- People from different areas of expertise who are able to present different opinions and without agenda.
- Those involved with determining the case would be educated on the subject/experts (dog behaviour, rehab)
- If the tribunal has authority to order euthanizing dogs exhibiting dangerous behavior.
- That it address the owner not the animal. Clearly the owner does not know how to take care of their dog.
- the people on this so called tribunal not have any pre determined opinions on any breeds of any kind and actually have compassion for the animal in question and have an open & fair mind & heart
- Must be a dog owner.
- Addendum to above - I would need to know more about the specific differences between the tribunal and court before I could support this idea. A tribunal decision sounds like something people would more easily ignore for the worst of offenders.
- The panel consists of animal experts
- That each case is peer reviewed
- I would like, for the owner, being looked into, as to, do they take good care of their animals? are they being abused?
- zero tolerance for repeat incidents. By law must remove dog and shelters must euthanize it.
- It would need to be a diverse, knowledgeable group of people within the tribunal
- There were opportunities for pet owner to rehabilitate the pet with professional training.
- Appropriate qualifications for those sitting on the tribunal.
- If the dog bite tore flesh the dog should remain at the holding facility. Or if it had to be forcibly removed from the victim.
- At least one member of the Tribunal must be a licensed DVM
- To include knowledgeable trainers with specific and proven training and knowledge of these types of incidents.

- The owner is permitted to address the tribunal and discuss the orders that were handed out and any mitigating actions that may have led to those orders as well as apprising the tribunal of actions taken to address issues raised by the interim orders.
- The tribunal would have to be staffed by people who actually understand dog behaviour and is up to date on how these dogs are reacting.
- The tribunal must include a trained behaviourist and others familiar with dogs, not joe public.
- Tribunal has authority to mandate owner/ pet training. No authority given to Euthanize.
- As long as the cost isn't currently paid by Alberta, but would now be paid by the city of Calgary
- as long as it was quick
- People that have experience and knowledge of dogs and dog behavior are on the panel.
- Not discriminating against the dogs breed
- Euthanasia is LAST resort. Training classes are encouraged, situation and owner's participation is acknowledged (eg poor treatment of the dog), animals have rights too
- The tribunal should not be allowed to determine euthanasia.
- The tribunal should be transparent in its goals and non discriminatory in its decisions. As mentioned prior any disciplinary action should be taken on the individual dog and owner, rather than the breed as a whole. My concern is the tribunal will become overrun with lobbyists or the like who's goals are clearly to destroy specific breeds.
- There is no breed specific legislation discriminating against 'pit bull' type dogs
- The tribunal would have to include dog experts.
- took into consideration why the dog bit, and the owners own reaction to the bite
- Look at past offences and owner responsibility as the first defence (ie: owner cooperation with dog remediation and avoiding euthanasia/seizure when possible.)
- First offense
- only for non dangerous breeds.
- No euthanization, unless we do the same for humans who are on the sex offenders registration. It is not the dogs fault it bites, it's the humans fault for not training or being irresponsible.
- Tribunal is made up of qualified behavior experts who's decisions are science based.
- The non-City representatives should include at least one person with relevant canine expertise (vet, dog behavior trainer etc)
- The City builds a fund that allow some dog owners to appeal, because QB matters are expensive and low income citizens would be unfairly disadvantaged in this matter.
- All dogs that bite should be put down immediately.
- To be made up of people with ACTUAL dog knowledge. They will need to know the difference between dog that is provoked and the bad owners that have made their dog this way.
- Providing the appeal process remained
- swift and efficient
- An experienced dog trainer was part of the tribunal.

- Prohibit Pitbull's and other dangerous dogs completely. Destroy them before they destroy a family or young child's life.
- If tribunal deems euthanasia, trial should then go to provincial level for final judgement
- I would like a range of different people on the tribunal, and they must all be dog owners. I feel dog owners can be more rational when making decisions
- The dog breed is NOT SPECIFICALLY TARGETED DUE TO BREED. DOG BITES HAPPEN, DO NOT BLAME THE BREED OF THE DOG AND FINE THE OWNER FOR NEGLIGENCE.
- Euthanization couldn't be decided solely by the tribunal
- An appellate process needs to be place to remove bias in the event of a contested ruling.
- Pit bulls are not singled out
- The tribunal needs to be made up of people who understand dogs and dog behaviour.
- Biting dog to be destroyed
- History of the dog being accused to be accounted for. Single incidence does not call for euthanasia as many factors can lead to a dog bite (eg. children pulling on dogs tail).
- animal can be kept with owner in cases where allowed
- They would need specific training and perhaps instruction from a judge or lawyer to exercise their authority
- Impartiality, members of tribunal should be varying ages, political beliefs, ethnicities, etc. Don't just do the 'Berta thing and get a bunch of old, white right-wing dudes that all agree with eachother on everything. No-one with any connection to interest groups.
- That it's not breed specific all bites by all breeds of dogs are treated the same
- tribunal members can be proven not to be biased or politically motivated
- As long as it is fair and not bias toward a type of dog. The situation of the bite or attack should be taken into consideration. Example would be did the pit bull protect itself and its owner from another attacking dog? In that case it would be what the dog does on instinct is to protect and shouldn't be punished.
- Don't destroy the dogs
- As written above.
- Wasn't city biased
- As long as decisions could be appealed.
- The dogs should get to stay with the owners until a decision with the condition that the dog stays on the property and only comes in to contact with the owners and not the general public.
- Tribunal has extensive experience with pets
- As long as the animal is kept indoors with OWNER! Until decisions made. No animal should be put down. We don't do it to sick humans who rape or kill why a animal?
- who would sit on the tribunal? Level of knowledge required to be a part of the tribunal? Do tribunal members themselves own large aggressive animals or demonstrate biases?
- I do not think the dog should be euthanized
- must have citizens on the tribunal those with training experience

- That all legalities are followed
- Depends who is on the committee and what canine expertise they have must have a citizens on the panel that have expertise that are not related to the city or animal control
- Euthanasia of dog should be based on multiple offences and supported by a certified animal behaviourist
- That it be open for review before any act, such as euthinization, be carried out.
- The breed of the dog was not included.
- Euthanasia as a last resort.
- Yes
- Not only based on a certain breed
- there are clear facts about the reason why dog bit someone in the first place.
- Let the dogs be.
- investigate owners. Animal abuse leads to visious animals.
- Rehabilitation programs for first offences
- They could not make the decision to euthanize an animal, if they feel eithanization is required it would need to move to a proper court. An animal's bread should not be disclosed during evaluation.
- I don't think animals should be put to death; in the case, a dog bites really bad a person then they should go to a tribunal and find an efficiency way to solve this. Owners should pay a fine and the hospital or doctor's bill for the
- Tribunal would just based on circumstance and not breed.
- There is more emphasis on the situation in which the attack occurred and never emphasize the breed of the dog
- Must include a Vet on the tribunal and an assessment by a separate Vet,
- assess restrictions on the owner, not the dog
- Stop killing aggressive or nuisance animals
- Harsher penalties for the owners. Like bigger fines. More than a slap on the wrist.
- Only opted for euthanization in very extreme cases
- A dog behaviour specialist meets and interacts with the dog on 2-3 separate dates to assess behaviour, temper, and ability to be trained or reconditioned.
- Dog should not be returned to owner after vicious bite
- Any tribunal member must demonstrate impartiality and lack of bias. Any undisclosed bias or prior involvement should be met with a significant fine not less than $1000
- It wasn't biased against certain dog breeds
- Ability to appeal.
- The tribunal is run by a panel of veterinarians here in Calgary. Bylaw officers and the pound are not the right people to make these decisions
- Decisions are made on the current incident based on situation and severity, not on breed.
- was fair to both parties & listen to both sides therowly & fines go towards med bills and damages.
- Fitness to own an animal are consider

- Animal behaviourist/trainer and veterinary assessments required before any final outcome decided
- Made up of an open minded animal supportive person.
- as long as there is no preconceived bias against pitbulls and/ or terrier looking dogs. fairness and regular review of the tribunal board members is paramount.
- That I would get to approve the members of the Tribunal or at least be allowed to appeal the Tribunal's decision on the basis that the decision was not made objective and based on pre-determine criteria.
- Associations like the humane society and animal behavior experts are included
- Euthanasia should be only an option if the dog was involved in multiple incidences or a severe case where human or animal was hospitalized, and I like the restrictions of dog owner needed to abide by.
- Absolutely NO breed specific regulations. All breeds treated the same.
- There is a complete and fair review of the dog in question. Dogs should be given a chance under new ownership and training. All dogs become dangerous because of their environment and previous owners
- Educated open minded dog professionals on the tribunal that follow science and not BSL.
- Professionally qualified positive reinforcement dog trainer with experience with behaviour dogs is on tribunal
- That the owner would abide by the restrictions and guidelines determined by the tribunal
- The members must be dog owners of various breeds and have in their repertoire several dog behaviour courses and trainings from a positive reinforcement based (science based) Dog programs such as from the CHS or Impossible Possible (Catherine Harbord)
- No euthanasia as an option
- As long as those representatives standing on the tribunal have an appropriate background in dealing with similar situations and proper knowledge of dog training, and behaviour; relating specifically to reactivity and aggression.
- As long as the dog can be handled by the owner, and there is no medical reason the owner can not handle said dog with either strength or at a mental capacity the owner should (if allowed) be able to keep said dog
- No euthanasia unless situation is VERY clear. Certainly if a dog kills or severely injures a person (not in defence of self, people or home), euthanize immediately rather than leaving in a kennel for months.
- can not support euthanasia
- There are many aspects of the option of tribunal system missing in order for me to support this option, i.e who are these city and non-city representatives?
- Training / education provided to all tribunal members
- People on the tribunal are educated regarding dog behaviours
- Both parties are equally represented fairly
- The tribunal is made up of industry professional in K9 behaviour, shelter representatives, etc.

- Didn't openly discriminate certain breeds and each animal faces the same assessment and trial.
- The panel be comprised of Unbiased and knowledgeable people from different backgrounds and an appeal process is in place and easily accessible.
- Very limitations for the vicious dogs exposure to people or situations that are at high risk for another incident.
- Non BSL judgements
- Dog has the chance to have more training rather than being euthanized.
- Decision makers would need to be extremely knowledgeable in animal behaviour and have no history of breed biases
- Both parties are given a fair opportunity to discuss what happened. The dog is given back to the owner and kept out of the shelter.
- It treated all offences the same - no special treatment for special circumstances.
- The tribunal decisions are made by people who really know dog breeds. Dogs have been thought to be "aggressive", but in fact are not "aggressive", only scared and unsure of what to do as their owners do NOT train the dog properly. The dog is only as good as their OWNERS train them to be. The responsibility should be on the owners to properly work with and train their dogs. Every breed is different. It's always the way that us humans treat them that make the dogs great or "bad". The dogs should go to trained people to assess whether or not the dog can be worked with properly to have them social in any situation.
- It treats all incidents equally & is not biased against specific breeds. It's the training or lack there of, not the animal.
- Dogs are not put down
- No city council members are allowed to be on the board!
- I do not believe any dog should be euthanized due to behavioural issues, training should be required or rehoming to someone who have provide adequate training - possibly done through a rescue
- Non biased members
- Who picks tribunal?
- The owners have a say in what corrective action they will take the first time. The second put the owner down.
- Each member swears that they agree that Euthanasia is appropriate for dangerous animals.
- Pit bulls should not be singled out for unique treatment under law. However, owners who have abused or trained dogs for aggression should receive harsh penalties and prohibition of ownership rights.
- No euthanization.
- The panel must include people that work with/ have knowledge of animal behaviour
- Euthanasia is the very last thing to suggest. Training, education and helping the dog is priority
- Only if tribunal included people with specialized knowledge e.g veterinarians, pet trainers, and not just "volunteers" or city personnel!!
- All dogs viewed same

- A thrall Owner background check with officer licences background check. 2. Dog to be removed and put through training with a trainer and foster care to evaluate plus rehabilitate , as Canadian law does that to violent offenders, dogs are the same, you kill a person you go to jail and not shot but law officers will shoot dogs with out any trial. 3) Once dog has been reviewed in fostercare plus training and owner back ground check clears then victim should be investigated also (did they tease/harrass dog prior etc.
- As long as the representatives include individuals on all sides of the spectrum
- Not biased due to breed of dog
- As long as there is a fair and judicial process that includes mediation and trauma therapy
- euthanizing a dog should be absolutely the last resort. I hope the tribunals would consider all sides and not automatically take the side of the humans. Decisions should favour management, traning and restrictions over euthanasia.
- Members are elected and change often
- All alternatives be explored before euthanasia is even considered.
- It had dog experts in it to assess what's best for the animal. If an animal is being mistreated and that is the cause of their aggression, an expert can identify that and if the animal can be saved
- I would have to know more information to make an informed decision about this.
- Ability to appeal decision
- I would agree if this tribunal was represented with non biased.
- These a wide verity of People
- The tribunals decisions are reviewed by a judge or other law professional afterwards to ensure that the tribunals are operating in a fair and just manner and that tribunal members are relieved from their positions if they are not fair or just.
- I only agree with the 3rd point. The owner must take obedience classes or not own a dog. A tribunal will just end up costing tax payers more money. People who wish to own a dog should be properly vetted and take classes with a dog in the shelter. Then if they want a dog after that, they are now certified to won one.
- The dog owner is the real problem here and they MUST be held accountable for any/all injuries as a result of their dog biting anyone. Any second offense means the dog is seized and that owner and household loses the privilege of ever owning another dog again.
- I would like the opportunity to be on the tribunal.
- The tribunal needs to have an animal beviorist that can provide some context as to WHY the attack happened from the aimal's perspective.
- As long as you can appeal the decision before your animal is euthanized
- Dog is not to be euthanized before the case is before a judge.
- As above, in agreement
- People on in this tribunal need to be well educated about all dogs.
- They are unbiased towards dog breeds with a reputation of being aggressive

- As long as there is a proper appeals process and breed specific legislation does not hold sway over proceedings.
- That people on the Tribunal are dog owners with no bias to size and breed of the dog
- Don't euthanize
- No euthanasia unless involving children or death.
- The tribunal should include experts in animal health and behaviours (veterinarians, animal health techs, etc...)
- Qualified dog people need to be on the tribunal
- Tribunal includes a balance of perspectives and approaches when it comes to animals in relation to people.
- Training for the owner and the dog is essential. As well as training, all vet bills incurred should be paid to a victim of ill-trained dogs BEFORE the offending dog is returned to the owner.
- A truly unbiased group that is educated in animal behaviour
- That Nuisance charges and bite and instances are investigated for provocation
- The composition of the panel needs to be balanced and include veterinarians, dog trainers, dog owners, doctors, psychologists
- the tribunal must hand out equally harsh sentences to the dog and owner and order the dog to be euthanized immediately. If a tribunal helps the victim then I'd support it. If it helps the vicious dog or irresponsible owner, I would not support it. The owner should receive a criminal record, a red sign on their yard that they have a vicious dog and are a non-responsible pet owner. They should be fined $3000.
- As long as the decision is NOT based on breed or "predisposition", but actual evidence.
- As long as the owner and victim were both able to fully be involved and were to be able to plead their cases in front of the tribunal.
- The tribunal needs to be objective, it isn't a licence to kill because of personal feelings towards a dog breed or "type" of person who owns the dog. Dogs aren't born bad, they're taught the behaviour.
- The owners should face penalties for their animal's behavior
- As long as dogs aren't euthanized based on breed and behavioral treatment is looked into before deciding.
- no euthanizing!!
- It would depend who the tribunal consisted of...
- Owner must clearly demonstrate that this is first time behaviour and they must report successful completion of city approved obedience training .
- There are time limits to be met to keep the matter moving thru this process or we're back where we started. If euthanization > fast. Again, timeline imposed.
- More than 60% of tribunal members are veterinarians and/or behavioural specialists
- Ultimately, I believe the behaviours of dogs are controlled and taught by the owners. I don't believe any dogs should be euthanized because they weren't properly trained nor treated with human decency. Dogs don't tend to bite (for example) unless being provoked or neglected or mistrusts their owners or abused in some manner. They're already traumatized. They bite as their last resort to control the situation as they access the situation in their limited dogs' minds. They're like toddlers/preschoolers, but go throw tantrums (or even bite and scratch) when they don't have the vocabulary or properly-taught ways of releasing their "big and scary" emotions, such as anger, frustrations, fear, being overwhelmed. I believe that if I want to include a dog into my family, it is 100% my responsibility to train, educate, and lovingly discipline my fur-animals. They are ultimately still animals, not humans. We just take responsibility in loving and caring for them properly, which includes discipline. A parent does not love his/her child if he/she lets the child do whatever the child wants. That will destroy the child. Same with a dog, no matter the breed.

- The tribunal should have knowledge of dog behaviour, and should force the dog owners to attend dog training courses and euthanizing the animal should be the last option.
- Kept their personal breed bias out of proceedings, eg-same procedures whether the dog is a Golden Retriever or pit bull.
- All dogs are treated fairly and the owners behaviours are reviewed
- Tribunal contained people from the Veterinary Industry
- One of the members of the tribunal must be from an animal rescue as they would have the required experience to assess each situation.
- All parties to the nuisance situation are required too attend canine communication / body language training to ensure the owners learn how to properly train & manage their Doug's, as well as to ensure the victims are not raising an alarm simply from a base of personal fear and not a true nuisance audition.
- That all measures are taken to try to support re-training, based on using independant canine behavioral experts vs just putting a dog down because it exhibits aggressive behavior. There should be steps to try to correct it and understand the animals ability to change. Sometimes unfit environments and owners cause the issues. An indepent review would allow a proper assment vs a death sentence to an animal that doesn't deserve that.
- make sure the people on the Tribunal have owned at least two dogs in there lifetime
- That the dog receives training and that the owner be investigated for being a responsible owner or not.
- Focus on behaviours of the irresponsible owner, more than on the dog.
- The members of said tribunal are not biased against specific dogs breeds and are competent to assess and make such a decision.
- It was made up of animal professionals including employees at the City of Calgary
- The tribunal members would need to be pet owners to understand the distinct nuances of pet ownership.
- dog behaviorists need to be a part of the panel
- The option of appealing the verdict.
- I feel like owners should have a chance to either speak on dogs behalf or submit written statements from vets/trainers to relay previous behaviors or character of said dog. I say this because there are cases in which there are unprecedented circumstances that causes a dog to bite that normally wouldn't. Having said that I think this is a great idea to shorten the time a dog stays in a cage, as some of these dogs have stayed there for months! There is a case to be made that its cruel leaving a dog in a kennel 24 hours a day , no sunlight, forced cage soiling, decline in mental well-being, very little social interaction, no touch.. ect.

- The committee must have a vet a dog behaviourist an animal trainer at minimum on the committee
No citizen at random who has no experience with animals
- The tribunal can be UNBIASED.
- Decisions are enforced
- Would need more information on this. Are representatives trained in animal behavior? How about human behavior? Human and animal psychologists for every case. If you're going to make the effort, do it right.
- Both sides of the story are actually heard and not based on simply stereotypes of breeds of dogs. The city discriminates enough against coloured people, you want to bring dogs in the mix?
- My condition is that the tribunal must have trainers or other people who are familiar with whichever breed is involved.
- A vet or animal behaviourist be present.
- The tribunal included an expert in dog behaviour.
- Owners and pet receive classes
- A tribunal would need ample representation from animal rescue experts and behaviourists i.e., Calgary Humane Society, AARCS and veterinary behaviourist.
- If the victim of the bite was in any way provoking the attack, the dog should NOT be considered a threat
- The tribunal has pro-dog voice - not staff from the city pound
- The members of the tribunal are knowledgeable and unbiased
- As long as the Calgary Humane Society is part of the Tribunal
- It was comprised of mixed group of people EDUCATED on these topics - no politics, fair selection (i.e. they don't get selected because they donated money or know somebody who knows somebody).
- The tribunal would have to consist of totally non bias members that have never been part of campaigns for or against BSL.
- The owner's ability/willingness to make improvement to the animals wellbeing should be considered
- All dogs are equal regardless of breed. Literally any dog can kill, it's not logical to target a specific type when they're all capable of causing harm. This article literally says pitbulls are NOT involved in more bite incidents than other dogs, so why target them specifically? Even if their bite is stronger, a St. Bernard can harm a human just as easily.
- I would want to see neighbours of said dog be interviewed to see if they feel that this dog is a constant threat. I would hate to see a dog euthanized due to an incident with only the victim testifying to the incident.
- Animal behavioural specialist is part of tribunal.
- Costs covered by the owner of the dog

- The non city person or persons should be qualified to assess a dogs behavior and understand what may have led to a bite or incident with the dog.
- had multiple representatives with an educated understanding of canine behaviour.
- The tribunal needs to have the power to determine if the dog, or the owner is at fault. If it's the dog then it should be seized, but if it is the owner perhaps the dog could be turned over to the humane society for readoption.
- Tribunal members must be made up of a variety of professionals (legal, councilor, animal behaviour, etc)
- If this is a second bite occurrence the dog should be euthanized.
- Depending on how you are choosing the non city representatives
- Whether there has been a previous problem. The circumstances of the event. If someone has entered a fenced yard without permission from the owner.
- The qualifications for members of the tribunal should be published and should include some legal training (not necessarily a lawyer. Possibly a course in administrative law and animal behaviour
- Tribunal members should have litigation and/or mediation experience. Individuals brought before the tribunal should have access to representation should they want same.
- Tribunal must have even representation from both dog owners and non-owners.
- It be provided as an option and that the members of the tribunal be significantly knowledgeable and educated in the psychology, behaviour and training of dogs, not casual or common citizens.
- As long as it proves to be a swifter course of action. Dogs respond to how they are treated and are more manageable when both dog and humans are trained. Training dog should be a requirement of keeping dog.
- Like in court I think person appearances by pet owners, victims and any witnesses should be part of the decision making.
- Includes an animal behaviour specialist
- The tribunal must have the authority to enforce and ensure decisions are obeyed
- Need more information as to who would be leading those tribunal, judge, city employee, etc.? What training would they receive if not a judge? Process would need to be fair to all parties. Decisions and rational are made public
- doesn't require hiring/increasing the size of the City administration.
- ensure no bias
- My condition is that there is representation from competent, experienced animal rescue groups (i.e., AARCS), not just Animal Services.
- It is not biased on the type of dog. A nasty bite from a toy poodle or a Jack Russell terrier show poor responsible ownership too.,
- No euthanasia
- Obedience training required for dogs and owner again and a trainer assessment on the dog, paid by owner.
- Tribunal must be comprised of those knowledgable and qualified. This should be defined in the bylaw.

- This is my answer.
- Yes
- As long as it follows all City and Provincial laws, and decisions are enforced.
- Diverse panel of members of tribunal. Kind of like a jury
- The decision to euthanize an animal is a final measure after other orders and measures to modify behavior have been exhausted
- If the tribunal is intended to make the system more efficient then I support it. However, if the intent is to somehow be nicer to biting/aggressive/vicious/untrained dogs and the owners that failed to control them, then I oppose them. Let's see some responsibility by dog owners for a change.
- It is unbiased and based on a case by case basis, not on breed.
- It is based on a per incident basis and not biased towards heavier punishments that are breed specific (e.g pitbulls)
- They have no bias towards dog breeds
- Is funded mostly by fines levied
- dog should NEVER be euthanized. We don't euthanize people for assault and battery
- No City member rather an animal organization such as SPCA plus people with a knowledge base re animals or experience interpreting legislation.
- As long as all sides were reviewed and the decisions wouldn't be solely based on the breed of dog, singling out pit bulls is discriminating.
- Nothing breed specific, must be available to access for any breed of animal.
- All parties need input on this process and an appeal process must be in place.
- This be completed within a short a timespan as possible e.g. within 14 calendar days
- Breed neutral, licensed, educated and trained experts on the tribunal.
- If there was no bias against certain breeds of dogs
- As long as they do not discriminate dogs based only how they look
- The tribunal members must be stakeholders in the community of both human citizens and pet citizens alike. More details would need to be provided on how these members would be selected. Please provide research that's been done on other communities that have this type of tribunal and where it has been set up and used successfully (meaning most parties understand and can accept the resulting decisions, which seem fair and reasonable).
- Fair and no discrimination
- I do not believe dogs should believe dogs should be euthanized no matter the "damage", they should be rehabilitated and rehomed as the owner is most likely the reason for the dogs behavior, the owner should be fully accountable for the dogs actions as they are have taken "ownership" of the dogs wellbeing and anyone/anything it comes in contact with.
- As long as a proper investigation is conducted. A dog that is being antagonized in some way may respond by biting. Extenuating circumstances need to be considered
- Tribunal board needs to INCLUDE with again a specific all around certified trainer/behaviourist (non-biased) or veterinary field.

- That the tribunal was an independent team and not Animal Services.
- The dog remains in the custody of the owner.
- As long as specific breeds aren't being targeted.
- As long as you can appeal the decision before your animal is euthanized
- As long as they not rushing without due diligence in the matter
- No assessing if the dog should be euthanized
- If a dog were ordered to be euthanized the owner would get to spend time with the dog in a safe environment first.
- Dog behavioural experts are involved. Every time.
- Responsible dog ownership
- There would be a balance of professionals who work with reactive or other types of dogs; there is an automatic right of appeal to QB and not just a judicial review process where the standard of review is difficult to deal with; that the ability of the dog to be rehabilitated or other restrictions placed on the dog are undertaken by professionals who deal with these types of dogs, not by bylaw officers.
- The conditions of tribunal would have to be presented before being able to make a sound decision
- Was comprised of trained animal behaviour experts/veterinarians. I room for politics here.
- All dogs regardless of breed are treated equally. It seems rather ironic that we condone racism within humanity however, you are intending to discriminate against a specific breed of dog.
- both dogs and both owners needs have to be considered. again this question is misleading and poorly worded.
- If the dog was able to stay with it's owner while the decisions were being made.
- Fair
- The conditions listed above
- members are unbiased and elected
- euthnization of a dog should only be considered in extreme cases. Educaation/restrictions should be attempted first.
- The tribunal members have not be involve in a similar case or a case involving animals. The ability to properly trains nd maintain the animal is included in all tribunal assessments.
- That no dog is judged by their looks. That there is actual evidence that the dog is a danger no matter the size.
- They keep there prejudices out of the process
- Each member tribunal owns a dog
- for the first offence.
- There is a animal behaviour specialist involved and the doctor(s) who treated the patient who was injured
- People are accountable for the decisions they implement.
- Decisions involving Euthanization should be taken to provincial court before carrying out euthanasia.
- Rehab/training before euthanasia is considered

- Be careful about really biased folks who join tribunals so they can punish dogs
- So long as the representatives are a non-partial cross section of animal behaviour experts.
- Well defined guidelines that will conclude to the verdict. Minimize grey areas for the tribunal to act by.
- They have an understanding and education to make such calls and that their decisions have nothing to do with specific breeds.
- The dogs are being treated fairly.
- 3rd party on rotation for a fair and only get info on case in front of them with no pre existing info on the case
- The animal stays with the owners and owners must immediately begin behavior training for reactivity through the Humane Society, or another accredited dog behaviorist.
- Made up of a diverse group of people
- All parties can agree on conditions
- Due diligence is followed to determine the cause(s) of the vicious behaviour and the relationship between the dog and the owner.
- It must be made up of members of the community
- A tribunal is not breed specific.
- As long as there are members of the tribunal that have a professional designation regarding animal care or behavior.
- as long as they remain thorough
- It is not BREED SPECIFIC LEGISLATION. Should it be applied to all breeds equally I'd support it.
- The representatives would need training to hold the role to make decisions which are in the best interest of the animal.
- it should not have authority to euthanize.
- The dog should not be euthanized, as dogs that are driven to bite are not properly trained by their owner. Responsibility should be placed on the owner, including fines and mandated training for the owner and animal.
- Dog remained in the home not a shelter
- The choosing of tribunal membership should ensure that individuals are not overly sympathetic to dog owners and dogs.
- Focus on owner responsibility rather than fault of the animal
- Tribunal to take place within 7-10 days of an incident
- Tribunal members would need to be selected in a thoughtful way to avoid biases, and there would have to be oversight on the tribunal and a mechanism for appeals of tribunal decisions.
- that the tribunal does not go in biased to any breed of dog. I appreciate a tribunal would decrease the amount of time a dog is kept in a shelter since that can increase the trauma to an already stressed out animal however I don't think I trust a Tribunal that goes in with an 'agenda'.
- non-City representatives should be animal professionals and fanciers with up-to-date educations and experience with dangerous/nuisance dogs.

