs, or other livestock. If you want to live on a farm, leave the city.
 - The noise and smell of chickens is difficult to control. The risk of viruses and other diseases that comes from humans living in close quarters to livestock.
 - It will attract kid life such as coyotes, bobcats etc.
 - livestock should be limited to suitable locations. If inside city limits there should be a minimum land requirement. Less than this, in my experience, proves a nuisance for neighbors.
 - They bring mice and rats
 - "Pigeons? The noise is annoying.
 - Are you really asking time if I want people in my neighborhood owning piegon coops?
 - Wow city of Calgary. You are really going backwards.
- Targeting pitbulls while there are many other breeds with higher attack rates, but we did not speak of those breeds specifically. I know MANY wonderful pitbulls that behave better than my neighbors shitzu.
- Now you want to al"
 - Livestock do not belong in the City
 - It opens Pandora's box. I don't want a neighbour with 3 support roosters
 - People have a hard time looking after and being accountable for their cats and dogs. Livestock would make the problem worse
 - I feel hens stink. I wouldn't want hens next to my already densely packed back yard in the inner city. I also wouldn't want to tarnish relations with my neighbour over declining for them to have hens... out of the city in bigger yards, sure, but not inner city due to density concerns.
 - Not enough information
 - I don't have faith that individuals would properly follow rules or that bylaw officers would enforce
 - I do not want to live in a community with livestock - I live in the city not the country for a reason.
 - livestock do not belong in the city.
 - No livestock as it is too difficult to really ascertain the need for such and monitoring would be another expense the City does not need.
 - Nuisance for neighbours
 - Chickens are noisy, smelly animals. I worry too about the reduction in property value if I was next to people who raised chickens. I grew up on a farm and there is no reason to have them in an urban environment. Let wild birds eat the bugs. I support local farmers.
 - livestock should be in country areas with lots of room for their lifestyles.
 - Why do we need livestock in the city
 - Noisy, smelly and possible disease transmission

- Livestock should not be permitted in residential areas.
- Urban hens and livestock should not be allowed in Calgary.
- Livestock have no place in an urban setting.
- I don't want roosters waking me up at all times of the day. Too many allergies also. Want livestock equals moving to a farm.
- Birds are noisy and smelly
- Hens may be a nuisance or trigger to current domestic animals causing more issues.
- There is just not enough room in most city lots to accommodate livestock and to control the odor that arises from them. It is not fair to the animals to be kept in these small spaces and be subjected to city life.
- I see no purpose in this.
- People are loud and inconsiderate enough of others, I would not appreciate my neighbours having farm animals making extra noise, mess and smell.
- There are not many areas in Calgary where the owners have enough land to provide an adequate space for live stock.
- Many people already have great difficulty caring for their current pets ie: keeping cats indoors, picking up poop, walking dogs responsibly and on leash at all times. Adding chickens would create an urban nightmare. Chickens require proper feed, care & exercise to reduce disease and must be confined to one yard. If ppl can't confine their cats, I can't imagine what will happen with chickens!
- A neighborhood is for houses and children, it is not a farm. I don't want to hear chickens and smell them. At what point does this stop? Mini ponies? Goats? If people want to keep livestock they can live on an acreage outside of the city.
- Hard to enforce proper handling, environment, etc.
- If I wanted to live by a farm I would have do so ... livestock, no matter what, has no place in the city due to density
- This will turn backyards into farms, not very appealing if they're your neighbours.
- Livestock can be a nuisance when in close quarters. People who choose to live in the city are also choosing a lifestyle that doesn't include proximity to farm animals. Also, it's already had enough for by law to deal with all the nuisance complaints from permitted animals - this would just add more to their work
- I think it would become a tricky situation to manage between neighbors.
- The presence of coyotes and Bobcats
- A metropolis is not a farm yard. Everyone wants to eat an organic egg until their hen dies of winter cold exposure. This is ridiculous.
- Wild life in the city will definitely happen, not smart when kids are outside until 9pm or later
- Noise and smell issues will effect the larger communities apart from neighbours.
- There was a rooster a long way from my home when chickens were allowed before but I could drill here it. If people want livestock I believe the appropriate place for that is not in a city with small yards and close neighbours.

- I don't wanna see people keeping chickens to use them for eggs. If they were kept as a pet then my answer would be yes
- The smell of chickens and pigs is atrocious. I've lived on a farm... No thank you. Move to a farm if you want farm animals in your yard.
- People are not responsible with their domestic animal
- Am allergic
- Increase in coyote activity near residential areas that could be a problem for household pets.
- We don't need caged animals in the City
- Until other animals are under control with current bylaws - ie. dogs and cats at large and nuisances - I don't think we should be added another animal that the city has to monitor and "police"
- I am in support as long as they are responsible owners, however I would have serious concerns with people thinking it's a great idea and not really understanding the effort it takes to take proper care of these animals.
- The smell is enough, if I wanted smelly animals next door, I'll move to the country.
- I do not agree with these types of animals being in the city as the population is too dense. If someone wants to own them they need to be in an area where neighbors are further apart.
- I don't think hens are needed in the city...
- Hens and other livestock belong in rural areas period. This idea is totally ridiculous!
- Caring for any animal is a large responsibility and has no place in a City setting. The noise, smell and disruption will only cause further negative interactions among complaint and defendant.
- Don't belong in the city
- Farm animals belong on a farm.
- Livestock should not be permitted in residential communities. Dog and cats cohabitate with people in residential homes. Other livestock (e.g., poultry, animals with hooves, etc.) do not.
- Livestock in city limits can be a true nuisance especially with noise issues and uncleanliness by the owners NOT keeping livestock pens/feces kept clean
- There would be offensive odour from livestock/poultry being raised within city limits.
- Allows for too many negative interactions with neighbours.
- Urban hens can stream zoonotic disease and don't belong in an urban environment (for the hen or people's sake)
- I don't want hens in my neighbourhood, the noise, bird poop - it would be a nuisance. I also don't approval of bees unless someone's yard is large enough and contained from neighbours. Inconsiderate neighbours with Bees in too small of yard and too close of proximity to other's with no regard for young children and pets create a very unliveable yard. We all pay taxes and it isn't fair for one person to create a nuisance. Regarding the Pigeon question, no one should be owning those birds!
- They are agricultural and should be kept on acreages or farms. They are noisy and can be quite malodorous.
- Chickens and other livestock draw coyotes

- I don't like urban farms.... we live in a city and not on a farm
- I don't believe livestock should be in a residential area and to have "support from adjacent neighbours" could put neighbours against each other causing a negative impact with all neighbours. I live in a neighbourhood that is quite dense and zero property line so there's not a lot of space between houses -- I don't want to hear roosters at the crack of dawn.
- Living with livestock in close quarters leads to disease transmission. And almost no one has a yard large enough to properly support even a single hen without turning it into a dirt wasteland.
- Don't agree with farm animals in a city setting.
- Hens are dirty, I don't support any livestock being kept within the city limits, if you want chickens, buy a farm!
- Noise issues
- I do not support the noise or smell of chickens or other livestock in the city
- Just brings rodents into the population as a result
- This would encourage mice and some people are pretty lax about keeping these areas clean. Possibility of disease to neighbours
- "Give them an inch and they will take a mile"
- It would get out of hand"
- City is not the place for farm animals
- Roosters are loud
- Improperly cared for livestock are a huge risk when urbanising them. They are a large nuisance in noise pollution too.
- Livestock and other farm animals do not belong in residential communities
- Why would I want a farmyard located in my neighbourhood? It's a ridiculous idea.
- Livestock of any type should not be allowed in the city and I definitely don't want to have them next door! If I wanted a farm odor I would live on one!
- Very messy. Encourages wildlife such as coyotes into the area
- I have been around chickens & unless scrupulously maintained they smell. They are also noisy. Bees are a necessary part of the ecosystem but I do not want hives near me
- I've lived in a small town do you know how loud and obnoxious they are? Also their poop really stinks. On hot days like these I might not be able to use my back yard because of the smell
- I fear that hens will be acquired by folks who haven't got a clue. This will increase the likelihood of abuse and mistreatment.
- Smell and noise from the neighbour. Don't want to hear roosters in the early hours.
- Chickens smell and carry disease
- Any and ALL farm animals should be prohibited within city boundaries
- I said "no" above but it should really be "maybe". It depends on the purpose of the "livestock". If it's just a reclassification in order to allow non-traditional pet animals such as pot-bellied pigs or domestic ducks, for example, to reside within city limits in a loving home, I'm all for it. However, if the "livestock" animals are intended to be slaughtered for human (or animal) consumption, then I most vehemently disagree with this bylaw amendment.

- Should not be allowed, noisy and smell.
- Farm animals should not be allowed in an urban setting
- There is no way to contain the smell and noise of livestock animals. As the odor can really dampen any outdoor activities in other neighborhoods backyards. As the noise as well animals are animals and make noises throughout the day and night.
- For goodness sakes, quit this nonsense in a large city like Calgary with very small yards. No chickens . Stop this insanity.
- Livestock does not belong in a fully urban environment. They need space and disposal of manure and bedding. Hens are borderline in urban spaces and should be carefully evaluated for the health of the birds and the community. Strict permitting is needed.
- It still seems unrealistic to be able to provide clean environment for for hens
- I would like to see a process for approving chicken first, and then potentially add other livestock after a period of time to evaluate the successes and problems of keeping chicken. One consideration that is not mentioned is the potential for disease transmission (e.g. Newcastle Disease, Avian Influenza) that can potentially be economically devastating for commercial producers. It is also completely unclear what the requirements are for enforcing these bylaws, what additional resources (e.g. additional bylaw officers, vehicles) would be needed, and how this would be financed. I would also like to see the implementation for mandatory prophylactic treatments (e.g. mandatory vaccination for Newcastle Disease) and a plan that defines responsibilities and mitigates the risk in cases of an outbreak.
- If you want a farm, go and buy one. Does not belong in the city
- How do you effectively enforce who can & cannot have these animals? There are those that would break the rules
- Explain the benefit of this. I see none listed above.
- I do not like the idea of urban livestock
- I do not live in the country for a reason and do not feel I should be subjected to someone else's desire for country critters
- There is no good case to be made for livestock to be permitted in the city.
- You want to take away my pitbull but bring in nasty birds? NO chickens
- It will not play out as planned i see livestock at large in the city
- There's no way the noise factor alone can be controlled and no damn way I want to be woken up by a friggen hen. Dogs barking excessively are bad enough, and I own a dog. If ppl want a farm lifestyle, they should move to a farm.
- Hens/chickens only belong on a rural facility.
- I do not agree that the city is a healthy environment for livestock
- Other livestock should be on acreages, not on a city lot.
- No livestock within city limits

- This initiative seems counter productive to the City's goal of increasing the current living capacity of existing Calgary neighbourhoods in order to support population growth in the City. With increasing the amount of residences in an area this inherently will reduce that amount of useable green space to support livestock. Example is infills - the backyard sizes have decreased with a closer proximity to neighbours and permitting livestock in these scenarios would be irresponsible - the usable area would be too limited to support livestock and it would most definitely be more than just the immediately adjacent neighbours impacted by sounds and smells. It is not advisable in inner city; however, perhaps could work as an exception in unique scenarios in outlying neighbourhoods.
- Would attract more Varmin into the city. Chickens are not clean at all
- Dogs, cats and other household pets already create challenges in neighbourhoods. It is not necessary to create more by adding other livestock into the mix.
- No farm animals should be kept within city limits. Irresponsible owners could release the animals, and it will turn into more feralschickens roaming, like the domestic rabbit situation releases in the neighborhoods, within the city. People not ckeeping the conditions of the livestock clean. I do not want the smells or the fecal matter left over. Our winters are too cold,as it and now it will be the city or spca to take in abandoned farm animals. No thanks, properties are already too close together, it is just going to cause problems, i do not want roosters crowing in the morning, and chickens fluttering all over, farm animals should only be kept outside city limits. FIRM NO. It is just asking for trouble. Buy your flipping eggs in the grocery store
- Livestock should not be allowed inner city. With proper space outside of inner city i think is acceptable.
- Would open Citizens up for Animal to Human cross contaminating. Hoof and Mouth disease can be transferred from Animal to Human. A very limited amount of Chickens okay, even a Duck or 2 but Farm animals belong on Farms. Even Goats/Sheep/Llamas have no place in Residencial areas.
- No livestock in urban neighbourhoods
- My neighbor believes cats should freely roam, and their dogs bark at all hours. Can't imagine what I would have to deal with if they owned hens and other livestock. For 18 years I've tried to get them to be responsible, and they don't care. Nor does the City, as they have never been fined for this. If the City cannot enforce current bylaws like this for cats and dogs why is it considering adding hens and livestock to the picture. "Being willing to testify in court against your neighbor" does not solve the immediate problem of cat shit in my veggie patch and my kids not being able to get a full night's sleep because of barking dogs.
- Do not want live stock in calgary community.
- We've chose to live in a city/urban area NOT the country or a farm.
- Do not want the noises
- Unless there quiet or kept away from neighbors
- I prefer not to have hens or livestock next door to me.
- This is the city not rural. The smell alone is enough to deny. If you want to keep "farm animals" , buy in rural Alberta

- I don't believe all people will necessarily be responsible owners even if they have initial good intentions and enthusiasm. The rules would have to be very strict and I can see enforcement would be difficult. There are also animal welfare issues I would be concerned about. I can see many people starting this hobby and tiring of it just like with other activities.
- People do not properly care for cats and dogs livestock is for rural areas
- I don't want to noise and smell of livestock in my neighborhood.
- Livestock should not be kept in urban areas no exceptions.
- I wouldn't want chickens next door. Pets stay inside most of the time. Chickens do not so there would be constant noise. I'm also worried about smell if people do not clean up after them on a consistent manner.
- I support urban hens completely. However without knowing what other types of livestock you are considering allowing I can't support that part.
- Seems the city has enough problem keeping dog and cat bylaws fair
- This includes no urban hens - urban environments are not compatible with livestock operations.
- Calgary is no place for livestock.
- "What happens if a person gets "approval" and then their adjacent neighbours move (rental or sale of neighbouring property)? New owners of the adjacent property should not be burdened with the "approval" given by previous owners.
- Also what about rental properties? In the case where a rental property is adjacent to the requesting house, the owner of the neighbouring house should be asked for approval, not the tenants. Tenants should not be able to "approve" livestock nextdoor as they have no long term interest in the property and might only be there for a few months."
- Any livestock should not be allowed at a residence inside city limits
- I don't want to hear or smell these types of animals in an urban setting they should be in a more rural setting
- How about communal hen farms & such in the country similar to community gardens idea. But no I don't want to wake to sounds & smells of hens & pigs in my neighbourhood. Dirty dog runs are bad enough especially in summer heat when you want to be in the yard.
- I would support it in theory, however I would hate for the same neighbors that currently don't take care of their property, now also were allowed livestock.
- The last thing I want is cackling hens and / or a crowing rooster / stinky domestic animals next door to my yard. They belong on a FARM. The only animals I want in my backyard are natural critters that enjoy my back yard. ALSO...living close to Nose Hill and having chickens in the neighbours yard may attract dangerous critters (read: "coyotes and bobcats") in for a quick "snack"...
- goes too far
- Hens in a cage have no effect on neighbours, so neighbour approval is problematic and needs to be stricken
- The city already charges too much for dog licensing. Most people are barely making it by and you want to implement more things that will charge calgarians too much money
- I am not In favor of livestock animals within urban areas

- I do not want chickens, hens or any other livestock living next door to me. Those animals do not belong in the city.
- I do not believe we need livestock in the city.
- no place for these animals in a city
- Hens in Calgary are not required.
- Livestock belong in farms. Property values of neighbors would likely decrease due to perception. There is potential for a lot of disturbance to neighbors.
- Difficult and expensive to monitor and ensure a sanitary, safe (avian flu) environment that does not smell, so that neighbors are not affected. This would result in diminished enjoyment of the neighbors yard.
- Nuisance noise and odor, vermin attracted to the area by feed
- I do not feel that there is enough separation in the yards in Calgary to have hens or other livestock on them. Our neighbor had chickens/hens and they were all over the place.
- I am a light sleeper and would not appreciate the additional noise implication.
- Few if any chicken coops can be kept to a level of stench acceptable in our tight residential area. Leave farming to lots greater than 1 acre.
- The noise and smell
- I don't think a city is any place for livestock
- I am not living next door to clucking, smells, etc. Are you kidding me? I know that neighbours don't have much say in what a person does, so that does not cut it. If people want livestock, they can live in the country. No bees allowed in the city too (NO bees, if they leave their hives and go to the neighbours, that would be horrible, and it happens, I know, from people who keep bees and their bees swarmed their neighbours yard)
- To much risk to go wrong, not enough enforcement as is. Is a nuisance to the neighbourhood for one person to have fresh eggs
- I dont want to have a neighbour with chickens/livestock. There would need to be rules regarding space.
- Those are farm animals who have no place within the city limits (for ANY reason).
- If you want livestock, move out of the city
- I do not want hens or other livestock, and their unique needs, to be allowed in the city. That is what rural Alberta is for. Ask the hens and other livestock what they prefer - I'm pretty sure it isn't living in the city.
- The need to get approval from neighbours is excessive and will prevent most people from being allowed this option. I support a bylaw that allows them as long as safety of animals is followed
- How would you enforce this - logistically ridiculous - lets hire another 100 city staff to keep up with these ideas. Have you heard there's a pandemic and people are without employment?
- Most people can't keep their yard clean put livestock in there it would be a mess
- we do not live on a farm
- While I am somewhat for the idea of livestock in residential areas I think people will try to wiggle their way through the system so they can have any sort of livestock animal they want. If someone wants to have chickens then why can't another person have goats, sheep, pigs or mini horses? It could all end up causing issues in the future

- Considering our current pandemic where the virus moved to humans from animals, I am strongly opposed to any loosening of regulations regarding livestock/non-pet animals in a dense urban environment.
- no hens or chickens. they are noisy and they smell.
- I support people having hens if they want, anything other than that is not ok. Its not fair to expect people to be ok with someone deciding to have a goat farm next to them. there is a reason its called LIVESTOCK and not pets.
- Chickens are not needed in a city of this size.
- "There are too many people who have domestic animals that do not exhibit responsible behavior. Chickens and other livestock along with their waste, smell, noises, etc, do not belong within city limits. It is irresponsible of the city to even pursue this, especially with the potential of disease spread such that these animals could cause.

- Also, someone in my neighborhood has pigeons and they leave a horrific mess on our roofs, bins, outside furniture, etc. Why is this even allowed in the city?"
- Don't belong in the city.
- Farmyard animals are just that, farm animals. Hens can be messy, noisy, and it opens the door for people to apply for other animals
- I would not want someone with hens against my fence with dogs. If allowed would have to consider what is neighbors have dogs. This is an accident waiting to happen, or torments the dogs
- Difficult to monitor and enforce.
- As a farm raised human I do not believe that most of the people in this city can provide a clean quality of life for livestock. Once you add in vet bills and feed - it is going to be a mess.
- no need and would be hard to police. Potential for health risks. It would be 'like opening a can of proverbial worms'!
- Livestock should not be on small properties.
- I like the bylaw as is.
- Chickens are noisy and dirty and don't belong in the city.
- We have enough problem with cats and dogs..
- I do t want livestock in my neighborhood
- noise, smell, and other problems are difficult to contain or reconcile in an urban residential environment.
- Last thing i need is the stench of an unkept animal. I already have to deal with the stench of pot, i don't need to listen to chickens, next we'll be keeping pigs, cows and maybe a horse or two. These are "farm" animals, we live too close together, not good for humans or animals.
- This is a city, not a barnyard. Farm animals belong on a farm, not running down residential streets.

- Few have sufficient animal husbandry education
- Allowing other livestock such as pigs or "micro pigs" (there's no such thing) be allowed in the city could increase cases of animal homelessness. People buy these pigs thinking they stay the size of a baby (which they don't) and when they grow up and become a huge 200lb+ pig they are given up, sold for meat or dumped. This is not fair to an animal that has the intellectual capacity of a 4 year old human child. Its also not fair to the animal rescue groups that will ultimately take the burden of caring for these animals for the rest of their lives.
- I don't believe farm animals belong in the city.
- This is not something that would work in the city and would really be annoying if it was my neighbour.
- seems like you are making more work and therefore increasing taxes on this
- I don't want to be woken up at sunrise by a rooster crowing
- Feral rabbits and cats as well as hares already attract Bobcats and Coyotes we should not add in chickens.
- Farm is for farm animals! Houses are too darned close together now to allow for clucking, squealing, etc amongst the already annoying incessant barking and growling. Are we kidding here?
- No place for livestock in the city!! My sister had chickens in the house beside her and it stunk and was noisy!
- The potential for nuisance, people not following the rules as well as the cost of enforcement makes it not worthwhile. If you want livestock, live in the country, there's tons of rural properties available.
- How do we ensure proper setups without wasting tax dollars on enforcement.
- No thanks. I don't want to hear them, or smell them near my home. Nope nope nope. People will not take care of them properly in the city. No way!
- Livestock stinks. Some people can't even be bothered to keep their dog runs clean. I can't imagine if livestock being allowed in an urban setting wouldn't cause even more outrage
- This is a city and agricultural animals belong outside urban areas. It's cleaner, and more considerate to neighbours. What happens if one neighbor approves but then moves? New person ends up living next to farm animals. Also extra expense to tax payers to check on reported unhealthy living conditions.
- "People do not look after their yards half the time and now let's add hens. I do - Not want the smell, the look of the yard and the noise. Move to a farm if you want chickens."
- Just think at 25+ C keeping a chicken coop in the city, the stench and/or the stench of the chemicals who are used to cover the original chicken stench. If people want to keep a pair of decorative miniature chicken as family pets should be OK- but not as food source.
- Living conditions are too close in the city leading to problems with noise and maintenance (smell)
- Calgary is urban, hens deserve farm area.
- Noise and smell would bother surrounding neighbors.
- Hens will attracts more wildlife such as skunk, coyote and fox therefore more complains and phone calls to report the guy next door.
- Livestock are smelly and have no place in an urban environment.

- too noisy - already have issues with noisy dogs.
- "Support from adjacent neighbours" is useless. Either something is allowed or it's not. My neighbour doesn't need my support to run multiple noisy smelly diesel trucks and generators on his property, which is more of a nuisance than hens.
- I would personally love to have chickens but I know that many people would not take care of the animals properly and it would be difficult to enforce properly. I vote no because I am concerned about the animal welfare and the cleanliness required to keep livestock properly.
- Speak with breeders and trainers who are on the front lines first.
- Farm animals have no place in city limits.
- While I support the idea of self-sufficiency and food security, unfortunately few people would actually take care of the animals/poultry properly. The last thing I want is to live beside a chicken coop.
- don't want chickens in city limits....
- Allowing hens and other livestock is likely to be very problematic and given ineffectual enforcement of other bylaws do not expect any bylaws and their enforcement - or lack thereof - to adequately address the issues.
- I do not agree with livestock in the city. That should be kept to rural property I think the city has enough trouble enforcing the bylaws we already have
- Livestock tend to create a lot of noise and generate a lot of waste. I think allowing livestock would devalue property values and it would be difficult to enforce and ensure owners are taking proper steps to mitigate issues with noise and waste.
- I already have homing pigeons in the neighborhood and they are annoying
- These animals have no place in the city and should only be on farms. People are naturally not responsible and it will create a ton of mess, noise and other issues including possible disease.
- The city is not a place for agriculture. Our bylaw officers cannot keep up with the issues at hand, let alone deal with animal complaints. For every new bylaw passed, Council should remove 2 old, ineffective bylaws.
- People will not properly house these animals or clean up after them. It will be more of a problem than anything.
- This is a city of 1 MM+ people, not a farm... please use some common sense - not everything needs to have a green socialist agenda
- Allowing for livestock or hens would lead me to believe that slaughter would soon happen. I wouldn't want to live next door to someone slaughtering animals.
- I live inner city, I would be concerned with smell, noise, increase in coyote/bobcats to area.
- Livestock doesn't belong in the city. Move to the country if you want hens and other livestock.
- I see no need for urban hens, and wouldn't be happy if either of my neighbours got them.
- Houses are too close together and would impede on neighbors rights to enjoy their properties based on smells and sounds coming from livestock. There is enough dog owners that leave their dogs barking for hours as it is.

- Usually people with animals have the opinion that everyone else also needs to like their animals, no matter how loud they are or how much they stink. This isn't the case though. Other peoples animals are mostly annoying.
- NO livestock of any kind should be allowed within the city limits.
- Noise
- We don't have enough by-law enforcement for the currently allowable pets without adding a new species
- Our homes and yards are too small and too close together. The smell, noise, dirty water run off and flies would be overwhelming because it's unlikely that the average person would properly clean up after these animals everyday.
- There needs to be a limit on what is allowed in an urban environment. If you want to raise hens there are millions of acres of land in Alberta where you can do so without causing an annoyance to neighbours.
- Livestock typically have a smell and are loud. They cannot be trained like a dog and future neighbours would have no say in regards to if their personal outdoor area smelled terrible due to livestock feces.
- Livestock don't belong in a city. There is rarely enough room for them and the noise /odor produced could lower property value of neighbors. It could also lure predators into the community which endangers pets. I would not want livestock in my community and certainly not close to my house.
- Neighbors should not have a say unless the birds/animals are a problem just like the owning of dogs or cats
- I don't want farm animals in my neighborhood. i don't want the noise or the feces.
- Who will clean up the mess when the owner moves on...what about rental homes. No we don't need chicken coops in the city.
- I would prefer that people raising hens/livestock did this on rural properties that are not as close to their neighbours.
- City is too crowded environment to keep livestock. There always be unhappy neighbours filing complaints. Right now Calgary is unable to keep roaming cat owners or barking dogs owners in check, no way they will manage additional complaints about livestock.
- I don't believe that any livestock larger than a hen would have sufficient enough space to comfortably live at most urban homes.
- Urban hens are a noisy nuisance, and are dirty
- If we're talking about a single animal, then I could support that. However the idea of having a neighbour who has multiple animals makes me wonder about the sounds, odors and mess of livestock.
- There is already a wide variety of animals that can become "pets" adding traditional livestock such as hens, pigs will be a disaster potentially pitting neighbours against each other.
- Rural livestock have no place in an urban environment. Notwithstanding the stress of city pollution (air and noise) on the animals, the noise and smells neighbors would be subjected to is not acceptable....not to mention the drop in nearby house values.

- livestock should be kept on large open properties, not in the confined spaces of a community backyard, the smell and upkeep can be neglected and put neighbours in a less than friendly scenarios
- The noise/smell is not acceptable in most cases. It would be too expensive for the city to monitor trouble cases.
- Excess noise for neighbours
- People don't follow regulations and problems will increase.
- They belong on farms, not backyards. The noise and stench would be awful.
- They attract mice
- Yards in the city are far too small and close together. This would cause a lot of nuisance (sound and smell) to neighbors.
- Livestock in urban yards does not have a positive impact. It will create more tension and issues between neighbors.
- This is not a good idea. The amount of disease that can come from livestock including chickens is tremendous. How will the city ensure that outbreaks do not happen? I am pretty sure this is why previous councils have not explored it. If you want chickens get a farm.
- The feet used for hens can attract pests and rodents. We do not need more rodents in the city.
- I am extremely sensitive to smells and to odd sounds, both of define livestock activities. I worked and visited farms for many years so appreciate what livestock can be like. If people wish to raise livestock, move them to rural property.
- Noise - early crowing of cocks
- There is great potential for abuse. People hardly obey bylaws from my personal experience. My neighbour's dog poops on my lawn and has on one occasion run into my house.
- No Livestock in the city limits, If you need this type of support, move to a farm.
- No, we have enough irresponsible pet owners in the city
- Impact can go beyond adjacent neighbors. Onus should not be on neighbors to complain.
- not needed
- Unnecessary and fraught with noise and smell issues.
- Salmonella is endemic in poultry species and this increases the possibility of food-borne illness. There are also numerous reports from other jurisdictions that hens are abandoned at animal shelters once their ability to lay eggs has passed. Many people don't realize that hens have a longer lifespan than the time they're able to lay eggs.
- Noise issues. 'Support from adjacent neighbours is likely not enough distance and other neighbours will be impacted.
- Calgary properties are very close together. The smell and noise of livestock could impact quality of life for a neighbouring home.
- city lots are too close. I like my neighbours but I don't appreciate backyard chickens. At. All. Why start adding to a list of things that cause friction in a neighbourhood? The needs of hens??
- I'm concerned about fire but otherwise open to the idea.

- I don't support farm animals in residential areas.
- Hens and livestock in the city are an unnecessary burden. They create noise and smells unwanted by everyone blocks around. The cost of taking and enforcing the thousands of complaints that result from this could be better spent elsewhere.
- I wouldn't want to live beside a neighbour with a bunch of farm animals in their back yard. The smell alone.
- I don't trust people to have hens responsibly - coops may be unsightly, the chickens will stink, etc.
- I do not approve of urban livestock. I feel that it proves itself to be more of a nuisance to the surrounding community than it is a benefit to the urban farmer.
- If you want livestock, move to the country. Increased density is already causing issues by increasing residents proximity to negative environments (fire spread rates, fire pits, noise...). Now adding livestock?! Noise, smells, negligent owners, it's just NOT necessary in a City or suburban environment. Focus on getting people to take care of the property they already have before making our neighbourhoods into barns.
- This is what rural properties/farms are for.
- There is no place in a city for this type of animals. It would be noisy and smelly.
- Chickens are noisy, covered in salmonella, and smell.
- Chickens are gross
- Absolutely not. People choose to live in a large city for city amenities not livestock.
- "Too much noise
- And smell"
- It would be bias to support this without a full investigation and all parties viewpoint.
- Farms, ranching and their lands are important and critical. Taking the livestock care and production out of the hands of professionals and putting it into recreational the hands opens the door to animal cruelty through mismanagement and ignorance.
- I would agree with this bylaw amendment if I knew 100% the actual breed of the dog was kept from the chief officer until after the decision was made. I think this is the only way to create a true unbiased opinion in these decisions because the chief officer will only be focusing on the actual situation at hand, and not the dog breed.
- chickens are not meant for large city living, if anything create a small community farm for all in a quiet community
- Livestock need larger space beyond a urban life
- -properties are too small and smells, noise would be a problem. Most neighbours do not want the messes or coops in view of their own backyards do tend to put their 'junk' or 'messes' between homes which impedes the neighbour's ability for 'clean' views.
- Why should their be hens?
- Prefer not to have chickens in the city
- If a beautiful dog like a pit Bull is a nuisance imagine what chickens or a hen would be like
- No livestock should be allowed

- I believe there is not adequate enough space in the city for the size of cage livestock would need to comfortably live. There should be enough room for free range as well as a caged coop area. I believe the smell and sound from livestock does not belong in the city and that is why they are farm animals.
- I would not support this amendment as lot size in Calgary does not allow for adequate noise mitigation, and I have seen other cities that have allowed backyard chickens and now have feral chicken problems
- I'm not sure of the communal benefits of hens in the community.
- While I like the idea of urban hens there would be the same issues that there currently are with irresponsible owners of dogs and cats
- Too many people irresponsible. Will only create problems
- If you want livestock, live in the country. The city is no place for livestock
- The noise and smell of chickens cannot be contained to only the owners property. Neighbors may see it as a nuisance
- I don't care
- Too loud
- "Livestock belongs on a farm where people know how to care for them. As well as the fact that they care disease and parasites.
- As well as the smell and noise can be very offensive"
- Every bully breed I know is amazing and friendly. Majority dog friendly as well.
- Many people work shift work and hens would be noisy.
- Livestock is not meant to live in the city.
- noisy
- Livestock is not appropriate for the city. The noise and smell will easily get out of hand.
- Farm animals aren't appropriate for in the city.
- Chickens are not good for night workers
- Livestock do not belong in the city.
- Not everyone will take care of animals. They stink their noise...go buy an acreage.
- Livestock are for farms not for city living
- By law officers are already involved in all of initiatives and quite frankly won't have the time to visit each incident in a timely manner. This will cause more escalating issues and could possibly involve police calls.
- There was a hen running loose on the streets in my community this week. I could foresee it as being more of an issue in the future
- There is already an overload of work on our Bylaw officers. This would add another layer.
- Farm animals belong on farms. Chickens can be very noisy. Not fair on the neighbours.
- I don't believe that hens should be kept in the city, the city does not provide the appropriate environment for such animals.

- Unless they are kept indoors, I would not support having livestock in anyone's yard. It can become a potential health problem if the pen is not kept clean and the noise could be very disturbing for neighbours. There's not enough room in Calgary, houses are built way too close.
- People barely clean up after dogs and cats, livestock would be smelly, more diseases, the noise.
- I do not support livestock in an urban area. Chicken feces are plentiful, gross and smelly. I would not support this in any way, shape or form.
- Opens up the potential for human health issues. City lots are not serviced to accommodate livestock.
- Some people will not enjoy the noise or foul smell that also comes with farm animals
- I think it opens to many issues.
- "Urban areas are not for chickens and such"
- "Want a chicken, move to the country"
- Livestock would stink up the city I think
- I don't believe in breeding livestock or any animal for any human use.
- I would not want to live next door to someone with a chicken coop.
- In people's yards? No, I don't need added noise of hens along with the magpies, prairie falcons, chickadees, crows, ravens, Blue Jays, grey jays, etc..
- Livestock belongs on farms, not in the city. Move to a farm if you must have livestock. In addition the smell can be horrendous.
- Livestock doesn't belong in urban areas
- You want to get rid of a beautiful breed like Pitbulls, but allow livestock in people's backyards?
- I am totally opposed to urban livestock. Our forefathers thought this one out and they were not stupid. If people want to keep livestock, go live in a rural environment
- So much missing information. What is included in the term "livestock" and just how are "suitable living conditions" defined? I'm having difficulty imagining a typical urban property as having the space to provide suitable living conditions. Don't get me wrong because I'd love to have a pet alpaca but my rational self says I need to move to the country to do it. And what the heck does "community benefit" even mean in this context?
- More animals will be surrendered when people get tired of them.
- Noise and attracting mice and other wild animals
- I don't want my neighbours having a backyard farm. It is already bad enough that my alley neighbours have rescue dogs that they clearly don't take care of well.
- City no place for farm animals
- Dislike the idea of urban hens.
- They belong on a farm, not in the city.
- Nuisances from noise would be much more prevalent. Unless it was only outskirts of towns/large lots or an appropriate indoor space for keeping them.
- Hens belong outside the city on a farm.

- In general, livestock require living conditions that cannot be provided in an urban environment and would inevitably result in conflicts with neighbours.
- Noise and health and smell
- We r not a God damn farm city. Keep livestock and hen's on the farm. You are asking for coyotes and wild cats to gone into the city. DUH!!!! They will kill the stupid chickens. They stink...their feces carries disease. Wake up!!!! HOW STUPID!!!!
- There is not enough space in a Calgary home to sufficiently house live stock.
- You want live stock live outside the City. That why we have rural areas.
- I'm a very firm believer, that farm animals should stay on a farm to avoid them becoming a nuisance to humans and avoid the stress these animals should not be subjected to.
- This is difficult. I would love my own chickens but I know so many people would take advantage of it. In my neighborhood I would be concerned it would attract wildlife that could put my dog as risk.
- Livestock do not belong in city
- I come from a farm where we had laying hens and they are their pens are dirty and smell terrible. This is fine when they are on a farm but not in a city where people live in close proximity. Unfortunately not everyone can keep their homes and yards clean as it is and I think it would be an absolute disaster to bring hens into the mix- NOT A GOOD IDEA.
- No livestock in the city. They make a mess and are loud
- Adjacent neighbour support seems unreasonable if other criteria are met
- I don't feel your neighbors should have any say.
- Unless the proper lot size is provided I don't believe livestock should be in suburban communities.
- Noise and smell
- Houses generally to close together. So many people have allergies to hay And wood chips. Some barely take care of regular cat and dog don't need chickens and rosters too
- I find they are more suited for country lifestyle
- Most city people have no concept of what it takes to raise any form of livestock including hens. I believe it would just lead to mass neglect. Most dogs and cats are not looked after according to bylaws - what makes you think animals requiring more intelligent care would be a good idea?
- Livestock comes with noice and smell pollution. Plus they might carry pest. They can attract rodents and wildlife as foodsource for these
- Livestock does not belong in a city. Too stressful.
- Bylaw enforcement is complaint driven. As long as this remains our method, it will be adversarial between neighbours. We need less of that.
- Make it a permit as well, If they want Hens or other livestock I'd prefer if they jumped through hoops and had to get a permit, not everyone should be able to keep livestock
- Issue with noise.
- "Move out of city limits if you want a farm.
- If we all have self sustainability even in the city why have shops? why buy local? The agriculture all around Calgary would plummet astronomically if everyone (and their hen) weren't buying."

- People can hardly keep things clean without livestock. Let's keep livestock to farms and rural areas.
- I don't want to deal with a neighbor living next door with a smelly noisy chicken coop. They want one they can move to an acreage.
- Animals belong in farms, not cities.
- May become a noisy and smelly problem
- I believe these types of animals should not be allowed in the City.
- Hens do not belong in homes.
- City living means generally living in close proximity. a crowing rooster or squeaking hens can be very noisy and disturbing. Never mind the smell if not properly cared for. Livestock should be limited to acreages , farms, or people with large lots.
- Chickens bring vermin
- Proper training for owners
- Don't want livestock in neighborhoods
- This does not define what suitable living conditions are. And the term positive impact/community benefit is vague. The idea of obtaining support from adjacent neighbors is also questionable; would there be a form made?
- Dogs are not dangerous because of their breed. Some of the nicest dogs I have met are pit bulls. They are dangerous because of the way they are trained/their environment and experiences.
- Livestock needs to be on an acreage or farm not a back yard.
- Why should people be allowed to have hens in their yard/house... but some people can't even let their pitbull or "aggressive" dog not be muzzled or be in an off leash park?
- I don't trust humans to take care of animals they belong on a farm or acreage.
- Live in the country if you want livestock.
- Pit bulls are no more dangerous than other breeds. Pit bulls are not born aggressive, they're taught to be. Doberman's, Shepard's, Rottweilers, etc. If you wanna ban a breed, make sure you ban all them.
- Bird flu.....
- Our city always stood behind responsible pet owner ship if any breed specific bylaw I would sell my house and move away as I would refuse to live in a city that thinks that discrimination is acceptable as long as it is against something that has no means to defend it's self
- Risk of disease due to close human/livestock interaction, serious potential for limited alternatives to enforce problems arising from feces, urine, pest insects, etc.
- Absolutely no to labelling Pitbulls as bully breeds or as high risk. I do NOT agree with all the bylaw changes at all.
- Do not support backyard livestock
- I feel it would attract predators such as coyotes
- Livestock Do not belong In any city. Most new communities barely have 4 feet between them. Hard NO

- There are enough dangerous animals in the city partially as a result of additional land required for these animals. They contribute to other unpleasant issues when housed in restricted areas and may encourage other predatory animals residing or coming further into the city putting the communities at further risk.
- Yards are too small in the city and houses are far too close to allow any livestock. Smell and noise cannot be regulated. It should not be up to neighbours to disallow an application by voicing an opinion in reference to a sign.
- chickens are delicious, but filthy. They attract mice and other vermin.
- nobody wants to live next to chickens
- To many lazy people that wouldn't properly maintain the clean up of these animals
- City yards are not adequate size for farm animals.
- I like everything except for needing a community benefit
- Our city backyards are not big enough to house these types of animals. Larger lot sizes might be okay but new communities are not great just because outdoor space is limited.
- Don't let people have chickens, you will have more noise complaints then you can handle and those [removed] stink when not taken care of and let's be honest half the Calgarians can't clean up their dog shit let alone their chicken shit
- It would be disruptive to neighbours and the animals themselves to be kept in a strange urban setting
- Health concerns over keeping the hens and to avoid people selling the eggs of livestock.
- I don't believe that chickens can be kept in residential areas while keeping neighbors happy. They are not a city friendly animal.
- I don't want hens in Calgary neighborhoods
- Go [removed] yourself [removed]
- Chickens smell.
- They are loud and smelly
- Not a fan
- Livestock belong on a farm and not within the city limits
- It's too dangerous for the animals, too easy in an urban environment for someone to sneak into a yard and harm and/or steal the livestock, etc. The safety of the animals must be the top priority in this particular matter.
- If taken care of, someone owning birds does not offend me.
- It is unnecessary to have livestock in an urban centre. Perhaps having parameters based on lot size.
- farm animals have no place in the city. We have small yards. People can't keep yards, alleys, etc free from dog mess, how can you expect them to clean up properly after farm animals.
- My neighbours run a [removed] sawmill and wood-burning facility in their backyard in the SE and ByLaw has done nothing about. Therefore, I refuse to get permission from adjacent neighbours because they are [removed]s.

- Hens are not pets. They are animals that deserve a proper home where they won't be killed for food or mistreated for eggs
 - If you want to raise livestock move to a farm. I don't want chickens and other livestock living in the city.
 - There would be issues with renters & landlords which are likely to outweigh potential positives. Another challenge would be enforcing animal welfare standards & monitoring for transmission of disease. Livestock husbandry requires careful sanitation.
 - Putting this on a neighbour to decline a request will cause future issues between neighbours.
 - I don't want to listen to hens or livestock in the city. Outskirts where the properties are bigger for sure. I don't hear them over there.
 - Livestock should be kept out of city limits. There is more pollution in the city which could cause concerns for the animals. If they are producing something that could be consumed it could cause harm.
 - Farm animals belong on farms or land larger than 2 acres.
 - "Noise
 - Smell"
 - Farm animals are for farms, not for houses in urban areas. These animals require sufficient range to roam which is likely not possible in City limits.
 - Charge owners and not the breed. Bully breeds are not the issue, owners are. Do not discriminate against bully breeds
 - Hens are noisy & dirty.
 - I do not support the noise or smell of chickens in my neighborhood. Farm animals are for farms.
 - I don't support raising livestock in an urban environment.
 - Why do we need live stock running around? The city is a joke, not a farm
 - "Support from adjacent neighbours should be a very minor consideration. Considering how picky/offended many people get from minor disturbances, I feel like this would result in most permits being denied.
- I see nothing wrong with having a few chickens (for example) in a backyard as it is eco-friendly and would harm nobody."
 - I am concerned about animal welfare and humane handling for end of life. Where would these birds be slaughtered? Euthanized? I fear they would be set free to die a "natural" death which I do not consider humane for a bird that has spent its life in captivity. Additionally, I am already concerned about the bobcat population in my neighborhood and backyard chickens would only increase the bobcat population.
 - It's hard to enforce, and it risks the safety of more animals. Most animals need more space/resources than can be provided in the city.
 - Health reasons

- Some of those animals have a heavy smell.
- So many people In Calgary have chicken coops and other livestock. Being able to live off of your own food from your own garden and animals should absolutely be encouraged and allowed. Those who don't provide humane environments or are ill-equipped to handle them should be exceptions on a case by case basis. I'd take livestock over yappy, annoying dogs that don't stop barking any day.
- Noise
- -
- Domestic animals should be the only ones allowed in the city.
- Concerned about potential hygiene and cleanliness issues and noise pollution
- Hens and some other livestock are noisy and smelly, I think many houses in Calgary are too close together to feasibly allow ppl to have livestock in the city
- I dont think the city is a place for livestock. People will try and cram animals in places where they don't belong and aren't treated well. I doubt the city will have enough funding to manage this properly.
- Chickens will become a nuisance, their excrement leaches into the soil and can contaminate it, they smell and undoubtedly there will be cases of negligent owners who dont take care of the birds properly and have no regard for any nuisance the birds may cause for neighbours. Enforcement of the rules will cost more taxpayer dollars.
- What other livestock is being considered?
- I don't think livestock should be in the city residential areas.
- City housing is too close together and neighbours should t have to deal with the noise and stench of farm animals in the back yard.
- Nobody needs farm animals as pets
- Some areas of the city are already prone to the presence of other wildlife such as skunks, coyotes and bobcats and the addition of urban hens would likely increase the presence of these predators which are a hazard to pets and children.
- that brings coyotes and other wild life into the city
- "Why do
- We need hens in the city???"
- Other live stock require room and yard in the city are becoming smaller by the year.
- I have no opinion on this. Default option is no change.
- Animals should not be kept for slaughter within the city. They are more susceptible to stress, noise and other issues. It is not safe or necessary.
- I don't believe "farm" animals belong in a city setting!
- Hens are for rural areas.
- It would be uncontrollably noisy and unable to guarantee health and safety in a casual setting like that.
- If dogs and cats are already such a big problem, the last thing we need is love stock for people to manage. We already have large numbers of complaints about noise and cleanliness with normal pets, livestock will bring this to an astronomical level. It also has a chance to attract predatory pests such as coyotes, foxes, weasels as well as larger wild predators such as large cats, wolves and bears. Livestock animals such as chickens can create massive unhygienic problems with waste and smells, as well as noise.

- The city is not a farm
- My concern would be noise, animal attacks etc.
- No livestock
- I dont believe Hens and other livestock would benefit the city as a hole they require more space and I would be concerned about the smell and noise. I cant imagine what the necessity would be for this. I dont agree st alk
- No live stock of any kind should be allowed in the city. The lots are too small and I don't believe any type of farm animal should be cooped up in a city.
- Hens aren't for cities. Hens are for the country. I'm sure it wouldn't smell great and it would look like we lived in a third world country. No way.
- Animals should be free
- Until coyotes can be better maintained in urban setting you are just providing live food.
- Depends on the kind of wildlife, but Noise complaints would skyrocket.
- Hens should not be kept in your backyard, loud and uncontrollable
- Keep it simple. Bylaw officers cannot enforce all this by themselves. Chickens and/or a Rooster make plenty of noise. Touchy subject.
- No livestock in city limits
- I live in a high rise
- Houses are almost stuck onto each other, I would never live next door to someone with chickens, that noise is for acreages not the lots we live in in Calgary
- Concern with noise, Smells untidy yards
- I feel like this could become very messy. Animals are meant to live in large areas not cooped up in the city
- this is an urban city not a farm yard
- No hens. Cats and dogs in the city. We're not farmers here. A lady in Shawnessy has geese. They are noisy.
- I believe you need to live in the country to keep chickens.
- It will be soon be abused. People won't clean up after their animals. I mean REALLY one of the vectors for virus transmissions is close proximity to pigs and ducks and potentially others. Why do we want to go back to living in medieval cities because of claims of needing a 'comfort' animal.
- They stink and make noise keep them on properly zoned farms
- I've never heard a good outcome from anyone's neighbor owning livestock
- Don't need livestock within city limits.
- Going to create too many neighbourhood issues and disputes. Smell, attraction of pests into coops, noise complaints

- Hens in town will promote the likely hood of [removed] Fights
- I lived on a farm, I hated the smell then and I hate it more now...and would not be ok being awoken on non work days by barnyard animals
- Unfortunately the smell would be prohibitive
- no it will make the communities smell/sound like a farm and less appealing. Also very annoying for the neighbors to listen to.
- This could be another situation for animals to not be taken care of properly / abuse / neglect , ect
- My daughter has chickens in the country. They are very noisy and their coup smells very bad. It's ok when it is a long way from a residence. They also attract predators.
- Excrement from poultry can be overwhelmingly smelly and carries disease. Would not want hens near my home.
- I owened hens, I know is impossible to avoid smell and keep clean for an urban standard
- Noone in the city should be able to raise hens. That is very sloppy and makes the city look bad. Go live on a acreage if you want to raise a hen or chicken
- Livestock belong in open spaces on averages or farms. There are enough animals in shelters and poorly treated in the city and the shelters would become even more burdened to care for livestock when their owners tire of them and throw them in the street.
- I think we should start with hens and see how that goes before considering other livestock.
- Farm animals belong on farms
- Chickens are loud and can carry disease
- Livestock belongs on a farm
- I don't agree with hens living in Calgary
- Because these animals are not objects to be used. We're already having a problem with global warming and we're gonna add onto it by allowing people to own their own livestock
- "Farms in a creatures are where farm animals

- Farm and acreages are where livestock should live not in city limits"
- They are noisy and smell bad, they belong on farms
- bad smells and bird diseases
- This will pit more neighbours against each other

- I support this other than the exceptions on a case by case basis
- Having livestock in the inner city doesn't seem beneficial to most people and the animals.
- The city is not a place for livestock.
- Coty doesn't have the resources to be able to deal with complaints/incidents related to these other animals. The city doesn't even have the resources to deal with dog/cat complaints so we shouldn't add more animals. This could lead to issues with cleanliness/noise in those areas. How can you possibly obtain support from all neighbour's when New neighbour's could move in at any time?
- People are irresponsible, allowing anyone to have livestock is a horrible idea. If it is allowed there should be applications, rules and follow by the city to ensure the livestock is living a good quality of life
- Hens create very a offensive odour problem, totally unfit for the urban environment. You must know a substantial percentage of urban chicken farmers will not have good cleanliness standards and will not keep odours down.
- I don't want chickens etc living next door to me
- I don't think hens should be allowed in the city.
- Additional noise & smell Animals like this should be where there is lots of acres between homes.
- A standard city lot is not large enough for any livestock. Noise, smell, annoyance, danger are not restricted to the owner's lot. All of these affect adjacent lots automatically; the owner cannot control that and therefore it should not be allowed. PERIOD. This includes bee-keeping, which I can say from first-hand knowledge, is both annoying and dangerous and affects my enjoyment of my own property.
- They are dirty and disgusting
- My concern is that people will want these animals without the know how of how to take care of them and the majority will end up abused.
- You have a right to do what you want on your own private property. I DO, however, agree with the making sure of suitable living conditions can be provided point.
- Don't make things complicated that don't need to be. We have more important things to spend our tax dollars on.
- It creates a possible toxic environment between neighbours if a neighbour declines. Better to just avoid it all together.
- I do not want to "urbanize" our back yards any further. Birds can be noisy, messy and dirty. I moved to the suburbs precisely because it's quieter. Please don't keep trying to make us become some place we don't want. You're already allowing more basement suites and taking away seniors only residences, how much more damage do you want to inflict on us?
- Don't want the smell or sound of livestock in the communities.
- I don't think the general public is aware of zoonotic infections to ensure that humans are not threatened by keeping livestock in close proximity. Covid-19 is a great example. If I want to live near livestock I'll buy a farm, not a municipal property.
- I don't believe the welfare of livestock can be maintained in the limited city space.

- There is no need for them in the city and it would be dangerous for the already wondering animals and hens.
- Do not support - as one example, even though one may not be adjacent to the person whom decided they wanted a rooster as 'other livestock', the racket at dawn would definitely carry/bother several blocks in distance.
- Livestock need a particular environment and domestication of certain species is a potentially animal rights situation
- The noise, waste and smell remains to much of a concern to allow this type of so called urban farming.
- Chickens smell really bad. No matter how clean you keep the coop they stink.
- Hens need to stay on a farm not in a city
- They are loud , dirty and should not be in urban areas
- Live stock belongs in areas that can provide appropriate room for them to live. Noise and smell is also an issue.
- I think too many people wouldn't know how to properly care for hens or would get lazy over time and coop conditions would end up poor.
- Some neighbours would never approve anything even if not truly impact them
- The smell isn't worth it
- "Absolutely no livestock in the city!!! No one wants to smell chickens or hear chickens every morning if they did they would live on a farm
- Absolutely not, not to mention the increase barking complaints because the dogs wont stop barking ay the chickens absolutely no there is no need"
- Think hens would be intrusive, noisy and smelly- attracting predators as well
- I don't believe the average person has the ability to properly care for these animals, and would be worried about animals like this getting free. As well, non-domesticated animals are more likely to carry viruses and other illnesses that may be detrimental to human health.
- "This is not a rural situation
- I don't want animals that should be on rural properties"
- City lots are small, animals are noisy. It requires space and distance from others which I don't see feasible in the city.
- Farm animals belong on a farm
- Livestock doesn't belong in the city. It would lead to noisy/ unsanitary conditions. Your neighbors do not deserve to have odors and loud annoyances imposed on them. Additionally, one must be able to afford to provide a high quality of life for livestock, therefore one would be able to afford to move out of town if this was the case.
- To noisy and stinky
- They are loud and can kill people
- I see the potential for too much abuse of this bylaw and envision yards full of chickens or goats that decrease others' property values and quality of life. If it was extremely limited in scope as to what is considered livestock, how they are to be housed and strict number limits, it may work, but I don't see people abiding by the law on this one.

- Lets stick with hens and bees.
- Flock/hens safety and disease prevention is complicated and must ensure that human food safety is not compromised.
- Livestock does not need to be in the city
- Hens are not considered a domestic animal.
- The public is uneducated about livestock especially those who live in the city you need a minimal 8 foot high fence to keep Chicken from flying over. Next you're going to have neighbors complaining about the smell and noise. Who's going to round up the chickens when they get out? Who is going to police and make sure people are abiding by the numbers? For example if you're allowed for chickens at one location and let's say everyone in the city own chickens how are you going to follow up with everybody every single time to make sure they're abiding by the law? People can't even drive proper in the city and you're wanting to give them chickens. There is a huge skunk problem in Erinwoods.... Chickens/livestock only bring in predators.
- Do not want livestock in neighborhood
- Since we seem to be moving into an age where work / education is done from the home thanks to COVID I can't see myself getting much work done while my neighbors chickens are loud and disruptive. I see there being lots of fights between neighbors on this.
- Whenever rules are changed to allow people to allow people of a community to start altering their homes to take in more animals too many people take advantage of the situation. A good portion of people will take care of their home but many will not. Then if a neighbour's life is affected from the new altercations from not properly maintained hen (ie. smell and noise) it becomes very difficult for the neighbour to get the situation fixed.
- Because if that chief has something against that breed or anything he/she can make it go their way instead and I do not agree with it. The law system is already flawed as it is.
- bylaw should remain as is. no livestock other than for emotional support.
- I do not support existing City oversight in way too many areas, let alone any new bylaws.
- livestock within city limits is a "nuisance" as put best in the earlier engagement
- Houses are very close together in Calgary. We live together well because we have some basic rules. I don't think that this is a fair environment for urban hens for either people, or the hens.
- BSL are going to increase kill shelters capacity and it is wrong to assume a dog is bad because of their breed. It's sick and evil. I am ashamed the City would even suggest such a thing.
- "I was raised on a farm and I know that's where animals belong .For exmple, chicken yards and fences stink,as does daily Animal urination. We have enough noise in the city without roosters crowing and cows mooing. This is not ""the wild"" .BIG crazy idea.If that happens in Calgary,I am outta here.
- urination."

- I believe there needs to be more regulation in pet ownership as there are lot of irresponsible owners. But I do not believe a ban or extra regulation on a certain breed\type is the correct way to go about it. Don't punish a dog or owner that has done nothing wrong. But more effort into dealing actual incidents and bylaw offences
- We don't need chickens in the city
- You cannot blame a specific breed. I have been bitten by a number of dogs over the years and 100% of the time it has been small shitzhu type dogs that bite. I have met more pit bulls that I would feel comfortable around. You cannot pick on pit bulls without including shepherds, Doberman's, Rottweiler.etc
- this should be approved, no need any additional restrictions.. this will benefit many people especially during pandemic
- the last thing I want to smell while enjoying my yard is the "barnyard smells" that are associated with having livestock. I would not trust the owners to keep their "barnyard" clean and smell free. The City doesn't patrol stray, free running cats whatsoever so have not faith in enforcing these additional bylaws.
- I don't care about hens. Leave them on the farm.
- Not in a city
- Livestock should not be in the city.
- Hens produce a noise and smell that should not be allowed in the city. Neighbours would not have the option to approve/disapprove and that may impact resale values of homes.
- Chickens should not be allowed in the city. They attract skunks and cause a bigger issue with their presence.
- There isn't enough land in Urban setting
- "Many animals are a nuisance by nature - crowing hens at 5am, the smell of chickens or other livestock and their feces - which could adversely impact enjoyment of homeowners and residents who choose not to raise livestock.

- If people want to raise farm animals then they can move to a farm or outside of the city where such activities are already permissible."
- people rarely consider all pets
- Livestock can be very noisy, and smelly as well. This can have a negative effect on more than just the adjacent neighbours.
- Huge NO. Property values and contentment with life would drop immensely. If you want a hen go live on a farm. I do not want to listen to or smell them
- All livestock type animals shd be rual not urban areas. Also noise is a big consideration and livestock animals do make noise

- The city isn't designed for livestock. Even though I would love to have chickens I see the risk for animal and potential community disruption. I can also see how we couldn't limit to just chickens as definitely not large livestock
- It's hard enough now to keep the coyotes away, without having livestock around. Beyond this, the smells and noises involved do not belong in an urban neighbourhood.
- Livestock can attract other wildlife- eg. coyotes, bobcats - into residential areas making it a safety issue for residents and pets
- "Yards are not big enough in Calgary, your neighbours would be negatively impacted by smell, noise, etc.
- Minimum yard requirements of 2 (two) acres or more would have to be imposed.
- Neighbours move so what happens when a neighbour who supported the ownership of livestock moves and a neighbour who does NOT support it, due to allergies, smell or noise, etc, moves in? Or if a neighbour who thought they could support the situation discovers after the animal(s) are there that the situation is not what was expected or is, in fact, intolerable and they do not support it after all?
- Is there going to be a set limit on how many livestock animals you are allowed? How would you determine the limits? Will there be a determined amount of livestock/acre? How many chickens or roosters or pigs or cows or horses, etc, or combinations of them will be allowed and how do you determine that? What would happen if someone exceeds the set limit of livestock?
- Are all livestock going to be allowed? If not, how do you determine which will be allowed and why and which won't and why?
- Will there be an appeal process? If so, who will set it up and organize it? How would you choose the board members? Who would be in charge and how would it be paid for?
- What happens to the animals if the living conditions and/or care requirements are not met? Will there be a fine system? If so, who will determine the fines and enforce them?
- What happens if the animals are at large? What happens if the animals are abandoned or seized? Where would the animals be housed? Who would care for them on a day to day basis and who would be financially responsible? Where would the additional finances come from? How would rehoming/adoption work?
- There is simply too many issues that can and WILL arise from this for it to be allowed. No animals other than cats, dogs, birds, fish, bunnies, guinea pigs, hamsters, and most reptiles, snakes or other domesticated pets than can be quietly and responsibly housed within someone's actual home, whether it be a house, apartment, condo, duplex, etc, should be allowed within city limits. Animals that are deemed to be livestock or wild should not be housed within city limits, unless they were/are grandfathered in, or are on properties deemed as ""farms"", especially if the property is less than 2+ acres."
- The only one I disagree with is the support from adjacent neighbours- they will not be impacted greatly by the hens, so not necessary. No different than if someone got a dog, you don't need approval from your neighbours for that. A dog has the potential to be much more noisy than hens.
- I don't like it

- This is opening up another can of worms and increase problems with wildlife looking for food
- If people want hens they can move to an acreage or buy a farm.
- I do not think people in Calgary know how to deal with them, and could see way to much time and money wasted and complaint and etc.
- You have not provided enough information to say yes. What type of livestock? How is adequate land, water, sanitation determined for a horse or a pig or a goat? What happens when the community or neighbours change or change their sentiment over time?
- Dirty, would create yards that are disgusting
- Too loud
- I do not want livestock if any kind kept in yards near my home !!!!!
- house values would go down,, do to the mess from livestock. Very noisy and disturbing to neighbors
- Farm animals including chickens do not belong in the city.
- Livestock should be kept on Acreages and Farms. This will only attacked wildlife more into the City ie; coyotes, bobcats etc
- Birds stink
- Remove discretion of the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer
- if you want hens (or bees for that matter) live more rurally. People live in the city, not in towns or near farms on purpose.
- I do not think hens belong in a suburban community. And as a neighbor would find this a nuisance (I.e. smell and/or noise)
- I don't think it is appropriate to have livestock in the city. The smell/noise of livestock could travel much further than just the adjacent neighbours and other neighbours could suffer the consequences
- Hens mean roosters, roosters crow at ALL times of the day and night making noise violations a serious issue, and if not properly maintained and regularity cleaned all livestock pens can easily become a public health hazard.
- I feel people would treat this as a novelty and then not take care of the animals properly.
- Animals, unless they live in the house should not be allowed in the City.
- Livestock has no place in an urban environment.
- It will become very hard to draw the line.
- absolutely not ! this is ridiculous! DISAGREE
- Don't make your job harder
- Those animals do not belong in the city. Neighbours will always be upset, even if not direct neighbours, the community will be.
- Again, too many unknowns can enter the equation.
- Noise at the crack of dawn.
- Chickens are not for neighbourhoods, but farms.
- Livestock should be kept on farms or homes with adequate space. Not in the city.
- Chickens are loud, stink and there is no way to isolate them from other diseased wildlife
- We need to stop exploiting animals for our own pleasures.