- Have people who specialize in dogs or other animals behaviours on the tribunal and also have professional dog trainers also present when making the decisions as they are trained and more qualified than the general public or appointed leaders.
- That cases and the people involved were heard, evidence was given, trained behaviorists could assess the animals. The animals were protected from labels that the public might be al to quick to put on them.
- Who would be on this tribuneral panel? SMEs related to animal behaviour and responsible ownership?
- Both sides of the story need to be heard from all parties involved.
- Don't bully the breed. Small dogs, fluffy dogs, all dogs can attack.
- Dogs should be given a chance before euthanized. Not caged up but worked with. More likely than not it's the owner who is bad and not the dog.
- The assessment is done by a professional
- it includes all dogs that bite
- Ensured that previous relationships of domestic violence and abuse of animal are considered before sentencing or decisions AND history of owner's animal abuse be ruled against owner,not animal.
- Tribunal should include the dog owner
- trained people and clear guidelines
- Severe bites being thorough investigation of all involved and whether there was any instigating by the injured.
- It be the choice of the owner
- must have people who are not bigoted towards breeds based on appearance
- Tribunal must be made up of actual dog behavioural specialists not bureaucrats.
- dogs with multiple offenses were secured at the owners property. le does not leave the property except for leashed, muzzled walks. And if this is not complied with maybe harsher punishments like extra fines or the removal of the dog from the owners custody.
- As long as the dog remains with it's owner, while the case is processed. No need to further scare and potentially harm the dog by having them in an unknown environment.
- The victim supports this system
- All dogs apprehended for severe bites should be taken away from their owners permanently and the tribunal should have the power to determine if the dog can be rehabilitated.
- I would support city officials that were properly trained to handle and assess the specific animals they are dealing with. The unfortunate reality of most dog bites is that it's mostly human error when it comes to training or handling the animal and honestly I feel that if the people deciding the fate of the animals were actually professionals we wouldn't have to euthanize so many dogs and could potentially rehome them rather than unnecessarily killing them.
- The family of the owners testify as well to talk about whether they feel the owner has correctly trained the dog. It cannot just be he said she said if it is an isolated incident...
- Tribunal

- The tribunal members would be assessed and vetted to be non-prejudicial toward specific breeds or heavily leaning to draconian measures when dealing with cases. Members must be fair, creative and genuinely interested in animal welfare as well as community safety.
- The tribunal needs to consist of people knowledgeable in the science of animal behaviour. Education is the key to fair and appropriate decisions.
- Why can't put response Not sure. Probably okay.
- assess and euthanasia
- There is no cost to protest against finding, and every effort should be focused on owner responsibility not destroying dogs
- So long as every effort is made to minimize euthanizing the animal (such as first-time offenses, or for those who frequently adopt older dogs that would otherwise have been euthanized). Also, that information to assist in obedience training be made accessible to any offender.
- Not target specific breeds and determine if the dog is actually vicious by uninvolved party
- On individual basis
- All dogs who have bitten have to wear a muzzle in public spaces and may be removed from owner if the bite victim chooses
- Ensure animal is in safe home.
- If the dog is owned by an irresponsible owner then the dog should be removed from said owner and rehabilitated...if possible.
- Tribunal representatives should be well-informed on a range of solutions to evaluate for each case what is best for the community, dog and owner.
- the dog was not euthanized but instead put in behavioral training
- The tribunal has no relation (personal or professional) to the dog's family, by-law officers, impacted victims, etc. Just like a jury for fair process.
- Eutheanizea of the dog should never be an option, dogs need training and proper ownership which should be the main goal of a tribunal which I would only support if also included representatives from rescue shelters & adoption/foster centres as well as a queens bench representative. We want to make sure there is someone there to speak for the dogs not just the justice department!
- Victim finds outcome of tribunal sufficient and dog owner can be monitored to ensure they're following conditions laid out.
- That there's representation from dog trainers or rescue associations that are unbiased towards different breed of animals. And further, that the panel is unbiased towards animal breeds.
- An appeal would be accessible to anyone and there would never be a rush to euthanization if the review deemed necessary. Adequate time should also be offered to get professional and expert assistance by both parties to help guide the decision.
- Animals generally don't do well in a shelter. Therefore the owner should be required to pay a bail so the dog isn't under a lot of stress. Behaviour training should be mandatory because fining the owner DOES NOT correct a dog's behaviour.
- I don't believe in the euthanizing of animals, they should be properly cared for and watched. They are just dogs, the owners should be held more accountable.

- Support systems offered to both owner and animal before euthanization considered. Support the animal and owner's rehabilitation.
- I would only support this if Calgary chooses to NOT adopt a BSL targeting "pit bull" looking breeds.
- As long as the representatives were selected randomly and decisions were made fairly after reviewing the cases.
- If the tribunal included a trainer that could determine if the dog was a nuisance do to poor upbringing and if able to be rehabilitated or not with new owners
- If euthanasia is recommended, it should go to a higher level court.
- That all dogs are viewed and no biases are placed on "pittbulls".
- If they determine the dog should be euthanized, it will be housed until the appeal is determined and finalized.
- as long as it allowed for a formal/legal appeal process if desired.
- Individuals given authority within the tribunal required a minimum level of dog behaviour education.
- Animal rescue members.
- No breed specific segregation. Regardless if it is a pit bull or not, the same process and analysis should apply.
- Members are not previously biased against "bully breeds"
- If the dog is dangerous enough to be euthanized, the owner should be banned from getting another one for up to 5 yrs . The owner should also have to take a register course on proper dog ownership and training.
- The people on the tribunal have been educated in dog behavior and understand not one breed is more likely to be aggressive. It depends greatly on environmental factors
- I don't think euthanasia is ever necessary. Require obedience training for both pet and owner
- That people involved are actual dog professional capable of assessing the situation, dog and commitment of owner
- Owner gets to keep the dog and does not have to pay out of pocket for any proceedings.
- As long as tribunal is made up of some members that are experts in issues of dog bites and probability of repeat incidents
- tribunal would not be declaring a dog to be euthanized. rather their only other option is to mandate rehabilitation to occur while waiting for a court decision.
- The members of the tribunal are split 50/50 city/non city members and have no previous association with direct animal bylaw enforcement.
- As long as the tribunal is split with 50% with advocates for any dog declared vicious or in trouble ... It must be fair or the dogs will suffer again
- Fundamentally, I do not agree with "vicious" dog definitions or dogs' destruction, since bad owners are nearly always at core fault. Conditions: the reduced time is not unreasonably short, to allow for long-enough and truly expert "assessment." Owners should be allowed to call in other behavioural experts of their own choosing as well (BAD owners wouldn't even bother). "City & non-City representatives" is far too loose a term; true experts MUST be consulted, e.g James Tsai of Arf Arf Bark Bark Rescue Foundation. If owners don't agree to restrictions placed, dogs still shouldn't be destroyed, but given the chance to be rehabilitated &/or "downtrained" first, using ONLY true experts in same, then either returned to the owner or adopted out. Since even virtually all of Michael Vick's canine victims were successfully rehabilitated, that proves it CAN and SHOULD be done for most dogs!

- A tribunal should not be allowed to determine if any dog should be euthanized.
- If euthanization was off of that list, and instead determined that the dog would do rehabilitation through one of the shelters and then have to re-do obedience training. We don't put down people for biting. Why should we do that for any other part of our family?
- Does not discriminate against Pit Bull type dogs!
- A high level of transparency of how a decision was made and public availability of clear guidelines that outline how these decisions are made.
- They are unaware of the dog breed in order to provide a fair trail
- A specialized team of unbiased representatives that only handle cases of this nature
- Breed-specific legislation is archaic and not supported by data. I find the continued negative references to pit bulls very problematic coming from the City. It indicates a huge discrimination issue. You guys need to evolve.
- If it makes the process shorter and is fair
- As long as there's an appeal process
- Tribunal must consist of 50% dog owners and at least 2 should have professional background (training, veterinary etc)
- That representatives have knowledge and background in animal care and bylaws, such as veterinarians and animal control officers
- The tribunal must be impartial, experienced in dog behavior, and have no breed-specific biases. That is to say, it must be staffed by professionals with training.
- Non biased opinions on the dog and person
- As long as the dog isn't out down
- This applies to all dogs, not just dogs that look like "bully" breeds. Also the owner should be looked into more for the bite than the dog. There are only bad owners, never a bad dog.
- It did not euthanize a dog prior to court. This allows the owner to appeal the tribunal's decision at court.
- No euthanizing the dog
- If people are bias just because they like the breed or dont like it, or if there a big dog that 'could' do damage it should not be uthinised because of it.
- Put to more people who have dogs of different sorts
- Requires that the owner have to get training in how to properly take care of pets, especially dogs.
- Assessment of dog by at least one and preferably more than one certified behaviour specialist.
- Owner keeps dog at home.
- It has at least 7 members

- There was fair representation of people that have a high understanding of dog behavior not a bunch of pit bull haters.
- It is unbiased by the breed or appearance of the dog and owner.
- The tribunal was made up of vets and knowledgeable animal advocates, not city employees. The owners should be the ones to be held responsible. There are no dogs that can't be saved from bad owners.
- Representatives must include an expert that has experience with that animal (the animal's vet, it's trainer, caretaker at its shelter or breeder)
- Instead of euthanizing a vicious dog, put it through behavioral training with a professional.
- Must have qualified behavior specialists and vets to assess and the assessment must be done in the least stressful environment and take any added stresses of assessment into account.
- that the dogs are treated as kindly as if you owned them yourself
- Dog experts/ Vets are on tribunal
- No euthanization
- the victim was provided support to attend or to hire counsel (financial and psychological) and was given the opportunity to decline a tribunal if worried about intimidation or retribution from dog owner.
- The owner or owner's lawyer is also represented
- Extra considerations would need to be taken to ensure any "bully breeds" aren't being unjustly euthanized.
- The tribunal is completely impartial with no implicit bias towards pit bulls or other similar breeds
- the composition of tribunal has a majority of dog trainers and breeders on each tribunal panel.
- As long as the accuser has actual proof of said pet being a nuisance.
- If the representatives were non-biased and educated on both laws and domestic animals, specifically dogs.
- Owners are punished
- The dog was not euthanized based on breed but an interaction with a human
- Assessing a dog to be euthanized can only be done by more than one highly reputable dog trainer.
- There is no bias from the committee with regard to breed specific language
- that vicious dogs that have bitten people or seriously harmed other dogs are euthanized and the cost of the tribunal is at the dog owner's expense
- The dog stays alive no matter what
- Clear and impartial mandate
- As long as it is not used to rush a fair process
- Only for the sake of the victim, couldn't care less about the added 'inconvenience' or money for the dog or their owner
- Non bias toward breed; No breed discrimination.
- If someone is willing to adopt the dog in a set amount of time with training in mind, euthanasia should not be considered.
- It is able to listen to the owner and witnesses in person/video call etc, they have to see/meet the dog

- All tribunal members must be educated in dog behaviour and understand that breed punishment is not the solution
- Considering the owner as the only responsible of any incident, and avoiding punishment on the animal. The Owner must pay for animal rehabilitation and re introduction to social environment.
- Mixed races, mixed genders, mixed non animal owners and animal owners. No
- Don't euthenize people's dogs
- Only true dog EXPERTS, breed neutral TRAINERS/BEHAVIOUR specialists get to make the decisions and the dog welfare is truly maintained during the whole process
- as long as it includes professional opinions of a veterinarian on the team
- People with recorded cases of dog bites are banned from Having a dog
- Animal behaviorist, veterinarian, and psychologist are members.
- The animal has an aggression or bite history and it's not a one time offender in which case there's absolutely no reason for a dog to get put down.
- Have a vet also perform a temperament test to assess the dog's temperament.
- The dog is not euthanized unless it is a persistent offender
- The members of the tribunal are qualified ie Calgary Humane Society etc.
- As part of the tribunal committee a professional dog behaviorist is added. Many people do not understand dog behaviour and my concern is that there could be bias with tribunal members against our canine best friends.
- Not discriminate against different breeds of dogs
- Tribunal decisions would not prejudice in any way an appeal to Court of Queen's Bench. A decision to euthanize would also be out of scope of the tribunal.
- Euthanization should be absolute last resort, AFTER obedience training, assessment of trauma/abuse, and being available for adoption into a proper foster environment (approved for nuisance dogs)
- If there is a a fair chance for the dog such as 1. make sure the jury and judge have dog behaviour knowledge 2. are non biased to all breeds 3. Know the difference between a dogs aggression or the lack of owners knowledge on how to handle the dog or breed. 4 charge the owner more and make them take a animal training course rather than killing the dog 5. Euthanize the dog as very last resort!
- Decision makers must have expert knowledge in animal behaviour, and must remain impartial when it comes to breed
- The tribunal is composed of members who have no biase against breeds
- Everyone involved is educated on the matters at hand and there are guidelines to follow so biased opinions do not alter the situation.
- Absolutely no euthanization. Some human don't get more than probation for assault!
- No bias and transparent...fairness.
- Tribunal should include vets as well as dog trainers who can accurately judge the dogs temperament and owners handling.

- Any dog is immediately euthanized on the second bite, not taken to a shelter.
- A qualified impartial veterinarian, as well as a qualified dog handler/trainer are a part of this tribunal, and have equal/overriding vote on the matters.
- It is neutral and is run by knowledgeable dog people and not fear mongering people
- Steps are taken to ensure that those with an obvious bias are not allowed on the tribunal.
- As long as the people chosen for the tribunal have extensive experience with several breeds of dogs as part of their profession, e.g. dog trainers, dog daycare workers, veterinarians. People who have a fear of dogs should be disqualified.
- The owner needs to demonstrate training in management of dogs. Problem dogs are most often the result of problem owners.
- Fast turnaround!
- It does not single out one breed to be considered as a more severe nuisance than others.
- Don't euthanise the dogs. Instead, train them to have better behaviour.
- The tribunal is experienced in dog behaviours
- Don't euthanize the dogs
- Idk
- long as it reduced total costs rather than adding to them.
- Professional dog behaviorists must be part of the tribunal and the tribunal must take human actions into account e.i. Was a child allowed to torment and abuse the dog, etc.
- Decision to be put down not made by tribunal
- Right to appeal in the courts. No barriers to an appeal
- You need a second opinion on any decisions
- Those on the board are knowledgeable in people and pet behaviour.
- It's not the dog's fault they are aggressive. The dog shouldn't be euthanized. The dog needs training and re-homed.
- That the decision could be appealed before anything happens to your animal.
- The tribunal members must be DOG TRAINERS that are well versed in dog Aggression & possible reasons for
- If it was initiated by one dog and due to the size of the other dog an injury occurred both animal need to be looked at fairly.
- Veterinarian members.
- It needs to have dog experts on it
- Administrators making decisions are thoroughly trained and knowledgeable about the breed.
- Dog trainers/behaviourists are on the tribunal, an unbiased advocate for the dog is appointed, those on the tribunal are knowledgeable about dog behaviour, animal rights and do not support any form of BSL so that fair, impartial decisions can be made, owners take responsibility and fines, penalties, conditions are enforced.

- When it comes to the dog being euthanized, I think there should be complete proof of what the animal did. Not just one person's claim, and if the only evidence is bystanders' claims, there should be at least 3 bystanders that agree on what happened
- Following all rules and doing what is BEST for the animal.
- Very strict guidelines in front of a multidisciplinary committee.
- It occurs within a 2 business day time frame
- The tribunal has appropriate representation to reflect the community
- They have a biased opinion. Can't be against specific breeds when put on tribunal
- The dog and owner should take obedience classes together to assure the owner takes full responsibility for the dog/owner's actions.
- Dogs should not be euthanized
- If the goal of the tribunal was education and training for the owner and dog.
- Includes all breeds big or small
- There is no unfair bias against specific breeds
- The dog will not be put down
- There needs to be an appeals procedure in place. The tribunal cannot declare that a dog should be euthanized. Euthanasia should be outlawed in place of other solutions that focus on the root cause of the issue (there are no bad dogs, just bad owners)
- If the individuals chosen had experience and knowledge of breeds and looked at each case individually and fairly for all sides involved.
- Obedience training requirement before release, the option for the dog to be returned to the owner with restrictions while the case is going through court. Euthanasia only if absolutely necessary and only an option when an incident has caused either excessive harm to another person/animal or death to another animal directly related to the incident.
- It includes a recognized canine behaviourist.
- It would be comprised of dog behaviour experts and not just appointed city officials on a power trip.
- Panel members are a balanced representation of interests and values
- No tribunal members have a bias against specific dog breeds
- The courts' processes.
- The tribunal members have ample knowledge and experience (or training) regarding the issue being discussed.
- They are not biased towards BSL
- So long as it was provided equitably, to all breeds of dogs.
- Non-City reps must be either animal lovers or work in or is a volunteer with an animal rescue organization.
- That if the tribunal decision was appealed by the dog owner, the victim(s) are notified so they could take action to defend their case.
- More control about the owner: the ability to handle dogs!

- Animal care professionals (e.g certified trainers, veterinary professionals etc) are included in the tribunal
- Tribunal members must complete anti-bias/anti-racist training workshop.
- That whole story is taken into account for every case and the tribunal doesn't become a death sentence
- if euthanasia is selected, it should go before a judge to deliver final ruling
- The tribunal is fair to the animal and supports alternative ways of keeping the dog and owner together as a family and working through the behavior problem. This is more effective in the long run and better for the dogs
- Provides consistency and is able to provide best accommodation and compassion for the animal. Many dogs are simply not given a 2nd chance when it is usually the owner who has not done proper training or care.
- The tribunal comes from as many walks of life as possible. Pit bull lovers and all..
- There are people who have knowledge and understanding of dog behaviour (such as from the Calgary Humane Society).
- Did not have the authority to euthanize dogs, only refer to court proceedings if their recommendation is for euthanasia. Also, gave a panel of behaviour experts to assess if a dog could be rehomed after training instead.
- The people on the tribunal can be objective and are not bias to one breed/type of dog over the other. As a young adult I was bitten by a small dog and more recently had my American Eskimo dog was bitten by a small dog; because of that I might not be as objective as I need to be about small dogs.
- Unanimous decisions, if not unanimously approved then deferred to the court
- A professional property credentialed expert is the one who assessing the dog and providing suggested restrictions, outcomes, etc. not just tribunal members.
- There should never be an option to euthanize. It is inhumane
- Non biased opinion judge
- trained professionals representing the interests of the dog were represented on the tribunal
- How about dont add these ideas your making yourself look bad
- Members of the tribunal must have significant experience working with animals and include a balanced representation of citizen interests. Tribunal members should include veterinarians and experienced dog behaviourists.
- Aren't biased to dog specific breeds.
- Gives the dog owner a chance to explain. I have bad neighbors who tease/instigate my dogs through windows & over the fence!!!
- Includes representation from knowledgeable advocacy groups such as Justice for Bullies.
- Proper time to have Dialogue between both parties and a non-partisan third party
- If the dog and owner are cooperating
- A

- As the people were educated about all dogs and were not biased.
- Euthanization should be the decision of a court case.
- As long as the tribunal followed the recommendations of animal behaviourists and experts, using scientific studies to guide their recommendations. The requirement of proof should also be to the same standard as it is in court.
- Dog behavior specialist involved
- As long as all dogs involved in an incident or severe bite only are assessed on a case by case basis
- That the breed of animal involved in the incident does not hold more fault than the owner.
- Should there be an appeal and the dog owner is unsuccessful, the owner should reimburse the city for legal cost.
- As long as there is someone on the tribunal who works with a reputable and ethical animal organisation, such as the Calgary Humane Society.
- The dog isn't punished, it's retrained and perhaps rehomed. It's the owners fault for neglecting training or the animal itself.
- NO Euthanizing, i believe this to be a cruel method of control. we dont do it do humans we shouldnt do it to dogs.
- The tribunal consists of people from a variety of occupations, with no conflicts of interest, and have some experience in animal training or animal behaviour
- Any destroy orders must not be carried out until the owner has had a two week period to decide if they want to appeal. If they decide to appeal, the City should do nothing until an appeal decision is rendered.
- The tribunal needs to practice due diligence
- Determine, and review restrictions placed on a dog, which the owner would need to abide by to keep the animal
- Dog owners need to be more accountable. A fine should reflect their income and be proportional. Higher income should receive a higher fine. Any bites are unacceptable and preventable.
- are verified as being unbiased
- Cost of appeal covered by the dog owner regardless of final decision
- Owners cost
- If the dog is to be put down that it needs to be determined if its the dog, or the owner. Most times the problem is the owner, not the dog.
- A dog sympathizer could not be a part of this tribunal (members must be impartial).
- Previous behavior is considered
- We need people who are educated, informed and experienced in animal behaviour on tribunal.
- Provided the tribunal is made up of experienced dog people
- It has fair representation by members that own the same type of dog in question
- the tax payer is not footing the bill
- All breeds of dog should be treated with the same expectations and held to the same regulations.

- I believe that even dogs that have been involved in biting incidents need to be evaluated fairly. The circumstances of the bite and previous behaviour need to be taken into consideration, as well as the owner's responsibility in the matter. In many cases, rehabilitation and rehoming solves all issues. This needs to be considered before euthanasia.
- Tribunals can be appealed at provincial court and/or court of Queen's bench. The right to decide euthanization is not given to the tribunal. The animal is to be evaluated by a professional trainer for its ability to be rehabilitated and suggested recourse as well.
- Aggressive dogs be given the option of adoption by people capable of rehabilitation. Bad dogs are a result of bad owners. A dog shouldn't be killed because it's owners are negligent/abusive. People with a history of bad dogs be banned from owning any breed.
- A nuisance dog and their owner must complete behavioural training during this time to show a dedication to making their relationship healthy.
- That a animal behaviourist was involved to spot underlying issues, or non apparent issues.
- That the dog be evaluated by several independent dog behaviour specialists. That the owner be able to visit the dog during the tribunal process.
- In instances of euthinization verdicts, an appeal process should be in place.
- Tribunal members must be educated, certified in animal bylaws/violence issues, and chosen by the community.
- A specialist dog trainer and vet must be on the panel at all times to assess dog behavior/ circumstances for the bite, as well as overall dog health.
- The owner gets a fair hearing
- I do not believe they should have the power to make the decision to euthanize, however a review of interim orders and restrictions would be a good idea to cut back on processing time.
- The representatives should be experts in dog psychology and behaviour. The stereotype of 'pit bulls' being more dangerous is conditioning too many people. The majority of the misbehaving pet dogs are not pit bulls, in fact, it is dogs of any breed, mixed or not, whose owner misses dog handling education or fails to take the time to train/socialize their pet. Mandatory training or rehabilitation should be the first line of intervention/prevention to be considered. In fact, anyone should be required to enrol at least in a basic obedience training program when taking a puppy or adopting a dog.
- Opportunity to retrain and recover obedience in dogs is offered before such steps as euthanization are taken.
- It did not discriminate against the breed
- Pit bulls should not be the primary reason or the only reason for this.
- If it were comprised of experts. Like Cesar Milan.
- When it comes to euthanizing a dog, that should be left to actual courts, judges, and lawyers. A family's pet might be put to death, a tribunal is not enough.
- As long as the tribune can still enforce punishments / orders similar to a provincial court.
- The tribunal would be fair, no additional expense to the owner or tax payer. Training dogs does not guarantee success and insuring the dog is impossible to enforce. We have a vicious cocker poodle

(not pit bull) that has received 3 years of obedience schooling from a kook using treats for when the dog is barking. It's not the dog's fault but the owners. Hit them where it hurts and stop hiking our taxes.

- As long as they didn't let people off easier than what they would face in provincial court
- Unbiased people on the tribunal.
- The dog could stay with the owner but kept on closer watch during the trial so less traumatized for dog and owner
- The members of the tribunal contains various types of dog owners
- That all parties agree to it.
- That eye witnesses have the opportunity to provide feedback to the tribunal
- That Regular static's be published such as breeds, offences, and verdicts.
- they are not BSL. Not all box breeds are aggressive and not all box breeds will bite. Have a FAIR tribunal. Because right now this legislation sounds like its only going after box breeds.
- Additional obedience, heavy fine for owner instead of declaring all "bull headed" dogs aggressive.
- There was no bias towards what is considered a 'nuisance dog' including size and breed.
- They agree to solution and follow through. If they don't, they lose their dog and it's euthanized.
- As long as the tribunal had someone who specializes in animal (canine) behaviour. All members should be working within their scope- for example vets or animal owners etc.
- euthanasia is automatically under a second review- by a third party vet, or another city's bylaw office, or the court of queen's bench.
- Give them the power to order compensation to the victim so the victim doesn't have to sue
- Includes individuals such as veterinarian and other educated animal personnel ! (trainer / obedience instructors) who can make a unbiased decision !
- How do tribunal members get chosen?
- The dog stays with the owner with particular rules depending on the individual case.
- If they have valid evidence that the dog was not at wrong, then yes. Adults and kids have provoked dogs to do bad things and that is not okay.
- The tribunal adjudicators are trained for their jobs, are impartial and taken from a mix pool of general public and animal behaviour experts
- D
- Severe or permanent injury cases, or cases involving death should follow the current process.
- To punish the owner, not the dog.
- remove dogs that have injured others from Calgary
- no discrimination against breeds
- Not to be breed bias. Pit bulls are not as dangerous as many other breeds. Be educated on the breed. Don't make this breed specific.
- Aim to protect the animal, offer training unless there is disease or medical condition that is the cause of the animal acting aggressively.
- ???

- knowledgeable dog representatives about breeds and behaviours are present
- Allowed for formal charges to be brought against the offending owner.
- Tribunal followed the recommendation of professional dog trainers that have assessed the dog for rehabilitation possibilities.
- Use of a tribunal system must not increase the time required for decisions to be made.
- Proper training of dog should always be considered first, or re-homing/re training dog. Look to owner as the first problem.
- The owner is also “assessed” to deem if they are in fact a responsible/fit pet owner. If the owner is found not to be (Ex. They are found to have been abusive, or have malicious intentions etc), there should be harsh punishment, and a life time ban against that person ever owning an animal again. Rehabilitation (PROPER rehabilitation) for animals included in a situation should also be provided. Animals should not be punished for man kinds behaviour, those animals who have become “vicious” due to years of abuse/mistreatment should be extended the same courtesy as any victim is - we always seem to find it easier to punish the offending animal...euthanize the dog that bit someone, but allow that dog owner to continue owning dogs and when it happens again continue saying “oh it was just a bad dog and needs to be destroyed” or “oh it’s the bread that made them vicious - we should ban and destroy that entire breed”.
- Eliminate the time a dog is in a shelter and ensuring that other methods, such as training for the dog and owner be employed before resorting as a last measure to euthanization. It’s not the dogs’ fault and they should not pay for the owners negligence. And “pit bulls” are not vicious animals, stop segregating them.
- Dogs should not have to be euthanized in any instance. As a dog trainer and technician, there is no reason a dog cannot be relocated. Humans are responsible for dogs, if a dog is misbehaving, this is due to human training. Dogs should not have to die because of lack of education by their humans. Every dog of every breed is at risk for becoming a nuisance if the owner is not educated. Pitbulls only end up in these scenarios because these dogs are easier to purchase for low costs shelters and backyard breeders. Education is the way to go!
- Yes but cannot result in euthanizing
- Take into account whether it is a first incident,
- More information needed in order to say for sure.
- that the appeal would not include the verdict the tribunal came up with so not to influence the appeal
- No profiling based on breed
- Euthanasia is cruel
- If appealed, the dog owner must pay monthly in advance for the dog to be housed with Animal Services (or alternate provider) until the appeal has been withdrawn or fully completed. This cost is non refundable, even if the appeal is successful.
- Only if there are consequences for the owner, not just the dog. It has been noted in many cases that the problem is the owner
- No dog owners or members of the Calgary dog lobby could be on the tribunal. Not even one.
- One non-dog owner.