- urban hens/livestock could increase noise, odor, and predators in the community.
- Livestock need areas to live (secluded them to a small yard in Calgary is in humane). If you want a wild animal go to the zoo.
- I don't want to live next to live stock otherwise I'd live in the country not inner city
- livestock doesn't belong in the city. it would be a disturbance to neighbors and majority of people are irresponsible and don't understand livestock needs. i worry that people wouldn't properly care for the livestock and they would be surrendered or set "free" where they wouldn't survive
- They would bring more inconvenience and disturbance to the neighborhood. For example, a rooster makes everybody up at dawn everyday and there is no way to train them.
- Where does it stop
- Living in the city, i don't think a lot of people would be happy with the sounds and smells that would come with livestock on a constant basis. It's a nuisance to most - especially light sleepers. I personally don't want to hear livestock at 430am. I think this would drop the value of houses in the city because farms that house livestock typically are much dirtier in nature. Not to mention, it could increase or predator animals from the wild to frequent the cities more which could harm pets/people (ie. cougars, coyotes)
- Noise, and especially odour from hens and/or wild stock would not be acceptable. This topic is just too stupid to talk about. Theses critters belong on a farm. Calgary, stop bending over and taking it to satisfy the wants of the few over the needs of the many!
- Most Calgary neighborhoods are way too crowded (with very small yards) to allow livestock without affecting the neighbors.
- I don't think hens and other livestock are needed in city limits. If properties with hens are not well maintained, then there are problems for neighbours. There are enough problems with dog owners who do not clean up after their dogs and the smell and flies are terrible. Bylaw does nothing for these problems when reported and neighbours have to live with it. Why add more problems to the list?
- I come from the country. Chickens have to be one of the worst smelling livestock around.
- Will be hard to enforce. Is enough poop everywhere from rabbits, cats and dogs...having livestock in backyards might cause a big issue. Imagine a hen escaping and running in a yard where free dogs or cats are in...
- Livestock doesn't belong in community neighborhoods.
- "My neighbor already has hens... (illegally apparently)
- If folks wanna raise other livestock they can buy a farm..."
- I grew up on a farm and would not want them living next to me!!
- Also, NO HENS in the city.
- They belong on a farm. People can not be trusted to endure the animals well being
- I do not want farm animals in the city. I know many people who are afraid of (including children) chickens and it I believe there is a risk that it would devalue my property if my neighbors had chickens.

- Chickens can be loud and disturb piece. They smell bad and i wouldn't want to deal with the smell coming from neighbors backyard. Especially of we are sharing the fence.
- I would be concerned about noise, smells and what happens if the animal escapes its enclosure? If the person needs poultry or livestock for their won benefit, it's a lifestyle choice; they can move to a rural environment. I cannot see any positive impact to the community of having poultry or livestock in a neighborhood, other than being an accessible "petting zoo" for kids.
- Livestock belongs on a farm with farmers that are dedicated to caring for them.
- It isn't the breed that is the problem it is the owner & regardless of the strength of a breed if a dog is going to bite it will bite. I have been bit more times by small dogs than large dogs.
- Support from neighbors can be hard to attain
- Noise, smell.
- There is no need to have these type of animals / birds within the city limits.
- I can't see how they're necessary for an urban dweller, they make noise, smell and can carry diseases.
- Because it's stupid.
- They have poor hygiene and should be in the country
- The city does not provide enough space for humane treatment of farm animals.
- I would but I don't think you should need neighbour support. We too often allow our neighbours to dictate what we do in our own property - unless it's physically spilling over onto yours or breaking an existing noise bylaw then it should be fair game.
- if i wanted to live with livestock I would move to a farm. There is no place for a farm fowl or animal in the city
- I think livestock are noisy and smelly and dirty and could cause disease
- livestock if not taken care of smell. once someone has it, it will be impossible to get them removed. It would make a difference to my purchasing a property. and could devalue others peoples property.
- We live in the city for a reason. If I wanted barn animals in my community, I'd move to the country.
- They are extremely dirty and noisy, does not support a clean upscale city environment
- It's too random, and the choice of livestock would be dictated by people's ethnic backgrounds and eating habits. It's getting more common to hear about goats being slaughtered around the city and at campsites. No one wants the neighbours' noise and smell.
- If someone wants chickens or a cow, they should move out of the urban environment. We have the LESA bylaw for emotional support animals. I would not support my neighbour having chickens or sheep or other livestock in the City.
- I don't think a city has a proper environment for hen
- Livestock belongs on a country residential, or property zoned for agriculture.
- I do not support citizens having farm animals (eg. chickens, ducks, geese, rabbits, pigeons, pigs) in the city because we are already seeing too many by-law infractions with pet owners in general
- Enforcement of bylaws is already stretched to thin so they won't have time to police urban livestock issues.

- Chickens, fine. Other livestock, no thank you.
- I had a neighbor with hens and it was noisy and smelled.
- People should move to an acreage if they want farm animals.
- I believe livestock should be kept on farms, or larger pieces of land in the proper living conditions meant for them.
- That would encourage predators and wildlife into the city e.g. cougars, bobcats, etc
- It has nothing to do with the breed of dog.
- Hens and livestock can't be controlled in the same way as domesticated animals. They are noise, smell and most certainly do not know how to adhere to noise bylaws.
- "The City should be focused on finding ways to reduce its operating costs not increasing them, particular in a time of a shrinking tax base. Allowing livestock in the city will require staff and resources to regulate
- Secondly, there is a reason livestock require lots of space and mechanisms to clear waste (faeces, carcasses, bedding, food and so on). What is the strategy to allow people to clear waste safely, hygienically and cost-effectively? This should totally be a user pays cost.
- Thirdly, this seems to be a self-interested request .
- Fourthly, what consideration will be given to mitigating other risks such as noise, safety (e.g. disease, aggressive behaviour, animals getting loose, running into traffic etc.
- This idea has to be one of the most ridiculous. If people want to own livestock. Simple solution. Buy an acreage outside city limits."
- We have lived by this in Mount Pleasant, it was not pleasant.
- We have had experience with neighbours having hens in backyard. Noise issues.
- City people don't need farm animals. the risk of neglect and abuse would be too high.
- Absolutely not. People cant take care of their yards or pets as it is. I would be choked if a neighbor had a hen house
- Chickens should be in a farm not in an urban setting.
- A bylaw officer shouldn't be able to make final decision on his own it should be something with everyone involved
- why attract wildlife ...we have enough that we are trying to live with
- Too many people would get into this without understanding the needs of the hens. This is going to lead to animal cruelty and unnecessary harm to the hens.
- The smell makes me gag
- Coyotes, owls and countless other dangers to the smaller livestock (traffic too and people who don't know animal handling that would want to take pictures with small kids too. Too dangerous for the animals.
- They are noisy, smelly and can pass on disease through their feces.
- too much of a hassle and henning can be dangerous and attract more wildlife such as coyotes, wolves, lynx, bobcats etc.
- We just went through covid-19, we don't need more dirty livestock in our city to give us diseases.

- Shouldn't be in the city
- Avian flu
- I am not in favor of livestock or other farm animals being kept within the city limits
- A member of our household is anaphalatically allergic to poultry, by ingestion or breathing. If a neighbour was permitted to house poultry we would be forced to sell our family home and relocate.
- They are never properly taken care of (as evidence by other communities that rescinded this bylaw).
- Chickens do not belong in the city, they smell and cause other rodents to seek their food. Not to mention the noise
- Smells and/or noise from livestock, their feed and feces are not desirable and would negatively impact property values.
- Because all animals are innocent, it's the owners that are guilty
- I don't want livestock in close proximity to my house
- Enforcement of all the criteria would be difficult and likely costly.
- No need for this within city limits as it causes nuisance for neighbors.
- Do not discriminate against breeds focus on holding pet owners accountable, training and other resources
- i dont believe keepign hens is at all necessary or important enough for the city to act on. no one needs a hen.
- an emotional support peacock or puma is funny but makes a farce of real support animals
- Farm animals need to stay in farms not in urban areas where neighbours are packed close together. There are lots of flea markets for people looking for "farm fresh" choices therefore it is not necessary within city limits.
- Backyard chickens will cause influenza in the city as owners will not keep their environment clean.
- Not only would the city eventually receive odour, and noise complaints this would become a animal mistreatment issue. It can and should be avoided entirely.
- Farm animals and livestock not required in city
- I would not want animals besides dogs and cats living next door to me.
- So I have to smell chicken shit and watch my neighbours slaughter their chickens. Yet I can't have a pitbull? Whats wrong with you?
- All livestock should be banned within City Limits. The noise and smell would create nuisance behaviour and aggravation for neighboring properties. Despite good intentions, initially, many owners of animals, including domestic, neglect their responsibilities associated with the proper care and maintenance required for owning animals.
- The only one I agree with is hens. But I think if the resources are not there to ensure proper care and housing Of the hens I wouldn't be ok with it. Furthermore, I don't agree with other livestock. I think that could cause issues with neighbours Who perhaps move into a house a where maybe the previous owner was ok but the new one is not but also unlikely people can provide what a larger livestock animal needs living wise within the city and creates more work and time on the park of enforcement officers and court system

- Cost too much money to administer. We are in difficult financial times and our taxes are already too high.
- Because we don't need to turn our residential areas into farms.
- I grew up on a farm and am well aware of the smells, disease, noise, pests AND dangers associated with chickens and livestock. There are other animals people can have as pets to obtain the same support and community benefit. Eggs and poultry can be purchased from outside the city. We can't allow everything in the city that occurs in the country. Citizens must make a choice: urban living or country living.
- I don't want livestock in my neighborhood
- It's not hygienic to have livestock in urban situations
- I do not agree with majority of the By-law presented its racist towards the breed and unfair to those loving non aggressive dogs who are completely fine out in public.
- ITS NOT THE BREED ITS THE OWNER. DO SOME RESEARCH
- livestock do not need to be in the city, how can you train them? house them? They need to stay on acreages or farms not in the city. They are loud and have bad odours and I don't see this essential
- Livestock does not need to be in the city, this will create more problems than they solve.
- Livestock belongs on farms or acreage not in the city. I don't want the noise, smell, attraction of wild animals and vermin.
- I don't believe that livestock belongs in urban areas.
- As long as everything is kept clean all is OK.
- Raising of wild animals, especially noisy and/or smelly animals such as livestock should not be permitted as it causes a disturbance to the rest of the neighborhood. The city is not a ranch, if people would like to ranch they can move outside of the city and get adequate space so as to not be a nuisance to others
- No
- Noise and smell would be a huge problem and who wants a roosters loud noise awakening one at 4:30 AM?? The City of Calgary seems incapable of dealing with loud racing cars and motorcycles in the City and the needs of Calgarians are not at all "balanced" regarding that nuisance, so why introduce more problems you will be incapable of dealing with? Generally, Bylaw Officers in Calgary are impotent and incompetent and would never be able to deal with urban hen problems. If the City can't even afford the cost of pesticide to kill the noxious thistles patches in off lease dog parks, how the heck would anyone think the City could deal with the additional problems of urban hens? The City needs to show it is capable of dealing with the problems it currently has and demonstrate an ability to "balance" Calgarians need for adequate noise and weed control before introducing additional problems.
- I feel this is very unfair for neighbours of chicken owners. They do not have a choice in the noise and sanitary conditions of a place that is right by their home. Even if the hen owners are responsible, there will still be smells as hens are livestock. They will smell. The whole neighbourhood will smell awful if there are multiple hen owners on a street.

- The newer communities are becoming more and more congested! Chickens should be raised out on acreages, they need the space!
- I support raising hens for their egg laying but larger livestock would prove problematic in my opinion
- Although there are aspects of the bylaw which have always validity, I think the restrictions to pit bull breeds is unreasonable and discriminatory. Decisions as to whether or not a dog is to be considered "a nuisance" should be based on individual cases, not breeds.
- No farm animal should be in the city limits, if the person wants a farm animal they should buy land to keep them on. If farm animals are kept in the city eg. chickens then I should be able to keep a horse.
- That's what farms are for! Having livestock or hens or chickens is ridiculous!
- I do not feel it is fair on the neighbours. It could affect the sell price of their home. Only agree to the above on acreages.
- Noise and smell
- pressure by adjacent neighbors may cause issues.
- Allowing these animals will increase enforcement, I don't think it's practical or something where best resources are being used.
- Not fair
- i own a pitbull and never had an issue with her but i have issue with smaller dogs that bark and are a nuisance
- livestock is not for cities. health impact is too great.
- We are in a crowded urban environment. We should have to "balance our needs" with hens - the City is for people!
- Chicken smells and cause a multitude of problems with mice and other animals. They belong on farms and should not be allowed within the city limits.
- Livestock should not be in cities. They need room to move around
- Livestock smell and are noisy
- Ability to keep appropriate livestock within city can improve food security and be beneficial for homeowners and neighbours (eg: chickens eating pest insects)
- If I wanted to live on a farm I'd move to the country!
- Many type of live stock animals require specialized care and space requirements and I don't feel live stock animals belong in the city
- Neighbors SHOULD NOT have say in the decision-making process to obtain urban hens. Bylaw should be given powers to enforce in cases where hens are not cared for and/or become nuisance animals.
- This is racism of the animal world. Pinning one breed because of a trait you consider "dangerous" is essentially racist. Make it fair, don't pin out one breed and the law would be effective. Signed, the owner of a calm, "lovebug" pitbull. (Who I will mention, releases anything when I press the roof of her mouth. Yes I can put my hand in her mouth when she is latched onto a toy and she releases without any harm to me.) Support proper dog training. Not dog bans.
- Why the heck would we want livestock in the city??? They wouldn't like it either.

- Livestock is not suitable for an urban environment
- You really need to understand bio security and the kinds of disease that chickens can spread — livestock and people don't mix in Covid times. Also, most people who want to raise chickens in the city have a Romantic notion about raising chicken and then when the hens get past their egg laying years, they surrender the chickens to the local shelter causing another huge issue. Please talk to knowledgeable groups, like Alberta Egg producers or Alberta chicken producers, before proceeding and allowing this. There needs to be mandatory education at the very least.
- I don't want the noise, smell, and pests that come with barnyard animals
- If you allow hens then it would smell plus the city would smell and there could be a mouse and rat infestation
- We have enough wildlife entering the city, these will only encourage more wildlife into the city
- Noise & smell problems for the neighbourhood / neighbours
- How do you measure community benefit ?
- I don't think livestock of any kind belongs within the city limits
- Because the singling out of "pitbull" type dogs is not ok, especially since the city has stated that they aren't responsible for more bites. Rottweilers and German Shepherds have a stronger psi bite force than "pitbulls" yet no specifications are made about them,
- Animals need a bigger and more quiet environment than the small confines of a yard and noise of traffic in the city.
- You want to impose bylaws against barking dogs and then I am supposed to be okay with listening to chickens all day. How would the city control smell, pest control (if any), and has the city researched how it would affect home resale.
- I do not believe that livestock should be allowed within the city limits. They are disruptive to others in many ways - noise, smell. Neighbours can, so the permission of one, does not guarantee the support of a new neighbour.
- I lived beside a pigeon coop growing up. There was poop everywhere because they would let them out to fly laps around the neighbourhood. They resulted in dead birds because they would hit the power lines all the time. It brought coyotes in from Nosehill at night time. Not to mention it was just gross. Chickens would be the same and I'm sure would make too much noise.
- Too many variables. Here's another livestock need to be on rural property.
- People that want to own hens and livestock can move outside the city limits and purchase a farm. These animals bring diseases with them and homes in a city are too close together to provide safety for neighbours.
- I do not want livestock in town.
- This may potentially cause disruptive behavior to the neighbors
- "Let's support our farmers, and let the farming and housing of farm animals be to them. Pet owners cannot pick up their dog poo, how are they going to keep their yards clean, provide adequate care, noise issues associated with animals, we have enough irresponsible pet owners in this city, why have more. Let's face it, pet owners are on average very irresponsible.
- Hens, and other such animals belong on farms, where they are not caged, and have room to roam."

- urban areas are NOT farms. Noise and excrement smell would diminish quality of life for neighbors
- Because this is a city. There's no room here for livestock that require space to roam. If you want livestock at home move further out of the city
- We have farms for this. The noise smells poor maintenance by neighbours the increase attraction of wildlife like skunks, Coyotes and snakes In the outlying areas of the city. I think this would cause more issues than what it's worth
- Hens are extremely loud and smelly
- I do not want Farm animals in Urban households I feel risk of increased predators and rodent activity in such areas
- Farm animals smell really bad
- I don't think turning Calgary into a farm is a good idea for anyone.
- This is ridiculous!
- Hens are more of a nuisance than actual pets (dogs). There would be plenty of unnecessary birds dying because many pets aren't exposed to this and would go after the at no fault of the dogs.
- Hens are on farms. These will be more of a nuisance than dogs and cats.
- No need for farm animals in a city
- Bylaw has a problem controlling unruly neighbours, barking dogs and illegally parked vehicles let alone adding hens or other livestock into the mix.
- I foresee issues with this. We don't need urban livestock, there are tons of rural properties available around the city.
- Urban settings should not support livestock especially because enforcement could be challenging when infractions happen
- Farm animals belong on farms.
- Because of the noise and the smell
- City is too busy for animals to be calm and stress free. Along with most property's out door space not large enough to accommodate most farm animals.
- Absolutely not they don't belong in the city
- Livestock do not belong in the city. There is too much risk of disease in the close confines of city properties along with attendant noise and odours. I include pigeons in this category. The Anderson LRT station is an example of pigeons creating a nuisance. They should be removed and kept away as they are dirty and noisy.
- City is not an appropriate place for this type of livestock
- I support therapy animals! One hen, no more. If I see a coop in my neighbors yard, will I be mad, YES! What other livestock? Will I have a cow next door and like it, NO! Be more specific!
- Noise
- I do t think the city has enough enforcement to handle more animals.
- I think this opens the door to alot of challenges regarding other livestock. It could turn into a legal mess. Which equals more expenses for the city. We dont need that.
- It's cruel.

- People need to be fully educated before taking care of any type of animals. So I believe they need to take some type of course or test so they fully understand how difficult it is.
- If I wanted to live next door to a farm I would move out to the country
- All livestock belongs on a farm.
- Farming chickens takes practice and skills which will now fall on neighbors to be subjected too. The noise and biohazard wastes will be an issue as well.
- Livestock does not need to be in the city
- Livestock can't get the car they need in a city property. It increases risk of disease and is entirely unnecessary.
- I believe it will lead to unsanitary conditions
- No chickens in city limits
- I think the bylaw will be abused. It is also hard to define community benefit / positive impact as those could be different to 2 different people. Support from adjacent neighbors could be forged, and also what about neighbors moving? Any livestock approval from a neighbor almost needs to be conveyed if the neighbor plans on selling their property; otherwise a new neighbor might not approve of livestock next door.
- No people do not always follow guidelines.
- Livestock should be kept out of the city. Animals like hens are dirty, smelly and noisy.
- This is a stupid idea, there are already enough irresponsible pet owners around (no picking up after their dogs, noise, not following leash bylaws...), why would you want to create more? Chickens are noisy, smelly and create a lot of waste, it is definitely no suitable for an urban setting. People that need chickens should consider moving out of urban setting.
- Chickens cause noise and a very strong, noxious smell
- Livestock smell bad. I would only support this if their were designated "zones" that someone could move to and raise the livestock. A livestock district, if you will.
- No need in the city
- Smell and attract of other animals
- Do we live in China now?
- This is a city. Not a small town
- Noise and smells would get out of hand
- Livestock produces too much odor and fecal matter, and should never be permitted in urban environment due to close proximity of residential dwellings. Livestock should never be permitted in urban setting.
- This will be to the detriment of the livestock animals. There will be many people who are uneducated on how to care for the animals and we will see an increase in abuse and neglect.
- My neighbor can have hens waking me up in the morning but you want to muzzle my dog and not let him go to his park to see his friends anymore?
- Not interested in having chickens in my neighbourhood.

- Hens and other livestock should not be kept in an urban dwelling. It is not fair to them or to the neighbours.
- As an urban area, this doesn't seem to fit/work.
- Hens are ok but when you say other livestock, where does it stop?
- Chickens belong on farms, not in inner city backyards.
- Livestock do not belong in the city. They are loud and will cause neighborhood disputes. If people want livestock, they are free to move to the country.
- With the current population of Calgary, I just don't see how this will be properly regulated/ evaluated. Chickens don't belong in someone's 4 square foot backyard, they belong in the country
- Those animals are not meant for city living
- In an urban environment, there is zero way living conditions for the animals can be suitable.
- I think it will create more space for dirt and disease as these animals belong on farm land, also certain animals can create noise etc.
- I don't believe that everyone will take proper care. and it will draw more wildlife like coyotes into the city
- Farm animals do not belong in our backyards. I grew up on a farm and their care needs to be daily and extensive. City dwellers have no idea what it takes to keep chickens and other farm animals healthy and happy. They will be abused, neglected and become sick and flea ridden in the small spaces where they will be confined due to lack of knowledge and money needed to keep them healthy. What does an owner do when they come to the end of their life? Will there be a law against ending their lives, or what? And where do the remains go?
- If someone wants livestock (including hens) they should be on a proper acreage, outside city limits. There are plenty of livestock farmers within an easy 1/2 hour drive of Calgary that most Calgarians don't even take advantage of purchasing from.
- I feel people would start keeping chickens for food or keep too many chickens, although I did see a pet duck in Jasper this weekend....
- The specificity as Pit Bulls equal to a nuisance dog.
- No livestock
- In many cases, livestock require much more room than what most inner city/suburban backyards are able to properly provide.
- Noise, and smell
- There is enough problems with people caring for animals that are already allowed, do we have the resources to ensure the well being of additional animals?
- Chickens and hens can bite hands. You should definitely make sure they have their own rules, own insurance, deemed a nuisance....
- As a home owner I would be concerned about noise and smell
- Farm animals belong on a farm not the city
- We have enough nuisance around the city. Irresponsible pet owners. Hens belong on a farm not in a city. Noise and waste associated with it, want peace and quiet.

- Too much danger of disease being passed on from animals to humans ie bird flu. Noise and odors could be a big problem.
- Noise, animal neglect, airborne particles and potentially diseases, allergies of neighbours.
- Having farm animals in the city creates extra noise, smells and other nuisances. They could attract wild predators that would cause other issues in the city.
- Why do we need this? Please go live rural. Smelly, noisy, virus ridden.
- Most livestock will not have adequate space in urban areas. The smell of livestock animals is also not enjoyed by many people.
- We live in a city, not a farm
- Farms should be outside city limits
- Noise and smell concerns.
- Unless there would be a way to enforce loud or nuisance hens.
- "Farm animals should not be in enclosed places. They should be roaming free in a large environment. Smells, fights, cleanliness of the neighborhood.
- Might attract more wild life such as coyote, cougars,linux and wolves in the neighborhoods at the limit of the city. I.e : redstone neighborhood has coyotes very close to the houses."
- No thank you
- Hens are farm animals. They're smelly and loud in the city. I would be concerned about people also acquiring roosters. They're also bait for coyotes, which are already an issue in Calgary.
- I don't trust the people of this city to do it in a hygienic way and inoffensive way or purpose.
- It would take more clean up efforts and there would be a decrease in air quality. Cleaning efforts would most likely be paid for with tax money and would not be beneficial to every Calgarian.
- "We live in a city, if you want to live on a farm, then move to the country. Who wants to be awoken by a hen early every morning, not me.
- Plus all that hen poop, smell, seriously city is trying to be too much to many people. Stick with the basics, city dwellers don't own hens.
- And there is no way a hen can provide emotional support for anyone, they are not cuddling animals, and they like to roam free, they need space to roam I.e. farm."
- Chickens, yes. Other livestock, no.
- Absolutely NOT! It is animal cruelty regarding the urban hens. How can there possibly be humane living conditions for Urban Hens - area available, type of runs etc impossible. Public health. Smell/ noise. What if neighbours agree and then new neighbours move in and disagree? The rights of the neighbours? What happens to the hens?
- Breed specific legislation is disgusting. Perhaps mandatory training. Dogs of all breeds may bite. It has nothing to do with breed. This is beyond disgusting if you know the slightest thing about dogs.
- Livestock do not belong in the city
- I'm a vegetarian. Would not want to live near any animal farm.
- The city of Calgary does not have the resources necessary to monitor and regulate livestock within the city sufficiently.

- I can see this going sideways and an increase in complaints that the city will then have to manage.
- is city of Calgary animal services going to be able to house livestock of found at large? Do they have to pay for licensing? There also aren't really large animal vets within calgary.
- I will not support this bylaw because you are allowing livestock on property but you're making it mandatory for bully breeds to have obedience training, more insurance etc. this is ridiculous, figure one thing out at a time, instead of trying to give one thing while you take another do your research on your bully breeds because they are not vicious dogs. They are strong, and since when do we punish someone for being strong...oh right we actually praise it, so grow up and stop trying to give us livestock to distract us while taking away bully breeds.
- It perpetuates bias towards particular breeds of dogs. If the city is concerned they should offer Mandatory free obedience training for "higher" risk dogs instead.
- I do not approve of allowing urban hens or other livestock within City limits. It will greatly increase the number of predatory animals in communities, which will most likely result in a greater number of those predatory animals being euthanized due to Calgarians' improperly providing safe live conditions for their livestock.
- it is wrong
- don't need farm animals in the city
- Really?? Let's talk bird flu!!! Look at all the shit coming out of China!! There are reasons we do NOT live in close proximity to live stock. So are you planning on opening up some chinese wet markets too???? GIVE YOUR HEADS A SHAKE!!!
- This is a city
- My concern is for noise and appropriate space available to the livestock.
- livestock does not belong in the city
- Some people will take advantage of the system and have all kinds of pets in their yard without knowing how to care for them .
- The crowded conditions of the city will create problems for neighbours of people who have livestock and it will only cause more problems among neighbours that will be difficult to resolve.
- This will add so much noise pollution and likely animal neglect / harm as not enough people will be property trained on how to care for the hens properly.
- I do not believe that city lots are large enough to support the living conditions hens require. they're dirty, they smell, they're loud, it will just end in more nuisance calls.
- Livestock belong on farms.
- I don't believe bylaw officers would be able to manage this at the current time. There are enough bylaws that are already barely enforced the introduction of livestock bylaws would be laughable to be honest.
- No leave live stock and would animals out of the city they have no business here, unless you starting up a meat packing plant [remove] off.
- Chickens are far more aggressive than dogs.
- Chickens smell, I don't want chickens living in my neighbours yards so I can smell them. Well taken care of birds shouldn't have a smelly area, but we all know how people are with things in their yards.

- There are a lot of people who think they know how to be self sustainable, but require much more knowledge and education. Till such has been achieved by the individual or household, there should be a full assessment required to attain such animals/livestock.
- That what farms are for!
- Livestock should be only allowed on properties which allow for a significant distance between houses. Most Calgary homes do not have backyards large enough spaces.
- I don't want livestock in the city
- No need to have other livestock in the city. Chickens are fine. If you want other livestock move to a farm.
- Urban hens lead to maltreatment issues for roosters, as they are not wanted/allowed. As well, it often happens that when backyard hens become inconvenient (ie, a move, sickness, or job change), their welfare is often disregarded as owners attempt to relieve themselves of the burden.
- Why on earth are hens needed in the city..
- I do not support urban hens within city limits
- At times we have to deal with noise, destruction of property and feces from others pets. Livestock animals will be exceptional worse for all these items, especially noise and feces (ie. smells). It is much harder to train a livestock animal than domesticated dogs and cats.
- there's just no need for agriculture in the city. That will cause neighbor issues almost instantly. Maybe an exception would be if they own "x" amount of land (like 1 acre) within the city limits
- Livestock of any kind need more space than a Calgarian's backyard
- Livestock does not belong to a city.
- I am concerned about noise and odour.
- They belong on a farm.
- I only say no because it's not clear to me how the well being of these animals would be assured. Who will verify that their living conditions are suitable, and would there be follow up to ensure that the suitable conditions are continuously maintained (particularly as the seasons change, and new needs arise as a result).
- These animals smell terrible and are usually loud so the noise would be disruptive to none owners and would cause more issues
- Noise, fecal contamination, possible vermin infestation from chicken feed
- Farm animals belong on a [removed] farm. A solitary therapy chicken is fine, but if I can't have a free roam pit bull they cant have a flock of chickens.
- Chickens create extra noise and smell.
- Hens are not pets.
- Houses are too close to support urban hens and livestock.
- Chickens are on the farms and production facilities. The fecal matter produced by chickens is not manageable by individuals and can cause E. coli bacterial infections to increase.
- Cats being unregistered and roaming around attracting wildlife needs to be curbed before introducing new pet bylaws.

- Livestock should only be in rural areas not in the city too much noise and problems.
- Farm animals belong on a farm
- Hens are noisy and take up a lot of space
- Livestock isn't meant to live in an urban area.
- If people want farm animals live on a farm.
- You can not force farm animals to be quiet in an urban setting. Plus keeping pest free, clean, etc, would require too many bylaws.
- These animals don't belong in a city.
- livestock belongs on a farm, not in the city. No livestock permitted in the city.
- The noise, the smell - don't want that beside me
- too noisy and smelly
- too many things can go wrong
- I used to work on a farm that had a chicken coup. They stink and are noisy
- No chickens in the city.
- It's not just billy breeds that's are only strong breeds. It's all big dogs . So if you're going to make this a bylaw night as well do it with all big breeds. This is the exact reason we don't come to Calgary anymore. You over react and you guys are ridiculous. If you have the proper training with your dog and you don't abuse it why would it be aggressive ? It's the owners you need to worry about not the [removed] dogs .
- I'm concerned that people aren't aware how noisy chickens are.
- I feel livestock has it's place, not in urban households.
- If you want farm animals, then live on a farm
- What is the definition of "live stock"? I certainly do not want goats/cows in my neighbourhood!
- Alberta drivers run over wild animals with no care! It would just add more bodies on the street!
- The noise, smell. Risk of too many people not knowing how to properly take care of farm animals in the city.
- No hens in urban setting, noisy, smelly, keep them on the farm please
- "Farm animals receive poor enough treatment (and abuse) in the so-called well regulated environment of commercial farming. Allowing the ordinary public to keep, house and ""care"" for hens and ""livestock"" is simply opening the door to far more widespread animal abuse cases. Without frequent inspections backed up by regulations and severe penalties this will be yet another area where humans treat animals horrendously. Animals are mistreated and abused on a daily basis with animal protection laws consistently failing the animals they're supposed to protect.
- Allowing even more animals to be put into situations where the public own them is disgraceful. I am appalled that Calgary would even consider this."
- Some people do not clean up after the pets now, one can only imagine what would be the result if a bylaw was passed to allow livestock and chickens. Calgary Is a City not a barnyard.
- I am not sure people could create a suitable living space. The hens should be free range running around if anything.

- Urban hens in other cities have not panned out that well. They would likely be a noise nuisance
- the city is constantly dealing with bylaw issues without animals or livestock of peoples yards etc.
- I do not agree with livestock in the City as people seem to stretch the limits allowed.
- I do not see how suitable living conditions can be offered in an urban environment.
- Why do we need livestock when ppl cant even take care of their kids, or other pets
- I would support if the animals were quiet. The idea of hens early in the AM is a "NO" for me!
- noise and odors are not suitable for city lot sizes
- unfortunately some owners will neglect to clean the cages and this will bring more undesirable animal like skunks, mice etc..and smell
- Livestock shouldn't be in a city, space, smell noise.
- Chickens are noisy and smell. They do not belong in the city.
- I really like the idea of allowing livestock, but I think there is a pretty high chance for the rules not to be followed and neighbours disturbed. I just don't trust that people would follow the rules and animals shouldn't be caught in the middle
- No chickens in city limits. Please. I've been against this publicly for many years.
- I don't believe people would follow this by law if passed. I'm also confused why chickens are involved in a pet by law?
- I live in the city, if I wanted to hear chickens and other livestock, I'd move to a farm.
- "So that people can not store them properly and they can run amok? It will happen
- They are dirty and extremely smelly and would be an absolute disturbance. They also attract coyotes and foxes which will wander into the city to investigate"
- I'm not down with the smell of livestock
- Although there is a lot of potential for benefits from having livestock within the city, there is too much room for irresponsible ownership and I feel we should focus on the domestic pets before creating a program like this.
- I don't think there is enough room/space in the average Calgary yard to adequately care for hens. I worry about animal welfare as it is a huge undertaking to care for hens. If there was a course required for anyone interested on how to properly care for hens, etc., then I might support the idea
- Farm animals do not belong in the city limits!!
- The noise of livestock animals would spread past the immediate neighbours,
- Let people be
- Hens and chickens promote rats, alberta is one of the few places without them.
- I don't believe this is necessary. City people should not have the OK to keep farm animals. There is enough waste from these animals out in rural areas that it doesn't need to be expanded in to the city
- I feel the sound and mess would get out of hand. Due to the size of the properties the city has been approving now. Such as zero lot lines. It might have to be a larger property. And would need approval from 4-6 Neighbours
- I think its unfair to bully any and all bully breeds.

- Livestock should remain in rural areas, if someone wants to own livestock on their property then they should move out of the city.
- Terrible idea to allow poultry in the city
- Bylaw already does not have the man power or understanding of animal welfare to control this. Your officers don't even pull animals out of bad situations now, you just call the humane society and plead ignorant. How are you going to deal with livestock when you don't have a shelter/rescue to work with? You don't even take in rabbits for crying out loud. Don't bite off more than you can chew. Calgary already has shown it cannot be responsible for animal ownership.
- Years ago my neighbours had a rooster in their back yard that woke us up at 4:30 am every morning. It was awful
- I don't think farm animals should be allowed in the city
- Concerns about disease, odour, noise and the risk that people will neglect their animals next door and I would have not be able to cope emotionally with it. Bylaw officers are in short supply and have too much to do already and most bylaws are not upheld now. The current "enforcement by complaint" system is a failure already and I couldn't accept that lack of response would result in more cruelty to animals. I also think that this could create a lot of conflict among neighbours. For example, some like pigs, others hate them or have religious problems with them. Raising animals for fur is an ethical offence to most people. Rabbits are pets to some and food to others. It goes on and on.
- Pigeons are not pets & should not be allowed as such unless their wings are clipped.
- Why would someone in an urban setting need chickens? I cannot imagine having a neighbour with chickens and being forced to listen to that all day long.
- Livestock are usually louder, smellier, and require more space than can be provided in an urban setting
- Terrible idea - very serious and long term impacts to neighbours
- Chickens spread disease. Would you let people own ducks and geese next? Or how about rats and pigs. Instead of Wuhan 2, we can have the Calgary flu.
- Livestock are made for farms. Keep them there. The noise and the smell doesn't fit city life.
- The noise level of farm animals in the city is unacceptable. Especially when we can not control clean standards.
- This is one of the most prejudice and judgemental bylaws I've ever read. You can not act with this much prejudice to a dog breed when jack Russell terriers, chiuhas, golden retrievers and other such dog breeds are far more aggressive. Dogs don't attack based on breed they attack based on the way their owners raise and train them. This seems like the councilor proposing this has extreme prejudice based on their on personal feelings about this specific breed and is not attempting to utilize their position of power to control and enforce something so discriminatory.
- Livestock belong on farms. I've lived next to people who owned a rooster.... The whole neighbourhood can hear that whenever it decides to cockadoodle doo!
- The keeping of livestock in a major urban area is completely inappropriate given the negative impacts of noise and odor on the community.

- There is not enough room for livestock in the city
- Lot sizes are too small to allow this
- There is no need for this amendment as there is no need to allow for livestock of any kind in Calgary.
- This is noise that cannot be contained.
- My concern is that neighbors with hens would not properly care for them causing a smell, noise and unclean environment for all those in the area.
- Seems like a slippery slope. If neighbors agree to you having hens in your yard and they move is it grandfathered in?
- Fowl and any other type of farm animal belong in a rural setting only. This would include pigeons.
- Farm animals belong on a farm.
- Unless there is adequate space, it's not fair to the animal
- Chickens are loud and messy. What if the neighbours approve the chickens and then move?
- No livestock in the city. There's always the one person who won't take care and it'll be a nuisance for all.
- Having hens in the city is just one more noisy, disgusting, unnecessary complication that the city governance doesn't need to waste its time, energy, and citizen money on. Buy an egg at the grocery store for 10¢. Good God.
- Livestock shouldn't be raised in the city.
- "The amount of people that
- Would buy them not realize the responsibility and just let the out would be terrible. Along with the improper caging that would happen along with the noise"
- Seriously. Hens. We do not live on a ranch. They belong on a farm.
- livestock do not belong in the city. If you want to raise chickens move to a farm.
- Many people are unfamiliar with farm animals and therefore their care may be substandard. Also the noise, smells and small lot size makes this unwieldy
- Hens and other livestock do not belong in the city
- Too much of a nuisance
- What a nightmare. Absolutely not. The smell. The sounds. The one inevitable lack of care, especially in winter. The unwanted animals chickens will attract.
- No
- Urban environments are not the right environments for livestock. Livestock in urban environments would also be nuisances to neighbours.
- You want livestock, go by a farm. Livestock does not belong in the city. Properties are too small to house any sort of livestock!
- Property lots in Calgary are generally small making it difficult to safely and humanely house livestock. Not everyone would have the same rights because some properties are ill equipped due to size in order to support animals.

- Livestock comes with specific health concerns and training. If everyone had bens chickens roosters cows it should be outside city limits
- Not entirely sure how this would look.
- Without knowing what “other livestock” includes, I cannot support this.
- Livestock needs to have lots of room which several communities do not have. Inhumane to keep them in small areas within city
- There should be no bylaw created based off of a dogs physical appearance. And a “pit bulls bite” is not a reason as there are much stronger dogs that are not related to the pit bull breed (ie. Grey hound, Cane Corso, etc.) where as those dogs listed as an example, do not look like a pit bull at all. Any dog can be aggressive and it is up to the OWNER to have the dog trained properly in order to take it out into public to socialize. I do not agree with this bylaw what so ever and if this is passed you will see myself leaving Calgary as that is disgusting behaviour.
- Loud and noisy and dirty. Also cause disruptions with other animals ei cats and dogs
- If people want to keep barnyard animals, they should purchase a farm. I do not want to smell animal waste, or be disturbed by the noises these animals make.
- If you want farm animals move to a farm
- it is not fair to punish pit bulls who are docile, the problem is that whoever raises it, not everyone can have pitbulls.
- "To many variables. What do you do if neighbors agree then one set sells their house and the new neighbors object to the livestock or hens? How th [remove] do you tell the hens owners that what was acceptable now is not?
- Farm stock should stay out of cities. People that want animals live that should be in one of the many smaller communities or on a farm or acreage."
- It encourages hoarding behaviours and could increase The draw of wild animals into the city
- Livestock doesn't fit in a city. It is unreasonable and abnormal to take a animal out of their comfort zone which is a rural area.
- Live on a farm if you want livestock. Houses are too close together and already do not allow for adequate distancing for noise and nuisances.
- I think there will be too many problems with owners not adequately cleaning causing odour issues. Also hens could attract predators endangering other pets and children. We already have coyotes and bobcats.
- The country is where farm animals belong not in the city
- Chickens can be noisy. I would need to see a size minimum on yards to be able to hold chickens as I wouldn't want to hear my neighbors chickens all day long.
- I don't believe we need livestock instead we should be pushing for animal rights instead of continuing down the path we have been
- Go live in the country or on a farm if you want farm animals. It's not fair to these animals.
- Some neighbours are going to say no just to say no. I believe they need to be screened for adequate living conditions for the animal and that overall benefit is positive. I think family benefit can be just as important as community benefit.

- Hens don't belong in the city
- I am concerned for the well-being of the hens, it seems unlikely there could be proper monitoring of their treatment/living conditions.
- roosters are LOUD
- I need to know more about what other animals this would include. Noise, smell, and nuisance are considerations.
- Chickens smell if not taken care of properly and the coop not cleaned, they also need room to roam and many backyards in the city are not large enough to do this effectively.
- I would not be happy if my neighbours had hens in their backyard. Namely because my community only allows chain link fences for yards.
- Noise messy smell
- Although I would like to be able to have hens I don't think Calgary properties are large enough for other livestock.
- I am concerned that they would be abused and bred for slaughter.
- I don't want to live next door to a cow. My neighbours aren't responsible enough to own a dog, let alone a goat.
- I think COVID highlights the risk associated with mixing fowl, livestock and people in urban setting.
Thanks
- I don't want live stock in Calgary. That's going to attract more wild life that we don't need in the City.
- "Suitable living conditions" is extremely vague. There would need to be concrete rules in place that are ENFORCEABLE as needed.
- Why do I need Hens in Calgary?
- Hens have roosters roosters crow.....do you really want to open that can of worms? Smell, attracting coyotes and other wildlife. Now there is abuse....
- Hens and other livestock do not belong in the city.
- Why shouldn't people be allowed to raise their own food
- Farm animals are better suited to farms. This can lead to noise issues and unwanted messes/smells.
- No
- Obvious is it not
- If it's on a farm yes not in a house in the city then no
- Livestock belongs on farms.
- no.
- No
- I am at a loss as to what exceptions there would be where someone would require an absolute need to raise livestock in the city. I do not think exceptions should be allowed. It permits a grey area whereby loopholes can be exploited.
- Most people do not properly clean up or care for hens. In a city setting this could get quite messy and smelly. Plus dogs not properly leashed or fenced may want to get at the hens.

- livestock should be kept in farms or acreages
- If my neighbor started raising a backyard farm (hens, goats, etc) - I would be beyond irritated.
- Nop
- But... I was raised on a farm and most people have problems picking up after their dogs ... smell WILL be an issue.
- No
- I live close to downtown. Its already busy enough and the noise levels are high all day and all night. If I have to factor in the sound of chickens, im buying myself some oil and firing up the deep fryer. Keep the coops in smaller communities.
- More wildlife is net good
- No thanks
- I don't want to live on a farm if I did I would move
- Urban hens should not be allowed. There are enough hens in the farming industry living in horrible conditions. There is no need for more.
- too loud
- We have farms for these kinds of animals
- We don't need chickens in the city
- Farm animals do not belong in the city.
- Livestock belong outside of the city regardless of what it is
- Birds smell and make noise.
- Rural livestock should not be allowed in urban areas
- This is wrong and animals behave differently than humans and humans can aggravate an animal or scare them and they naturally get defensive when they are vulnerable pit pulls are just like any other animal and not all of them are aggressive.
- Noisy, dirty, disruptive for others.
- too many areas in this city where wildlife would be drawn to the chickens as food
- Livestock should be keep in rural areas, not in the city. Living in the city is not a conducive environment for livestock.
- Livestock is not appropriate in city.
- We have had hebs and roosters kept by a neighbour in a confined space that have been disruptive day and night. I do not support this.
- Potential noise complaints? I mean they're not kept inside houses in order reduce the noise levels but are kept outside instead.
- They are not meant for residential
- So many reason this shouldn't be allowed. City is not meant for hens or other live stock. They require room, they can smell , be loud. Houses are so close together. Zoonotic diseases
- Livestock don't belong in the city. This is how disease can spread. "support from adjacent neighbours" means nothing when homes change owners and then do they have veto power? Would they be informed by their realtor of hens or whatever living next door? Would there be a registry anyone could look up? What about a house next door to a condo complex? Too many variables and living arrangements to make it an equal opportunity for all to be a fair program anyway.

And...diseases...still a problem.

- "While an urban environment can be quite adequate for a limited number of hens on a residential property, the same cannot be said of other livestock such as cattle, horses, goats, sheep, pigs, alpacas/llamas, or other livestock animals larger than chickens, quail, or rabbits.

- It also seems like it could easily become a source of resentment and/or anger between neighbours, which would not contribute to civic harmony."
- Chickens stink
- We are a City not a farm.
- Current bylaws
- "Urban hens are one thing, but urban pigs and sheep are another. Animals need daily exercise, adequate space, and enrichment (among many other things) and the backyard of a house in suburban Calgary is not adequate.
- If a property was pre inspected, the potential owners of the urban livestock had a proven record in animal care and applied for and received the proper permit, only then could the city of Calgary even begin to consider opening this can of worms."
- Unsure
- "Unfortunately a lot of times, people get animals on the basis of they are cute, and as much as they are, rarely can a city home have appropriate living conditions for livestock, nor can most people provide all
- Their needs."
- or a medical reason, yes. Let's not let it go to far, chickens in every yard,,no, goats,, etc no
- chickens are noisy and smelly. I foresee a lot of poor conditions for livestock. People don't properly care for their domestic animals, what makes you think they would care for livestock adequately?
- I don't feel as though people living within the city could provide adequate homes and care for the animals. I believe this would lead to many animals being seized for abuse or lack of care.
- Farm animals belong on the farm where there is adequate space.
- The city is not the place for livestock. They can be noisy, smelly and can contribute to the spread of disease - especially poultry and swine. They are a wonderful addition for people living rurally but not for people who live in such close proximity to others. Enforcement and disputes on livestock issues will also waste time and efforts needed in other areas.
- Chicken are noisy and smell
- "Many housing communities do not have adequate spacing for other livestock.
- Chickens may be an exception, however, how many are allowed to one household? How is the smell that is often associated to chickens be managed? Etc."
- Livestock does not belong in an urban or suburban environment.

- Livestock belong on farms, not in backyards.
- Loud, smelly, I would not want to live next door to someone with chickens. Imagine trying to sit in your backyard when there's a chicken coop 8 feet away. It's beneficial to only the owner, not anyone else. Lot size and location of the coop would have to have rules with no grey areas and strictly monitored.
- Absolutely not necessary to have livestock in the city
- Should not be in the city. I would love hens but I know they are not city pets.
- Noise, smell and small yards are a concern.
- I think these livestock belong in farms. They're not domesticated like dogs and cats.
- Larger livestock have no place in the city. It would be impossible to create appropriate space for them.
- I feel this will raise concerns of noise, smell, disruption to the general living areas surrounding the proposed livestock locations. This could have a significant effect on the perceived value and potential sales of surrounding properties. The raising of livestock should be in a more rural setting.
- I don't see how having a hen would impact a community positively.
- Issue of noise and smell for nearby residents. Most people don't know what goes into raising chickens
- Smell, noise, lack of space between houses, impact on neighbouring animals.
- farm animal should stay on farms. If you want chickens move to the country. They require more maintenance than a dog or cat, ie cage cleaning. Most people can't pick up their dog poop that they leave on my front lawn. I grew up on a farm and all animal enclosures create some nasty smells, especially chickens.
- Unenforceable. Poultry en made is a health hazard in inexperienced hands. Think rampant bird flu!
- Enforcement problems. The smell of hens and other farm animals.
- Cows shouldn't be running around the city
- I hardly believe suitable living conditions and proper care can be provided to livestock in the city
- Chickens smell. Personally I would not like to live next door to a coop.
- If you want livestock and stuff. Buy a farm. I don't want to be hearing and smelling farm animals in the city.
- Farm animals should remain on a farm
- I don't feel people should have chickens in the city
- I worry about the noise, smell, and property damage
- Noise and health & safety concerns.
- Noise and smell
- I don't see the need for livestock in the urban areas, with so many farms/farmers in the surrounding areas.
- Chickens will be more disruptive than dogs
- They are dirty, noisy and people fight too much already about dogs and cats. This is stressful
- Live stock is for farms but on a basis to basis being a support animal would be considered

- Noise, smells would not be appreciated. If this could be completely mitigated (such as indoor/basement only), that would be fine.
- I'd support urban hens but not other livestock.
- I don't want to be living next to live stock or chickens
- We live in an urban centre - if people want to own livestock, there are plenty of rural properties around the city to do so.
- I choose to live in the city for a reason. It is bad enough that we allow smelly firepits. I have no desire to live next to a smelly, noisy flock of chickens. People will not keep the pens clean. Some people have allergies and are bothered by grains being fed to the chickens, feathers etc. They want a farm animal, let them rent space on a farm to keep them.
- Neighbours who may originally approve may change their mind when they witness the noise and smell firsthand. It would likely be too late to reverse the decision.
- Noise and smell. There is no list of what livestock would be permitted to make any other judgement
- "This could go wrong in soooooany ways
- What if you get a new neighbor that doesn't approve?"
- This will get out of hand as there are not enough bylaw officers to handle all communities
- Noise and mess
- I don't know of any neighbor hood that has enough space for livestock and people to easily cohabitate.
- The noise of chickens in these small yards would not be enjoyable in the evening while sitting outside. These type of animals need lots of room, but the normal size of yards cannot handle this. Fire department have complained about how close the homes are, now you want chickens. Coyotes would become more of a problem than now. My parents and their neighbours have lost small animals to these animals. I back onto a green space that is an alleyway for coyotes, birds, ducks, ocelots and other wild animals. I love it. I do not want to here in the middle of the night that chickens are being killed by coyotes and ocelots.
- The potential for owner/neighbor disputes and conflict is too high.
- Chickens have no place in the city.
- I'm concerned about the animal's quality of life and what predators might be drawn into the city by them
- Unnecessary.
- Its stupid
- Birds carry disease they are noisy and this form is already complaining about nuisance dogs why are we trying to add nuisance chicken
- I don't believe livestock should be allowed in the city with the exception of emotional support livestock animals.
- Pitbulls belong in calgary. Not chickens.
- Lack of consistency to the care and treatment of the animals and risk of imposing conflict amongst neighbors.
- Livestock does not belong in an urban environment

- It would cause too many problems.
- Chickens stink, goats and stuff would be eaten by the owners that want fresh meat - no for me
- I don't want to smell them.
- Farm animals don't belong in the city
- A lot of people can barely take care of normal domesticated animals (dogs, cats, rabbits, etc); should not be increasing the pool of animals to pick from. The noise and smell is greatly downplayed by those who are pushing for urban livestock.
- Livestock are smelly and require a lot of room for a proper living condition to be met. That should not be within city limits.
- I don't believe that the space within urban Calgary is enough to support the amenities these animals and practices need
- How and why would live stock be allowed but a well trained dog would'nt be. If owners can't be accountable for cats or dogs. How could they be for livestock
- Attracts wildlife.
- loud . Dirty
- Livestock does not belong in the city.
- You are trying to control dogs and allowing people to have livestock as well. Then offcourse a dog will bark if he sees chickens etc and then he is a nuisance, that is not fair.
- I do not believe that livestock should be kept within the city limits.
- Chickens bring disease that many aren't prepared to deal with, are dirty and noisy.
- I don't feel that any livestock should be in the city limits
- Livestock had no place in the city (farm animals)
- People are not responsible enough and not enough yard space in Calgary properties.
- Live stock does not belong in the city. Between unwanted notices and smells it will reduce the neighbours ability to enjoy their back yard.
- Chickens and other rural animals do not belong in the city. They can be loud and smelly and disturb other residents.
- We already have enough issues with owners not properly caring for existing pets. The city is not the place for livestock.
- They stink
- I think this teeters in a slippery slope
- N/A
- There would be no follow through to ensure proper living conditions, etc. So the person would file with proper documentation and ideas and not follow through on it.
- They are not meant to live in urban areas.
- How are you going to regulate and ensure the animals are well cared for?
- This could become a hindrance to neighbors.
- We don't need chickens and livestock in the city. Move to a farm if you want livestock
- Please just enforce the current laws

- Don't want the smell of livestock or disease associated with uncleanliness in the city
- There are many health risks associated with keeping livestock with the general public. Hens are fine but other types of livestock require much more attention and care in order not to be a public danger and nuisance.
- Don't need another alarm clock...
- Houses are too close together in new communities with too small of yards. The smell and sounds would be very difficult for surrounding neighbours.
- Farm animals do not belong in the city. Not all property owners will be responsible enough to keep a clean pen. Risking animal to human virus spreading.
- It's a city, not a farm. I can barely get a place to rent with a cat or dog. Imagine someone losing their residence. What do you think will happen to it? It will be killed. Change the attitude of Landlord's and renting to animal/pet owners. MAYBE then this could be further discussed.
- Chickens are noisy and smelly.
- Regular citizens have no idea of how to properly care for the animals
- Too loud
- Livestock does not need to be in the city. Keep them on farms and in rural areas.
- The city has enough on their plates they do not need to get into animal farms.
- You have not lived on a farm chickens are loud and they do stink even when you take good care of them. Pigeons are a messy bird there is no cleaning up their feces that is an impossible criteria to even put in your rules.
- Backyard flocks are the biggest disease contributors.
- Hens/chickens are not meant to live in small back yards. They are meant to roam free, on farm land. I suspect the other pests they will attract will become more of an issue.
- Birds are loud and not every neighbour is going to want to hear that.
- I would not want my neighbors to keep hens in their yard, the noise and the potential mess are not appealing. Hens don't belong in a small backyard.
- If there was a way to keep noise and smell under control I would consider changing my answer
- I don't want livestock or hens in a city neighborhood at a private house. We have enough noise in the neighborhood already.
- The City is not a farm.
- Farm animals belong on the farm not in the city.
- If you want livestock move to an acreage and the country.
- As long as there are backyard breeders, puppy mills, chained dogs, neglected/abused dogs and cats and maybe even dogfighting or cockfighting rings, the City should not consider extending the variety of animals in the population. When there will be no kill in the shelters because of pet overpopulation, then the City may consider adding to its budget for the control and monitoring of other pets.
- Hens should not be allowed as pets in urban areas.
- Livestock should not be permitted in city limits due to noise, smell and hygienic reasons

- Hard enough to enforce other birds in city
- Bylaw can be very biased. They Cannot say yes to one and no to another
- Makes too much noise.
- Hens shouldn't be allowed in the first place. You guys can't get tough on vicious dogs but you want to allow hens? What is wrong with this picture? (Wait until the first normal, nice, well-adjusted dog gets into a henhouse - imagine that on the news.... Dogs hunt hens as they do squirrels, rabbits, mice.... Who thinks of this?!?)
- Concerned about noise, waste, and smell.
- chickens and livestock are not meant for cities
- Not as explained above. The first 2 points are lacking objectivity instead they rely on opinion & feelings. Support from adjacent neighbours - I may not like their dog - but I have no recourse on that.
- hens would be ok, but not other livestock. Roosters in cities are a noise nuisance, for example.
- [removed]
- I do not believe that city people would provide appropriate care to hens. Also keeping hens in close quarters with people can increase chances of disease spread in those communities.
- No need for people to have other farm animals in the city. That's why there are farms and ranches.
- It is your property, you don't need your neighbors approval to have a dog, why for a bird?
- Noise & smell
- No livestock
- No
- Would require more information on this issue before being willing to vote for or against this amendment.
- Room for too many neighbour issues
- It is impossible to keep chickens from being noisy, and creating odours that affect neighbors. If I wanted my home to smell like a barn, I'd live in a rural area, not a city.
- In most situations livestock is not suited to city living, sufficient space cannot be provided for these animals. People would abuse this and keep the animals in unsuitable conditions.
- Its a farm animal. Belongs on a farm
- Noise/smell.
- I don't feel livestock can get the required care, space, etc in a regular home environment. Plus smells, noise etc not fair to the neighbors
- Only if you can humanely prevent cats/foxes/other predators from getting at your chickens
- I don't like chickens. Noisy and smelly
- Homes are already way to close together in Calgary unlike they are in most parts of airdrie, chickens would just make too much noise and during unwanted times of the day.
- Live stock belong on a farm. I do not want to hear or smell them. I live in the city for a reason.
- It would be a noise, health, and cleanliness nuisance in high density areas
- We need to draw the line somewhere. This is a city not a rural environment.

- Animals such as these do not belong in a city. Average yard size in Calgary is quite small and properties are too close together to support livestock in backyards.
- I don't want the smell or sound of hens in my neighborhood. We live in the city, not on a farm.
- Chickens and livestock belong on farms not houses.
- Unless I'm regards to outskirts where there's space; I think livestock needs better spaces to roam, therefore in the city wouldn't be ideal.
- Your considering breed specific laws but you want to put hens and dogs across the fence from each other.. disaster..
- The smell and the noise would be a nuisance for more than the immediate neighbours. In the city, it is rare that someone has a large enough lot to actually give hens the proper space they need and respect their neighbours' right to peaceful living.
- My neighbours are already breaking most bylaws. Chickens would be a clucking disaster
- I believe that should not be allowed in urban areas and requires too many resources/ tax dollars to monitor this.
- No way to control everyone with owning livestock
- I like that my family has livestock on their farm or acreage. But I don't want to live beside rooster etc.
- Poultry belongs on a farm/acreage
- NA
- I don't think it's a good idea to allow farm animals/livestocks to be living in people's backyards.
- Noise complaints would sky rocket wasting peace officer's time, when we already have overworked staff in this department.
- Livestock need more space than can be provided in a back yard in the city. On a side note, they are quite smelly and still noisy.
- Noise complaints in suburban areas
- I see it as a potential issue with neighbors, smell, etc.
- Unsure...sounds like a slippery slope, negative effect on property values.
- I would not want to live next door to the smell, odor or noise of chickens pigeons etc
- I would be worried about noise and smell. Not sure what other livestock would entail. If you can let us know then I could comment further or change my answer.
- I feel like we don't have to have animals keep the grass down and that this will take away jobs which would harm our economy further
- after all the fuss over the Chicken plant in Ramsey, it would be hypocritical to allow chickens in yards.
- Parasite control and easy prey for wildlife to venture closer to homes
- Livestock are noisy and not domesticated animals
- Livestock can bring diseases and I just don't think it should be kept in urban areas.
- Farm animals are meant for farms, not the city
- Farm animals should not be in city limits. Noise and smell would be a problem

- I don't want my neighbours rooster crowing at 5 in the morning. There is a reason I live in a city and not a farm.
- I don't think other livestock are suitable for city dwellings.
- "Suburb land is limited, yards are small.
- Though I like the idea of a constant supply of fresh eggs, my fear would be that some residents may butcher the chicken for meat."
- Thus would result in more animal cruelty and more animals needing homes
- People aren't responsible enough, and would result in more animal abuse
- I can't see any livestock other than chickens doing well within the city; they wouldn't have enough room to make their life enjoyable in my opinion.
- Livestock should be in a rural place, not a city.
- This bylaw will just end up amplifying the current animal related disturbances occurring between neighbors and community members
- Livestock should not be raised in residential communities. People are not equipped to take care of livestock that are not trained
- I do not support livestock in urban settings including hens and chickens.
- I would want to see more details specifically with regard to cleanliness, smell and noise. As well as what percentage of the neighbours need to be in support of this?
- Cities are not the place for livestock
- I don't believe that farm animals belong in a city lot
- There should be no hens or farm animals allowed in the city. If you want to fine dogs and cats why make your problems worse
- Farm animals don't belong in a city.
- In my experience, urban chickens are universally a nuisance and are rarely properly managed.
- Limited space already, too many people with decrepit yards etc already
- Depends on the animal and size of the grounds where animal will be kept.
- I'm allergic to most farm animals so I'd like to breathe
- Livestock should not be permitted in the city. The livestock would not have enough space to live a good life.
- We are too large a city to have close neighbour communication and confirmation of support.
- The noise and smell would be an issue
- "The way you phrased that makes it sound like you are asking about the second, not the former.
- Have you been on a farm? Chickens are loud, even a cow would be a less obtrusive suggestion."
- You want to ban pitbulls but allow chickens in people's yard? Completely malicious and irresponsible
- No hens
- Unsightly and increased management. Neighbours can;t controls dogs and cats let alone an untrainable more difficult to keep penned chicken.
- This opens the door for many more problems for the city. Noise. Waste. Animal abuse. Chickens should not be in city limits.

- Hens are noisy.
- I don't know what you mean by other livestock. Cows? Horses? Or ducks? There's a big difference.
- Too much disease can come from livestock/hens!!!!
- "Our houses are already so close In the city never mind Adding hens ... you will issues with dogs and cats taunting barking you name it at the foreign animals to them . Livestock do not belong in the city and most people do not have the resources in their yards for a proper coupe it could also add concerns with smells
- Skunks coyotes you name it on a farm owners can prepare themselves for those animals however in the city to bring hens is bring more Prey for the coyotes which is already a huge concern in public areas ."
- livestock should not be permitted in urban areas due to noise and other nuisance and impact to the use and enjoyment of adjacent properties
- If people are basically not going to be allowed to own pit bulls, we don't need pigs, horses and chickens to add to the mix. Those animals belong on farms not backyard of people living in the city.
- Seems like having livestock in close vicinity of other homeowners would present additional noise, smell and potential waste issues. I dont think its fair for neighbors to have to deal with it, and could potentially calling city services more often.
- If you want livestock go live on a farm.
- I have concerns about the animals being slaughtered on the property
- I do not agree with hens or other livestock allowed in the city.
- Leave the hens to the farmers
- I don't think people will take the time to research the needs of the livestock, or really consider the impacts of noise, smell, and increasing attraction for predators in the area.
- People keeping farm animals in their back yard does not give them adequate room to move. Also, chances are they are also going to be slaughtered in the back yard as well.
- positive impact to a community is a vague term. Be specific. What does support mean
- Chickens are loud and smell
- Inner city isnt a farm.
- Many yards are too small/too close to neighbours
- I don't want to hear or smell neighbors animals. They belong on an acreage or a farm.
- That would be a nuisance to neighbours
- I would not find it acceptable to live next to a hen house in the middle of the city. This could also greatly decrease resale value of surrounding houses.
- there's no need to have livestock in Calgary. They should. Move to a rural area if they want to keep livestock.
- I don't feel that livestock belongs in the city - that's why you live on an acreage or rural property.
- It we'll bring disease if it not controlled nor process properly giving power to those who will abuse the law
- There are already issues in other communities with Chickens let's not add to it.

- Hens are noisy and messy. Farms are better for them.
- I am against this because the housing is too close together... A lot of people can't even care for the dogs and cats in the city..... The smells, and who would be responsible for these animals when the novelty wears off.
- I honestly don't understand this question. Therefore I cannot comment.
- Hen coops stink, and neighbourhoods already reek from marijuana and firepits. Where will there be any fresh air left?
- Opening it up to any animals is a bit absurd in a city
- I don't think livestock should be kept in the city. It would create unwanted noise and smell.
- Needing permission from neighbours may cause conflicts. Size of property should be a consideration, especially considering how odours and noise may impact neighbours' enjoyment of their homes.
- Space is limited and livestock other than hens and small poultry require more space. P
- Do not support urban chickens. If I wanted to wake up at the crack of dawn by a rooster, I'd live on a farm.
- This is a city. If you want to raise livestock, purchase a home in the country where farming is considered a normal practice. I also don't believe livestock should be retained under the guise of therapy animals.
- The noise and/or smell could be problematic.
- I do not think majority of the public will provide appropriate care and medical treatment for chickens. If voting yes, these people should have requirements for yearly exam and fecal testing.
- If I live in an urban setting I do not want to be dealing with the sounds and smells that come with a small farm or hen house. It would be very disruptive.
- I am not sure this is a safe or healthy idea.
- Introducing livestock possibly to neighborhoods could introduce many more issues like under the counter sales or even smells and such. I also don't see a need or any of the pros to adding the livestock to our communities.
- There is a potential for livestock to overrun a residential property.
- NO. Just NO. Don't do this.
- I would support the guardianship of animals considered livestock only if their welfare was the primary condition. But given how badly the rules regarding the welfare of domestic pets are enforced, I would say absolutely not. More animals don't need to be abused.
- Considering the fact that people are not even required to prove they are qualified to own a dog, it seems ridiculous to think that you can ensure that livestock are being properly cared for and that enforcement is forthcoming.
- The city is not a farm. If you want a farm, move to the country.
- The smell... they belong on a farm
- I do not support the ownership of livestock in the city for animal welfare reasons.
- Hens are for the farm. Keep them on the farm

- Some yards are simply too small for this... and as well I would have big concerns regarding the owner keeping yards clean
- Calgary is too crowded to not have others view these animals a nuisance
- If you want to have a farm animal the go live on a acreage
- I would want more information on what is meant by suitable living conditions and impact on neighbours
- City lots are not even big enough for people to live cleanly and peacefully together, unless you live in an older area where the lots are not yet redeveloped. You can play farmer on a rural property.
- Keep livestock for acreages and farms it smells terrible. People living with animals is how we have things like covid and bird flu.
- People can barely handle domesticated animals. Would not enjoy loose livestock getting hit by neighborhoods cars. People Who currently have livestock animals as pets REALLY want them breaking law or not. There for, they will give proper care. As soon as the doors are open for everybody.. I'm not sure what would happen.
- People already complain of noise hens are loud and can be very territorial. Also if I lived next door to someone who had hens and was trying to sell my house, it may be a massive turnoff if potential buyers which in turns hurts the finances of everyone.
- Too much potential for noise, smell and disruption of the peace.
- It is not necessary to open the door to other animals.
- Farm animals need a farm
- The smell, waste, noise, disease and who will be honest and follow the rules or bylaw put in place. What if people use the animals for fighting?
- Hens do not belong in the city. Often times people don't have the space for them. I think that allowing hens will isn't appropriate for a city environment where people will just build small cages to put many hens in.
- I understand the reason for hens and goats, but based on how people tend to not put their best foot forward I think the animals would either suffer or be a nuisance to neighbours.
- The coops stink
- Again owners need to be responsible. I wouldn't want to live next door to noisy chickens or the stench if the owners neglect to clean up after the animals.
- Farm animals belong on the farm.
- I love the idea of allowing chickens, however the noise and the smell is a huge deterrent.
- That is the reason for "FARMS" Chickens DO NOT belong within city limits!!!
- Livestock require space. That is not feasible in an urban setting.
- Some animals, don't need to be within city limits, especially animals that require more then one to be happy, a proper (they aren't cheep) set up, and need more space then what the now typical back yard in Calgary is sized as.
- I don't want any livestock within the city limits.
- I am worried this will draw in more coyotes to urban areas.

- How do you manage the sounds and noise violations that would happen as they are animals not trainable pets?
- No wildlife in the city
- Working in a shelter we frequently see hens that have been abandoned when people realize that they have actual needs, they are often in incredibly poor condition and are rarely provided proper medical care. There is a severe lack of knowledge in the average person on humane care, and they tend to be "used & abused" then dumped if they out-live their usefulness.
- I do not want to hear roosters at 5 am
- The city is no place for livestock.
- If people want a farm, move to the country. Hens and other livestock belong on farms, not in the city. The LESA lady is a fraud, she just wanted to keep hens!
- My neighbours had hens for a while. They woke us up every morning - they are too loud for close-together city housing. They belong in the country not the city.
- I prefer no urban hens
- Noise and smell. This can carry further than adjacent neighbours.
- Chickens are dirty, then what goats, pigs?
- Leave the farm to farmers.
- Chickens smell.
- [removed]
- Farm animals do not belong in the city. They can be noisy, dirty and produce unwelcome odors. (I grew up on a farm!)
- There should be something about noise the animal makes included
- I do not want livestock of any kind next to me. I live in the city, not on a farm.
- You want to have livestock, then move out of the city. I love all animals but a city yard is not the place for livestock.
- What is the definition of livestock, does it include pigs, cows, goats and other animals?
- hens would attract more coyotes and bob cats when there is already a big enough problem with them.
- I would not welcome the noise of chickens while trying to sleep or enjoy the peace and quiet of my backyard.
- It a rural animal. It will attract wild animals like coyotes putting neighbours at risk.
- Livestock should live where they have proper space and can proper care
- Enforcement will be too challenging to take on effectively.
- I'm thinking about noise, smell, what if they get loose?
- This is a city, not farm land. If people want to own farm animals they can move outside city limits. There is no way people would take proper care of these animals, plus it would decrease the life enjoyment for these animals if forced to live in tiny backyards. Also, could you imagine a rooster waking up a neighbourhood everyday? I would be furious if I had to deal with that inside the city.
- It would be too hard to enforce this from a bylaw officer perspective.

- Game and farm animals belong outside the city. This should only be allowed if you have a larger plot of land
- Farm animals do not belong in the city.
- I don't think livestock in the city is a good idea. Also coops are dirt and probably will smell.
- Live stock presents a cleanliness issue, noise and smell issue, and can attract predators into otherwise quiet areas, putting others at risk for encounters.
- They stink SO BAD. This isn't setting anyone up for success.
- The city is not the place for livestock
- Leave farm animals on the farm.
- Most properties in Calgary do not have sufficient space to adequately care for livestock.
- They are noisy and smelly and disrupt neighbours
- This isn't a huge farm! Redicilous
- Problems with hen is that they can be noisy, and also can stink. I have experience with family that owns ranch and has hen.
- Think our climate is too cold especially if owners are novices at this
- My next door neighbour had them and they were a nuisance! The noise was very frustrating. There is no need for them in the city.
- Concerns over manure, smells and noises.
- Livestock does not belong in an urban setting. There are too many dangers for the animals.
- How are community stakeholders engaged prior to introducing livestock on a property?
- I'm not sure Calgary is ready for livestock in our backyards yet.
- No exceptions though, farm animals can create an extremely offensive smell and residential is in too close proximity to neighbors.
- They smell and shy of removing 6-8" of top soil there is no removing the smell
- The city is growing and the boundaries are getting tighter, nuisance pets are the norm now andthat will not be changing anytime soon so why add on to the problem with more pets that may smell create more noises or atrack other predatory animals. In our neighborhood we have a huge problem with barking dogs however, one household may have only 1 dog but combine that with 5 - 10 house in the immediate area and if each animal barks, each takes a seperate time, the peace is destroyed and none of the owners think their pet is the issue.
- I do not support this because I believe other issues will arise in the future if this is allowed. I believe people will do whatever they want even when rules are in place.
- Chicken feces really stinks.
- Laying hens are short lived and Calgary WILL see them being released into the public or tossed into the compost bin.
- I disagree with livestock being allowed within city limits.
- Regarding other livestock: bylaw should remain as is - no livestock other than emotional support ones allowed in city.

- Having hens in town brings in more coyotes, foxes, and other predators. Those predators would end up causing more problems and probably getting hurt in the end.
- I would not want my neighbour to have hens - the smell and noise would be very bothersome in my opinion.
- Although there are bylaws of the number of livestock becomes unreasonable to maintain by bylaw it will get out of hand and be yet another issue that needs to be dealt with
- Worried about the noise and the smell.
- so somebody can own a damn rooster then slaughter for food in their backyard, but you're targeting pitbulls?
- Livestock belong on farms not in the city. Opens up to many issues and potentially increases other Wild animals (coyotes, bobcat etc) from being drawn into the city
- Farm animals should be on a farm not in suburban neighborhoods
- I don't believe the smell would be controlled & adversely affect adjacent neighbors. I have a Neighbor with 2 dogs. She decided spreading wood chips in the backyard of approx 12x12 would handle the smell if she chose not to pick up the waste. Has resulted is an awful smell, plus an influx of swarms of flies and has been a nightmare trying to get this stopped. Livestock next door would very likely be even worse.
- You are looking for new revenue, greedy city hall!
- The homes are too close for me to support this.
- I've lived other places where livestock is a problem in urban areas.
- Only no because this is too vague for me to have a whole opinion. What type of live stock. Horses and cows kill more Canadians every single year than dogs have... ever. And you are Henny Pennying over 40-60lb "pit bulls" like weirdos.
- I don't agree because chickens etc create smells and noise that belong on a farm - I opt to live in the city. It is enough to put up with the chaos that unattended pets cause.
- Having raised chickens on a farm, they do not belong in back yards
- Government control is always lost
- This is urban living, you want hens, live in the country
- Don't know enough to provide an answer
- I would not want to be next door to livestock, live in the country if you want that.
- Noise
- Livestock should remain in rural areas only.
- I would rather live next to a pit bull than a chicken
- I don't feel this is a good idea opens too many options for nuisances and also improper care of the hens
- "I live in a major urban center intentionally. If I wanted to wake to the crowing of roosters and braying donkeys, and dodge horse droppings as I walk, I would have moved elsewhere. It can be tense enough living in such close proximity to this many other humans, under no circumstances am I willing to introduce even more creatures to the same space, especially creatures that don't have the mental capacity to understand that it's not always an appropriate time to scream. There is nothing reasonable about that suggestion. A huge benefit of living in an urban center is that your house doesn't smell of chicken shit. I'm at something of a loss trying to explain my answer because I can't imagine why anyone would want their figurative farm-animal neighbors to acquire literal farm animals. I would never move into a home that had livestock next door... If I already lived there, I would only stay long enough to find another place. The idea that my drug-addict neighbors with no education but an art degree, that can't even care for their own hygiene are about to be encouraged to let livestock loose in the neighborhood is disgusting. You claim that this is a suggestion from phase 1 feedback... are there any humans reviewing the feedback?? The idea is so short-sighted and childish, has no one considered the consequences? What happens when I can't find feed for my chickens? What do we do with all of the animal waste? Am I expected to keep them quiet during noise pollution hours? Who will deal with it when I insist that the neighborhood cat is stealing my eggs? What will you do when I get bored of chickens and let them loose in the alley? What am I expected to do with them when I move? What happens when my chicken finally dies of eating table scraps and garbage (because I can't find or afford feed downtown) and I eat it's diseased meat? What happens when my chicken inevitably attacks my neighbors infant? Is there no one involved in this project with cursory experience with farm animals?

- This idea is obviously foolish. If you are still unconvinced, talk to at least one rancher."
- People could take this too far. As well, these animals could attract more coyotes into urban areas. How do you prevent licensed cats outside from attacking free range hens?
- Who wants to listen to chickens at night
- They belong on farms and will bring the community down, due to smelly, noisy etc.
- My neighbor has 2 dogs and he never cleans after they poop. If these people get hens or other animals, I would be afraid of the consequences of bad hygiene.
- Spreading of communicable diseases and those that transfer to humans.
- I don't agree with livestock or hens in the city
- Bad smell
- Leave them alone. They belong in their environment not man made
- Noise. We live in a city with most residents not having air conditioning in the summer. Windows are open during the evening and early morning. It will be a disturbance.
- Hens belong on farm land not in the city
- not in the city neighborhood. Maybe allotments like in the UK
- They smell and too many people are irresponsible
- I am not sure that I am comfortable with a Bylaw Enforcement Officer making the final decisions.
- Chickens require a high level of care, and I cannot see this being followed in a city setting. Most yards are not large enough to house or provide room to run for these animals. enclosures would require heating in the winter - there are far too many variables to allow the general public to have these animals unfortunately.
- Messy, noisy and unnecessary

- I fear the mis-Treatment and lack of adequate care that may occur if owners are not responsible
- When I was younger our neighbors had chickens. The noise and the messy conditions where they kept them was awful. People struggle with taking care of cats and dogs, other livestock as personal pets I completely disagree with.
- Increases animals in captivity for no reason. Increases likelihood of animals being abused/neglected
- Noise concerns.
- Don't bring farm animals into the city, it's dangerous for themselves due to the traffic and high number of people. Additionally, most home owners within the city do not have the property space to adequately support a farm animal.
- Live stock is for farms not the city
- if you are looking to ban specific breed of dogs but allow specific live stock which can create just as much if not more harm/issues i feel the whole picture is not being looked at.
- If you want a farm, buy a farm.
- I would not want livestock animals loving next door to me (the noise, smell, etc)
- How do neighbors say "yes" and then when they discover the noise, smell, etc., go back and withdraw their approval. Most people don't know what this would look like beforehand and hindsight's 20/20. Also, when people started being allowed "emotional support animals" this went crazy with all kinds of stuff. Opening the door to this creates this kind of potential. Also, you would be increasing the number of animals that are neglected, not cared for humanely (like a puppy mill) and then where is the funding for new/diversified shelters to take on these animals? And what's the demand for rescued chickens? Already shelters are overrun with cats and dogs and other household pets. We don't need to add to that.
- So likely to be abused...buy an acreage if farming is your interest.
- I do not want any livestock in my neighbors yards. The noise and smell would be terrible. Many people dont pick up dog poop out of the yards, i believe unless people clean out pens every day the smell will be terrible! I grew up with chickens & know the smell that can waft across a yard.
- You're all for bringing in obnoxious animals, who stink and will bring other forms of wildlife into the city further to hunt them, but when youre given generalized info on A BREED of dog, you just penalize them and chastise those who own them. None of you should be in the position you are in if you're not willing to do PROPER research. You ignorant [removed]
- Could see this getting out of hand.
- "No. Unless in rural areas.
- Noise, smell"
- Support from adjacent neighbours may only be temporary. If they decide after the fact, for any number of reasons, that they no longer want the animal there, what happens to the animal? Also, if new neighbours move in, how do they get a say after a decision has already been made? Does it possibly affect resale of surrounding properties? Will it possibly put further strain on bylaw officers if complaints start rolling in? Livestock should remain outside of urban areas! Maybe there could be some sort of community farm, like a community garden, outside of residential areas??
- No

- Noise, smell, attraction of wild animals into the community.
- Farm animals belong on a farm not in the city
- There are going to be negligent livestock owners. Waste and disease will be a problem.
- Urban farm animals of any kind should not be allowed. If you want to raise farm animals you should live in a rural area.
- I think neighbours should have a say in whether hens are next door to them.
- Livestock larger than chickens/ducks need lots of yard space. Calgary lots are very small in many communities and won't accommodate any animal bigger
- Houses are too close together within Calgary. I think this should be for rural properties or acreages.
- If you want to raise livestock move to the country.
- chickens stink. livestock shouldn't be kept in the city. there is enough farmland around calgary that a suitable system can be designed to create a community farm.
- Farm animals, especially chickens, are loud and smelly. They should not be permitted in the city unless land size meets a minimum criteria. Animals should also then not be permitted within a minimum distance of property boundaries.
- Livestock are for farms not urban backyards
- Stupid
- for so many reasons ,, #1 research this idea ,, its not new ,, unable to control the dogs and cats so let add so more to the list ,, buy an acreage that what they are for ,, why my tax dollars to evaluate case by case reviews from 0.000000001 % of population --really .
- Chickens smell beyond immediate neighbors.
- The noise and odour from them would be a major disturbance to neighbours. If all neighbours were okay with it with written consent then perhaps it could be allowed.
- Livestock in the city is not ok.
- I live in a city so I don't need to live next to livestock!
- This is not a rural environment. It is a city. Farms are rural.
- Inner city yards are no place for livestock .. The health concerns from chickens outweigh the necessity for them.
- I believe there will be an increase in rodent and other wildlife activity creating issues in other ways. Disease ect
- Residential properties in Calgary are close to each other. i do not want to smell the animals or their excrement.
- We need to keep other livestock out of the City. I don't think it is a good idea to have anyone exposed to disease that could be carried by Other Livestock.
- nobody wants squaking birds all night and day.
- Livestock do not belong in the city! They belong on a proper rural farm.
- Farm animals do not belong in the city.
- I don't want hens and chickens in my neighborhood

- Farm animals belong on a farm.
- No urban animal farming should be allowed.
- We don't need urban hens.
- I don't think livestock animals should be allowed in the city, they are messy and smelly animals even when taken care of, barking dogs are something we deal with on a daily basis I don't want to live next to someone who has a hen house or any other type of live stock. People that want to own livestock should look at living on property away from the city, I don't agree with it and think a city yard is not big enough to hold such animals.
- We live in a city, not a rural, agricultural environment. This is a slippery slope leading to livestock bylaw issues requiring investigation and enforcement costs. If you want a rural setting, move to a rural area.
- Livestock deserve open outdoor space to roam
- There is no scientific evidence to support the claim that chickens are emotional support animals and they are an inappropriate pet for a city setting.
- Livestock does not belong in the city limits. Smell of excretion is the biggest issue.
- I don't think people could build suitable living quarters for them - how would they remain warm when it's super cold out?
- farm animals belong on farms. If my neighbors can have hens and farm animals which make more noise than regular house pets then I should be able to make noise all night too. Or if we allow farm animals in yards then I should be able to grow my marijuana outside too
- I don't understand how a hen can help the community
- It will attract other wild life (coyotes, lynx, etc) into the backyards of Calgarians.
- Farm animals do not belong in town
- I would not support hens or other livestock in the city.
- If you want hens, live in the country. Would not like to live next to people owning livestock. Urban beekeeping okay.
- I would not want to live next door to a house with hens because of the smell and or noise.
- You're going to outlaw pitbulls but allow people to have chickens???? Seriously? No.
- "Brings predators around
- If you have a chicken, eventually you will have a coyote or weasels or tons of mice"
- Neighborhoods change as do neighbours. What is acceptable at one time may not be so in the future.
- Hens and pigeons will disturb neighbourhoods with noise and fecal matter. People wanting to own hens or game birds should go take care of a farm, not an urban backyard.
- Livestock should not be kept in someone's backyard. They are animals that deserve a life too.
- Good people will be good, and bad will be bad. I can see chickens being abused, abandoned or not properly taken care of. If you can't police this, don't allow it.
- "So now there is a kill facility at each house with animals
- Who monitors - really

- Who manages - really"
- Noone should have to tolerate chickens or livestock in an urban setting.
- I have no interest in living in close proximity to livestock
- Homes within a 100 m radius must be consulted and would have to agree. Grew up on a farm and keeping hens can be noisy and odorous.
- Livestock needs an open space not between houses. They smell, they're noisy. They should have a designated area for the community, much like community gardens.
- I see a case for urban hens. I can't see a case for any other livestock.
- Hens do not belong in cities.
- Noise and smell. Livestock need to live outside the crowded city. Maybe one chicken per household.
- No livestock in the city
- I'm ok with chickens but where will it end if other livestock are approved. Most city dwellers don't have the room for other livestock.
- they don't belong in the city only farms
- Noise
- Figure out the dog and cat issues first before adding to city bylaw workload
- Livestock need room to roam Calgary residences cannot provide that
- Dont believe city communities should allow hens or any livestock within city limits.
- Calgary is a city. One of the cleanest and nicest in the world. Allowing hen houses and the like would make a big difference in the maintenance of the city
- Livestock should stay outside the city. It's more healthy this way. The increase in deadly ailments such as swine flu, bird flu, and Covid-19 should highlight this is not the direction any city should move towards.
- Noisy
- No livestock in calgary. It's not kind to your neighbour in COMMUNITIES
- We are not a farm.
- Urban chickens would quickly become a nuisance to neighbours. Chicken coops attract rodents and other pests, predators, and keeping chickens is a filthy business. Anyone who has ever been near a chicken coop can attest to the overwhelmingly foul stench.
- I believe hens should be on a farm and not within city limits.
- I do not want to listen to a bunch of hens clucking outside my bedroom window at 6am. If I wanted that, I would live in a farm.
- Will hunting of such non-pet animals be permitted within the city on any given day?
- Noise nuisance
- Hens are not an urban animal
- ..
- The houses are so close together impossible to control smell noise etc
- Hens are noisy and i personally wouldn't want to have neighbors with hens
- [removed]

- Livestock do not belong within city limits. They will be disturbance to the neighbour hood.
- [removed]
- I don't want to deal with the noise or smells that having livestock in my community could produce.
- The city is not the place to be creating farm environments. This is Pandora's box.....
- I only support individuals who have "livestock" such as chickens, pigs etc. as a pet therapy or support animal. I am too afraid of diseases spreading through "livestock". Look at how viruses are started. Quite often a pig or chicken is the "Middleman" for diseases spreading to humans.
- I do not want a Hen squeaking or crowing at the crack of dawn. As well they are very smelly animals.
- There will be no end to it once you open this up. I lived in a farm. They're load and attract predators. People will end up with all kinds of livestock in their backyards.
- Outside of city limits for non domesticated animals.
- No need to go to do many approval requirements
- [removed]
- Urban and hens should not be in the same sentence. There is absolutely no need for farm livestock to be in city residential neighbourhoods. The City already has enough to deal with. This is simply ridiculous and unnecessary. If individuals want hens they should be prepared to live on a property designed for this. This scenario is absolutely not creating the best of both worlds.
- Live stock should not be kept within city; there isn't enough space and facilities to accurately keep live stock. For example, what is done with live stock for slaughter and what regulations are there? I wouldn't want backyard slaughter houses, etc.
- I do not feel like livestock should be allowed in the city.
- If I can't have my very docile and child friend pit bulls why should I let people have chickens. They're noisy and a nuisance and dirty
- I do not feel people in the city would do right by having livestock. This should remain in areas of open spaces or have their land assessed prior to.
- Hens? There are already someone other issues bylaw can keep up. I wouldn't want hens next door to me for multiple reasons.
- [removed]
- noise/smell.
- Leave livestock out of the city, city smells like crap already.
- Livestock? So now people can have sheep? Goats? Chickens? In their backyards/property? No. You will run into issues with smell, noise, damage to private and public property, animals escaping, animals being stolen, accidents and injuries to people and children in the household, neighbours and/or general public.
- Livestock belongs on a farm. No one needs a cow next door. Adequate space, enrichment, living conditions and shelter would be a concern and difficult to enforce considering animal welfare and rights are to relaxed and not enforced enough as it is. Chickens are fine.

- I feel the city struggles to keep up with dog and cat complaints. I would rather my tax dollars be spent on doing two things better than spreading what appears to be thin resources even thinner. Not to mention the additional stress of adjacent homeowners
- Bylaws already currently favour noise makers and nuisances. Nobody wants to be the neighbour of someone who owns chickens. They are loud, dirty and smell. It would bring a larger weight of issues with people not being respectful than any benefit to our city
- I appreciate the thoughtful effort put into drawing up regulations, but I'm doubtful that it could be successful. There are already so many potential conflicts between neighbors, this seems like creating more.
- It is an urban environment not a farming community.
- We don't need hens in the city
- Chickens and other livestock animals don't belong in a city, they belong in rural environments so they have the necessary area to stay healthy
- Hens for eggs ok, but farm animals belong on farms.
- Wildlife will come into the city to eat them. Want chickens, move to an acreage
- If you want to raise livestock, move to an area that allows it. As someone who has been around livestock, the smells and sounds alone can quickly become a nuisance to anyone in the area.
- Noise level, messy
- I don't think other livestock should be kept within city limits.
- No hens. No livestock.
- livestock that live outdoors have a tendency to be loud and create smells that would have a negative impact on more than just the adjacent neighbours.
- These people can move to a rural area if they want to own livestock.
- If you want farm animals live outside of a city
- For the work involved in monitoring this I don't think it is worth it. The last thing we need are chickens that escape and cause other problems.
- All livestock and yes that means hens/chickens don't belong within city limits. They belong on farms where there is little to no impact on neighbours or neighbourhoods. Live stock in a city brings unwanted smells, scavenger birds, and other vermin/rodents.
- More strays getting out of the house or yard and roaming the streets
- Having livestock in city's and urban area might be wildlife such as coyote ls and foxes, which will endanger small house hold pets and children.
- They smell
- This will be abused.
- Livestock should not be allowed in urban areas
- ..
- livestock cannot be effectively cared for in an urban setting and are likely to experience neglect or abuse.

- No need to have chickens and cows etc roaming the streets of the city, as with pets has showier owners aren't going to be smart about this. Just something else to take advantage of
- Livestock should be in rural areas not within the city.
- Farm animals don't belong in the city. Yards in the city are not large enough to appropriately distance noisy and/or smelly animals from the neighbours property.
- [removed]
- I think a neighbour having hens would lower the value of neighbouring homes, therefore I am against it due to noise and the mess they create in a backyard.
- They belong on a farm not an than area
- I personally do not understand allowing livestock in the city. If my neighbours had livestock that would be loud, cause foul odours, etc I would not be okay with that. If you want livestock move to the country.
- You are already limiting the number of pigeons, why oh why would you now allow livestock?
- There is a reason we have farms. There are plenty of local farms with livestock that Calgarians could use to support.
- Don't agree with criteria
- I think it's asking for trouble to have hens around urban areas if all these aggressive dogs are such a problem
- This is a city not a farm
- There is no need for livestock to live in the city. That is cruel and unnecessary. These are animals that rely on a "farm" lifestyle which the city cannot provide.
- We are in a city. Hens are more noise. And more mess for the owners who could forget to clean up the mess
- If you want farm (hens and chickens) animals go live on a farm, dogs can be trained not to bark no dog needs to bark if you train it you cannot train a hen or chicken to not make noise
- [removed]
- Chickens smell horrible and I would not want a coop anywhere near my home.
- Not all animals are meant to be in a city. I would not want to be woken up by chicken, roosters or smell outdoor enclosures.
- Allowing more animals into the city would create a need for more policing. Calgary can't afford this extra cost right now. We do not need another property tax increase.
- This will lead to more animals being mistreated or abandoned
- farm animals belong on farms not in my neighbors back yard.
- Farm animals do not belong in the city
- Buy a farm if you want farm animals. This is a city, but a farm.
- In the city living, the most of the sizes of properties are small/limited unless the potential owners live certain sizeable properties noises nor order cannot be under control. Should have clear guidelines ex: how big the property should be. How far apart from the houses between etc

- With how close together and how small lots houses are built on these days, I do t think it's appropriate for home owners within the city to have hens/livestock. Also, the smell these animals give off through feces etc is disgusting and a health hazard. If I was buying a home in an area, I would not even consider being close to these home's with hens/livestock.
- I would not want hens/ live stock in the city limits. That will attract more wildlife in city too.
- Urbanites are barely capable of caring for dogs and cats in a responsible manner. There will be great harm to other species of animals if they are allowed to be owned by people who have little or no clue about animal husbandry. Abuse, neglect and/or abandonment will abound.
- No if you want to have farm animals on your property in the city move to a rural area.
- Hens are stinky
- I live in an Urban city because I don't want to live next to a farm.
- Dogs can be quieted and birds can be scared off. Chickens or hens make noise ALL THE TIME.
- Too many uncontrolled and barking dogs now. Too many loose cars pooping and killing birds. We don't need more animals not being cared for responsibly
- It has the potential to be taken advantage of. I have good relationships with my neighbors and don't want to be put in a position that doesn't support their livestock choices and tarnish those relationships. Leave it alone.
- Having grown up on a farm I fully understand the effort required to properly look after livestock. I would doubt that a lot of people appreciate what would be involved.
- Don't allow livestock in Calgary when clearly you think a solution is putting a muzzle on a dog.
- Livestock are meant for farms not city dwellers. I do not want hens/ cows/ sheep/ etc. In my neighbour hood
- Urban back gardens are no place for farm animals
- "Chicken or hens are not only an order nuisance they are a noise nuisance.
- In addition they can damage rental properties and homes and wreck it for the next person that comes along."
- Why would we even need this
- [removed]
- Who wants chicken poo smell in their area...
- People can't even take care of basic animals like dogs and cats and you're going to allow them to have livestock in their backyards?
- Too much mess
- Want livestock move to the country. We see how some people maintain their yards, now add livestock. No!
- Smell and noise would be too much
- Farm animals live on a farm for a reason. You're just going to cause stress to the animal.
- There is too much irresponsibility and the enforcement people have enough to deal with, I grew up with hens and no matter how much you clean the smell never goes away
- [removed]

- These are not urban animals. You want farm animals -- then move to the country. I have lived on a farm most of my life -- and these animals are not pets. They smell when not looked after properly and tend to be very noisy.
- This is not an urban animal.
- I don't think people would follow the rules
- Livestock does not belong in the city.
- third part, no
- I would only support this if they were responsible pet owners.
- ?? Seriously ? Ban and restrict bull terriers but bring wild animals. People are the problem. Why add to a problem. Is there a need for this. Is there space for this ?
- This would set the scene for even more complexity and potential conflict in relationships between neighbours. Our experience with the multitude of dog owners in our area of the city is probably a fair indication of how too many of them (even if just a small number) are persistently irresponsible (off leash in on-leash areas, not cleaning up after pets, etc.). Also, when we have as much wildlife around the city as we do (moose, deer, skunks, coyotes, weasels, rabbits, etc), there will be increased potential for conflict and attraction of predators.
- Most livestock barely have enough space as it is, I don't see the benefit for livestock to come live in the city. Maybe I'm not understanding this correctly.
- Could negatively affect property sales at a later date
- The city backyards are not a farm or zoo.
- If I'm a neighbour, I don't want the Noise and smells that will be created.
- I don't want smelly dirty livestock within city limits
- I don't think they need to live in Calgary communities. Even a few doors down from someone might drive their dog crazy.
- There's enough domestic animals without adding live stock to communities.
- Livestock in the city would have great potential to be a nuisance
- Unless inside the home, I think that hens are too much of a disturbance for neighbours. In addition, it would be difficult to ensure hens within Calgary are receiving appropriate care and vet care, so I don't think it is appropriate to keep them in the city.
- Chickens should be allowed or not allowed by the city, and it shouldn't be based on a neighbour's preference. Other livestock should not be allowed in the city.
- Not a good idea
- waste concerns and smell
- It's ridiculous to even allow hens - stupidity - if you want hens / move to the country
- Livestock do not belong in the city. Too often, people take them on thinking it's easy. I have owned and worked with many species of livestock, and it is far more to manage than people realise. If dogs can't even be managed properly, why add livestock to the mix? A city environment is also stressful for livestock. They require more waste and feed management than people realise. It's overall a terrible idea.

- I only support this if all neighbors within hearing and smelling distance are okay with it, unanimously. I personally would never be okay with living near livestock especially considering how many diseases can come from animals.
- Chickens won't be able to thrive in the city. They'll get out and be loud.
- I do not want to see an increase in hens living in poor conditions. Unless there was legislation that protected hens in abusive situations (the way there are protections for dogs), no, I do not want to see this.
- There are already enough animals in this city - 135000 dogs!
- Nuisance in the city. Many people do not even take care of dog crap and stuff in their own yards. This just opens us up to more problems.
- We don't need chickens or roosters in the city it will only invite more coyotes and other predatory animals
- Farm animals should not be 10 feet away from other houses.
- I don't think Calgary properties in the city/suburbs are appropriately prepared or set up for this kind of livestock. For example, hens, would require special structures in the yard and may lure coyotes or wolves/other predators to the neighbourhoods.
- Any other livestock would need more space than what is available in any residential area. Chickens/ducks are fine because they don't need a lot of space to roam and forage to supplement what they are fed.
- Livestock require significant space, can be very noisy, and can produce significant smell. Small urban or suburban properties are not appropriate for them.
- "If these are livestock then out of control issues arise,
- Chickens for eggs No
- Goats, pigs, sheep, miniature horses, cows, lamas are not acceptable for city backyards"
- I believe the close proximity of homes in most of Calgary's neighborhoods, especially the new developments, is not conducive with the added potential for additional noise and smell complaints.
- I would worry about smell and noise.
- calgary is not a farm, we're supposed to be moving forward not backwards, hens are disgusting.
- The city is not for livestock they should be kept in the farms to enjoy their existence.
- this bylaw is is far to over-reaching
- If people wish to raise livestock they should live outside city limits
- I need to understand more what livestock we are talking about. And what happens if they are approved and then cause issues for the neighbours or are not being properly taken care of.
- this sounds silly
- It's a recipe for disaster between smell, neglect and abuse. It's bad enough people can keep pigeon coops.
- I don't want live stock animals in my community. Especially chickens, too noisy and the smell.
- No livestock in city limits. Small house pets in the city limits only
- Chickens make sense, but other animals do not.

- Most families have little understanding of appropriate care for chickens and would not provide vet care.
- Hen houses are very smelly no matter how much it is cleaned
- Anyone who ever been to a farm with hens/chickens knows the smell can be very offensive. Given that wind can carry the smell of an off leash park to all surrounding homes I do not think support from just the adjacent neighbors is sufficient. It should be those within the block radius.
- I am concerned about potential noise and smell.
- Smell, noise, attracts predators such as coyotes which puts children and pets at risk
- Noise and smell
- Concerns that this may be in humane in regards to lack of space & health considerations for people.
- farm animals belong on farms, not in the city.
- case by case' leaves a lot of room for personal bias from officers unfortunately
- Would be too hard to monitor/keep track of
- Hens are noisy, smell and draw in predators. It appears that there has been more wildlife entering the city with the decrease in human traffic during the initial lock-down months of COVID-19. With additional livestock around it could lead to increased incidents of Cougars, Bobcats and Coyotes coming into yards.
- I just do not feel that chickens, hens, pigs, sheep, big snakes etc, etc., belong in an urban setting.
- "The LESA is the only livestock that should be allowed on someone's property. Too many cases of animal abuse to livestock could occur."
- living next to a chicken.coop is stinky and loud.
- There is already problems ensuring animals aren't abused or neglected. I just see this adding to the problem.
- I believe noise and smell would quickly become issues with irresponsible owners. Also strict rules would have to be in place to prevent the spread of disease.
- It is too difficult to ensure that the animals would be treated humanely. Enforcement would be nearly impossible.
- Farm animals should be on a farm not in the city!
- don't need the neighborhood smelling like [removed]
- You're worried about stray animals and aggressive dogs yet you trust Calgarians to run a hygienic well kept farm on their property?
- [removed]
- I doubt many people understand how to properly care for livestock, and I worry about people who get them as a novelty; that it could become either a hazard or a disease issue
- Smell and noise, as well as neighbouring property values.
- Unless there was a rule to re evaluate it annually with neighbours or upon sale of house.

- I don't see how livestock would provide community benefit. Plus if adjacent neighbours saying no can be overruled what is their other option ? To move ? There is no purpose to keeping livestock inside city limits.
- No livestock of any type should be in a suburban or urban space.
- Noise and smells may affect neighbors further away
- I would have concerns about noise, smell, diseases, etc...
- Live stock shouldn't be within a city.
- .
- In suburban setting sure not in the city core
- I fear it would create tension in Neighbourhood a due to noise and potential smell.
- Chickens are so smelly. There will always be complaints
- I have a phobia which is untreatable and caused by childhood trauma. My one voice would not supersede if the other neighbours didn't care. It also makes buying a home more difficult and would reduce the value of adjacent properties.
- I think it's best to keep animals within cities to those that can function as stereotypical pets. By which I mean they can live in the house, and have neighbors exposure to them controlled, limited, or temporarily eliminated by the owner, when necessary.
- Belongs on a farm
- Additional resources spent on useless options. Hens should remain on farm, not be a city animal. If there is an issue with neighbors or excessive noise or smell, the office is tied us with this instead of attending to other more prompt issues.
- With the recent outbreak of Covid 19 coming from animals, is now really a good time to allow farm animals in close confines of a city lot? i think no. Calgary simply can not police everyone to make sure they are clean and safe so no hens
- I think neighbors within hearing distance from these animals should have say WITHOUT exceptions!
- I do NOT want to hear roosters at 4 AM in my neighborhood. Animals belong on farms and acreages only. Other animals - people in Calgary can't seem to contain their cats - how are they going to keep rack of livestock?
- Livestock should be kept to the larger land properties.
- "I dont believe farm animals need to be living in backyards. Chickens smell very bad, and are very loud as well.

- I do agree with using the goats to mitigate weeds, but not in backyards."
- Allowing people to breed and exploit any animal is wrong. You should not allow this as all of your criteria is acknowledging how humans will benefit - what about the hens? I am interested in what can be done to ensure the safety of the animal is put at the forefront of this. Keeping an animal in a coop is abuse.
- no farm animals in the city limits

- Sure ban a cute pit bull and try to bring yucky birds into the city see how unfair that would be?
- Pigeons should not be housed.
- They smell and many think chickens are easy to look afterward and I'm worried they maybe treated badly
- Chickens are loud and smell bad
- this poses not only a health risk but an increase in wildlife that will prey on the hens in the city.
- I'm not sure how well this would be regulated especially in terms of providing suitable living conditions. The time frame to get proper help for dogs or cats in unsuitable conditions itself is so long - I don't see any concerns about a hen's living condition being attended to any faster.
- It is too difficult to enforce and ensure people properly care for livestock. Hoarding, cleanliness and environmental concerns would not be supervised. You want to limit pitbulls, but you think its fine to have a house with pigs, and chickens and whatever other livestock YOU deem appropriate??
- That will took much time, money and resources to enforce where it should be spent elsewhere. Everyone will push these boundaries constantly, and these animals will get out of control.
- It would be to hard to make sure all the different kinds of animals are being taken care of properly.
- [removed]
- Chickens are loud and neighbours have no say which is unfair
- They would be annoying
- Livestock should not be in the city
- As much as I would love a goat, I don't think it's appropriate living conditions for wildlife within the city. Many communities and households do not have the space to properly house livestock.
- If you want farm animals - go to a farm. I don't support this.
- Noisy and dirty.
- "I consider chickens(hens) farm animals and therefore they belong on a farm! The only exception would possibly a support or emotional reason and then there should be a limit to how many could be kept at any one address. If you keep chickens in an urban area why not pigs, horses, sheep, goats or roosters? See the can of worms opening?"
- livestock do not belong in the city! It will create so many noise and smell complaints, chickens are very noisy and odorous, and it would be so difficult to ensure the wellbeing of the livestock. Chickens are also easy targets for predators such as lynx, coyotes, etc and the city doesn't need to see an increase in those animals as a result of allowing livestock in the city
- Farm animals are not meant to be in cities. It's unnatural and honestly just immoral. Those animals need room to move around freely. Livestock gets out in the country often enough, think about how much worse it will be in the city. They will cause damage to so much of the city.
- Run down places like forest lawn, do not need welfare hens.
- Neighbours change, living conditions change, numbers of animals change.....I don't see how this could possibly be adequately monitored and enforced. Personally, I'd be an unsupportive neighbour on this.
- "Livestock does not belong in the city.

- Also, I am concerned that hens would attract more coyotes to the community."
- I lived on a farm. It stinks
- I don't believe farm animals should be within city limits
- The impact on the community. Worries about the needs of the animal, smells etc that will impact others
- I think if you are going to balance the needs of hens you should balance the needs of PITBULL TYPE dogs also, Im incensed by this conversation
- worry about the smell
- In a town I previously lived in, there were no resources available to ensure chickens etc were living in appropriate conditions. I saw some terrible "chicken runs" in back yards, people who had no idea of what was required to ensure that the animals were adequately cared for.
- Urban environment is not where chickens should be: huts stink, hens are noisy and attract predators into the area.
- No , we have farmers markets and supermarkets for a reason. My neighbours don't need chickens.
- I don't have faith that people owning hens would upkeep the houses and it would start to smell horrible for the nearby neighbors
- There is no way of effectively policing if every owner is properly caring for the animals (eg. Neglecting picking up waste, giving them the proper livable space they require)
- I have no idea why anyone would need other livestock inside the city. Having hens is enough, not sure I even like that idea, considering the poor sanitary habits of some of my neighbours egads.
- If you want livestock, move away from the city.
- Neighbors change, they can complain. Hens make noise, smell, people may not think of these things when they agree to having them as neighbors.
- People can't even look after their dogs properly and allow cats to run loose. Chickens will not be any better.
- N/A
- Not enough room for hens
- Noise concerns.
- In light of COVID and a number of other avian diseases we've seen come through our world, no thank you, this is just asking for more exposure for disease development and spread.
- Chickens can smell extremely bad for the neighbors in suburban areas.
- Chicken are annoying early in the morning.
- I do not agree with having other livestock.
- if a decision to allow a farm animal is made, if the decision is made in perpetuity, what happens when people move and new people move in - they have to deal with it? This decision wouldn't allow for the co-existence of people. Cats already roam freely causing issues amongst neighbours.
- I don't believe livestock should be kept inside the city.
- I don't think people truly understand hens and worry that they will not be treated well if they do not lay eggs etc

- That puts too much pressure on the officer. The law needs to be the same for everyone.
- We don't need livestock in the city.
- Farm animals belong on the farm.
- Leave the agriculture out of urban areas. Chickens belong on farms, not in the city.
- While this is something I would like to see, I don't think the urban dwellers of Calgary are ready for the noises and smells of urban livestock. I think this would cause more problems than it would solve and City resources would be stretched to the limit in trying to manage this.
- My dog would go nuts. He'd be declared dangerous for following his instincts if he got near live stock
- YOU NEED TO DEAL WITH THE DRUGS AND CRIME THAT INFEST THIS CITY UNDER [removed]
- People don't take proper responsibility when having livestock
- There are enough challenges with pets as it is let alone allowing other livestock within city limits.
- No chickens as this would devalue neighbouring home values, create a draw for feral animals such as cats and draw in nuisance dogs running off leash. Also drawing in urban wildlife such as coyotes, bobcats and foxes.
- You are going to discriminate against dog breeds but expect support for livestock? This is nonsense.
- If you want livestock move outside the city.
- Hens are not pets
- If you want livestock, get a farm or acreage. Animals deserve a proper place to live.
- Resources for enforcing bylaw doesn't outweigh the benefit. Would this not promote predators within the community ie: Bobcats, Coyotes, Fox?
- I don't think that a city is really appropriate space for livestock.
- I do not believe the size of yards in Calgary are sufficient for other livestock
- Hens require roosters, and roosters in an urban area is absolutely absurd. They crow at all hours of the morning, day, and night. This would be significantly more of a con than pro.
- People will take it to far
- Where do you limit other livestock? Cows, horses, goats, peacocks? There are several animals that create environmental impacts (manure, disease) and would need constant inspection.
- If I want to live on a farm I will move there. I don't want to hear or smell chickens, goats or other animals in the city
- Chickens do not belong in city dwelling backyards.
- I don't believe live stock has a place in Calgary and it would be a problem for the surrounding Neighbours
- There is no need for this.
- If you want hens go live on a farm
- there is no way to see how they could be controlled in the environment without wrecking gardens and other property
- SPCA's in other cities have tried this and ended up inundated with the hens come the colder seasons as people didn't want to invest in over wintering the animals

- Animals could easily fall into dangerous urban situations, this could cause coyote problems to get worse.
- Waste of tax money to monitor and police. I believe it will also create neighbour - neighbour drama.
- This is absolutely ridiculous. You'd stink up the whole neighbourhood, and livestock makes way more noise than your average dog. If people want livestock go but a farm [removed]
- I do not want chickens in a yard next to mine. Both the noise and the small and increase in mice as well as fleas, flies and disease.
- I don't think any livestock should be permitted in the City of Calgary, not even hens. I believe it is cruel and would be very expensive to monitor to ensure animals are properly cared for.
- [removed]
- No
- Livestock don't belong in the city.
- Livestock do not belong in my neighbors yard
- If chickens why not goats or sheep perhaps a hog or two how about a horse lowering my carbon foot print riding to do errands or work.
- "Bridgeland rabbit explosion of the past 10 years. Domesticated rabbits escaped a private enclosure where the animals were being raised for consumption. populations exploded and it became a real problem in the neighborhood being over run with domestic rabbits for several years.
- Policing of these animals being allowed in the city limits would be difficult and costly. Money better spent supporting other animal issues within the city structure."
- Contrary to popular belief Calgary is not a farm
- Livestock belong in a rural environment. I don't want to hear chickens chirping near my house.
- Farm animals should not be allowed in the city at all. I would not appreciate a stupid chicken waking me up at five every morning as I'm sure that people who work at night and try to sleep during the day would not either.
- Would open up the potential for many complex issues/problems/conflicts. As just one example, a change of ownership or residents in an adjacent property could easily result in feuds, and the animals having to be re-homed.
- Calgary is a city. Not a farm. In light of live kill markets related to Covid I think it's a terrible idea to allow urban animal farming. I would not want it next door to me.
- Chickens and live stock should not be in the urban environment. If people would like those animals to be part of their life, they should look to live in a rural environment.
- We do not need wildlife in the city. They are dirty and noisy and can be smelly.
- Don't know enough about having hens in on the property. How much noise, waste, smells. Is there always a male rooster? Sounds in the morning.
- I worry about the "support from adjacent neighbours" clause and how an individual might be impacted as their neighbours change.
- chicken shit stinks
- Hens and other livestock tend to be loud and smell. Not suitable for inner city life.

- Should this amendment not be included in the land use bylaw?
- City lots are too small, infringement on neighbours with concern of offensive smells, noise, animals escaping, drawing in predators, lowering community standards and property values, rising conflict between neighbours and their rights. Concern of irresponsible ownership, animal care and neglect.
- Once urban livestock starts, where does it stop? Hens can be as loud as roosters. Consulting adjacent neighbours is fine, but when they leave, are the livestock allowed to stay?
- Control factors and I don't want farm animals as my neighbours.
- Farm animals produce offensive smells. People don't clean up there dog poop can we really expect that people will clean up daily after farm animals? Chickens/roosters are noisy and would be a nuisance. Farm animals need large areas of outdoor space even if they are pets. Most yards would not be big enough. Chicken coups, animal fencing and shelters if not done properly can look very unattractive ruining views for neihhbors. Urine and fecal matter run off into a neiboring property during lawn watering, rain and snow melting will be a big issue and very unhygenic. Could devalue neiboring properties substantially.
- I've been in a hen house. A well kept one. The ammonia smell was beyond toxic. I do not want that anywhere near where I live.
- If I wanted to live around farm animals I would be living in the country not in the city so absolutely not. If people want these animals then they shouldn't be living in the city.
- The bylaws cannot be enforced enough to ensure animals are treated properly. Smells that can be associated are unpleasant and the noise.
- I don't want these animals to be allowed because what if they escape their enclosures? Then you have these large animals potentially causing incidents.
- Hens do not belong in yards
- The neighbours may have numerous complaints about gens such as noise or smell, which should not impact an individual's ability to support themselves with eggs.
- Hens should be kept as close to their natural habitat as possible. They need a large quiet area to roam and a urban city would just destroy that.
- Excess noise from animals, increased smell, decreased valuation of surrounding and adjacent properties.
- [removed]
- I do not believe chickens should be allowed in the city there are acregages and farms
- How to you control someone who does not clean up and deal with the smell etc? It's like people in our community who have garbage all over their property. Do you constantly complain and make an enemy? We had renters we drove off because of this but there are homeowners who are pigs.
- Move to the country
- Farming dies not belong in the city and it increases several health risks. Calgary does not have enough resources to monitor the animals we have now.
- We're an urban area. You want more livestock, move to the country. Support from neighbours tends to pit neighbours against each other and doesn't help when new people move in and are subjected to livestock next door that they never had input on.

- "Noise issues. Hens wake up very early!
- Another opportunity for people to mistreat an animal. How many folks actually know what hens need for a healthy life?"
- [removed]
- The noise, smell and we already have an issue with skunks and Coyotes... We don't want to attract more
- "Absolutely NO. There is no possible reason why hens or other livestock should be allowed in the city for neighbours to be subjected to stink and animals noises. And then just imagine when won wants to put their property up for sale. Good luck with that. Aren't barking dogs and dog excrement enough? I live across the street from The Lougheed House historical site. The park at the site is just a dog toilet and the lawns are ruined."
- I would not agree to livestock in a city. You can get the support of adjacent neighbours but what about the person 3-4 doors down that works shift or nights.
- Noise, odour, reduced property values
- Criteria is too vague and would be open for people to abuse the system
- No urban hens and no other livestock! Those belong on farms. Do we really want to be the city who brought avian flu back? I also didn't know properties within the city can own pigeons... that's very dirty...
- Farm animals belong on farms
- Residential dwelling areas are in tight proximity to each other. The disruption from neighbours housing livestock would be unprecedented for city living. I would highly oppose
- It's a trendy thing. Once people get bored or the hen stops producing eggs. What happens to the hen?
- I live in the city and not on a farm. If I wanted to live where there are livestock, I would live in the country. It is not fair to expect me to have to listen and smell livestock in my neighbors yard.
- I do not think farm animals should be allowed in the city. Our houses are too close and the smells would trigger allergies. If you want farm animals, move to a farm.
- I don't feel that a fair system could be in place to accurately get "support from adjacent neighbours" and the additional noise / smell could be difficult, especially as neighbours come in and leave the area. As an example, if I was a shift worker I wouldn't want to deal with the sound of chickens first thing in the morning from two or three homes over, but I didn't qualify to approve since I'm not adjacent.
- People cannot currently take care of their properties. Can you imagine the smell of an unkept livestock pen
- farm animals belong on a farm. If someone wants hens its so they can have the eggs, in which case they require a rooster. Do you have any idea the noise complaints you would receive from neighbours if someone had hens and roosters??!!! This is so ridiculous that the city would even consider this
- I see no benefit in hens or urban livestock. The city already spends too much money on dogs and cats, this will just be an additional cost to taxpayers

- They are noisy and smelly.
- I don't think you should have livestock in the city. I'm assuming they will build coops for hens in their yard which can create issues.
- Have lived in jurisdictions with these laws. They raise more issues and don't provide a net benefit
- Livestock aren't needed in the city. They bring the potential for disease and they may attract other pests. Allowing livestock will embolden people to have livestock without following bylaws. Lots of people act and then deal with the consequences. The grey area you're introducing will lead to conflicts between neighbours and disharmony in our communities. I don't understand the overall benefit to be honest when you consider the potential negatives.
- this is not a farm it is the city!
- They are farm animals not house animals
- I think the animals would be happier in a rural setting.
- At this time I would say no but likely need more information. I am unsure of what other livestock would be appropriate for an urban environment.
- Livestock create a smell; noise and loss of property values for neighbours.
- Barnyard animals need to be zoned in an agricultural setting. Not residential.
- People are not always going to remain in a house for long. What happens to the livestock when they move? Livestock are noisy, and smelly, I'm not sure the property values of the people around wouldn't be adversely affected.
- Chickens and hens are loud and noisy and I would rather not have them in the neighbourhood.
- [removed]
- Keep livestock on farms
- If I want to live on a farm I would move there. You cannot even police cars wandering in Calgary. So how much of a mess would live animals in the city be!?!?!!
- Na
- As most Suburban neighbourhoods have a dense family population hens are not suitable for backyards
- I'd rather not have my dog freaking out over clucking chickens at all hours of the day
- Livestock are not meant for urban life environment.
- Chickens and hens are load and stinky. Calgary is not farm land and should not be treated like so, first comes the chickens then the pigs and goats.
- The smell/noise could be a nuisance to the neighbourhood.
- Some People are not responsible enough to own cars and dogs without allowing another animal especially again with our winters being so cold
- Unless you have the capacity to inspect the cleanliness of the owners yards and the animals living quarters, this shouldnt be done. People will just keep unsanitary conditions that create problems for neighbours. The houses in calgary are built just too close together for this and unless you can inspect what you expect regularly, this is just a disaster waiting to happen

- I feel like this would be adding more 'policing' by bylaw officers, which will increase case loads of officers. I feel that this change would not be supported by a lot of the public at large, and create a situation where unhappy neighbors will report on the most minor of issues (particularly noise complaints). While I personally don't have an issue with urban hens and support a community that increases sustainable food practices, I just think the increase to complaints and the subsequent resources required to patrol this area does not justify the practice.
- There are not enough educated people living in the city to understand the responsibility that comes with owning livestock and the proper care it would take to raise such animals.
- I believe this would cause more problems down the road.
- Hens or livestock should not be in residential locations. It places a burden on neighbours how may have allergies or don't care for the noise, smells, and lack of providing adequate care that is placed of a neighbor to call to check the well being of these animals.
- It takes a lot of work and knowledge to provide proper care to livestock. If not properly implemented the animals may become sick(how would they be disposed?), mice may come into the community or have wild predators in the community(like coyotes). This would put adults, kids and domesticated animals at risk.
- Farm animals belong on a farm, not in the city. I do not support the initial bylaw not this amendment.
- Could cause issues with coyotes coming into town to kill hens, and cat/dog aggression instincts to chase hens
- I just finished reading Spillover a book on zoonotic diseases such as Covid, influenza, etc. (Excellent book, worth reading, BTW). Many spillovers are due to a combination of poor animal conditions, unexpected contact between livestock and wildlife, keep different species together (eg ducks and chickens). The potential risk of this in a loosely regulated environment just seems too high.
- Chickens are noisy and can be very smelly. Not appropriate on small lots where they would impact neighbours. Plus they can attract predators like foxes to neighbours which can put pets/children in danger
- No hens. No livestock. NONE. Calgary lots are small; no one should have to live next to livestock. It's ridiculous. If you want livestock or hens, live outside of the city limits. Eggs are cheap at the grocery store! It would cost a lot more money to raise hens than buying eggs at the store.
- I don't think livestock belongs in the city.
- Do not support hens in an urban setting. Houses are so close together in some areas that only asking adjacent neighbours isn't enough
- farm animals belong on a farm. Not in suburbs.
- These animals can be incredibly loud, smelly, and aggressive if not cared for properly. If people can't even maintain and train dogs properly I don't feel they can handle chicken or livestock
- This is not the country. Allowing people to have chickens will cause a great deal of misery for neighbors as well as a higher cost for AS to enforce the bylaw.
- I do not want to deal with the additional noise and smell of a chicken coop in my neighborhood.
- Noise, smell, possibility of abuse
- [removed]

- Noise; they are noisy creatures and invite coyotes
- [removed]
- I don't think that urban hens are a good idea.
- Its either available to all or not available
- Hens and livestock should remain prohibited within City limits. They can be loud and pose a health hazard if their living area is not cleaned and maintained properly. If people want to have livestock, they should move to less populated centres.
- I support urban hens, however I believe any other livestock, larger than a chicken/duck/goose has too much potential to be a nuisance or pose a danger
- This will result in more vermin.
- [removed]
- We live in an urban area. Move to an acreage if you want to raise livestock.
- There is already a plethora of companion animals/birds/fish/reptiles etc. to choose from. Livestock provides us with food. You'd need several hens if you want a supply of eggs - hens go through "broody" stages and stop laying. Heated outdoor living conditions large enough for roaming as well as equally adequate outdoor roaming is hardly likely in a city environment. My grandparents had a very small pigs & poultry farm so I know. My gran had O.C.D. where cleanliness was concerned. Most people don't, and chicken-shit is amongst the most foul-smelling animal waste there is. Where are people going to put all this animal excrement? In the compost bins? That'll be great in the summer's heat. And what about eating them? Are my neighbours going to be slaughtering creatures in their yards? You don't say what other livestock is being considered but my arguments are similar. Adequate indoor/outdoor roaming spaces, noise, odours and slaughter.
- Hens belong on farms
- Hens attract coyotes and bobcats making our neighbours more dangerous
- I feel like if you want to own farm animals, you should live in an area where they have the proper room to live. You wouldn't want to own a dog in a small apartment with no yard, same applies
- exotic animals don't need to be pets, lots of dogs are in shelters, this would just open up more "exotic" animal shelters
- Chicken, pigs, duck, cows, horses, lamas, and any other animal that you want to let live and breed in the back yards do not have enough space place to roam and swim. The infills that the city is granting permits for are cutting back yards down to the bare minimum. There is not enough land, property to support such animals. unless I can go scoop some for supper.
- In such tight living conditions neighbours would be subjected to the sound of the animals. If there is enough space between houses, sure.
- Livestock on farms. Not backyards.
- We don't need chickens waking people up in the early am.
- Go to a farm and smell them, that's why NO
- It takes a certain skill to bring healthy livestock into the world.. getting average joe to do it would be irresponsible.

- High-density living and farm animals do not mix. As stated above there are several main issues even with just cats & dogs... now we're going to add barn animals too?
- [removed]
- As much as I love all animals, livestock is meant for farms. It's not enough room to give them a balanced life in the city.
- Noise and odor concerns.
- There shouldn't be any other livestock living in the city. That's torture to the poor animals being cramped
- Chickens are disgusting and loud
- The city is no place for livestock. If you want to have livestock move to the country
- livestock like to roam and need lots of space and consume alot of resources to keep fed and watered, if live stock were to escape it could cause serious implications in neighborhoods or even busy streets
- if a person would like a farm style animal i believe that they should be in an area where they are likely to thrive without the potential for any problems. if we put this bylaw into place, and someone gets an animal which then causes problems therefore the animal be taken away, we now have a stressed animal and have upset a person. good heart for the idea, but i just don't think it will work out. this also has a high potential to create drama within neighbourhoods (ie: people who can hear the hens/other livestock and are bothered by it)
- "Urban living is not for livestock. Not ideal conditions for animals and potential issues with neighbours, state of the property (cleanliness) lower property values, less attractive to potential buyers in case of buying/selling.
- Just leave the animals outside of the city."
- Farm animals can carry serious disease and spread same. A populated area is more susceptible to quick infection. Look at all the diseases out of China.
- No backyard zoos
- livestock should not be kept in a city, it's very rare there's enough space for them
- [removed]
- People wanting hens need to go live on an acreage. They are dirty animals and city dwellers have no idea how to care for them. We live in a city, not a small town. These animals do not belong in a city.
- "I don't own
- Livestock"
- The yard space in Calgary is VERY small in most places. It feels inhumane to keep them in such conditions. Plus the fecal matter for chickens in town would be hard to manange
- We live in a city - if i wanted to live in the country with farm animals I would.
- Livestock are a nuisance within city limits. They are noisy and smell. They're on the farm for a reason
- [removed]

- Even with the criteria for neighbors to approve of urban livestock, it kind of forces their acceptance to stay "neighborly".
- get an acreage
- I don't believe there is a use for any other urban animal other than hens
- Not if you're planning to take my rights to own my dogs
- "If people want hens I think they should have a certain amount of land. (Ex. Bigger back yard)
- A traditional yard is not enough land to house hens."
- chickens are small and do not bother much neighbors but other livestock like goats, pigs, cows... can cause more problems between neighbors (odors, noise...) Unless the property is an acreage, complains from neighbors will happen.
- farms are the place for livestock
- There is mostly not enough space in the city dwellings for livestock/hens
- Limited space in backyards to support this amendment
- [removed]
- I would be supportive but I believe that it would be too easy for people to take advantage of this bylaw and not care for livestock properly.
- The diseases chickens carry are dangerous. If you want eggs or anything chicken support your local farmer
- Why do we need this?
- Livestock should be on a farm, not in a city.
- If you want farm animals then live on a farm or acreage
- Unless you are removing the coyotes from all the city parks as well then you are essentially just providing them with a source of food
- honestly i already get enough feces on my car from birds.
- If you want livestock, get an acreage. Hens are dirty and loud and the smell stays in the yard and travels far in the air. They are not quiet at night and the provoke dogs and coyotes in neighbouring yards and parks.
- People can live on a farm if they want farm animals
- This bylaw shouldnt even be considered. This is shameful.
- Will cause too much chaos.
- Simply the noise and smell would not be appropriate given how close Calgary housing in suburban areas is
- The city is not designed for farm animals. I don't think it is appropriate to keep them in a small a back yard. There is always smell and noise associated with them and it is not fair to the neighbours.
- People are dirty and careless and we do not need neighbourhoods smelling like a chicken coop just so a few people can have access to fresh eggs
- [removed]
- I do not support livestock in city limits

- People complain about a dog that barks once or twice a day, never mind hearing roosters, goats, ducks or any other live stock in your neighbors yard. The smell of livestock in a small space like a city would also be horrific for neighbors.
- This situation is complicated by the kind of weather we have in Alberta, the handling of waste and attraction these animals present for some some wild animals.
- livestock belongs on farms, not in cities
- Hygienic & nuisance concern. People have choices of where they want to live in Urban, Rural & Farm according to their own priority in life.
- not prepared to tolerate barnyard noises and smells in the city
- livestock belong on a farm, pets should be inside
- Poultry can carry diseases and attract wildlife. They are not meant to be pets. Their excrement stinks and would be a nuisance to neighbours. If they remained indoors and were treated with the same disdain cats are then I'd accept them as indoor only pets.
- all farm animals should remain on farms not in a city or town.
- Feces and feed can attract pests
- [removed]
- Larger animals than hens require grazing and pasture - not enough room on most lots within the urban scenario. Also, larger animals tend to be smellier. And for the well-being of the animals, it would be kindest to not limit the herd to one, so there would need to be much more room, and mitigating steps to prevent smelly manure and noise.
- Do not want hens and livestock should be in the city
- Noise is likely to be a nuisance to more than just the adjacent neighbors.
- Farm animals pro create and can get out of hand really quickly. If this was allowed I would want there to be strict rules on who can own the wildlife to prevent hoarding.
- [removed]
- livestock does not belong in the City. At present we have wildlife entering (coyotes, Bobcats, occasionally a bear) and could cause conflict. Wildlife is already threatened enough
- They are noisy and noisome and will attract predators. We already have a large number of bobcats, coyotes and even the odd cougar.
- As someone who grew up in a rural environment, I can speak from experience that chickens are NOISY and SMELLY. As well, you're going to have increased instances of high prey-drive dogs and cats taking advantage of these new "opportunities". Nobody in their right mind should want to live within 10 acres of livestock.
- As a former resident of Vancouver where they allowed chickens there were problems. 1. odour 2. noise (esp if roosters involved) 3. poor quality of care (with our very cold weather this would be even more of a problem)
- I don't think livestock belongs in the city. They make noise, they need space. You're also putting the neighbour in an awkward spot. Say yes, and be annoyed by clucking hens all day. Say no, have an upset neighbour until you move.