- As long as both parties agree to it.
- It is a "fair" group of people in the tribunal with a knowledge base of the issues involved
- evaluations were made on behaviour, not breed
- Membership in the tribunal must include certified animal behaviorists.
- Dog gets to see their owner when waiting for trial
- Transparent, with knowledgeable, ideally expert panel members.
- If a dog is involved in a severe bite it needs to be kept indoors and the owners need to do obedience training
- SPCA/AARCS/HUMANE SOCIETY members are present. It cannot be just the useless city council and mayor. Animal advocates MUST be involved
- All parties must agree to a tribunal process, otherwise, go to court.
- There was no discrimination against dogs based on their breed.
- Does not have BSL integrated into it.
- No breed specific legislation
- must have rescue people on the tribunal
- It is balanced and impartial to breeds
- All parties represented
- Did not in anyway include breed specific bylaws and leaned toward rehabilitating both the dog and educating the trainer. Bad dogs get bad for a reason.
- As long as their decisions are fair and binding.
- The tribunal panel must consist of a balanced mix of bylaw and enforcement personnel as well as animal behavior specialists such as dog trainers or veterinary medicine personnel.
- Appeal to courts must be enshrined, especially euthanize decisions. During appeal process, dogs may be placed in a shelter at owner's expense, or some other guaranteed means of restricting dog's roaming.
- Our taxes aren't increased.
- yes
- Tribunal were persons with extensive knowledge & experience with dogs (vets, dog walkers, trainers, groomers, employees/volunteers from animal shelters, foster home conductors, etc.) Min of 5+ years working with dogs
- It was made up of representatives including vets, trainers and qualified animal shelter workers.
- Review viscous dog declarations
- The stated goal should be rehabilitation where possible. Decisions are public record.
- No breed specific bans or conditions. Some dogs are bad because they have idiot owners. It's never the dogs fault... it's their owner.
- As long as breed is not taken into account . Lifetime ban on dog ownership if the owner has been involved in multiple dog bite incidents
- Places equal responsibility on the registered owner as given the dog. Both need detention, training and re-introduction with others.

- Those sitting on the tribunal are knowledgeable about dog behaviours/ training / psychology / and have the best interests of the dog at heart.
- An order of euthanasia should be signed and approved by a judge of the provincial court.
- no euthanization
- Owner needs to provide proof of compliance with any imposed conditions
- Consisting of people who are actual experts in dog behaviour, and are able to accurately assess the incident and its causes.
- It is impartial
- The owners are more of problem than the dogs They need to learn obedience training
- That there is a look into possible teasing / egging on the dog, or someone going on the dogs property without the owners permission . Ensuring that this is not a first time offence and doing a proper investigation into the situation before any decision could be made.
- In the event of a decision to euthanize, the owner can still appeal.
- There was irrefutable evidence to support euthanasia
- Owner(s) held liable for ALL Damages, Medical Bills, Etcetera....
- Tribunal participants have some qualification regarding dog behaviour, not just an interested citizen.
- Actual dog behaviour experts are involved
- Any tribunal must have legislative backing, otherwise problem owners would not be under any real obligation to comply. Reducing trauma to dogs and victims should be a priority.
- Must be dog owners
- I would like to understand how the representatives were picked/assigned to ensure qualifications were accurate to make these decisions
- Remove the ability of the tribunal to decide to kill a dog. it is a huge decision and cannot be taken lightly or too soon. Due process. Who is adequately authorized to decide what dog to kill? Based on what criteria? Size? Defending itself?
- If all cases are carefully examined and euthanasia is a very last resort
- There should be at least one representative on the tribunal with a strong understanding of dog behaviour.
- The tribunal should include animal experts such as a Veterinarians and animal trainer.
- Independent
- Ensure Tribunal members are not biased against any particular breeds.
- It depends on who makes up the tribunal... make it fair - people that understand dogs
- The tribunal members aren't all supporters of breed specific legislation/discriminatory against certain breeds
- The dog is assessed by an independent dog trainer for behaviour
- Non city members should include individuals who are trained to assess animal behaviour and should also include members of animal rescue. An option to re-home the dog rather than euthanize should be considered in all cases - by including such members on the tribunal an assessment could be done on the viability of rehoming.

- Equal part dog owners to non-dog owners.
- It should not be a forum for debate. Have real responses ready for specific actions. It should not take 2 weeks to decide if a dog who attacked a human should be put down unless it was clearly provoked into doing so. Most circumstances needing intervention or investigation by officers do not need an IQ of 150 to determine where the fault lies. This should not be a body used to spend tax dollars and waste time.
- Decisions by the tribunal could be appealed at the Court of Queen's Bench.
- There needs to be a non biased tribunal. Like race if people hate a certain type of dog and it is involved they will not see the facts or help to move to a fair decision instead will condemn the animal based on looks and looks alone.
- People overseeing the process, or involved in the process, must include responsible pets owners.
- Vets and dog behavioural specialists should be required to make up the majority of the tribunal due to their expertise with animals.
- There is a transparent and inexpensive appeal process available to all parties of an incident being heard by a "tribunal."
- Both parties are considered. Each party is informed. IT is understood that each party exhibit understanding of pet ownership and coerced behaviour is absolutely not tolerated
- ALL OPTIONS for the pet must be considered. There are organizations around North America that take dogs like this. There are special pet owners who have advanced handling knowledge. There are rural communities that have farms where they'd be nowhere near other dogs or people. There ARE rehabilitation options. Dogs almost always bite when they're terrified and threatened or trained terribly.
- Emphasis is placed on the behavior of the owner that lead to the dog becoming a 'nuisance' dog. Was the human training the dog to bite, was the human using the dog for dog fighting, did the human look for guidance when aggressive behaviors were noted. Again, the dog is not naturally aggressive, remove dog from owner, place the dog with someone to work with a trained dog trainer to retrain the dog.
- I do not believe a dog should be euthanized for bad behaviour. The onus should be on pet owner too rehabilitate.
- Absolutely NO euthanization unless a human has been killed. Leaving a dog at a shelter is cruelty. Invest in fostering to get professional care and training
- Tribunal includes at least one citizen resident who has extensive knowledge of dog behaviour.
- Dogs are not euthanized just because of a poor owner. Owners should have more responsibility and training expected of them rather than blame the animal
- Both victim and owner must have the opportunity and clear process for appealing decisions made at tribunal
- The dog be allowed to remain with the owner and all circumstances of the incident be fairly reviewed
- Included conditions for surrender to a willing rescue in lieu of euthanasia in all cases
- Using outside people on the tribunal...ie vets, obedience trainers.....NOT by law officers!

- Qualified members with knowledge of animals not as opposed to law/bylaw or enforcement backgrounds.
- Must not require an increase in property taxes, but rather budget cuts from other programs.
- Dog remains with owner until sentenced. If the incident happened because of the owner, such as letting the dog off leash, the owner must legally respond for that and not just receive a fine.
- Any dog confirmed to be responsible for a severe bite or injury should be euthanized, no exceptions.
- Keep this limited to trained professionals with the best expertise on animals, not law enforcement.
- The breed of the dog is not the only factor in making a decision.
- The laws are followed.
- I recommend a low threshold for euthanasia in the case of injury to a person.
- That they are not biased against dogs based solely on breed.
- people can not be biased against specific or bully breeds
- It shows no bias Or prejudice to any one breed
- There is an option for both parties to escalate to Court of Queen's Bench. I strongly feel owners should be held criminally responsible (assault) for at fault dog bites.
- Had a minimum of 2 veterinary professionals and 1 certified behaviorist as part of tribunal
- Reducing upset for the animal, it should be temporarily placed in an appropriate foster, vetted foster home.
- Members of the tribunal must include at least 2 veterinarians, people that specialize in training animals, and those that specialize in animal behaviour. This tribunal should NOT be laymen or members without relevant expertise in animal health and behaviour.
- A veterinarian was involved in all decision making
- The tribunal would need to be made up of experience animal people that could work with the owners. Not just enforcement personnel.
- Provided all parties agree to the tribunal process instead of court process
- I would need to know more about the composition of the tribunal
- N/A
- conditional upon the tribunal consisting of fair and impartial participants with thorough education and understanding of dog behaviour
- As above
- list above seems to be rigid. Above has no reason to be any faster/reduce wait time as outlined.
- Well researched and educated members of the field should be an integral part of the process. Vets, animal rights, trainers, dog behavior experts. It is important that we don't ask people who know very little about dogs to make decisions on their lives especially considering this questionnaire specifically targets pitbull breeds.
- Focus on owner responsibility and ensure owner gets trained until they pass certified tests
- It would need to include vets and SPCA or Humane Society representatives
- Tribunal should not have the ability to mandate euthanasia, only recommend. A court order (in addition to tribunal recommendations) should be required to euthanize

- That they ensure that the dog doesn't suffer from fear aggression
- Tribunal members be trained and knowledgeable in dog behaviour
- Dog "bites" and "attacks" are very relative - i.e. a chihuahua vs a pit bull attack are quite different in risk and damage. Therefore there should be allowance for owners of smaller dogs that are deemed less risk to be restricted to the owners property or muzzled while out for a walks
- Appropriate qualifications of those sitting on the tribunal
- cannot put down the dog
- the reason of the attack.. what trigger the attack.
- They would allow the option for the dog to be rehomed to a rural property in an approved home as opposed to euthanasia. Unless the attack resulted in death of either another let or a human
- The individuals involved in the tribunal had sufficient training on relevant topics (such as on dog behaviour), and were fair
- As long as it can run in tandem with criminal / civil court proceedings to eliminate delays.
- It was ensured that it would be unbiased towards specific breeds and it looked more at the owner than the dog
- If it is not a pitbull, let the owner have the dog until it goes to court
- Pre-screening for breed bias
- As long as it is held to the same standard as the current model.
- The tribunal can recommend a dog be euthanized, but the family/owner of the dog should have the opportunity to defend their animal. In some cases a dog bites/attacks because they were provoked. I would hate to see an otherwise loving animal put down because someone else taunted/teased/or otherwise agitated the dog and got bit.
- professional dog trainer with experience with more aggressive breeds be one person on the tribunal. That there is a variety of socioeconomic representation on the tribunal. All are dog owners
- I would support as long as the tribunal makes ever effort to keep the dog and owner together if that is in the best interest of the dog. thx.
- The dog should have the opportunity to be trained or rehabilitation given by a proper handler or trainer. If that does not work, then additional measures be taken. Many of the incidents are because of the owner; it shouldn't be a punishment to put a dog down after one incident or where they had no training prior.
- Euthanization, is never to be an option. Training should an option with a dog behaviorist.
- If all members are breed neutral, do not support BSL (Breed Specific Legislation) as that would make them biased, and they must all be reputable animal professionals that have years of hands on experience.
- Not all dog attacks happen because the dog is vicious. There are MANY provoked attacks. Before a dog is labeled dangerous or euthanized, it should be evaluated by a vet for illness and by a behaviorist to determine its temperament.
- Any councillors who support breed specific legislation are barred from taking part.
- Animal welfare experts who consider the best interest of the animal must be on the tribunal.

- A statutory right of appeal regarding matters of law, not reasonableness.
- If the tribunal is made up of educated persons regarding dog breeds, behaviour, behaviour remediation, etc and all efforts are exhausted to rehabilitate / re-home the animals
- The Tribunal must include a dog training professional and a veterinarian.
- Decisions should be based on the individual dog's training, behavioural history, and on the competency of the owner. Bias toward specific breeds should not be tolerated.
- Unbiased to dogs and breeds.
- Ensure there are NON BIASED members. Your survey here clearly shows BIAS
- it is fairly reviewed. no basing on type of dog, and how many times its happened and if the owner is responsibly training or neglecting.
- All representatives must be in the dog training/behaviour world. Both force free and other methods. Balanced and unbiased opinions matter strongly here! Dogs who bite can be victims as well, as they are reacting out of fear not aggression
- As long as all parties are heard. Bylaw officers are never at the scene at the time of the event and the dog owner MAY have mitigating circumstances (e.g. the victim may have provoked the situation somehow)
- There is an enforcement and monitoring component that should happen regardless. Someone still needs to go out there and ensure rules and decisions are being adhered to.
- The victim can receive payment for injuries.
- Do not let the tribunal become stacked with dog fanciers who become more lenient than current system
- They cannot order a dog euthanized without a full inquiry.
- A team of several, unbiased individuals, better than your team for this project. Based on my experience working with the Court of Queen's Bench, many animal tickets handed out which included a small breed dog or cat are treated less harshly because they are "small", while most cases of bites involving children are actually breeds such as labs and golden retrievers, but as soon as your so called "pitbull" breed is mentioned, first instinct is for the uneducated to automatically euthanize.
- Euthanizing is an absolute last resort after the dog has the opportunity to go to obedience classes or follow other rules such as having a muzzle in public.
- All "authorities" parties need to be experts in their field, with some sort of educational background on dog behaviour. Not just on the job training!
- Included people with a professional background in training/caring for animals - as they would have the most accurate opinion in the assessment of the animal. Also, people who are unbiased regarding breed of dogs.
- The tribunal needs to operate objectively based on well-defined bylaws. A dispute and or appeals process must be available to dissuade bias and provide remedy when it is felt an unjust ruling has been made.
- Proper representation from both sides. Animal lover and neutral.
- Unbiased and knowledgeable tribunal members including veterinarians.

- Don't be biased against specific dog breeds
- Was a non biased system toward specific breeds of dogs, and treated every dog breed the same.
- It contains people who own and understand large breed dogs.
- If dog has a repeat offense they are taken from the owner
- As long as it was a court decision to euthinise a dog.
- It must take place promptly . Dog bites should NOT be tolerated at all .
- All dogs were treated equally by a team of court staff who actually know something about dogs and dog behaviour.
- I would only support it if it pertains to ALL breeds and does not single out one breed.
- the members of the tribunal included animal behaviour experts not just city officials and thay the members of the tribunal are evaluated by the community annually.
- This would on a case basis. Did a dog that caused damage threatened, defending itself? It would a case by case basis.
- As long the representatives know what they are talking about
- As those on this tribunal were educated in dog behaviour. And did not support BSL.
- A trained dog behaviouralist is present and provides guidance no matter what the breed is.
- A program for rehabilitation for the dog, instead of a fine, owner must pay for rehab. Euthanization must be the last choice! They can live under certain restrictions like the muzzle. They can always be relocated to a forever home if the one it is in is not suitable
- The tribunal needs to be composed of ANIMAL EXPERTS such as veterinarians and dog behaviorist not random people who know nothing about dogs, dog behaviour, etc.
- Yes
- Somebody with veterinary and/or training experience needs to be involved in this tribunal.
- Euthanization as a last resort only after full investigation proves dog is a risk to injure Again
- As long as both parties - esp the victim agrees
- That subsequent random visits are made to the owners home. There are no bad dogs just bad owners.
- Tribunal decisions are regularly reviewed for consistency and whether they have made a difference to the frequency and effects of complaints.
- As long as the the owners ability to control their dog is strongly looked at.
- they consist of intelligent people who can make real decisions on the animals.
- As long as it did everything possible to rehabilitate the dog instead of putting it down
- Not sure how tribunals work but would need to ensure those on the tribunal are chosen in a fair manner.
- Depending on the people determining the decision, that would include a licensed veterinarian and certified k9 trainer.
- Not confirm the euthanasia order
- Euthanasia is considered after other remedial efforts have been taken ie. dog training, muzzle and leashed on walks.

- quick, efficient, no years on doggie death row while careless owners appeal
- It was not discriminative against specific breeds, genocide is not okay in the animal kingdom either.
- A dog bites, period, it is seized and euthanized. Just like we do with bears, cougars, coyotes, or any other vicious animal.
- There needs to be a better definition of a "nuisance" dog. Pit bulls cannot all be lumped into the same category. For example, a 40lb pit does not present the same potential "nuisance" as a 120lb Rottweiler.
 - 120lb Rottweiler
- As interim period pending court case.
- Appeal process provided before action against the dog
- Does not discriminate against breed. Pit bulls are not the problem.
- all breeds are treated the same and not just focused on a specific breed.
- Standards and training are clearly defined and adhered to
- Yes
- As long as it's a major incident that includes death, vicious attack to people, kid's or other animal or including death.
- Using a true educated and qualified dog behaviourist.
- Due consideration be given to the life of the dog. Perhaps with a standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt if euthanasia is being considered.
- As long as there are NOT breed specific laws in place. The dog's master is his owner.
- Ability of person suffering personal or other injury (e.g. injury to animal bitten by dog) to pursue litigation
- The dog went threw a test and the results weren't effected by the breed of dog
- Set a time limit for evaluations and appeals
- No bsl. Its racist and wrong. Any who do ar the problem not the solution.
- it must expedite the process and not cost too much to set up
- Dogs which cause severe bites should be euthanized.
- They would be the first line of defence to sort which cases need to proceed to a higher level of consequence. The tribunal decisions should not involve euthanization orders. Only trained professionals should weigh in on that decision
- Euthanasia is taken at last resort
- When restrictions or seizure to a rescue takes priority over euthansia.
- should have a set of criteria out line to follow.
- tribunal includes some pet owners. Owner of dog defendant has input to tribunal's review. If there is advice from vet or doctor it s/be considered.
- Ok
- It involves both victim and owner.
- That the tribunal members were dog poo wner as and had knowledge of dogs with regarded to most breeds.

- Owners should be able to speak their truth.
- The dog remains safe at home
- The representatives must not have any prejudices towards specific breeds, or have supported BSL in the past.
- They should review all interim orders, declarations, and restrictions, but should not be the ones to pass judgement on their behaviour. A professional, such as a veterinarian representative, should be the one to pass judgement. Lastly, the owners should be involved in all discussions regarding the dog's punishments and wellbeing.
- Destroy the animal.
- must include an recognized animal behaviorist as a representative. The animal must be fully evaluated for temperament etc. to get a better understanding of whether an incident was a 'one off' due to specific circumstances or whether there are clear signs that the animal poses a potential future threat to GenPop.
- As long as the owner is involved
- If they assess that a dog should be euthanized, the case should still go up to the court.
- They have the authority to put aggressive dogs down.
- As long as the tribunal is not staffed by biased people, meaning tribunal members should not all be dog lovers.
- Follow up with severe punishment for the owner, whatever that is - a hefty fine, possibly jail time, but no slap on the wrist.
- Breed specific bylaws are not in place and local rescue organizations are involved (outside of the SPCA).
- I would be in agreement with this if certain things are taken into consideration. A different residence for the dog could be an option meaning the dog could be allowed to live on a farm property away from the public instead of being put down. If not possible then allow the owner to be there when the dog has to be put down
- The tribunal must thoroughly consider every ethical option for the future of the dog (training to improve behaviour, giving the dog to another more equipped owner who can actually care for it etc) before euthanasia is considered.
- All costs and fees if maintaining the tribunal must be paid only by owners of problematic breeds and owners at fault
- If it was the 2 or more offence.
- The tribunal needs to consist of at least some designated animal experts (veterinarian, animal/dog trainer, etc. - volunteer basis maybe?). Otherwise, the non-City representatives won't be taken as seriously by the animal owner and possibly victim, which may increase appeals.
- Review mental health of owner. If found erratic and abusive take the dog away.
- Annual review to examine internal biases against those dogs who have a negative public persona (e.g. pit bulls, Am. staffs, etc.) to ensure fair enforcement.
- Those making the decisions are not biased (afraid of pitbulls, mastiffs, etc), have knowledge of training and behavior exhibited by various breeds and consider the owner of a dangerous dog a large part of the issue. If the dog is euthanized all costs should be placed on the owner with a ban on owning such a breed ever again

- I would support
- As long the date dog owner is able to provide a statement and there are mechanism to help individuals through the process.
- How are the members of the tribunal selected in a way to ensure impartiality, and not stacked with say pitbull enthusiasts who white wash any offence one commits.
- It would help
- Diverse group, including trainers, rescue agencies, behaviourists
- Restrictions that owner needs to abide by the keep the animal
- They can't determine if a dog can be euthanized. Several factors and opionons should be considered for that
- A dog owner of one of the problem breeds on tribunal
- Had members from the veterinary industry
- Dog training experts part of tribunal.
- consideration should be given if a dog is antagonized or provoked.
- Regular rotation of tribunal members, does not become another venue for delaying action, does not deny the attacked party the right to proceed in a civil action
- Provide education to tribunal to ensure there is a lessened bias when making decisions.
- Monetary costs to be paid by the owners of the dogs. It should not be up to the taxpayers to fund a tribunal for these dog owners.
- Tribunal members must all demonstrate familiarity and experience with the bylaws pertaining to animals
- Dog should be retrained rather than euthanised, in most cases it is the owner at fault not the dog
- Nn
- The dog owner should also be held responsible
- Most owners are aware of their dog's personality and risk factors. They are responsible for ensuring appropriate restraints and avoiding problems. Penalties as in fines and repercussions should be clearly stated and followed.
- I don't think its necessary, if its going to be a big cost to tax payers.
- That the dog is NOT automatically destined to be euthanized without trying something first
- Appropriate training and education for tribunal representatives is provided and kept current.
- Unspecific breed interpretation no terrorizing of pitbulls because they look like they're mean
- Tribunal members should be vetted to ensure they are impartial. Members should also regularity be replaced somewhat like jury duty.
- Victim impact statements are heard and considered
- Members of the tribunal should change frequently; those selected should be reviewed regularly to ensure they remain unbiased (somewhat like jury duty)

- The tribunal has enough power to be able to support the bite victim and penalize the dog/dog owner. The dog has just been apprehended for a severe bite!
- If there has been more than one incident injuring person or another animal
- Harsher penalties should be handed out to owners whose dogs have injured other animals and people.
- The welfare of the human victim is paramount
- Public safety is utmost, a tribunal may be too inclined to protect a dog and its owner rather than the public at large
- All decisions were reviewable at a court
- They are actually willing to euthanize a dog
- Must have a majority of certified animal trainers on the tribunal board..
- if nuisance dog owner is repeat offender then court and no longer allowed to own any animal
- Is as harsh as the court
- Those on the tribunal are educated on breeds and do not discriminate against certain breeds.
- Nuisance dog and their owners have ONE chance. If a problem occurs again, dog is automatically put down and owner charged.
- p a tribunal as long as all dogs are considered equal
- The owner of the problem dog remains on scene until authorities arrive.
- The owner may choose a tribunal or court.
- Professional in the animal institute must be on the tribunal. Vets, animal behaviourist
- automatic appeal if dog deemed aggressive and should be euthanized
- Fair and just evaluation and result, not dependent on breed, but behaviour.
- Any penalties would have to be harsh and binding including jail time for the owner of the nuisance dog
- If there were the option to rehabilitation or other options before euthanizing.
- Yes
- Euthanization shouldn't be an option unless all other options of rehabilitation have been explored and were unsuccessful..
- There is an attempt to recondition the dog and the owner before the euthanasia is preformed
- Tribunal must be overseen by experts in dog ownership and training to ensure that all possible options are used before euthanasia
- That euthanasia wasn't the only option given
- Involved at least one individual qualified to conduct behaviour assessments (such as at cochrane humane society)
- It indeed was a shorter wait period and the representatives had an understanding of dogs/dog behaviour and their priority was to return the dog to its home quickly with the necessary supports to prevent another occurrence.
- A licensed veterinarian & dog trainer where part of the tribunal.

- The tribunal must have at least two independent reputable, certified dog trainers / dog behavioral specialists that can assess the incident properly. These decisions should not be left in the hands of people without the proper knowledge.
- No prejudice towards a certain breed
- Certified dog behaviour expert must be one of the tribunal members and an assessment performed on dog by a certified behaviour expert in more serious cases when a dog is in consideration for being euthanized.
- Required rehabilitation or obedience training for dogs with single/minor offences, to increase the chances that they will be able to remain with owner or be adopted by another responsible owner.
- There must be a reasonable representation of dog owners and non dog owners on the panel
- indifferent
- Vetting the individuals who are on the tribunal would be important so that bias isn't present in decisions.
- Rehoming was prioritized over euthanizing.
- Membership in the tribunal should be restricted to persons with legal and community protection/civil rights expertise and exclude persons who have a vested interest in promoting animals (e.g., members of SPCA, breeder groups, dog advocate groups, shelter operators or supporters, PETA, etc.
- Not specified by Pitbull
- that the dog is evaluated on the basis of its behaviour and not its breed. That rehabilitation be considered.
- Consists of people knowledgeable in the area of animal behavior
- There should be more than one adjudicator on each case, and no prejudice against any certain breed.
- Honesty
- Depending on the people who were making the decision. They would have to be educated in the animal industry ie vet, dog trainers..
- Don't make it breed specific and engage veterinarians in the evaluation of dogs
- That the dog is immediately put to death with no appeal
- The dog can remain in the care of the owner.
- Too much power is put here in a court that won't necessarily take it as seriously (even some human life isn't in court). Tribunal is fine but should not have a say on euthanization. It must be an unbiased risk assessment without a fate suggestion included.
- Quick turnaround
- Must remain unbiased as in the person is not afraid of pitbull or other terrier dogs when deciding.
- They didn't discriminate based on breed.
- Comprised of dog owners knowledgeable about a variety of breeds
- no biases
- What's the difference between options a and c?

- there needs to be a way to appeal the decision for/against
- Unbiased and knowledgeable members of the panel are a must, people who work with animals not politicians or bored middle class house wives
- a fair and unbiased selection of representatives
- Decisions are not based on a pet's physical appearance.
- There would need to be animal behaviorists on the panel. City employees don't have the expertise
- Those involved in deciding the dog's fate be fully educated in dog behaviour and training, and that no BSL bias is involved in decision making.
- Veterinarians and professional dog trainers only
- I support
- *as long as there is no breed specific legislation. Otherwise I do not support a tribunal.
- As long as appeal is available as specified above.
- Before a dog is euthanized, there should be mandatory behavioural training in order to correct the dog's problem behaviours. Most dogs are able to change their behaviour when given the proper care and training. I also believe there should be an investigation into the current or past owners of vicious dogs if applicable, to see if they were given the proper care. Dogs do not become vicious on their own, they are always reacting to a negative environment in which they have been placed.
- Tribunal would include several members (no single person making the decision).
- N/a
- Someone who has a knowledge of animals, such as a shelter/vet clinic volunteer. Also at least one tribunal member should have a satisfactory history of animal ownership and currently own a licensed animal.
- There is factual evidence of the dog's behaviour and there are professionals that understand the animals there to assist in the decision making
- more information about who the City and non-City representatives are - are these people accredited and/or experienced experts?
- I am concerned that quick decisions may be made and dogs may be taken away or euthanized when they should not. I would want to ensure that correct decisions are made in the best interest of everyone.
- If the city is referring to the dog as a particular breed then it must follow through with proving the breed via CKC/AKC registration or DNA prior to labeling in order to remain accurate. A lot of amazing well bred purebred registered dogs are being lumped in with dogs of mixed heritage.
- House arrest and muzzled on walks
- They looked at every viable option before deciding a dog needed to be euthanized
- The representatives be HIGHLY trained in the area to be able to make these kinds of decisions
- Proper investigation needs to occur, lots of things need to be considered while putting a dog's life on the line. Ownerships, past care etc. Keeping a dog locked up after a traumatic incident or a trigger isn't going to display their proper characteristics. They are an animal with instinct, it can take up to 48 hours for them to process and cycle through emotion and fully calm down. They should be kept with their owner during the time of review.

- the dog goes into foster care or special care for its trauma or behavior disorder.
- The tribunal had final say and couldn't be challenged.
- That the members were not prejudiced towards any specific breed or animal.
- Don't hold dogs in a shelter. They just get house bound
- Certified dog behaviorist and a certified force free trainer is part of the tribunal to ensure there is a good understanding of dog behavior
- Vicious dog owners should be banned from having any dogs in future.
- The tribunal members would need to be carefully select or elected.. tribunal details would be advantageous to public knowledge prior to formation.
- it was objective and not biased (e.g breed bias not allowed)
- I believe dog training experts should be involved Pit bulls are not the problem but bad owners that do not properly train their dogs are. One must be an expert On this dynamic to assess a dog and its owner
- Determine the right measure depending on the scenerio
- No euthanasia. Dog should be removed from home and go to a behaviour specialist until ready to rehome to an owner than can handle it.
- They are trained in science based animal behaviour and not pop culture expert knowledge of dogs.
- It included members who do not support breed specific legislation, but rather responsible pet ownership policies.
- Having the power to ban the owner from owning a dog in the city again with the ability to forward that decision to be upheld provincially as well
- A significant portion of tribunal members had the training necessary to meaningfully assess the dog's behaviour relative to the situation and determine how likely another, similar incident will be.
- I would support the tribunal if the dog is not euthanized
- As long as someone who is trained in dog behavior is on the review panel and they are able to assess the dog, it's living conditions and it's handler interactions/training habits and methods before determining if it is something to do with the dog (health/trauma/reactive) or if it's the person's treatment of the dog and the dog is able to be rehabilitated in a new setting
- How do you insure the members are always fair and reasonable?
- If a vicious dog is released back to the owner with restrictions, there needs to be significant oversight to ensure that the owner is following the restrictions and that the dog is not endangering the public.
- There was still the avenue open to move a case through the courts if it was deemed severe enough, for example, if a dog was purposefully used as a weapon against another person or dog.
- if the victim of a dog bite was proven to have tresspassed, harassed, or in anyway agitated the dog the victim will be punished and the dog will not be harmed will have no record.
- Tribunal run by persons with legal background
- That the dog be helped and not Euthanized. It's the owner not the dogs fault.

- There is no biased individuals on the tribunal. They must be impartial individuals who have not campaigned against a pit bulls or other nuisance breeds. Additionally, the type of animal/size/age/weight must all go to tribunal. For example, if an chihuahua had bitten someone I would expect the same steps. They are just as vicious as some other dogs.
- The tribunal does not have the power to authorize a euthanasia of any animal
- Cannot be prejudicial towards a dog breed.
- The tribunal includes experts in the field of dog behaviour such as a board certified veterinarian behaviouralist. This cannot be a decision made by a city staff member uneducated in the field of dog behaviour.
- Both dog owners and both dogs were assessed in the event there is a serious dog fight OR dog bite to a person(s) or a dog(s).
- As the animal (if able to) is returned back to the owner until a decision is made and not in a shelter.
- Fairness.
- the dog remain with the owner but not allowed to leave the property.
- Those on the tribunal be qualified and knowledgeable.
- As long as the tribunal members underwent education on the myths regarding "put bull" type dogs and their bite strength, the actual effectiveness of BSL, and animal behaviour experts were consulted for every case.
- The tribunal would need to have multiple animal behavior specialists involved in each case. These specialists would need to come from diverse training backgrounds, i.e., the city should involve those from both balanced and force free approaches.
- At least 60% of the tribunal are experienced dog owners
- as long as specific breeds are not targeted
- Any dog that causes severe damage should absolutely be euthanized immediately!!!
- The tribunal is representative in terms of diverse genders, education, pet ownership, and culture.
- If it speeds up the process and potentially gets the dog back to the owner quicker it's a good thing.
- Cases could appealed before the animal is euthanized
- That the dog still remains in the shelter while tribunal processes the case. If the tribunal is faster, then the dog is not in the shelter for as long. Or, have the dog start at the shelter, then once terms of release are agreed upon, the dog can then be placed back with the owners. I feel the dog being taken away for at least a short period of time send a message to the owner about the severity of the situation. The other option is to charge the owner for their dogs stay in the shelter.
- If they are dog owners and dog trainers, it's not the dogs fault 90% 9f the time the owner is to blame, ie lack of training and corrections and affection.
- if a dog is not possible to be rehabilitated. Euthanasia should be an absolute last resort because a pet life should not be considered less than a human life.
- Yes
- Yes
- People on the tribunal have experience to deal with these situations.

- Review previous incidents, assess the dog and place restrictions on the dog and owner
- It is upsetting to me that a dog is blamed for behaviour when quite frankly I feel it is due to irresponsible owner behaviour. The owner in this case should have to attend mandatory dog behaviour education and perhaps be banned from owning dogs until they do so.
- No BSL or racism against bully breeds. Attempt at all costs to reach non-euthanasia solutions
- As long as the dog owner pays all costs for the appeal at the Court of Queen's Bench.
- Dogs are not euthanized for something that is their owner's fault. There should be a focus on training and rehabilitation, not on euthanizing dogs. If the owner isn't capable of dealing with training the dog then the dog should be rehomed.
- It happens Quickly
- A dog behaviorist outside of city employment and humane society is on the board
- Owner pays the costs of the tribunal.
- Representation from the Calgary Humane Society must be on the tribunal
- The tribunal would have to be a good representation of the population including people who own a variety of dogs and those who do not own dogs. I also believe the decision should be unanimous and not a "vote".
- Pitbulls are not viewed ANY different than other breeds. German Shepard's are equally as strong and yet are not penalized.
- The tribunal MUST be made up ONLY of professional dog trainers and veterinarians who understand why the dog is in this category of aggressive, and they must be allowed to ascertain the home environment of the dog. Euthanizing a dog should only be a last result wherein the professional determine that the animal cannot be retrained.
- As long as it isn't breed based.
- A dog behaviourist or expert is able to assess the animal and be part of the tribunal. Full investigation all animals/people involved and actions leading up to the incident. People need to also show respect towards the animal and pay attention to said animals body language and overall situation.
- If bylaw officers become efficient and responsible in actually reducing the inherent danger of pitbulls
- The tribunal cannot make the final decision for euthanizing the dog.
- It should also reduce overall cost to the court system
- Look at the underlying reasons for the vicious behavior and consider finding a better home or situation for the dog - ie: Rural location, or with adults if it isn't good with kids, etc.
- It contains experts in dogs, especially vicious ones, so its decisions are unbiased, extremely informed, and reasonable.
- the way it was raised ,the living conditions of said dog
- Further details on the election of the tribunal system to fairly and equally represent the city, owners, and dogs. And incidents should put focus on dog owner more than the pet to put in place corrective and preventative behavior going forward.
- They do not make their decision based on breed but based on the dogs condition and behaviour.

- Tribunal system cases should NOT be allowed to appeal to another authority (Court of Queen's Bench) as this only prolongs the process.
- The process is started within 1 week of the incident.
- Dogs are kept in their homes with the condition they are not let loose.
- The restrictions would still be enforceable on the owner even if it was outside the court system
- An animal learns what it is trained, people who are unable to care for a dog should be fined heavily and excluded from future pet ownership. Explore if the dog could be retrained or placed in another environment.
- The dogs are not given another chance to bite
- that the owner pay severe and appropriate penalties to a victim when there is an attack.
- restrictions and harsh fines for bad owners. pit bulls thrive with good owners. the bad ones need to be punished, rather than the dogs
- As long as they use witnesses at the incident and the owner can have family members that know the dog more personally
- Appropriate qualification for those sitting on the tribunal
- Dog receives training to try and curb aggressive behaviour
- A non biased decision not based on breed but the death of severity
- how would people be chosen for the tribunal - at least one needs to be a non-pet owner
- The tribunal seats be filled by NON-BIASED, educated individuals (i.e, veterinarians) who do NOT see certain breeds as more harmful than another.
- It still can involve criminal charges of the owner for not abiding by the restrictions placed on the dog. Bad owners should be charged in the justice system not city bylaws.
- Non-bias breed clause. We should treat all animals kindly. If the animal is an aggression repeater, the animal should do obedience training and then a muzzle in public
- No euthanasia. Retraining and forfeiture by the owner.
- Panel members must have a thorough understanding of dogs. They should be dog owners themselves and they should be well versed in dog behaviour.
- Individuals have the right to appeal in a provincial court of law
- How are the members of a Tribunal selected?
- It does not become an equally slow process
- be fair to all breeds
- Owner must take approved course on dog behaviour, handling and training
- In the case of a death or more than one bite reported. Bite incidents can be recorded by bylaw and if there are more than one incident of bites then there should be a course of action taken against the owner.
- As long as the tribunal was made up of qualified professionals (veterinary professionals, certified behaviourists)
- The tribunal representatives would need to be made up of a reasonable selection of the community. For example, the tribunal could not be made up of a group of people who are active against pitbulls, or bully types of dogs. Judging by the wording of this survey, it sounds like many people who are involved are already firmly against "pitbull" type dogs. "

- Fair non biased opinion
- Veterinarians and/or animal hospital workers with no bias toward any specific breed be on the panel. Actual experience across various breeds versus propaganda and fear mongering.
- As long as the dog was allowed to stay with it's family during the process.
- As long as all non-kill options are carefully explored.
- All members of the tribunal must be existing or recent dog owners
- People on the tribunal must also own dogs. This will avoid those that are anti dog and would not look at the situation as all dogs are bad.
- The representatives were actual animal/dog owners themselves.
- Be careful who is chosen for tribunal. Must be unbiased
- Dog should never be euthanized. It is never the dogs fault. It is always the Owners fault. The dog should be given to shelter / rescue to be rehomed to a family that will take the appropriate steps to train the dog. Under no circumstances should the dog be euthanized. It is not the dogs fault.
- At least one of the members must be a practicing law practitioner
- Fairness for the animal
- Depending on the bias directed towards specific breeds. All dogs big or small have the capacity to attack and cause damage.
- A clearly defined mandate, open and transparent. Defined cost upfront, with the loser paying. This would limit the number of marginal cases brought by the city and limit abuse of the asymmetrical financial and power advantage held by the city.
- No "second" chances for dogs; immediate euthanization...this would save money all around in the long run. People who keep menacing pets, are only on a ego trip.
- The owner needs to abide by restrictions and be required to pass training class with their dog.
- i would support this as long as it does not involve bias against a particular dog breed. review of incident details and follow up actions should only be based on facts, not assumptions of dog breed characteristics.
- costs must be controlled
- only if it will be done faster. If it can't be done faster then there is no point bringing in another Business Unit.
- An animal behaviour specialist is part of it and they are have NO association with the city of Calgary
- No Breed Specific Legislation
- All incidents should be treated equally, regardless of the breed involved.
- Representatives MUST also include a professional in the canine field (dog psychologist, trainer, humane society member, etc...)
- Tribunal members must be animal experts from the field, and not advocates nor counter-advocates to the already listed breed-specific issues
- No dog should ever be euthanized

- Criminal charges for the owner
- All members of the tribunal must own a pet of the same type as the one on trial.
- Wondering how the tribunal would be formed.
- As long as the individual performing the tribunal has expertise in dog aggression
 - dog training implemented and reviewed by independent company: (2) assessment provided based on whether it's the dog or the owner, and if the owner - removing the dog and finding a new home vs. euthanizing.
- If the persons on the tribunal were qualified to accurately assess pet behaviour, temperament and provide alternative supports for the animals and owners.
- As long as the representatives are trained in animal behaviour and can therefore properly assess the incident.
- No dog should be euthanized
- Decision is based on incident and not on breed
- Members are trained, their serving terms are limited and restricted with no ability to serve back to back terms and a limitation of two to three terms in total, they keep up to date with what normal behaviours are for dogs and apply a non-biased approach. They must remain ethical, disclose conflicts of interests and must have different backgrounds to maintain impartiality.
- Same day decisions with no chance for appeal
- Aaaaaa
- The "jury" or whomever is making the decisions, should be comprised fully, or almost fully, of individuals who have dogs/animals or have worked directly with dogs/animals. It's unfair to put someone in charge of a decision regarding an animals life if they have no idea how dogs/animals act and how to interact with them
- Keeping kennel time low as possible
- The dog is not euthanized because its breed is "deemed" vicious. ALL owners of pets dogs, or cats, MUST be responsible for them! You want a pit bull, required classes. You want a jack russell, classes! Some just buy a dog (or cat) because they want to and they don't know what all is entailed with the huge responsibility! Education! Classes! Lessons! And make them afford! Not everyone is rich in this province!
- Decisions would have to be effectively enforced.
- The victim should be the the focus a human being attacked by an animal. Society are allowing animals to kill babies, kids, human beings and we are treating it as if verbal dispute. If the tribunal is not a dog and pony show, that doesn't fails to follow through in upholding strict consequences. If people are cannot afford the expense in having a pet they should not have one in the first place. Movie stars have huge yards and lots of money and so poor people should stop following Hollywood.
- As long as all breeds are tried in the same manner. Focus on the severity of the infraction. Not the breed
- That those on tribunal reflect a cross section of hands on experience & common sense without bias and breed prejudice.

- People with appropriate qualifications should be on the tribunal, including animal behaviour specialists.
- The animal is not deemed guilty or a nuisance based on it's breed or appearance. Solely on the facts.
- Tribunal representatives are current experts in this field, have past experience assessing these orders and show NO discrimination to specific breeds of animals under assessment. The panel will be made up of representatives from varying animal backgrounds ex. vet, private animal rescue workers, public shelter care workers, obedience trainers etc.
- No euthanasia for behavioral issues. Order rehabilitation at owner's expense. Dogs should not become victims due to human negligence.
- Veterinarians would need to be involved
- The cost of said tribunal must fall on the owner of the pet being investigated.
- Ensuring that the pet has actually been mistreated to lead to the violent behavior.
- Depending on who sits on the tribunal.
- The dog should remain with the owner until the case is heard and decided by the tribunal. During that time the dog should not be allowed to leave the owners property unless the dog needs medical attention.
- Do not put down dogs unnecessarily. Force owners to get remedial training, and dog stays secured on property and/or enclosed, safe yard.
- If you look at all cases, who caused the attack either the owner, victim or dog. It's not always the dogs fault! It's usually how the owner trained the dog or the victim doesn't know how to treat or be around dogs and sets the dog off!
- As it is fair for all parties involved and the owners are held responsible if necessary
- Tribunal was made up of people proven to be unbiased on the topic of policing certain dog breeds.
- If appropriate people without bias are appointed.
- No dog should be euthanized, when humans commit actions like this they don't go directly onto death row. Why would you even consider doing this to a dog? People are let off on bail if they've hidden a dead body, there's no reason as to why an animal should ever be euthanized.
- It shouldn't cost the taxpayer anything. Costs should be covered by the problem dog owner.
- Tribunal decisions should not be appealed as it would waste Courts' time on minor issues that can be dealt with by the Tribunal.
- The dogs home life/ ability or willingness of owner to train, health of dog and quality of life.
- The tribunal does not decide to euthanize an animal
- I think a tribunal could be effective if it is properly and fairly overseen by people with no bias and educated on the facts of the matter - not based on emotion or hearsay or limited fact.
- The tribunal is comprised of individuals who are specialists in animal welfare and behaviour so that a dog who bit because of the situation it was put in (i.e. being tormented by a child, cornered, in pain, stressed ect) is not euthanized unnecessarily. Sometimes great dogs do things out of fear/protecting it's self if pushed to it's limits.
- Tribunal members have the education and experience to make such determinations.

- Have the owners assessed if they should be allowed to own dogs in general. Most of the time the dogs are aggressive due to the owners and not the dog itself.
- A protocol to deal with dogs that have been professionally assessed as dangerous or vicious (eg. euthanasia or confinement).
- must be cost effective, reduce wait time significantly, and have knowledgeable members appointed
- The Tribunal reviews the entire case and actually has knowledge on dog behaviour. Dogs first instinct is not to attack, they give plenty of warnings prior and testing a dog in a stressful environment like a shelter is not a good way to indicate their behaviour as it's stressful place.
- Those on the Tribunal are appropriately qualified. I would have to look more into what I would deem as appropriately qualified though.
- Representatives must include professional trainers/behaviorists, and a vet.
- Dogs should not get euthanized instead the owner should be ordered to go through training programs to better control their animal.
- Who would be on the tribunal? What background would they have? Would they be volunteer or paid? If they have an appropriate background in animal training/behaviour or similar, it could be reasonable. If they are random members of the public - no.
- fair and impartial representatives
- Followed the law and bylaw without bias
- *did survey on my phone I couldnt read the answers from the drop down
- I dont understand the difference. I would need more information.
- un biased people on tribunal
- Euthanasia should be a last resort, as the issue is frequently not the breed, but the owner and training.
- They would be fair and unbiased towards people and dog breeds
- not significant extra expense
- It is not breed specific
- There would need to be a mix of vet's and animal behavioural specialists as well as the general public, always including an owner of the same breed of dog, as well as someone whom knows the dog but does not own the dog that is being reviewed.
- Must be as unbiased as court. No preconceived ideas about types of dogs and behaviour.
- No BSL!
- It was fair and just for the animal, not biased towards the humans.
- ff
- The dog is observed for its nuisance behaviors in its home rather than the shelter.
- Euthanasia of the dog is more often than not inappropriate. Dog incident occur most frequently due to inappropriate training and handling allowing the dog to be placed in a dangerous situation. The dogs should be rehabilitated and rehomed where possible, not immediately euthanized.
- As long as the dog is not euthanized due to serious cases rather receive proper training for both owner and dog

- Understanding the qualifications of the individuals on the tribunal and levels of expertise in assessing each case
- Responsible the owner for the dog behaviour and provide rehabilitation to the animal
- No additional public taxes
- If the dog must be euthanized from a decision, the decision should be reviewed by a team that consists of vets, CPDT-KA trainers and behaviouralists. Dog should have to pass a medical examination first to ensure no neurological issues could be present etc.
- The victim must agree to by-passing a formal trial. There also should be multiple animal experts, such as veterinarians, on the panel of representatives.
- Fff
- The tribunal is procedurally fair, the tribunal as an appeals board, and all decisions of the appeal board are reviewable by the Court of Queen's Bench.
- Yes
- It is more efficient and cheaper then the current approach.
- A tribunal would work ONLY if it APPLIES TO ALL BREEDS and NOT singling out breed specific dogs.
- it did not increase wait times
- Actually qualified people. Not just nepotism.
- a chance to give evidence
- As long as it wasn't too soft on nuisance dogs.
- No discrimination of the breed.
- If both sides can be heard out appropriately to determine why the situation escalated in the first place. Not just listening to one side of the story. Likely needing a witness. And/or involving an animal behaviourist in consultation to aid in decision making processes.
- Members of the tribunal exercising decision making authority should have real expertise in dog training, especially as concerns problem dog behaviours such as reactivity. Dog training agencies should also require better certification. There are too many dog trainer operating in Calgary who have no idea how to handle problem dogs, but claim that they do.
- Only within reason, a danger to other dogs or humans only.
- As long as there are guidelines and accountability.
- There should be a maximum time limit on dogs being in a shelter awaiting the Tribunal. If possible, dogs should be kept with owner under "house arrest" type conditions (i.e. muzzled when off property).
- I would support a tribunal to shorten the time frame for all involved but the members of the tribunal must be impartial nonpartisan people with accredited expertise in the fields of veterinary medicine and animal behavior.
- Must not incur costs to general taxpayers.
- Dogs are not euthanized
- Made up of unbiased qualified people with expertise in animal behaviour and rehabilitation

- As long as it is handled fairly and the people involved have the choice to proceed to the courts if they don't like the outcome but at their expense
- I support this idea so long as it does not result in an increase in property taxes.
- They respect the life of the dogs as a full living and the need for the animal over the owners. As it is the owners responsibility to be sure in all time the animal is protect , feel secure, and respect as a full leaving like anyone.
- That a minimum of 2 professional animal professionals (ie. behaviorist, Vet, professional proven reputable trainer) was included as representatives.
- Minimum number of people in the board
- The responsibility level of the owner is determined. Has the owner done their due diligence in training? Has the owner provided an abuse free home with plenty of exercise and mental stimulation for the dog? Has the owner had previous nuisance or aggressive dogs? Was the dog provoked? Was the dog frightened?
- dog owners paid for the cost of the tribunal
- Tribunal members had requisite skill and experience and no preconceived biases towards specific dog breeds
- N/a
- Must be qualified and understand animal behaviour.
- As long as the tribunal will not hold any breed specific biases and make the decision based off the evidence, looking to the owner to see what they have done or not done that could have caused the dog to bite.
- Bully breeds should not be held to a different standard than any other breed.
- Members of the tribunal should be dog experts rather than regular people. Experts in dog behavior, veterinarians, professional dog trainers. Regular lay people will may rash, emotional and uninformed decisions.
- As listed above. The owner needs to be held far more accountable than they currently are. Yes the dog may be vicious, however they didn't get that way on their own. Determine if rehabilitation is possible for the animal before deciding euthanizing is the only option, substantially fine the owner and if warranted seize the animal from the owner without possibility of it being returned.
- no breed specific decisions-all dogs can be good or bad.
- Members rotated often or case by case
- As long as it followed the condition that the dog severely bit / attacked someone with no reason.
- One representative is a certified Behavioural Specialist or other animal specialist (ie vet, vet tech)
- The tribunal members are chosen from those with expertise
- More supervision by owner
- at least one animal advocate/behaviorist on panel. rehabilitation is possible. some dogs just need a different environment in which to thrive, not unlike humans.
- Mixed elected and appointed tribunal members with at least one vet and one lawyer
- I don't have enough info to form an opinion

- Na
- You do not force someone to kill their dog. Euthanasia should solely be up to an owner. You don't have the right to murder an animal.
- the owner keeps the dog confined after bylaw officers deem that the owner is a responsible owner and that this owner cares for his/her dog well. If the conditions for the well fare of the dog are met, then the owner can keep the dog at home, take it muzzled for daily walks.
- To make the dog being in the shelter a more better experience for the dog I'd suggest to let the owner spend time with the dog daily to help the dog not feel lost or abandoned, especially if the certain dog has separation anxiety. The owner should know the dog more and the dog should be comfortable with the owner. But that is if the owner feels safe with the dog...I fully agree with the first point. But I think that to let the court have reduced wait time you could have all severe dog bite cases put into one category then divide it into three groups, one being low severity, second being mild severity then third being extreme severity. These different severity cases could go to different courts, and the mild and extreme severity dog cases will have overall less wait time with the low severity's out of the way. The dogs, owner and the victim will have the attention. I agree with the third point as well. It is an excellent point. But just the second one I am weary about. Aren't there humanity rights protecting these animals? Euthanization should only be used when an animal is suffering right? I believe that the vicious dogs should go under extensive care to train them to not hurt people or other dogs, and for walks should be muzzled.
- Who would the members of the tribunal be?
- Members of the tribunal must be unbiased towards the breed and objectively review the incident
- Dogs cannot be euthanized and instead are issued mandatory obedience training and a muzzle until graduation of obedience training
- At least half of the representatives on the tribunal would have direct, related experience with animals and animal behaviour.
- Tribunal members screened for bias, maybe have both dog owner and victim agree and accept tribunal members
- Emphasis on training and not putting dogs down or banning the breeds.
- if is cost effective
- Make sure that the individuals on tribunal are not all siding with BSL Make sure that some are positive reinforcement dog trainers
- The members of the tribunal are educated and experienced in regards to different dog breeds, training, and recognizing behaviour.
- Unbiased towards breed of dog
- NO cost and listens to the victims.
- laws cannot be breed specific, only behavior specific
- There is no previous bias towards any specific breed of animal.
- On a trial basis to monitor advantages and disadvantages of utilizing a tribunal.
- Experts placed on the tribune should be knowledgeable of dogs and/or seek advice from those who know dog behaviors. Non experts should not be making these decisions.