- I don't believe chickens should be in urban areas. I don't want to be awoken by the sounds of chickens/roosters, etc. Don't want the smells of unkept chicken coops. What happens if owners get chickens and don't look after them or neglect them. It is like people that own dogs and neglect them.
- it might create too much noise at very early hours of the morning.
- Livestock can be quite smelly and people already have a hard time cleaning up dog and cat poop. Livestock would be no different. Livestock are also very noisy at early hours and at late hours.
- I do not agree with having livestock in the city.
- Livestock (including hens) should not be raised within city limits.
- There is no need for an urban dweller to raise chickens, as it would be more of a nuisance for neighbours than it would benefit the community or individual
- You don't move to or live in a city to start a farm.
- Tired of seeing neighbours kill chickens and livestock for food in their backyards
- farm animals belong on farms .
- The yard space in many calgary yards is not suitable to support livestock
- Noisy little cocks
- Chickens, sure but nothing else should live in the city, animals need space and we don't have it in tiny backyards. Move to the country if you want a goat and cows
- I don't trust people to be responsible enough to have hens. Coyotes, Bobcats, those animals love easy prey and already their presence is considered a nuisance to many. I would hate to see another natural predator die because of human irresponsibly
- animals are safe unless saying other wise
- Livestock is meant to be living in rural areas. I would not want to live next to someone with hens, pigs etc.
- "Livestock stink!
- I would be so upset if I couldn't use my own backyard because the smell of someone's livestock is beside me. That's what farms are for"
- The smell
- Farm animals can be loud and destructive. They do not belong in the city.
- Noise and smell factor is not something I want.
- If we lived in a region without sufficient agricultural land or access to agricultural goods, I would be supportive. However, there is plenty of rural space to have chickens etc. I also have sanitation concerns. We need to address the larger issues of food security and access to food for people, particularly underprivileged communities. I would be supportive of having a community-run, urban agricultural space as there would be more oversight of the sanitation and the animals to ensure they had proper care.
- Chickens lead to increases in vermin and an increase in wildlife predators. This is a dumb idea. Calgary is not a giant farm.
- The city is no place for back yard animals

- Even hens can become a nuisance to neighbours because of the smell and mice activity when not properly cleaned. Again another non-enforcable issue and where do you draw the line on type of animal.
 - People want livestock? Live in the country. The city already has issues with mice.
 - Hens attract vermin which everyone in the community is exposed to
 - Disruption to urban looks, sounds and smells.
 - I don't see the benefit of having livestock under the city's care
 - No need for livestock in city limits. Smell and noise for neighbour's should be considered as with any animal
 - It just adds another animal problem
 - Noise and sanitary problems are a concern
 - Chickens and other livestock bring on their own challenges that people who have never lived or worked on a farm do not appreciate. Also, if not properly cared for or housed it could attract more wildlife, like coyotes and foxes.
 - It shouldn't only be the adjacent neighbors but also the neighbors further on the street. Noise and smell will affect them too
 - Improper management of bird diseases and i worry that people who should not own/ are not properly educated about hens would be able to have them thus causing distress and overall bad situations for the animal.
 - Carry disease, multiply and escape. Filthy noisy nuisance. Smell.
 - Opposed to hens as they can be very noisy for neighbours. Other forms of livestock may be ok.
 - These animals do not belong in the city . They should be on farms and acreages.
 - "Hens are livestock meant for a farm not an urban dwelling.
- Allowing this is more ridiculous then implementing rules against only pitbulls"
 - Farm animals belong on a farm not in a yard in the city this is a terrible idea even to allow hens what is this
 - Too noisy
 - If you need farm animals move outside the city.
 - I do not believe hens or other livestock should be allowed within the city limits.
 - Chicken coops smell and will make it harder to sell a house if neighbor has chickens next door.chickens belong on a farm not in a city
 - Livestock live on farms. Calgary is a city. There's enough therapy animals out there. If one needs a chicken, Airdrie and Chestermere aren't very far
 - Hens are noisy and the smell wanders. It could have a negative affect on dogs around that area.
 - Calgary is growing, and it is growing fast, what use to be a farm or an acreage outside of calgary limits is now inside calgary limits. It is unfair for someone's lively to be ruined when a city is growing so fast.

- I don't think that allowing other livestock than hens is necessary.
 - Due to the limited space between residences I don't believe that the smell and the noise can be sufficiently mitigated in an urban environment. If I wanted to live on a farm I wouldn't be living in the city.
 - Noise and smell of feces
 - Chickens, Goats, etc. Have no place in the city. Most pet owners do not properly take care of their animals. The only way I would support this is licensing the live stock and having random checks like AHS checks in restaurants
 - [removed]
 - It would be very hard to provide adequate living conditions for some livestock inside the city.
 - The city isn't a farm and we shouldn't have to listen to hens clucking or anything else a farmyard animal does. Including the smell they make.
 - Roosters crowing all the time and the smell is bad. Farms are farms and city living is city living. You wanna own farm animals- move to a farm
 - We already have problems with noisy dogs and cats and dogs that are left to wander out of their yard. Complaints to bylaw are met with comments that there are not enough officers to enforce this behaviour. Livestock would just add more complaints that do not get addressed.
 - I say no just because I'm clean and organized but most people aren't. I see a lot of people having these animals and not keeping them properly cleaned and looked after with no regard to their neighbours having to hear, smell and put up with their slack.
 - There are enough livestock animals that only live to be killed for food
 - No place for hens in city loud and messy leave them in the farm
 - "We are in the middle of a pandemic. Birds and pigs are just two of the sources for some of the world's major pandemics in the past century. It is a mistake to introduce potential pandemic sources to urban centres.
- Poultry and pig farms have stringent health and safety, but ,in spite of these safety measures, we have seen major disease outbreaks at those facilities here in Alberta. Homeowners will not have requirements like foot baths and full PPE.
- My neighbors were already chopping up chickens on their driveway to serve in their family restaurant. What's to stop unlicensed meat vendors from doing this, especially in light of recent provincial relaxations of meat processing rules? We are putting the food chain in jeopardy by allowing urban farming. Some of the so-called pets will be butchered for food, possibly in your neighbor's driveway or yard. I did not sign up for this!

- Livestock attract vermin. Livestock belong in the country. Kindly move to the country if you want to farm."
- livestock require a lot of room to roam. Unless you have lots of room, I don't think livestock should live within the city.
- Birds are gross disease carriers and shouldn't be in neighborhoods
- Hens, belong in a rural setting. Don't want farm animals next to me. If I did I would move to an acreage or a farm. Noisy and stinky
- This opens a whole new field of possible conflict, neighbourhood planing, architectural controls, property values... It could open up years of complaints, court cases appeals on land use bylaws. and cost us millions of dollars that we no longer have available in our tax base. Just opens a hole can of worms.
- Small game and livestock will increase our influx of predatory cats. Endangering our smaller house hold animals ie. cats the are allowed in our yards
- Keep the livestock on acreages where they have enough room to have suitable living conditions for these animals. I wouldn't want my neighbour in the city to have chickens any more then they would want my dogs barking in the backyard.
- They smell awful and how will their waste be dealt with,
- I believe this would encourage more wildlife to enter our city and put the wildlife in harms way.
- Urban areas are too densely populated and the cost with outweigh any benefit.
- if you want chickens, move to a farm. There will be added costs fort his bylaw that Calgarians don't need.
- We live in the city for a reason. If you want livestock, move to the country.
- This would be very difficult to enforce, and the problems of livestock in an urban environment are numerous. Examples are: maintenance of living conditions, noise, increase wildlife attacks on hens therefore more danger to the public.
- Farm animals go on a farm
- They attract coyotes to my property/area.
- no farm animals in a city.
- People keep too maybe pigeons and chickens in the city especially in neighbourhood makes a mess and they are loud
- You don't need hens or other livestock in the city
- Do we really want to waste our time, resources and money on monitoring hens and livestock in the city? I don't.
- I am not in favour of Farm animals in the city
- Our yards are so small in some areas - the smell and noise would be terrible for many neighbours. I would not want such things so close to my home and yard where we like to spend time outside - and we have allergies. Smell and noise at night and early morning when windows are open would be bad too.

- Nit everyone would be a responsible owner to keep clean etc. They would attract more wildlife such as mice and coyotes. We already have issues with coyotes. Calgary is an urban community, not a rural one
- I don't particularly want livestock within the city limits, that's what farms are for.
- Having spent a fair amount of time on a farm with chickens, they are dirty and noisy. I would not want to live in close quarters like a city near hens.
- I don't think any livestock should be within the city, that is what outside farmers are for, the city doesn't need to take responsibility to bring in farm livestock, reach out to other farmers/ranchers if there is a need for something.
- They should stay on farms.
- Urban hens can become problematic and/or a nuisance to urban dwellers and should be left for rural living arrangements
- Most city yards would not provide sufficient space for these types of animals which would lead to inappropriate living conditions for them
- no one wants a rooster waking them up in the early morning. i feel like there would be many complaints from neighbours if this were to happen
- I would not like to have a neighbor that had chickens, based on their smell, and noise.
- We do not have the room needed in the city for livestock
- I would support animals in the community but not at individual residences.
- If people want to have livestock they should live in the country, not the city.
- While there would be restrictions in place I feel unfortunately they would not be followed by everyone. I believe there would be more mistreated animals in unacceptable living conditions that would get out of hand
- Livestock belong on farms, not in cities. Cities should NOT have farmland inside it
- Like stated above it's ridiculous
- what is considered support from adjacent neighbors? And if you don't support, what avenue do you have? I believe this would only contribute to more neighborhood tension, environmental issues.
- Livestock should only be allowed on farms and large properties that have a lot of land. Not in the communities.
- More coyotes and cougars.
- Livestock should not be subjected to urban living conditions and neighbours shouldn't be subjected to any nuisance caused by urban livestock
- Too much effort will be put towards noise complaints by neighbors. Not an efficient use of tax payer dollars.
- So you're going to allow other livestock to live within Calgary, however you are going to limit the number of pit bulls that people are allowed to own?! I don't think so.
- Livestock should not be allowed in the city. Proper living conditions cannot be met. And the potential for livestock theft and livestock running around the city will increase.
- It may cause bird flu

- I don't think hens and farm animals need to be allowed on residential properties within the city. They stink, make a lot of noise and can be potential nuisance, if they escape and are harmed by a dog or cat it's just going to cause more problems.
- We struggle with responsible ownership of pets, let's not add poultry and livestock
- Why the heck are we bringing livestock into the city when the city is trying to get rid of dogs ?!?!? Livestock is meant for a farm.
- It is difficult to manage whether there are appropriate living conditions or space for livestock, and what training is available for taking care of these types of animals.
- Livestock belong in rural and not urban areas.
- Noise and smell are a concern of mine if a neighbor is allowed farm animals right next to my yard and house.
- [removed]
- I do not support having hens or other livestock in residential areas
- I do not support livestock in the city at all
- Livestock belongs on the farm, not in major cities.
- These animals are often not cared for appropriately and belong on a farm not a back yard.
- I'm not sure responsible hen ownership in the city could or would be followed by all citizens.
- Would provide a nuisance to other residents, encourage pests and wildlife into the city. Bylaw cannot keep up with animal cruelty cases at the moment without adding further laws involving animals. Penalties are not harsh enough. If people wish to keep livestock or chickens they should invest in suitable property outside of the city.
- If people want farm animals, they should live on a farm. You will have so many cases of neglected animals if this goes through
- There is not adequate space for livestock in Calgary to be humane.
- I like animals, but I don't need more noise in my neighbourhood, especially from animals that make a lot of noise. A city is not a farm.
- If the city is considering the bylaws for pit bulls, it shows the city's lack of animal knowledge and understanding. Therefore, for the city to decide what conditions are appropriate for livestock, clearly won't be comprehensive enough and I'm worried that there is room for more animal neglect and impulse buys.
- NO! The city land is not for livestock. There's plenty of farmland outside of city limits for raising them.
- [removed]
- Most houses in Calgary do not have sufficient space for livestock. Also would draw in predators, who would be euthanized if they kept returning.
- Farm animals should not be allowed in the City, and if they are there needs to be extensive training for handling on the new owner side
- I live in the city for a reason. I do not want to be woken up to roosters, deal with the garbage and debris from hens, pigs, and whatever livestock there is.
- Would depend on how this is done. If I had support from one neighbour and he moved, the new person should have to also give approval or I can't keep the hens. Could be a very slippery slope!

- Hens are noisy and their living conditions can become a nuisance smell
 - noise and smell in tight neighbourhoods
 - barn animal belong on a farm due to the noise and smell and space requirements for the quality of life for the animal
 - [removed]
 - They are too loud and not appropriate for city lots. If someone wants farm animals they should move to a farm.
 - Livestock such as hens do not belong in a city environment where houses are too close too each other. As well the fact that we do have a lot of wildlife such as coyotes roaming the city seeking food will mean that they will come in more often for the hens.
 - Farm animals belong on farms
 - Livestock is not needed in this city. If I had someone with chickens and other animals in their backyard, I would be [removed].
 - These are farm animals and should stay on a farm. We have enough issues with pet dogs, cats, birds, mice, snakes etc without adding pigs, hens, cows, etc to the problems.
 - Hens attract foxes and bobcats. I foresee you euthanizing the wildlife whom would come for the hens, when that isn't right. It is their nature
 - Homes are too close together. More allergies, smells & sounds come with this. Not for suburban or city living homes
 - Chickens are borderline ok but anything else isn't. If you want to raise live stock move to the country
 - No livestock witching city.
 - I don't want random chickens running around [removed]. Who is going to clean it up ? I don't want them wandering into my yard and disturbing my pets.
 - After going through potential issues with dog bite bylaws, why would you allow livestock?
 - [removed]
 - Birds can be viral transfer species. Don't we have enough problems with viruses currently?
 - I can't imagine that the smell and sound would be pleasant for neighbours.
 - I don't think hens should be kept inside city limits
 - "It's just extra burden on the city to create new bylaw and administr those.
- No need ofthat during this time."
 - Livestock within urban limits is equivalent to baiting/teasing the wildlife
 - I don't support this initiative because I believe sanitation enforcement and noise concerns would be an issue. We also already have issues with coyotes in communities trying to eat dogs and cats. Bringing chickens into the city would be another alluring point I believe.
 - This would largely be influenced by WHAT livestock and suitability for them to be in an urban setting. without examples, this is hard to support.

- Farm animal require special attention and space which we do not have in the city. My neighbor already tried to have chickens in there back yard and within 2 days a skunk moved in to our area. I leaved in fear that my dog was going to get sprayed by it. As soon as they got rid of the chickens Mr skunk left.
 - Don't want to be living beside a stinky hen house
 - "No roosters. Other livestock can smell bad. Suburban homes are too close together for this. If I'm an acreage, yes. Or larger inner city lot, maybe.
 - Not in newer suburban areas."
 - Just dumb.
 - noise and odor problems
 - Not sure what the quality of life would be for larger livestock in small city lots.
 - [removed]
 - If you want to own livestock move to the country
 - Most people do not understand the care processes and needs for livestock
 - [removed]
 - Hens belong on farms
 - Too much noise and mess
 - [removed]
 - "So many issues with animals released from homes already, we don't need hens too
-
- Too many cats at large."
 - City is no place for luvestock
 - Keeping livestock/hens on residential properties, can create health issues and will impact the property value of neighboring residences. If people want livestock, they are free to go live on a farm.
 - Absolutely not
 - It's difficult to meet a chickens needs in a city environment and I don't see it being a good welfare situation for the birds in the long run.
 - Livestock should remain on a farm
 - Something else to monitor
 - Calgary is a city last time I checked, not a farm.
 - Unfortunately people are not very clean and this will bring more pests (mice, voles, ants, etc) to neighboring homes
 - Too many people would not look after their hens or bees. As soon as money is tight, people will stop providing the necessary care.
 - I just don't see the need to own a pet hen. If people want livestock, buy an acreage or a farm.
 - Urban areas do not seem an appropriate place for livestock. Houses are too close to each other and smells and noise would be a nuisance.
 - smell would be my concern

- Do not agree with hens within the city limits. They are a farm animal.
- We live in far to close quarters to have livestock/chickens. What if the neighbors says yes today and then no a month after they realize the noise&smell? What if a new neighbor moves in and does not support?
- hens needs farm lands, city's are too loud.
- The city isn't the place for farm animals
- [removed]
- We live in the city of Calgary. There's placing like farms for this. If you want them contact a farmer.
- I don't feel any livestock belong in the city due to noise, smell
- It's not fair to the animal.
- Most farm animals and noisy and smell
- Who wants to live next door to someone who owns chickens in the city? That would really annoy neighbors
- Animals can be very smelly and noisy. A place for farm animals is on a farm.
- These animals are a nuisance.
- I think is no healthy to have hens inside at home in winter time .
- Costs to police this too high. Other pressing matters ie car thefts
- Noise
- Hens belong on farms, it's in humane to have them in urban quarters
- Farm animals are for farms and should not be in the city
- [removed]
- The allowance would be abused and animals would become a nuisance.
- I don't agree with livestock within the city
- Hens and livestock attract wildlife.....
- Noise and smell of hens in urban neighbourhoods is unfair to those surrounding neighbours.
- Farm animals belong in the farm not the city. This will cause more neighbours issues and complaints to the city. At this point the city can't control roaming cats
- I don't have enough information to support this.
- Hens will likely attract predators to come into urban zones.
- Bringing other animals in would attract coyotes etc.
- [removed]
- If you want livestock move to the country
- Hens are loud and stink, if you don't want dogs barking then how her hands any different
- Move to a rural area if you want to keep farm animals
- I know of someone who keeps hens. That's fine but the last thing we need are people keeping chickens, a pig etc for food and saying it's a pet.
- There is currently enough issues ensuring that the animals currently allowed are cared for and safe and healthy. Also currently there is almost no enforcement of the current animal bylaws until if is too late so let's work on the current animal bylaws before we add more.

- I do not support raising animals just to eat them or eat their offspring.
- [removed]
- I dont want farms in the city
- Animal services has enough to deal with already
- If people want to livestock and farm animals - they can move to a rural environment.
- This would generate more noise and smell, people don't take their responsibility seriously, by law would have to have authority to fine not monitored situations
- Chickens do not belong in the city
- That's what farm's are for.
- No farm animals in urban areas. I definitely would not want chickens or anything else in my neighbourhood.
- I don't believe support from solely adjacent neighbors would be enough and smell or noise may be a problem for those farther away than just the adjacent houses
- Noise and smells.
- In the city, i would not want hens or other livestock.
- [removed]
- You're saying dogs a nuisance but want to allow noisy farm animals that live outside 24/7. Seems silly
- Da animals do not belong in a court environment, not only does it pose a threat to the animals but to people and the resident pets as well.
- The city is a city. Having livestock in the city can cause irreparable harm to the animals. The stress on them from loud noises, vehicles, people teasing or bothering them from over fences is just to much. It will ultimately create more problems for owners, tenants, and the city.
- I do not support livestock permitted in the city of Calgary.
- Animals raise for food belong on a farm, not in the city.
- People,can buy an acreage for keeping chickens, pigs etc. I can't even get my neighbours to control cats, let alone feral roosters (who can be vicious)
- [removed]
- Hens are for a farm not in the city
- Chickens are loud. If you would like to run a hobby farm relocate to an acreage
- [removed]
- Pet owners can barely (if at all) follow the rules of the animals already allowed. Adding more will only cause more of a problem and cost to the city and to neighbors.
- Chickens are loud, over populate quickly, and lead to an increase in dangerous wildlife in suburban areas
- Noise smell sanitary needs garbage disposal
- I'm doubtful that any consideration of and communication to neighbors will be consistently followed, not sure the Bylaw folks will be strict enough with violations and where there are hens, someone will slip in a rooster and that will be too much noise in an urban setting.

- Livestock should not be allowed in the city. If it is only rural properties with minimum yard space behind houses should have it permitted.
- its ridiculous
- My concerns stem from irresponsible ownership and husbandry. Noise mess, smell etc.
- If you want livestock, buy a farm.
- I have a neighbor who has roughly 50 pigeons in their backyard, the coop goes above the fence line, extra noise is emitted and overall is an eyesore in the backyard and I would argue has decreased property values adjacent I do not support this under any circumstance.
- People do not take care of dogs and cats so the cost of enforcement does not seem to be worth
- Hens and livestock are loud, and smelly.
- People already neglect domesticated animals. We don't need to throw more species into this mix.
- If people want livestock, live outside the city boundary
- chickens for example can be very loud i think they should only be allowed on farms outside of the city
- Hens and other lives stock are loud and have a considerable smell. They can't be returned to a house when they are bothering their neighbours.
- Just like louder dogs can be complained about, I'm assuming that hens and other livestock would be complained about. For example, the smell or the noise.
- I do not want more noise living inner city. Also if you have an owner that will not keep up proper hygiene in there back yard the smell can be horrid
- No, unless this law is enforced with permits and there is SPECIFIC education/training provided for people who would like livestock.
- I think the potential negative effects (noise, smell, living conditions, lack of adequate/humane space in urban yards, etc) outweighs the potential benefits.
- I grew up on a farm and Chickens stink they are loud and annoying.
- A farm is farm, hens belong to a farm. A home is a home.
- [removed]
- Farm animals are always noisy and smelly. Also, even well intentioned situations will have incidents and a community should not have to deal with that in a city.
- I think that would excite coyotes and bob cats leading to more of them in the city. Which wouldn't end well for the poor wild animals.
- I will not support any changes until pitbulls are not singled out.
- It will just create more problems, noise complaints, health and safety issues.
- I don't think the public needs to be keeping more animals in cages in the city. Leave hens to professional farmers.
- Unfortunately, chickens make a lot of noise and mess. Would not want that next door.
- City lots are to small and close together. If a neighbour had hens it would affect multiple people surrounding them. Not fair. They belong on farms and acreages.
- Noisy, manure odour, carries fleas/ticks

- This is a city/urban environment unsuited for this
- I believe the potential to increase a readily available food supply for the small predators already living in our city (coyotes, bobcats, etc.) would increase their presence and put them at greater danger in an urban setting.
- Livestock require a lot of training, work and space to maintain. What would happen if the owner goes on vacation? It would be detrimental to the health of the animals and people living in the area. There is also a higher chance for spreading diseases linked to livestock in rural areas.
- Livestock is more of a nuisance than any dog or cat, have an odour, attack when slightly agitated and cannot be brought inside during quiet time hours.
- You should not be allowed to have farm animals in the city. Citizens are unable to have cows or horses in a backyard so others should not be allowed to keep hens in a coupe in the city.
- Because you are catering this one specific breed. This doesn't enforce realistic rules, and won't deal with other breeds when and if they bite.
- Livestock does not belong in a city.
- I believe it would depend on the livestock. But there are health concerns for both people and livestock to take into consideration. Ex. If people were allowed goats or pigs on property they can be highly destructive animals and can eat and dig through fence lines.
- People can't be trusted to make sure the smell of the chickens is kept to a minimum
- Stop making up new rules and regulations to justify your jobs and increase your bureaucracy
- Na
- Lots too small to support this theory. The smell and noise is substantial. Leave them in the rural areas where they belong.
- The only other livestock I can think of are big, smelly and noisy.
- I don't support any kind of livestock animals inside the city.
- I don't believe livestock needs to be within Calgary city limits.
- The city is no place for farm animals
- Farm animals do not belong in the city. They don't have the room they need in the city.
- Don't want livestock living next to me.
- noise, odors, messes
- Because in the winter when it's not fun any more you are going to have a problem. 2. If people can't control or make time to train and take care of house pets how do you the farm animals are going to make out.
- not a fan of farm animals in the city. there should be a limit of at most two if they were to be allowed. most city dwellers have no idea how to care for farm animals. there are a lot of irresponsible animal owners. there needs to be a quick resolution process to disputes about animal disturbance. maybe two strikes and you're done. there has to be some recognition about neighbours quiet enjoyment of their property without having to deal with odour or noise. Keep the number of animals at a minimum as other cities have done and it would go a long way to solving this problem. ownership limits should also be put on dogs and cats. few city lots can really support more than 3-4 dogs.

- Bylaws are often not enforced to begin with based on lack of resources. This is just going to cause more issues amount neighbors and neighborhoods.
- LIVESTOCK DOES NOT BELONG IN THE CITY!!!!!!!!!!
- I think there would be too many people who don't know how to properly care for these animals. There would be more cases of animal abuse than ever.
- "We don't need more random livestock on properties.
- Before you allow more animals, maybe you should review the pros and cons of the people with chickens (and their neighborhoods)."
- No one NEEDS livestock in the city. If you do, move to a farm.
- I don't feel livestock belong in an urban setting. While someone may have support from adjacent properties initially, what happens when properties sell or people move and feelings are not the same with new owners??
- Support from adjacent neighbours? What if one supports, one doesn't? Puts us in the position of opposing a neighbour which doesn't make for good relationships. If you want chickens, go buy an acreage where you won't affect those around you.
- Other livestock needs more space than what city limits can provide.
- There should be no farm animals in the city. If you want chickens move to the country.
- If you want farm animals buy a Acreage and purchase farm animals for your farm not in the city
- While I love the idea of possible other livestock, I'm concerned about neighborhoods where the houses are quite close together and the noise that livestock would make. You cannot teach a chicken or a goat not to make noise and you cannot bring it inside if it is disturbing to your neighbors, like you can a dog
- If I wanted to live beside a farm I'd move to the country. I've lived beside a neighbor who had a duck farm. It was terrible. Not keen waking up to the sounds of cows outside my bedroom window either.
- Don't want the extra noise and smell.
- By law enforcement is ineffective. There will be an increase in cases of neighbor against neighbor. Smells, sounds will deter people from enjoying their backyards, especially in high density neighborhoods. Farms animals belong on farms.
- I do not wish to have urban hens living within city limits. Farm animals should remain to live on the farm.
- The chance and likelihood of hens and other livestock being inadequately cared for within city limits, on urban and suburban properties is far too high.
- We don't have the funds to enforce that the laws are being followed.
- Having to smell bird feces every day? No thanks. You want to be a farmer, move to a rural area. It's bad enough that we have to smell that horrible marijuana everyday, & now this? This is a city, not farmland.
- "urban hens - yes for eggs only
- Other livestock - no"
- I don't want livestock to be kept within the city, Calgary will start looking like a 3rd world country.
- Way too difficult to enforce and I see it being far more intrusive on neighbors. Keep it in the country

- Livestock need more than the BASIC care and unfortunately having the bare minimum isn't enough especially in an enclosed city.
- Hens stink and are farm animals.
- Livestock deserve to be on land large enough to roam and not cooped up in a suburban backyard.
- Livestock in the city will just get as bad as the feral cats problem. When people can't afford to feed these animals anymore they will just let them go.
- Love stock should not be in family homes
- I don't want pigs, goats, cows, and other farm animals to be allowed to live in the city.
- People can't even properly care for dogs and cats and the city does a poor job of enforcing animal welfare. Adding more types of animals that people have even less knowledge about will be detrimental.
- There is nothing like the fresh air of a farm!
- I believe farm animals belong on a farm, not in the city. I.e. chicken, pigs, etc
- [removed]
- I live in a new area, and our lots are already so small. I would not be comfortable with having urban hens next door to me, knowing what goes into roosting and keeping them from personal, hands-on experience in a rural setting.
- Pests will be attracted to properties noise and smell of chickens is terrible green carts already attract more pests so chickens could lure coyotes into neighborhoods causing safety issues
- Hens are filthy, allergenic and could spread a future bird flu. If people want to raise livestock, there is plenty of land outside city limits.
- I grew up with hens and they were great but the people who abused the leniency and had multiple goats etc made it hard to enjoy our yard
- Given the close parameters between houses, potential smell or noise may become an issue which can cause unpleasantness between neighbors who sometimes are not always approachable. Owing livestock should be allowed only outside of the City limits. Owing animals can sometimes have the best intentions but get out of control for any reason
- Livestock doesn't belong in the city, it isn't fair to them nor the people living near them
- Livestock and chickens are grown on farms where they have space to be taken care of. If people want to raise hens or livestock, then don't live in a city. Move to the country or acreage so that you can properly care for the animals and have the space to do so without disrupting people who like city living. It could open up a can of worms for health conditions/concerns for neighborhoods, well-being for animals that has to be monitored, noise complaints, neighborhood disagreements etc. It will add to more bylaw calls and complaints than its worth.
- "Farm animals belong on a [removed] farm
- If you want them get the [removed] out of the city period
- Sick of minority groups whining and getting their way"
- No farm animals in the city.
- Chickens smell terrible!
- Hen? Seriously?

- They're farm animals
- I do not believe bylaw has the manpower to address potential animal welfare issues regarding hens. Inspections of husbandry areas to ensure the animals are properly taken care of should be required.
- I don't trust that a large amount of the urban population is able to care for livestock properly. This will end up negatively affecting the animals in some cases.
- If people want hens they should move to a farm or acreage
- I live in a community that spearheaded the LESA for chickens. I don't believe that livestock should be kept as pets for any other reason. We have enough issues policing cats/dog owners as it is.
- I don't feel that the place for livestock is within the city limits and feel that this is going to be a big headache for neighbours that would live beside people who do put livestock in their backyards.
- Livestock only bring coyotes and disease to the areas. Livestock is for farms and out of city areas.
- If people want to raise livestock they should move to the country.
- This is a slippery slope and there are people who will take advantage of this. It will decrease property values.
- I can see hens, but depending on the livestock I feel it may become an annoyance to house anything larger than that for the neighborhood.
- if you want to raise farm animals, move to a farm. Chickens, cows or pigs on the other side of the fence are going to increase the incidence of dogs barking.
- Chickens are stinky and loud. They also bring coyotes and skunks into the area. There would be a need for some licensing and training before I would be okay with my neighbours having chickens.
- I don't like the idea of exceptions at the discretion of chief bylaw officer. It either yes or no and if complaints are received then officer can go by
- livestock does not belong in the city. hens are messy and their feces stink. we have enough problems with skunks and coyotes in this city without adding new sources of food.
- Houses are too close together in most communities. Chickens smell, and can be noisy. Need to be kept on places with some distance between the neighbors
- Within the city, there is not enough land far enough away from neighbours that having livestock such as hens that would not be disruptive. I think it is best kept outside of the city.
- Chickens can smell very bad. Also we lived in other areas where roosters would wake us up.
- I believe by allowing this, people will get these animals and next thing you know they will be slaughtering them as well! I also know that there is way too much animal neglect and cruelty happening already and allowing hens etc will just increase an already huge problem. Unless hens etc. are going to be actual pets and part of the human family and treated as such, then that could be an exception but it would have to be heavily monitored and regulated so that these animals don't become victims of cruelty and neglect...or end up on the dinner table.
- Calgary properties are cramped as they are. Many livestock animals make lots of noise (much like dogs) which can create unneeded noise complaints. If someone wants livestock, they can move outside the city and commute.
- Houses are too close and a lot of back yard space is too small.

- I think that City of Calgary really needs to start planning for increased urban density. At what point is the carrying capacity exceeded? Population biologists will tell you that increased population densities results in increased anxiety and violence. We are seeing that in Calgary. The last thing that we need is to put animals into a city setting! My neighbour already doesn't follow bylaws. Now I'm going to let him have animals. Perhaps first the City of Calgary should reduce our crime rate and bylaw infractions before we add this into the mix!
- the city is no place for livestock. not enough land.
- My area is residential. Would not expect to have livestock introduced.
- I do not feel neighbors would be supported well enough. Noise adjacent to livestock could become unbearable with no recourse.
- IF hens were allowed they need to be restricted to certain locations due to the possibility of disease they carry
- fowl do not belong in the city, they are a health hazard
- livestock in the city causes too many noise, smell and disturbance issues with neighbours.
- my neighbours barley look after their lawns, garbage etc. I would not want to live next door to chickens/hens/goats etc
- livestock belongs on a farm or rural property. the smell they can generate would be a nuisance to others.
- Biosecurity reasons that can transmit diseases to other flocks
- [removed]
- I believe that City and CPS resources are already strained and don't need the extra obligation to respond to complaints re: smelly or noisy hens/livestock
- Livestock should not be in urban areas, they are for rural/farm life
- Livestock should not be in the city (rural).
- I don't agree with people raising animals to kill them and eat them.
- If you want livestock or chickens - rural animals - move to a farm. I don't want to have chicken feed lots in yards near me.
- Urban hens can be loud and smelly and attract other pests. Given that properties in Calgary are relatively close to each other I do not support this as it will not be possible for urban hens to not impact immediate neighbours.
- Livestock belong on a farm setting.
- I don't want livestock next to my home. I don't trust that the city has the capacity to monitor complaints or oversee standards
- It would cause far too much nuisance to neighbors, and would cause issues with neighbors etc. Livestock belongs on farms and rural areas. It would also mean a new tenant could be forced to live beside a previously approved hen house, even if they weren't ok with it.
- Allowing hens or livestock could attract more pests to the neighborhood and as a homeowner I wouldn't want to have to deal with more issues around my home due to that. It could add more cost to me which isn't fair. As well, it could perhaps add unwanted noise from said neighbor.
- There has to be noise restraints put in place first

- I don't want to be subject to excessive noise and smell. If they want to raise livestock they can move to an acreage where there is the space to minimize impact to neighbours
- I don't think farm animals should be kept in the city. There is not enough space and it could encourage coyotes or other animals to come closer to homes
- Many people, neighbourhoods will start chicken farms in their back yards. This will depreciate the values of a property depending on what area of the city you are in.
- I would not support this due to the mess, smell and noise that would come along with allowing hens in the city
- Waking up to my neighbours dog barking is enough to tip me over. If i hear chickens, roosters and goats I would not be okay with that.
- The land area size in calgary does not support these types of activities due to small lots and proximity to your neighbors. People still think it's okay to let there cats out.. let's start there before we allow livestock.
- Where there are hens, there will eventually be a rooster waking the neighbours up at the crack of dawn and all through the day. Have lived near roosters - awful
- Having grown up with livestock, this would be difficult on the animals to be in a city environment. Unless the owner has ample space and livestock experience and/or training, in addition to the requirements you listed, this is not supported.
- Will there be more money in the budget to manage the enforcement of the bylaw
- Livestock dont belong in the city and I believe people who dont know what they're doing could acquire animals they dont know how to properly care for.
- My neighbours can't even clean up after their dog, and the stench makes us uncomfortable in our own yard. Can you image if they were allowed to have hens and other livestock?
- No livestock by individual citizens within city limits. People can barely handle dogs and cats, let's not give them cows and chickens
- no need
- farm animals belong on a farm
- The city does haven't time to follow out complaints of what's already going on. People here cant be trusted and we dont have the resources to follow up on chicken complaints
- Hens attract rodents, specifically rats.
- I don't like the idea of it being on a case by case and the bylaw officers discretion. People need to feel their are rules. If a person were to get a chicken or pet pig, they would always worry that a bylaw officer in a bad mood would decide it's not okay, possibly even after another said it was. Also some of these amendments are strange, offers community benefit? What does that mean, and would you suggest cats and dogs offer a community benifit
- in the City we are so close together. Dog & bird noise is enough without adding to it.
- roosters crowing at early hours can not be trained. Hygiene, disposal of surprisingly large amount of chicken dung
- Noise, mess, smell
- No livestock can be smelly and decrease property value.

- One concern I have is how the city would be following up to ensure the living conditions of the animal are indeed suitable, when we have so many issues already of inhumane living conditions for pet cats and dogs around the city.
- I do not want hens living next to me unless they are quiet.
- Are you going to introduce new bylaws, if we're only allowed one dog in the house then you can't have more than one kid in your house hold
- People within the city leave their dogs outside in-30 for hours and allow them to bar daily. Couldn't imagine if we handed them goats and hens.
- Bringing a farm inside city limits wouldn't be wise, look around, I'd guess that an average of at least 50% of the residents in Calgary can't be bothered to properly maintain their property as it is, and now you want to add farm animals to their yards?
- [removed]
- Far too many people don't clean up after their dogs, I am concerned it will be the same with other animals.
- The hens/emotional support chickens argument is ridiculous and nothing more than an attention-seeking move from people with mental health issues. Laughable.
- Most livestock is bigger than a dog and I don't believe they belong in the city.
- Residential areas are not suitable for livestock especially in Calgary with many communities being zero lot lines
- belong on an acreage or farm. Noise, smell.
- Noise and smell
- Chickens, Hens and livestock belong on a farm not in a city.
- We do not have the veterinary resources to take care of the influx of rural type patients that would be coming in. I think too many would get these animals while being too uneducated on how to care for them, especially in a city.
- Want to live in rural areas live there.
- There shouldn't be hens inside the city
- Criteria are too vague
- I believe that livestock in City limits can be noisy and messy
- I grew up on a farm. Animals are not suitable for this compressed city lifestyle of living. They are noisy if they are chickens and most animals refuse creates doors. If you want to raise animals, you should live on an acreage or farm.
- Unneeded/unwanted Noise and smell
- Farm animals belong on the farm. Keep your [removed] chickens out of your backyard, I shouldn't have to smell or hear them when I'm trying to enjoy my time outside.
- As a person raised on a farm, there are certain livestock that would not fit in with urban living (pigs, cows, goats, sheep). The animals behaviors would not fit within the current infrastructure (hosing to close together).
- I believe livestock belongs on a farm, not in a city

- chickens are very stinky.
- It's a city, not a farm.
- People will abuse this privilege and neighbors will be negatively affected
- Farm animals need to have lots of space
- Chickens are for farms
- I already can't get my neighbour to take care of their yard or their keep their dogs from barking so I certainly don't want to have to deal with other animals.
- No
- Barnyard animals do not belong in the city.
- Suitable living conditions needs a clear definition.
- Chickens and their waste stink. Unless you have a very large property where the smell wouldn't travel, no chickens
- Too much more to change & worry about. Keep farm animals on the farm. That is where they are happy & healthy
- Not interested in having this amendment in the city. I do not trust people and their motives with hen ownership, plus additional public funds would be needed to bylaw enforcement to deal with irresponsible livestock ownership in the city limits. absolutely not interested!
- Some will be good but if u live by someone not responsible, it affects your day to day living. Livestock is for the country.
- No, no, no!!! I have a hard enough time with peoples junk and garbage piled around their house as well as the alleys and roadways. I do not want someone to move in with pigs or goats.
- I don't think have other livestock would benefit the city. With more noise complaint from the animals or the livestock escaping. I think it will cause more harm or trouble than good.
- If a person wants livestock they should move outside the city limits. Cleanliness and odor control would be an issue for direct neighbors, especially in areas where properties are only 28-32 feet wide
- Chickens are loud, smelly, messy and a farm animal. LIVESTOCK. If I have to live next to a chicken coop in the city, I am going to call DAILY on noise complaints. They are a nuisance and disgusting. Calgary should not engage in allowing these pest animals into residential areas.
- We don't live on the farm
- As a child I lived next door to a man who kept chickens in the city. He had a rooster and it was a terrible experience as an owner has no control over its behaviour. It was burden on everyone who lived nearby. Chickens are less bothersome than roosters, but you can't train them to be quiet and hey attract predators. Your house cats and dogs in your back yard will die because your neighbour has hens that attracts wild predators who will stalk your neighborhood.
- The city is not for wildlife and do not believe it is good for the animals . You also could cause problems with neighbors who say no to them wanting wildlife. That's not fair. If want chickens and other livestock please move to the country.
- Farm animals do not have a place in an urban environment.
- Farm animals stay in the farm.
- Animal husbandry should be practiced in rural areas only.

- This is a city. Not a farm
- This is a joke right?
- Hens are bad enough, we don't need other livestock.
- The city is no place for livestock. Period.
- I don't believe the community benefit/positive impact is great enough.
- Additional animals will require additional city workers to police and enforce. We need to cut costs not increase the. Yards are small and neighbor issues will increase creating more enforcement issues.
- if people want farm animals they should live on an acreage or farm
- The smells and the messes are not worth it, especially with neighbors who are careless
- Considering the current pandemic I don't think we need closer living relationships with livestock
- We don't need more animals in the city that will be neglected. Our winters are too harsh for people to have chickens without the proper equipment. The little heaters that are available to keep them warm start many fires. I believe that it would increase our fire risks and animal neglect.
- It isn't the animal. It's the humans that are the problem
- [removed]
- I don't want the smell or noise in my neighborhood. If you want chickens move to a farm outside of the city.
- No livestock in city
- Too much noise in an inner city environment. Noise affects all neighbours, not just adjacent.
- Hens should not be allowed in the city. They will not be happy and it will lead to neighbourhood disputes.
- I fear it will attract predators that may attack pets
- I think people will get animals that they may not understand how to care for and the animals will pay the price.
- Livestock does not belong in the city. Why would anyone want for example chickens living next door causing a nuisance.
- This is a city, not rural farm yards. There is enough issues with noisy dog owners, let alone increase the number of complaints about other animals.
- I don't think livestock belong in the city.
- [removed]
- I am on the fence on this topic. I could see having livestock as a great learning opportunity. I have raised livestock from horses to chickens, and they are a lot of work. I could see if this bylaw passed, that a lot of people will buy livestock for the sake of it but not really understand how much work it is.
- Excess smell and noise far exceed the benefit, if you urban setting doesn't fit with your bohemian ideals, please move to the country
- Noise and sanitation issues. As well as safety if animals escape/are poorly penned.
- I don't believe urban hens are necessary at all.
- I don't want the noise that hens would be making throughout the day especially in the early morning/bedtime nor do I want to smell the excrements.

- "Support from adjacent neighbours? What if they move?"
- Also concerns for animal welfare. Chickens I'm ok with (I think) but other livestock seems too much"
- Urban livestock opens it up to not just chickens, but pigs, horses, where does it end?
- I'm worried about noise and smell from livestock. I'm also concerned people who have no idea how to raise livestock will give it a try to the detriment of the community and the livestock themselves...
- I don't think livestock belong in the city
- Don't live on a farm for a reason
- This opens up too many possibilities for people to own animals that don't belong in a city environment. Hens are acceptable, as are pot belly pigs, but opening this up to other livestock is not responsible. If you can't control dog and cat owners, how are you going to reasonably enforce other animals?
- [removed]
- I grew up on a farm. If you allow chickens in peoples property you will attract coyotes, raccoons, dogs ect. Which will lead to many confrontational problems with predatory animals wich defeats the purpose of the past question about feeding wildlife in your yard. You will now have to resort to killing the predators to keep the chickens safe. Build a community livestock facility where people can keep & raise their animals in a safe setting.
- No farm animals in city
- Birds and other fowl should not be within the city.
- I don't want to live next door to chickens so I can't ask someone else to do so
- Too noisy. Hens should be on farms.
- Urban hens are not necessary in urban areas
- Control of livestock differs from pets. Homeowners cannot control nose from chickens, and the city would surely fail at odor control complaints
- no unless the person lives on an acreage or farm. Hens are too loud
- How about we take things one step at a time. Fix the issues we have first before inviting more
- I don't want the noise and smell of livestock next to my home, livestock needs to stay out of city limits
- "If you are interested in livestock, live on a farm.
- Smell, noise are potential issues."
- farm animals belong on farms not in the city
- The noise is a problem and smell if not taken care of
- Livestock should be on a farm. Much like feral cats, pretty soon there will be feral livestock in the neighborhoods. Whose responsibility is that?
- We are a city! If you wish to have hens then live in the country. People tend to slack off with the maintenance of these animals once they get their approval to have them.
- we don't need chickens and other animals in the city we already have a problem with coyotes and lynx . we have lots of little kids playing in our yards and parks that don't need to be under predator's eyes.

- Chickens can add a lot of noise to an area unkept chicken pens can be repulsive. You want chickens to move out of town.
- It would create way too much noise
- So you want to allow hens in Calgary but are trying to muzzle and treat peoples dogs like [removed] because of there breed ?
- They just using them for their eggs. Enslaving them
- I don't believe livestock should be allowed in urban areas in the city.
- If you want livestock, move to a farm.
- Livestock has no place in a residential area
- There need to be more restrictions in place to protect the welfare of the animals and put forward guidelines to ensure they are being raised and cared for properly. People raising animals who do not have appropriate knowledge about an animal's requirements can cause undue stress and harm attempting to raise that animal.
- noise and disease
- Don't want to hear chickens.
- Please no. I do not want my back yard to smell like a farm nor do I want to deal with any increased noise from animals. If we are trying to say - do not feed wild animals - then allowing farm animals will only attack these wild animals. This is counter intuitive. If this is allowed what types of recourse Will neighbors have should the farm life be noisy and interfere with my space in my backyard that I have worked so hard to make relaxing? Will my complaint be taken serious? Should it become too much will the owner of the farm animals be told to remove them? What are the recourses here?
- These types of animals are typically a nuisance.
- people already don't take care of their animals. This just adds more to be neglected and increased workload for police and bylaw.
- City properties are not big enough for livestock.
- Chickens and livestock belong on farms not in the city.
- People will not properly take care of chickens as they will expect them to act as domestic animals (like dogs/cats) and not farm animals.
- "Would you want to live next to the stench of hen poop on a hot day eliminating your ability to have your windows open for fresh air? Would you want your sleep disturbed by constantly clucking hens? Would you be willing to accept that it would have a potentially negative impact on the resale value of your home as a neighbour to hens or other livestock?
- The only exception I'd be ok with is horses provided the property is no less than half an acre and they have proper feed/water and shelter.

- Any other livestock should require an acre or more of land and cannot be housed near the property line."

- Live stock should be kept on farms! I have enough problems with rental property not being looked after and to add something like this to situation would be larger mess! Not enough by law to monitor! Birds are dirty!
- Chickens do not belong in urban areas. They make noise and smell. I would not support one in my neighborhood at all.
- I do not believe there is any place for livestock within the city
- What kind of livestock? Most city properties aren't suitable for animals that require much more space.
- Who needs hens in the city? And houses are way too close for this. I don't even like hearing dogs bark excessively or birds chirping outside my window.
- No reason to have livestock in the city
- Have you ever smelled livestock?
- Suitable living conditions MUST be provided. Just because they CAN doesn't mean they WILL.
- Animals are not food!!!!
- I believe this is a slippery slope. Hens become goats that become cows etc. Also, if the current adjacent neighbours agree, what happens when those neighbours move? Are the existence of these animals required in the real estate descriptions of the house? I would need more information on this change to possibly support it.
- hens are too noisy and do not belong in the city
- if people want livestock, they should live in the country
- Farm animals belong on a farm
- livestock requires space, that can not be done within city limits.
- It only encourages predators (dogs, cats, coyotes, foxes, badgers etc) which is not fair to them. You would be leading the predators to slaughter. Predators are REQUIRED or this city would be infested with rodents and rabbits. Take a look at the skunk population, because skunks have only a few predators. BEFORE making any bylaws regarding animals, City council should have to consult with wildlife experts, Dog Trainers and Veterinarians! Licenses for pets should be free with vaccinations and at least they would be kept up to date! And STOP with the pit bull blame and shame! ALL working/protection/herd dogs can cause major harm..that is what they were bred for!
- People don't need hens as house hold pets.
- The potential for noise, smell and mess can cause conflict. many yards in Calgary are very small and even if one neighbor says okay, what about when they move and another person moves in. There are enough pet choices already where the pet stays inside the home and doesn't affect people that live around them. Want a hen, move outside the city.
- Concerned about noise/smell with other livestock.
- The city of Calgary is not a farm
- Too much noise and smell. We're don't need livestock in the city.
- If you want a farm move out of the city. Are you kidding me? Pushing dogs out bringing chickens in? [removed]

- Enough problems with cats and dogs with irresponsible owners. Livestock belongs in the country. Can't believe this is being considered
- [removed]
- If they want to raise livestock they should move to China where it is legal and encouraged. Heard of swine flu...bird flu...
- This will attract rodents
- more detailed criteria required, amount of land required for the specific animal
- unless you have over 1 acre size yard you shouldn't be allowed chickens/hens/livestock
- Livestock, including hens belong in rural areas outside the city. The only exception to this should be if farmland is annexed by the City and there is livestock on that farm. There should be a grace period to allow for the removal of the livestock.
- I don't think livestock of any kind belong in the city.
- unless you have a limit on how many hens one household can have. the owner would need to provide documentation as why the Hens are needed from a DR.
- [removed]
- According to the City people can't even deal with their dogs and cats. Why would anyone be on board to add to this problem.
- Hens roosters are very loud, and I don't know if these enclosures for them are being inspected to ensure these livestock animals are kept where there supposed to be
- You can't train a hen to be quiet like you can a dog
- Livestock spread disease. Why would we have that as a possibility in an inner city like Calgary. Fact is, some pet owners are ignorant and will not do what is required to keep diseases away.
- I have no desire to live next to an urban farmer.
- You want to essentially introduce BSL (breed specific legislation) to wards pit bulls but want to allow people to have chickens. NO!
- Live stock does not belong in a city environment. It increases noise pollution and smells. It also invites the likes of additional coyotes and other predators. Which raises more concerns for city staff and citizens alike.
- People will take advantage of it. If people want livestock, they can move to a farm.
- Livestock is dirty and noisy. I do not want it in my neighborhood
- we are in a city if people want livestock they should move to the country
- Urban hens do not sound like my idea of a good time.
- I do not want to live beside chickens/hens or any other livestock I'd go live in the country if I did
- With all the different kinds of disease these chickens carry they should be kept on a farm where it's manageable.
- Cheif bylaw is usually someone with kittle to no experience
- people who claim they need hens for food (eggs) due to low income are not transparent. It costs less for eggs than to properly maintain a hen. People will push boundaries and urban wildlife wont end at hens. This is a very slippery slope and a horrible idea. why not designate green spaces in neighborhoods for hens to be kept communally instead.

- Live stock can be smelly and noisy and I don't feel that all people would be responsible with the care and cleaning. Please keep this to outside city limits
- Hens in residential would attract wild animals more... Common sense.
- Livestock would likely be difficult to train regarding noise levels at certain times. They should also have large living spaces which calgary does not necessarily afford.
- Will be loud and stink
- If someone wants farm animals move to the country, this opens up a whole level of bylaw we havent thought of. Community centres could offer a hen houses that it shares like a community garden thus many people ensure its success verse one person unable to control or loses interest. Causing what was a good plan now a bad neighbour.
- [removed]
- Noise, smell
- the City has enough trouble enforcing by-laws currently on the books including the fines in #9
- this is not farm land, I would not want hens living beside me in an urban setting.
- Livestock belong on a farm not in the city.
- Isn't there enough cruelty to animals we have (and poop) !!! You want livestock, don't live in a City.
- Don't need chickens running free in the city
- Noise mostly
- Noise
- If people what livestock, they should move to an rural community.
- [removed]
- To many people out there would not give the animals proper pens.
- There is no need to have larger animals like goats, cows, pigs etc. to be kept in an urban environment. It's not fair to confine the animals to small spaces or create the nuisance for your neighbours.
- who would need a urban hen? Why would someone need to have a chicken in their home.
- Livestock has no place in the city
- Urban farming not appropriate for animals.. It's best kept an out of city activity, and there isn't any NEED for in city farming
- Animal living areas can smell if they aren't cleaned on a regular basis
- [removed]
- I grew up with neighbors who had chickens, they were extremely loud in the early mornings
- I do not want to hear chickens or livestock first thing in the morning. Let alone the fact people don't pick up after their pets as it is. There is a reason even acreage developments don;t allow livestock. Think of what the run off is going to do to our waterways in the spring.
- I would not want to live next to livestock, most city lots are too small for "livestock" to be kept properly.

- A city is not a farm and neighbours should not have to listen to or smell livestock or chickens
- Chickens are disgusting and shouldn't be kept in urban communities. If you want farm animals go by a property on the edge of city or farm.
- I think it would create noise
- To vague to support a yes answer
- We are a city not a small town with super large yards
- No farm animals in urban areas
- there is no place for livestock within city limits. How could the city possibly enforce the rules in the absence of public help.
- I don't feel the city is any place for hens or wildlife. If people want to own those pets, they should move out of the city, where the animals will have a better chance for a good life.
- C
- People will abuse this allowance to livestock
- Suburban houses are very close together. Chicken coops smell!
- Livestock can not be properly cared for in the city.
- You're having a hard enough time regulating pets. Livestock won't be properly regulated.
- any kind of live stock should be in the country. as the lot size in calgary is to small for this. I do not want to have the smell around my house or the noise that could come with it.
- Your plot in city limits is not a farm.
- Backyard are not enough in the city
- Smell, noise, nuisance for neighbours!
- Chickens are dirty and noisy.
- Attract coyotes and skunks
- hens belong on a farm.
- People should NOT have sheep and goats in their city backyard. This is a recipe for disaster. You will have people butchering and hanging animals for their neighbors to see. The city has a hard time with managing roaming cats and dogs, how will they handle it if someones sheep or goats got out? If people want livestock they should not live in an urban setting. Chickens are one thing but even too many of those and you get foxes, weasels, birds or prey and a pest problem if people don't keep their chicken space clean. People need to be responsible and when they get too many animals in a space they tend to get overwhelmed or used to the smell.
- It would devalue surrounding properties
- It opens a can of worms
- "No. I chose to not have live stock and do not want to be around it. I would have no say if my neighbours chose to have hens. We are already living so close in small lots next to each other. I would be very upset.
- This would also cost money for the city to set up and then later enforce."
- Not unless the bylaw specifies that Roosters are not to be kept within the city.

- I am simply not confident majority of people in a city dwelling could or would provide adequate care to livestock animals. There still exists issues with in humane living conditions for domesticated animals/pets which need addressing.
- lived next to a chicken pilot program and the noise and smell is not for the city.
- They smell and people will not take care of them properly even if there are standards.
- Don't know much about live stock
- They dont belong in the city. People are too mean and irresponsible.
- Chickens belong in the country. You allow chickens in the city the same thing will happen as what has happened with domestic rabbits.
- Don't want the noise and smell
- Neighbour support would be tough to apply - if they move or change minds then you would have to get rid of your hens
- I wouldn't want chickens in a suburban area
- Any larger animals produce excess noise and waste. If we wanted to live in a rural area we would move to one.
- They attract rodents. They're a nuisance to the community.
- We have enough trouble trying to enforce people to keep their properties tidy and organized and now you want to bring livestock in to the mix? No
- I don't think livestock belongs in a city setting with population density so high. It would be impossible to avoid noise and smell complaints on a constant basis
- Chickens are smelly, dirty, plague rats. Way too many people dont clean up after thier chickens
- I think that an additional criteria should be that the chickens or pens be placed where noise and smell aren't issues. I have a recreational home where the neighbors have chickens and it certainly wrecks the serenity of a beautiful morning. The cackling also drowns out the songs of other birds, particularly if there is a rooster. This is a change in my initial support of urban chickens after my experience in my cabin property.
- Chickens or hens stink, in the height of summer, smells can become unbearable. Hen attract other animals and likely to (despite the climate) attract more rodents too.
- Having more animals at home could increase the chances on zoonotic diseases that could impact our health care system.
- I love the idea of urban farming bit do not trust my neighbours to run a clean operation.
- Look at what happened when people let their unwanted rabbits out. Introducing domestic livestock into the habitat of wild animals can upset the ecosystem. In addition released domestic animals are easy prey that attract more wild urban predators.
- Not appropriate in a city
- Hens are one thing, I don't think farm animals are necessary in the city. Hens will draw predators.
- Livestock do not belong in the city
- It just doesn't seem to mesh well with a city that has coyotes and roaming cats etc

- I don't believe livestock (including chickens) should be allowed within city limits. I grew up on a farm and can tell you that even with proper care they stink!
- Most lots are too small. Hens or other livestock would cause noise and Odor from an irresponsible owner. I could support if the fines for noncompliance were very high.
- They stink
- This is a city, not a farm / green space where those kinds of animals belong. I worry they would be too noisy and too much pet waste. Most houses are too close together!!!!
- We don't live on a farm if i wanted to live on a farm I would move to a farm
- We are a city of over 1 M, not a farming / ranching area
- They're living beings and not just decoration for the city.
- I don't want livestock living next door to me.
- when there are issues with regular house pets there is very little bylaw will do, widening the scope further complicates things.
- Potential for abusive living conditions due to lack of education, finances and preparedness of the individuals attempting to raise livestock as a hobby. Also likelihood of a lack of adequate city resources to properly monitor the animals for cruelty concerns.
- I don't believe livestock should be allowed in the city where large groups of people are exposed to farm animals and mix of animals more likely that carry disease. Think COVID
- Livestock belongs on a farm, not in the city.
- Move out of the city if you want farM animals. Case by case approval is timely and expensive
- Farm animals are difficult to predict and not trained/socialized like other pets. Should not be allowed in urban settinf
- too much possibility of abuse of the chickens
- Allergic
- No body wants to wake up everyday like they live on a farm @ 4am to Cock a doodle doooo in a Urban area. Chances are many of the residents there work in the city
- Most people already have a hard time cleaning up after their animals, most live stock are much larger than chickens. So no, people want live stock they should live in the country.
- Who wants a smelly chicken coop living right next door to them?
- Smells, noise , not professionals .
- I do not waht chickens and other livestock in the city limits. They are loud and few clean up after them fully so it smells and is potentially unsafe
- I live in a city, not a farm. There are lots of choices for people who want to own livestock.
- Lived next door to chickens in Killarney - the noise and the smell was horrific
- This is unnecessary in a city setting
- The smell. It's too much. I would love to have egg laying hens in my yard but I would never do that in the city. I feel that anyone who really wants hens or other livestock can choose to move to a property outside urban/suburban areas. Fresh eggs are available in plenty of places, there is no need for this in the city.

- Once you start its to hard to go back.
- I wouldn't want the noise or smell of other livestock beside me.
- I think any kind of livestock should be in a rural setting(acreage). Not in any inner city or suburb.
- It's called a farm, go live on one and have all the animals you want. Neighbours are bad enough without hens or other livestock. Ridiculous.
- I wouldn't be living in the city if I wanted to be near farm animals.
- I don't support people having animals as live stock to benefit from them. Animals are here with us not for us.
- I would support a bylaw to allow other types of animals, but only if a strict approval process was in place, which included immediate action on any complaints by neighbours. This includes having the privilege revoked. My experience with this city shows that it lacks any consideration for neighbours or neighbourhoods, and will not act to remove a problem; thus I would likely not support a bylaw amendment.
- Noisy, smelly, loud and can spread disease. Do we need to add another thing that's gonna need monitoring and money.
- Concerned about increased predators, noise, smell and how waste will be managed
- Could see potential problems when it comes to this, especially with neighbours.
- As a vet student, I have learned that backyard hens is an excellent way to spread disease amongst chickens and some of those disease being able to spread to humans is a major problem
- You think dogs are nuisances? Haha.
- I would be concerned with an increase in wildlife such as coyotes and other predators who may seek out hens. Increased predators is a safety rush to the predator as well-they could hurt or killed unnecessarily.
- Concerns of noise, odour from livestock animals
- If you are eliminating a dog breed because it is a nuisance, why invite livestock.
- I think it should be more than just the Chief Bylaw to make the decision. They may not be very knowledgeable about the animal that the request is about and either refuse or accept without properly educating themselves
- Please keep the livestock on the farm / ranch where they belong and not in the city.
- I don't think it's necessary. If people want that they should move outside the city.
- Keep chickens in the country
- I am concerned there will not be enough checks on animal welfare, concerns with excess noise and smells.
- Will lead to a worse feral cat problem and potentially bring wildlife into city limits. Not to mention the smell.
- Livestock do not belong in the city, they belong on large acreages or farms where they are able to freely and healthily roam, without and unnecessary noise or disturbance.
- I hate birds. Waking u up. No way. I was in Jamaica and they had chickens. Worst ever! If I wanted to live in a farm - oh yeah I don't hats why I live in a city. Move out of the city of u want a farm

- They are noisy, smell and a nuisance.
- Keep the farm animals on the farm where they belong.
- It's a city not a farm
- Bylaw officials have too little information on the laws or appropriate training to be arbiters. With a strong possibility of biased judgements or owner behaviour that would be detrimental to the livestock in question to avoid inspection/officials involvement.
- Why would you restrict pit bulls but allow hens to live in Calgary
- Livestock of any kind including hens do not belong in cities. If someone wishes to own livestock there are plenty of rural communities that allow this.
- On an acreage go to town. I do not want to live beside a hen house. Duh.
- A person can't control smells or noises of livestock animals
- Depends on the livestock being considered
- Insufficient access to veterinary care for livestock in an urban setting
- Cause we don't need more ridiculous laws and restrictions on our lives
- Livestock don't belong in a city, it's stressful for the animals
- "I don't want farm animals in my
- Community."
- See no reason for this
- That's what farms are for
- In my area we already have a large amount of animal feces left and strong odors, really do not need more
- Yards should be big enough, lots in calgary are not
- It will stink up every neighborhood
- It could get out of hand
- What if you move to a house that has hens or other live sock that was previously approved and you have no choice. These animals do not belong in an urban setting. I would be very angry if any of my neighbours in ear shot got hens.
- I love chickens and birds but not in my neighbors back yard. If you want live stock, move out of the city. Also what will you do if there is an outbreak of Avian Influenza in the wild bird population? Make all people with chickens euthanize their birds?
- If this passed more rescues would be needed to help hens and other livestock. There are enough stray, abandoned and abused dogs and cats I can only imagine what would happen if hens abd other animals were allowed.
- Standards of living, containment and community upkeep would be very difficult to patrol
- I think it will cause more friction given people working from home.
- Discretion of the Chief Bylaw enforcement officer. So leave it up to one person? Nah. Rife with problems.
- I don't think chickens have a place in an urban setting. I worry about their living conditions and people taking advantage.