- Did not hold any bias against Any specific dog breeds, and only focused on each individual case independently of the others.
- Why the dog bit occurred.
- At least half of the tribunal members are working in a veterinary field
- I can't read the rest of the sentence on a mobile phone.
- must have all best interests
- That they look into rehabilitation of the dog over euthanasia
- They would absolutely have to be specialized in the nuances of dog cases and understand that nearly all dog behaviour is a direct reflection of their owner's treatment and training. The first response should never to euthanize a dog, but instead to investigate the owner and place punishments on that owner.
- Due process is followed
- If they recommended euthanization that the owner have a chance to go through the court system as a secondary look
- Not guilty until proven guilty, allowed all parties to speak, allow the owner time to prove they have done everything possible to train and control the dog. Be fair to the pet owner.
- That the tribunal be comprised of people not biased against dogs, or dogs of specific breed.
- Not influenced by the proposed breed specific discriminatory measures
- At least 1 dog behaviouralist is on every tribunal
- Found every practicable way to work with the owner to improve behaviour of nuisance dog(s) (i.e. mandated training class(es), rehoming of the dog into the care of a qualified individual, etc.) before even considering having the dog put down. It is my belief that poor ownership creates nuisance dogs; dogs are not at fault for poor behaviour, owners are. Also, during the tribunal, there must be no breed bias.
- There should be no breed bias in the judgment. Obedience training/re-homing of the dog to a experienced trainer/foster homemust be the first course of action, euthanasia should always be a last resort. Poor ownership creates nuisance dogs, dogs are not inherently bad.
- They review evidence, not make decisions based on breed
- Can't read this answer. It cuts off
- The welfare of the animal, taking in its upbringing, must be held in high consideration.
- All facts should be taken into account regarding the bite. Ie, triggers and such. There are nearly always warning signs
- At least one or two veterinarians sit on said tribunal
- The owner is investigated, for example for history of animal abuse and neglect. The breed of the dog should not be a determining factor when deciding if a dog is euthanized. All dogs should be sent for a behaviour assessment by a non biased organization always prior to euthanizing a dog.
- I do not believe they should be able to decide on euthanasia prior to the final sentencing of court.
- The tribunal consists of dog behavior experts, trainer and vets

- They work with certified behavioral trainers and vets before declaring a dog must be euthanized, and allowing the family to have a voice in the matter.
- The members of the tribunal are educated in dog behavior and assessment.
- The owner is held accountable only not the dog. A dog should never be put down because of an owner's stupidity for lack of training, exercise, love or a proper home.
- As stated above, tribunal decisions can be appealed by the Court of the Queen's Bench
- It is NOT a result of BSL.
- Kangaroo court is not sensible. All individuals must be lawyers or judges, people who understand the law. It's people who understand the law or it's just a joke. I mean would you hire a plumber and go tell him to teach physics? No kangaroo courts.
- That at least one of the tribunal be a professional or highly recommended by the community canine behaviour expert..
- Na
- If it's freeing up the provincial courts and costs but not if it's adding another level of bureaucracy to the process.
- A fee is not imposed on an accused to engage the tribunal
- Euthanasia is decided after multiple bite incidents with owners not proving to make any effort to change the behaviour or keep the dog away from other people and dogs.
- Owners and dogs stay together
- as long as dogs of this type are allowed to be free in public places and off leash where all dogs are allowed until an attack happens with that dog. Not all dogs of this breed are aggressive.
- composed of knowledgeable individuals eg veterinarians, behaviour experts, animal services people, and/or citizens as a check. But if owners launch appeals just to be jerks, doesn't that take awhile and dog still suffers?
- I think there must be dog experts on the tribunal and the owner must not be part of it.
- A qualified non force using trainer should be a member of any tribunal panel and have at least the same input as other members, including voting rights. Their vote should be the casting vote if no agreement can be reached
- The dog cannot be euthanized but will be put into the care of a rehabilitation facility to train the dog
- The qualifications of the tribunal are appropriate
- It keeps the interest of the dog's health and safety a top priority.
- Dogs aren't euthanized unless it is it extremely serious case I do not believe that we should have the power to kill a animal when people are blamed and arrested for murder every day and we do not kill them we find every solution first to help those human beings...
- The tribunal was reviewed yearly for performance by the citizens of Calgary and background checked for non-malicious activities. Tribunal members must also be qualified and to have the passion to rehabilitate dogs on a case to case basis.
- The vote is unanimous to pass.
- Euthanasia used as a last resort. Rehabilitation and behavioral classes should be the first option in all cases

- There is a unanimous agreement before euthanization.
- If a dog causes a serious injury to a human the matter should be settled by a court of law.
- Tribunal members are professionals like veterinarians, professional trainers, etc. that can make science-based decisions
- I do not agree with euthanizing the dog. In most cases it is the human influence/how a dog was raised. The dog should first be looked at by a dog trainer to try and properly train the dog before it is simply euthanized.
- People on tribunal will need to have appropriate qualifications for the tribunal
- It was felt with within 30 days.
- No bias towards specific breeds
- The members of the tribunal are well-educated and have some credibility that warrants them being qualified to make a decisions about a dog's life (experienced animal worker or someone having formal animal care training).
- There must be means of appeal as outlined.
- The decisions was made promptly and without bias
- Appeals to courts must be allowed
- Have subject matter experts/trainers be a part of the process to determine suitability of the dog.
- Who would sit on this Tribunal? Who decides the tribunal makeup? This has to be a fair process
- Euthanizing is ALWAYS a last resort. And they people on it aren't absolute cone heads who target pit bulls
- dog is not euthanized and funding for dog obedience training
- The breed of the dog does not influence the tribunal in any way, shape, or form (ex: pitbull, rottweiler)
- Euthanize was a last resort and the animal was giving every opportunity to go to a "rehabilitation" training program for aggressive dogs.
- Movement against euthanizing wherever possible. Including harsher restrictions (homebound, no off leash, muzzle, training and punishment for the owner over the dog)
- That it is fair and equal for all dogs, not just based on their looks or breed. All dogs and responsible dog owners need to be treated fairly.
- There must substantial proof of dog attack and must be unbiased to bully breeds
- Those on the tribunal must be experienced in the area of dog ownership, health, behavior etc. Families and communities must also be consulted.
- The representatives are required to have extensive knowledge on dog behaviour, rehabilitation, training, and obedience. They cannot be breed-biased. They are required to have had 5 years or more experience working with dogs that have behavioural problems. The tribunal should include the dog's well being in all cases processed. The tribunal should work hard to ensure that the dog under investigation will be found another proper and safe home/owner when needed. An order for a dog to be euthanized cannot be used as a way to "speed up the process" of the court case and tribunal decisions have to be based on the well being of the dog and safe rehabilitation.
- Limits time for a dog to be in a shelter

- A fair panel - members such as a certified dog trainer, someone who owns a dog, along with city workers and at least 4 members.
- It is not discriminating certain breeds
- Only unbiased people can be appointed to the tribunal. No history or personal experience with dogs involved in incidents, no possibility of personal gains from outcomes of cases, must have education in dog behaviour so educated decisions can be made, and must always act in kindness and fairness
- Only one chance per household
- The dog wasn't in a kennel for months
- That the tribunals do not become some basis for an anti-bulldog crusade.
- Veterinary and animal behaviour professionals were represented in the tribunal
- There should be at least one dog behaviour specialist in the tribunal.
- The tribunal includes one or more experts in animal behavior/health/psychology and includes a person or people with a very thorough understanding of the bylaws
- Training for the dog and owner
- The tribunal should be based on law not feelings. I believe it would be hard to find people who are not biased one way or the other to do what is right for the dog and community
- Input from local balanced dog trainers and NOT treat based trainers
- It's not used as a vehicle to expedite euthanasia.
- Educated individuals (Veterinarians, animal behaviorists) need to be involved in tribunal process
- to put the animals needs first, understand that they weren't born this way, they were made that way by shitty ownership.
- I would hope that a tribunal would consider hearing from both the victim and the owner in terms of their wishes (and planned remediation on the part of the owner).
- Not all dogs bite because they are aggressive they also bite out of defense or terror or they are protecting their human or animal friend. So the tribunal must take this into consideration as well
- Mediation & restorative justice first
- A tribunal would be okay if there were penalties for the people/smaller dogs that cause the larger dog to defend itself.
- Euthanizing should not be considered
- You can't be quick to judge the dog. If the dog has potential to be trained let the knees have the chance to do that.
- People on tribunal having biased perspectives on breeds would hinder proper growth of system. It would make sense for people elected to tribunal to have background and or training in dog behavior
- As long as the goal was not to euthanize the dog. A fair assessment of the dog is had.
- It merely provides a quicker method of processing legal actions against dogs to keep their time in confinement to a minimum.
- Nonpartisan, must prove to be more effective than provincial court
- Any and all dogs not just "scary looking" breeds
- You have not explained what a tribunal is or what the purpose is

- Dog owner must agree and further restrictions shouldn't be placed on the dog in question while waiting for tribunal to decide.
- If the dog has a history of offences.
- Condition that both dog owner and complainant agree in writing that they WANT the tribunal instead of court, and that they will abide by the decision of the tribunal.
- Strict and limited scope of authority, these tribunals can easily begin to make rulings that are outside of a mandate.
- Was investigating thoroughly by profession of behaviouralists
- includes an expert about dog training and behavior
- As long as there are no breed specific biases
- Orders to destroy a dog can be appealed in court
- It's members are well versed in dog behaviours / training and have some experience in shelters/training/animal animal related profession
- not assume all pit bulls are nuisance dogs, and made rulings based on behaviours, not breeds.
- The dog is evaluated. Sometimes circumstances are not cut and dry. It could be an owner's responsibility/cause. I hate that this breed is targeted as a dangerous breed. It's not always the case.
- Fairly appointed members of the tribunal, members from the community not city officials.
- Each case must be viewed and processed depending on the specific breed behaviour and needs. Only then should TRAINED professionals be in charge of this task
- The owner and household only get a single opportunity. Afterwards penalties should be severe.
- Tribunal members must have experience with dogs and their variety of temperaments. They should know the difference between aggression and fear.
- Punish the crime and the instigator NOT the breed.
- If this was to pass you best make sure you have qualified certified animal trainers or behaviorists running the show and making the recommendations not just some non qualified city worker
- The breed is not the main factor but the owner and their responsibility around training and modifying behaviour be evaluated.
- The people on the panel do not have any bias towards dog breeds
- No euthanization
- As long it provides ample opportunity for the dog owners to make their plea and there are appropriate measures done to deem the dog aggressive, by an experienced behaviourist.
- Before ordering the dog for euthanasia the dog would go through obedience training and removed from the home in case the problem is the owner and not the dog.
- As long as it is making the process quicker to get the animal out of a shelter.
- There is a veterinarian or licensed obedience professional on said tribunal
- There MUST be 1-2 professional animal behaviouralists on such a tribunal were it formed.
- Was represented by non-biased individuals and very carefully looked at on a case by case basis.

- The tribunal should consist of a variety of people (e.g. dog owners, non-dog owners, ppl with kids, etc.)
- has dog behavioral experts on the tribunal - not just regular people who don't understand animal or dog behavior
- NOT decided strictly on breed. Was the person or persons bit tormenting or attacking dog. Was dog attacked the original instigator.
- Euthanasia should only be considered after extensive review of the dog's behaviour and after extensive training and rehabilitation. Most dogs become vicious due to learned behaviour and training from an owner, and there should be an attempt to undo this training before euthanasia is considered.
- None
- you leave your bias against pit bulls at the door. Again, the owners are the problem. Can we spay and neuter the owners instead?
- If animal neglect or abuse is discovered, the animals should be surrendered to a shelter or rehab and the owner should be prosecuted in a regular court and prohibited from owning animals again.
- The person needs to be punished, if the dog is to be killed then that owner should be held accountable for the bite victim and the life of the dog.
- Left putting the dog down as a last resort.
- Someone on the tribunal is an expert or advocate for animals and is able to help determine if with proper intervention the dog will not reoffend
- Look at the stability of the human who owns the dog. Also look at if the human was purposely training the dog to fight, the human should always be held responsible, if the human is showing signs of aggression, if the human cannot listen, if the human can not provide documents showing that this is their dog, they should not have an animal and there should be a system to show that humans who have previously been abusing animals should not own animals. However the dog should be allowed to tear a human apart if the human attacks the dog. Self defense.
- Not to be biased against breed, but take each case as its own
- The animal is not held responsible, but the owner is. They animal should not be euthanized
- I would need more information on the tribunal and also criteria for the people who sit on the tribunal to ensure they are not biased
- The dog and owner should be assessed by a qualified, third party trainer to provide a recommendation to the tribunal as it is often the poor actions of the owner that is responsible for bad behavior by dogs. Recommendations should outline the type of remedial training required for owner and dog.
- More emphasis needs to be placed on the dog owner. Most dogs are not aggressive! Rather they pick up on their owners behaviour. So if the owner is aggressive than will pick up on that as well. Just putting a dog down for aggression does not stop the owner from getting another dog nor teaching it the same behaviour.
- People are dealt with according to what they have permitted their animal to do, NOT based on what breed the dog happens to be.

- Must be completed in 30 days or sooner (not sure what the first choice "Tribunal being efficient" really means - what is efficient for Tribunal could be different than what animal owner perceives is efficient (especially for animals who are impounded at Animal Services for more than one-year during court proceedings). Does "efficient" just mean faster than the courts?
- be objective, and speak to 'bite or victim of complaint', owner, and surrounding neighbours if applicable to get a better all servicing picture.
- Still follows proper legal procedure and ensures charges/Euthanasia sticks
- As long as specific breeds were not targeted with severe consequences. This isn't a breed issue its an owner issue. A small jack Russell can hurt a child as much as a pit bull can hurt someone. Im not a fan of targeting breeds.
- Tribunal members must have a pet themselves.
- The representatives have a background knowledge of dog behaviour
- They are not biased based on breed specifications. And they are animal lovers themselves or else these people won't truly care and will just euthanize with no care.
- Not jumping to conclusions based on breed.
- Dogs get fair representation from people who understand the nature of dogs and can assess whether the incident was truly vicious or self defense of an insecure animal who was forced into a difficult situation.
- It is NOT breed specific or biased.
- It's fair and not bias against a breed
- not based on a breed.
- I would support if the specific animal had numerous strikes against it for similar behavior. I also believed in holding the owner accountable more than the animal itself.
- if the injuries are very very severe or life threatening. no animal should ever be put down for biting someone if they need a few stitches or if there's a small gash.
- Owners should be given options for what happens to the animal, tribunal cannot decide to euthanize the animal without an effort/options being made or given to correct the situation before ending a life.
- Members of tribunal need to be trained dog professionals, eg Vets, trainers, rehab specialists.
- I don't believe in euthanizing a dog, unless you absolutely had to under certain circumstances. But I always believe in rehabilitation and maybe instead if the city offered a dog training program it would do much better.
- The tribunal would need to be qualified to make such decisions in a fair manner with no breed targeting
- The tribunal should be made up by members of the ABVMA, animal behaviourists, and other veterinary professionals.
- I support a tribunal if it mean to effectively speed up the process, with less harm to animal.
- As long as it would include canine behavioral professionals such as individuals associated with the Calgary Humane Society.

- Determine , & review restrictions placed on a dog, which the owner would need to abide by to keep the animal. The person who teases or aggravates the dog and it results in a bite, the person should also be held accountable.
- The interest of the animal is kept first and foremost. The owner is the one that is at fault for not controlling their pet.
- input from a trainer, an animal behaviourist, a dog enclosure specialist. if house and yard are impregnable after changes then dog could stay at home under conditions if owner can be trusted to follow specifications.
- The victims and owner can decide
- No prejudice against a specific breed, for example pit bulls.
- Review the owners care of the dog. Most nuisance dog behavior is an example of bad dog care by the owner.
- No appeal. Whats the point of wasting the efforts of the tribunal. Otherwise, stick with the court system.
- That the dog does not have to be put down. This is like introducing the lethal injection once again to our criminal system
- If the dog was being harassed by the victim, a lesser charge would be placed on the dog, as well as a harassment charge on the victim.
- An educated and trained non-biased individual providing the investigation.
- It was objective to the breed, as in there be no difference in how the case is handled for a chihuahua as it is with a pit Bull. Only implement this if you can guarantee the judging will not be breedist.
- Where the owner has the choice to have their case held before a judge if they prefer
- you would need a veterinarian and dog trainer as part of the tribunal to give a professional opinion, not personal.
- Members of tribunal had experience with dogs (or vets, dog trainers/walkers)
- The tribunal should not be for breed specific as often the problem is the dog owners
- Euthanizing is a extreme last resort; the tribunal should include trainers which can work with the animal to rectify the behavior. There is generally a reason that the dog is acting out this way and it almost always is due to the owner, not the dog.
- The representatives would be required to have experience/ training in legal proceedings and demonstrate impartiality.
- I don't agree with euthanasia until every attempt to get the dog under control has been made. Additional training, muzzles etc are tried first
- Ok
- Tribunal is not a static committee but a changing jury of peers
- g
- Does not discriminate against pitbulls - you've admitted in this survey that this choice isn't evidence-based
- The tribunal is educated on the issue at hand with extensive background in dog research and breeds.

- Good
- Mandatory retraining of the dog and consequence to the owner
- The breed is NEVER discussed to prevent bias.
- Pitbulls should not be singled out based on stereotypes. This is a backwards concept.
- It was efficient and focused on quick resolution so that the dog does not needlessly suffer in isolation
- The owner being able to defend the dog and explain the actions
- There are properly educated people on the tribunal who understand dogs and dog behaviour including BALANCED trainers.
- They practiced the same guidelines when making a decision as the courts
- People are invested as well. As human instigation is usually the issue.
- The dog should not be put down. The owner should be fined and the dog placed in a loving home. I once adopted a dog that was a Doberman, constantly in trouble and running away from his home. Was the best with me, and never had an issue or ran again. Kjnda like some youths that run from abusive situations.....
- The tribunal is diversely selected
- Please stop putting dogs down? Owners should be punished for repeat offense
- It applied to ALL breeds who are involved with overly and unjustified aggression, NOT breed specific. The tribunal would have to be a mix of people who are both for and against big “dangerous” breeds like pit bull and Rottweilers so that the tribunal is FAIR and unbiased. Dogs are not bad, owners are.
- The tribunal has dog experts and/or people who are very knowledgeable of how to deal with a variety of dog issues.
- There needs to be assessments completed on the owners for the behaviour of the animal. Seldom is the animal at fault if they have not been trained properly or put in the correct environment by the owner. The owner needs to be held accountable to change
- Only when it is given to a dog that has made a Offence before
- The people on the tribunal would have to be educated specifically in the treatment and behaviour of dogs, vets for example would be ideal
- Consultation with a person trained in canine behaviour and/or veterinary medicine were a mandatory step in tribunal decisions.
- DEPENDS WHO THE SHAREHOLDERS ARE

Bite and Run

If a dog bites a person or other animal, do you support a rule that requires the dog owner to remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer if necessary?

Responses below include those that responded ‘Yes’ and provided an explanation.

- The owner is always responsible for the dog especially if there is a history and the dog doesn't have vaccines up to date
- It should be part of responsible pet ownership, if the owner has to leave the scene for personal safety or safety of victim so as to prevent more bites. Owner should call 311 and provide their information.
- It's common sense
- If my dogs ever harmed anything it is my responsibility to deal with the consequences. People take off and leave the "victims - owners and pets" to deal with trauma and cost then have to find the aggressor and take them to court. No accountability.
- Previous offences. If the dog has had rabies shot recently. Reduced stress on the animal.
- Absolutely they should and if they don't then big fines ahead. It's the same for hit and runs, should be the same for dogs and owners.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dog's actions
- Yes I do believe that they should remain at scene or give contact information. This will help understand whether the dog has been in a neglected home or not and investigate the owner as well. If people leave there is a reason .. most likely owner hiding
- As a dog owner you should be responsible for your dogs behaviour.
- I'm shocked this isn't already a law like remaining at the scene of an accident. Isn't a bite incident the same. It would eliminate a person needing rabies testing etc.
- the dog should be removed from the situation - if the individual needs to leave though to do that (say a park), then there should be a way to contact that person. sometimes it is less safe to remain.
- Pet owners should always be responsible for their pets.
- Owners must be held responsible for their dogs. If they don't remain at the scene it can be more difficult to track them and their dogs down.
- I agree.
- how else is the officer going to find the offender and investigate properly....
- My pitbull has been attacked by many "non-vicious" breeds and been taken into vet care due to it with no responsibility taken by the other owner
- I feel that this is an important step in ensuring the sharing of personal information that is correct and keeps both parties civil in a heated situation
- They need to be held responsible.
- Same as any accident. Should remain on scene if needed
- People need to be held accountable for their pets! Vet bills are incredibly expensive and depending on the situation the bills should in part be paid by the at fault party
- Every person's account of the incident should be on record while it's fresh in their minds.
- Similar to a fender bender in a vehicle. If the person just leaves then it's like a hit and run. There needs to be exchange of information and sometimes an enforcement officer may need to be present
- Yes because the dog could be sick and the person or other animal may need more medical attention.

- Owner must always be present with the pet when off the owner's property. For Eg: It should not be treated any different than a hit and run case.
- There is ownership for the trainer in how the dog is acting. Severe cases must be recorded to prevent them from happening again. This can only happen if treated as similar to a human violation (aggressive behaviour, assault, etc).
- Owner should always be fully liable for what damages that their own pet dog has done. Similar to car accidents, driver / operator is responsible for the damage or the accident.
- Bad animal behaviour should be the responsibility of the owner. Not the fault of the breed.
- I personally think if a dog bites a person that dog should be taken away. No second chances for biting dogs.
- Dogs that bite should be held accountable
- It is important for information to be exchanged for the safety of both parties if illness arises, complications or questions come from the incident. Is the animal up to date on shots, medical bills, etc.
- Too many dogs get injured at off leashes And the offending pastries just leave. There should be heavy penalties for doing so
- As a pet owner I am responsible for my pets actions. Should be treated the same as a motor vehicle accident in that those involved should be required to stay at the scene.
- If there is any incident where animal attacks a human or another animal information should be shared from both parties. Failure to do so should penalize the owner.
- Dog owners need to be responsible and accountable for the behaviour of their pet. Valid contact information needs to be gathered in case there are medical expenses incurred by the injured party.
- Its only common sense
- A person's dog is an extension of them while in public. If they caused harm to another person or animal, the decent thing to do would be to exchange information and face repercussions if necessary.
- Common sense. Also would depend on severity. Whether or not bite breaks skin.
- No different then a hit and run with vehicle
- Owners are responsible for their pets behaviour. If it is serious enough, the owner should compensate the victim where required.
- It's common sense.
- Accountability.
- They should share contact info.
- Sharing contact information isn't a bad idea but separating the animal and it's target it likely necessary.
- Oh my god. This is embarrassing that in the year 2020, this is not a requirement. Are you allowed to leave if your car hits someone? Or not provide information. You can be more seriously injured by a "pet" than by a 1500kg machine. Come on. Aren't you embarrassed that we even have to ask these questions.
- But this could be difficult depending on the circumstances of the incident.

- That's only common sense.
- Seems reasonable people remain at a scene like any other situation.
- The dog/pet is the responsibility of the owner. Just like at the scene of an accident you are expected to stay and give your information to the other person. The same should be considered with a dog bite/attack
- unless the owner can provide contact information to a witness so that the dog can be removed to ensure no one else is harmed
- to understand if dog has up to date vaccinations to help victim to understand if thus has happened before and the circumstances
- Of course! Just like with any accident, the same rules should apply here.
- It's serious if a dog bites anyone and a responsible owner should stay to deal with the situation.
- It's inexcusable that someone would allow their dog to attack someone or another dog and not submit their info to the victim and police if the victim decides to pursue charges etc.
- There is no where else to put this input, but I believe the language used in the proposed bylaw, specifically targeting one breed (pit bulls) is inflammatory. Many breeds bite, have large jaws, and are capable of causing harm (Shepards, Saint Bernards, etc). Breeds are not the problem, owners are. If anything, there should be bylaws around responsible pet ownership, ie, training classes mandatory for anyone adopting any dog, vs breed discrimination.
- I think it's important to have both sides of the story. Like for instance if the dog was being harassed of course it will bite why is that the dogs fault. Dog owners shouldn't feel like they are always in the wrong as I don't think that is always the case
- I think it's important for a dog owner to take responsibility for their animals actions. An exception to this would be if the animal required immediate medical attention.
- Per incident, if not a small tousele and a vet visits is not needed, then I do not believe they need to share information.
- Yes but all dogs. I'm disgusted at the fact you have zero knowledge about " pit bull " breeds. How dare you start to try and scare people when it comes to these " pit bull " type dogs. Shame on you narrow minded people who take zero time to learn about the breeds you categorize as "pitbull" .
- It is not the animals fault for irresponsible ownership. Owners need to train and teach their pet social etiquette - just like children.
- So the owner is able to be educated by the officer or provided resources that provide education
- I had 1 of my dogs attacked, and my roommate had his viscosly attacked to the point of needing to get something like 20 stitches to close the back of its neck. Both happened at a dog park, both owners left. I had to get the city to call them and deal with them.
- Yes, the only way that they should leave the scene is if there is a medical emergency (e.g. they were injured in the incident as well and need immediate medical attention) or if they are being threatened by the other party in which case they should be required to self-report the incident within 24 hours
- Well yes I would expect anyone who's dog has bit to stay and see of the person is okay. But with u treating to kill peoples pitbulls if they bite I can see why people don't stick around!... leave the "bully" breeds alone..during a pandemic don't you have something better to do with yourself?

- By staying and communicating, everything can be resolved more quickly. It will be important to ensure as little bias as possible while this is all taken into consideration by the Office. Also - what if Bylaw is busy or its after hours? Perhaps require contact information to be shared - like a car accident.
- Helps determine how each dog reacts around each other at the time of the incident.
- Owners should be held responsible for their dogs actions. Pay for vet bills of injured dog, be held accountable and put their own dog through training to prevent another incident
- The owner should be held responsible, not the dog. Therefore they should stay at the scene and give any contact information if the person was hurt.
- Yes, and if they don't they should be charged with fleeing the scene of a crime. As dogs can be used as weapons, we are fully responsible for our own dogs actions. And bigger fines should be enforced.
- A pet owner is responsible for their pet and if an incident occurs the owner is accountable for their pets action
- Its all about accountability, you own a dog, you are responsible. You don't leave a car accident without exchanging information or speaking to police. . .
- They should stay so that the enforcement officer can record info in case of future events or to check if there are any past events, to check for vaccinations, and in case any fines need to be levied.
- This puts ownace on the owner where it belongs. If a dog is violent, regardless the breed, it may point to mistreatment or neglect at home.
- Seems like a good way to hold them responsible and get the information needed for treatment of the victim
- necessary with any accident where someone gets hurt anyways, why not here?
- Yes, except if the situation requires you to remove your dog or seek medical help.
- how else are we able to track nuisance dogs
- Owners need to take more responsibility for their dogs. I've heard of too many incidents where owners have left the scene and left victims with large vet bills.
- There have been many who blames the other when in doubt they always think there animal is in good behavior. Delusional!
- Or they can be charged for leaving the scene of an accident.
- Owner must remain and provide necessary information for follow up
- The owner should be held accountable. Not the dog.
- The dog owners normally disappears after and incident and can not be traced
- The owner of the dog should have to pay all required fees. (Vet fees if attacked another dog, prescription fees if human was sent to doctor)
- The owner must carry full responsibility for the dogs misbehaviour. Including compensations, medical expenses, moral damage, punitive fines.
- The dog owner is ultimately responsible/accountable for the behavior of the dog
- Because that's what the owners needs to do there dog there responsibilities to be there ! Thank
- It's the right thing to do

- It is no different than witnessing an assault or a car accident. You stay and give your statement and accept consequences if necessary.
- I feel that there is an obligation to pay for any medical needs that the other person, animal or thing would need after a bite.
- This I can get behind. PEOPLE need to be responsible when their dog attacks another animal or person.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the behaviour of their dog. If a dog is found to cause harm to another animal or human it is only the responsible thing to do but provide contact information, take photographic evidence of the aftermath of the altercation and if serious enough (hospitalization is required) then enforcement officers should be brought to mitigate.
- There is always two sides to a story so both owners should be spoken to.
- "Within reason. Maybe the person really has somewhere they need to be. If they take some appropriate steps such as exchanging contact info then I could see, in some circumstances, it being alright for them to leave.
- But it can't be like a hit and run. They can't just leave to avoid responsibility."
- A dog bite is no different than any other accident.
- It is an accident scene and someone has been hurt. Exchanging information and talking to enforcement is vital to ensure shared information between parties and aid if needed is properly rendered.
- Yes so there is no she said he said.
- Yes, too many owners walk away and avoid taking responsibility when their dog has injured another dog or a person.
- Unless the owner needs to remove the dog from the scene for safety reasons
- Unless there is a need for immediate medical attention
- Yes, just like a car accident.
- Yes, people should have responsibility for their dogs. A dog bite is still considered an accident and information should be exchanged.
- Yes only because they should own up. Its not always the dogs fault or the dog might have a legit reason sometimes not.
- People need to take ownership of what happens, it is not fair to expect the victims owner to foot the Vet Bill. People should get reprimanded when they don't stick around and own up to it.
- Or at minimum, the dog owner provides the information to the victim
- like a car accident. the aggressive dogs owner should pay for vet bills in order for the other dog to become healthy again.
- As a pet owner, you are responsible for the animals behaviour
- It's part of being a responsible pet owner
- When you own a dog they are a dependent member of your family. If you minor child attacked someone you would be expect to represent them to the police. You have to represent your dog because your dog cant represent themself.

- The individual who owns the dog is ABSOLUTELY responsible for the dogs' actions, and must be present to claim responsibility. If they do not there should definitely be consequences
- Plain and simple - stay, give your information help out the injured.
- it is the owners responsibility
- It's responsible dog ownership
- Its just like a car accident, they should be charged for leaving the scene
- if a dog is injured the owner should have to share their information
- Yes, however the offending dog needs to be under control. It would be hard to share information with someone if you dog is still continuing it's aggressive behaviour.
- Hhh
- Same as if you are in a non animal accident.
- You should be responsible for your dog. Unlike a car, there are few identifying indicators to identify someone who did not remain at the scene
- The owner needs to be responsible for the actions of his dog and tell the enforcement officer what happened to lead up to the incident.
- It is no different than a car accident. The owner must take responsibility for their dog's actions.
- Unless dog needs medical attention, leaving the scene is like a hit and run. However the dog being on the scene may make things worse
- Good dogs bite too. It's important to have all the information to make an informed decision.
- "The dog owner may need to share vaccination information and sometimes the extent of the injury is not known until later.
- I wasn't sure where to put this, but I vehemently oppose breed specific legislation. Each dog and owner should be treated as individuals."
- It should be treated similarly to a traffic accident.
- Yes this makes the most sense out of everything. IT IS NOT BREED SPECIFIC. It is just simply being a responsible pet owner.
- Any owner of any dog that bites, no matter how minor the injuries might be should give a statement.
- It should be no different than a legal obligation to remain at the scene of an accident. If the opportunity arises for an individuals dog to attack or cause injury to another property (dog or other animal) or person, they are legally and civilly liable to be responsible for said injuries and damages. They should legally be compelled to remain at the scene until it can be properly recorded, all details obtained, and all individuals involved properly identified along with their contact information in case a follow up is required. Similar to an accident report.
- They need to take responsibility
- Yes but I dont think the dog should be put down, the owner be fined for not training properly
- It is important that all parties share pertinent information. Including any issues of both pets/ persons may have.
- Punish the owners and make the owners responsible. Its nor fair to punish the dog when its the owners fault.

- Both parties should be available to speak with an enforcement officer to explain the whole situation
- It's the owner who raised the dog(s). However both parties must be held accountable and if the non offending party leaves no further action should go forth. As some dogs have been rescued and are still working through problems. Dogs whom are off leash in non off leash areas and run up to a leashes dog after being told by the leashed dog owner that they aren't good with other dogs yet and if the non leashes dog gets bit for going at the leashes dog the offending party (doesn't matter the breed) should be given fines weather they stay on scene or not.
- Enforcement officer needs to be there to get all the details to ensure correct accurate documentation
- it is important that the owner stays as its important that both sides of the store are matched up and not hear say
- The owner knows the dog best. Dogs will bite/ attack out of fear/ anxiety/ lack of training. The owner should remain at the scene to be able tell their side/ dogs side of what happened as there are 2 sides to every story.
- The same reason why someone should be held responsible to remain at the scene of an accident.
- Too often irresponsible pet owners flee the scene to escape possible vet or medical bills which is unacceptable.
- I have heard of too many incidents where the owner of a dog who bites another dog or human doesn't even apologize, let alone stay and provide their contact information. They need to be held accountable.
- That's like asking if a person involved in a hit-and-run should stay or go until owner of damaged car is back. Yeah, they should stay and be responsible and take ownership of their poorly trained dog.
- A responsible owner would be present with the dog at all times.
- The owner Should have to stay and provide id
- Yes of course because it's like when you get into an accident. Both parties should be there to explain their sides of the story.
- Too many owners take off and face no consequences.
- This is essential. It is like children or humans. Animals are also the product of their owner and training. An owner must take Full responsibility of their animals and their actions/behaviours- we never want our animals to hurt anyone or an out her animal, but must ensure and take responsibility.
- Same as a car accident. You have a responsibility to address the incident.
- Except when circumstances require leaving...eg. To get first aid, remove dog from situation and secure until officers attend, etc.
- Otherwise there is no accountability. Owners now with problem dogs and not following the rules just swear at you for complaining and walk away
- "Being a responsible pet owner requires accountability for causing damage/injury or being the guardian of a being that does this.
- It also prevents the possible misidentification of an innocent pet and owner."
- The handler or owner is responsible for the animals behavior
- Fined for leaving the scene of a crime

- Yes but only if blood is drawn or obvious damage. Dogs use their mouths to play and communicate and nobody needs dog park Karen calling the authorities everytime another tries to play with hers...
- People should take responsibility for their animals.
- This one could allow for vet information to be exchanged, and for an enforcement officer to collect testimony from multiple parties.
- It is the owner's animal, and therefore their responsibility to ensure the situation is taken care of.
- "Do NOT make someone put
- Down their pet. Provide classes
- For said animal and owner and
- Don't assume it was the dogs fault."
- However, if the dog is in a state that cannot be controlled at the scene contact information should be given verbally and the offending dog should be removed from the situation promptly.
- "Unless of course the situation requires the dog to be tas
- ken away to prevent further injury, then what?"
- The dog owner knows their pet. They can explain behavioural issues and perhaps they warned the other party to keep their distance due to their dog's unease and these warnings were ignored.
- dog owners are or should be responsible for their pet's behavior. Car owners take responsibility for driving, and must stay on scene of Collision, i think a dog biting is similar to that and the owner should stay on scene until situation resolved.
- There are always 3 sides to a story
- Yes, the owner should take responsibility
- Its assault. They should be held accountable.
- Owners should be required to stay at the scene of the incident, provide proof of vaccination and licensing, and communications with officers.
- The majority of responsible owners do. This is punishing a bred and I don't agree with that.
- If the dog bites someone the owner should be held responsible for and medical or vet bills.
- This is reasonable
- I have had my large dog attacked by a smaller dog. They walked away cause they can pick them up and run.
- Absolutely. I feel it is necessary to deal with it as it's your dog.
- Be responsible as you would for any other accident.
- But it depends if the dog is biting out of protection. Is it a biting a predator? If so, NO!
- 100% the owner should remain at the scene of an incident involving their dog biting another dog or a person
- They need to accountable
- its like a car accident.
- How else would you determine what happened, the circumstances around the bite
- Yes unless the other owner or person gives them the okay to leave.
- Owners must be responsible for the actions of their pet.

- I believe that regardless of the breed, if a dog has bitten another animal or person, it is also the person's responsibility to make sure that the person and/or animal is okay. It is important that they stay there and share all information necessary as would be expected in any other incident scenario.
- "If a person is touching a dog without consent then [removed]
- You know the risk of petting."
- This will help keep the owners responsible for the incident, and extra vet and or health care costs.
- Yes I most definitely agree with the statement because a lot of pet owners of animals that cause severe damage while biting tend to flee the scene or become very confrontational and aren't able to reason with. That being said nothing gets resolved and the owner of the pet attacked has to suffer the consequences of paying the bills if required and dealing with the trauma without ever getting coverage from the persons who's animal is at fault. Those people at fault as well don't get held accountable and most likely the incident will reoccur.
- [removed] PIT BULLS ARE NO MORE LIKELY TO BITE THAN ANY OTHER DOG. [removed]
- It's just respect to the person that was bitten. And to at least make sure they are ok. Just like car accidents.
- Depends on the severity
- If animal is involved with a bite or attack. It should be treated like a vehicle accident. No one leaves the scene until an officer arrives and assess the situation and out come. Small or large dogs need to be treated equally.
- people should be responsible for their dogs
- However, if the dog isn't in a state to remain present with the owner this can be challenging.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to stay.
- Dog breeds with stronger bite strength than American Pit Bull Terriers: Bull Mastiff, German Shepherd, Chow Chow, Cane Corso, Irish Wolfhound, Doberman, Great Dane.
- The owner is responsible even if the dog bit and attacked another dog who wandered onto their property as long as the other dog has no record or signs of aggression.
- Accountability
- So everyone knows the facts about what happened
- It makes sense that a person should have to stay to share info after significant incidents.
- I have many reasons for saying yes, one being to hold the owner accountable for their dog, two to ensure the dog can be rehabilitated if possible without hurting others.
- I have a friend who was attacked by three dogs and the owner just left her lying there, severely injured and unable to get up!
- Its an accident and everyone must take responsibility.
- If a mediator is needed to sort through he said/she said bull [removed].
- Often owners of other animals are left to foot the bill of bites while the owner of the biting dog leaves the scene
- It's important people give contact information for any vet bills. And for officer to hear both sides of story

- My dog was bit by another dog and the owner didn't even seem to care.
- Wehaverules that have people staying on the scene for car, bike, robbery, and all kinds of other incidents. Dog bites should be no different. Be a responsible owner.
- They should be allowed if necessary to put their dog in a safe & contained space such as the car or in the house, but then return right away to the scene of the incident.
- People need to be responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- Dog owners need to be accountable for their dog actions
- They need to give information to find out if the dog has had shots and possibly pay vet bills
- Should also be liable for any expenses that may be occurred
- Taking responsibility for your pets is extremely important.
- Of course if there is an incident the owner should be present and ensure that the other person or dog is alright. Exchange information and check in if appropriate. With that said, there are also lots of instances where people over react over their own cause of defensive behaviour and then blame the dog for defending himself or herself.
- Pet owners must be responsible in the situations they put their animals in, and be held responsible for their animals behaviour. When animals are in public, owners must ensure they are well mannered, socialized, safe and in good health (including all recommended vaccinations).
- It is the equivalent of a hit and run otherwise.
- any medical or vet bills should be the owners responsibility
- Absolutely. Like a hit and run. The bite should be on the dogs record whether minor or not in case it's a pattern. Fleeing should be a crime. I've seen a dog attack another and the owners took off.
- Common curtesy.
- I think it's required to discuss the matter with an officer.
- Like a car crash, it's important to have all the information. But on the other hand what would they do with their dog that instigated the attack?
- This isn't currently required?
- Regardless of if beings an accident or not, it is fair to everyone involved. Incase follow ups need to happen for various reasons (eg. bill about injury, spreading of diseases like rabies, etc)
- The owner is responsible for that dog, so must remain present for next steps.
- It would be best to trace any incidents with dangerous animals - this would better track any future incidents including other dangerous situations or places like vets.
- Both parties should stay to be able to share their stories with an officer and determine who was at fault. It is never the dogs fault, always a persons fault.
- It allows for the scene to be assessed in real time and for proper identification to be shared in a possibly tense situation.
- It's the responsibility of the dog owner to follow through with any incidents your dog may have caused.
- "sharing information is a requirement after other civil issues such as collisions.
- Waiting for enforcement is impractical in many cases however."

- to be able to find.
- That's just common sense. Only an idiot would leave the scene of a crime
- [removed]
- The dog could be acting out of resentment of possible abuse of owners. Aggressive dogs need to be chipped for tracking at owner's expense.
- I think that all parties need to be heard.... for example if the big dog bite a little dog because the little dog was attacking the big dogs legs, etc
- If the bite is sever aand requires veterinary care
- The situation should be assessed from both owners and facts should be considered before making any decisions. Witness testimony could come into play. An owner with a nuisance dog should be held responsible if another dog or human is injured due to negligence.
- Safety for those affected. Know if vaccines are up to date. If animal has history. Accountability for their animals actions.
- Knowing the medical background of the animal would be important but I also feel the context that lead to a dog biting is vital to the outcome of any situation. If this is not part of the case it does not allow for exploration of what lead to the incident.
- If the officer available is 15-20 mins away, yes staying at the scene and understanding what happened will help with handling future cases.
- If it's severe enough. However if it's just a nip (does not puncture the skin) I don't think it is necessary.
- I don't understand why this isn't mandatory now
- For the tribunal of course.
- that owner should be responsible for the vet bills and also should be held responsible for how their dog acted.
- It is a responsibility as a dog owner to ensure you are acting as such. If your dog bites someone or another animal, you as the owner should ensure the damage or injury and offer any assistance possible
- It is the right thing to do
- If a dog bites the owner needs to remain on site unless the owner amd dog are in fear for their wellbeing by staying. However they should be in contact with authorities within a set amount of time.
- A third party would be beneficial in determining if the dog was provoked into an attack or not. As well as ensuring information was collected properly
- If it was an accident have record of it. As a scared person may say one thing when that's not what happened. Ie PEOPLE WHO DONT HAVE DOGS WALKING AT A DOG PARK AND START SCREAMING WHEN A DOG COMES FOR A SNIFF. like come on! You know this happens and the dog gets punished not the stupid act of the humans.
- A dog bite is like an assault. There should be consequences.
- It comes down to taking responsibility for your animal .
- First of all, your dog should never bite anyone. I've owned "aggressive breed" dogs my entire life Rotty's, german shepards, chows, pits. On my third pit bull, and NONE of my dogs have ever bitten anyone because they have all been socialized properly. However, if your dog does bite someone, you are responsible for its actions and should be required exchange information and be available to make a statement to an officer.

- Its like a vehicle accident. If it occurs you need to stay at the scene.
- any decent dog owner should want to make sure the other party is ok or help. You do not flee the scene of a crime, so why would you now
- Vet bills should be covered by offending party if in public and unprovoked. Everybody should be able to tell their story and I believe everybody who is responsible should be held responsible.
- I agree.
- To allow for follow up - as required depending on the incident and outcome.
- The owner and dog's information should be taken and tracked for repeat offences.
- Vet bills
- Just like with a car accident. Agree.
- An owner should be held legally responsible for their dogs actions. Including being responsible for paying for damage inflicted
- It should be treated as any other incident involving injury or property damage
- People need to be responsible for any consequences from an attack.
- I agree but rather than punishment I think maybe a warning and responsible owners typically would seek treatment or obedience training for their animals.
- Same as with a car accident, you can't just leave!
- It's a matter of taking responsibility
- I think it is absurd that you are targeting a specific breed or a breed that looks like a specific breed. [removed]. You need to be ashamed of yourself for even including this in a survey. Pit bulls are not more likely to harm a human than any other dog. This survey is racism towards dogs
- Similar to a vehicular incident. Sharing of information should be mandatory (should be common sense but that's another discussion)
- Both parties need to be held responsible for their animals and share their views on the incident.
- No different than if you were in a car accident. You remain in on the scene.
- The whole focus so far as I can tell is penalizing the dog but the real issue are the owners
- If another dog bites my dog or my child, the owner should be held liable for all injuries. The dog and owner should be dealt with in a timely manner to prevent further attacks.
- By law officers need to be able to identify the owner as they are the real culprit
- owner must live up to their wrong doings
- Working in the vet industry this would greatly reduce the issues of who should pay for what
- Yes I believe with any incident both parties should remain at the scene if there was an altercation to take statements and exchange information.
- Owners of a dog that has bitten another person or animal should have to stay. Not leave and let the victim have to deal with it. You're required to stay at the scene of other incidents, why should you leave after a dog bite?

- It should be treated like any other accident.
- This shouldn't matter what breed the dog is. If an owners dog is at fault they must take responsibility.
- It's like a traffic accident, but with flesh and blood. Of course that makes sense. Also what makes sense to implement fines for fleeing the scene of the incident.
- If requested, if not being abused by the other party and if safe to do so for both the animal, owner and the individual bitten
- I didn't even know this wasn't a requirement.
- I work at Healthlink and take calls from people who are bit by dogs and the owner leaves. The person doesn't know the dogs health status also it may re offend .
- They can explain everything that happen cuz that is thier dog???
- Taking ownership and responsibility is critical
- A severe bite is serious and any responsible pet owner should be willing to share this information and speak to an officer anyways.
- Dog owners should be held accountable for any vet bills required if the injury needs attention
- For the owner to take responsibility
- Such incidents should be treated in the same manner as car accidents
- If someone owns a vehicle and hits another person with that vehicle they have to stay. It's should be the same for animals.
- Just like if you hit a car, you are required to stay at the scene. I do believe they should be allowed to step away from the scene for safety purposes, however remain close by. Ex. Take the dog down the block.
- If a dog has bitten someone it is the owners responsibility to make sure that person is ok. If that victim doesn't have specific health coverage or know how to handle a bite the responsibility should go to the owner who didn't properly train their dog not an innocent bystander.
- I was bitten by a small dog at a dog park and the owner laughed it off and did not offer any contact info. I wished to file a complaint with bylaw and did not have enough info.
- Personal liability encourages owners to be more responsible
- Dogs shouldn't be allowed to bite other people then the owners are allowed to leave
- Owner needs to be held responsible.
- It's just common sense
- Because regardless of breed, there's lots of incidents where bites happen & owners flee.
- Yes, so both parties can tell their story, would encourage any other witnesses to remain on scene if possible. It's easy to claim that somebodies dog bit them unprovoked with no evidence other than the "victims" word
- It is the right thing to do, just as you would in a vehicle collision or any other incident involving another party.
- People who take on the responsibility of caring for a dog also take on the responsibility to keep their dog safe in all situations. If an incident occurs they should take responsibility to resolve it. Sadly because euthanasia seems to be a “quick fix” to deal with a dog termed as a “nuisance” I can understand people being hesitant to stay if they fear their dog will be euthanised.

- there needs to be accountability by all parties. and information gathered right at the time of the incident
- no different than remaining on scene of an accident
- If your dog hurts someone it is your responsibility as a pet owner to remain at the scene as your property caused injury to another person
- Everyone should be responsible for their pet.
- Just a note, I'm confused as to why pi
- Any attack should require the owner to stay on scene.
- If any breed of dog bites and draws blood (only without warning), yes, I think contact info should be shared. A dog won't attack unwarranted unless it's had zero training and/or has been mistreated. The owner then is at fault. Not the dog. The owner should be held responsible and get obedience training or surrender the dog.
- Unless the person needs to leave to secure the dog and then return.
- You must stay present to ensure proper handling of the situation.
- If your dog bites another dog or a person then you should take responsibility for that dogs action and stick around to deal with it.
- To be able to gather information and having the owner remain in the area allows the proper people to discuss and learn the underlying reasons for a bite ie. behaviour issue, who's fault, whether the dog was provoked or being protective.
- Regardless of breed, owners need to be responsible for the behaviour of their pets.
- It should be the same requirements as a hit and run: all parties are required to remain on scene.
- They need to be held responsible
- obvi
- If they leave, it is difficult to track them down later.
- responsible pet ownership
- They are responsible for what their dog does
- Yes they should !
- Accidents happen and I understand this, but the animal who gets attacked and hurt- their vet bills should be paid for by the person who's dog attacked. It is good to have an officer present to take down the story of what happened and to note the attacker dog to be possibly added to the nuisance list.
- To provide contact info, however hanging around waiting for bylaw may not be reasonable if the dog is aggressive and needs to be removed from the site of the incident for safety reasons
- too many owners run away when a problem arises
- I support it but I don't see how it is enforceable.
- Ultimately the owner should be responsible for the dog. If they allow the dog off leash and an incident occurs the liability should fall to the owner.

- All details should be recorded to allow assessment.
- This is critical to ensure the owner is aware of the severity of this incident and proper care is taken afterwards such as supporting the victim and training for the biting dog
- The owner must take responsibility for their pet
- It's self-explanatory. A dog bites another dog or person, the owner of the offending dog should be required to be present if police are brought in.
- Yes it's just like a car accident and if you can show your dog is a calm dog hell yeah
- An owner should be responsible for their dog's behaviour in public. If a dog were to attack wildlife, the owner should not have to remain there as there would be no one to exchange information with.
- Dogs that are allowed to run free that don't have reliable control. Which is most at the dog park. Should be liable for vet fees etc. Much like someone that gets your car is responsible for the damage.
- Too many bad dogs attack without repercussions.
- This is key. We need to have instant access to the dog's medical records to ensure rabies shots were given. Rabies has to be treated quickly or it can be fatal. The only exception is if they have to lock the animal up to prevent more injuries.
- Pit bulls must NOT be treated differently than any other breed!!!
- Similar to remaining at the scene of an accident.
- It's the decent human thing to do! Obviously no one wants their dog to bite someone or another animal, and things happen, often times it's an accident. But you should still remain on scene to share the incident and contact information
- Whether it be because the dog was defending himself/herself or the dog just bit them. All parties should remain on scene. Personally, I've had run in with idiots that wanted to pet my dog even though i stated NO multiple times and they get way too close in my and my dogs personal space (which he did not appreciate) and defensively he would bark and show off his fangs. Is it my dogs fault? no its the idiot who doesn't understand the meaning of NO so i would want the enforcement officer to understand that.
- Owners must stay at the scene of the assault
- Many cases of people lying about who they are when involved in dog bite situations
- This seems to be common sense. Just as you would stay at the scene of a car accident
- That owner is responsible for the dog.
- This should also go for little dogs butting big dogs. Even if no damage they need to be controlled more than any pitbull
- Shouldn't this be common sense?
- Providing skin is broken and it is a bad bite. If a child runs up to a pomeranian it might them if scared.
- Just like with a car accident, an exchange of information should be required.
- That's responsible pet ownership.
- I feel there is always 2 sides of every story and all sides should be heard.

- If a person who owns an offending dog leaves the scene of an accident, they should be held accountable both criminally and financially
- This should be a given for ANY dog owner with ANY breed
- It's simple, it's about accountability.
- It makes total sense to for both owners of the dogs to have contact with each other and exchange information. This is the same process that is used during car accidents. This should extend to incidents concerning dogs and people.
- I think it important to know that all dogs involved are licensed and have current immunization.
- If the bite is serious - not a 'nip', then yes.
- Any responsible owner would do this without a bylaw.
- It's just the right thing to do.
- it depends on the bite severity. In most bite cases the fault lies with the person bitten or the attack is exaggerated.
- Stop targeting bully breeds. They are not the issue, Responsible pet ownership is
- This is crucial to ensure the animal is properly vaccinated as well as in case the bite causes major medical concerns such as abscesses, torn ligaments/broken bones, any vaccinations the person may require etc
- if a dog severely injures another animal or person, then they should be held accountable and help pay for vet bills if necessary and would legally be responsible to any injuries on a human.
- In the event of a serious incident where it is called in as there should be a statement.
- "Not for animals, unless in the event of obvious and severe injury. Dogs will sometimes bite one another without injury or in the context of play.
- With the exception of instances where someone feels intimidated or unsafe. Either party should be able to leave in this case."
- Yes, if the "victim" requires it. If the victim does not require/ask for this, the owners/dogs can be free to go.
- Obtain emergency medical assistance for injured persons or animals. Required to wait for bylaw to determine apprehension and/or quarantine of animals (rabies, etc) and appropriate law/by law enforcement.
- Then both sides of the story can be heard and it can be dealt with properly.
- If vet appointments need to be made, it's fair that all parties are involved. It shouldn't end in enforcement taking either dog.
- I agree. My own pup was bitten by another dog once and the owner left. My issue wasn't with the dog. My issue was with the owner. The city allows people to simply purchase pets and this particular family literally built a small pen (about 5' x 8') and kept their full grown Siberian Husky in there ALL THE TIME. It was never walked, and the only time it had company was when they were trying to breed it. Well of course the dog got antsy and aggressive. It was never allowed to interact with other dogs or people. I tried calling the Humane Society and they said that due to our city's rules (that an animal only needs food and shelter to be deemed as being cared for) they couldn't do anything. THIS is what the city needs to be changing. You shouldn't be allowed to just lock dogs up and provide some food and call it a day. That is how dogs become aggressive, and can end up hurting someone. These lax rules are what allow people that don't care about the animals to attain them, and then get other people hurt.

- I think it is common courtesy and shows respect to the victim
- Aggressive or Dangerous dogs that bite (not breed specific as I have no issue with BSL breeds) should have owner take responsibility.
- This allows both parties to have information they feel they need to deal with the situation.
- Having a pet involves responsibility. This is one of those responsibilities.
- Accountability for owners is never a bad thing. If your dog bites you should have to explain the actions.
- It's like a car accident. Need to give details to authorities
- Only if the skin is broken
- Absolutely need to be a responsible owner. Things happen and or get heated both sides need a fair share to explain or take ownership.
- Why shouldn't the owner be there to provide info!!
- it is the responsible and reasonable thing to do.
- duh
- This would hold owners more accountable.
- Actions have consequences. If you own a dog, you are responsible for their behaviour.
- Owner responsible for all behaviours of all animals in their care.
- There are many reasons any type of dog would bite. So yes. Each person should stay. The other person could have been terrorizing the dog or rushed on it. Many dogs have ailments. So treating dogs with respect is a given. Never approach anyone else's dog
- It should be a requirement of responsible dog ownership.
- Trace and penalize nuisance owners
- I believe it would be easier to track a dog's track record. Makes the accountable for their dog's actions.
- I have been bitten by dogs before, quite badly. The animal bit me in error, and if the owner had not stayed, there might have been a discrepancy between the two versions of events. The dogs are rarely at fault, it is usually owners who do not raise and train their animals correctly.
- Too many incidents where the owner disappeared and not taking responsibility for their dog
- Too many people take off after their dogs attack another. It is not fair to the owner of the attacked dog to not get compensated
- The owners of both attacking dog, and attacked dog should both be required to stay and take ownership for their respective roles in the incident. Often, the dog that was attacked was also engaged in irresponsible ownership/behavior, but wound up the one with worse injuries
- This is a responsibility action. The owner has the responsibility to stick around and face the music as well as assisting with any information required by medical staff involved and animal enforcement officers.

- This helps to ensure that authorities will know what dog caused the bite and the owner can be held responsible.
- Need officers to get identification info
- Same rules as a car incident.
- The information regarding the dogs medical history and it's aggression history needs to be known. It's important to understand if the dog is struggling with anxiety or aggression, versus if the dog was very innocent and was provoked.
- An owner should take responsibility for its dog's behaviour.
- More information about the dog allows to determine if dog should be in public spaces etc.
- We've had our own pet injured on our property, while the other animal was roaming free, due our neighbours being irresponsible, complained to animal bylaw services, investigated, found the neighbours responsible for vet bills. Animal by law services pressed charges against them, went to court several times, no money was received, no charges were laid against the neighbour. At this time I've followed all of your rules to stop my neighbours cat roaming free, no charges have ever been laid against them. So cat owners know that animal bylaw services have no power, so once people of this city know that, they let their cats roam free knowing that the bylaws don't apply to them, which is same, that animal bylaw services are a joke, and everyone who owns a pet knows that especially those with cats, but those of us with a dog gets investigated immediately which is unfair to us. Regardless of what had been reported each should be taken seriously and made to follow the city bylaws for their pets.
- Dog owners need to be accountable for their lack of training for their dog.
- Same as traffic accident
- It's their responsibility to provide contact information and possible health/vaccination information on the dog.
- someone's dog should not be allowed to bite or attack anyone and the owners have no responsibility. Take ownership of yourbdogs behavior
- Obviously yes
- You should have to take responsibility for you dog. To me leaving the scene of a dog bite is the same as a hit and run, and it should be treated as such.
- There are always two sides to a story. I agree that both party's should stay on scene but away from each other and talk with enforcement.
- Only if safe.
- It is the OWNER that is responsible for a dog's behaviour, regardless of the breed. If the owner is not putting in the effort to train their dog, or is abusing them at home which leads to violence, the owner should be held responsible.
- The owner is responsible for the dog and must rectify any wrong doing to the best of their ability.
- I've been an owner of a dog who was attacked and severely harmed by a dog and the owner fled the scene, not long after this incident a community alert was sent out for the same dog as it had bitten an elderly lady. The community was looking for tips on where the dog and owner reside, had the rule above applied I feel that both incidents could have been prevented as my dog was not the first to be attacked by the same dog.