- Live on a farm if you want to have a farm.
- Livestock (of a size larger than hens) are intended for large open spaces, not City backyards.
- Hens are very loud, dirty and smelly and should be prohibited within the city limits. They are more disturbing to the peace of a neighborhood than a barking dog.
- I do not support house owners having hens in their yards.
- Don't agree with Urban farm animals.
- We do NOT need stinking chickens in the city. People cannot look after dogs and cats never mind chickens.
- Other livestock could include cows, pigs, horses, etc. not all animals are meant to be in the city.
- Livestock does not belong in city. Chickens fine, nothing madger
- [removed]
- I think livestock has a place and should be with people who want them. Alternatively, I also think that people don't move to suburban areas to have livestock as neighbours. Furthermore, should this bylaw go through, I don't think people with hens or other livestock should have to provide benefits to their neighbours as part of the bylaw but because they want to. It's not a job they're applying for it's a lifestyle choice.
- You do you. Just don't have a farm on your urban property. I don't need to be woken up but 65 farm animals every morning.
- Hens should stay on farms
- I don't think it's in Calgarians best interest to allow other livestock in the city, nor is it in the best interest of animals. The only way this could be remotely feasible is if there is a minimum land size requirement.
- I live in a city and not a farm for a reason. I would prefer to not hear or smell livestock at my residence. I would agree if there was a provision that your property had to be larger than the typical small city lots in newer developments.
- I wouldn't enjoy a chicken coupe as a neighbour
- There is no way to enforce noise issues with livestock
- From this description, it is not clear exactly what I would be supporting.
- Livestock tends to carry diseases. Also "adjacent" neighbours may not be sufficient. In communities with zero lot line or reduced distances between homes the noise, disease and smell could impact more distanced neighbors.
- Too many allergens
- The type of livestock should be clearly laid out...would love to have a horse in backyard but obviously not feasible.
- These types of animals are not for suburban areas! You want to raise animals like this buy a farm
- Farm animals belong on the farm
- [removed]
- People are ignorant as to farm animal care and need to move to the country if they want chickens, goats, sheep etc.

- Livestock belong on a farm not the city.
- Maybe. How are you going to measure community benefit? How do deal with neighbors that will never be satisfied? What will define suitable living conditions?
- I don't believe within the city properties have adequate space for other livestock.
- "I would like to raise chickens, however, there are many issues with animal husbandry that must be mandated - the animals must not be raised for slaughter. The property must be of a significant size to accommodate chickens. Some livestock should not be in an urban setting - goats, sheep, pigs because of the potential contamination from feces. Noise, smell and the inexperience of urban ""farmers"". Would there be an increase in the number of bylaw officers?
- I do support bee hives - this is a vital contribution to the world."
- This will be difficult and costly to enforce and can become major annoyance for neighbours.
- They are loud, and the smell is disgusting.
- Hens should be on farms not cities
- bylaw can never be fair to all persons considering different venues and different neighbours. A goat may be condoned on one street, and not another, because of bias, and this would not be fair.
- Noise issue. Nothing is being done with dogs barking constantly in our neighborhood so I can't imagine anything would be done to enforce noise of hens if that arose.
- Loud, can't be trained
- Livestock belongs in the country, not the city
- They are loud and disruptive not to mention the smell if not cared for properly
- "Increased risk of zoonotic disease between poultry and humans.
- Requires advanced husbandry that many owners cannot provided in their back yard."
- get a farm.
- Not sure what this would look like
- [removed]
- Have you ever seen a chicken coop! You want to muzzle a dog, but think it's okay to have a shit factory, in your neighbours backyard.
- I have lived around chickens in a rural area and do not want to live near them in a city. I do not want to be in a position where I have to say no to a neighbour request to have chickens either.
- What training/skills does this " Bylaw enforcement officer " hold to give an educated decision?
- Too many variables and too many people would abuse the system or not follow the rules.
- You aren't trustworthy
- houses are too close together for livestock
- My concern is that people will not take adequate care of the livestock.
- We are not a farm
- Chickens would be kept outdoors and as such can pose issues such as noise and odor for neighbours
- Livestock should not be allowed in the city
- Dogs and cats only please in the city. NO chickens!

- [removed]
- Chickens do not belong in someone's back yard.... that would be like putting a lion in a pig pen.
- Keeping livestock in any situation is wrong. They are not meant to be cooped up in houses and back yards.
- I am a livestock veterinarian. Urban residents are not equipped to deal with livestock. They usually require a significant amount of space and come with other challenges such as noise/odour/special feeding and care requirements/etc.
- Livestock are meant for the country
- Hens are farm animals not city pets
- they are noisy and they stink! absolutely not on small city lots in close proximity to neighbors. Have any of you ever lived in rural Alberta like I have? If so, you would never ask such a dumb question!
- While inside animals can be controlled for the noise they make, livestock of any sort cannot. That along with the smells when the only way to keep houses cool in summer is with open windows, I don't think it's fair to neighbours. As it is, pot and campfire smoke is bad enough when it fills the house from neighbours.
- If you want to own livestock, you are free to leave the city. I don't see why livestock is needed by anyone within the city.
- Livestock should be in the country. It is unfair to have livestock animals in the city especially since most yards are small.
- I can't see how any livestock outside of a chicken can be ethically kept in the city given species requirements for animal welfare. This makes it too easy for animals to be abused.
- I see too many risks of zoonosis here, these animals probably won't be getting the vaccines and herd health management that farms can provide, and this will increase animal and human health risks
- Need specific guidelines for adequate living conditions and should be explicit for different species
- Where some properties can accompany livestock most can not. It also requires there a standard to be for every type of animal all of which people will dispute over and over if they don't get their way. This costs the city money and I do not want my taxes to be wasted because someone wants livestock for any reason. There are more than enough domestic animals suitable for the city.
- We already allow chickens for people who are sad... Why not let the city turn in to a zoo.
- If you are going to pass multiple by-laws about pitbull breeds, or dogs who are "nuisances", it is questionable to introduce more livestock that could also be considered a nuisance. Even if neighbors initially agree to it, what happens once these animals become a "nuisance"? This is incredibly unbalanced and biased.
- Neighbor's barking dogs and roaming cats are bad enough and current process for dealing with such issues is ineffective. Don't want noisy chickens.
- City is not a place for birds. That's where farms come in.
- They are loud, dirty and if you want them, live outside of the city. Not in the city where it could be temptation to wildlife or neighbours' pets to get at.

- Hens and other farm animals belong in a farm. Hens in the city will bring in predators resulting in more calls, more $$ for bylaw.
- I understand there are some people who wish to pretend they are living in the country while they live in an urban setting. But it simply isn't reasonable to allow livestock, and the issues which come with them, into an urban setting, with the density which we currently have (and hope to increase). While slippery slope arguments seldom seem compelling, they have a great deal of merit in real life. Once hens are allowed, it is only a matter of time before other animals are included. A bright line test is enough. No emotional support lammas in the City.
- Noise and fecal matter smells
- noise and smell problems
- If animals are raised as livestock, aka for consumption, the treatment, wellness and slaughter of the animal cannot be properly monitored by authorities/animal wellness groups.
- It's a city, not a farm.
- "I feel that e
- too many people would abuse this situation - noise of hens, other livestock, smell of feces/waste and failure to cleanup, etc. Enough people let their cats roam and crap in neighbour's yards and leave dog feces on sidewalks, lawns and alleys that I don't trust others to follow rules for livestock in the city."
- I don't believe that the average person has the appropriate knowledge to properly care for "livestock" animals.
- There are too many ignorant animal owners with no respect for their neighbours or the animals they keep. Urban yards are not suitable for housing livestock. Livestock will attract mice and various predators to the city as well. People wanting livestock should live on an acreage.
- Livestock do not belong in city communities
- No chickens
- Unless they are used for support animals
- Live stock belong on farms
- There is no way to ensure people will actually provide good care for their livestock, proper management of animal feces so it doesn't run off or seep into the neighbouring properties, that the animals will survive the winter.... just multiple issues and they're not enough city employees to check every single household that would have livestock.
- farm animals belong on the farm
- livestock belong on farms/ranches.. not in my neighbours yard
- I wouldn't want to hear chickens or roosters in my neighbours yards. The sounds would be a nuisance. If they want livestock, they can move out of urban areas.
- I have concerns regarding the animals welfare.
- Hens could be allowed as long as they don't disturb the neighbours. I fear that people will have to many, stink up a neighborhood, and they'll be too loud, if there's a rooster involved. People have a hard time looking after their dogs and cats already. I'd be open to the idea of the animals are not a nuisance, yards are kept clean and coops are tasteful and clean. I fear they will be sorry, full of feces like their back yards are now with dog feces.

- Nuisances and neglect would occur. Farm animals should stay on an acreage or farm.
- they stink
- People can't even look after their own dogs and cats; throwing live stock into the mixture is asking for increase in city resources.
- [removed]
- People will not care for them properly. They should just buy eggs from a farmer.
- Keep livestock in the rural areas
- Way too much potential for abuse. Is the City going to regularly inspect the housing conditions of these animals? I think not. This is a terrible idea.
- No. I believe it will lead to people abusing their privileges. I chose to live in a city, not on a farm. I don't want ANY farm animals near my property. I don't want to see, smell, or hear them. Also, won't chickens attract coyotes?
- hens are very smelly make alot of noise and require more care then people realize this is a horrible idea
- I'm sure whomever would be raising these animals would be eating them and butchering them at there home and dont think it's safe, sanitary etc. NO NO NO and they wont clean up after them
- I have little faith that the city would be able to properly regulate hens being in urban settings. I might consider supporting this if there are standards like only places with fenced yards may obtain hens and anyone wishing to obtain hens would have to recieve a license aswell as I do not believe neighbours should be subject to the nuisance of hens so the person wishing to obtain hens would also have to gain permission from their community to obtain hens.
- If they are going to be allowing chickens in the city you are inviting diseases into the city limits. That's why theres farms and farm areas. If you're allowing chickens and other livestock, which being bacteria and disease to close proximity, leave the pitbulls and bully breeds alone.
- I think the only way someone should be allowed to have livestock including urban hens is if they receive approval from surrounding neighbours. I personally would not want my neighbours to have livestock.
- Livestock within the city limits is likely to be a nuisance due to smell and also noise
- This is a city not a farm yard.
- Half the time by law doesn't do anything about dogs being outside in all weather conditions with just a dog house. Stating it's "suitable"
- Nothing about the cleanliness and proper disposal of the fecal matter has been listed. Hygiene is an important factor to be made aware of.
- No
- Good job taking care of livestock
- No
- Hens can be very noisy.
- Too many issues caring for birds

- Chickens stink. I would never want an urban coop anywhere near my house. Gross.
- I dont know the current by law.
- Concern over the smell and mess caused by livestock and people too lazy to clean up the mess.
- This can be abused. Restrictions on numbers needs to be enforced
- Having animals in the backyard is not appealing to very many neighbours. What happens when some neighbours agree and others don't? Then there will be fights between them and we all know how that turns out.
- No
- This increases the work of bylaw officers and there aren't enough as it stands. Also, the ownership of an animal is a huge responsibility. People need to follow strict rules and it is very hard for people to make sure they can do this. Furthermore, owning animals like chickens can be a nuisance, dirty, and loud. With many newer neighbourhoods with very small yards and houses closer together, I am not in favour of hearing chickens cluck all day and night while I'm in my yard.
- hens are for farms not cities
- the country is for livestock.
- This question does not provide enough information to make a decision.
- Bring in more farm animals this will draw in coyotes and such.
- Livestock do not belong in a city
- I dont believe any livestock should be allowed in the city.
- I am not sufficiently knowledgable about livestock for a reasonable answer. Main concerns would be noise, unpleasant odours and risk of disease which should be addressed.
- Farm animals do not belong in the city.....noise....smell....
- If you want to get rid of pitbulls but allow hens, yall have something wrong woth your heads!
- Livestock belongs on farms not in the city
- I dint think livestock have a place in the city
- The urban areas of Calgary are no place for live stock leave it to acreages. I don't want foul smells from man urban farm entering my home and yard. And I certainly do not want to be woken everyday from a crowing rooster
- I would not want to be the neighbor where live stock is next door. It's smelly and should be kept on farms.
- Live stock deserve to have space and don't deserve to be Stuck in a city
- .
- Livestock do not belong in the city.
- you have lots of land surrounding your city, so there is no need for farm animals in the city
- Unless the public wasn't able to access them.
- People can't take care of the dogs and cats that they have. How would they take care of other livestock?
- This makes no sense.

- Chickens stink. I know people say they keep them clean but they don't. Behind my moms house a big bag of chicken shit was found behind her house. Want chickens move out of this communist city
- Hens and other livestock attract rats. It is not possible for the average person to keep a pen clean enough not to smell.
- Just because suitable living conditions can be provided for the animal doesn't mean that it will stay that way, leading to smells and unsightly enclosures. Also hens and livestock can draw more predators into the city limits and dwelling areas
- N/a
- Smells and messes. Already enough problems with other animals roaming around such as pigeons and cats.
- Hens should be for average properties, not cities
- Houses in the city are too close together to allow for livestock. Hen houses are loud. Livestock bring the smell of manure and are an eyesore in an urban setting.
- Can't keep communities clean already.
- "I feel there are too many domestic animal owners that do not adhere to the animal bylaws so I do not feel that there would be any difference with livestock.
- I also think this would be a potential to attract more coyotes and skunks etc., to neighborhoods"
- Chickens stink and are loud. I would never be willing to live next to one.
- If someone wants farm animals, they should move out of the city. I think it will cause more of a problem for neighbourhoods. Noise, smell, potential of animals becoming loose and damage to people's property
- It's an urban area. Livestock belong on farms, period. Smell, noise, mess will affect too many people. Way too long a process to get the problem resolved. Lots are small, houses too close together. Also what happens when animal is old or when stops laying?
- Farm animals are loud, dirty and need space. No place for them in the city.
- This can have many undesired effects such as land value degradation, noise issues for further than adjacent neighbours and likely other items not listed
- Livestock should not be living within the city limits. If you want a farm move to the country
- We have enough noise in our neighbourhood with dogs barking incessantly and kids screaming.
- Do not believe hens can be kept within city limits without causing a nuisance to others.
- There is no scenario would I ever enjoy living beside an urban dwelling with live hens. This is mainly from a noise and smell standpoint. The smell is absolutely atrocious.
- Having hens in the city is not acceptable. There are enough people abusing the animals we are allowed to have now.
- Hens require land, space, pens, and constant attention. They will also attract predatory animals to the city.
- Livestock does not belong in town. Having grown up on a farm, it is not fair to the animal, nor should neighbors have to deal with the noise or the smell.
- I don't want chickens in the city.

- Livestock should not be allowed in the city under any circumstances.
- Don't need chickens in city
- Chickens are dirty and gross
- keep the chickens outside of city limits please
- Calgary lots are small therefore livestock would create a stink/smell, increase bugs and predators. Not safe for households. Perhaps a communal livestock location away from houses.
- They are a disturbance when outside of the house. If they are a service animal, then they need to be inside with the owner.
- Hens ok other livestock no.
- This is an urban area not farmland.
- Livestock should not live within city limits...
- Livestock does not belong in the city. Period. I grew up on a farm, and I know the smells that come with this.
- Not everyone is a responsible pet owner which ruins it for the ones that are hens can be a great addition to a community but are also dirty and a health hazard if not cared for properly
- They stink and the noise
- It's too costly to enforce. Too many would be careless.
- This has the potential to get out of control. Livestock have certain requirements that living in a city can not provide.
- We have enough noise in the City already.
- Noise and smell. Your neighbours can change so if they move and new neighbours don't support it what can be done. Affects resale of property adjacent to.
- Keeping chickens for eggs yes. Keeping chickens for slaughter in my neighborhood, absolutely not. Butchery in unprofessional settings breeds diseases, and we already have coyote and fox problems, we don't need to feed them hearty meals.
- Hens could disturb a lot of neighbours in the community. What happens to the hens if living conditions are no longer feasible? Neighbours have enough. Also, with hens comes the attraction of scavengers...foxes, badgers, even neighbourhood dogs and cats that it's in their nature to chase/attack hens. Not not considering hens, but I think they'd only be feasible on acreages, nothing goods Going to come from hens raised in cramped neighborhoods within limits of city.
- My concern is that there wouldn't be enough city bylaw support for inspections, permits and complaints to be handled in an efficient manner.
- The spread of disease is of the utmost importance, especially with Covid-19 and the Pandemic. With the growing population of the City of Calgary and the already overworked Bylaw officers, we do not feel that "farm animals" are a good fit for Urban living. Complaints may take a long time to be addressed and health and smell concerns may already be causing a problem.
- if you want livestock then move to a farm. These animals can be noisy.
- Not necessary
- There's enough animal overpopulation in the world

- what other live stock could reside in the city?
- It puts neighbors in a difficult position if they have to object, unless they can do so anonymously.
- Chickens stink and should stay on farms
- Livestock are expensive, loud, messy, and unhygienic. They should not be allowed near residences. Asking for adjacent neighbour support will put social pressure on members who may state support when they are actually against having livestock.
- If you do that soon with the amount of houses being built there won't be any "feasible" Place for them
- K seriously u want to get rid of mans best friend because of their "breed" and bring in birds..... what in the hell is wrong with this world
- Most newer yards are small and very close to neighbouring homes. You want livestock move to a rural setting! Doesn't matter if it's for eggs etc. I'd love a cow for milk and cheese but it's not appropriate. So no to the chickens etc!
- Yards are small, too many smells, attracts too much wildlife, messy
- You need to be specific as to what animals are allowed
- I would not want to live next door to any livestock
- There should be a requirement for the size of a property to properly care for these animals as lots sizes in Calgary cannot accommodate livestock
- Livestock does not belong in the city! Would ruin neighborhoods and relationships between neighbors.
- Livestock should remain on farms not in the city
- Urban properties are too close to support this kind of thing.
- Given we don't know all the details about how Covid19 originated, it is speculated that farming within the city was the factor in having the virus jump to humans. Livestock should be kept on farms for this reason and others (noise, smell, sanitation)
- Too many infractions would occur such as dirty, smelly pens and cages etc.
- "I'm not interested in living next door to chickens, or other livestock.
- Noise and smell would be my concern. Preventing me from enjoying my backyard."
- No farm animals should be allowed in the city. Move to a rural area if you want to keep farm animals.
- I have been around hens and the odour can be offensive.
- Chickens stink and are noisy need to be on a rural property, not in communities where neighbours are close.
- Noise, cleanliness and smell. People have a hard time picking up after dogs, I don't believe people will responsibly clean up after chickens with frequency required.
- There is a reason why we don't allow Elephants in an Urban setting. Same should be true for Livestock. PEOPLE are unpredictable
- Homes are built too close together to allow for hens
- n/a

- There's pigeon farms already in peoples back yards in the north east. This poses the same or higher threat to the local environmental health
- Increase in vermin, sadly although province likes to consider itself Rat free this is no longer the case.
- let people live
- "Turning Calgary into a 3rd world country?
- Where have all the founding father's good clean living standards gone?
- Most of the city has become urban high density ghetto.
- Hope someone will stop all these endless spending and madness going on at city council."
- Livestock in the city?! Sooo many more diseases will come.
- Livestock require more care than cats and dogs. They are also loud and potentially quite smelly. It would be a nuisance to the neighbour hood if a chicken coop or pig pen was in somebody's back yard
- Farm animals do not belong in the city.
- Hens should not be in a city. There are too many predators. (cats, dogs,etc) and it wouldn't be fair for any neighbors having to deal with the esrly morning noise and the smell.
- Too many variables and our yards aren't big enough.
- Most of these animals need more space to live in e.g. farms
- Urban hens present a disease risk through avian influenza
- The city is not the correct environment to raise chickens. This would open the door to the hens being abused and un-cared for.
- Keep the livestock at the farms
- Attract predators to area that maypose risk to household pets
- Not within the city limits.
- livestock belong on a farm or rural setting.
- Livestock should not be allowed in city limits unless as an emotional service animal. There are too many risks as well as disease and I think that people, as a whole, will not consider their neighbors before they consider themselves.
- I do not believe livestock/farm animals should reside in a city. I don't feel that they can be properly cared for and sanitary conditions maintained in a urban environment.
- Urban environment is not an appropriate place for livestock and will disturb the urban quality of living by creating smells and noises.
- Until you take the BSL legislation off the table there is no support to bring any other animals and problems into city limits.
- Don't want the noise and smell. We are building more densely which could make it worse
- Creation of new bylaws for every scenario will create a pharisaical society
- They cause damage.
- Huge potential for disease/ odour if not properly handled
- Nuisance will be occur even though responsible owners.
- The city is not a farm. We already have covid we don't need a bird/swine flu due to unclean cages.

- Its ridiculous that the alberta government thinks its a good idea to let hens roam around the city. Hens and chickwns are not nice animals.
- Too many people will not provide safe living and it will be a nightmare to police this. If people want to raise hens, they can live outside the city.
- Have livestock in city limits is a bad idea. How is the animal was supposed to be dealt with? Bylaw enforcement will never be able to deal the additional issues let alone there current scope of work.
- I don't want to be exposed to the smell or noise from these animals. Plus it makes the yard look messy and can decrease propert value
- I am concerned that animals won't have proper living conditions in an urban environment
- Bylaw enforcement would be difficult. Chicken coops are extremely dirty
- These animals smell worse than cattle. If I would want this I'd move out of City
- Roosters make too much early morning noise.
- Most home sin the Calgary area would not have sufficient space for livestock, this will increase calls for service regarding untidy properties, noise ect ect ect
- Concerned about noise.
- I would not want to live next door to a neighbor who kept hens. Hen enclosures are noisy and smelly.
- Some people might be responsible in this regard but I can imagine many who would not maintain their properties well and neighborhood problems such as unpleasant odors and unsightly property could arise. Things do not always work out as planned and can get out of hand.
- You should really have a "maybe" answer that allows people to consider an amendment based on conditions the City would impose. You're forcing people to agree or disagree, which is bad form in a survey.
- Worried about the noise and the smell from neighbors that may want hens.
- This to me is opening up a "can of worms". We have enough problems with no bylaws for the number of animals you can have in one house hold, what about the smell from the hens and other livestock when the owner is not probably taking care of them.
- Livestock should be kept on farms, not in cities.
- "If I don't need permission from my neighbours to get a pet, why should I need permission to get a chicken/bird?"
- I think that clause should be removed and there should be a limit on the number of chickens, prohibition on roosters, and mandatory chicken owner classes"
- I don't want to wake up to the sound of a rooster crowing
- Live on a farm for animal producing food.
- Livestock belong on the farm not in a city backyard
- Livestock has no place in the city. Most livestock are herd animals and should not be kept on their own. I think this will result in more abandoned and abused animals once people realize how much work and the responsibility involved in keeping livestock
- I could see lots of problems with cold weather and people not providing good enough shelter during the cold months

- "Noise and smell
- Attracting other wildlife"
- Livestock of any kind does not belong in a city
- Having livestock in the city could damage property that could go up for resell.
- Livestock does not belong in the city and the majority of yards in the city are not large enough to provide the environment they require.
- If people want livestock, they should live in the country. There is no room/need to livestock in a big city.
- Urban hens are not necessary. Takes away from animals natural environment.
- Will be a big problem in high density areas.
- "City yards were not designed for keeping livestock, including chickens. Houses are too close together and, now houses are larger, the yards are getting smaller.
- Perhaps an option would be green spaces for to be used just for community gardens and small livestock."
- Should be based on case for case . Most cases it's a matter of ownership training
- Urban dwellings are not an appropriate place for livestock such as hens and goats etc. These animals need more rural settings and space for a decent quality of life not a city backyard.
- People always start with good intentions, but then life happens and things get neglected and it becomes an eyesore or a neighbourhood problem. If you want farm animals move to a farm.
- People already neglect domestic animals, this just opens up opportunities for more neglect, plus many city vets aren't knowledgeable about livestock
- These kind of animals belong outside city limits.
- Wuhan
- It is not clear what other livestock are to be considered
- livestock do not belong in the city. Most city dwellers do not have the education to properly care for these animals. Farm animals belong on the farm.
- I can't imagine being the neighbor of this. It should be a vote of your neighbors and if they don't want it then they should not be allowed. Just like having a business in a residential area.
- There is no need to have livestock in an urban setting
- People are already slob and don't look after their yards. Garbage is not picked up frequently enough to manage the garbage and stench that would come from this venture. They belong on the farm not in city residential properties.
- I do not support Hens in urban settings.
- Urban hens seem like it will only increase the amount of attacks by people's dogs or cats, as we have already seen that humans don't understand animals prey drives, this would only increase bad things.
- Noise/smell. As an adjacent neighbor I would never agree.
- there will be impact on noise, smell, predators, butts, insects from dejects and other consequences that I prefer not having to deal with it.

- Go live on a farm!
- I believe the negative impact to surrounding residents, including reasonable enjoyment of their property, would outweigh the benefits of allowing livestock in the city.
- too hard to monitor and enforce if you want chickens move to the country as a neighbor I don't want a rooster wake up call or the barnyard smells also could attract coyotes Bob cats et
- Calgary is not a farm. Lol.
- "Absolutely not. I do not support farm animals living in my neighborhood. I do not want to be woken up at five 6 o'clock in the morning and do not want to deal with the smell constantly. If you want farm animals you need to buy space in the rule areas just outside of Calgary or a larger plot of land in this city is no place to have a farm animal roaming around. I pay a lot of money and each year the taxes seem to go up and up and I would like there to be a separation a farm and city life.

- However the most important reason is my daughters allergies she is allergic to feathers and dogs cats grass. The only safe haven that we have for her is our backyard and I would not want my neighbours horse feathers, chicken feathers, rooster feathers or any other feathers blowing into my yard constantly giving her an allergic reaction. It is frustrating enough when we have to leave a park because an owner of a dog has allowed their dog to climb on playground apparatuses."
- People are not responsible. They can't even take care of just cats and dogs let alone now chickens .
- I have seen them at my friend's home - they are noisy, dirty and there is an odor. The city is no place for livestock.
- Livestock smells bad
- If this is a question when you are thinking about doing the certain things to pitbull breeds all I have to do is laugh
- I don't think the final decision about anyone's animal or child should be at the discretion of the chief bylaw enforcement officer.
- [removed]
- I think most properties in Calgary are too small to allow other livestock to suitably live in the city.
- gonna get so many that wont look after animals and clean up, want a farm then move to country
- Pet chickens? Chicken coops are filthy. Actually a little surprised bylaw enforcement is not busy enough
- Do not think it should be within a city
- There's a reason farm animals are called farm animals. I think all these animals will eventually become nuisance animals. If you want animals that badly, move to a rural property where you have the proper space.
- I recently learned that we're one of the few places where urban hens are not allowed. Would I love to be next door to them? Probably not. But, maybe I'd get some eggs out of the deal.
- livestock should stay on the farm or acreages

- Urban hens are actually exploitative to the animals. The only true benefit is given to the humans. We need to do better in this world and it starts by recognizing animal rights. Absolutely no urban chickens.
- We are talking about pet animals here. If the city is proposing a limitation to how many bully breeds dogs are allowed in a household, how can introducing other livestock into a community be a good option?
- No livestock
- Chickens are annoying
- It will lead to more conflict within communities
- We don't have the room and I don't want the smells that go along with livestock.
- I wouldn't prefer to have livestock where I live
- I don't believe the animals would be cared for the same on a property in the city like they would on an acreage outside the city
- Don't police people wanting chickens
- Pens attract small rodents. This is the last thing we need in the city. If you want to own a chicken, move to an acreage. I for one DO NOT WANT mice and other small rodents taking up residence in my neighbour's yard.
- I think more information needs to be provided. Livestock often need particular living conditions that are not always available in a more urban setting. Will this also attract and increase interactions with urban wildlife - particularly predators?
- Confining farm animals to small yards is cruelty
- Chickens carry disease and are FILTHY
- I don't feel that livestock belong in the city.
- Stinky and belong on a farm. Not residential land
- I oppose the idea of allowing hens in the city
- Due to noise
- City planning policy keeps pushing higher densities (which I don't agree with). Where do you expect people to keep farm animals. It would be a real nuisance in high density scenarios.
- It could end up like wet markets and spread disease and viruses if not policed.
- Livestock and farm animals do not belong in the city. People will go overboard and it is too difficult to patrol this. If you have farm animals in town you will have problems and I came from a farm the animals stink even chickens. Even if you only have 5 or 6 they stink. And how do you control how often the pens are cleaned and where does the shit go, into garbage bins? People are lazy and that will cause problems. Responsible people will still have to use or dispose of the waste somehow. Mix into a garden. What about in winter?
- Livestock stink
- Having to get a neighbor approval can be time consuming and costly for the city. If hens are allowed at one property they should be allowed at all with proper enclosures.
- An urban environment is not an appropriate location for livestock of any kind.

- Livestock belongs on a farm or rural area
- Livestock don't belong in a city
- This is an URBAN setting. If they want farm animals - buy a farm and move.
- livestock is for farms not rural life
- I would agree with this if the conditions were that the support from adjacent neighbours would have to be 1) unanimous (not majority), and 2) not 'grandfathered' in (so a new neighbour would be able to veto it). This is probably not feasible, so I would not support this.
- Livestock does not belong in city limits. If you want livestock move to suitable land to efficiently take care of said livestock
- this will lead to some people raising and slaughtering hens for food, this will create unsanitary conditions and possible inhumane practices. It will be too hard to control hens for eggs and pets and hens for meat.
- This is a fine line in which needs to be very thought through. I understand support animals are great for people also saving on food cost these days. But this may not work for a lot of people. Houses are so close together with smells and sounds
- The City is not a Farm
- I don't like the idea of live chickens in my neighbourhood
- I just don't support it
- n/a
- Allowing livestock would open the door to situations where owners are not caring for their animals appropriately, or maintaining acceptable sanitary conditions.
- Farm animals need room to roam around and often have a very strong odour.
- I live in the city and do not want the animal noise and smell of a farm around my home.
- Agricultural stock do not belong in urban settings, they belong on farms. I do not support hens in any city
- Opens the door for more problems- some animals just belong on the farm
- Properties in Calgary are too small for raising any type of livestock. If people want to raise livestock they should move out of the city to a property that is adequately sized
- Attracts more dangerous wild life. I guess I would need the pros and cons and more info to make a wise decision.
- This city has jammed too many houses too close together to be able to properly support an urban livestock option.
- "Encourages predators in residential areas
- Coyotes"
- I do not want a neighbour with hens.
- Chickens smell. I would hate for my neighbors to have a chicken coop in their yard.
- There is no way to ensure the hens health, are they pets or food?
- Calgary needs to focus on other things at the moment.

- I don't think livestock or fire pits should be allowed in urban areas. Too many people who aren't responsible and don't follow bylaws. If I want to have livestock I would move to an acreage
- Livestock should not be kept in city limits, with exception to maybe chickens (limit 2). If you're talking goats or other larger livestock, then they should remain on farms.
- Humans do not know how to properly care for multiple livestock animals living together and they will take advantage of this. I so not support more than urban hens.
- It will smell. It can increase neighbour hostility. Roosters are loud and obnoxious. It will increase work for bylaw and cps.
- are you serious ? We have a coyote problem and you're just going to throw breakfast lunch and dinner out for them now? Give your heads a shake !
- Who wants chicken shit everywhere? Honestly. This is not a farm town, keep it modern and civilized. Leave the farmers out of the city.
- Chickens Stink. Obviously the person who created this idea and the people supporting it have never had to take care of hens. They STINK. Neighbors will regret living there.
- Livestock need large and open property in order to live humanely, and the city is not the place for them.
- too many steps, waste of money
- if people are already complaining about domesticated dogs and cats, adding hens would start a steep slope precedent for any and all animals (including non domesticated) in town and complaints would rise.
- If the question is in regards the security of the hens - any dog breed would chase - not just pit bull breeds. I would also be concerned about droppings contaminating water that dogs would drink from or children would paddle in.
- You live in a city
- livestock should be raised outside city limits, support our farmers in surrounding communities.
- Livestock belong on farms. There is too much noise already, adding livestock will make this worse
- There is really no need for livestock to be within the city limits. They can carry several diseases and the problem is people are going to take advantage of this and by the time they get caught it will have gone too far to fix. Just keep it to domestic pets.
- Too much noise too early in the morning for residential area.
- Becomes a nuisance to neighbors
- Livestock don't belong in the city.
- livestock may introduce additional health concerns
- Local produce is better for your immune system. As long as this is regulated and enforced properly it can help our community.
- Farm animals should live on a farm.
- "Purchase an acreage-
- Livestock of
- Any kind in the city will encourage more stray animals."

- Residential = residential. If you want livestock on your property buy a rural property.
- They are too noisy and uncontrollable for city living
- The smell and noise is a nuisance
- Farm animals should remain on a farm.
- If you want livestock buy a farm
- Concerned about the door, smell and containment
- I don't want hens living next to me. It would be noisy and could aggravate other animals.
- It's a lot of time and resources to ensure there's support from all neighbours, and to verify suitable living conditions on multiple occasions not just when they first get the animal.
- Working in a municipality myself I know first hand adjacent landowners who are against this will have negative impacts on them and the neighborhood moral.
- While many owners will be responsible it only takes a couple to destroy a community. I live in erlton where a neighbour released some pet bunnies in the early 2000's and we now have an absolute infestation.
- Urban goats, sheep, pigs and equids could all fall under this law and are a considerable nuisance regarding escape and subsequent destruction of neighbouring properties, smell and noise. Hens are quiet. Roosters are not.
- I would be afraid that livestock would be killed and/or abused by owners who are not experienced in their care, or for consumption.
- Calgary is a city not a farm. If this was allowed I feel it would increase to a point on nuisance
- this is a city not a backyard farm
- cows? pigs? goats?
- I've been attacked by more livestock in my life then any dog or cat. A city is not the place for live stock.
- If you can't control what's happening now, why introduce more animals
- I don't know what this is so I can't say yes if I don't know why I'm saying yes to.
- "You want hens, or other farm animals please go live on a farm. The poor neighbors, have to put up with the noise, stink, and looks of hen coop and the waste they create. Plus, one's property value with decrease accordingly, i personally would not buy a house, knowing there is a hen coop next door. Also, with our climax, winter temperatures going down in the -30 and lower, how is the owner going to keep the Hen or Hens warm, I think this is inhumane. Please leave the farming to the farmers and Lets Support our local farmers.
- What about those people that are allergic? What about the people that have sleep issues, and those shift workers, that is all we need to hear is a Hen at 5 am in the morning. Plus, where is the Hen to roam, our city lots are not big enough to adequately accommodate a Farm Animal."
- Increased risk of bird diseases and things like bird flu. Better to keep them out of the city
- I don't like birds hahaha
- They should be on a farm where they have more room
- Keeping livestock in the city, especially birds will spread diseases. It's unhealthy.

- people will jump at the chance to own a "miniature/teacup X" without doing any research and when it turns into too much work will dump the animal
- If you want livestock move to an acreage
- People abuse these kinds of situations and then the animals suffer
- Some people do not take the animals welfare into consideration.
- I think that is a little much and would cause more problems for people
- "Noise, smell , nuisance .
- Abandoned chickens
- Increased cost for animal services- will need funding to keep the abandoned, lost, at large chicken, feeding, medical care, more staff requirement etc.
- Zoonotic disease"
- Barn animals belong on farms not in back yards . If you want animals invest in land and care for them where they belong. This is too much for a burden to neighbours especially when normal domesticated animals are not handled properly why add more problems. Leave farming to farmers. Period.
- Livestock is smelly with chance of disease transfer between them and humans.
- Farm animals don't belong within the confines of city limits.
- I live in a city so I don't have to have farm animals living next door. It would drive my dogs nuts.
- Stinky. Noisy
- Farm animals belong on the farm, not in cities!
- I don't see why neighbours need support it. I don't have to approve of my neighbours having dogs or rabbits.
- "you can't have regular people raising livestock.
- These will only set the animals up for neglect and abuse.
- NO to livestock in city's"
- Livestock shouldn't be in the city. People live too close together and there are varying degrees of standards of care, noise/smell tolerance, etc. It will cause neighbour disputes.
- Livestock don't belong in urban areas.
- Houses are too close together In The city and the noise, smell would quickly become a nuisance.
- it raises the opportunity for wild hunter ex bobcats to come into the area
- Livestock bring unpleasant noise and smell to a city. Most city lots aren't big enough to properly accommodate livestock, even small livestock like chickens
- Hens belong on a farm, not a city dwelling.
- noise, smell
- So noisy! We lived in another provinces. A house, in our neighborhood, 5 houses down had hens... they were super loud.
- people will start housing without permission. Hard to police
- Do not allow livestock to in city limits.

- The smell concerns me. Birds and livestock are STINKY. I don't want to be unable to open my windows because my neighbour has a backyard farm.
- Smell issues
- They will draw in Foxes & Coyotes. In turn this will open up opportunities for attacks on family pets & potential attacks on small kids. Leading to the destruction of the coyotes & foxes for having been nothing more than coyotes & foxes.
- livestock/ hens don't belong in a city setting. It can be traumatizing to them too. Also what happens when i buy a new home and the neighbors already had hen/livestock approval i didn't know about that make me enjoying my house difficult?
- Few people would house and care properly for them as well what veterinarian in the city would they have to take them to? These animals need to be vaccinated, dewormed, hoof care, exams etc. depending on the species. So these animals would never have proper veterinary care.
- Hens should be outside the City. We have enough issues with domestic animals roaming , including skunks, we don't need more animals to be out of control
- They belong on a farm
- Livestock should be on a farm not in a city
- I don't think you need support from your neighbors or permission/ inspection
- Homes are not farms, with the cities reduced lot sizes, this is not a reasonable idea.
- People have enough difficulty looking after their current pets.
- They are meant to be on a farm. Would cause noise violations.
- Why add another animal to the list that will not be taken care of properly or be given an appropriate amount of space.
- Chickens smell. I dont want a smelly neighbour
- Chickens are noisy and they stink. I'd like to believe owners would keep them clean and quiet but given how people handle dogs and outdoor cats I am not convinced.
- I don't think most people who love in the city are equipped or able to be equipped to handle or keep livestock. Most livestock are herd animals who are accustomed to having lots of space which can't be provided in the city.
- Who would monitor the situation? How would neighbours know it's being kept clean and tended? It could cause more neighbour strife.
- Farm animals can carry and infect our pets with diseases and parasites. The only way I would support this is if these farm animals require a health certificate from a licensed vet, stating the animal is clear from parasites and diseases.
- Seriously??? Get rid of one and bring another??
- Domestic rabbits are released into neighbour hoods and multiply , and do a grave amount of damage. Do you really want a smelly bunch of chickens running around and backyard butchers around?
- I would support this for hens but not roosters. I don't support this for other livestock.
- Chickens, hens, turkeys belong on farms. Pigeons belong...in the wild.
- Want to raise live stock...move to a farm.

- Chickens are annoying. They make noise, they smell and they irritate dogs, making them bark, and then the dog gets blamed. Want a chicken or eggs? Go to the damn store.
- Should not be allowed.
- Stop creating issues Calgary!! That's what farms are for! No livestock!!
- I don't support the exceptions being at the discretion of the bylaw officer.
- They belong in a wide space.
- I don't see how this can be properly enforced or monitored
- Livestock or hens do not belong in the city due to smell and not enough space to roam.
- Although the initial compliance will be demonstrated, the follow through will be very time consuming to enforce
- Support animals can be managed by exception but general livestock bylaw is not acceptable. They come with noise, smells, etc that are not appropriate for city living.
- I grew up on a farm. A city is not the place for livestock. There will be many people abusing this bylaw
- Livestock should NOT be kept within the city limits.... opening a huge can of worms!
- Stinks , loud , animal abuse increase, lower property value . Hens and pigeons belong in farm areas where your neighbours don't live side by side . Increase health issues , breathing in feces . Bad bad idea. It be different in places such as small towns but in a city really stupid idea .
- If people want to keep a few chickens for their own consumption-as long as they are cared for properly, and not a nuisance- the neighbors shouldn't have a say in the situation
- Having livestock in neighborhoods that are built in such close proximity to each other only encourages dogs to bark because there are new sounds (which then they are deemed and nuisance) or cats to become intrigued and roam. Livestock belongs outside the city limits.
- These animals belong on a farm period
- We have local farmers we can support for livestock
- Hens or other livestock are noxiously aromatic and can produce a lot of noise at all times of the day. Plus they can attract undesirable wildlife such as coyotes, wild cats, and other predators into the City.
- hens and other livestock do not have a place in our neighborhoods . Our city lots are too small for proper care of these animals . they belong on a farm or acreage setting , not the city . I am totally opposed to this idea.
- Personally I'm against animal agriculture as it causes unnecessary harm to a living being!
- This will get out of hand quickly. People will own these animals and not look after them properly.
- Hens stink. they also make a lot of noise and most yards are small and too close together
- Chickens stink!!! I don't want to be that neighbour downwind of a coop.
- Many pet owners are negligent in removing excrement as it is. I would not want to have any odour what so ever in my yard caused by having birds
- I don't want my neighbors having a chicken coop in their backyard
- Unless you have a large 1/2 acres you can buy you chicken at Safeway or from a Hutterite farm

- These are farm animals and should be on a farm
- I do not want to live next to a fly infested chicken coop and chickens carry lice. Do you research.
- Just worried about the mess and the smell
- People complain about wildlife now. Can you imagine the complaints and waste of government money when fox, bobcats etc go after chickens.
- "Farm animals are filthy. Pigs burrow and dig, chickens if not cleaned regularly stink. I would not allow roosters as they are very loud. Goats climb and chew everything and if they got into my back yard i would not be happy at all, especially the amount of time and money i put into my landscaping.
- If people want farm animals, move to a farm"
- I wouldn't want to live next door to hens, etc.
- Livestock does not belong in a city.
- Chickens will increase the coyotes and skunk problems
- If not watched carefully, this can get out of control.
- Livestock do not belong in the city. Potential for parasites, attracting predators etc is too great to outweigh the benefits
- Livestock needs space which a city setting cannot give them.
- Livestock need more room than what a residential lot can provide, and there will always be that person that has no regard for their neighbours. This good also add to the degradation of neighborhoods, and neighbour relations.
- If we start allowing other livestock on people's properties within the city limits, this could cause more issues for their neighbours. We already have people complaining about dogs, you'll have them complaining about goats too?
- Live out in the country if you want farm animals. The city is overcrowded and the noise and smell is not fair to the neighbours
- noisy
- No livestock in the city. No chicken. No pigeons.
- Impossible to administer and control
- Without further information regarding what animals and types of conditions I cannot support this.
- City bylaw doesn't even follow up on dump yards as it is.
- It's dangerous that are the issue. NOT pit bulls
- There's no way to keep livestock in a city ethically. Even with just pollution and noise.
- Livestock need a lot of space to live a good life. Being cramped in a small pen is not ethical.
- Opening up the city to livestock is a potential can of worms and issues for neighbours. The smells, sounds and potential fights could be high.
- This is simply a move to gain more votes towards the eradication of a sweet and loving breed of dog. Based on the views of uneducated individuals whom have no business weighing in on the matter prior to getting said education. Should we lock up / all children because there are a few that make bad choices? Or do we hold the specific parents responsible and offer corrective actions on a case by case basis! The two issues here are separate from each other and have no place being presented side by side.

- 90% of flu's come from living in close proximity to chickens in China. We don't need to extend bad ideas here.
- Livestock in the city is loud and smells and would be a general nuisance to neighbour's.
- y'all don't need to raise no [removed] pig in your yard. support farmers instead.
- Again people should have the freedom to decide if they want chickens. The enforcement officers shouldnt do a thing to get in my way until it becomes a problem.
- Calgary back-yards are too small to ensure smells and sounds don't bother neighbours.
- This has a huge potential to create over population of chickens and live stock at large
- Hens are FILTHY and carry numerous diseases. They can roam but pitbulls are dangerous? Are you dumb?
- homes are too close together in Calgary to allow for farm like animals in neighbors yard. The smell would effect the neighbors yards.
- you want farm animals, live on a farm
- If I wanted to live on a farm, I'd live on a farm.
- Chickens are dirty, stinky and can be loud. I used to raise hens on my farm and they need appropriate space to live healthy lives.
- Keep it simple. This complicates things.
- No livestock animals in people's backyards!! This creates abuse potential, backyard butchers, and other avenues for neglect & abandonment, stressing out neighbours, rescue organizations, and the animals in question.
- Your uneducated proposal is DISGUSTING.
- Our weather is not conducive to keeping hens year round and that means the poor chickens would have to be sent somewhere over the winter. Also, how would you monitor correct handling/feeding of livestock animals.
- You can't control the sound and smells of most animals. We have enough dog owners who don't control their pet's barking. What if the animal gets loose? What if the owner doesn't clean up regularly. What are the rights of the neighbour in this case.
- If you think bedbugs are an issue now, just wait until there are hens allowed within city limits. Not only do chickens attract bedbugs, chickens also have a very offensive odor.
- Chickens don't need a lot of space to roam, however, most other animals do and if they don't have it, they become a nuisance. Its cruel to the animal.
- This is silly and livestock are a nuisance.
- I don't want livestock in my neighbourhood!!
- this could get out of hand very quickly. if you want a cow, go live on a farm.
- We don't need any more animals.
- Will create conflict as people will say they follow the rules to purchase hens then ignore the rules as time goes by.

- Too smelly, dirty and noisy
- These animals should be for a farm setting.
- Don't see the upside
- No because then it would require by law checking regularly to make sure owner is abiding by the laws. As in how many chickens allowed. Noise created and clean up.
- Livestock is meant for farms
- They're annoying and they stink
- You want a farm, live on an acreage. Our homes don't need to smell that everyday. Hens alone is fine.
- Why do we need livestock? Also, in a city, I don't think there's will ever be suitable living conditions
- Animals need space, i live in a city because i dont want the country smell , dont bring animals into residential areas
- It would be a noise annoyance. Disturbing to urban neighbours along with domestic cats and dogs
- With covid-19 out there you're actually considering this? That seems very myopic to me.
- It would be too hard to enforce and too many people would "push" the bylaw and not follow it. Livestock belongs on farms. Even acreages have limits on the number of animals allowed.
- farm animals belong in rural settings where they do not annoy neighbours. Even pens that meet your requirements still attract other nuisance animals, mice, magpies, ravens, skunks etc
- They are farm animals! They stink!
- Our communities/houses are too densely packed, having to listen to someone's livestock I would classify as a nuisance
- we don't need livestock in our yards while our yards and homes are growing smaller and smaller.
- I have seen this in the past. It is a dirty mess and should not be allowed in the city
- Other livestock would likely include pigs which have an extreme odor. If Covid has taught us nothing it is that crowded conditions of animals in urban areas increase the risk of zoonotic disease
- Allowing urban hens (but not roosters) naturally leads to a large number of animals that will be abandoned when chicks are found to be males instead of females. This puts excess pressure on local rescues for these unwanted animals and leads to a large number of animals either suffering or being killed simply because they can't produce eggs.
- I do not see the need for additional livestock within urban city limits. I feel this could be a larger issue down the road.
- Noise and smell nuisance. Will just create conflict with neighbors.
- We don't live in a farming community
- Livestock would create more nuisance....noise and smell, not sure how this is okay with the other things listed regarding dogs.
- Chickens are loud and smell terrible. They don't belong in an urban setting.
- Unless the homes are on the out skirts of city limit
- Hens are much more vocal than people realize, not just roosters. I believe that people are unaware of this and there will be noise complaints. Hens also require large enclosures that depending on the space in a urban yard could not be met OR if they are not allowed outside of their enclosure/coop an increase in behavioural problems are likely to occur.

- You can't ban a dog and let a chicken and goat run wild together.
- live on a farm them...
- Livestock does not belong in the city
- Livestock does not belong in the city. If people want to house animals they should move to an acreage for the health and well being of the animals. I support hobby farming, but responsible owners recognize the need for space.
- Hens only
- Hens & other livestock in the city is ridiculous
- An urban setting cannot provide for the animals needs.
- Livestock in an urban setting could attract vermin (due to feed storage), or create smells and noise.
- There is great potential for this to be misinterpreted and misused.
- I would not want hens nor do I wish to have them as my neighbours in the city
- Attract more wild life into city, such as coyotes and skunks. They are already a safety issue.
- Farm animals don't belong in the city as they are not house pets
- You want a farm, move to the country. Hens are going to cause so many problems, it's like you guys are trying to create work for yourselves.
- Neighbors don't want to smell or hear livestock. Dogs are noisy enough
- I don't want a barn yard for neighbors
- These hens will end up in animal shelters once the novelty wears off or after they stop laying eggs (2 years) further burdening the system.
- If you want livestock you should live in much bigger lots than the city provides.
- I do not want to be woken by chickens or smelling a coupe while trying to relax in my own yard
- Calgary houses are packed too close together for livestock.
- chickens shouldn't be in the city, dogs are natural prey driven animals as well as cats if you believe putting chickens in the mix is a good idea you should not own animals or be choosing the rules for the city.
- There is not enough space I. Back yard to properly clean, maintain and consider the needs of the animals. Smell and noise would be excessive
- The balance wouldn't stay balanced for very long
- While I support the use of goats for weed control, allowing other livestock could lead to serious problems and health risks for said livestock.
- If you are going to put severe limitations on blockheads (pit bull breeds) who don't even show signs of aggression then no other animals (livestock) should be included. You can't segregate an entire group of dog breed and then try to appease the masses by saying they can have livestock instead.
- I don't want chickens, hens feathers etc in my neighborhood

- Just as in the case of nuisance dogs - barking, running wild, defecating outside of their yard, complaints, follow-up, & owners response or lack thereof & more follow up - all takes time - meanwhile the problems still exists!
- I don't believe hens should be in the city. Neighbors of that household would most likely have to deal with noise and smell from the hens
- There's not an objective way to measure community benefit/positive impact.
- Na
- I think we have enough irresponsible pet owners in the city that introducing livestock is just a recipe for disaster
- Hens are farm animals and I don't believe they should be allowed in the area.
- You can't make the decision based on whether the neighbours approve... and it shouldn't be up to one person either. There should be a way to give the home owner more freedom in their own choice.
- No one needs to enslave animals for non-pet use.
- Hens are a nuisance.
- It would be a severe nuisance to have a neighbor with a hen
- Hens are farm animals. They do not belong in the city, they stink, they can be loud and alot of people do not care for their pets let alone a farm animal. It could also cause an increase in theft.
- Although I love farm animals I only see problems with allowing them in the city.Noise,smell getting out of their enclosures.
- No
- We don't need livestock running around the city. All that will happen is people who shouldn't be owning livestock with procure livestock and then neglect/abandon it.
- "Nuisance concerns..... smells. Noise. Hygiene. Once livestock allowed it is the neighbors without livestock that have to suffer a reduced quality of life from living adjacent to those with livestock. If city allows livestock the city should have to waive property taxes for all adjacent homeowners whose properties lose substantial resale value. It is absurd that a family can spend their life savings to purchase their dream home based on an understanding of the rules of their community and then have city bureaucrats turn that dream into a nightmare with no redress or relief. Any of you city policy wonks who think otherwise have your head up your ass, and should be required to put your own skin in the game by being forced to purchase anyone's home who wants to leave an area affected by this ridiculous bylaw. Purchase price to equal 20% over and above the greater of sellers purchase price or market value - sellers choice.

- If you think it's so great you live next to it and pay for it with your own money,

- Livestock belongs on a farm."

- I think hens are fine, but other livestock might be too big/disruptive for a backyard setting. So I would not open it up to other livestock
- I don't understand what livestock, other than maybe hens, would be wanted in the City, it seems strange to me, because I don't understand it. I would need to have a conversation with someone who wants the amendment, to help me make an educated decision.
- In most cases, livestock doesn't belong in the city. The smell and noise can cause a deterioration of enjoyment of others, even beyond immediate neighbours. There are also people with allergies to different animals and as these animals may spend A fair amount of time or even live outside. My kids are allergic to fur bearing animals, and so goats, horses, etc in an adjacent yard would make our outside completely inaccessible for them. There is a duty not to cause your neighbours misery and we wouldn't even be able to open windows in the summer if a neighbour had certain livestock. The City should work to first do no harm and I don't think it's fair to expect me to accommodate a neighbours desire to live outside of normal urban perimeters. Many smaller towns near the city allow certain types of livestock. Just like I shouldn't expect to be able to run a business that becomes a nuisance to my neighbours or have loud parties, let my dogs poop on the neighbours lawn, or bark all day, let junk pile up, or run a grow op that vents just outside my neighbours window. There are certain things that need to be limited when people live close together and chickens, goats, sheep, horses, etc are not quiet, or unobtrusive animals. We shouldn't be making exceptions that cause distress or reduce enjoyment for neighbours. Farm animals in most cases should only be permitted outside the city. Just like other city rules, people can choose to live in places that allow them more freedom, such as the country or small towns. We shouldn't punish the innocent neighbours of someone who wants an exception. I love farm animals for the record, but they aren't appropriate for the city. And for those who want fresh eggs, we have farmers markets for that.
- Regardless of the conditions given in a household, I don't agree these animals should be allowed in residential area. I still believe hens belongs to farms only.
- Sounds like a lot of people submitting paperwork for someone to go over, thats expensive. You are discussing a tribunal process above to reduce costs and time, makes no sense to add the same problem back again.
- This would be very costly and time consuming to maintain and enforce
- I'm concerned owners will not keep living conditions up to standard, and will cost money to inspect/enforce
- If someone keeps and animal with the intention of slaughtering for food, I as a neighbour, DO NOT want to be forced hear or see it happening.
- Seeds for hens attract mice and rats. Hens and eggs attract raccoons. We are still in the middle of a pandemic. There are many valid reasons not to include urban animals.
- Farm animals smell and make noise, this could bother neighbors. How will all the animal waste be dealt with
- Livestock should be on a farm and not in city limits.
- A city is not for farm animals. I do not agree that any property should be allowed to have them in the city.

- I have enough issues with the smell of pot from the neighbours, I dont want to have to deal with the smell of "live stock" in the urban centre.
- I do not think approval of animals that could cause a next pandemic should be mix with humans. Avian influenza, swine flu, etc. Risks should be thouroughly analized.
- "Odour. Noise pollution.
- You can't teach a hen not to cluck. And I don't recall ever seeing an owner pick up after these types of animals. If you cant clean up after your animals, you shouldn't have them."
- Chickens belong on a farm or acreage with lots of space. Lots of people that don't take care of their yards/property will let it get filthy and unhealthy for the chickens.
- It would lower my property value and do not want to live next to a farm
- What the hell are you guys talking about? Chickens out in the road becoming road kill & causing accidents? Stupid kids murdering them and putting them places? We also have lots of protests recently. You want these animals trampled? Who runs our city to suggest dumb [removed] like this.
- Would you live beside someone who has such animals in their yard?
- Hens and livestock do not belong in the city. Yards are too small and neighbors are too close.
- Support from adjacent neighbors would be hard to attain in most cases
- If we spend time considering livestock within the city limits then we have the time to consider more than breed shaming pitbulls.
- I do not believe the city has sufficient resources to monitor and/or enforce new bylaws related to livestock.
- Heck yes let's get agriculture into urban spaces. Monotype areas lead to sprawl, one of the worst things to happen to a city.
- Livestock should not be allowed in the city.
- Nothing good can come of livestock ownership in the city limits.
- Chickens are moist and attract coyotes, dogs.
- No Hens should be allowed in under an acre of land and should require agreement from the community
- There is no way to control smell.
- "The biggest concerns are:
 - Proper care of the animal
 - Noise
 - Smells
 - Dirty or unclean yards"
- I don't think hens should be allowed in the city.
- This would pit neighbors against each other in the event an adjacent neighbor does not support the application. Furthermore, I have concerns about the potential impact on my enjoyment of my property
- Animals are currently enslaved to humans. Stop the cycle of abuse against them.
- They would be a nuisance and the city sucks at enforcing any bylaws

- Livestock do not belong in the city
- Neighbours can be intentionally unfriendly and shouldn't have a right to make the decision.
- Livestock can be noisy, smelly, messy and attract predators into the neighborhood such as coyotes and bobcats.
- There is no need for livestock in an urban setting.
- I don't need to hear chickens in the morning
- We don't need any more animals in Calgary. Go visit a zoo or farm
- The noise is a nuisance
- The noise and I strongly feel they would attract more wildlife such as coyotes.
- Livestock and hens aren't appropriate for city living.
- I do not think any farm animals, including chickens, belong in the city.
- I do not want a neighbour with hens
- Cities are compact and the smells and conditions do not provide adequate living for people or animals. They belong on a farm.
- It's not fair to the animals, the noise and smells of the city can be overwhelming to a farm animal and they need more space than what the average city back yard can provide.
- I would need a complete definition of "other livestock" before supporting this amendment.
- New neighborhoods denser and City wants older neighborhoods to densify. Too much opportunity for unintended bother.
- Livestock does not belong within the city limits
- No farm animals in the city, please.
- I don't livestock should be kept in the city.
- I don't feel farm animals should be in a urban setting .
- Neighbors will have to deal with the noise, smell and any other issue that may come up with poorly managed hens
- If I wanted to hear and smell livestock I would live in the country not the city
- Hens are very smelly and noisy
- I feel chickens belong on a farm or acreage - not in town.
- Urban...HENS? Plant more gardens..
- I believe that in a city we don't need livestock - including urban hens. Livestock belong in the country.
- Too many possibilities for abuse of the rules with very little overall benefit to the public.
- Hens in the city will not have adequate space and amounts to animal cruelty.
- Noise, smell, disease, cruelty to hen with winter and weather changes, people on holidays and neglecting
- Noise and smell- there is absolutely no need for this in a city. If you want to raise livestock, move out to the country please.
- The yard would be smelly and dirty. Get eggs and chicken meat at the store.
- Possible noise, smell and nuisance on smaller city lots.

- Hens, roosters, ducks, Other fowl and Barnyard animals do not belong in the city regardless of yard size
- Noise, smell, untidy sheds/coops, other mess
- Unless an animal is designated a support animal, livestock should not be in residential areas.
- Higiene and proper cleaning could be a problem (decease transmission)
- Noise and cleanliness within the city
- Very small properties will generate smell and noise
- no one needs to keep hens
- I think hens are too loud especially in the Morning when people are sleeping
- Concern around noise, smell and in increase of coyotes in residential areas
- The bylaws for cats and dogs are not enforced at this time; therefore, why would you think that the bylaw would be enforced for livestock (which belong on a farm, not the city).
- Could limit property values of adjacent properties due to smell, noise, nuisance.
- The bylaw amendment would put family that do not support livestock in their neighbour in an awkward position...creating neighbour conflicts.
- Not really a good fit for being in a city. Also noise and odor issues.
- Haven't we learned anything from Covid? A city is no place for farm animals. Eggs are cheap. Let those who want to grow their own move to a farm or an acreage.
- Smell and unsightly premises will become a major problem
- They are noisy and dirty.
- I am opposed to farm animals living in urban areas
- I think livestock belong on an acreage or a farm. I would hate my neighbor having chickens or hens or any other farm animals that would not be spending nights in their home. It could easily become out of hand.
- Livestock should never be allowed within the city limits.
- How do you regulate this to prevent abuse and/or lack of proper care and cleanliness? Most city yards are too small to grant proper space for such animals.
- I do not support livestock in city surroundings
- Firstly, how is this legislation what we are concerned about right now in August of 2020? Secondly I do not want to hear roosters, smell chickens, hear sheep or goats in my neighbourhood. What if the people who wish to bring such animals into the city choose not to vaccinate them and their property is next to mine? I do not wish to live next to such activity. If my concerns about noise & smell could be satisfied, then I am more willing to let such animals live in the municipality. But keep in mind that similar to dogs, sheep, goats, roosters and hens can all bite, scratch and harm another animal or human as well. So it's ironic to hear the city talking about limiting the number of animals a person can own while simultaneously wanting to bring in more into the municipality.
- Most city yards are not large enough to support livestock. If you allow 1 you must allow all
- Livestock does not belong In the city. How do you control the smell of these animals?
- Livestock is not domesticated animals and therefore could create issues

- Because we live in a city, not a farm.
- Hens and goats can be a nuisance and don't belong on city property
- Old get messy, are hens pigeons.
- Look at China and live animals COVID-19 ...
- If we already have a problem with feral cats and dogs why would we bring other animals into the mix that will unbearably cause more of a nuisance than domesticated mainly indoor animals.
- Messy, smelly and dirty. What if
- "Inside the city limits, there should never be livestock. EVER!"
- Livestock create excessive noise, waste, disease and putrid smells."
- Hens create smells and flies.
- Odours and noise are too difficult to monitor and handle in close urban areas
- Tell me how you're going to create responsible dog owners by allowing these same under educated individuals to own f-g chickens ?
- We live too close to our neighbours to have this happen. Unfortunately not all citizens will follow the rules or hygiene of owning animals like this, I'm referring to waste clean up
- If all persons could be counted on to keep their yard smelling nice it might work but this is the real world.
- Absolutely not this would decrease the value of adjacent properties.
- I would not want to live anywhere near hens in an urban area. They are noisy, smelly and I think allowing it will lead to many complaints. Upping enforcement is an additional cost to taxpayers. Better solution is to not allow it in the first place.
- I used to live on a farm and cleaned out the chicken coop on a regular basis. In the City, not everyone knows how to look after hens including waste disposal in a sanitary manner. Then, how would the waste be disposed of by the owner? In the green bin? What about the risk of Salmonella and E. coli contamination in the waste? How would the owner control the smell of the waste? Plus, new comers who may be accustomed to raising chickens in their country of origin may have different practices. Any enforcement by the City could lead to human rights issues and legal implications for the City. There are many factors to consider.
- No need in the city
- Livestock does not belong in the city.
- I do not believe it is necessary to have livestock in an urban environment.
- Live stock including chickens belong on a farm not Nextdoor to me.
- I feel that there is no need for livestock within the city and it's improbable that there would be enough space and appropriate living condition for livestock.
- Raising livestock should be a rural hobby.
- This is getting out of control people do not look after their animals yards and it will be next to impossible to have dealt with
- Need more information regarding the general health impact to the community, and enforcement. i.e. cleanliness (removal of fecal matter), potential disease, & inadvertent escape of animals.