- Should not need a law for this. People need to own up.
- Should be like an accident.
- How is this any different than hitting someone else car with your car? You are damaging anothers belongings if an incident occurs and it is only the right thing to do to be a responsible owner and provide information.
- Unless both parties agree, I think there should be incident reports of dog bites etc. The trouble I see with this is what constitutes an incident where the owners need to be on scene ie. what is 'serious'
- I think this is essential for identify and recording dangerous incidents.
- Owners should always except responsibility of their dogs. But at the same time all stories should align.
- It is the responsibility of a pet owner to have control of their animal at all times and be responsible for their behaviour
- I believe that if any breed of dog bites someone or something else that the owner is responsible to ensure that person or subject is taken care of medically and/or legally. Same as if your kid bit a person or you hit a person.
- Sure, I'd want to know if the dog has been vaccinated.
- Yes, but only if it's safe. Perhaps they could leave information or immediately call 311 if it's safest to leave.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their dogs actions and keeping proper records ensures thats possible
- Absolutely. This is a serious incident.
- "It is the responsibility of pet owners to train and co trials our animals. This includes their fear based "aggressive" behavior.
- Owners needs to take responsibility of all aspects including bites."
- As long as it was an aggressive bite and not a playful one
- They should always share contact information.
- It would make sense that the owner has a chance to explain their side of the situation
- Always need to get both sides of you leave after an attack no matter the circumstances you look guilty
- If you have to stay for a car accident, you should have to do it for your dog(s) as well.
- The victim or victims owner needs to have access to the offenders vet records for safety
- This ensures all parties take responsibility.
- The dog owner needs to take responsibility for their pet
- Its similar to a car accident. So it should be similar charges if the person leaves. Bite and run!
- As someone who ones a Staffie if it was my dog you'd all be screaming for her to be taken away!! But if it's a small dog nothing happens

- Owners (of vicious dogs especially) whose dogs bite must be held to the same standards as drivers in motor vehicle incidents.
- Yes but at the same time it's probably not safe for the owner to remain there with their dog who may have just bite someone or A dog.
- So many people don't stay, they don't take responsibility, people should be held accountable for their dogs actions
- It's the responsible thing to do
- Accountability & responsible ownership. It doesnt matter the size of the dog or who was supposed to be in charge of said animal
- "If I get into a car crash should I remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with enforcement officer...?"
- The answer is yes! Should not be different for an animal attack."
- Absolutely the information needs to be exchanged or a "failure to remain on scene" should apply with a heavy fine (over$1000)
- My puppy has been bitten at the dog park and they just run away
- If severe enough to require medical attention for person/ animal bitten. Such as puncture wounds or other damage.
- This is common sense. Those involved in a serious incident should always remain on scene until an understanding is met of details given/taken.
- The responsibility should be similar to hitting a car and causing damage (ie: hit and run)
- A person should be expect to stay at the scene of the altercation, just like you are suppose to stay at the scene of a car accident, etc.
- Any owner of any dog breed should remain on scene if necessary.
- If necessary - if someone is upset or hurt then they will ask for an extra enforcer to be involved to help the situation. This may not work if someone is feeling guilty about making enforcement get involved, but it may lead to better animal control in public places if someone owns a biter or a dog who is not well trained.
- It's your property therefore your responsibility
- liability reasons
- Yes, I believe its the owner that's responsible for their pets behaviour and being able to effectively manage it it so bites don't happen
- There have been many stories of dog owners walking away with their dog to avoid responsibility.
- I believe this would allow for sides to be spoken for on both parties, however I think it is important to recognize that without visible proof of the situation, resolutions may still be difficult to come by.
- A dog that has been involved in an incident needs to be documented and investigated to determine if it is a nuisance. Fines can be a deterrent to stop owners from leaving the area to "protect" their dog and avoid other fines
- They deserve to explain their side of the story. Maybe the dog was being harassed
- Owners of dogs should be responsible for keeping their pets in control. The reason why people run and hide is because previously this was a death sentence for the dog even if the dog was defending themselves from a person who was abusing them (stranger kicks my dog, my dogs bites stranger, strange files complaint and my dog gets killed)

- The owner should be responsible for the dogs behaviour.
- As a dog owner you are agreeing to be responsible for something that can hurt others, just like when driving a car you should be responsible to stay at the scene of an incident and provide details and input.
- If another person or pet is injured statements should be made by both parties regarding the events before and after the bite. It should be responded to quickly so as many facts surrounding the circumstances of the bite are available for review.
- You can't just let your dog attack someone and walk away
- You have to be responsible for your own dog
- Seems like common decency toward a fellow human.
- Dog owners should be responsible for the actions of their dogs and seek assistance from professional trainers to prevent future incidents.
- This would prevent owners from fleeing the scene and not being held accountable.
- Same as a vehicle accident. People who don't remain at the scene get charged with hit and run don't they?
- Well if any human or animal party involved needed medical care, I don't think it's reasonable to expect them all to be present but I do think it should be mandatory to share contact info (but people can lie so not sure how to police this)
- Owner must accept responsibility for their dog's' behaviour.
- Absolutely!!!! Severe damage can occur from a dog bite or any kind of incident, and the OWNER is responsible for everything that dog does. However, there will be people take advantage and call Law Enforcement if a dog even growls at them (which is a dog's defence mechanism before they bite. Ie. Growling = back away)
- The need to explain thier side of what happened
- Unless they have to rush animals to a vet or a person to the hospital
- it is the owners responsibility to watch their dogs when in public areas or at dog parks. Responsible dog owners learn dog behaviour and understand how to read the cues. Unfortunately a lot of dog owners assume their dogs are fine when they're running off leash, it's been my experience that if a dog is communicating with a untrained dog and they take action it is the defending do that gets blamed. The responsibility should be on the owner to deal with the consequences.
- As lone as the dog does not need immediate veterinarian assistance, the owner should remain on scene.
- I believe an owner must take responsibility for any harm or damage inflicted by an animal in their care. It is unacceptable for such a person to leave a scene without providing information on how they can be contacted in case of lawsuits, medical issues, and simply to keep track of an animal that is demonstrated itself to be vicious.
- Owners need to be responsible for their dogs.

- There are always 2 sides to every story. It is beneficial to hear both and to know the dogs' history. Also too many people mis identify dog breeds.
- Bite definition would need to be very clear as any uncertainty in interpretation will be confrontational, especially when dogs playing or exhibiting communication but not aggression.
- It's no different then a car accident. I dog biting it MOST time's an accident. Therefor information of the owners should be shared, the owner of the bitten dog deserves to have vet bills covered but that the end!
- Yes, the owner should take responsibility and remain on the scene, UNLESS in an off leash area, where they should move to the nearest safe area so they aren't putting other dogs at risk.
- Take responsibility for the dogs actions
- Part Of responsible ownership
- Same as with a vehicle so it makes sense. The only reason someone wouldn't want this it likely because they don't want to be held responsible for it
- Any breed of type of dog owner needs to be responsible!
- It's their dog and they are therefore responsible for its actions. It's the same as hitting somebody with your car and leaving the scene of the crime; it's unacceptable. They need to pay for damages their dog caused to the other dog /person.
- Every pet owner needs to be responsible. Been bitten by a small dog off leash, the owner picked them up, told me I was fine, and ran...needed antibiotics after infection took place. City did nothing as was a small dog
- People need to be held responsible for the behavior of their pet.
- Only if it makes sense if the dog is upset it makes no sense for the owner to have to stay there waiting around the animal should be allowed to go to a safe environment to cool down
- A physical attack from an animal should be handled the same as a car accident. Additionally, the cause of the bite should not immediately fall on the animal. There can be instances where the victim of the bite provoked the attack.
- There responsible for training or lack of
- If you are involved in any kind of incident you should always stay at scene
- As long as the owner has the offending dog under control stay. If the owner has no control leave but must leave contact information for the officer
- It is responsible. People will be terrified that their family pet might be taken away but as responsible dog owners, it is important to learn from mistakes and seek help and guidance. It is also important for the person who was bit to learn how their actions might have called the problem.
- Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of there pets and held accountable to a reasonable degree
- If a dog bites another person or dog, the fault should be on the owner due to lack of training. Dogs aren't born vicious, there is a reason behind it and it most likely has to do with lack of training, trauma or neglect.
- I believe that the dog that bites a person/animal has a right to pay out any hospital/vet bills.

- any dog owner (regardless of it's size or breed) should be held accountable if their animal causes injury to another person
- It is the responsible thing to do
- There should be accountability if a dog bites another person or animal, and it should be taken into account whether the dog has had obedience training, vaccines, etc.
- I'm surprised this isn't already in place. Unless the dog is under duress and at danger of violating again, the owner should absolutely remain present.
- Not always possible as many times the owner is nowhere near the dog when an attack occurs.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for the damage their dog causes. Vet bills should not be left to the victim.
- This would enforce the need for the dog owner to take accountability and be responsible for damages caused by their dog.
- The owner is the problem, not the dog.
- background and history are key to understanding why a dog bites- many dogs are not aggressive per se, but become fear aggressive when scared or feeling threatened. Understanding circumstances (e.g., did the owner warn others nearby not to approach their dog, but someone did anyways? Was their dog responding to another dog being aggression and was trying to defend itself? Did the owner instigate it somehow? Does the owner know their dog is aggressive in certain circumstances, but failed to warn others verbally or by not having their dog wear a noticeable vest/label for others to know not to approach?) are important to making accurate judgment calls on potential dog bite incidents.
- Medical costs and responsibility - if my dog hurt someone or their pet i would feel horrible and would want to help any way i could. Im responsible for that pet and should be held liable. If someone hurt me or my pet id want them to stick around. Medical bills for pets are quite expensive and they should be held responsible financially if their pet hurts another or person.
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets and if someone is harmed, it should be illegal to leave the scene until a bylaw officer investigated. Much like hit and runs are illegal when involved in an auto accident.
- Yes, provided that a large dog or pit bull will not be immediately placed at fault if it was antagonized by another animal or a child ran up to it and approached without asking.
- It's no different than a car accident
- The only way they should be allowed to leave is if their contact info has been shared so they can be held accountable.
- correct identification of any suspected offending entity
- Same rules should apply here as they would a car accident. Leave the scene you should get charged for that. Officers should do thier job to the letter of the law without bias. Ppl leave because they are afraid to loose their dog immediately however that shouldn't be the case unless an unprovoked attack occurs in my opinion.
- It's about taking responsibility and ensuring that there is follow up for the incident
- Common sense, duh!

- Seems the responsible thing to do
- Too many people take off
- That goes with out saying. That is called responsible pet ownership.
- Any incident where harm is cause to another individual or animal should require the accused to remain at the scene. Similar to an impaired driving charge.
- Take responsibility
- But only to the degree that emergency transport to a vet or hospital is not required. Medical attention first. If injury the result of the dog bite, practitioners could notify City Bylaw if the offence. Should leave name and contact info if cannot remain on scene
- It makes sense. Car owners have to stay at the scene of an accident. Dog owners should too. But blame the owners, not the dog. Breeds don't matter.
- it's only fair to the owner of the dog being bit to have a way to report to 311 or get monetary compensation for vet bills.
- It's called responsible ownership.
- Easier to manage.
- Yes, as long as it is safe to do so. If the situation becomes hostile or if it will create more tension, sharing contact details with an officer via phone should suffice.
- It makes sense that the owners should exchange information in case a trip to the vet is required
- "If the situation allows. If the dog
- or persons involved need medical care, they should be allowed to leave and give a statement at the vet / doctor."
- It is the other party and the owners right/responsibility to share each side of the story regardless of what happened.
- It should be against the law for dog owners to leave the scene when their dog bites/attacks
- There needs to be accountability and exchange of details means an impartial party may be able to make that judgement if necessary
- "It's like a hit and run.
- They need to be there to tell their side of the story"
- They need to take responsibility for the situation.
- Unfortunately not all owners take responsibility for the actions of their pet. This should be mandatory as the owner should be held accountable for the actions of the animal. If an animal can not be controlled the owner shouldn't have them in a public setting.
- Owners must be responsible for their animals. They can not flee the scene of an incident
- This should happen.
- It's assault and the owner needs to stick around. Animals are like children and when an animal bites the "adult" needs to be around to be their voice
- how is it fair that if I get bit by someone's dog, or if my dog is attacked by another that I must now deal with everything cause that person was irresponsible?

- The dog assaulted the person or other animal. They need to stay and deal with the consequences.
- this is no different than if they were in an accident with a vehicle.
- This would allow for accountability of the dog owner and aid in determining the next steps.
- the owner with the offending dog should stay, especially if the other has been hurt.
- The owner should take responsibility for their animal.
- I assumed this was a rule already, but yes, I don't see why you shouldn't be held responsible for providing proper training if such an incident occurs
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their pets. It's the same way someone should stay and talk with an officer after a car accident.
- If they are not required to remain at the scene, how else would people be held accountable? Similar to vehicle accidents, those involved remain at the scene for officers to arrive. Otherwise it's a hit and run.
- Like any accident, that parties should be present to provide contact info
- It's common sense.
- It's the owners responsibility. It's mostly the owners fault for a dog that is aggressive, not the dog. There are more cases of Labs and Chihuahua bites than Pit Bull type breeds.
- Yes!
- It is the owners responsibility to take control of their dog and explain a situation. If the owner knows the dog might bite a person or another animal, it's the owners responsibility to control their dog or put on appreciate gear to control their dog (ie., muzzles, harnesses, etc.)
- Same logic as a car accident...the owner is responsible...but it needs to be the person in charge at the time of the incident who needs to stay
- That way the enforcement office gets both sides of the story. Instead If it being one side.
- It comes down to the owner understanding their dog and having to be educated on how to control their dog in the incident setting. If the best way to being their dog out without incident is training or muzzle, they need to be enforced and not up to the owners preference
- I think it should be agreed upon by the people involved in the incident. So if one party wants an enforcement officer then they need to stay. If they can resolve on their own then not necessary.
- Common sense and acting in a responsible fashion.
- the owner is ultimately responsible for their pet's behaviour
- 100% owners should be liable for their dogs.
- People who own a dog that can cause trauma to another dog or person should be liable and the best way to determine who is at fault is the scene of the crime
- That's the responsible thing to do
- This is imoortant
- It is a social responsibility to stay at the scene of an incident where your pet causes someone else harm.
- Only for bites that draw blood. If both parties agree not to call bylaw then they don't have to
- Dog owners of vicious pets should be held accountable for the actions of their pets.

- Should always give contact info for dog bites. If severe but should stay till officer arrives.
- Unless the human or animal is in danger. If the person bitten provoked the attack, they should have to take responsibility as well.
- No different than remaining at the scene of a traffic accident.
- I think owners should stay on the scene, most do not with fear they will lose their dog. There's more to an aggressive dog than just a bite, sometimes that's a one off and a dog isn't actually aggressive.
- I believe it is in the best interest of the victim if information is exchanged in case the damage is worse than originally thought
- It is the responsibility of the dog owner to handle the situation safely. If the dog needs to be removed from the situation then a quick relay of information is necessary for later proper assessment of what happened
- Any owner whose dog bites a person or dog should stay at the scene.
- It is like a hit and run offence. The owner shouldn't leave the scene of a crime.
- The owner should have to stay and exchange information
- Need to exchange info as the same as a vehicle accident
- This seems common sense to stay and help the victim and speak to officers. With the exception of if the dog cannot be controlled and immediately needs to leave the scene for the well-being of others.
- The owner is accountable to pay damages to the victim
- You must be responsible and accountable for your pets.
- I think it should be treated the same as a vehicular accident....contact info is exchanged, ect....
- Often times I have heard the owner of a dog in a bite situation runs away and has no responsibility whatsoever, leaving the victim the vet bill for their animal. The irresponsible dog owner should be held accountable.
- Well of course, vaccine history is extremely important to be able to give or get at this moment.
- It's sad that there has to be a law to ensure this, but it does seem to be necessary given some owner's behaviour
- Should pay for medical bills for animal
- Scene of an assault which could be causing serious bodily harm. Owner of dog is responsible for assault and therefore should be required to remain at scene and report incident to authorities
- The person responsible for the dog has to be responsible for their dog's actions
- Yes, but people should be assured that their case will not immediately result in euthanasia
- Everyone, no matter breed or severity of incident, needs to be held accountable for their dog's actions. If you can't be responsible enough to stick around when your dog is involved in an incident, you are not responsible enough to own a dog.
- Yes because it is necessary for the dog's well-being of the dog bites are serious enough. Medical bills is main reason.
- A responsible owner would stay.
- Similar to any automobile collisions causing injury.
- Either that or call in to report it themselves

- The dog owners must be punished not the dog.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- The owners need to take responsibility
- People lie about their contact information
- If there is no rule requiring the owner to remain at the scene of an incident, then the owner is absolved of responsibility and why should they stay? Also the owner may not want to share contact info and if there is no rule then they will not. The contact information is important because the owner may be liable.
- A parent is responsible for their child's actions. An owner should be responsible for their dog's actions. Dogs should be trained just as children should be trained to behave appropriately. People should not be leaving the scene of a car accident, dog owners should not leave the scene when their dog has bitten another person or animal. Otherwise, the owner could leave the scene, give a false name and phone number and could never be traced. The person or animal injured would be left with vet or medical bills. If a dog is trained properly to behave, then an owner need not be concerned with such incidents.
- The dog's misbehaviour and violent outburst is most likely due to negligence and failure to properly train/look after the dog by the owner.
- You need to have the health information from the dog.
- I work in the veterinary field. I have seen very sever dog fight injuries where the owner has left; and the victim is responsible for an incredibly high bill.
- I've had a dog attack my dog and because we only knew the dogs name nothing ever happened and the dog had proceeded to injury a few others as well
- Ultimately a dog owner is responsible for what their dog does and a dog is considered property. You can look at it similar to a hit and run - if your dog attacks someone and you do not stay on the scene you have caused bodily harm to someone and ran away to avoid consequences.
- Rarely has their been an incident at the Braeside off-leash park where I take my dogs however a dog did attack and bite a dog (not a pitbull - in fact the pitbull dogs at our park are friendly, well socialized and well behaved) and the owner of the aggressive dog took off and left the older lady to deal with her injured dog. I'm sure it will be hard to enforce but helpful if a rule.
- If my dog bites someone and they want law enforcement involved I should be held responsible to be there. My concern is that if my dognis agitated, I would need to get him to a safe space first, so maybe exchange information and follow up later?
- Accountability
- Irresponsible dog owners need to be held accountable and pay for any damages or vet bills of the attacked. Note that I have stated the owner be held accountable not the dog.
- The owner is responsible for the dog and should have to provide assistance and remain on scene in the same way it is required for traffic accidents. There should be penalties for "bite and run", including losing the right to own pets.

- Because it's the only way to assess the situation. Just like in a car accident all drivers have to stay and exchange information if necessary and/or wait for reinforcement, same should be with dog altercations.
- Much like a vehicle accident this should be a regulated incident as the pet owner.
- yes owners should take responsibility for the actions of their pets
- there is liability both civil and liability
- They are responsible for everything related to their pet especially if it causes harm
- Depending on the bite. If it is severe enough that someone needs to be contacted the owners should be responsible and exchange information, take pictures. If it doesn't warrant immediate medical or vet attention than I would leave this up to whoever is involved. Also, keeping a dog at a scene like this could increase its stress and lead to further reactions.
- The owner of the dog that caused infliction onto a person or animal needs to be held accountable especially if there are medical/vet bills that are to be incurred due to the incident.
- Take responsibility and take care of any medical and be forced to take dog training and report back
- Owners are responsible for their dogs of course they should have to stay at the scene of an attack on another person and deal with the consequences.
- Yes, dog owners need to take responsibility for poor training and subsequent behaviour problems.
- People need to take responsibility for their actions
- Just like motor vehicle accidents, an owner should remain on scene. What if they never turn up again?
- If an owner leaves the scene it should be treated as a hit and run vehicle accident would have been treated.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for what their dog has done.
- You meet to stay at the scene for a motor vehicle accident, assault etc. why not a dog bite incident
- "Victims shouldn't feel abandoned and left without information.
- However- if the dog is clearly in distress they shouldn't be waiting in public. Maybe in the car or at home after providing contact details."
- Have heard too many stories of of people or their animals being attacked & the owner of the dog attacking just walking away & facing no consequences. That should not be possible or happening.
- It is important for people to take responsibility for their animals actions. There could be substantial costs incurred by the animal for medical attention.
- They shouldn't leave the scene that's like a hit and run
- yes and there should be a fine for not staying at the scene.
- The owner holds more responsibility than the dog.
- If I end up with vet bills because another dog attacked it, I would expect they take responsibility. Having them stay at the scene would ensure this.
- So the responsible owners can pay for vet bills
- Responsible owners would do this and should do this.
- Sure

- Just the same as if you caused a traffic accident with your vehicle, the owner of a dog has the responsibility to stay and report the incident to a local enforcement officer.
- A dog's actions are often the responsibility of the owner's actions or inactions. Also, if they know they have to take responsibility they may make extra effort to avoid a potential dog issue.
- If a dog bites another dog or person the owner should be held responsible
- Because it's the right thing to do
- This is the responsible thing to do
- Every story has 3 sides
- Information exchange should take place - just like a car accident. But medical attention is likely required so understand that people will leave to tend to their animals.
- Responsible ownership
- Absolutely as with any accident or issue information should be exchanged
- Additionally, a fine if they leave.
- If someone is bitten and there is proof then the situation should be explained by both involved.
- This is purely BSL, you've singled out "pitbulls" for no reason. You should also KNOW YOUR FACTS. It is proven a "pitbull's" bite is no stronger than any other specific breed. Their bite force is 300lbs of pressure which IS LOWER THAN A GERMAN SHEPHERD. When will organizations wake up already. Also, "a dog that has an appearance and physical characteristics that are substantially similar to those of dogs referred to in any of clauses (a) to (d); ("pit-bull")" ARE YOU KIDDING ME. So it just has to have a big head or boxed body like a boxer and it's already dangerous? Sugar coat your words as much as you like this is just wrong.
- I believe that owners should be held responsible for any dog bite or aggressive behaviour caused by their pet. The only exception would be if no visible injuries are present.
- It's essentially not the dog's fault but the owner's lack of discipline
- It is an incident. The owner should take responsibility for their dog.
- Owners whose dogs bite other dogs and cause harm commonly leave the scene to avoid responsibility for the harm caused to the other dog.
- They need to be there to explain if their dog has had vaccinations and rabies shot, they should be present to see who they've affected by their dog's behaviour and be fined accordingly.
- It's the responsible thing to do. There can be Veterinary costs associated in certain situations and the Owner at a min should be held responsible.
- Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their animal
- People need to be held responsible for their pets.
- Owning a bully breed..I struggle with many other breeds and owners NOT respecting city parks that are NOT off leash and allowing their dogs to charge my mastiff. We have worked hard to be in control but will be blamed. You never hear lab or small dog attacks or charges bull breeds. The city NEEDS to be more responsive protecting those of us who do follow rules and train our dogs. I have yet to see a bylaw officer in my suburban SE neighbourhood. In 20 yrs on Calgary pathways, I have never seen bylaw or bylaw enforcing rules. I am saddened that I have rules for my breed but no one is standing up or following through on the many dogs and owners allowed to behave poorly.

Bandanas will only help if people know what they mean but now you are asking me to advertize my trained "reactive dog". While I will participate, what will the city do for me if a Yorkie charges my mastiff and due to size does harm? How does the city plan to balance the breed scales?? How will they plan to protect on leash areas not being used incorrectly causing harm..because there is not enough signs posted and who cares..except I do when that lab is coming straight at me and my dog. Upping fines is great..who is gonna enforce this. People will not wait for an hour for bylaw to respond.

- This just makes sense
- I support the requirement to share info but if medical attention is needed staying at scene might not be realistic.
- This one should be common sense.
- The officer can see the owner and the animal for himself shortly after the incident AND the person can't just leave and potentially never be contacted if the incident caused injury or damage. The person with the offending animal shouldn't have an easy out by just leaving and not giving personal information.
- As a responsible dog owner, that should be an obvious response.
- That's responsible pet ownership and being a decent human being. It is law to remain at the scene of an accident and I think it's reasonable to expect the same in this instant.
- any animal that bite a human or another Animal their owner should of course stay .
- This holds the owner accountable. More often than not, attacks happen when owners are not careful with this breeds
- Your dog just assaulted another human. Take accountability. It's like getting in an accident and taking off and ultimately the dog learns that behaviour is okay
- If your animal attacks someone or something you should be liable for the damage
- The victim of the attack may need follow up information (ie vaccine status), or financial support for veterinary bills and should be able to be in contact with the dog owner if needed.
- If an enforcement officer is not readily available, police must make themselves available with out undue delay.
- This would promote accountability and provide victims of biting a legal standing to request contact information for follow up.
- The owner needs to be held responsible for the attacks. Animals behave on what they are taught. The owner is directly responsible for this.
- Hold owners accountable hands down
- Once a person leaves the location where a dog bit a person or other animal they could disappear and never be found
- We have to have accountability and recourse
- All sides should be heard.
- Because it's the right thing to do.
- Same as every other incident (ex. Hit and run). Need to stay on scene

- if owner is on hand can get information regarding status of shots to the animal (such as rabies vaccination)
- yes, because Pitbulls are not the only umbrella breed that bite or attack people, [removed].
- It should be treated as a road accident or any other incident. If you hit someone with your car, you wait for proper authorities. Having your dog accidentally injure someone is the same thing.
- most take off and then its hard to locate thw owner for vaccine records
- Common decency would dictate this is an approach behaviour.
- That's good in theory but I can see owners leaving especially if there is no way that the owner can be identified. It happens now so I can't see that changing even with a rule. The only way it could possibly work is that a fine would have to be paid by the owner if that owner was caught.
- Leaving is similar to a hit and run, and very hard to find the dog and owner after
- Well it's basically assault. But I do not agree with deeming certain breeds more dangerous
- Responsible pet ownership needs to be enforced
- Information is critical.
- Any bite should be properly investigated and documented.
- Owners should be held accountable for the training and behaviour of their dogs. Running for an incident is comparable to a hit and run.
- If the dog bit another animal or human out of aggression, or if the accident was severe then yes. However, some dogs give warnings to humans or other animals that are ignored which can lead them to further defenses like bites, in this instance if the bite is not severe than it should not be mandatory. Severe meaning needing medical attention like stitches.
- They shouldn't be scared their dog is going to get euthanized, and I think that needs to be made clear
- I think both parties should stay. I also think that whether the dog that was injured was in compliance with bylaws is important. Eg. If they were off leash and not under control (bothering the other dog) and the owner was unable to contain their dog, then the dog gets bitten, that should also be penalized.
- In case the dog owner tries to run away. There should be a way to safely do this without the dog being more stressed out and causing more incidences.
- It's important to get both sides of the story.
- Owners have to be held responsible. There are not bad dogs only bad owners. Better screening process to breed and own a dog.
- As a dog owner you are responsible for your dog and it's actions, including if they bite a person or an animal. You should need to stay, provide contact information and speak to an enforcement officer if they are able to come within a reasonable time frame (I.e. 30 minutes)
- The people need to be properly identified and so does the animal.
- Just like any other accident, people should stay and take responsibility for their part.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their pet and ensure the injured party has the care they need.

- The dog owner should be held accountable just as they would be if they were the cause of any other kind of injury.
- Dog owner should be held responsible to pay for vet bills and provide contact information to victims.
- Stop penalizing pit bulls and their owners because of their "strong bite" my Staffordshire bull terrier is an absolute wimp. We are responsible dog owners, he's had obedience training and we have pet insurance which includes liability. I'm so [removed] mad at you guys for penalizing this breed. How [removed] dare you, chihuahua's bite more.... penalise their owners, my husband and I already work [removed] hard, pay taxes, worked through covid and now you want us to pay more, just because we own a "pit bull" [removed] off...it's a cash grab. You should be absolutely ashamed of yourself. If ANY dog bites and is deemed as dangerous, you should be penalizing the owner at that point not discriminating against a generic breed. My dog has never been muzzled at all and never needed to be, if he goes to park (assuming you dont ban him first) be he gets attacked by a husky dog (also a big powerful dog) he can't defend himself...then what? It's [removed]...are you gonna ban all white people from the parks now too? How [removed] dare you suggest this.
- It should be treated the same if another person bites someone
- I agree with this as this will allow for easier exchange of information and gathering of information for whatever follows
- If a dog bites anyone or another animal it should be treated as something serious. And should be looked into. Not just for people's safety by must for our animals safety and well being as well. It could also help identify dogs that are not being trained properly. Improper dog ownership can lead to the dog being euthanized because if the pet owners irresponsibility
- Same as a hit and run. You don't leave the scene.
- Simply put you are leaving the scene of an assault on a person. You should have to stay put or exchange contact info.
- Same as a car accident can not bite and run
- The owner of the dog needs to be held responsible. It's about the training from the owner not the dog specifically
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets. Just as you should remain at the scene of an auto accident
- "Each story has 2 sides
- If another dog attacks mine and then my dog defend itself how can you blame my dog"
- "Because we need to hear both sides of each party to determine why the dog would bite in the first place.
- Also, if there is any life threatening injuries that would be at the cost of the party at fault."
- Too many times dogs are off leash and the incident happens without the owner being close enough or denying the incident. Owners need to take responsibility.
- If you can't control your animal and it bites you should take responsibility
- Only if it's a bad attack. In the same breath if they just exchange information it should be good enough.