- Just there are people with terrible neighbors.
- Pit bull and pit bull like breeds are a nuisance but livestock is okay? That doesn't sit right with me.
- We do not need chicken pigs sheet or other livestock in city limits
- I want a quiet neighbor. I can't believe we let people smoke pot in their yard either.
- Livestock doesn't belong in people's backyard
- Livestock results in the potential for increased nuisance complaints and communicable diseases in that cannot be limited in the confines of an urban environment.
- Hens and other livestock belong in rural areas. They are a nuisance and have immediate negative impact on neighbours.
- Think regardless of the rules, animals would end in substandard accommodations too often. Love the idea in theory. Also, it seems a shame that some people could house these animals and others not, regardless of their fitness, but based on their neighbour's preference.
- Because the city won't enforce proper storage of animals or noise complaints.
- Where do you draw the line if you allow chickens... pigs and cows next?
- I see no reason for livestock in the city. Many people around us don't even take care of their pets or follow current by-laws. I have up to 5 cats in my yard at any one time. There is no by-law enforcement so why would we add more rules that aren't enforced.
- I believe it would introduce more problems than benefits. Predators, environmental impact, noise, animal welfare. People choose to live in the city for a reason, if people want to have chickens, etc. acreages are a better suited environment.
- I'm not ok with my neighbours having a hen house, if you want that move to a farm; not a residential area
- Livestock belongs on farms
- Most people who try owning livestock in the city will soon tire of the cleaning and care required, and their yards will be reduced to stinky, noisy, disease-ridden dumps, becoming a torment and a health hazard to their neighbours. Our houses are built too close together to allow urban farming. If you want a farm, move to the country!
- Hens are a lot of work to keep clean, avoid noise and smell. Fleas, salmonella, mites, other diseases the province regulates to avoid biosecurity issues cannot be followed in a city in close proximity. Also no veterinarian sees chickens in Calgary. What is the owner going to do for vet care and bills??
- I have grown up on a farm and the smell of the animals and waste (manure) they produce can be extremely offensive. As well a lot of people are allergic to these animals and can have severe reactions to them.
- I don't believe hens should be kept by people to provide food. They should live free from exploitation.
- Because the city will not be able to / have the resources to enforce proper care and stop people being bad neighbors -allowing excessive noise, or smell, or whatever the issue might be.
- These animals do not belong in the city.
- I don't believe an urban environment is appropriate for chickens

- Although I love all animals I do not want to pay $500k for my house and then have to live beside farm animals. Mainly because not all owners are responsible i.e. picking up messes. Also many pet dogs may have prey drive so may end up trying to dig under neighbours fence to get the chickens.
- I don't have confidence that the city will have the staffing, budget or enforcement legislation needed to ensure the criteria are met and maintained.
- The city is not the place for urban hens or other livestock due to additional problems with smell, noise and other such issues that impact on neighbouring properties.
- If you want to own chickens buy an acreage
- Seems overly complicated. Can't imagine what other livestock would be permitted. Also having it contingent on neighbours approval seems like a potential for conflict.
- Noise and smell
- If hens are allowed there will be discrimination charges if all other livestock are not allowed (sheep, horses, pigs, cows). A very slippery slope.
- I had a neighbor with hens and it caused a lot of noise. They didn't take care of them. Some of them died. I think anyone having livestock should have required training and be monitored.
- We have more than enough kinds of pets within the city and do not need to add to this.
- Livestock should reside in rural areas so as not to hamper the quality of life of urban dwellers. Chickens are loud smelly and attract predators like coyotes to urban areas.
- Live stock belongs on a farm. Not in the city
- The city is not a farm.
- No livestock in an urban environment. That is why we live in a city and not in a rural area
- Urban area is not the place for farm or large animals. Backyards cannot handle the feeding, exercise, poop, cleaning, and care of these animals.
- If owners can't even follow bylaws with dogs and cats, why would we add other animals to the mix.
- The City of Calgary and City Police already do a poor job controlling noise and nuisance bylaws and smoke from fire pit and marijuana odor issues. The last thing we need is another noise, smell and animal welfare issue in our city.
- Farm animals should not be in a city
- Livestock does not belong on private properties in the city.
- The noise effect from such animals is much broader than direct neighbours.
- I do not support additional livestock in the city, I feel there are an abundance of dogs pooping and peeing in public places, it's destructive to private and public property and smells awful in the public dog parks. Until pet owners can be held responsible for pet damage to private property like lawns etc...I do not support additional pet ownership within the city.
- Foul create disease risk
- Urban hens and other livestock can draw more predators (coyotes, cougars, bears, racoons) into urban areas. Acreages and hobby farms are more suited to livestock
- I worry about the safety of the animals. Are they going to be kept in a humane manner? Who would check on the animals.

- Having various different types of animals in proximity to humans could open the door for illness and disease
- We live in a city not the country. There are human allergies, animal odours and noise we need to consider. Am I allowed to have a pet hippopotamus?
- You are opening to ban my therapy dog but bringing in [removed]? Give your head a shake.
- I worked for The Federal Agriculture dept for 35 years to prevent bird flu, and 40 other diseases you can get off of poultry. I do not want any next door. Buy an acreage. Not in a city, feathers fly everywhere. My sister raises them on an acreage in BC, works fine.
- Sounds and smells from livestock can travel beyond adjacent neighbors.
- Want chicken buy a farm
- The density of the neighbourhoods & close proximity to neighbours would not be a suitable place for hens or other livestock
- Unless the property is more remote, noise may be an issue. The hens causing too much noise an may attract other wildlife. The hen owners must find a way to reduce the noise and secure the property so that other wildlife does not get onto their property.
- Noise and hygiene would have to be monitored and there arent enough bylaw officers to monitor this effectively.
- Chicken coops or pens stink and you know not everyone will properly clean them, and if you do they still smell.
- Livestock are noisy, can smell, they can attract predators
- Livestock should not be allowed in city.
- I live in a condo. This is My nightmare
- Neighbours dont need to support it, and id doesnt need to benefit the community
- Many of Calgary communities live near open fields and parks where coyotes live peacefully! The introduction of live stock could encourage them to enter communities and be injured needlessly
- I really want to say yes. I would personally love hens and fresh eggs. However people already can't manage their yards and there's not enough enforcement of junk on property or poorly maintained yards. I also don't think people who have no experience raising farm animals Should be allowed to have them without training and supervision
- There will be home owners who won't take care of chickens. It will be too much for the city to police
- Urban livestock is an oxymoron. A backyard doesn't provide a proper environment for farm style animals. If pet ownership bylaws (dogs and cats) are still an issue they should be addressed first.
- Agricultural animals belong in a non-urban setting. Farm animals are not pets.
- Seriously? We're in the midst of a pandemic with zoonotic origins. H1N1 a decade ago was bird flu...
- Need to limit location. Multi family, high density locations would be a problem. Should only be considered in single detached homes.
- I grew up on a farm and that is where they belong. Chickens are dirty and people with breathing problems are affected.
- If your property isn't large enough to house these animals, and prevent the smell and sound to disturb someone on a neighbouring property then it shouldn't be considered.

- Agree except that adjacent neighbours would have to support. Assuming there is no impact to how they enjoy their property, there is no reason for them to help decide
- I don't feel livestock should be allowed in the city. Could a facility be build outside city where people could maintain the livestock
- I worry about property values of homes beside someone with a chicken coop. I would have a big problem with my neighbour doing that. The smell from the yards of dog owners who don't pick up after their dogs is bad enough during the summer, never mind livestock.
- Many lots are too small and noise and odor would disturb neighbours. Move to an acreage if you want to keep animals.
- Please don't expand the list because most people neither have the skills or space to properly care for farm animals.
- too many risks of noise and smell for neighbours
- Almost all yards are far too small. Hens attract coyotes.
- farm animals do not belong in the city
- Noise and smell would be an issue especially in inner city communities that have small yards. If a neighbour decided to raise hens it would considerably diminish the value that my backyard brings
- Having grown up with chickens in an urban setting...defining "Neighbours" is difficult. Chickens, if not well managed can be heard or smelled a long way away. Thus having your "Neighbours" approval is very problematic. I suspect the same would be said for horses, goats or lamas. If I wanted to smell livestock I'd live on a farm...not in the city!
- I think the administration of this concept would be too cumbersome with subjective and indefinite rules.
- Firm no to farm animals in the city. Cops in backyards the is not a desire for any neighbour.
- As much as I love animals, a city environment is not the best place for livestock.
- Farm animal need space and there facial matter is smells and its intrusive and flat out no if people want farm animal live on a farm or acreage rural area not city
- City living isnt for Livestock. Move to an acreage if you want to farm. Opening this door will be the floodgates to having farms in neighborhoods. DONT DO IT!
- Live on larger property outside of the city if you intend to have livestock.
- Do not want noise from livestock.
- Livestock requires space
- absolutely ridiculous to have people raising animals. They are not professionals at it. Silly when we just saw Covid transmitted to humans from bats.. Have you hear of bird flu??
- Want a farm move to a farm and be a farmer. Leave the customs of the 3rd world in the 3rd world
- Noise and smell concerns
- Unless there was mandatory registration and more personnel were added to monitor the situation, I foresee a lot of animal abuse being overlooked.
- we live in a City. If people want livestock other than dogs/cats/birds, they should have an acreage or be in the outskirts of the city. Or, builders can get permission to have their development able to have these extra different livestock AND those who buy these homes are aware at the time of purchase. I do not want to live near a "hobby farm", I did not buy my property with this intent. This will certainly lower our resale values of our homes, if this is not regulated properly. We can't seem to control people picking up animal wastes already, I don't want pig, hens, etc wastes to be an issue and I don't want the extra noises.

- It will be difficult for individuals to meet these standards
- Urban hens will attract mice, fleas and coyotes.
- These "other livestock" belongs at the farm not in city.
- Hens yes but other livestock no. Livestock is noisy, smelly and would be a nuisance
- Hens and other livestock should not be part of urban living
- Livestock belong on farms/acreages, not in cities. They are smelly, noisy and need room to move. Apartment dwellers and 25 foot wide city lots are an inhuman home for livestock and chickens.
- Chickens and livestock spread disease!!
- We live in a city center and farm animals should not be allowed in the city. If people want to own pets that are not domesticated they should move out of the city to do so.
- seriously? Fine, along with my nuisance dogs, can I keep a Llama in my yard? They like to spit, what fine will you give.
- Danger of zoonotic disease
- Dirty and noisy. I wouldn't want to live beside them
- Livestock doesn't belong in the city. This includes "emotional support" livestock.
- Encourages predators to come closer to people's families.
- there are already enough problems trying to get owners to control their noisy barking dogs, picking up their dog's waste etc. Also, having to get your neighbour's support of your pet choice is just going to cause friction & bad blood between neighbors if the proposed pet owner is denied.
- People have difficulty being responsible for their cats and dogs
- How much noise do hen's make? Is the owner responsible for keeping their homes clean? and how does the city enforce this?
- We don't need farms in people's suburban yards.
- Livestock stinks up neighborhoods. Encourages other pests like mice, coyote, to hang around urban areas
- I would not want to listen to chickens
- In high density neighbourhood this would be a disaster - noise - clutter does not belong in a dense urban area.
- I don't care about urban hens
- I lived in the country. Chickens are loud! We had 10 could hear them over 3 acres away
- I believe if people wants hens or livestock then they should live in the country.
- If someone wants to run a farm, run it outside of the city. The smells and sounds of livestock would be disruptive to neighbours. Also, it's not fair for livestock to be raised in an urban environment.
- if people want chickens, get an acreage or get out of the city. If i had a neighbor with chickens I would be so angry

- Livestock doesn't belong in a city
- It's too hard to regulate and our seasons are harsh
- Having grown up on a farm I know what is involved in raising livestock and I don't think that the average city dweller has the necessary experience with animal care to be able to provide for livestock.
- Not in inner city
- I don't want increase bugs, noise or smell. As a neighbour it could create tension if I deny my neighbours ben request
- Hens and small livestock in urban, residential lots will attract predators such as raccoons, coyotes, cougars and bears.
- The Calgary bylaw enforcement takes far, far, far to long to resolve any justified complaints. I have first hand experience in this matter: 14 days to respond to a complaint, an initial warning, a second warning and then followed by an order to solve any identified issues in 31 days. Fines or potential fines are minimal and ineffective.
- Go buy a farm
- "This does not cover the myriad difficulties of urban living. Neighbours may move; a neighbours' health situation might change; they may have a falling out.
- Enforcement is insufficient to the task should this be opened up. Who will police a situation where Hen keeping is used to cover a cock-fighting group? A domestic goose once caused huge noise issues in a neighbourhood I frequented. Laws are made for the lowest common denominator, yet there are people who will flout all laws. Good citizens will follow the rules, we know that. Opening up this question means opening up too many loopholes. The cost of enforcement is a public expense and increases of this nature should be avoided. The City is not able ensure the safekeeping of the dogs and cats presently allowed."
- the city is not a place for hobby farms
- Chickens do not belong in the city.
- If you want livestock than move to a farm. Livestock bring additional problems such as increased waste, smell potential diseases and increased predators in the area.
- Barking dogs are already a problem especially in warmer months when you can't sleep without a house window open, imagine adding roosters' to the mix early morning and you're just asking for problems. These should be left to acreages and/or farms - not within city limits.
- Livestock does not belong within a city and should be rural only
- not all people are responsible regarding animal health. Chickens need to be looked after & kept clean at all times.
- Health reasons and odour
- Where do you draw the line? No chicken owners next to pitbull owners No crowing Roosters before 7am? No pigs if they snort too loudly? No horses if you only have a one car garage? And take a large size garbage bag with you to pick up cow poops when walking Daisy on a leash (City bylaw - all cows on leashes).
- Livestock smell is pungent

- People aren't responsible. Enough animals already live in terrible conditions and I do not trust the city to regulate or monitor it properly.
- As nice as chickens are, and as dutiful as the owner may be, they SMELL.
- Livestock belongs on farms. How do you control the number of hens someone can have? Will you be licensed to have hens and conditions inspected regularly?
- We are a city, not a farming community.
- Do not support
- No hens in the city period
- I don't think that most people have the proper understanding or education to care for hens within their backyard and in the city. As someone who works in Agriculture and has a degree focusing on chickens and livestock I think this could go poorly and could lead to diseases within bird populations increasing and other issues due to improper education
- Hens attract wildlife.
- Really? Living in an URBAN part of the country most people do not want clucking. If people want chickens they should live in RURAL Canada.
- I am 100% against this. Unless the animal in question are on an acreage or farm, it becomes an all-too real possibility that these hens would become a nuisance to adjacent neighbours. As an urban homeowner, I shouldn't have to worry that a neighbour would acquire these hens and affect my ability to live without the accompanying noise and mess. The presence of these hens could also very realistically affect my ability to sell my home at all, much less for it's full value for all the above reasons, not to mention that the yard containing the hens would bring down the look of the community. No one expects to find hens in an urban setting.
- Noise of hens
- So many more pressing issues atm
- I agree that the rights of neighbours should be considered, in terms of smell/noise, etc but how does a person prove community benefit and getting support from neighbours is not always reasonable.
- I wouldn't want my Next door neighbour To have a bunch of farm animals in their yards. Stinking up the whole block. Farm animals should not be taken to live in a city, that's not a suitable living condition
- I don't want to live near a farm
- If animal can be cared for allow that animal. Why does it need to "offer community benefit"??? Who cares about neighbour support??? If you can care for animal on private property leave it alone and let it be.
- Concerned that owners will not care for these outdoor animals properly due to lack of knowledge and experience. Better to support commercial farmers who raise the hens humanely and responsibly.
- A
- People have a hard enough time cleaning up after their house-pets in public and private spaces, which makes it hard to believe that the spaces of livestock would be kept clean for both people and animals. It would be important to have neighbor approval if livestock were to be allowed.

- Let's keep farms outside of the city, we have enough barking complaints, now your just adding noise and smell complaints!!
- Farm animals belong on the farm!! I would not appreciate a rooster crowing early in the morning everyday, not to mention the smell!!! This goes for @ll farm animals!!
- If you want animals live on a farm
- I have lived in an urban area that allowed chickens (Brisbane, Australia) and the smell of a chicken coop is terrible in the high summer. Wafting into the kitchen it is not acceptable.
- Loud, potential for disease spread, would this request consent of new neighbors?
- Don't want them in back yards
- I don't think farm animals belong in a city.
- Creates to many issues for enforcement and neighbour complaints. May result in more neglected and unwanted animals when people thinks its a good idea or fun idea then decide its not.
- I don't support livestock at all!
- Spread of dease
- I dont support this if the owner would be allowed to slaughter the animals for "food"
- We are in a city, not farmland
- We have had a lot of coyotes, some bobcats and hawks in my neighborhood. The chickens would be vulnerable to attacks. I also do not want to hear chickens, and their presence would bother my dog. Because my dog is a retriever and retrievers were bred to hunt small game, he has an interest in certain types of birds. (ex: ducks and pigeons) If someone has chickens, he is going to be quite interested and want to get to the chickens.
- Hens are noisy and smelly, i wouldn't want my neighbors having them, nor would I want them
- Too many people would take advantage and not follow appropriate rules and guidelines. Potential for noise, smells etc.
- Most people do not know how to take care of animals. And farm style animals even more so.
- Its bound to cause annoy neighbours and create conflict.
- You shouldn't need permission to own an animal on your own property from a neighbor
- Livestock are for farms
- The city unfortunately already has multiple reports on a regular basis of wild predators (coyotes, bobcats, cougars) in Calgary communities. Having livestock within the city limits would only further increase these interactions increasing the risk to small children and household pets. The only exemption to this should be agricultural land already designated within the city limits.
- I would love to support this initiative but I fear that the monitoring of the adherence to the guidelines for this to work would be grossly immense and costly for the City. In a perfect world, individuals would follow the guidelines and adhere to the requirements but we all know there are many individuals out there who would run with this opportunity and not adhere to the rules/guidelines which in turn would create complaints & follow up. Possibly a trial run could be suggested to see how those individuals handle the offer ? If it proved to be too much of a monitoring issue then it could be withdrawn.
- I do not support Livestock in the community.

- farm animals belong on a farm
- Farm animals belong outside the city
- Property values could be impacted if your neighbour has livestock in the city.
- No farm animals in the city.
- This bylaw has inherent flaws that make it easy to be abused/misused and the potential for animal abuse.
- To hard to “police”
- "Too many things would go unchecked.
- Cleanliness/ bird health/avian flu. Leave it on the farms."
- You are looking at putting restrictions on certain breed of dogs but want to allow livestock with no Idea of effects on the communities
- Chickens stink and are mean (usually to each other - put a mark with a sharpie on one and the others will attack it). They are also noisy.
- People move to the city to get away from the “farm smell”
- Any livestock in urban area would inflict nuisance to neighbors.
- i do not think it would be fair for the livestock and i do not think they could live comfortably within city limits.
- Yards are too small in Calgary for adjacent neighbours not to be effected by hens and livestock.
- Livestock doesn’t belong in the city. There is too much potential for noise and odours.
- Livestock in the city should be a no-go
- The idea of crowing roosters and clucking hens in the neighbourhood adding to the noise is not my idea a peaceful neighbourhood. If you want hens get an acreage. I do have friends in Mapleridge, BC who have urban hens. Difference is they have a large yard, lots of trees and space between lots and houses. Calgary's newer neighbourhoods have very close together houses this could be a huge contention and issue for home owners who do not want barn yard animals and their noise close by their open windows.
- Noise and smell issues. We have more than enough noise in the city, without turning backyards into farmyards. If people want to farm, let them move rather than impacting their neighbours.
- No , there are currently not enough guidelines or information to support this initiative . I think we will end up with feral chickens running around just like the bunnies
- People are not compliant on rules and I would not want to live next to chickens
- Without specifics on what type of livestock you are talking about, it is impossible to determine if the adjoining neighbours would be adversely affected by noise, smell and other possible contaminations (feces) from the livestock someone might have in their backyard.
- Chickens smell
- I don't particularly want to wake up to stinking chickens, or goats, or god knows what else stinking up the neighborhood.
- "As a neighbour you don’t want to be smelling a barnyard next door.
- People move to the city to get away from the farm life."

- Life stock to exotic pets should no be allowed in city limits. ..and no more than one pet per household...and only after competition of a course in planned 'pethood' by the owner.
- I do not support hens in the city under any circumstances.
- Livestock DO NOT belong in the City. Have you learned nothing about animal to human transmission of disease? Looking to start the next Covid?
- "Animal to human disease - eg. Avian flu
- Noise and odour issues."
- Live on a farm if you want livestock.
- Calgary is known for its small yards and property sizes - where are people going to have room to have hens? Make it a minimum of a 1 acre lot to be able to have them.
- No. Guy in neighbour hood had a rooster. Cock a doodle Doo! No livestock for homes. A zoo of live stock with many types of each animals at edge of city would be nice. Pigeons removal upon complaint
- I think it would create more neighbour issues/complaints to make it worthwhile
- The animals should not have to offer something within their community, it prevents the animal from holding any religious purpose. Such as cows in the Indian tradition. It also prevents people who need to own them for their own lively hood and providing for their family if they have to share.
- Neighbours will control the home owners too much it needs criteria
- To think having additional wildstock in urban environment would have more positive impacts than a significant increase in nuisance claims is insanity. Wildstock does not belong in an urban environment.
- I grew up in Ramsay and lived there since 1956. There was a neighbour who every year raised chickens in his back yard. I found them noisy and not very pleasant smelling.
- If you want to own farm animals move to the country. City is no place for any farm animal. You will always have neighbours who don't take care of messes and smells. Thus us not wht we live in the city.
- Too many people jump on the bandwagon but don't sustain interest and that leads to abuse of the program and animals.
- Don't mind hens if the owner has a huge plot, but in most Calgary suburban areas the hens noise would be a nuisance.
- Keep farm animals on the farm.
- no livestock in The City proper
- Dogs are the owners responsibility no matter the breed
- Chickens are extremely smelly and need a lot of room to properly live, which is not possible in most city lots.
- Chickens on farms
- Our neighbor had chickens for a little while until we called the city to let them know. My only problem was that my dogs barked at them because they didn't know what they were and then someone would call for a nuisance barking complaint!
- To complicated to implement and enforce.

- "Livestock do not belong in the city. Period. It's bad enough I hear neighbors dogs barking.
- I am not in favor of the smell and noise to name just 2."
- Worried about waste / disease
- Noise smell mice and they only lay eggs for a limited time
- Hens wake up very early and make quite a bit of noise and impacts quality of life for many. Hens should remain on acreages or farms.
- Chickens and other wildlife should not be in the city limits
- farm animals should be on a farm. city yards are inappropriate places for livestock and too small, they are a poor environment for animals
- I don't want livestock living next to me. Being noisy or stinky with feces. My house is 4ft from my neighbor in these new developments with small yards. Children, dogs, cats, rabbits, birds, etc are enough!
- Chickens don't belong in residential neighborhoods.
- Livestock should not be allowed inside city homes. Farm animals only
- Farm animals shouldn't be allowed in an urban/suburban neighborhood - too much potential to create problems.
- No
- We'll end up with people trying to run farms on city property. Limit each animal the household can have.
- Chickens & Livestock belong in the Country.
- I don't think farm animals should be allowed in city limits. City officials are busy enough with dog and cats without the added work of chickens.
- There is no feasible or inexpensive way to enforce the adequate care of these animals.
- If people want livestock they should buy a farm
- Besides chickens, WHAT other farm animals would someone NEED to have in their backyard. No, you want a goat, move to a farm or buy co-op goat. I don't need to wake up in the city and hear AND smell McDonald's farm at 7am.
- nuisances, potential noise, disease, etc.
- Noise and smell
- It may not be possible to train other animals to not be a nuisance to neighbors. Each time a new neighbor moved in next door there may be complaints and or mediation required which is a waste of time and money.
- The level of noise they produce and care they require is not something suitable for the vast majority of urban areas in Calgary
- I would only support if neighbours,2 adjacent on all sides,were in agreement.roosters can be very disruptive.cows can be very smelly.
- City properties are far too small to allow for farm animals to be kept
- No multi animal livestock dwellings due to potential for odour and noise

- People may acquire hens without proper education about hygiene and the prevention of disease/zoonosis.
 - Chickens stink and should stay on farms period.
 - "I am not sure an urban environment can support 'livestock' as they can be smelly (chickens), goats etc and noisy!
- Would definitely require approval by your neighbours if this bylaw was allowed. Maybe make a course mandatory for people who want to have urban livestock as so many people know very little about 'suitable habitat, cleaning and care of animals'."
 - The noise these animals make is not suitable for city dwellers who live close together. If that happened beside me I would expect compensation for decreased property values and loss of wages due to the noise affecting me. If I can't sleep I can't work my shift work job.
 - Would like to say yes, but unfortunately the few irresponsible ones ruin it for the others. Most yards aren't large enough. Too many cats and dogs live in poor conditions. Would there be permits and ongoing yearly inspections of the coops?
 - This is a city not a farm. The more livestock (hens) would bring more coyotes to the city. Downtown already has that issues because you feel like having the domestic looking bunny rabbits are a great idea in parks...
 - I personally would not want to live around urban hens - especially if they are not pets and being bread to eat
 - Noise and cleanliness issues
 - Training and noise control for livestock can't be achieved the way it can for domestic animals. They aren't appropriate for urban settings.
 - Hens don't belong in the city.
 - Noise and filth - again, responsible owners
 - Livestock including urban hens should stay rural.
 - Community benefit doesn't really tell me much? Too subjective
 - Maybe other farm animals, but hens/chickens are so loud
 - I do not feel that I want to live next door to a "farm" when I live in the city
 - I don't believe livestock has a place within city limits.
 - Hens should only be allowed on a farm, they smell, they make noise and shouldn't be allowed in the city.
 - I don't think a standard urban home has sufficient space or enrichment for other livestock.
 - It's not just adjacent neighbours that would be affected, it should be the whole neighbourhood.
 - It brings in so many rodents. It's gross.
 - Farm animals belong on a farm!
 - hens are smelly and can be very noisy

- I don't believe livestock can be properly cared for in majority of inner city dwellings. I live in the suburbs and I know my yard is not big enough to properly care for livestock.
- Zoonoses. Best guess is that Spanish flu originated from ducks or pigs living too close to large number of humans. If you want a farm, move out of the city.
- Properties are not large enough to support this.
- While many individuals have the ability and yards to raise hens properly, too many who would "try" would fail. Caring for hens is a daily responsibility, without proper care the coop can quickly become disgusting for anyone residing nearby and inhumane for the chickens.
- You shouldn't keep wild birds in your yard
- I would be concerned about the noise and smell coming from my neighbor's yard
- Why [removed] should my neighbours be allowed noisy smelly chickens if I can't have my sweet living dog.
- Hens belong on a farm. Not in a city.
- Live stock should not be allowed in Calgary. Most yards are very small especially in the new community's.
- smell and noise can't be contained or within noise bylaw hours.
- I'm sorry, but we live in an urban environment with ever decreasing yard sizes. If people want livestock, they can move to the country. I'm also very concerned about impulse decisions and "fads". We already have too many unwanted puppies and kittens when the initial enthusiasm dies down and the realities and daily obligations of responsible pet ownership become clear.
- I support having backyard hens but not sure about other livestock. I would need to consider their size, noise level, activity level, yard size, etc. And the feasibility to have those animal in an urban setting.
- Livestock do not belong in the city.
- Hens are not city animals
- The feed often attracts rodents. This has been evidenced in other locations where they have chickens inner city.
- The noise and smell would be offensive
- If you live in the city, don't get chickens. If you want chickens, don't live in the city.
- I want a farm in my backyard but nobody in the city with small area can give the proper lifestyle
- We need less government not more
- I would like to know what other livestock people are requesting.
- Livestock can be loud, smelly, and could impact my ability to peaceably enjoy my neighbourhood. People already fail to follow bylaws about dogs and cats (roaming, leashes, poop pickup). I'm not optimistic about how that would unfold with livestock.
- Hands are fine as they can be contained and provide eggs for the owners any other type of livestock would need too much space and may cause disruption of the neighbourhood
- No chickens in yards.
- Hens are farm animals. No room for them in a city. They are loud and messy and stinky.

- Livestock of any kind do not belong in the city!!!!
- farm animals like hens are very smelly
- I grew up on a farm. The last thing I would want is a hen house in the property adjacent to mine. Could also cause hard feelings in neighbours who really don't want livestock in their vicinity, but don't want to be the one to hold out if the other neighbours agree.
- It is awful that because of different cultures that all of a sudden we can have a cow in our basement. No wonder Canada is screwed. Keep bending to every culture but our own!
- The city i. My opinion has houses on top of one another and builders are knocking one house building two to create even less space. I feel this would create a lot of issues for neighbours and complaints.
- You wanna ban dogs so your chickens can roam? are you serious???
- No live stock of any kind should be in the city. Only in rural areas
- This will easily get out of hand
- Can hardly control the feral cat population and problems with dogs, why add more animals that people don't even know how to look after.
- No need for these animals in city limits.
- Your going to let someone have a cow or a goat (which does an INCREDIBLE amount of damage to the environment if not properly vtaken care of) but you won't let someone have a specific breed of dog all because of their appearance. Literally during a time where we are tearing down racism you bring out a law that is quite literally racist to dogs.
- They are noisy, smelly and filthy. Backyards in calgary for the most part are much too small to keep hens in a clean way. They would be a nuisance to neighbours.
- Hens are fine. NO one wants a cow in the neighbour's yard!
- This is stupid and ridiculous. Livestock should not be in urban areas.
- We had a neighbour with a Rooster and the constant crowing was crazy at all hours.
- There is no place for urban hens or livestock. You want to introduce hens and livestock but ban a certain breed of dog? Absolutely absurd.
- We are opening the door for further abuse of animals, by causing stress on them, improper confinement, possibility of other wildlife coming into urban areas and becoming more aggressive trying to get food eg. coyotes . These livestock animals need space, and people not used to having livestock will not have the proper education to look after them. Just like bunnies, we will see chickens roaming our cities because people didn't want to look after them anymore so let them go.
- Livestock does not belong in the city due to noise, smell, aesthetics, etc.
- The smell alone will never be controlled and will draw in more wild animals
- Indifferent
- Livestock belong on a farm not in the city.
- chickens are diseased and loud. And dirty
- Suitable living conditions is vague wording, consider appropriate living conditions for livestock.
- Urban area for livestock not healthy.

- "A political quagmire—
- As a guide dog trainer and past animal control officer, I would not want the door opened to the prospect of "anxiety" companions or the plethora of novelty companion animals."
- The mess and the noise situated around chickens and hens is not something I would want to see in my neighborhood.
- Properties in the city are not big enough to offer the animal good space to live in
- Smell and noise. Would attract wildlife and cause safety problems
- You're worried about feral animals and you want to throw livestock in the city too? Unbelievable. If people can't be responsible enough to take care of their cats, chickens are not going to be much better.
- livestock belong in farms outside the city
- n
- This poses risks to the livestock being cared for appropriately and safe at all times.
- Urban areas (in my opinion) are not suitable for intentional livestock operations. It would also most likely devalue neighbouring homes.
- [removed]
- I don't believe "support from adjacent neighbours" is necessary provided the animal's owner isn't breaking any rules.
- this will get out of hand
- Nothing to do with yous
- Farm animals should be on a farm, to be properly cared for.
- I think it could create an additional problem with more animal being strayed. As well increase more wild predators to urban areas. The coyote population is growing as is already an issue in some neighborhoods
- "I don't have any concerns about people having hens in their yard, I
- just would be very cautious of people wanting designer animals and facilitating the black market on animal trade."
- As it currently stands, there are enough issues and problems with bylaw and CPS enforcing other matters. If you have a community that collectively wants a single area to raise chickens, then that could work. But on an individual basis, it will lead to more problems.
- Ones freedom to determine how they use their own property should not be determined by their neighbors.
- I am against animal exploitation.
- People always take advantage of situations and things will get abused. Keep farm animals where they belong.
- I don't think anyone wants to live next to a hen
- farms are where farm animals stay chickens fine if its not right ontop of your neighbour

- Livestock belong on farms
- Buy an acreage or farm. Chicken manure smells.
- People will not follow guidelines and officers will not be able to keep up to calls and complaints.
- I don't support holding animals for humans own gain.
- There is already too many problems with cats wandering and dogs barking or not being removed from careless owners. We don't need to add to the already thinly spread resources we have for animal bylaw enforcement.
- If you want hens, get an acreage. A city plot is NO place for a foul run.
- I live in NE Calgary. Certain ethnic cultures will deliberately "misread" the bylaw and claim English as a barrier to understanding. They will possess 8 hens per person, not household and wait until the overwhelmed bylaw officer to finally visit. They will only correct the hen count for a few days and resume their commercial size hen lots knowing the entire NE will have only one assigned bylaw officer to do enforcement. This is an absurd idea.
- Livestock belong in a rural setting
- I considered buying a house but was saddened by the neighbors owning ducks and bunnies and they were fenced in right beside the house.
- All we need are more viruses to come out as a result of poor hygiene and not having proper facilities for raising and breeding hens. Farms outside of the cities and facilities that are built to have live stock are right places. Suburban areas in a city are for pets that you can control when they make noise. You can't stop a rooster at 4 am when your sleep is most needed.
- Hens only at this time
- Hard to predict how the noise/smells/ etc would affect the neighbours.
- if you want to raise cows and horses in in the city, move to a farm. Let's not get carried away. We already have people who can not own a dog or cat responsibly, next they'll decide they want to try raising cows and horses in their home.
- Should be on farms and in rural areas. Will create a nuisance and problems within neighbors.
- We're going to have hygiene, rodent and noise / smell issues (as well as increased coyote activities and other complications) . If people want to raise hens, pigs etc. they should move to a small acreage or farm... not live in the middle of a city.
- Smell and noise would both be things that the owners couldn't control as well as they can with a domesticated animal.
- I do n out think any livestock or hens/chickens should be allowed. Far too stinky and noisy for city neighbourhoods.
- Hens will crow. No one wants that.
- Retarded.
- We hear hens clucking all day from a house 3 -4 doors away. I certainly would not want that noise coming from my neighbours yard.
- Extra risks and challenges. Deal with the current issues prior to adding on the pile
- The city is no place for farm animals. Leave them on the farm. Domestic animals, pets are nowhere near the same as livestock.

- I don't think it is fair for livestock to live in an urban area
- At present I have found no clear answers in concerns to how would policies be enforced, whether under wildlife services or Humane societies. In regards to tracking escaped poultry or livestock would a chip or collar be required? Are there appropriate veterinary services presently within the city of Calgary? What zones of Calgary would be prohibited due to living conditions, space limitations and natural spaces? What standard are poultry coops going to be held to? How will the city take care of wildlife attracted to the coops within private property? None of these questions have been answered for me, along with multiple other questions revolving around the topic and I feel until these questions have been adequately researched, answered and justified poultry should be kept outside of Calgary city limits.
- This is gonna bring coyotes in big time. Seeing as how you guys can barely control the coyotes in the nw Evanston area you really want this problem everywhere? More bobcats too. [removed]
- As much as I love animals I feel a lot of people wouldn't do the correct research resulting in more animals not being cared for and surrendered.
- How would you know, if they have already gone a head it would be harder to remove after
- there are too many irresponsible owners. My neighborhood is already turning into a shanty town with sketchy car ports and people paving their front lawns to make room for 6 vehicles to park. We don't need chicken coops just because one neighbor will share eggs with another neighbor
- I think there are too many people who would abuse this
- These are rural animals. These are not pets, and should not be raised in an urban environment for feed.
- Noise of chickens, allergies to most farm animals, hay, etc.
- Hens should not be raised in the city. The smell, noise and space would be hard to control and impact the neighbourhood and neighbours.
- "Noise, smell, coops are ugly and dirty. Move out of town if you want a barn yard.
- I don't need a rooster waking us up every morning.
- There is NO way you can have a coop that will not be a nuisance to adjacent property."
- Farm animals DO NOT BELONG IN THE CITY. Get them out of the city, if you want farm animals then live outside the city
- High density Urban living doesn't mix with the risk of increased zoonotic infection risks
- will be noisy and also waste management of the owner could be an issue
- Who would be inspecting the suitable conditions for the animals and what dictates suitable in a city where it's winter almost 6 months of the year and temperatures below -30°C
- Concerns over noise, smell, affect to property values.
- It's a slipping slope.
- Chickens and livestock carries disease, We don't need to commingle the two in the city. Dog owners are hard enough to control and penalize. We don't need to add chickens, goats or other livestock owners pushing the rules too. Just say no!
- How can you think in exploring the feasibility of allowing urban hens in Calgary if our current pet bylaws is full of holes i.e why allow dangerous breeds as pets (pit-bulls)? Why don't you think on strengthening how to enforce current bylaws i.e dog owners who throw the bagged poop or even do not pick the poop at all (please go to any park in Calgary around 9 pm and see how many poop or bagged poop you find, see how many people/kids are traumatized by dogs unleashed in leash only parks or beaches. It seems we the citizens of Calgary are under de dictatorship of pets and soon it will include the dictatorship of the hens.

- We are in an urban environment. If you want livestock move to the country.
- This is not a problem to my knowledge, and would likely result in some kind of unintended consequences.
- farms do not belong g in cities. Space is already a large issue
- I don't think livestock should be allowed in the city except for support animals for health reasons, to be approved by the bylaw officer.
- No livestock in the city. We aren't farms and our neighbours are too close to deal with other people's livestock.
- Chickens are noisy and they're feces are very foul odoured.
- Livestock belongs on the farm
- Hens belong on the farm
- Odour, noise, and cleanliness are potential issues that neighbours will have to deal with.
- Only acceptable if no neighbours within 100 yards have a right to veto.
- No livestock in the city. Its annoying soundwise and smell.
- Hens are farm animals, they are analogous to cattle, sheep, goers, etc.
- Smell. Noise. No thanks.
- There are too many people that will not take care of these animals and they will be lose in the city.
- Urban and suburban private residences are not the place for chickens who can be noisy and create noticeable odour.
- There is no place for smelly, noisy animals in the inner city.
- Noisy
- I do not want hens or other livestock to be allowed in city limits
- The city is no place for those animals. If you want to own them, then move to an acreage
- Majority of city lots are now 8 metres wide; there are basement suites, garage dwellings, lane house etc. Calgary is high density. Hens require free range and are a great deal of work to maintain a healthy hygeinic environment for both the birds & the humans. Research confirms viruses including the bird flu, resulted in China due to housing livestock in crowded conditions. Residents can't even maintain their yards, such as weed control & sidewalk snow removal, picking up their dog's excrement let alone caring for chickens. Will you have a chicken patrol to check up on the welfare of the birds. What a non-sensible proposal and for what purpose?
- Na
- My experience with bylaw reinforcement for barking dog complaints is poor so I imagine reinforcing nuisance livestock complaints would be poor. I don't believe livestock in an urban setting is good.
- I would not support hens in the city limit. They are farm animals. They stink and are load.

- Chicken bring other pests to the area i do not believe they belong in small spaces
- Too difficult to control the noise and smell when owners are irresponsible. Onus on neighbors to file complaints. Residential lots in Calgary are way too small
- Non domestic animals brought into established residential neighbourhoods are often very disruptive to the neighborhood. Noise, smell & nuisance factor are not conducive to a relaxing, clean family environment. This should include de-scented skunks, ferrets, chickens, goats & pigeons etc.
- Having livestock will cause increase in predator incursions into city which is becoming more of a problem every year. Move outside city limits if one wants livestock
- Calgary is an urban city with over a million citizens and developers pushing houses closer together. There is no room in this for these types of animals. It is not a farm or rural area.
- Livestock shouldn't be allowed within city limits.
- No livestock in Calgary!
- Live in the country of you want chickens. Simply outrageous to have this in a city like Calgary.
- why hens?
- Calgary is a huge CITY, not an urban living area. Though it sounds like fun, hens are. Not meant to be raised in the close quarters of a city area.
- There should be a clear demarcation of livestock in urban environment and rural. Imagine every condo owner having a hen in the beltline? Certain areas of the city, rural like, can be permitted to have hens
- For medical purposes only.
- Farm animals not necessary in city
- Farm animals don't belong in personal residences in the city. If people want farm animals, they should move outside of the city
- Livestock does not belong in the city
- I believe that we live in a CITY not in the country....
- Farm animals can stay on farms.
- It's absurd to have livestock in the city. We already have too many issues spinning out of control. And we CAN'T AFFORD IT.
- livestock should not be permitted in city limits.
- Livestock does not belong in the city.
- Livestock and hens do not belong in urban areas.
- noise, smell, mess
- any livestock(including hens) on small city lots will cause noise, smell, and waste issues.
- I grew up on a farm and the smell, noise, attraction of coyotes/mice etc and the fact hens only lay eggs for a few years cause me NOT to support hens in the city
- Farm animals/ livestock belong on farms, not in a city. They need more space to live & roam, expel excrement that needs to be disposed of, are noisy & not domesticated. Allowing animals in a city is a recipe for another bubonic plague. This issue should be dead in the water forever & it is ludicrous to even waste time considering allowing animals to reside in the city.

- We're not living in the country - chickens smell and most people don't take care of them properly.
- No body needs a farm downtown or smell it
- Farm animals belong on farms
- animals belong on large plots of land not found in Calgary and are not suitable for our urban situation
- Sorry, no. I live in the inner city. I see neglected cats, stray cats, loose dogs and I live across the street from a dangerous dog. I think it is a fad and I'm afraid the amount of care needed to handle urban hens is not going to be taken seriously. I think we'll see the same issue that we saw with people dumping pet rabbits. Every time the train goes by the Ertlon train station (I think that's the station), I see several pet rabbits living outside (dumped and have become "outside" rabbits). I'd like to see people keep their cats inside. Once we have this down I think we can move to urban hens. Re: pigeons. Absolutely not. I think the City should assume that they'll become "food" birds. Same reasoning as above. I already have pigeons being fed in my area. I don't think it's a good idea to give people the option of pigeons as "pets". What is the rationale for having pigeons as pets?
- Livestock really do not have a place in the city. Those who really want to take care of such animals will need to relocate outside the city (to a farm). There are risks including attracting other wildlife and potential for more animal based diseases.
- I have no faith that a byblaw officer would be enough to prevent abuses of the new rules.
- too broad and hard to monitor. for example support from adjacent neighbors, how many, how close, moving, new neighbors etc
- Farm animals should be on the farm
- the city has enough difficulty controlling cat and dog issues let alone free range whatever situations
- No need for this in a city environment
- They belong on a farm
- Because they should be on a farm.
- Hens are preyed upon by measles, foxes, coyotes and other animals. The presence of hens will attract predators to the neighbourhood. We already have trouble with roaming cats shitting in the garden, skunks taking up residence under the deck and wasps setting up home in the composter. We do not need more vermin in Calgary.
- There is no need for other livestock in Calgary
- I don't live on a farm for a reason and I don't want to live next to livestock.
- live stock belongs on farms not in the city
- It would not be long before there would be goats, sheep, llamas, pigs included.
- This can be one a major issue for those neighbours that are on either side where the animal(s) are kept. The smell, the untidy nature of the yard/area/noise etc. This could affect someone's house value when trying to seek ones home as buyers might be turned off if this is next door. I could see people thinking this is a "cute" idea at first then lose interest and things go downhill for the animal(s) and there area they are house in.

- Such animals are unable to comply with current noise restrictions/by laws. Hearing these types of animals throughout the night and early morning is disruptive to neighbours, and is something the owner(s) may not be able to control.
- It's not fair to neighbours. Hens can smell, noisy, carry disease and homes are too close together to not affect neighbours
- I don't think it is an appropriate use of land and to expect all your neighbors to be happy to listen to the "rooster" crow at 6 am every day is unreasonable.
- Might attract a higher amount of wildlife into communities (coyotes, etc)
- I do not think that there is any need to have livestock within the city limits. Hens included. They can attract predators (i.e. coyotes) and we already have enough issues with coyotes within city limits, without enticing them to come closer.
- Loudest dirtiest animal
- There is an abundance of rural land and rural-urban (towns) in Central Alberta with much more lax restrictions on this issue. A person in an alpha or beta city should not have the expectation that they can have livestock on their property. There are so many opportunities to live a more rural lifestyle if that is what one desires - a city like Calgary need not be and should not try to be all things to all people.
- Concerned about health issues due to hens at urban areas
- Ridiculous idea to keep livestock in the city. This is opening the door to abuse by irresponsible owners.
- Give people an inch and they will take a mile. Start allowing all kinds of animals to be homed in neighbourhoods and you will open a Pandora's box of issues. I want a cow, well I want a bison, I want an exotic cat... Recipe for disaster. 2 chickens max based on the above criteria but maybe have a size limit based on sqft avail and living conditions (acreage vs backyard in Ramsey)
- Rural animals do not belong in an urban setting. They require more space
- I think it is unsanitary you have hens and live stock within small and personal properties in the city limits. Farm animals should remain on farms.
- Calgary lots are generally not large enough to properly and humanely house animals with proper shelter space and enough space to roam.
- I do not want more animals in my neighbourhood. Livestock belongs on a farm/range, not on residential property.
- Live stock should not be in city limits. Chickens are one thing, but other farm animals belong on a farm
- We are all in lockdown because of CV-19 and now you want to let farm animals all over the city? Only morons would think this is a good plan . You want farm animals buy a farm.
- Farm animals belong on a farm, they stink.
- I wouldn't support this because of the possibility of noise and smell.
- I don't think people are capable of caring for farm animals in an urban environment. There is not enough space in most yards, there will be noise complaints, and it may bring predators such as coyotes or bobcats into the area.

- No livestock whatsoever in Calgary limits. They are not required and this is standard in every major city in North America. Do not fix something which is not broken. If you want hens move out of Calgary.
- Usually other livestock other than fowl, end up being slaughtered for food. Will there be rules around not slaughtering the animals in your back yard?
- The city is too dense (properties too close together) to allow this without potentially impacting neighbours negatively. It's bad enough we have to deal with the smell from fire pits that we would have to deal with the smell of livestock.
- live stock are for farms .
- If I wanted to own livestock, it shouldn't be based on if it benefits the community or what my neighbour thinks. Living conditions definitely matter and should be looked into for sure.
- Some people have a hard enough time taking care of their dogs and cats let along an exotic animal
- Livestock should not be in urban areas unless the property is an acreage.
- I do not believe city conditions are suitable or humane for larger-than-poultry livestock.
- [removed]
- If you want to live like on a farm - then you need to buy property out of city limits and live on a farm.
- The noise, & smel.
- Main reason that I don't support this, would be what happens if the neighbours move and new ones move in. Do they have to go through the process again? If not, that wouldn't be fair to the new neighbours.
- Not a good idea in a residential neighborhood.
- Noise and door are concerns
- I'm vegan, we don't need more animals.
- Noise and smell
- I don't thing livestock need to be in Calgary . Move to country if u want livestock.
- Hens are farm animals and do not belong in city residential communities. City residents and neighbours shouldn't be forced to live alongside with farm animals, nor should neighbours need to be consulted on these ridiculous matters. If the assenting neighbours move and new neighbours don't share the same decision, what happens to the hens? Issues already exist in neighborhoods with owners not cleaning up their animal's waste and the associated smells that go with it. Once hens are allowed, what's next? Pigs? Cows? Horses? It's important to keep the city a city and the farm animals on a farm, both for the human and animals' health and well being.
- Noise
- Sanitation issues
- Because there is not enough space in a calgary backyard to operate a farm
- Chicken last do not belong in the city
- If we don't have responsible dog or cat owners how will this work?
- Most urban neighborhoods are too dense to be able to raise chickens without having some type of impact on immediate neighbors, whether by sound, or smell.

- Farm animals belong on a farm not in the city. I would strongly oppose the noise, smell, and mess
- Livestock do not belong within city limits
- Bringing chickens in just bring more mice.
- Chickens, unless supported by a medical professional, should not be living in the city. They belong on a farm.
- Too many challenges would exist. How many animals? How big? How noisy? Other environmental challenges.
- Hens roaming loose are food for coyotes - coyotes are already under a lot of stress and don't need to be painted black by irresponsible chicken owners
- Too many people are irresponsible with the animals they can currently legally keep. Hens should not be added to the list they are stinky, loud, a nuisance to neighbours and will further impact real estate as it'll remove resale value.
- Not in favor of farm animals in city backyards in any capacity
- If they are well cared for I think hens is a great idea
- Noise & Nuance.. I would not want to be living next to a neighbor with Urban hens, chickens etc. Keep that to acreage & farms. City is a City.
- I don't have enough knowledge on the subject.
- People have a hard enough time looking after dogs and cats in residential areas and now we are going to introduce more livestock that will be at large. I can guarantee this will not be a good thing
- Hens belong in farms or acreage homes, not in the city.
- Chickens are not clean animals and people don't always take care of their animals in a manner that is best for that animal. Chickens fall under that category. Chickens don't belong in an urban setting, they belong on a farm.
- Wild animals do not belong in the city. Period.
- Provides a disease vector for bird to bird transmission as well as bird to human. Risks of disease transmission to the commercial chicken industry
- Stinks up the neighbourhood
- If I wanted to live next to a "farm", I'd move to a rural area!
- I don't want hens or other livestock living new door to me
- What standard is there for the care of chickens or livestock? There must be history showing people can provide care and knowledge of the breed. Livestock is a lot of work, and can be a nuisance to the community if someone does not know what they are doing.
- There is no need for other livestock to become pets
- Loud ongoing noise that can not be mitigated by training or placing inside the residence. Like a dog or cat. Hey honey can you go bring the rooster/goat/ pig inside as they are getting a bit loud out there isn't an option. Ex 5 am rooster crow (when you work nights) not a trainable trait. Noise
- This is ridiculous
- Livestock belong in farms and not urban areas.
- Livestock belong on a farm not in the city.

- Livestock and chickens can spread vires. Some livestock would cause noise violations.
- Livestock belongs on farms, or in rural areas wherein they have the freedom and space to live healthily and free. Hen coops (or other confined urban livestock enclosures) are not only detrimental to the health of the animals, but (in large) cause nuisances in the neighbourhoods they live in. Any people who want to own such enclosures should only do so as a business, thus requiring a business license, and properly inspected facilities. This way, the city would benefit from the purchase of City business licences, the animals would benefit from proper living conditions, and the owners would benefit from either proper training, or potentially profitable enterprises.
- When homes are built very close together and privacy is at a minimum, it is NOT respectful or appropriate for hens or rabbits or other livestock to be right next door- noise, smells, concerns for animal welfare etc...
- these people need to move to a farm Calgary is a city I do not support any livestock within city limits
- No chickens please
- Farm animals are not appropriate in my city
- What we need to address first is get the compliance and enforcement in place for what we have, not introduce more things like hens.
- I don't want to live by any kind of livestock
- It's going to start with hens and then it's going to be some other kind of farm animals. If you need farm animals around you, move to a farm.
- Within reason unfortunately you'd you will hire a person with 2 weeks training to run the program and make the decisions anyways
- due to the ever increasing density of calgary, there are limited suitable locations that would permit urban livestock without significant noise disruption to the surrounding community.
- I would support community based, in no residential areas
- There would be a noise issue. Let farmers do this!
- It is a slippery slope..... it would require significant increase to monitor and would easily devolve into a nuisance situation! Numerous home owners unable to keep property clean as is!
- Livestock does not belong in the city
- Farm animals belong on farms, not in backyards. Roosters crowing at dawn can be heard for blocks, not just at adjacent houses!
- Farm animals do not belong in urban areas. They belong on the farm!
- Too noisy and smelly.
- belong on a farm not city
- Chickens should be outside of the city
- In the city, the population density is too high
- Too loud.
- I believe this is a trend for some people and they don't understand what's involved in their care.
- Farm animals do not belong in the City

- In the case of loose hens it may increase urban road kills and increased chances of disease spread if not kept responsibly.
- Depends on the type of livestock that doesn't infringe on noise bylaws and cleanliness
- Livestock does not belong in the city. Including chickens
- Chickens equal mice
- Stinky. Noisy. Unclean. I live in a city, not a farm.
- Livestock belongs in the country. And, who decides if a miniature pony is acceptable but a Clydesdale is not?
- Noise, stench, lowering property values
- Livestock should remain outside of the city limits.
- I don't think the city would be giving very fair condition guidelines for these animals. This would absolutely leave too many animals left in horrible conditions/unfair conditions.
- I can see this becoming a problem. Attracts predators, can be noisy and smelly.
- Case by case exceptions are not acceptable
- Urban areas are not suitable for keeping livestock like hens given the very close proximity to neighbours in many areas of the city. Too many judgement factors to consider. Just no.
- Too noisy
- If they want a farm move to one. Otherwise could create issues for neighbours.
- The city is no place for farm animals
- If I was woking by a rooster at 5:00 am I work be pissed off. Pig's also has to go.
- An urban environment is not appropriate for livestock or chickens. The city properties are not large enough to accommodate livestock and it could be more harmful to the animal and human health. It could be a disturbance for neighbours and will create more issues in neighbourhoods.
- Calgary currently has a very great dog program. People with all dogs need to be more accountable. ALL DOGS
- I have lived in other countries where urban hens are allowed and they attract rodents and other vermin. Also it increases urban smell/pollution.
- All that bringing chickens in will do is increase smell / flies & the potential that the hens themselves are attractants for nuisance wildlife
- The adjacent neighbour part of the amendment is good. Does this mean if a neighbour says no then the issue is dead? The smell and the noise can't be mitigated enough to make them an appropriate animal for city life.
- who cares
- Livestock do no belong in the city
- Several primary concerns - noise, smell and poor treatment of the animals. Chickens drive me nuts first thing in the morning and the smell is gross. Although rabbits are quiet, folks usually have a difficult time keeping them confined - for example, we had a neighbor like this and their rabbits dug holes all over our yard and destroyed our garden. If the animal can be keep indoors, then I have no serious problem with it. However, city lots are typically too small to support "exotics" you would normally find on a farm, and I am dead set against allowing them in the city! You have enough trouble with feral cats and barking dogs which are very difficult to manage.

- Property area is already too small, not large enough for mini-farms. Animal smells, ticks and noise would add health risks. Would not be able to enjoy the too short summers. House values decrease in neighbourhoods that would allow livestock rearing. Neighbour squabbles would increase which will add to mental illness. Will increase City's expense in odour and cleanness/hygiene monitoring.
- "Hens do
- Not belong in city limits"
- Not within city limits.
- It's not fair to neighbours that have no say in what someone may get yet they'd have to put up with smell, noise, etc. Bad enough that we have to put up with barking, howling dogs.
- I don't want to hear or smell them
- Livestock are for farms
- Hens and other farm animals should not be allowed within Calgary city limits. Noise and odours are two obvious reasons for this.
- They will spell up the neighbourhood
- I don't believe we need livestock in the city. Imagine listening to a rooster crowing early every morning and throughout the day, as many are known to do.
- Too many resources would be required to monitor and verify each instance. Pigs are a huge concern. If you grew up on or near a pig farm, you wouldn't offer this possibility.
- Seriously.!? This is a ridiculous concept.
- NO LIVESTOCK IN THE CITY!
- "Chickens and livestock belong on the farm.
- Not in the city."
- Calgary is not farmland. If a person wants hens or any other livestock, they should move to a farm.
- I have noise concerns
- Properties are too small for livestock. Noise and smell concerns are paramount.
- These can be very smelly animals to raise
- Noise, smell and attracting coyotes, skunks, etc
- I support the amendment but do not support hens or other livestock to be permitted in residential areas in Calgary
- But have neighbours that have pigeons, and I consider them a nuisance, so not sure about adding.
- Thing will get out of hand
- This is an urban area not rural
- I am concerned about the level of noise and odors, given numerous communities in the city have housing with minimal spacing between / among them. It also becomes quite subjective, as to what an acceptable level of noise and odor can be. For individuals, who are particularly sensitive to either of the above impacts, allowing certain urban livestock to reside in close confines can greatly impact the quality of life (ie less sleep, depending on time of noise or nausea and other physical responses to excessive odors).

- We are not farmland
- Dogs and cats alone cause enough issues. More animals = more issues.
- Poultry animals are smelly dirty and noisy. Let's start policing dog walkers who don't clean up after their dogs before allow more stench and disgust in the city
- chickens can emit odours that then can permeate the area. Many have lived by irresponsible dog owners who don't pick up and it's not nice. They will also attract mice. I also worry about keeping chickens in Calgary's brutal weather. Once the novelty wears off who will police that they have heat and adequate unfrozen water etc?????
- Chickens okay. Other farm animals would not have the necessary quality or life in the city. They need more space and would likely be considered nuisances based on smell, noises, etc
- Livestock of any kind do not belong in the city given many residents inability to properly care for dogs and cats
- the Needs of the many outweighs the needs of the few- live stock belong on a farm for the well-being of the animal as well
- The city is no place for livestock. No matter how you do it there will be no real way to control this not to mention it will attract predators, etc. People who want to own livestock can move out of the city.
- Noise and smell considerations in urban areas. Nuisance owners using bylaw to raise animals for consumption.
- who wants hens next as a neighbor? they are farm animals and who know what is in their feathers
- I believe that with all the current problems we have with animals in the city, it would not be wise to bring in livestock without having an influx of problems and complaints.
- Too loud and annoying
- I don't want to have to be the "no" voice of a neighbour wants to get an unusual animal.
- Yards of recently built homes are smaller than previously built homes which does allow adequate space for the health of the hen and to reduce negative interactions with neighbours.
- I do somewhat agree with this amendment in that if hens were allowed in urban setting, they need to be treated well with a good home environment, but I'd rather they stayed in rural environments where they have more room to run around and live a better life.
- Just let them have animals. We are too separate from nature and the 'support from neighbours' is just a recipe for conflict.
- Fear that coyote population will increase and roosters will make a lot of noise
- I do not believe livestock is necessary within city bounds. It opens up too much possibility for enforcement which we do not have the budget for increasing this oversight and monitoring.
- What a stupid idea in a crowded city. Chickens stink you know!!
- Noise, smell
- Rats.
- This is an urban setting, if you want livestock, move to a rural property.
- The city is no place for livestock of any kind.

- I don't want to hear a rooster or smell chicken poop while at my house
- The smell might be an issue especially if you are living right next door. Rural areas fine but not right in the city.
- Farm animals belong on a farm
- I'm worried about the smell
- our taxes are high enough. Cost of more bylaw officers is prohibitive. Lots in Calgary are too close together and small. They do not support livestock.
- You want farm animals - move to an acreage/farm
- I like the idea but I don't have the full picture of what this would look like or smell like.
- I think the smell and noise from livestock would be difficult to manage in an urban setting.
- Livestock isn't appropriate for a city. Particularly on small lots or at townhouses/condominiums.
- "Because there's not enough enforcement of animal protection laws in Canada.
- Allowing livestock in urban areas would allow inexperienced animal caregivers and owners access to these animals and they will become the new puppy mills"
- Our neighbor had them.. dirty and noisy
- I wouldn't care for any of my neighbors having livestock. There is no space for them to have any quality of life
- Not many people would raise the hen well. Now, there's more option to buy organic eggs. Yes, of course it costs more money.
- Hens are not pets and they make lots of noise and the smell very bad. They cannot be trained like dogs.
- I would like a clearer definition of "livestock". I would have to say that livestock does not belong in the city. Lot sizes are too small, particularly in new neighbourhoods. Odours, noise concerns. I have no issue with pot belly pigs. However, where do you draw the line? I don't wish to see or smell my neighbour slaughtering livestock!
- Livestock belongs on a farm.
- Some people already do not adhere to current land use bylaws or maintain the property of weeds, etc. To allow them to have livestock would end up being a further nuisance to the neighbors
- I have enough noise in my neighborhood without having chickens and whatever other animals you deem acceptable
- Animals are noisy and smelly. It's bad enough we have to endure barking dogs and dog feces smell from neighbours, we don't need to add more animals.
- No hens if going through with bully breed legislation - stop bullying my breed
- Livestock belong on a farm or small holding. They are not, never have been and never will be urban animals. The needs of the animals should also be taken into account and that is a peaceful setting in which to live the lives as naturally as possible. In addition, they are usually noises and with the restricted space between homes, can only become a nuisance (getting woken up at the crack of dawn every morning is only one aspect. Sick people need peace and quiet and having a farmyard outside is no such environment. There is also a smell and disease factor: hen food attracts rodents, for example.

- Where does it stop...goats, pigs, cows. Hens are farm animals pure and simple, not standard pets such as cats or dogs.
- I have been around them they are loud and they smell.
- I don't believe that the animals' needs can be adequately met in an urban setting. Nor is proper veterinary care enforced which can result in public health concerns.
- Think of the escapes.
- This proposed amendment, is arbitrary and discriminatory. It has no basis in fact.
- I don't see a reason to have a hen in a city
- If the five freedoms cannot be met for that animal, it should not approved for city living. For example, if one owns a goat in the city, how can it have enough room to walk around and enough grass to graze on in addition to the hay. You could take your goat on a walk I guess but how would you pick up after it considering all the fecal material are like small marbles?
- I do not think the city has proper abilities in place to properly monitor this. I think it will just get out of hand and to many issues will arise from this. Costing us tax payers more in the long run. So no.
- I don't believe it is ethical to use animals for our own benefit- I would also wonder about the consequences if people are using these animals for food (will they be butchering animals in their backyards?)
- Livestock do not belong in the city!
- Lived next door to someone who had chickens and rooster. Noisy and smelly.
- "This is a city. Live outside a city if you desire such animals.
- There is no benefit to neighbors from ownership of such animals. People move, neighbors change."
- Potential to be too much of a nuisance in an urban setting. I certainly would be upset if one of my inner city neighbors had hens in their yard.
- Should not be allowed in residential areas.
- No is no
- Farm animals are meant for farms not to be stuck in a backyard in a city
- They cause disease and noise
- what do you do if you get new neighbors, the last ones said yes but maybe the new ones dont want support it - do you slaughter said hens?
- Farm animals should be on the farm
- if you want to farm move to a rural setting
- I don't want to hear chickens next door
- livestock belong on a farm or rural area
- It is too easy to have them in an environment that affects others, unlike a farm or acreage . You can't control the noise they make. There could also be a problem with sanitation and odor.
- The city is not the proper environment to have farm animals reside in, it is not feasible to start this program as it could lead to more problems down the road.
- I do not support the idea of livestock living within city limits. It is cruel to the animals and unfair to neighbours.

- Chicken coops and chicken feces are filled with organisms that can be dangerous. Chickens can escape. Chicken coops can smell.
- Odor, noise and invitation to predators
- having chickens increases mice etc...which increases cats roaming...just to get trapped
- People don't take care of their in door pets properly so farm animals should stay at the farm.
- Noise can be an issue. Unfortunately more opportunity for irresponsible owners.
- Farm animals make noise, carry disease and smell and require special care and attention that is not easy to provide in an urban setting with harsh winters. Not all people are even responsible enough to pick up dog poop much less care for other animals. And chickens would also attract other animals (coyotes, raccoons, slums) into the city as they look for food. Bylaws will never be enforced properly and animals and neighbours will be the ones who suffer, not the irresponsible animal owner.
- People can not be trusted at present to even manage their cats and dogs and you want to allow even more animals to be kept domestically? No way
- Hens would be a nuisance on most properties and would just cause more issues. City people don't want a rooster crowing in the morning or periodically throughout the day
- Chickens are noisy, dirty and subject to disease. They attract predators such as skunks, foxes and coyotes.
- I need more information what this would look like in practice. Will there be restrictions on the # of hens; what kind of living quarters they will have, etc.
- If someone wants to play at Farmer, they should be in a rural environment.
- Control of Sanitary and noise issues are paramount. I would have concern as current bylaws and the time by law officers have to deal with car and dog issues are inadequate. Education is great, but we have seen repeat offenders being able to get away with only a letter time and time again. They know that there is no real penalty so do not try to change. Unfortunately this leaves neighbours to suffer and "pay the price"
- Absolutely no livestock belongs within city limits
- so if your neighbor gets ten stinky disgusting dinosaur birds and all you can then do is sell your house and move that's not fair to the neighbors
- depending on the neighbourhood house are too close together and everyone should be able to enjoy their back yards.
- Livestock needs are different than what a small city lot can provide. Neighborhoods are not built to support livestock. Plus, the odours from livestock will carry throughout the area. If you want livestock, you need to live in a rural setting.
- Chicken coops are filled with organic that can make people sick. Birds can escape and get into others yards. They can also get smelly.
- Disease, smell if you want a farm buy one. You open the door to hens then what?
- Dirty, smelly and no need. If they was hens, chickens in their yard buy a farm. What's next cows
- You would have farms inside city limits and that doesn't belong.
- It's the citythey should be left on the farms

- It is hard enough for bylaw officers to police cruelty to pets. We should not add more animals to become pets and subject to cruelty.
- Seriously? Cities aren't meant to be farms. And vice-versa.
- I've lived in neighbourhoods allowing livestock while in BC. Fastest way to become overrun with rodents.
- I wouldn't want a hen house for a neighbour.
- if a neighbor is fine with having chickens, what about renters that leave in a year? The new renters? Would it be up to the owner? Can the neighbor withdraw support if they become a nuisance? What would happen to the chickens? We have pest problems already, what if skunks become more prevalent in the neighborhood? Will there be a limit?
- Bringing my predators to the city by doing this
- the city is not appropriate to raise farm animals
- Too much care and responsibility for farm type animals needed within an urban area. Also, smells and noise complaints might increase substantially.
- Our backyards should not be a hen house. If you want livestock then buy yourself a farm.
- People barely care for dogs and cats. I don't need hens and roosters next door. And they will probably just be eaten by the Bobcats in the neighbourhood.
- that's disgusting
- I believe this could cause issues with other animals and pets especially depending on the area of the city if it's close to park and could draw coyotes and other animals into communities if they believe there are food sources
- i think livestock should be raised on a farm. Those animals need space. And maybe the neighbors say ok, but what about the next person to move in to the adjacent house?
- By and large people are very irresponsible with animals. Having hens and other livestock in the city will likely lead to endless noise and safety issues for neighbours
- If people want animals they should move to the country or a farm. No animals in the city.
- Work nights. Wouldn't like roosters waking me at 5 in the morning or during weekends
- Chicken coops are smelly and unsightly.
- livestock belongs on a farm or in the wild. Should not be sold for financial gain to be known as pets in a household/municipal environment unless, they are kept at the zoo (common sense). Like who thinks up these stupid ideas ??
- The property lot needs to have a standard minimum size and the hen house needs to be so many meters from neighbors and this won't be possible in MANY neighborhoods in Calgary
- If I wanted to live near a farm I would move to the country.
- Livestock should not be permitted within the city in residential areas.
- On a farm yes, but not in suburban areas.
- On the whole, majority of people have no clue the needs of any animal be they live outside the home or inside. They do what is appealing to themselves be it housing, feed, maintenance of any given animal. Also is the outside animal wanted as a Pet, or for food for the humans?

- Adjacent neighbour's may simply decline without an acceptable reason as to why.
- Hens and livestock should not be allowed in urban areas.
- Noise
- cities are for people ,country is for farm animals.
- NO farm animals in city - NO chickens or Pigeons
- That is a nuisance in a city neighborhood. People looking to raise hens should move out of city limits
- Livestock are to be on a farm, not in the city
- Many people do not know how to care for their domestic animals as is. Many SPCA's and shelters see an influx of abandonment of hens when cities allow them.
- Noise and smell. I do not want to live next to a barnyard. That's why we live in the city!
- we don't have enough space in the city but if it's in a community center maybe.
- I don't believe livestock should be permitted in an urban setting.
- Hens? Really? There are not many properties that can support setting up a proper hen environment that would not interfere with neighbouring properties
- Chicken can carry bird mites which can spread to humans and other pets. Infestations are very difficult to get rid of and can materially change the quality of life for those who have been infested.
- I don't like the idea of farm animals in the city! Should we not be concerned with the virus they may carry?
- Livestock is for Farms not for the city. We have enough issues with lost animals do not need to add to it.
- Urban means urban... rural means rural. Don't get confused
- Move to the country if you want live stock in your yard
- I would 100% not want to live beside someone who owned chickens. They are livestock and belong in the country.
- Most people are not always home and if the pets are being a nuisance to anyone, they cannot properly manage them. Not all pet owners do the basics of walking their dog for exercise, and they bark when they are bored or not walked. I have seen how easy it is for chickens to get loose even when caged, so that is not viable when nobody is home to watch. Pets need us to be around to have a happy life, and we want them for a happy life of our own. If we are not there , it makes no sense for them to have pets. Cats are not controlled, and nobody pays any attention to where they go. The answer is to someone else's yard to do their business and stink up the whole house. (first hand knowledge) How is that fair to the majority of pet owners who pay a licence fee and keep their pets under control at all times?
- As with any animal ownership. It is the owner who needs to be caring and responsible. Unfortunately in today's world you can easily have those who think it is fun or unique to have some hens or something but then just cannot be bothered to really spend the time to properly care for them. Same issue with lots who get a dog and then just lock it outside in the yard day and night and then wonder why the poor thing barks or howls or cries. You will have the same issue with other types as people who are not really committed to the ownership eventually abandon the proper care and leave the animal on the sidelines with minimum interaction.

- "I do not believe that people will provide the appropriate care and welfare for 'other livestock' within the city limits.
- I do support backyard chickens but I think that it would be too hard to properly enforce rules for other livestock and that citizens would try to find 'loopholes'"
- Somebody is going to abuse this law and bring something dangerous into the city. If you want chickens go buy an acreage
- Chickens belong on a farm not in the city
- I don't think farm animals have a place within urban areas.
- Hens are one thing (no roosters please), but I think this would open things too much to who knows what kind of animals that are just not suitable for an urban environment. You don't define "positive benefit" or "suitable living conditions" in a way that I can properly assess the impacts. For instance, are you considering that some animals may attract other pests? What are considered suitable living conditions for an animal? How large of an animal would be considered suitable for an urban environment? It also places way too much pressure on neighbours who don't agree -they could be vilified in the neighborhood (that mean person who didn't let them have animal x) or bullied by their neighbours. This needs more boundaries. Plus if things don't work out, what actions are available to neighbours, and will they be able to appeal the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer's decision in the case of an exception? The onus should be on the owner to prove the animal will not become a nuisance to others, not on the neighbouring owners to prove that it will negatively impact them. This places too much authority on the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer to allow these animals at the expense to others. In summary, if you want to farm, buy a farm.
- Livestock belong on farms with people who know how to care for them and have the space/facilities to care for them properly.
- Unless it is monitored closely this could get out of hand. And Calgary has small yards not enough room for a farm animal
- Hens are smelly and loud, i wouldn't want them living near me.
- Condensed living smaller property the city limits is not a place for these type of animals
- There is enough urban noise and hard to tell a chicken or rooster to shut up
- No roosters
- As a veterinarian, I have seen numerous cases of humans infected with salmonella due to ownership of backyard hens. Most people do not have the knowledge or training to properly care for these livestock, and both animals and humans suffer as a result. There is often not proper veterinary care given, there is no biosecurity to prevent zoonotic transmission of disease, and no vaccination/deworming programs. Unless there are proper programs in place to train people on the proper care and safety of keeping these animals, in which they are then allowed to purchase them, I do not support this change to the bylaw.
- Will always be too much effort to enforce and cause too many complaints.
- Livestock is too broad a term here. A person does not need a herd of goats in their backyard and larger livestock (cows, pigs, horses, llamas, etc) belong on a larger acreage or farm. Ducks, geese or other small birds may be OK.

- has covid not taught us anything about risks of bringing farm and other animals into higher density urban areas?
- Livestock should largely be maintained outside of the city. Whether for personal or professional use.
- Seriously?? A pet is a pet. A barn yard animal belongs in a barn yard. Do we need to have more potential for virus/influenza spread from animals to humans than we already do? Given the state of our world right now because of a virus from an animal that is not a pet, why would you approve that? Do your civic duty and protect the city.
- No we are city you want farm animals go to the country!
- Livestock belong in rural settings not urban settings.
- urban environments are not suitable for livestock
- Livestock in residential areas are not ideal due to noise and smell. Requiring support from adjacent neighbours creates the potential for animosity between neighbours who do not wish to have livestock living nearby.
- It sometimes spreads diseases to humans
- A distinction needs to be made between urban and rural properties and this includes livestock. Allowing hens simply opens pandora's box to a whole host of problems.
- I don't think livestock bering in the city
- If people want Hens, move out of the city. It's not something that any neighbour wants.
- Chickens stink
- There is the problem of smells, rodents, skunks etc. if a home owner wants livestock within an urban setting, they should consider an average setting
- The noise and smell are hard to control. If someone had a few acres of property they could keep the coupe further from houses but if someone living on under an acre of land has one it can be problematic.
- Unless there are enough bylaw officers to quickly dress noise, odour and other issues immediately (which you don't) then this should not be occurring.
- No livestock should be allowed in the city
- I have a dog. On a hot summer day a week's worth of defecation can be pretty smelly. I can't imagine what a coop would smell like in summer.
- Typical lot sizes do not provide adequate space and buffers for livestock in urban settings
- Seems it would invite a lot of extra noise and smell among closely situated houses.
- Hens carry ghiradia. They would also attract coyotes, bob cats and other wild life further into the suburbs and then they would be destroyed because they are following their natural instincts to hunt food.
- I don't want the noise or possible smell from my neighbor
- Livestock is not necessary in the city
- This system - the reviewed case by case basis - can very easily be subject to abuse by both the applicants and the CBEO. A great deal of properties in the city can't support suitable living conditions and there's an overwhelming amount of NIMBY (Not In My Back Yard) in the city, people wouldn't be reasonable even being presented the argument of "chickens would help keep bugs under control." I recognize the benefits on a personal level, but for all my relentless driving at "let's get a chicken coop," my desire to improve the neighborhood would be bottlenecked at the approval of my neighbors who may not feel the same way I do.

- Many livestock need grazing areas and most people do not have the means to clean and maintain livestock living quarters.
- The stench of livestock in the city should not be introduced. We have a vast majority of land at the edges of the city that are sufficing.
- Having lived with livestock, the potential for negatively impacting neighbours is high. Unless the amendment is written in a way that clearly protects neighbours from negative impacts (noise, odour, roaming critters) I cannot support it.
- How my yard is any neighbours business is beyond me
- Livestock should remain on farms and acreages that have the space to accommodate these animals.
- Noise for one.
- The animals would be too loud and smelly
- If people want to raise farm animals they should take some responsibility and not buy property in a city that doesn't allow it -- why must the majority bend to support a vocal but small minority? In a city we do not have space or infrastructure for manure -- disease would be a constant problem (as with feral and roaming cats). Neighbours would have to deal with smells and noise and probably unsightly runs/henhouses/etc. If rules were to be enforced we would need many more bylaw officers. I invested in an R1 house in a city with bylaws -- if I had wanted to live beside farm animals, I could have saved a lot of money buying a house elsewhere.
- Farm animals belong on the farm, not the city.
- The smell and noise would be a huge issue for neighbours. In addition, they would attract predators like coyotes.
- No livestock in city limits
- Its bad enough having neighbors dogs constantly barking. I just want to be able to sit on my deck in quiet without more animals in the city.
- A city is no place for livestock
- Do we really need chickens in your backyard?
- Live stack are dirty and will attract pests
- I'm concerned that people with livestock may slaughter on their property, in unhygienic and inhumane conditions. There's also an issue with noise and odour if larger livestock such as goats and pigs are kept on city properties.
- Neighbours change and neighbours don't always share the same philosophy. Owning an animal is a privilege, not a right. People should be allowed to possess pets as long as they do not infringe upon the rights of others.
- Too much leeway for animal abuse, neighbor conflicts.
- Allowing hens may have negative impact to neighbours priority
- Noise disturbances.

- Noise disturbance and odour
- Livestock is livestock, not a household pet.
- This will be based on a personal assessment, not a full guideline. The city houses are not meant to be a farm. A clear list of acceptable livestock would need to be provided prior to the bylaw to being approved.
- How will the city have the manpower to supervise urban ranches? What about the human treatment and housing? What would this look like?
- Livestock should be on a farm, if I wanted hens as a neighbour I'd be on an acreage not in the city.
- "If hens are able to roam, cats should be able to roam as well. I thought cats are not able to roam because it brings in predators such as coyotes and bobcats. Would this not be the case for roaming hens?"

- Generally, I like the idea of roaming wildlife."
- It's the owners property, no need for neighborhood approval. Remove that and I'd say yes.
- Yes/no is too broad. Certain livestock (goats/llamas) are cost effective for landscape control. Aviary (chickens) can cause noise disruption. Therefore, my current answer is 50/50 split with your current answer system.
- Livestock are a nuisance to neighbours, whether it be through noise, smell, or otherwise. They should not be allowed in the city.
- No point in this inside the city.
- Livestock can become more of a nuisance than the (wrongly) demonized pit bull
- no farm animals should be allowed in city
- If you want livestock rent some farmland
- Livestock are meant for the country and have the space. This would be animal cruelty. Why would you worry about dogs behaviour that owners are cruel to, and then turn around and bring in more situation were animal cruelty could happen and create an even worse situation. If people want livestock and animals they can move to so land so they get a nice life as we did when we wanted farm life. City life or Country life. People need to start realizing they need to make choices not have the best of both worlds all the time. (bet this pandemic would have turned out different if we all realized not to be so selfish)
- We have enough dogs barking and other noises in our neighborhood today, we don't need odors as well.
- Livestock carry with them potential for disease and pandemic. I do not believe any animal should be kept as livestock anywhere, but in a densely populated city is asking for another pandemic.
- Calgary is too populous to have livestock properly regulated by citizens and authorities.
- I wouldn't want to live next door to livestock.
- I think that to many people would call in to complain about their neighbours putting extra strain on the bylaw officers.

- My worries is around how the hen owner will keep their hens in out an property. Worried about the mess and appearance of the neighbours yard and how it will impact my property.
- What other livestock? Sheep, goat, cattle? Hens are manageable, but bigger livestock i'm nor so sure
- Such animals belong on a farm or acreage, not within urban setting. Noise and smells are two reasons. If such animals were allowed then City needs a by-law that sellers and real estate Agents must disclose presence of such animals in the neighbourhood that current owner has or or has supported.
- The city is no place for pigs, cows, chickens, etc. They are farm animals & their noise and messiness would not be welcome to other neighbours.
- I don't want farm animals living near me.
- Calgary is not currently providing citizens with proper guidance for dog ownership, it is certainly not prepared to take on other types of livestock.
- Hens will attract more coyotes in urban areas.
- Most people are unprepared or unaware to the normal sights, smells, and sounds that would come along with this. I believe that this would create a number of complaints and charges to bylaw.
- Why the hell are hens and animals alike being treated with more dignity, inclusiveness and respect than dogs? Dogs have special bonds with their owners and become attached. We eat chicken on a daily basis. Wake up.
- There should not be exceptions; we need consistency. As a homeowner I want to be assured that my neighbourhood will maintain a consistent standard
- If you want to live on a farm please move out of the City and enough with folks playing the "comfort animal" card.
- Livestock Can carry disease and need proper vaccines and deworming protocols. Also they can produce smell and need places to roam and keep warm in the winter that requires extensive coupes, pens, and or sheds. They do not belong in the city.
- Housing animals outdoors will cause unnecessary noise and odors which would affect quiet enjoyment of your property. It could also affect property value
- Livestock belongs on acreages not a city.
- Too much work required by the city to ensure the well-being of the animals. Animal cruelty cases are already difficult to address.
- Having farm animals in the city is a ridiculous proposal. They smell, can carry illnesses, can be a nuisance and quite frankly are what I expect to see in a town/city when traveling to a third world country.
- Current building rules have houses FAR too close together to have, even a well maintained number of hens to NOT be a nuisance from time to time
- An urban setting is not the place to raise livestock. The noise, mess, and smell affects neighbours not just the individuals wanting to raise livestock on their property.
- Having farm animals in a city environment doesn't work. Having chickens and other farm animals on the small lots than are generally the norm for city life is not fair on the animals or the neighboring population. A few may agree to the arrangement but a person has many neighbors who potentially could be affected. e.g. backyard fire pits.

- we don't need a bunch of people with gross chicken coops in their backyard and roosters waking us up at 5 am. Anyone who owned a farm knows chickens are messy nasty creatures
- Question is too vague. If hens, then yes. However, what is the amendment that would permit exploring criteria for potential approval of other livestock?
- They belong on farms only!
- I don't believe farm animals should be raised in the city.
- Livestock can stink way beyond property lines
- What other 'livestock' do people need in the city? Pigs, cows, horses? The yards can not and would not be able to support larger animals
- Livestock do not need to be in urban areas
- I didn't buy a home in an estate area to live next door to a chicken coop!
- "Farm" animals are best left at the farm. People who want these sorts of animals should live in a place where not in close proximity of others. There wants directly impact those around them.
Sound/Smell
- The needs of the many outweighs the needs of the few.
- I don't believe support from neighbours should be required if you don't allow roosters in the city.
- Live on a farm if you want live stock
- The city should stop restricting what private property owners do in their land. Unless the owner is infringing on someone else's rights, person, or property, the city should stay out And stop grossly overstepping as they do not
- Loud, smelly
- I have had friends who decide to raise chickens and are surprised at how difficult and challenging this can be. I worry for the health of the chickens at the hands of the inexperienced.
- Livestock doesn't belong in cities.
- They will be a nuisance.
- it's ridiculous
- [removed]
- Keep farm animals on a farm. The city properties aren't big enough. And the smell.. I would very upset if I couldn't go into my back yard because my neighbour had a stinky chicken coop
- Homes in the inner city area especially typically have very small yards and are not suitable for animals. There are coyotes in my inner city neighbourhood and this would potentially attract them to my yard.
- In the city, there would be more complaints about noise.
- I believe this will encourage people who will not receive any proper education on hens to get them, the hens will be improperly cared for, and likely will be a noise issue.
- Livestock should not be in city limits. Chickens smell really bad and are very noisy.
- They're a nice attractant

- No, no hens in the city. I don't want a neighbour with a chicken coop. They're messy and dirty.
- Urban chicken farming has already caused problems affecting the health of humans in other jurisdictions. Wanna farm? Great, move out of the city and be a farmer.
- Livestock has no place in an urban setting.
- Sounds like it would cause smell and noise. Depends on how big the persons property is.
- It's animal cruelty. The entire world is moving towards veganism.. there is absolutely no need to confine animals in small back yard cages.
- People will abuse the law and will not follow the rules. This will cause animals in shelter and long court cases. One person will interpret different than other. Kind of like apport animal being abused in USA
- Unacceptable for hygiene reasons - especially risk of infectious agents transferring to people. (Avian Flu and salmonella as examples). Also are noisy and smelly. Neighbours can not get away from them. There is no need for this.
- Noise, mess and smell are potentials for community friction with neighbours.
- Noise. If you wish to keep livestock, please relocate to a rural area. Cities are noisy enough already!
- Too noisy/stinky for our urban density
- Personally I don't believe hens should be in the city.
- The big issue would be smell and hygiene issues for neighbours.
- Livestock belongs on a farm.
- Livestock and hens belong on a farm not in the city limits
- Don't believe in urban livestock.
- The cost of bylaw enforcement will outweigh any benefits of urban livestock.
- .no animals in the city!!!
- I do not want to live next to exotic pets, or example a donkey, Turkey or a llama.
- Farm animals do not belong in peoples backyards. Aside from the noise there is also the issue of cleanliness. Farms do not smell nice. I would not want my neighbors yard smelling like a farm.
- Chickens are smelly
- To difficult to enforce
- Many situations where people don't take responsibility for the upkeep of their yards and pets. This would very likely add to the issues. I wouldn't want livestock next door to me.
- Why is the city of Calgary even considering allowing easier access to feeding products for wild animals?
- People living in the city are entitled human beings so save yourself form the unnecessary calls.
- Noise complaints, smell, disease
- Noise
- I currently do not feel typical farm livestock are appropriate for most Calgary neighborhoods. I think there'd be too much noise, too many smells/odours and with most houses too close together, I don't see how this would be a positive experience for most people living next door to this.
- Officials would not have the ability or resources to manage this effectively.

- Lower property value. Do you want here rosters in the morning
- I've lived in places that allow chickens in urban areas, they are noisy and stink I do not want to live next to them or other livestock
- Danger for abuse
- Chickens and other farm animals are just that. They are farm animals. Noisy and smelly. They absolutely do not belong in a city or town. I know, I lived on a farm as a child. I definitely do not want to smell the excrement wafting over from my neighbors yard in the city and I definitely do not want to hear or listen to them.
- A neighbour raised chickens. Turns out he was using the roosters to fight. Having the birds in town will encourage illegal and animal cruelty. I do not want a farm animal next to my home. Chickens are just the start of a slippery slope. City enforcement is lax on so many items please do not add more unenforceable laws.
- Livestock should be in rural municipalities
- Keep farm animals on farms. They are loud and filthy typically.
- I don't think it can be monitored properly. The worst thing I can imagine is neighbours within hearing distance that have a rooster who crows at the break of dawn EVERY DAY! I believe they will bring more predators into the city as well. Wildlife has lost so much habitat from our unending growth (and who is buying these new homes in the economic crisis that Calgary has been in for the last 5 years?), they will start to look for easy prey. I'd say a stinky chicken coop is a great place for them to find easy pickings!
- Urban is urban; keep 'livestock' rural.
- This could lead to additional odors and noise in the neighborhood.
- Too concerned about noise, mess and unsightly hen coops. I think hen ownership would be great but haven't heard or seen anything that convinced me it could be controlled correctly.
- Sorry, I can't see how supporting this slippery slope of allowing farm animals (starting with hens) can have a stop point. Every single animal will have its day in court from here on out. We can't have our cake and eat it. You want farm animals.... go live on an acreage not in a fourplex with a 100sqft backyard.
- Livestock is meant for acreage and or farms on the outskirts of the city or in the country.
- Livestock do not belong in an urban environment. Odor, noise, insects, rodents and predators are always issues when livestock are present.
- It would attract other wildlife into city limits.
- nope grew up with chickens at my neighbors in Penbrooke, they're loud, they smell, and attract all sorts of pests
- Why hens??? Why not goats???
- Urban farming does not encourage best management and animal care practices.
- This could lead to noise complaints
- Not specific enough
- Hens and other livestock are a potential reservoir for zoonotic diseases.
- No other option. Hens are filthy and don't belong in a city

- I worry about the noise of roosters
- It's too much noise and smell, what if new neighbors do not agree etc etc. Too many issues
- They smell, especially during warm days, can be quite strong if housed in a small area. Many diseases are spread through animals as we have seen with covid. Better to be proactive than cause a resident to become ill.
- Livestock belong on a farm and cannot have an adequate life in a back yard. I would be ok with chickens if the owners are held accountable for the smell (ie proper cleaning must be taking place)
- Too smelly for neighbors
- Livestock requires a rural or semi-rural setting, if only for the psychological well-being of the animal.
- Move to a farm if you want a farm animal.
- Neighbour support is too much dependent on someone's preferences and not objective facts or considerations
- Have we learned nothing from recent events and transmission of animal to human diseases.
- Chickens are loud and don't belong in a densely populated area. Not to mention the smell.
- They smell and are noisy.
- The city is not the place for chickens or other livestock.
- No livestock in city (hens and roosters) are very noisy, smelly, and can easily escape. Then like in other areas there has to be a team of enforcement officers placed "the chicken has flown the coop" chase. This gets very bad over time, I have this get out of control fast in many city's
- People live in cities because they aren't farms.
- City is not the place for livestock
- Hens belong at a farm where they can live their best life. Not in an already overly crowded city. Consider their quality of life living in a big city first, that's not fair to the animal.
- The criteria above are too subjective.
- Live on an average or farm if that's what you'd like.
- Noise. More rodents. Odors.
- People do not know how to properly look after livestock including hens. I don't think it would be good for the animals.
- We're opening up potential for more issues that will need to be dealt in a similar manner as this engagement.
- Livestock should only be allowed in the country. It's not fair for neighbors to have to listen, smell or deal with what comes along with having hens close by.
- Obviously if coyotes eat domestic pets, chickens would be tasty viddles.
- The animals are not the problem it is usually the owners. I feel that there may not be enough bylaw officers available to check out complaints if this is allowed.
- "No, I am completely against urban hens and any other urban livestock.
- Noise, smell, disease issues, impact to surrounding property values, etc.

- Actually, no, I would be OK with it, as long as the impact to property values is ameliorated - say a presumed impact of 20% of property value paid out to neighbours immediately (per, say, most recent city property value assessment), and then thereafter the same proportion of property tax be covered. I could put up with the nuisance of neighbouring chickens for that sort of compensation."
- i dont agree with livestock in the city.
- Respect for tax paying neighbours, must be number one priority before allowing farmyard pets.
- People would not look after ensuring the yards were well cared for so the smells were kept under control. These urban farms are fun till they aren't.
- Farm animals or livestock require larger spaces then city properties can accommodate due to mess, odour, and noise.
- We live in a city, not in the country on acreages or ranches.
- Livestock should not be in urban areas as the animals will impact neighbors and the neighbors have no say in this
- I don't believe that cities are appropriate places for laying hens or other livestock. Rural areas can provide more space and appropriate shelter for these animals.
- Why a hen? In the city? Last time I checked hens belonged in the farm.
- I don't have a problem with the idea but can easily imagine a couple people going overboard and bylaw not having the time to deal with it appropriately. It's easier to just stay at no.
- because calgarians are bad people. they would never consider the noise, smell, whatever effects on their neighbors
- I support all of these except for item #1. I don't see why my "community" should benefit from me personally keeping hens. That is nonsense. The other items I agree with.
- "Such animals have no place in the city
- Could cause noise and possible disease"
- Animal welfare is not sufficiently addressed.
- City is not a place for farm animals.
- Impact to neighbors and welfare if livestock
- I would be afraid they would not be properly cared for, or hens would be hoarded and not properly protected.
- Large livestock should not be in the city due to noise, and smell complaints and lack of appropriate living space to accommodate all need for the animals
- Farming should not be allowed in urban areas. It can be noisy and smell bad.
- Livestock should remain on farms
- Dirty and disgusting and could be a noise complaint from people in neighbour hoods
- These animals attract mice and other critters
- It is mind boggling that this is up for debate..... with all the problems in this world and the crisis our city is facing, this is priority.
- The disturbance these can be if escaped or noice for your neighbors. Attracting more prey animals, such as coyotes.

- Please no urban hens in the city.
- Cops are already have “above the law” mentality, this would just aid in that. The city needs to look at other options. Like having a department dedicated to dealing with this issue with proper education.
- I do not believe livestock should be permitted in Calgary. Even if adjacent neighbours agree at the time, if they sell and a new owner comes in, they may not be in agreement. What is to be done then?
- There are to many irresponsible pet owners now. Plus it is almost impossible to get enforcement as it is now with bylaw offences now!
- Opposing allowing hens or other farmed animals in the city, unless they are rescued and not used for food
- Noise and smell
- I am opposed to allowing hens or other farmed animals in the city. They can't be taken care of properly in the city and in allowing this exposes these animals to potential cruelty. It also allows for a lot of disruption to neighbours.
- Livestock belong on farms. I don't support hens either. In my opinion, adjacent neighbours is not expansive enough for consultation.
- Unsure, as I don't know anything about these hens. If they are making constant noise, they absolutely should not be permitted. There would be zero relief from the noise for the neighbours as they are outside 24/7. Regardless of current neighbour agreement, people move often, and not fair to new residents if they have to listen to clicking all day and night.
- A city environment and livestock are incompatible.
- As it is, People can't look after their children and pets. How do you expect them to look after chickens?
- No. I do not support the holding of any farm animals in the city unless they are held for the purpose of providing them sanctuary and safe living space. I do not support the holding of livestock for consumption of their flesh, or production of products with their use, or for experimentation.
- It would depend where they were being kept. For example, I would not want my neighbour keeping hens, as it could be a nuisance during early hours of the morning or late at night.
- Hens have no place in a city
- Neighbours are volatile, and can change in the natural life of an animal. If new neighbours oppose the livestock, then there will be no place for the animals.
- Unless the animal was a rescue and not used for food.
- This would be far to difficult to monitor. Potential for increased noise in communities. Could diminish property values. Could result in unsightly back yards and stench from feces, etc. If people want farm type animals, they should not live in the city. Allowing this will also be difficult to monitor and management. Would need to have more bylaw officers to ensure enforcement, this could be costly to ratepayers. Overall a terrible idea.
- The city could end up sounding and smelling like a barnyard. Also would result in youth temptations to disrupt.

- I have lived in an area that supported hens and they were found roaming the streets and roosters would wake neighbors up.. roosters weren't allowed but showed up..
- Properties are too close together. The additional noise and smell is too much to deal with.
- Noise, smell, and the potential for animal abuse/neglect. They would be an excellent addition to community gardens or centers however
- There is no need for livestock within the city. This would facilitate a lot of animal cruelty issues.
- Trying to manage proper conditions for dogs and cats and other domestic animals is already a struggle with current resources. This will out additional strain on the humane society when they start receiving calls of inadequate food water and shelter
- I am against having chickens or livestock in peoples yards. Who is going to look after the welfare of these animals? The city doesn't have the manpower to go and check up on these animals. I think these animals may be neglected and abused and no one would look after their welfare.
- Against all animal agriculture. Personal and production.
- The noise and the smell would not be worth it
- The smell of chickens makes me sick.
- Against all animal agriculture.
- The city is not built to support livestock.
- As a potential neighbor, i would hate to leave beside someone who has chickens and livestock. These animals shouldn't be in a city setting. Keep them on a large acreage and farm, not cramped in someone's backyard
- Hens require roosters if I'm not mistaken.
- If people live on several acres of land the should be allowed to have live stoke.
- If they want farm animals beside chicken they need to live on a farm
- A city is no place for domestic animals
- Wild animals need to be on a farm. If not looked after and keep clean there could be issues.
- There are unintended consequences of increased livestock in the City, including waste disposal & parasites.
- I do not support any hens in urban neighbourhoods
- Another reason for nuisance
- Livestock smells.
- There are few vets in the city that would be willing to treat these animals, and they would be at high risk for neglect
- I do not agree with urban hens. Sound violations plus my son is allergic. We choose not to frequent farm area due to allergies and would prefer to see farm animals stay in rural areas.
- The city is no place for livestock
- chickens attract mice, coyotes even bears in bordering communités of fish creek
- It would depend on the animal and the environmental footprint it would have in the city.
- Chickens are obnoxious

- "1) I have apprehension for irresponsible livestock owners in ""hoarding"" situations or any situation where the livestock are treated inhumanely, causing transmittable diseases to arise. I would be mostly concerned about viral mutations (that are transmittable to humans) occurring in avian species of livestock (given the most recent viruses).

- 2) I would also be concerned that livestock owners become irresponsible breeders of livestock, or begin to ""sell"" their products (be it eggs, or meat) without proper licenses for this. I am fully supportive of responsible livestock owners, but I would like the City to acknowledge that, should the bylaw be passed, this can be considered either a ""pet"" situation or a ""food"" situation, opening up the potential for irresponsible animal handling practices in both cases.

- 3) The City would have a backup plan for the amount of ""nuisance"" wildlife that may be attracted to city limits (i.e. coyotes). There is already complaints about this in the neighborhood. The potential of more coyotes denning in the City is just something to be aware of.

- 4) (Although this is unlikely given Canadian winters...) In many countries livestock breeding gets out of hand. In Barbados you can see the amount of ""wild"" roosters and hens roaming the streets, which then become nuisance animals."
 - No "other" livestock
 - I am thinking about the noise and smell this may cause for neighbours, how will that be policed if the neighbours do not want livestock nearby? Its going to create issues and then bylaw will have to work to resolve them.
 - No
 - No need for farm animals within city neighborhoods.
 - there are far too many people who can't maintain there property with a basic cat or dog. I dont feel the city should be having to police other livestock, especially, in these tight financial times
 - I don't think that is appropriate for in the city. City yards don't have the space for that, nor do I want to be living beside someone with livestock in their yards.
 - Increased number of hen attacks.
 - there is not usually enough space for other livestock to live a fruitful life. If the owner had over an acre of land, then perhaps. But typically that is not the case.
 - The city is no place for livestock,
 - Spread of disease from animal to human which is contagious.
 - Livestock does not belong in the city. They belong on farms and should not be used for humans comfort, including emotional support animals within the city.

- If it is applied like the basement suite violation then the bylaw would very seldom be used. The officer has latitude and choose not to act.
- This is a persona choice not everything has to be “community benefit” unless it’s like breeding that causes harm to the community.
- These chickens are going to have a greater opportunity to interact with wild fowl than commercial chickens, which can lead to an increase in pathogen mutation and disease transmission.
- Pigeons are not pets they are wild animals and deserve to live that way.
- Livestock need a lot of space not available in urban settings
- smell and noise
- Noise & filth.
- The city isn't a place for hens. I too would love to do that but I see so many magpies and crows where I live - and they are constantly annoying the dogs outside going after them and taunting them...The birds stalk rabbits, cats on the loose too...anything. I think having hens in the backyard will attract more wildlife. I'm in Harvest Hills and coyotes come into the neighborhood all the time - this will just bring more trouble as we try to keep coyotes away from our residences.
- None domesticated animals should not be within city. The purpose of the hens is not the same as a companion pet. They are essentially a working animal and not be within city.
- They are farm animals not city. They also attract mice etc
- The care and feeding of livestock, especially to ensure that livestock ownership is not a nuisance to others, is complex. Vague ideas about "food security" being improved by such behaviours need proof; if the cost of an egg raised in the City exceeds the grocery store, then food security has not improved. Too much regulatory cost is triggered by this topic, to make the gambit worthwhile. And people cannot find themselves arguing about "therapy" animals, if the animals are not allowed in the first place.
- The management of this is not worth the expense
- Farm animals belong on the farm and not in the city
- I'm good with hens but don't feel that other larger livestock need be accommodated in back yards. Too many issues for neighbours.
- Doesn't sound like the proper research has been completed so until this occurs any leaps such as that above should be avoided
- Don't want the noise, smell etc next door to me so.....
- The housing are so close to each other, noises from dogs' barking is already a big issue for me, if there are familys' chicken farm set up in my neighbourhood, the noises and the smell will be another issues, may be those Calgarian with no pets, no chickens have to move to montain to leave to get away from the dogs barking and the animal smells.
- Chickens smell, are loud and would be an aggravating nuisance to live near within the city, if i wanted to live near farm animals, I would move to the country.
- "Livestock belong in the country side, not in The City of Calgary residential back yards, because it
- creates a nuisance and devalues residential monetary property values."

- The city has more than enough problems with dogs and cats, to deal with chickens crossing the road. Urban chickens and livestock has been a total disaster in other cities. Living with animals leads to diseases like bird flu, cat flu, bat flu, swine flu,, MRSA, common cold, SARS, MERS, CoViD-19
- Absolutely not no hens whatsoever
- This is very unnecessary and could get out of control quickly. Having a chicken as a pet I would support, but as livestock I would not.
- We can't control dog behaviour, waste and noise... livestock would be no different. Waking up to goats bleating, chickens crowing or cows mooing from my bedroom window does not sound appealing. The neighbours dogs are a big enough problem.
- The city is not a place for livestock
- Hens do not belong in the city
- Proper handling of livestock needs to be maintained by people with training. The allowance of livestock can cause a local wet market making the community more prone to sicknesses and infections. (Eg. COVID-19)
- not enough information given to support the change. Considering that bylaw has enough to deal with over cat and dog ownership, I don't think we need to add livestock into the mix.
- Noise and smell; we live in a city not a farm district.
- Wild stock should not be in the city
- Mini-livestock of any kind does not need to live in a city. To much risk of an owner not being able to provide sufficient space, and the necessary yard clean-up.
- This sounds like too much bureaucracy. The intent is fine, but I can see this mushrooming into something like the secondary suite debacle. Spell out what is expected of the homeowner, and if he doesn't deliver, then serve notice that the animal must be rehomed.
- I don't want to hear roosters or chickens at 6am on my day off
- I feel this opens up the doors for people to abuse the ability to have livestock in the city. This would result in more animals being abused or neglected by people who don't understand the needs of the animal.
- This is a slippery slope... hens and other livestock are best left outside the city.
- Urban hens can potentially create disputes between neighbors and within the community.
- I do not want the smell or sounds of livestock next door.
- [removed]
- Animals belong in the country please
- Where do you draw the line?
- we have enough wildlife and nucience animals. do not bring in more
- I don't talk to my neighbours nor do I care if they support what I do with my life. Unnecessary restrictions
- I would need to know what other animals are being considered before I could support the concept.
- I believe that it would lead to more probelms, including more negative animal encounters

- Farm animals do not belong in the city. People do not understand how to care for them plus there is not enough space. If you want farm animals, live rurally.
- [removed] Hens belong on farms. You want to ban pitbulls and any animal that scares you by appearance but yay for HENS??!! Taxpayers actually pay for this kind of thing? What a waste of money you are!!
- I believe livestock should Not be in residential or urban areas. Transmission of disease is one area of potential concern. Cleanliness, noise etc
- No urban farming of any kind, impact cannot be limited to neighbours and community.
- Fine for rural but not city.
- Stock living in the city is unfair to the animal and the neighbours. It also makes homes harder to sell.
- To noisy
- Too great of risk that they will be improperly cared for and pose a disease risk to and from wild bird populations and spread to food production poultry.
- Livestock belong on farms, not our very small, close together homes. They won't have the space. Also the smell...
- Absolutely not. Goats, cattle, swine, horses are not allowed in the city properties. Hens are for commercial purposes, they must be restricted from entering the city limits. There is no reason for a person to have a hen as a pet that can not be satisfied by another approved animal. If a person feels they need a hen, then they must move to a location that ownership of hens is approved. City communities must not be burdened with the time, and costs to evaluate each case. Hens are not approved now, they must stay not approved.
- Hens are acceptable with neighbour approval. I don't think other farm animals should be allowed in the City.
- I support sustainable agricultural practices and enabling people to provide for themselves. I believe this can be done hygienically on a small scale in cities.
- The constant noise and smell of farm animal near my house.
- Calgary is supposed to be urban living, not rural.
- i have lived next to urban hens and the smell and noise along with the insects is terrible.
- this bylaw DEFFINATLY needs to be changed. Livestock does not belong in the city limits.
- I am from a farm, roosters crow and should not be allowed. Pigs get big and if not properly confined can rip open fences very easily as they are smart animals. Male goats are very dirty and smelly. It would definitely be on a case to case basis and what animal they would want to keep in their yard. But definitely they would need their neighbors consent.
- I see it getting out of hand very fast and cleanliness of some yards becoming deplorable
- I would not like to see ultimate control being in the hands of just the Chief Bylaw Officer and would want the option of taking an issue to higher authorities including court.
- Stereotyping Pitt bulls is kinda like stereotyping black people. Use your head!!
- The city is no place for livestock.
- Harmless wildlife attracts harmful wildlife.
- "I dont think chicken will be careful by everyone the same.

- Too much noise.
- Too mess of lawns"
- "That's exactly what we need.
- Wet markets in every other back yard"
- Too many potential issues with noises, smells etc for neighbors
- Most yards are small and with 6 people's backyards backing against each other's fences the chickens are noisy and will Disturb others who are near them.
- No livestock should be allowed in city neighbourhoods
- Farm animals belong on farms
- If people want farm animals then move out to the country and buy a farm...this is the city.
- No chickens.
- They are farm animals
- Not sure what other livestock would be but I foresee this as a potential nuisance and problem for many Calgarians.
- Chickens are to noisy, especially for people who work shift work.
- Chickens can be quite loud in an urban environment. Also if not kept up on they do promote mice and rat issues. I found this via neighbours I had back in BC. there was a decent sized mouse population underneath the chicken coop. It's also a reason for smaller wildlife like fox, and even cougars to roam the area in hopes of a quick meal.
- impossible to monitor
- I was raised on a farm and lived on one for years and farm animals belong on a farm. The city can not effectively deal with dogs and cats so how are the going to deal with farm animals. Have you heard the noise a rooster makes at sunrise?
- I do not believe allowing hens in the city would be beneficial as diseases and predators will be more likely to appear.
- Living in an urban area means to give complicit consent to live in close proximity to others. That means sharing limited space. Introducing rural initiatives into urban environments means a virtual guarantee of conflict. Buy your eggs at the store, or move to the country.
- No livestock should be allowed in cities. If you want livestock then you should live in a rural area.
- Livestock (agriculture) should be limited to areas where the landowner has adequate space to reduce smells, noise etc
- we have a coyote problem why increase the problem with hens?
- Farm animals belong on farms!!! Chickens and turkeys are very stinky...
- Chickens are more work than ppl think
- Impossible to control. Too much can go wrong
- I do not agree with urban hens in Calgary
- If you want to have livestock on your property, buy a [removed] farm. It's not right for these animals to live in small confined areas. This whole bylaw needs to address [removed] people, and less about the animals. DO SOME HOMEWORK PEOPLE!!!!

- Livestock should remain only in rural settings.
- No one living inside city limits needs livestock, they aren't pets.
- I think there is enough of an issue with stray cats/dogs do we really need to add livestock to the mix? What happens when a chicken gets eaten by a dog or ages out? Are we going to say its okay to butcher them outside with possibility of blood being found in public areas? This will tie up the court systems. At present, to adopt a cat/dog there is no need to prove a person can care for the animal, nor that it has proper living conditions, etc. We do not presently enforce this with cats/dogs how would we do this with chickens and livestock? With more condominiums and apartments and the increase of immigrants coming to Calgary where do we draw the line between a 'pet' vs food source? What stops a person from processing animals in their home for food consumption? How does living with these animals comply with diseases that humans can contract from animals? Where is the health and safety standards? I mean we are dealing with COVID where animal bodily fluids have interacted with a human and it has caused a pandemic, what measures/controls do we have in place to ensure people are not living in animal feces and are properly cleaning up? I am sorry but not all people are great at being pet owners and adding more types of 'pets' to the mix sounds like a disaster waiting to happen... below you even ask about pigeons and odour management... who is enforcing any of this?
- the last 3 bullet points I agree with. however if I have a hen it should not have to benefit the community. I should not have to share my eggs, or baby chicks with the community. if the neighbours are cool and the animal is taken care of there should not be an obligation to share my animal with any one else. If you own a dog or a cat you are not obligated to share that animal with the community. Imagine, neighbour "hey can I take your dog for a walk?", Me "no, It's my dog", neighbour "well you need to share it or else it will be seized from you"?
- Why add more animals?
- I always thought having laying hens was a great idea. That's was until I was invaded by rats! I live in a lovely community. Never had rodents. Then we got 3 hens. Then the rats came. They got into my home. It was horrible. They did so much damage. It's just not worth the benefit of eggs. I would not want hens allowed in communities where home would be invaded by rats.
- Livestock should not be kept in the city, Most yards are not big enough to hold such animals, but as long as the animals do not become a nuisance and are kept healthy and clean it is not my business
- I totally disagree with having urban hens and any other LIVESTOCK in small city lots.
- Yards are getting smaller with even less privacy, so with that in mind it is not fair to neighbours of the owners of these animals. My daughter's neighbour has a duck living next door right now, which is totally illegal in Walden where 4 houses share one fence!
- This would attract too many coyotes.
- Not all people will keep it clean. Plus roosters wake up real early!
- I believe that there isn't enough power to enforce rules, or enough bylaw presence to ensure rules are being followed.
- farm animals should remain on farms

- Communities are always changing with new people moving in and out. The expectation of having long term support of neighbours is not feasible
 - Knowledge how to dispose of animal waste or the diseases and smells that come with it are limited.
 - I do not want chickens ect. next door and the smell and mess associated with that.
 - Livestock should not be within Calgary city boarders. We are too big of a city.
 - Most Livestock require space to be kept humanely in a way that is not possible in urban backyards.
 - Farm animals belong on the farm - the city is too hectic for them.
 - I don't know what other than hens could be acceptable urban livestock.
 - I do not care for the increased rodent and coyote attraction from housing fowl. Nothing against the critters, just the wants of a few should not outweigh the public good in the neighborhood. Also who wants to hear a rooster at the crack of 3 am announcing it's presence, I've experienced this many times in third world countries where urban chickens are the norm.
 - "Definitely not. People do not have the expertise to care for farmed animals like hens, who have complex needs and space requirements. While this may seem like a more compassionate approach to securing eggs, it is not. Hens are typically purchased from a hatchery where males will be killed or eaten because they do not lay eggs. At the end of their lives, the hens may end up in industrial slaughter operations or killed by someone with no experience.
- However, I would support allowing people to care for rescued hens on their property, so long as they are not exploited and slaughtered."
 - I think there is too much potential for things to go wrong
 - It will get out of control, just like off leash area where homes back onto off leash area.
 - Chickens are farm animals and they can carry diseases like pot belly pigs which calgary also allows in homes(yuck)
 - Livestock belong in the rural areas, the smell is not pleasant. It is bad enough that large dogs are kept in tiny apartments. Not fair to the these animals.
 - I have lived next to a rooster before and it is terrible.
 - Livestock does NOT belong in an urban setting. It belongs in clean fresh air with room to roam, such as the case may be.
 - Should not allow any livestock including hens.
 - Not sure I want live stock in my neighborhood. People dont bother to take care of cats and dogs. We dont need livestock running around
 - Enough issues in Calgary with dogs and cats.
 - Livestock need more room then a city/condo can offer. It will become overcrowded, dirty & noisy very fast.
 - People can't even look after dogs and cats properly, and so often, the problems that come up with pets are because of the owners...not the pets themselves. Are we expecting chicken owners to be a more responsible class of citizens than dog and cat owners? What if adjacent neighbours approve, move and new neighbours do NOT approve? What happens to the poor chickens who don't get a say? Chickens are lovely and sweet creatures, and I've experienced urban homes (Vancouver) that have had them (the chickens were ultimately killed by raccoons). I don't believe this is a Pandora's box that The City of Calgary should open.

- Chickens and other farm animals require care that most urban residents are not likely willing or able to provide. Also, noise and smell levels would be a concern for many.
- I do not want to live down-wind of urban hens. I live in the city so I don't have to be around farming operations.
- Livestock should not be in the city limits unless it's on an acreage.
- Chickens would be quite messy. I wouldn't want feathers all over my yard
- The probably of the mess, smell and owners not taking care of them. The added interest of wildlife roaming to get at them
- The law should be specific enough so that the discretion of Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer is not necessary.
- No urban livestock.
- The future is plant based. Let's not move backwards and increase opportunity for animals to be exploited.
- I don't think Calgary is ready to support more livestock at this time. I worry about bad owners including abusive behaviour and those unable to take care of their livestock properly.
- It opens up too many potential issues.
- We already have a neighbor with hens. Noisy and messy. It also gets neighbouring dogs too excited.
- do not know what other animals you are referring to
- Too much smell and noise
- Why would I want to listen to livestock? Have you heard how noisy they are? This is unacceptable for highly populated areas.
- Livestock is not meant to become urbanized, if people want to have those types of hobbies or lifestyles they need to move to a rural location. The smell and condition of farm animals requires a lot of space to not be an issue.
- Poor use of tax dollars
- I wouldnt want livestock beside me with noise, and smells.
- Livestock has no place in the city. If someone wants to own hens, they can move outside the city limits to a property that is suited for such an activity.
- Barn animals can transmit disease and encourage wild animal prowling. Please do not allow this.
- Too much potential for neighbour conflicts.
- Hens don't belong in the city
- smell and noise would be an issue.
- why the would we need chickens within city limits?
- If people are going to have a pet horse it will not be okay, the animal will suffer because they need space and not all the noise from the city or a cow.

- I am severely allergic to farm animals , hay and all that comes along with the care and maintenance of farm animals. The smell , and gas toxins that come from these animals all effect my breathing. I don't live on a farm for a reason and if my neighbour decided to make their backyard a farm it would have negative impacts to my health on a daily basis .
- Loud
- I don't want domestic fowl in the city AT ALL. Attracts large wildlife to community -> damage to neighbour property. Stinky. Noisy.
- No
- Don't want them around.
- I don't believe that the size of property provided within the city would provide the proper amount of space for livestock, which can't exult in a cruel situation for the animals involved. In addition, it will make reselling of property more difficult as livestock can be harsh on grass (e.g., pigs).
- Livestock should remain on farms, not in the city
- Chickens should not be in a city
- "Want farm animals, buy a farm!"
- Where do you stop, maybe a lion, its not as dangerous as you make pitbulls out to be"
- This should remain outside city
- Do not want the smell of chicken or pigs in the neighborhood
- I have zero faith in humanity actually caring for them properly.
- Absolutely not!!! I think you will have too many people not follow the rules and the smell and noise would be a huge issue for remaining neighbors.
- So you guys are concerned about 45 lbs. 'pitbulls' but are considering bending the rules on 1,500 lbs. cows in a yard?
- Those who want livestock should move to rural areas where the potential to disturb neighbors is reduced.
- Too complicated to regulate. While neighbours may initially agree, once the animals arrive their opinion may change. Bylaw officers have better things to do.
- bylaw officers need to check on the animals weekly to ensure proper care of the animals is being adhered to. I don't think the city will do that.
- High density urban settlements are no place for livestock.
- farm animals belong on a farm or acreage not in the city.
- I don't see why we need farm animals in the city, and I don't want to hear barn yard animals along with having to deal with all my neighbors fire pit smoke, it's too much.
- Cask grab
- Livestock can be loud and interrupt people on a community
- Noise/smell
- They can be noisy and smell. I would be concerned about disease.
- The feces from hens can carry diseases.

- Livestock belong in the country, not in an urban setting. Not only stressful for livestock to be confined in small spaces but also small livestock are attractants for nuisance wildlife like coyotes / cougars, neither of which we need coming into contact with the people / and their pets
- I fear that one day the Avian flu will reappear. The world is crazy enough with Covid. When cages aren't cleaned for long periods of time the feces will dry up and fly away in the wind.
- Although I support it for support animals I feel that it would be easily abused by individuals for other uses.
- It's been proven that doesn't work in other provinces applied, not only about 1 type of breed is about responsible owners
- However livestock in an urban city opens up the potential for disease
- If you want to maintain livestock, buy/rent an acreage. These should not be allowed in city limits.
- I live in the city not on a farm!
- My experience has been negative. Smelly, flies, feathers everywhere. If you want chickens, move to an acreage.
- Yards are small typically in Calgary. Disease spreads quickly. Huge monitoring cost for the city
- As someone who grew up with chickens, they're gross, loud, and stinky. I would hate to be living next door to that. Animals that produce high odors (farm animals) should be kept on farms out of the city. The city is no place for a barnyard animal. It's cruel and stressful
- If you can have chickens, fine but the neighbor shouldn't have a say.
- There would be a lot of problems for this such as odour and noise
- We already have too many nuisance birds in Calgary that the city will do absolutely nothing about even when they become aggressive towards pets and humans.
- Any livestock should have enough space to roam free on their property. They belong on a farm.
- No live stock in the city
- Too much noise and smell.
- I do not believe that livestock belongs in a city/urban environment.
- Don't feel like there should be livestock in the city. There are plenty of farms on the outskirts that people can go to for fresh animals.
- You are going to end up with dogs living next door to hens and potentially hunting a hen. Should a dog kill a hen does this dog then become a nuisance animal? Keep hens out in the country they do not belong in the city.
- Hens should stay outside the city, they are too noisy and messy.
- Unless there is adequate space between homes I do not feel that it is fair to neighbors. Sometimes there is good intentions in the beginning but over time care of animal could be jeopardized. There is enough abuse of animals already that institutions like (SPCA etc.) cannot cope with. Having to deal with farm animals to find adoptive homes in the event of neglect/abuse is another burden for these systems. Move to a rural community if your desire is to own farm animals.
- Livestock need space and room to run around and be LOUD. And the fact they can smell.. BAD.. I know because we had a hobby farm ON 80 ACERS

- My neighbour should have no say.... they didn't ask me if they could get a barking dog, or a bird-killing cat....
- An urban environment is not the place for livestock
- "Let's fix one problem, get real good at accountability for dogs and then add a new problem later.

- Also, guaranteed you are going to have a barnyard next to a home with dogs and there will be barnyard vs dogs issues going on. If a dog (historically had to hunt and kill animals to live) kills a hen because it got in their yard, is that dog now a nuisance? If the dog barks nonstop because of the hens, is the dog the problem or the hens that cluck all day?"
- Livestock belong on farms, outside of the Urban Center.
- Farm animals belong outside of the city. City lots are not made for farm animals. They also smell, and are noisy and would effect more individuals than simply the owners. If you want to own farm animals, like on an acreage.
- Increased noise / smell if not properly maintained requiring further resources from city to follow up on complaints
- Chickens are manageable within a regular yard, however this may not be the case for other livestock. I think that larger animals require larger living space, it's not fair to the animals to confine them to a yard.
- Not keeping the chicken coop clean and organized
- Chickens belong on the farm. Assuming that is what a 'hen' refers to.
- Cats are not allowed to be cats. They have claws, sharp teeth. City won't allow them to roam, bcuz ppl complain about them. But..ppl can have CHICKENS ? WHAT THE HECK !! Crazy. Chickens belong on a FARM !!! What is wrong with the world
- It oiled be dirty and I would be worried about Neighbour's not properly cleaning after the hens. I am worried about the perennial smell it would chaise.
- farm animals belong on the farm. Hens smell. People like this idea but many won't take proper care. Imagine living next to a chicken coop on a beezy day in the city. If I wanted to live on a farm I wouldn't live in the city.
- Live stock do not belong inside the city. They need space and belong on farms or larger acreages and to be owned by someone that can care for them properly.
- fleas
- Farm animals should not live in the city
- Urban 'livestock' attract pests and rodents. I'd guess that 90% of owners don't have a clue what it takes to manage poultry etc properly. Would also lead to an uncontrolled black market for meat and eggs.
- I find that although there is an openness for neighbour support, that is head to do without creating negative feelings. I feel that it would be easy to get Neighbourhood approval for loud or smelly livestock while neighbours maybe less onboard but don't want to create a dispute by declining a request.

- I personally would not want to live next door to a bunch of smelly noise chickens etc!if you want to raise livestock go live on a farm.
 - Hens should not be allowed in residential neighborhoods. If someone wants a hen, they should not be living in a house.
 - Only because I am unsure what living conditions need to be met for hens to live indoors
 - "I grew up on a farm
 - Chickens need space to roam and need a lot of care and time and effort
 - Not to mention with coyotes around your just asking for them to come more and more into the city"
 - My concerns would be environmental impact, both for the animal and neighborhood. Smells, noise, proper care.
 - your neighbours should not have a say in what you do with or on your property
 - People struggle to take dogs for walks and have cats only on their property. Why introduce more factors.
 - There is no need for livestock to be in the city and a neighbor who is not adjacent but on the same block could be affected by odor and noise.
 - Livestock cannot have a good quality of life in urban areas.
 - last thing I want is to see people slaughter chickens in their backyard for dinner.
 - City people often dont understand the needs of livestock animals. City homes also don't offer the room necessary for livestock to roam.
 - "Exceptions would be evaluated on a case by case basis and the decision would be at the discretion of the Chief Bylaw Enforcement Officer.
- This seems like it would just add a huge amount of unnecessary work."
 - Our neighbourhood's are not farm land
 - I don't feel that these animals belong within city limits. I wouldn't want to live next to the noise and mess UNLESS maybe a proper enclosure was built, but who could ensure this?
 - You want to take my dog but allow live stock? Thats disgusting. No.
 - I do not feel that the majority of yards in Calgary are large enough to accommodate urban hens.
 - Anyone should be allowed chickens.
 - This opens the opportunity for more livestock to be requested
 - Still shouldn't have a he
 - Bird feces create a smell and attract rodents. There are sufficient sources of eggs available without allowing urban hens. Also concerned about animal welfare. As an adjacent neighbour i wd oppose urban hens and this wd create conflict amongst neighbours.
 - hens and goats are not for a city . I certainly wouldn't want to have a neighbor that has hens or goats. The stink of their poop and they can be very loud.

- Just think you're opening a large can of worms with neighbor complaints and grey areas of what animals would be allowed
- Imagine every house had hens. The care needed is higher the amount of wildlife entering the city looking for food would increase this puts our citizens in danger. Do you want more coyotes? Because that's how you get them.
- You allow farm animals but still target pit bulls?
- We don't live on farms. If you want hens or other livestock, move out of the city
- My neighbours are loud enough without a bunch of chickens making noise and potentially smells and allergens.
- Could be a nuisance for neighbors and chickens are noisy and stinky
- We do not need to allow livestock in the city.
- Would need to see the entire proposal, where the hens will be kept, how many, how far from a residential areas, will there be check ups often to assure animal welfare is being held up, where will the waste they create go?
- Enough by laws
- Noise, smell, allergies- if you want to do this it should be done in a rural area or property large enough that neighbours don't have to listen to chickens or smell them.
- get an acreage or farm. Feel free to rent space somewhere this is no Bakersfield
- We're concerned about people letting these animals loose if they decide that they don't want them. Rabbits are a problem in Canmore already; they could be considered livestock too.
- Chickens have no place in an urban center. Not everyone follows the rules.
- Chickens do not belong in an urban setting. Period
- I think this could contribute to the already large live stock neglect so many animals already face.
- Not sure exactly.
- Livestock doesn't belong in the city
- Are hens or the other animals being considered trainable? What would the noise be like?
- Livestock and other "farm animals require specific environment and care to ensure their health and wellbeing.
- Livestock were originally banned from cities for good reasons, namely noise, health, disease, smell, manure, urine. Terrible idea to allow any back!
- They're annoying
- The density of the city is not ideal for livestock and is likely to result in more neighbour disputes (eg, noise, smell). If allowed, will there be training courses required to ensure livestock are being correctly cared for by people with no experience?
- Farm animals should not be allowed within city limits. No exceptions
- Don't want to hear any early morning cocks crowing
- They are farm animals and do not belong in the city
- Only in rural or farm settings
- Because I feel like this would lead to unrealistic living situations and do more harm than good sadly

- Live stock does not belong in the city. They cannot recorded adequate housing and care in city limits.
- First of all, the term livestock is horrendous. They're not stock - they're animals. And, to only allow certain animals to live within the city based on how they would benefit humans is ridiculous. Backyard hens as a way to get eggs are cruel - those hens come from hatcheries where the male chicks are macerated one the day they're born.
- I do not want to live next to farm animals!
- I am worried of the animals being neglected as well as an increase in coyotes.
- they belong on farms in the country.
- having chickens in city is only anogher reason for predators to remain in the area.
- No one person should be allowed to decide what can be allowed in any area of the city
- Homes are far too close in the city and this would only cause more neighborhood issues
- They belong on farms
- If my neighbours decide to have pigeons in their homes, even if I as their neighbour, don't support that decision, I have no control over it and would be forced to deal with these pigeons without a choice. It's not the same as having a domestic animal, pigeons are wild and cannot be tamed.
- I don't feel livestock have a place within the city limits. They carry diseases and attract other wildlife.
- No one wants to live in the city and have livestock as neighbors
- Livestock of any form should not be allowed in Calgary.
- The noise And smell
- Livestock is meant to be kept on large properties
- "Our neighbors have 3 dogs and their backyard is covered with dogs feces.
- Allowing hens would create early morning noise and hens' shouts and ""songs"" all day long , will create dirt and feces and the smell. Not everyone would treat their livestock responsibly and that would create tensions in the neighborhoods."
- Most yards in the city do not provide enough room for appropriate livestock ownership and those who have yards large enough are usually wealthier and if they were allowed livestock it would widen the wealth gap further. Unfair.
- Urban hens are a nuisance to neighbours and I personally would not want to live next to a chicken coop.
- No barnyard animals inside city limits. Not even therapy chickens etc.
- Because I wouldn't want the noise or smell next to my house
- Bring mice rats wildlife to our back yards
- High potential to cause issues with neighbours, for example noise caused by animals, smell, allergies, etc.
- already too many bobcats and coyotes in the city.
- Impacts resale values of property. Just imagine having pig pen in your neighbor's backyard or goat poo everywhere, or just hen's clucking!
- The cost for bylaw and control would not support the change.

- Farm animals belong on a farm. It's a thing
- I have right to enjoy peaceful leaving and these [REMOVED] hens always making noise early in the morning. This should remain illegal go to the store or local farmers to keep economy stimulated. Seriously keep our communities clean! We do not need this looking like a third world country. Major cities in Ontario and B.C. do not allow this so why should we? Go to a rural setting if you want to keep these things.
- no way, too loud, if you have a neighbour with nuisance birds good luck getting rid of them bylaws won't do anything.
- Noisy cockerels can cause a disturbance in an urban environment
- A city environment is unique in having many people in close proximity, which would need to be considered when allowing livestock within. Biosecurity is another important consideration since there are many potentially zoonotic diseases that may be introduced in our backyard herds that could potentially negatively impact our larger production groups, which we must certainly be careful to consider. For example, if someone had a backyard pig they fed scraps to, they could potentially feed it foreign meat containing foot and mouth disease, which could severely affect market access and our national pork industry.
- Noise and odours. Rodents.
- Not needed
- I think it would be difficult to monitor and difficult situations between neighbours would occur.
- I don't think they belong in the city and should not want them in my neighbourhood.
- I think this would require a higher level of oversight.
- I would not want my neighbors having hens in the city!
- City has enough to do to enforce dog/cat control. There is enough surrounding farmland for those interested in livestock.
- I don't believe the city is a place for any type of livestock animal.
- What happens if neighbours move and new neighbours do not agree with the presence of livestock?
- I feel hens will attract more predatory wildlife (Bob cats, coyotes, etc.) therefore bringing more harm to Calgarians and their pets.
- "Support from adjacent neighbors seems like a fluid situation
- If I approve of my neighbor having hens/small livestock - but then subsequently list my property for sale would likely be an obstacle to finalize a sale"
- Loud, smelly, maybe need to have X size yard to be able to have them.
- No hens in the city
- Why does it have to have a community benefit? I would only want to use keep the eggs for myself. Why do we need neighbour support? We don't have to ask them for a fire pit. The smoke from a fire pit is pretty irritating and spreads to more than the adjacent neighbours. Also what if neighbours are renters or a property management company is not available for support?
- If people want livestock they can live in the country. I lived on a farm and the thought of having the sound of chickens (or anything else, yappy dogs included) coming from one of the neighbouring properties is an annoyance

- I understand that people would love to have the “Urban farm” but at what expense? I honestly do not feel the need for any of my neighbors to have them. The smell is disgusting and if not kept up on it can be overpowering.
- Absolutely not. Hens and livestock would be adding to the problem that we already have with pet owners who are not responsible. It would be very difficult to enforce appropriate behaviour.
- Chickens are noisier and more dirty and are more likely to escape people's yards than every dog in this city.
- Too much animal cruelty in Calgary. No proper living conditions would be reinforced as the City finds that as long as an animal has food and shelter, it's all good. Well it's not. Why not, instead, reinforce your laws against PEOPLE who abuse their pets??
- Its a city not the country side.
- Move to the Country if you want livestock.
- No hens in city
- Let's ensure the dogs & cats are taken care of first before offering other animals for stretched bylaw / humane services to look after
- nn
- All farm animals belong on acreages or farms, and not in cities.
- I think that many of the current practices that are in place are harmful and damaging to both owners and their pets especially if they're an at risk animal potentially a nervous dog
- No birds in the city that's what farms are for!
- Having owned chickens, they are noisy and smelly if uncared for properly.
- Livestock do not belong in the city. This could lead to poorly maintained property, smells, nuisance noise and is just another thing to police.
- Not in the city limits
- I don't support keeping animals for agriculture
- If the city cannot manage the ability to control and monitor household pet owners and ensure that there is suitable housing/training/socializing for the animals already residing in the city, it is a waste of time and resources to attempt to bring more animals into the city.
- "disease
- Bacteria"
- Suburbia isn't a farm
- They would likely be mistreated and considering the weather conditions, they could suffer due to wrongful enclosures and care
- We currently have neighbors who can't keep her yard clean from dog feces. Having chickens will compound the unhealthy environment that is only a few feet away from adjacent neighbors.
- Just don't feel there is a need to keep hens in Calgary.
- Livestock belongs on a farm not the city.
- no livestock in the city
- Most of the city does not have space to raise chickens.

- I don't think suitable conditions are possible in the city limits.
- I don't want to live next to a farm
- I strongly do not support urban hens in Calgary. Urban hens can transmit disease to humans, and can also attract rodents and predators. Additionally there are odour, animal waste and noise issues. I grew up on a farm with chickens, and worked as an academic librarian supporting veterinary medicine, so am familiar with some of the professional literature on these problems.
- it depends on the animals. If they are noisy and disturb people sleeping after they work hard I would say no. If they are not causing disturbance to neighbors then why not.
- Hens and livestock cause issues with noise and smell for neighbors.
- Tell the hippie to go live in the country. Hens and chicken coops are disgusting. Do not allow it!
- No livestock in the city limits
- We don't have the climate for (most) people to responsibly have outdoor livestock. I worked in a green house for several years, and it was amazing how many people came back with pond fish because they didn't realize they needed extra equipment to over winter them. Too much room for animal abuse imo
- We are close enough to rural jurisdiction where hens and livestock are permitted. No need to allow them in the city. Too much risk, bacteria and infection may follow, will also increase the coyote problem
- Doesn't make sense
- Too many citizens would interpret the bylaws for or against themselves and others.
- It would just be like the goats. There is a lot more that this money can go to than animals that the city neglects.
- Noise, smell, and damages caused. Adjacent neighbours aren't only ones affected.
- There is insufficient funding available to ensure adequate inspection of livestock facilities. Also concerns about disease spread to wild birds. It only takes a few birds to escape in order for feral chickens to take over.
- I'm very allergic and if my neighbor had hens in their yard I would suffer greatly.
- Definitely don't need the smell/noise/mess in my neighborhood
- I don't feel that property sizes in Calgary are large enough to support livestock of any kind
- Hens are farm animals
- We already have many issues with neighbour relations and lack of respect and consideration for each other. This is a recipe for disaster, particularly in new neighborhoods where houses are VERY close to each other.
- Hygiene issues
- I wouldn't want chickens or livestock living beside or near me (noise, smell etc)
- Hens are not a city pet
- Unnecessary within city limits.
- Noise
- Just no, they don't belong in the city.

- Fine with farms having farm animals.
- Noise, smell and mess that comes with an urban hen.
- If I wanted to be around farm animals I would live on a farm
- Chickens can be noisy, smelly, and offensive to neighbours. They are not pets, urban Calgary is no place for livestock of any variety.
- Hens cause neighbour drama.
- Livestock belong in country.
- .
- livestock can be smelly, noisy, and/or dirty. It is hard to monitor if the animals are a problem, it is very hard to enforce any rules because by-law officers are so busy.
- I live in a CITY not on a FARM
- Growing up on a farm and having first hand experience with hens and other livestock, it is my opinion that b/c of city living space restrictions as well as proximity to neighbors, etc. would create a stressful habitat for the animals - as well as likely create a space that is not "friendly" to neighbors (ie, smell, noise, potential escapes, etc.)
- This is way too vague. Don't really understand what animals and what criteria is involved??
- I believe this can increase yard waste, noise and issues amongst neighbours. This would also draw in more wildlife.
- Inner city housing should not be able to keep hens outdoors because they are noisy, and also require more space to be happy and healthy than most yards can provide.
- I think farm animals should be on a farm, not in a small coop in the city.
- For city lot sizes I think it would be very difficult having adequate space for suitable living conditions for most species (Pidgeon's below probably an exception)
- Livestock carry diseases, are loud and smell bad
- Chickens are loud. What are you going to do when noise complaints come in about the chickens and other animals?
- Would be more open to this on larger lots, but 25ft lots are too small to accommodate.
- Animals are not for food
- Not interested in this idea at all. Horrible idea.
- I would support urban hens, but I would also have concerns. I am on the fence if I would like to participate in having my own hens. I am not against the idea. But, then my number one concern would be if my neighbours had hens and they were noisy.
- The evidence is quite clear that people and livestock living in close quarters leads to zoonotic infections. Chickens carry avian influenza and other diseases. They are not benign pets but rather livestock that should be kept by people with expertise in animal husbandry.
- An urban home setting is not an appropriate place for livestock.
- livestock belongs on a farm
- people can not take care of their CATs when we have hens, how would you enforce rules of this if you can not already enforce rules with cats

- It's already stated in here about dogs having nuisance behaviours, and having a larger fine on that. Now you're wanting to bring in livestock, this will open a whole other can of worms with nuisance. There are not enough bylaw officers to be able to handle all of this.
 - They're loud and can be dirty (mites etc) if not cared for properly
 - I don't support urban hen's
 - If you want hens move to a farm. There's not proper space.
 - Livestock (goats, sheep, pigs, turkeys, or whatever else this might cover) is better suited to rural areas. It's cruel to keep pent up animals in an urban environment. Luckily the city is surrounded by rural land for someone who want to raise livestock to move to.
 - Can people properly care for them?
 - Yards are small and the smell may be an issue. The city is I place for farm animaly
 - Chickens are filthy dirty and the smell can be atrocious. Having lived on a farm, with chickens, I know what is involved.
 - Could be smelly if not cared for properly
 - Livestock does not belong in the city. They smell, carry different types of parasites.
 - People cant even take care of their current pets, dont add more.
 - the risk of rodents/ pests increases substantially with birds, along with the unpleasant smells associated with owning birds.
 - Cities are not the place for farm animals.
 - I don not want to be woken by roosters. Farm yes. City - no..
 - No animals other than cats, dogs, rodents and fish should be allowed within the city limits.
 - Urban and rural are separated for a reason! Also Urban chickens provides 3rd world optics nobody wants that environment.....if you eat it it's not suitable for urban pets!
 - People would be diligent at first but when interest wains troubles could arise
 - These should not be in city limits
 - We have to many rabbits. We don't need chicken as well.
 - Go live on a farm if you want livestock
 - If I wanted to live on a farm I would.
 - Animals other than chickens do not belong in a city. They should only be kept on rural properties.
 - ""No objection" more so...I believe we're doing just fine getting our eggs from the store
- Also, for the pigeon thing 1-10 is pretty broad. 5 would be my max."
 - Houses are often very close together in urban Calgary and if a neighbor has a dog or cat, it could lead to disruptive interactions between the pets (dog barking, cat in the yard stalking the birds) and also hens can be noisy in the early morning hours, which disrupts a lot of neighbors in the area. Not to mention the smell of the chicken poop if it's not managed properly. I think it could be an option in areas where house lots are much larger than average where there is more distance between lots, and all adjacent neighbors agree to it, ie. Bowness?

- Neighbours can be difficult with no real reason
- There is no need to have livestock in urban areas.
- Most people have no idea how to properly care for livestock and the shelter will be inundated.
- Back yards in suburban areas are too small (noise, smells) and handling and mishandling of the waste could be a health issue for neighbours.
- "Life stock animals should not be in the city, can be out of towns like in farms or acres.
- I would not like to wake up to hear a cock crowing at 5.00am in the morning."
- Too noisy.
- Can see how this plays out. As communities densify and there is less and less 'yard' and houses are crammed tighter and tighter, it is cruel to animals to put them into something like this, not to mention the good neighbour thing. Regardless of bylaws - unfortunately, there just isn't enough follow-up.
- Livestock belong on farms, not in the city.
- If you want livestock, move out of the city. There is no place for the stink and filth of urban chickens and livestock.
- "I don't want to be waken up at dawn by farm animals from my house neighbour.
- All of you city dwellers spend a night outside with hens/farm animals, and tell me you'd be okay having your neighbour having hens and/or livestock!"
- I support urban hens, but "other livestock" is too broad
- They smell
- Livestock does not belong in the city.
- Farm animals should be on a farm.
- You want farm animals... live on a farm. You want farm fresh eggs laid by well cared for hens..... find a farmer who could use your support and pay them. Consider being the "egg" person and collect weekly for your community and deliver fresh eggs as requested to the households that are interested. Seriously people, we have amazing local farmers who raise and care for their animals they way they deserve. They're called "farm" animals for a reason.
- I think this opens up the door to having these other animals be a problem for neighbors, with noise and smells.
- Not enough room in the city to graze, excessive fecal matter getting in storm system, spreading of disease.
- Barnyard animals do not belong in the City
- Too much room for different approvals for equal proposals. Will become chaotic and who has the greatest moxy and argumentation to get support.
- Farm animals are called that for a reason. Noise, odour and the attraction of vermin are the reasons there should be no farm animals in developed residential areas.
- Livestock that requires farm size land cannot be properly homes within city limits. If there is a farm IN TOWN then yes.

- How is the City planning on the clean up and increased waste created by the animal? Are the owners going to have increased fees associated with the property, waste clean up, etc to help pay for this? Maybe regions in the city would be acceptable but not wholesale across city limits.
- ""Other livestock"" is not defined in this survey. I would not want to live next door to a neighbour who was raising ""other livestock"" without knowing specifically what those livestock were. The word ""livestock"", to me, means ""farm animals"". Aside from the noises and smells, this would not be desirable, for me, to live beside such a household. The place for these animals should be on a farm or acreage. If that acreage is inside city limits, that is fine, as long as it is big enough to contain the activities, smells and noise of such operations.
- It says that it is proposed that support be obtained from adjacent neighbours first. Be very careful with this, as neighbours may initially support, but what happens if they sell and the new neighbour does not support? That would be an administrative nightmare to rectify. What constitutes ""adjacent""? Next door? Two houses away? Three? What if the next door neighbour approves, but the guy two houses over does not?? (Or the guy a block away downwind??) As well, how humane would it be for such ""livestock"" to be raised on a typical city lot? Would they have enough room to roam? How would the owner dispose of animal waste? Would they be butchering out in the back yard? What if someone who keeps hens decides they want a noisy rooster in addition to their hens? How would that be dealt with by the city? What if the rooster owner decides to challenge the 'hens only' rule in court? (Sexual discrimination... ha ha). What would become of the rooster waiting for that to filter through the system, and the neighbours who would be subjected to the noise of a crowing rooster (they crow all day, not just at dawn) while the case winds its way through court? Disaster.... not to mention additional litigation costs thrust on to the City.
- How well would I be able to sell my house next door to an ""other livestock"" operation? Would I suffer a loss in my property value as a result? No thanks - please do not allow this. Nightmare!!
- Noise and hygiene concerns.
- Livestock belong on a farm where they can have adequate space they need
- I don't need to hear or smell livestock of any kind in the city limits. It's a main reason I sold my house in Airdrie
- Livestock does not belong in an urban setting
- If you want to farm move to the country
- Don't like having fowl in city limits - less clean
- Noisy, stinky, diseased animal situations are not for a city.
- Smelling insanitary conditions.
- Farm animals have a lot of odor.
- "(a) Nobody really needs a chicken in their yard. (b) I grew up on a farm. Chickens are really noisy and create a lot of odor.
- If, against all common sense, the city does allow urban chickens it has to require the express written consent of every adjacent property owner."

- They are noisy during quiet times
- We live in the inner city, and the sanitation, noise and health issues that arise with animal husbandry are a concern.
- Would be too hard to police for proper care and non nuisance
- Calgary does not have the resources to ensure bylaws are being followed by home owners.
- I would not want hens living next door. They should be on a farm.
- Noise and smell - also animals need space to roam
- I live very close to my neighbours, and can only imagine how disruptive this might be - I also have 2 dogs that have a prey instinct. I would support as long as there is a minimum distance between backyards, etc.
- I do not want chickens in an urban setting
- No hens in the city! If people want them badly, they can move to an acreage/farm. Hens or other farm animals do not belong in the city.
- "Hens can be noisy and make mess, and in areas in the City that back onto green spaces could attract animal predators.
- Also if it were to go ahead there should be annual licensing and a fee for each hen. Just like there is a fee for a dog licenses. Enforcement and adjudication must be paid by the animal owner, not coming from general revenues."
- Chickens are okay but any other livestock would cause more harm than good. There is almost no place they can live within city limits that wouldn't be cruel
- All hens or livestock should be held on rural property
- no farm animals in the city .. that's a nuisance having them in the city
- I do not support anybody from the city at their discretion making decisions that is proven idiotic and all it does is make residents angry
- "Today even with dogs there are those who will get them and then not take care of them. What guarantee is there that we aren't adding another type of animal to the already existing neglect and abuse issues that already exist. Do not add another animal to a bylaw when we don't even have enough resources to tend to the dogs and cats that are in this city. I wouldn't want to be subjected to the noise and smell from chickens never mind disease. Does this include butchering?
- If the neighbor puts a chicken coop near the fence line between neighbors, do I know have to smell it and listen to it."
- I believe animals would/could be neglected and couldn't possibly be harassed/injured by neighbours who are upset about them being nearby.
- Livestock seems to vague for me to answer this. I don't know what type of animals are being considered to be able to say yes. I'd need more details.
- Even if all neighbors are ok with a chicken coop what about if one of them moves. They limit the potential buyers or the new owners are afraid to speak out. I'm all for having a bee farm, chickens or goats... that's a benefit of living on a farm or acreage! City is for pets, not livestock. You want chickens, move out to the country!
- health concerns, noise concerns, space restrictions

- Carry disease if not well cared for and monitoring for 5 freedoms would be difficult- how do you ensure suitable living conditions on private property?
- enough of them support chickens and the disease they bring
- This is the City of Calgary and urban environment. If people want to raise farm animals, move to an acreage where it is acceptable or a farm. Think Pandemic and why these things happen.
- The City has no way to control owners of livestock. We do not need to become a 'third world' country...yet.
- "Calgary does NOT require Disease carrying Livestock! Especially dirty disgusting Pigeons! Like in Toronto & NYC.
- The Geese & Seagull Shit everywhere is more than Enough!
- What does this have to do with the Calgary pit bull ban?"
- Farm animals belong on a farm not in my neighbours backyard. I feel like it's ridiculous to be having this discussion. Live on a farm and/or acreage. Not in a city area with livestock.
- Not a big fan of farm type animals living in city
- I THINK IT WOULD DEPEND ON YOUR LOCATION AND THE SIZE OF YOUR YARD, AND RULES AROUND THE KEEPING OF HENS PROPERLY
- Farm animals should not be permitted in the city. It breathes rodents, flies, etc. this is a very unsanitary idea. People also have allergies. No. No. No.
- because it causes disease and more filth and litter
- I am concerned that there is no limit on the amount of livestock. I would be ok with 2 chickens, not 10+. Concerns about cleanliness of yards and pens and enforcement.
- Livestock can be loud, they smell and are always outdoors unlike a traditional pet
- Avian flu. Chickens are vectors.
- Birds are noisy and dirty
- I support hens for eggs, but I cannot see the value of other livestock
- with all due respect to those including myself who would love an urban hobby farm, at inspection time all could look suitable and well, but as I've witnessed with dog owners, clean up in -20 and up does not happen leaving an unacceptable mess in spring or throughout the winter melt and freeze situations we have here in Calgary.
- Undecided.
- People need to still learn how to take care of their domestic animals first. Sadly, I fear this will open up more animal cruelty.
- There is no way chickens should be allowed to be raised in the city, this is a slippery slope that leads to the establishment of unclean and foul smelling urban farms as well as the noise nuisance such animals bring along.
- It can be concerning to hear chickens at the early hours of the day and the odor can be very intrusive. If you want livestock, purchase land in the rural area.
- Having fowl in yards will increase wild animal encounters.
- I oppose allowing urban hens or other livestock

- Chickens stink, are loud and can spread disease. Most people have no clue how to care for nor do they need farm animals with in the city.
- the noise and smell would be too hard to contain
- I don't even agree with hens much less other livestock. These animals belong on a farm.
- I do not feel like suitable living conditions will be upheld within the city and it would be a nuisance to neighbours
- Calgary neighbourhoods are already overcrowded. livestock would only see a rise in noise (and potentially odour) complaints.
- Keep farm animals on the farm
- There are many Restrictive Covenants on inner city properties which do not allow livestock of any kind.
- The city of Calgary is unable to have the resources to support the bylaws they already have in place. Not everyone will take care of hens correctly causing issues in your neighborhoods which the city of Calgary or CPS will not have the resources or the time to support
- Livestock should not be in the city. There isn't enough space on properties to support their spacial needs and not be a nuisance to neighbours.
- Smell.
- People are already bad pet owners
- Keep animals on the farm.
- Odors and insects that I do not want around my property
- It would just open up a huge can of worms so to speak.
- Livestock should be on farm land or larger plots of land that rural communities have.
- [removed]
- I believe living next door to a person who keeps hens, would not only be unpleasant for numerous reasons but would also de-value your property.
- i am against owning hens in calgary as they may be subject to a lot of abuse and i dont trust the SPCA to enforce or fine owners for neglect
- Unless you live outside the city or in a very rural/remote area live stock (including birds) should not be kept in city limits. They are farm animals - they need more space than a city back yard to live!
- Livestock do not belong in people's backyards. By-law enforcement is not enough to ensure these animals are treated fairly. Is this for an emotional welfare animal? If so these are not hens. if it's to have your own eggs, still not good. Livestock carry diseases. CANCEL THIS!!!! Chickens are allowed but dogs are a problem!!!! My mind is blown.
- I think this would be too difficult to manage.....too many rules/exemptions etc. urban homes are already so close together that having to deal with the sounds/smells associated with livestock would ruin my enjoyment of my own property
- To difficult to enforce probable animal abuse
- birds carry diseases and are noisy. Not an urban animal.
- chickens and other livestock belong on a ranch or farm.

- If I want to, I've near a farm and all of the smells that come with it, I will move to the country.
- There are already too many irresponsible animal owners in the city. Having livestock within city limits on a small lot is not fair for the animals and neighbors due to noise and smell
- Do you want to live beside a home that has chickens. The smell.
- It is hard to imagine having space for hens as we are a rather urban city - I have to think there would be almost no areas with large enough yards - attract predators, noise problems?
- Chickens don't belong in cities.
- It is really difficult already for bylaw to force current pet laws. If neighbors had chickens and they became difficult or not following by laws this would mean longer wait times and frustrations.
- I don't feel that urban areas are suitable for the well being of livestock or hens. There is a reason why these animals are kept on large plots of land outside of cities. Having large livestock in city areas will also contribute to air pollution
- I don't want chickens living in the city.
- Living in the city exempts one from smelling manure
- I THINK THE AMENDMENT TO THIS BYLAW NEEDS TO BE THROWN OUT. NOW.
- There is enough farm land for this purpose
- What other livestock?
- I doubt owners could be held accountable for neighbours' concerns about noise or health (i.e. viral spillover events.)
- leave bylaw as is - no livestock
- Slippery slope to allow urban hens. Bylaw will be take advantage of if not enforced.
- People already buy hens and ducks for Easter and give them up when they realize they don't know how to care for them and then overburdened rescue organizations end up taking them.
- We live in a city not In the country. If they want livestock live on an acreage.
- Chickens are disgustingly gross. They are noisy and if people do not clean up or maintain their cages they become stinky disgusting disease infested places that nobody wants to visit or live nearby. It's bad enough that people do not clean up after their cats and a lot of dog owners don't clean up after their dogs but now you're going to try and let people house chickens in their yard or in their house how do you expect to keep the city clean?
- I do not see how the city has the resources (ie. money) to administer this program.
- I do not believe that there is enough room in the city to properly accommodate a farm animal. You're just allowing people to mistreat these animals and shove them into small backyards.
- People already neglect domestic animals. Livestock do not need to be thrown into the mix. Plus there would be a large increase in complaints to the city.
- Few city yards are large enough to properly maintain livestock even if just one animal. I think keeping it to pigeons and chickens and even then controlling numbers, is fine.
- General public cannot be left to their own devices - not everyone has common sense!
- "I like chickens. However, they need to remain on farms. Chicken manure is smelly. Chickens attract predators.

- Feral chickens can be a real neighborhood problem."
- this will not be monitored well by bylaw - there are not enough bylaw officers in the city.
- I do not support livestock being in residential calgary as they are disease vectors, result in increased noise & smell, and can be a source of disease impacting farmers (eg avian flu etc).
- I think it's likely to lead to more neighbourhood disputes.
- livestock should remain where it is most healthy for them and neighbors - the farm or rural communities. There is no need in an urban environment to have livestock.
- Hens are farm animals and as such should not be allowed in a progressive modern city.
- It would not be fair to people living around them.
- livestock belongs out of the city.
- City has proved it is inefficient and unwilling to even enforce the existing by-laws. That would cause more problems to deal with in the future
- Homes are too close together in Calgary. There is no way that animals crammed into small lots will not have impacts on all of their surrounding neighbors. Poultry attracts other wildlife and also creates issues for some people's dogs and cats. Livestock can also attract rodents, flies, fleas, etc. I must say that we have lived in many different settings over the years, both urban and rural where all manner of livestock has been in "backyards". In most cases they create issues for the neighbours and unfortunately in a lot of the cases the animals are not kept as clean and well cared for as they should be.
- It breedism and another money grab and unfair to judge based on breed.
- Farm animals should not be allowed within the city of Calgary boundaries. If you want to raise farm animals go buy a farm outside of Calgary
- Hygiene and noise concerns.
- Yes and no, chickens yes, cows no. They are not pets. How would it be controlled, how do you ensure residents are properly treating, taking care of the animal. Already not enough control on small pets like dogs/cats on animal abusers there is no reason to put more animals in their arms.
- Noise/smell
- People have inconsistent control for their current animals or at the very least many owners lack common courtesy for their neighbours/community members - I see nothing but conflict and issues related to people over romanticizing backyard chickens. I would imagine that few people have any real experience raising livestock and their depth of understanding comes directly from a blog they're read, a reality TV show or a twitter feed.
- Unsanitary in the city and a nuisance to neighbours with constant noise. Not an animal I'd want to live next to
- to much feces involved
- Too many people would think raising chickens would be fun - until it comes time to clean up the mess they make. Neighbours would have to live with their bad choices.
- Hens smell bad and could annoy neighbours
- Legislated responsible livestock ownership within city limits seems feasible. However, the resources necessary to facilitate this should not taken from other areas requiring those resources. Above all else, our current "system" should be improved before we look to introduce new ways of owning "pets".

- Bad smells, sanitation - let's learn from Covid-19!!
- I feel that hens stink and if not properly taken care could become a problem.
- Already we have a problem where people cannot take ownership of dogs, cats and other animals. There is fecal matter all over the bike/walking paths and sidewalks. Its rare and I mean rare that on a daily walk we don't see anything. Especially during spring melt its disgusting how much fecal matter is seen. Until people can be held responsible for domestic animals how can we allow for farm animals.
- I don't want live stock living beside me. The smell alone will decrease my property value.
- Support from adjacent neighbors!!, what happens when the neighbors move and new neighbors live next door. This will be impossible to monitor and enforce. No hens, no other livestock. This is a city not a ranch. Enforcements officers will never be able to enforce this. People will always find a way to bypass or attempt to bypass the law.
- As someone allergic to bees if my neighbours had them I would not be able to enjoy my own home without fear of getting stung.
- See previous comments
- Farm animals are noisy and stink, keep them in farms
- Chickens belong on the farm not in the city. This is ridiculous.
- Does the Chief Bylaw Officer really have the time or expertise to evaluate on a case by case basis what types of pets people can own? If people want farm animals they should move to a farm, they don't belong in the city.
- They are noisy and smelly you will have alot of complaints, I would be very disappointed to have farm animals living next to me
- Livestock of any kind (including hens) belong on farms or rural property.
- Not every neighbour is going to agree/support.
- Some people are allergic to hens/chickens - if they are allowed there will be a smell and feathers flying around other yards. If you allow hens, you should allow people to have other livestock as well - e.g. miniature ponies, etc. This could get totally out of hand with people not looking after the surroundings and who is going to ensure things are kept clean? We don't have enough by-law officers now.
- If you want livestock then live on a farm or acreage.
- I really don't see how having farm animals in my neighborhood would be beneficial.
- We are not farms and neighbors are already irritated by dogs that bark uncontrollably. To allow fowl that we make noises when the sun rises, will be disturbing to neighbors. Livestock in a city house lot; really??
- I don't believe that any livestock should be allowed in the city. It would be difficult to enforce and the potential for animal abuse it too great.
- For me to support this bylaw amendment, it would need to include public education regarding zoonoses of backyard hens as well as education for the owner of the hens regarding biosecurity

- This would open the doors to bring nuisance critters into the area as well.
- It's stupid. Move to the rural areas if you want livestock.
- Some properties are very close together.
- No farm animal including hens should be allowed in the city limits.
- I feel these are types of animals that would be better suited outside the city to roam larger areas of land, rather than be confined in smaller yards that the cities have.
- Chickens and other livestock need acres of land to be comfortable. They don't belong in a city. Their quality of life would be poor
- Chicken dander flies long distances making it difficult for anyone who has an allergy to feathers and/or dander to avoid if they live in the neighbourhood.
- Seems dirty and could spread illnesses if there is no proper handling. Could be noisy for neighbors. Livestock do not belong in Residential communities.
- Livestock is a broad term. I do not support cows, sheep, etc within city limits.
- hens are for the farm
- It will attract more predators like coyotes. California has this problem
- Depends on the livestock and what is in place to prevent the spread of any disease and smell
- hens and chickens do not belong in urban settings
- The odors from raising livestock in a urban setting could be problematic
- Too many people will abuse it and too few bylaw officers will be able or willing to enforce it.
- Livestock do not belong in the city. Living proximity in a city will cause issues arising from noise and smell. While those who have not lived with them may not recognize this, anyone who has lived on a farm will know the problem this will cause.
- I had neighbors who had chickens for many years (not sure if they were legal) but they annoyed the entire neighborhood. Caused lots of cats to roam the area. And they were not cared for / cleaned properly. The next door neighbors said that it stunk terrible too, they couldn't sit outside due to the smell.
- I feel that this particular option leaves a loop hole for a neighbour to make an issue for reasons other than the hens themselves.
- The term "other" livestock is much too vague.
- There is no acceptable situation to have hens in an urban environment.
- You spoke about nuisance animals above when it comes to dogs, what do you think hens will do all day I don't need hens clucking or roasters crowing all day long.
- I'm not sure city has resources needed to expand its monitoring activities
- Livestock belong on the farm
- "Where does this stop? I would like to have llamas in my back yard in the SW. If you want to have a farm move to a farm or acreage where you can have those animals so they have the space roam.
- if I live in a apartment can I have a chicken or pig, monkey, or pet lion? The city has to be able to say no enough is enough!!"
- Hens are fine, roosters are a problem.

- The city offers no help with things like puppy mills (all of my neighbors can attest to that). There is NO REASON TO ASSUME THE CITY WOULD INTERVENE WITH DIFFERENT ANIMALS.
- Disease can be spread through bird feces.
- Best raised out of city smell noise etc
- I do not support any wildlife including hens within city limits.
- Hens are a farm animal
- Hens are not pets in my opinion
- Because often these animals can be very noisy. Their feces can be very foul and I believe this could make it difficult to enjoy my own back yard.
- "People are pigs in general, you figure they will keep this clean?"
- No way!"
- Hens do not belong in the city. I would NOT want my neighbor having them.
- I think livestock is better suited to rural environments.
- Chickens smell and are a nuisance. I used to work in a chicken farm.
- "We are going to increased densification in Calgary and exploring livestock...really.
- We don't have the number of bylaw officers needed to address roosters in the morning. What about runoff from livestock into the storm system? Who is liable for cleanup? Wild animals will be attracted to the scent and migrate into more urban neighbourhoods...they don't even want fruit trees in Canmore and you are considering allowing a large farm experiment in the city."
- Yards within city limits are relatively small to raise livestock, concern about lack of care/clean up of livestock creating nuisance for neighbours
- Most properties in the city are not large enough, or far enough from neighbours to allow for livestock in a way that won't negatively impact neighbours ability to enjoy their property.
- We already have enough issues with noisy neighbours not taking care of their existing animals, we shouldn't be adding more until they can deal with what is already existing.
- When humans and chicken live in close proximity, it breeds disease and viruses. It is done in China and Africa, let's not import this unsanitary behaviour here
- Think is Ridiculous and a waste of time and money
- Most residential properties are too small to support livestock. Keep them on the farm or a larger plot of land
- The smell of chickens, goats, pigs, and other livestock can and will be offensive to neighbors. Plus you have the added problems associated with fecal matter from livestock.
- Chicken pens can become foul smelling
- "Because of smell and noise.
- Degrading property value"
- The city is not a farm and I do not want a farm adjacent to me. If I did, I would live in the country.
- I don't believe that it is in most cases possible to provide proper care for livestock in an urban environment like Calgary.

- "Concern over close living quarters with neighbouring homes and families and possible poor living conditions of livestock would have a negative impact on others.
- As well, once that livestock is allowed into city limit living, it becomes more difficult to reverse that decision for the owner of it turns into a poor idea."
- No! This will be a disaster. Most houses are too close together.
- Unless zoned for agriculture, I don't want to see urban farming in my neighborhood
- I wouldn't want to live next door to someone with hens.
- We need urban farming
- People can barely look after themselves and their pets dogs cats let alone having Urban hens.
- I dont want chickens and their associated noise and smell being next to my property.
- Far too often, people are given chicks that are male and grow into loud roosters. If people want livestock, they need to live outside residential areas. There are many areas outside Calgary that would allow them to have livestock. With Calgary encouraging increased density of homes, there is already reduced space between neighbours. If there is a problem house, it takes too long for all the reviews, paperwork, enforcement to happen and the neighbours suffer loss of enjoyment of their properties. Chickens smell if their area isn't cleaned daily. Given what I see with people dog waste clean up, I can't see people being better about daily cleaning of their coops.
- I don't think raising livestock is that easy. I'm worried about the nuisance (noise) to neighbors and the cleanliness (smell) issues that could arised.
- Chickens are noisy and stinky
- There is no rational need for anyone to keep chickens in a crowded urban environment where eggs and meat are readily and easily available. There are noise and smell issues with chickens.
- It's unsanitary. People will start raising and selling meat without a license. The smell will be horrible for neighbours. Stop trying to turn the city into a 3rd world county.
- I do not want to see farm livestock encroach into the city
- I do not think these animals should be allowed in urban areas. Our backyards are too small. The noise and smells would be overwhelming
- Livestock belong on farms, not in backyards.
- Concerns regarding noise and smell
- I don't think city folk need chickens in their back yards. I would fear some people would not clean up and care for their pets properly (like people do with dogs and cats etc)
- Biosecurity and disease control among urban hen owners is difficult to control and poses a large burden on food security and public health systems.
- A city is not the place to raise and keep these animals. I would foresee nothing but complaints, etc.
- Livestock belong on a farm, they always have and it needs to stay that way!!! I would not want to smell that or listen to the noise!!
- Their should be no farm pets that produce eatable material in a household yard
- You don't have enough people to deal with current problems . Now livestock? So we can hire more people and pay more taxes? Enough is enough. If someone wants livestock they can move to the acreage.

- Move to an acreage if you want hens
- We live in a city, not farm.
- Chickens excrement is unpleasant in its odour. Being allergic to the dust from this, as well as their feathers are unpleasant experiences.
- Concern about disease
- I think it will just increase conflict between neighbours and I don't see any effective conflict resolution.
- Livestock belongs OUTSIDE the city limits
- This is a slippery slope. For every good livestock owner there will be one that neglects responsibility. We're having enough trouble with traditional pet ownership.
- I don't feel that having livestock in ones yard is appropriate in such a close setting. With homes being so close together, there is more chance of this becoming a nuisance to the neighborhood than it being a benefit.
- These do not belong in the City.
- I don't believe that there is enough room on most city properties to keep the noise and smell away from neighbours.
- If I wanted to live on a farm or acreage, I would have chose that. I did not.
- Come on, seriously? Chickens and pigs in the city? No.
- It's foolishness
- The city is no place for this!
- No place to attract more wildlife into the city
- Livestock belong in the country.
- Livestock should not be in the city
- Smells and noise
- I support suitable living conditions for the animal.
- Noise & smell
- livestock should not be on private property within the city limits.
- Coyotes may become more of an issue
- I would not want a neighbor to have any time of livestock in their yard. Hens are a dirty noisy bird, and if people cannot take care of domestic animals how can we expect them to properly care for livestock
- Livestock need room to roam - room I assume would be limited within city limits.
- If you want to farm, buy a farm. I would not appreciate living next to a chicken coop.
- Noise.
- The city is not a farm. Would proper living conditions be enforced?
- Livestock should not be in urban settings
- I lived in Oregon by some hens and they are smelly. Would need to have a huge backyard, not great for city living.

- Hen is bad idea. They wake you up in the morning and the smell foul. Also they attract wild animals to home!!.
- "Pets to be allowed in the city should be limited to dogs, cats and a small bird. If you start including bigger and bigger animals, where will the limits of breed and size end up? third world country Hygiene, noise and transmittable diseases will become
- rampant. Calgary will become a third world country where everything is acceptable."
- Don't want the smell or the hassle when the novelty wears off.
- It may attract wildlife; then they would be unsafe from human/city activity
- Absolutely no chickens in city this will become a serious issue
- The city isn't the place for livestock.
- I don't think that the city would invest enough in proper enforcement of bylaws.
- If you want chickens live on a farm or acreage.
- Hens are a lot of work and are a big commitment. I worry that people will purchase hens as a fad and quickly get bored.
- Hens are quiet and clean if well cared for. They should be allowed, but a person shouldn't need their neighbor's blessing to own hens.
- If you want livestock. Move to an acreage.
- Hens, livestock etc should be on farms not in urban areas
- No livestock, including hens need to be in the city.
- Too many opportunities to infringe on neighbours enjoyment of their own property
- we have enough going on in calgary we don't need hens running through the city
- Livestock require specific environment for care and an urban backyard is not suited to proper care of the animals.
- I grew up on a farm and I am well aware of what chickens smell like and what they attract.
- I don't agree with it being at the discretion of the chief bylaw enforcement officer 1 person should not have total say. How can you be sure that they are being fair in decision making and not playing favorites based on gender or nationality.
- This is going to open the door to small farm animals in residential areas - noise, smells, getting loose. We are a city and not a place for livestock. Chickens are bad enough
- Absolutely not, it is not the place for livestock in the city and will generate ill will and bad feelings amongst neighbors. Leaving approval to by law will create many inconsistencies with added cost
- Livestock don't belong in the city
- livestock is not ment to be raised in a residential area
- Farm animals are not city pets. They can be a nuisance and should not be allowed in back yards. Live on an acreage if you want farm pets.
- I think enforcement would be difficult, thus increasing likelihood of mistreatment of animals
- It's not necessary and will require lots more enforcement. People are not responsible enough to do it properly. Additional noise and smell complaints will require lots more bylaw officers.

- Livestock should remain outside of a city environment. They are much harder to control for noise and noxious odors
- There is no reason to allow livestock other than "hens" in an urban setting.
- Noise and smell can be overwhelming
- livestock belongs on a farm not on narrow dwelling parcels of land
- Hens do not belong in the city
- Buy a farm..
- Exceptions be allowed by a by-law officer alone. This should be voted upon.
- No urban chickens. Keep those to farmland
- Birds carry bacteria And viruses that can species jump, and their droppings if not cleaned properly are a significant health hazard. Allowing livestock on close proximity and urban areas would increase pandemic potential such as Covid-19.
- chickens are meant to be on a farm with land to exercise. We are already being crammed into condos at 450 square footage. No room for chickens or other livestock in a city full of cement and condos.
- Chickens belong on a farm not in a city
- Calgary already has a coyote problem, and having urban chickens would enhance the problem. Ask any rural chicken farmer.
- I don't understand the ramifications well enough to agree.
- I do not think any alternative animals should be residing on city home properties. There is an option to purchase a farm or part of a farm in the rural.
- Urban neighbours live close together and livestock sounds like unnecessary noise, odour and property damage for non-consenting people to be subject to.
- An acreage is better suited for livestock. Some of the amendments require dedicated city human and financial resources that should be directed to projects that concern the majority of tax payers not some.
- The spreading of food source will increase unwanted rodent population.
- No livestock should be allowed within the city limits
- I'm tired of hearing about chickens. There's a lady in my community obsessed and I think it will lead to too many abusers and the city will end up having to deal with neglected chickens/cleaning up after a terrible chicken keeper.
- Livestock of any kind should not be allowed within the city limits.
- Farm animals belong on a farm, chickens are disgusting and unhealthy
- Live stock stinks. Also would induce more animal attacks.
- Cities are for people. The countryside is for animals
- Livestock belong on farms, not city back yards
- Livestock does not belong in a city and would not be comfortable in a small space.

- Chickens or hens are a tremendous sources of potential disease, odor, and noise pollution. Policing sanitation related to urban livestock would be very difficult, while putting pets, wildlife, and humans at risk.
- "Support from adjacent neighbors is unfair, a lot of Calgarians don't even know their neighbors and a lot of neighbors would say no just because they don't like a neighbor
- Just let people own a set amount of livestock (say 2 hens per household) without needing consent from their neighbors, that idea is ridiculous"
- Diseases, terrible smells, noise....farm animals belong on a farm
- should only be on farms. What about disease of fowls?
- Livestock are not pets and do not belong in homes.
- The conditions in the city are not suitable for livestock. This should be obvious.
- I feel there are few people who would be responsible enough to look after hens. I am not sure of the noise they would cause
- The city is not the place for farm animals. I wouldn't want them next to my home.
- I do not agree with hens and other animals being held in the city. Noise, attract vermin, smell, unsanitary.
- Seems unclear. Is it only direct neighbours you need approval from? If you are 3 doors down you may still hear or smell livestock. Also what is rules around enclosures for these animals. And where does it end? Pigs, goats, hens, etc.
- one person who would be responsible, will open the gate for people wanting any kind of animal, who will then in turn not be responsible. It's a flood gate. Unless of course, rules are put in place prior to.
- Who is going to enforce standards. This could get out of hand fast.
- Too broad in its current form. Which livestock? How much space and how many of each species? Support from the neighbours would need to be ongoing, maybe once a year.
- Livestock, as opposed to pets, don't belong in private homes.
- Bylaw should focus on managing current standards before adding more to the list of items to be upkept.
- Hens are hard to keep up with if in a small living environment, the lots in Calgary are far too small. This would also bring in MORE coyotes, foxes, and bob cats. We have enough just from having wild rabbits/hares!
- I feel this could influence resale and property values to some houses as the noise and smell can be undesirable. Another option may be if a new neighbourhood is deemed "livestock friendly" prior to people purchasing and for those who wish to have that type of lifestyle.
- We have seen a substantial increase in wildlife (bobcats, coyotes, fox) in our neighborhood over the last ten years. We are aware of this issue and are happy to co-exist. Bringing bait in the form of backyard hens into the neighborhoods is just asking for more foot traffic and hunting and leaves the hens as literal sitting ducks waiting to be preyed upon.
- Too much of a nuisance and the smell is terrible, i wouldnt want them next door to me, if i wanted to hear and smell chickens or hens id move to the country.
- You can't control the noise of the animals and could become a nuisance quickly.

- The only livestock I support is the sheep and goats used on city green areas to eat/cut the grass. People are barely responsible enough as it is to pick up feces and respect non-off leash areas. There are WAY too many soccer fields, school fields & greenspaces being treated as such & owners are not picking up feces. Is also disrespectful to those who don't care for or are scared of off leash dogs. They are in an off leash zone so why are owners letting their dogs run off leash? If you say something dog owners become offended and hostile. The city needs to spend more money/resources to this issue than allowing more varieties of animals. Also considering the size of properties is becoming smaller and smaller, where are people going to keep livestock? Opens the door to more resources being spent on complaints. There is no need for livestock in the city. If you want that move out to a rural location.
- I think chickens cause pose a potential for more predators such a coyotes and foxes to become a bigger nuisance with chickens becoming a part of city life.
- smells would be onerous
- I hate birds. If u want to live in the country move. Hens and roosters start at 5am and don't stop. It would drive me crazy! And I would hate my neighbor
- I have chosen to live in an urban setting not a rural setting. Hens and other livestock belong in a rural setting:
- It opens up the door for more neglected and abandoned animals as well as more city complaints. There are also few (if any) vets in the city trained and willing to treat livestock animals
- Animals are not "livestock", they're sentient beings and we have no right to keep exploiting them and forcing them to a miserable life, which is largely the case for animal agriculture operations. Instead of finding new ways to exploit them, we should find ways to reduce substantially the atrocities that go on in already existing operations.
- A dense urban setting is not the place for rural animals. ie - Roosters make a lot of noise and early. Increase of disease / pollution / smells. Plus they will draw in predators like coyotes.
- Noise, smell would bring in dangerous wildlife (cougars, etc). Not in favour.
- We dont need more birds in the city and if they get out thats a problem
- Chickens will suffer due to neglect.
- I don't think the city is a good place to try and raise all sorts of wildlife in a backyard. Some of the older communities have nice large yards but many newer communities are tightly packed with no back lanes and tiny yards. Noise and smells may become more of an issue in these communities.
- Should not need the permission of neighbors.
- I do not support hens or livestock within calgary
- live stock should be on larger areas, so possibly if you have a certain amount of land available?
- Don't believe in musles
- Too many people get pet pigs or chickens but then discard them when they get tired of them. This will only ensure it happens more often.
- Ineffective enforcement of by-law regulations now. Lack of person power to enforce. Unlikely to be a consistent application of the bylaw. A Pandora's Box just waiting to be opened. No confidence in the city administration.

- Very few urban properties have the required space for livestock. And the smell! Chicken poop stinks! No one wants to live next door to a smelly neighbour. If you want livestock, move out of the city and buy an acreage!
- Hens require a lot of work and resources to keep them healthy and laying. They are noisy and get foot disease easily. Unless you are selling eggs you end up with way too many eggs, a waste of food.
- Chickens are a high maintenance animal and most people can't/won't pick up after their dogs let alone having to do something more rigorous like clean out their chicken coop daily. If amount of dog excrement that has been left behind by lazy dog owners over the past many years is any indication of how an average "responsible" dog-owner is in Calgary, they most definitely are not responsible enough to keep chickens. Any bylaw enforcement does nothing except hand out warnings. These people need to receive large fines for not cleaning up after their dog(s)!
- While I understand the idea in high density neighbourhoods there is issues of nuisance, noisex smell
- The City is under-resourced / unable to deal with the problem pets we already have. I would only support this if there was a significant increase in staff and enforcement.
- Livestock belongs on farms. This bylaw is already too easy to abuse. There is not enough open space in most yards for animal husbandry.
- do not want the noise, smell etc.
- Livestock can be noisy and create unpleasant odors which would impact my ability to enjoy my own backyard. These annoyances cannot be controlled. You cannot tell a chicken to be quiet nor a sheep to stop smelling. Yards are too close together in the city.
- Fear of increased predation by coyotes, bobcats and other carnivores. We already have these issues.
- In my experience with some chickens in my neighbourhood they create a nuisance because of massive mouse populations associated with the chicken coop, creating a draw for free roaming cats (and a reason for cats to work hard at escaping from yards with barriers to keep them in), and create a garbage stream in residential areas that can include bacterial pathogens such as Salmonella.
- Farm animals belong on farms. The noise and smell is a concern for condensed neighborhoods
- Farm animals, unless deemed support or therapy animals, should remain on a farm and not in someone's backyard.
- We chose to live in an urban environment and would rather not be awakened at 4am by a rooster.
- I feel these animals belong on a farm and not in the city in a backyard environment. These animals need special care and a certain amount of space to raise. The noise and smell could become problematic. Overall I find it unnecessary.
- Hen's can get very smelly and most people are not responsible enough to clean pens daily.
- There should be no livestock allowed in residential communities.
- Livestock have too many negatives. They are not trainable. Can be a nuisance to neighbors like noise, smell.
- Livestock need room to live. Any urban area home do not have enough room
- I don't believe a city backyard is a suitable place for livestock.

- Smell and noise. Eg Being woken early every morning by a crowing rooster.
- i doubt people would provide good living conditions for animals they cobsider to be live stock versus pets
- There is a public health concern in regards to the spread of infectious disease (especially salmonella). While these risks can be mitigated by following proper safety and cleaning procedures, it's unlikely all these guidelines will be followed by everyone. Monitoring compliance and enforcement of the bylaw would be too complex.
- If you want hens move outside the city.
- Do not support livestock in city neighbourhoods -- too much potential for conflict.
- Most people do not understand what it takes to provide a safe, nurturing home for livestock and all too often when they become hard to handle they end up abandoned or surrendered to rescues and are not able to be rehomed.
- I wouldn't want to move next to a house that already has established chickens. They are gross and smelly. Farm animals belong on farms.
- Unfortunately they attract rats.
- I like the idea of hens, but I'm not sure Bylaw has the capacity to enforce all the things that would be needed. A lot of people already don't follow the rules for their existing pets (i.e. picking up after dog, respecting off leash/ on leash areas). It's a nice idea, but I envision it only leading to difficulties, especially with the potential for avian zoonotic diseases.
- Not acceptable in an urban setting. Smell, noise etc
- I don't want animals slautered next door for food or otherwise. Livestock, including hens will encourage other wildlife and predators to the community. I think this will encourage the death and relocation of wildlife—coyotes, cougars, wolves, bears, large predator birds. Plus the smell!!
- I don't think chickens should be permitted within Calgary. They are messy and noisy and attract wild animals such as coyotes, bobcats, cougars etc who will endanger people and their dogs and cats and cause the coyote etc to be killed.
- Impossible to control
- Most are too smelly and noisy.
- I support indoor support pets but outside hens may get loud and their waste messy
- In most other cities that I have lived in where urban hens are allowed they are an extreme nuisance and lead to attracting predator species - coyotes and rats in my experience.
- This is ridiculous. How can you expect chickens and livestock to NOT DISTURB neighbors? Noise is a real issue. Fecal disease transmission too. Dogs are noisy and a constant source of friction between neighbors right now. You want to expand that to livestock & chickens? WOW. Talk about an administrative nightmare. Property values for neighbors will plummet. If these people want chickens and livestock, they should move to a rural farm.
- Livestock deserve to stay only on farms where they have lots of space. It would be cruel to confine them in a city just so it's convenient for a human.
- The risk of negative impacts on neighbours is too high. I would not want the sounds and smells from urban hens next to my yard. If people want to have farm animals, they should locate in a rural area.

- They often stink, they are often noisy, there is no guarantee that owners will be responsible, neighboring animals (dogs) will be stressed by having "prey" on the other side of the fence.
- Unlike pets, urban livestock are more likely to affect property values and reduce enjoyment especially in areas with smaller lots sizes
- That's what Farmers and Farming is for.
- Livestock belong on a farm or acreage not in a city.
- I have experienced having hens and rooster in close proximity to my home - awful. Adjacent neighbours should not be put in the position of potential negative ongoing relationships if they don't want livestock in an urban setting.
- Current food chain supply is sufficient
- My in-laws (who live out of country) have hens and a rooster, and I find it very unappealing. They smell and make noise, and I don't agree with this becoming accepted in urban communities.
- Livestock Of any kind - hens, honey bees, goats, sheep, ponies, etc... - does not belong in any urban high density area. I'm unable to list all the possible issues and problems, not the least, enforcement resources.
- The question is unclear. What is meant by support from adjacent neighbours? Do the people who want hens have to seek approval or do their neighbours have to find out about the plan and then oppose it. Also, what is the recourse if there is a problem should the hens be allowed. What happens if the neighbours who agreed move and new neighbours who do not approve move in?
- It's a city
- I don't believe that any farm animals should be in the city.
- Cats and dogs are normal. Anything else should be on a farm.
- Mess, smell, disturbances from noise.
- Livestock (including hens) are not bred as "pets" and have much different housing and care needs than can be appropriately provided in the city.
- Hens' feces can lead cancers!
- It will not be possible to enforce regulations on Urban hens. The City's ability to enforce any bylaws is already stretched.
- I feel most people wouldn't properly care for the animals and when the novelty of having them wears off, then what happens to the animals? Shelters and rescues are full because people don't accept animals as a lifelong commitment and they certainly won't with livestock. Kindness to animals builds a better world for everyone unfortunately the animals pay the price when the kindness stops.
- I am having difficulty understanding why we would encourage City dwellers to own / keep farm animals within city limits. Any animal or avian species raised as a food source should not be allowed to dwell inside city limits. To introduce a bylaw that stipulates "neighbors must agree to permit the raising of hens (or other typical farm animals) in a neighborhood will set that community up for neighborhood disagreements, especially if it affects the Requestor's livelihood.
- You are not clear here..livestock bring disease and smells - they do not belong in the small properties, they belong on farms and acreages over 5 acres..
- Chickens /gems do not belong in the city limits due to the odour management.

- The city is not a place for farm animals.
- we have enough problems with accepted pets as it is, asking for trouble having more easy meals for urban predators
- They should not be forced to give away benefits of their livestock that they care for to other people
- There is no place in an urban setting for any domestic poultry. Hens belong on a farm.
- Horrible idea in a crowded urban environment and pandemic times and our socially entitled environment
- The potential for this creating significant friction between neighbors is extremely high. Raising animals is a lot of work and I feel while the hobby farmer may start out with high energy and intention that over time, will wain and animal care or cages will become junky. I believe this view is supported if you simply look at many homes yards or garden boxes. They often start out looking well maintained but people get busy and less interested and yards or garden boxes often start looking overgrown and junky (to put it nicely). A neighbor is put in an awkward position if things do become poorly managed and honestly there is little that a neighbor can do without damaging relationships.
- I don't want the noise or the smell.
- Messy, smelly, lawn destruction, noise. I do like the idea of beneficial short term visits for say slug control.
- The City is not a place for farm animals, otherwise they would be referred to as "City Animals".
- If you need a rooster for hens to lay eggs I am against it.
- It opens too much room for abuse and lack of enforcement.
- Should stay on farms.
- A city environment is not conducive to having "livestock" - ie. Attracts predators potentially harmful to children/adults.
- Too much noise, smell and fecal material
- Livestock are not appropriate in an an urban setting. That is what country living is for.
- Don't feel they belong in urban area
- The yards are not big enough and they are noisy and smell
- noisey, smelly and attract rodents
- The smell and noise
- Livestock don't belong in urban areas.
- If people wish to raise hens they should live in the outskirts or outside the city. Same as pigs etc.
- No chickens in the city
- We have too many animals in the city as it is and too many irresponsible pet owners. I don't see it improving by allowing livestock.
- Hens and other livestock don't belong in the city. Cities are for people and domestic animals like cats and dogs. Hens and other livestock will result in increased conflicts amongst neighbours and there is also the potential for disease. Hard to believe this is even being considered at this time given the pandemic and its suspected origin,

- Chicken manure stinks!! Trust me, I shoveled enough of it growing up.
- Chickens STINK. They belong on a farm, not in the city.
- Chickens and other livestock belong in rural area where there is space for them to live and be cared for while providing distance between neighbours to alleviate tension over noise and any other incidents or issues.
- I believe some animal can live within the city limits but there are one that need large areas to roam and I don't believe there are enough of these. I really won't want a cow living next to me. It's not fair to the animal
- no livestock in the city
- Livestock is a rather broad term and people will be quick to try to expand it to include categories far broader than city council might be considering. The definition of livestock and approved species must be clearly defined and not subject to deviation when someone says that some critter is their 'comfort animal'.
- The city is no place for livestock. Stop listening to a minority of people. The majority of us believe chickens and other such animals should be in the rural area.
- Neighbours approval is not necessary for other types of animal ownership, doesn't make sense to require it for livestock
- Livestock can not be provided a suitable life in the city and their smells can carry for quite a distance. Allowing this could result in manpower issues to handle all the complaints.
- I grew up on a farm where we kept chickens. I do not care how well someone thinks they are looking after their chickens, they will still pose a significant health risk. There was a good reason we always had to wash the eggs and our hands. Also, hens are noise and there is a greater risk at attracting coyotes and other predators.
- Livestock should not be in back yards in urban centers
- Hens are step 1 pigs are step 2 then cows then?
- hens should be in a country environment
- No need for chickens in the city. I see no benefit
- Livestock (chicken, pigs, etc.) should not permitted in backyard of residential areas.
- In older neighbor hoods, this might work as the lots are bigger, but new areas have much smaller lots and the noise and smell would be a nuisance
- Stop being so noise. We don't need to be micro managed as a civilization.
- I grew up on a farm with chickens. Their excrement can be very pungent. They will also attract predators such as Merlins, Hawks Coyotes, Foxes ets. Also, I am sure that night shift workers would have an issue with chickens cockle-doing when they are trying to get some shut eye.
- These animals could be obtained for the wrong reasons and end up not being cared for or housed properly. Also, would they attract unwanted predators?
- There are very few lots in Calgary that are big enough to support chickens or other livestock. Chicken and livestock excrement is very smelly.
- Having been around chickens, they can be smelly and dirtier than most birds. This could lead to abandonment issues as well as bad neighbors.

- I would love to see hens allowed in backyards however, having witnessed the abuse, neglect and cruelty of people towards pets + wildlife, even in my neighbourhood, (drowning and poisoning squirrels, shooting Magpies and rabbits), I fear there would be many birds/animals that would suffer unless proper safeguards, standards and heavy fines for abuse, were in place.
- Livestock in a large city? I do not see much success with this given various lot size limitations. I also have concerns about responsible ownership and the impact on neighbours and neighbourhoods.
- This could transmit diseases or can be a nuisance to neighbours.
- I am not sure what you mean by 'other' livestock but I do not feel that they should be permitted in the city. I can't see this being a good thing!
- Do not support the urban hens plan.
- Livestock and associated noise/smell/potential for disease does not belong inside a city.
- if you want to ban feeding wild birds why would you then okay live stock, you need to re think if food is put out birds will eat it, there is a problem with bobcats now why put captive animals into the mix.
- In my neighborhood, yards are very small and I don't think there would be adequate space for hens or Other livestock.
- I don't want a bunch of chickens in my neighborhood
- I can envision the hen situation getting way out of hand.
- I think that are noise and odor issues that have to be addressed
- This would cause a myriad of problems. Mostly between neighbours.
- Bad idea, the City has enough problems trying to control cats and dogs.
- Chickens are one thing but expanding to a wider range of animals could easily get out of hand with noise and smells.
- "You can't control the environment these animals will be kept in.
- Noise and smell is not fair to the neighborhood. Go live on an acreage if you want these animals."
- I live close to a park where predators such as coyotes and bobcats are often seen and roam the surrounding communities at night. Keeping hens would likely lure more of these predators into the community.
- There is no guarantee that hen owners will be diligent in the cleaning and care of their hens (cleaning fecal matter from coops, cleaning feeding areas, etc.) The smell from chickens can be very overwhelming & can cause problems for people with respiratory conditions. These animals can also be very noisy, & they may attract more predators into the urban areas.
- The fact that houses are so close to each other should have the city seeing this makes no sense. Cackling hens, pigeon poop, pigs grunting we have a zoo. Diseases are also a problem, control will also become a problem, nobody follows the bylaws than are in place already. Why would they after this, waste management of animals that owners should be taking care of is a major problem now. How do the city intend to ensure health and safety when it's now even aware of the nuisance pet owners are currently? Pigeons also destroys properties.
- Will attract predators such as coyotes and bobcats increasing the risk of deleterious encounters for other pets, possibly people.
- This is high maintenance option. City of Calgary should be reducing costs.

- I consider this close to the can of worms opening up analog. Who decides appropriate level of noise, smell and other that neighbors have to endure. This is not fair to neighbors that want nothing to do with any of it and feasible if you only allow it in specific communities where everyone is like minded.
- I am unsure about this. My concern is for the welfare of the animals, the 'use' of the animals by the owner (concern for on site butchering, a health issue and possible distress for neighbours) and the excessive number of animals causing interference with neighbours enjoyment of their property especially odour, noise and witnessing over-crowded conditions resulting in animal distress and neighbour distress.
- There is already too much noise from dogs. I cannot remember sitting on my deck for more than 10 minutes without neighbors dogs barking (Because I am there). I understand why people may want Hens or other livestock, but Hens are not quiet.
- There could be nuisance odours and noise from the livestock.
- The potential for these animals to disturb the neighbours and result in a nuisance (smell) greatly outweighs any potential benefit.
- Potential of diseases
- The cost of the level of enforcement, should a dispute arise, would be prohibitive
- My understanding of "other livestock" is cows or horses. Those animals are very large and are hard to control. They should be given large amounts of space. They should not be allowed in inner city yards. Those animals belong on farms and ranches with acres of real estate.