- ANY dog that bites another animal/person needs to be held accountable through the owner. Regardless of breed/size.
- it called being responsible .
- The resulting vet costs for the injured dog can be significant and the owner of the attacking dog may need to hold some responsibility or be questioned.
- Dog bites that result in puncture wounds should require follow up from a medical perspective, vet bill contributions and Rabies holds (in owners homes requiring vet check in 10days post bite)
- I was bitten by a dog once n when I confronted the owner, he was very rude n didn't care. When I told him that I will call the authority, he said "go ahead " n then drove away. There has to be stricter rules that dog owners have to follow.
- "It depends on the situation
- If the dog was approached by a stranger when it bit, it falls on the person approaching the dog, NOT the animal"
- For identity reasons
- The dog's owner should be held responsible for these kinds incidents
- In theory as long as the animals can be separated and calm - but depending on the situation it may be too hard keeping everyone there with upset animalsy
- But only if it puts no others or the dog at risk or in a stressful position. Owner should be able to take the stressed dog home if necessary as long as contact information is left.
- If this situation did take place, it is the responsibility of the owner to ensure the situation is dealt with properly. Leaving the scene will only cause more questions and no answers. Always good to have both sides of the story and as much information about the animal such as shots and possible infections for everyone's concerns.
- Unless the owner of the dog who had been bitten doesn't want to speak with an officer
- I think there would need to be a level of severity. If there are no injuries I would be be concerned about someone trying to hold me to this rule and it could cause unnecessary lawsuits and be a violation of basic rights.
- Make sure everyone is safe and vet bills are paid
- Should be responsible for vet/doctor bills
- People with dogs that bite should be held accountable and should be responsible for any damages caused.
- Owners should take responsibility for the actions of their animals.
- You cant leave the scene of an accident
- I believe information needs to be exchanged but forcing dogs just in an altercation to remain close is not a good idea.
- Absolutely! Too many times have I heard of dog bites and attacks on other dogs where the owner just vanished and never faced fines or even vet or medical bills resulting from it. It should not just be a rule but law to remain at the scene, share contact information and talk to an officer!
- Yes there should be a law in place that they have to stay and supply Information. Something similar to fleeing a scene should be in place.

- I don't agree with this idea because I am unsure how these people would be chosen for this job. A lot of people are not open or fair minded about animals breeds and animal care. For example, people that would be appointed for this job may be against bully breeds, therefore they would be more strict on bully breeds rather than others if they were to bite someone. All dogs should be given the same treatment when in this situation. We don't discriminate in our legal system based on someone's race or where they are from, dogs should be treated the same.
- Animal/ owner should be held accountable for both pets actions and their own.
- As long as the victim party wants to pursue this route.
- If the bite is severe and/or to a child. The owner should be held responsible. Any bite is a result of a poor owner. However, dogs play and sometimes play rough. I think bite needs to be better defined.
- There are 2 sides to every story, and the consequences to both parties need to be fair.
- I do believe if there is an incident. All parties should remain to report and provide info
- vet bills are very expensive and someone shouldn't have to foot the bill for other people's mistakes.
- This just seems like common sense. You don't leave the scene of an accident involving vehicles. How is this different?
- like a car, as an owner/operator of an animal you are responsible to act in the best interest of the injured party
- The owner should be held responsible for not properly handling and training their dog
- My dog has been bitten by off leash dogs in our community and there is no accountability for owners who are not keeping their dogs under control or in their yards
- Only way to document history and behaviour of the pet and the owner
- It should be treated like a car accident. Fleeing the scene isn't allowed.
- Owners are responsible for the public behaviour of their animals and must be held accountable.
- Too many dog owners just walk away leaving health care costs to the victim
- Many bites big OR small should be addressed. As an owner of a dog, pitbull to be exact, and having my dog attacked at the park and having puncture wounds I wish I was able to call someone to report the incident or request owners info. I would have liked to see some kind of discipline placed on the OWNER, not dog. Like a fine and warning.
- Bites can be severe and should be treated at the dog owners expense. Only for bites, not knock downs (without serious injury) and noise.
- Often, at the dog park for example a dog will attack another and the owner will leave, and ultimately leave the attacked dogs owner with a large vet bill and trauma to deal with, when it should be the attacking dogs owner responsibility.
- Because you're awful if you don't.
- Any decent person would stay unless it's some [removed] who asked for the bite
- If I'm in a car and I get in an accident, I'm required to stay at the scene and file a report. If someone has been irresponsible with their dog and as a result it has attacked another animal or person, the rule should be the same. It's about being responsible for your animal.
- yes
- Responsible owners will do this anyway.

- All information should be reviewed during an incident in order to let all parties reach a satisfactory conclusion efficiently.
- Yes. I think they should remain there and if they don't it would be similar to an offence like a hit and run on a person. Obviously not as extreme but something similar and if they don't stay then a fine or something would be issues.
- If an owner leaves then they should be charged the same as leaving the scene of a car/pedestrian accident.
- It is appropriate for the owner to take accountability for what occurred
- I'd support this if the bite was aggressive. I've seen dogs get impaled by teeth while playing, clearly an accident, but sometimes it happens. No one's fault and a risk of dogs playing.
- Why does this even require an explanation.
- This is responsible and courteous. The other measures are way out of line and restrictive and preemptive. If an incident should occur, yes of course the owner should stay on scene and provide contact information.
- Similar to an accident, full damage isn't known right away.
- Owners should be required to provide their contact information at the scene. Both parties should be required to do so. All things would be as equal as possible if it started out this way.
- Same as hit and run. Can't leave the scene of a crime
- Of course, they shouldn't be able to leave the scene of the crime
- I have been through this having my dog badly bitten resulting in surgery and I do not think it is fair for those nuisance dogs (a pitbull) to be able to get away with whatever they please because owners can't own up to what happened.
- It makes sense and is the right and courteous thing to do to stay at the scene to possibly be held accountable
- Owners should be accountable for their animals behaviour. Owner could have information that is needed for the human or animal.
- There has been situations where the dogs bit a smaller animal and the owners left.
- Dog owners must take responsibility
- Yes, the owner needs to take responsibility of their dog at all times
- Responsible pet ownership means taking full responsibility for incidents. Having a third party to take both sides of the story could help with problem solving - this would also ensure that incidents could be recorded for data use.
- Need to be held responsible
- Seems obvious
- Dog bite injuries can get expensive, the owner of the dog that bites needs to be held accountable.
- Like in a car accident or any other accident, a person involved or at fault is to remain at the scene. This should apply here unless veterinary care for a suffering animal is required and thus the obligation is on the owner to report and the vet to report so the situation can be resolved.
- it's similar to getting into a car accident, information should always be exchanged (of course with the premise that neither party can harass the other). Especially if the person and or dog ends up dying from the attack, the owner shouldn't be allowed to keep that dog (especially for repeat offences). the dog should go to someone else who knows and understands how to train/control the breed.

- This is basic common sense.
- It should be up to a professional trainer whether a dogs behaviour can be corrected. A lot of these problems are down to owners who need to be explored more than the dog. Mandatory inspection and training would be a better solution.
- Yes that's fair
- Owner identification and dog history can be obtained.
- just like any accident... YOU are responsible. Wait at the scene.
- Yes, the owner should be held responsible for the dog's actions
- owners need to accept responsibility for the actions of their dogs
- Just like a hit and run accident, the owner of the dog who has bitten shows a lack of responsibility by leaving the scene. If they stay and be responsible that should be taken into account at the tribunal. I prefer to only see Euthanasia as a very last resort.
- because like with any other incident, you need to stay behind to give your information and speak with an officer.
- the owner of the offending dog (and the dog) needs to be afforded some protection from retaliation while waiting. Information on what do do in the event of a dog attack (or SERIOUS dog fight), should be provided with licensing info. Or owners can exchange information like a traffic accident.
- "Absolutely.
- Any dog's owner that bites a person or another dog should be held responsible and ensure that vaccination record are made available to the family and to anyone involved. Same as a car accident."
- dog owners need to be accountable when there animal bites. The owner should stay at the scene and if they leave it should be seems as leaving the scene of an accident.
- Not remaining on the scene is completely irresponsible.
- owners are responsible for their pet's actions and need to remain on the scene to take responsibility
- Absolutely! This is common sense no different than a car accident.
- The owner should remain at the scene to explain the dogs side of what happened.
- People need to be responsible for their pets.
- I agree that the owner needs to give information after a bit, however I do not agree with having to wait for an enforcement officer
- If a dog bites another person there should be a significant fine for failing to remain at the scene
- Sure
- I hope fines would apply for those that leave the scene, unless needed to in order to obtain medical attention (human or animal)
- Owner should be responsible for there animals and is not on breed pacific
- The owner should 100% be responsible and pay for any vet bills incurred by the attack. You should never leave then scene without providing your information etc.

- As the owner you are liable for what your dog does just like you would be liable for your 7 year old kid punching another kid in the face
- A lot of people try and run away with their dogs when they bite. They should be held accountable
- Like a car accident. No one wants to have a hit and run. Just as it would seem unethical to let a dog that bites and the owner run off.
- I can't believe this isn't a bylaw?
- Those with a nuisance dog must be held accountable. I own American Bully's, and have never had an incident where my dog was in the wrong. But have had plenty of other dogs stir issues up with my dogs.
- I'm not quite sure what there is to explain? Good pet owners should take responsibility for their pets.
- It is important for animal owners to take responsibility for their pets and their actions, and also to defend themselves against wrongful accusations by other pet owners, regardless of size or breed.
- Responsibility and accountability must be fully enforced as it is an injury regardless of severity.
- Yes. As it is the persons fault as they are responsible for their animals
- Owners has to be responsible for training and bringing their pets out.
- To improve accountability
- dog bites arise in many different scenarios, this will help accountability
- It allows for both sides of the story to be heard. There are often times a dog bites another dog after repeatedly being provoked which is valuable information to know.
- It can be difficult to identify dogs involved in these incidents if the owners leave. Then they may be involved in multiple incidents before being identified.
- Yes... provided there is a way to remove the dangerous dog from the scene. People need to be held accountable if their dog bites or attacks someone or another animal. (Other than hunting dogs killing wild, legal prey)
- absolutely. However, if it is safest to remove the biting dog from the situation to avoid further problems, I think owners should be allowed to trade diver licence info and follow up through home insurance if necessary.
- So someone can be responsible for the incident
- You are responsible for your pets behaviour.
- They need to take responsibility for their dogs actions
- It is the same as fleeing the scene of a crime, in my eyes.
- We need more information about what happened and not just assume if a pit bull was involved it's their fault.
- People need to take responsibility for their animals.
- If you leave the scene of an accident it is breaking a law, why would a dog attack resulting in injury be any different
- If your dog bites, you need to take ownership
- It's like a hit and run...you remain at the scene until it is resolved

- We have to do this for other crimes or accidents . It will also help know if the injured person needs to go get a rabies shot. the only exemption to this would be if they had to get the dog out of the area for the safety of others
- When my dog was bitten the owner of just runaway
- Just like a car accident
- Absolutely. Information should always be shared due to vet bills and any concerns relating to the health of either dog.
- Of course they should! Their dog was responsible for the attack, it's like leaving the scene of an accident...
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their dogs and stay on site to resolve the issue and take measures to prevent another incident.
- Remaining at the scene is the responsible thing to do. however, if someone is willing to exchange info then that is a show of good faith
- Accidents can happen but an owner needs to do the responsible thing and remain onsite so it is dealt with. If their dog is still being aggressive and they need to remove it from the situation they must provide valid contact information.
- I believe the offending dogs owners should be responsible for the fees incurred from the bite, if veterinary care is needed and information on if the affending dog is vaccinated.
- if they do not stay, irresponsible owner. Therefore, untrained dog.
- I believe it should be treated as a car accident-must remain at the scene or it's considered same as hit and run
- I'm not sure why they would leave in the first place...
- Owners should be held responsible if their dog bites a human or another animal.
- OWNERS NEED TO BE HELD ACCOUNTABLE FOR THE ACTIONS OF THEIR ANIMALS NOT THE DAMN ANIMAL REGARDLESS OF SIZE! THEY ARE THE ONES LACKING RESPONSIBILITY!
- it would assist in fines/charges being made and allow dangerous animals to be documented more easily
- If a dog bites unprovoked there may be costs occurred by owner that should be the responsibility of the dog the issued the bite. Also if it is reoccurring other actions may be needed to be take
- Treat it like a hit and run if they do not remain at the scene. But will an officer show in time?
- Like any accident, the owner should be present to speak to enforcement.
- As a responsible pet owner you should be required to stay at the scene and share contact information in the event that your dog as inflicted damage to another dog or person, I would expect to be contacted to pay for any vet bills relating to the incident. I think it is valid to speak with an enforcement officer to get all sides of what happened - it could be a situation where someone is lying about how the incident happened.
- People must be responsible for the behavior of their dog pets. If their dog creates a problem, the owner must deal with any consequences.

- This is the most responsible thing to do! If the dog owner who bit my dog last year stayed put my situation at the dog park could be resolved better
- Similar to rules requiring you to stay on the scene if you're involved in a car accident.
- They should also be required to pay medical: vet bills.
- It is important to be responsible for your animal. It is also important that accurate information be recorded, and any medical (or vaccination) matters be addressed. I believe more education is needed, however, as many people believe that any bite means euthanasia.
- I didnt know people would leave!?!?
- Responsible dog owners would want to remain at the scene, irresponsible dog owners (who should be prosecuted) would not
- This should be a given! Your pet has injured someone. Same as if you are involved in an accident.
- They need to be held accountable and acknowledge something went wrong.
- My dog was bitten at an off-leash park and the other dog's owner did not provide any contact information (nor seem to care her dog was vicious PS was not a pit breed) so I was not able to follow up with her about vet bill for broken skin wound. My dog has a scar and we are fearful to return to that park.
- Pet owners need to be accountable for there pets actions.
- They should be responsible for any vet or medical bills
- Should stay to not only be accountable but also have an opportunity to tell their side of the story (eg if dog was provoked)
- The owner can provide information on the dog, is it up to date on vaccines, provoked? Owner should be responsible for costs if damages
- The owner must bear the responsibility for consequences.
- In many cases the person and dog leave before necessary information can be gathered.
- I think it is akin to a car accident. Someone was injured, you are responsible as it's your pet. You should remain there.
- Do not bully bully breeds
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets.
- Owners must be held responsible for their dogs behaviour
- "As long as Contact information is exchanged then they can part
- Ways."
- They have an accountability to stay
- A person should always be responsible for their dog.
- Owners need to know that they will consistently be held fully accountable and liable for any harm done by their dogs.
- I believe information needs to be shared in the occurance of a bite. I don't believe enforcement officers are required on all these calls, so as long as the victim is satisfied with receiving the appropriate information, this should be acceptable.

- It's basic owner responsibility. You're required to not leave a scene of an accident, same idea should apply here.
- Be an adult, as a dog owner I would never run away!!
- Too often owners don't stay. This new bylaw might not improve that, but will add an extra penalty onto delinquent owners.
- Owners need to take responsibility of their dog and should have a chance to explain themselves.
- If the dog bites it is more than likely not the dog's fault, it is the owner's fault for not going to training or putting their dog on leash or a muzzle. This is why we need muzzle laws not breed specific legislation that has been proven by endless universities and animal welfare charities to be detrimental to pet welfare
- Abusive owners would likely want to cover their tracks and not be held accountable for animal abuse. I really question the role of an "enforcement officer" however, and would like to see there be stricter animal bylaw services in place for abusive pet ownership.
- Yes and no. If you are endanger and the dog bites somebody then obviously leave. But yes, it is important to hear the whole story, and take appropriate actions.
- Owner should be responsible for any damages to person or pet
- It's just like exchanging information at an accident site
- As a dog owner, I would want to both have accountability for other dog owners being required to stay while the issue is settled, as well as accountability on behalf of other dog owners should my dog bite.
- people get away with their dogs biting people too often!
- A responsible owner, should and would remain, unless one or both dogs/animals required immediate veterinary care, and then i believe the owner(s) should be able to do that and have the enforcement officer meet the parties there.
- So that the owner can explain what happened and not be railroaded because if the breed
- With the exception of unwanted attendance on private property or provocation on private property.
- If the bite draws blood and if the victim (person) or another animals owner requests it.
- There are a lot of dog attacks that the owner leaves with dog and needs to be in contact to deal with the issue
- this is like s hit and run, so many people take off. Owners should be held liable for fleeing. The victim should not be held liable for damages another dog has done.
- my dog has been attacked at off leash and required stitches. owner left so her dog could not be identified, take responsibility, and I did not know if shots were up to date.
- If another dog harms my dog, the other dogs owner should be responsible for vet bills.
- It's common sense
- Collect info re rabies shots, history, analyse event. Eg was the dog being harassed by a child, did the dog attack with no warning.....
- Of course this needs to be a "rule", I'm surprised that this is even a question. It's common decency and people need to take responsibility for their pets' behaviour, including when they bite.
- The dog owner is responsible to control the dog and its actions.

- The responsibility is with the HUMAN not the dog/animal. When taking on the ownership of the dog people need to be educated on the whole spectrum of dog ownership.
- More accountability for bad dog parenting
- Holds people accountable
- It is good to look at both sides of a situation. Sometimes the dog may have been provoked by the person being bitten. For example, a child poking the dog in the eye with a stick, or pulling it's tail extremely hard causing severe pain to the dog. In which case the dog had the right to defend itself. The child's parent should be handed a fine and not the dog owner.
- there are always 2 sides to a story and i believe both sides should be heard in full but a lot of people leave the scene, leaving the other person with questions and often a vet bill
- Responsible pet ownership would be part of this.
- I am shocked that no such rule exists!
- Its the responsible thing to do. Its also accountability.
- they need to be held accountable!
- Without speaking with the owner there is no way to know if a dog has been vaccinated etc. Owners should be responsible for any damage/injury caused by their animals.
- it should be just like if you get into a car accident. You have to exchange information and then decide from there what to do. If damage is severe enough then the choice is made for you, you have to wait for bylaw/police.
- The owner needs to be there to take responsibility for their dog.
- How else can the victim pursue a complaint?
- You must be responsible for your animals behaviour
- The dog should remain at the scene unless required to seek medical treatment.
- They should stay and be held accountable.
- Many times the owner will flee and the opportunity to grab info in the spur of the moment evades the victim. Should be dealt with in the same way as a hit and run offender.
- I think anyone who leaves the scene where their dog has bitten someone needs to stay, render assistance and wait for authorities. If they need to remove the dog from the scene, they should be obliged to provide identification to witnesses.
- Too many people leave the scene leaving the victim no voice
- As an owner you should stay with your pet and provide information.
- I feel like it is important to stay at the scene to make sure proper information is shared to ensure owners are held responsible
- Animals are a liability, very much like a vehicle. You don't hit someone and get to leave the scene of an accident. It's imperative to act responsibly, and take ownership because if not, it makes the DOG look bad.... which is wrong.
- Unless there is an emergency
- Being able to contact someone to help cover veterinary bills after an incident can be beneficial to the injured party

- If your dog bites someone, you need to stay and give info, not just run off and get away with it.
- Staying to share information just seems like common sense. People need to know the dogs health/shots etc
- They need to be held responsible
- simple courtesy, if your dog bites another human being weither it is your fault or theirs it should be reviewed by a third party so that either the owner/dog or person who was bitten can be punished accordingly
- It should be treated the same as a car accident, where owners of vehicles have to stay to explain what happened/trade insurance etc.
- I think responsibility should be taken if a dog is attacking a person or there pet. Make sure party is ok and has been followed up with.
- 100% too many run, and owners are left with costly vet bills. And that offending dog is a risk of biting again. This also helps clear up disputes if a dog bit in self defence or to get a dog off it causing it pain. Bystanders knowing you can't leave the scene, like a car accident, would be more willing to stick around to provide witness testimony. A dog bite is NEVER a black and white clear cut case. And a bite does not necessarily mean it's aggressive or at risk to others, depending on the circumstances. Having cameras set up at dog parks that can have footage pulled by request could help mitigate a lot of these issues.
- It's the responsible thing to do if there has been an injury to a person or other animal. That said your pitbull questions are hugely problematic and offensive. You need to restart this survey. I have been proud that Calgary has not gone down the path to breed discrimination like other places and this is very disappointing.
- I believe that part of being a responsible pet owner is taking responsibility for the actions of your animals. By requiring people to take this responsibility, hopefully we can encourage the pet owner to acknowledge the issue, and work with law enforcement and the public to make their community safer.
- This is common sense
- There have been many times another dog has attacked my dog and other dogs in parks and the owners just leave right away with no info given. It should be treated like a car accident. You should have to exchange info.
- If there are medical bills to be paid due to injury than yes. I don't think, the biting pet should be taken away as people are part of the problem
- It may be more dangerous for the owner to remain at the scene with the animal
- Need to know if animal is up-to-date on shots.
- The owner is liable and it is just the right thing to do! It is like a hit and run if they leave
- They need to be held accountable and be offered the required resources to help manage their dog. They need to be monitored to ensure they are being the best owner they can be to their dog so incedents don't happen again.
- That person should be responsible for the action of their dog

- It shows responsibility of the OWNER and how the owner reacts to being under scrutiny and if they should even keep the dog.
- Such a requirement enhances dog owner accountability; increases efficiency for the city and victims; and facilitates the subsequent process.
- Yes is pretty clear.
- It is part of being a responsible dog owner and information should be exchanged if your dog harms someone or another animal.
- Only if it is safe to do so and the dogs can be calmed down.
- Bites should be reported, in order to watch for patterns of bad behaviour
- People must take responsibility for their dogs.
- I think it's like an accident causing significant damage, either incident should require the person to stay and give information.
- They should be held responsible for damages
- It is an owners responsibility to have their dog under control and like with a car accident there should be an expectation that the owner either remain at the scene of provide contact information.
- Some responsibility needs to be had for out of control dogs that bite people and injury other dogs/animals.
- I think whatever is safer for the animal to calm down
- Information needs to be exchanged to resolve vet bills, fault, etc
- Dog owner should be held liable for costs incurred from injury, including loss of work, counselling etc
- That's makes sense.
- I have seen multiple times people either having their dogs get in a fight and run away, or have their dog antagonize another dog, get into a fight and threaten to call bylaw. Having them forced to stay would be a help.
- Accountability is an important part of dog ownership, but both sides need to be accounted for, like a car accident. Authorities should look into the events leading up to the bite, not just that the dog bit.
- This is a good idea but only if the injury is severe, something that breaks skin. It's just too unreasonable. Some people will claim anything as a nuisance.
- Be responsible as well as pay vet bill
- Is this not common sense already? No different than a car accident.
- U investigate animal bite for rabies and many owners flee the scene or refuse to provide the information.
- The owner should have the chance to also explain and be offered advice on training classes
- Drivers of a car must remain on scene and share info. Owners of dogs are responsible for that dog.
- Your dog is your responsibility, if your dog injured another person and or animal, it's your responsibly to ensure it is handled properly. This would be like doing a hit and run with a car if you did not remain on scene.

- I feel like it's the same as a car crash. You should have to stay so someone is held accountable. People run off with no recourse on their actions and once they leave the scene no way to prove what happened
- I have had dogs bite and people don't care what their dogs have done. I have been bite and people think it is okay cuz there dog is small. People need to take ownership for their dogs. So many dogs are surrendered as people cannot afford vet bill after their dogs are attacked. Or why should people have to put up with a dog that bites and the owner get away with it. This escalates attacks if owners allow it to happen over and over due to lack of recourse. enforcement might be hard
- Too many times, the owner of a nuisance dog will brush the incident off - ESPECIALLY if the dog involved is a small breed (Yorkie, Pomeranian, etc). Most times the incident is not reported properly with consequences to the owner. Regardless of the breed, if they bite it's a problem!
- People let their dogs attack others and especially other dogs and are never dealt with. A friend's dog was attacked and the owner specifically said it was the third time, and then she gave a fake number and ran off. My friend almost had to put her dog down and was on the hook for a huge bill. Ridiculous.
- To hold owners accountable.
- Any incident where property is damaged, car accidents, etc. The owner is required to remain on scene, this should include dog incidents
- It is an owner's responsibility.
- The owner must account for the dog's behavior - owning a dog is a responsibility & owners need to be held responsible.
- Yes, to keep a clear record and accountability.
- Leaving the scene is trying to not take responsibility
- Take responsibility for your animal's actions.
- The owner needs to be responsible
- I believe this is important for legal reasons
- ...because it's a good idea ...
- If the dog owner remains, they can be asked to produce vaccination records (within a reasonable amount of time)
- YES!!! Oh my gosh the amount of times they just leave is absurd. If you get into an accident you are not supposed to leave the scene of a crime. This is a crime / do not leave. He said she said is less relevant when someone has an injury but having both witnesses is important
- There is important information required when a dog bites such as vaccine history.
- They should at least exchange information in the event the bite resulted in more damage than expected
- I don't think staying at the scene is imperative but exchange of information should be required so that the owner of the offending dog can pay vet bills and the dog brought to the attention of authorities as a possible problem dog.
- If it is safe to do so they should stay. They may need to get the dog away so they may have to leave.
- If a dog bites someone, the owner is responsible to deal with it, so they should stick around.

- Of course. Owner responsibility.
- Owners should be a part of the process
- Owners need to present to be held accountable
- It's important to create records and document dog bites for everyone's safety
- The person who had the dog attack should remain at scene and if not be charged with fleeing scene of incident
- It has to happen due to the potential for the offending dog to have infectious diseases, or lack of licensing or registration.
- They should also bear the responsibility of any medical attention needed for a person or animal harmed by their pet.
- responsible pet ownership = owner needs to be accountable.
- How else will you find the dog or owner-accountability!!!
- I don't know how you would enforce it however!!
- Many dogs get attacked and are left with the bills when the other party flees
- As the caregivers and owners of our dogs, we are responsible for their behavior. And bites always have an escalation sometimes it's not the owner or dogs sole responsibility.
- "You
- Should not be able to leave the scene if your pet injures someone"
- Many owners of dogs that have bitten another dog leave the scene without exchanging information or accepting responsibility for the dog's behavior
- Too many dog owners leave the scene of a confrontation or bite/attack without even acknowledging it. We need them to be held accountable for their animals actions.
- Remaining at the scene is just about taking responsibility.
- People should not be allowed to run away from their responsibilities. If their dog bites a person or animal they need to make sure that the injured party receives the care that they need, and that they pay any applicable fines.
- It's important to get info on rabies vaccination or not.
- In my opinion an incident involving a dog bite is similar in nature to a car accident. The owner of the offending dog needs to be held accountable for the actions of themselves and their dog. If any medical or vet bills result from the incident there should be a reliable way to ensure proper information is gathered. If an owner is unwilling to accept responsibility for the actions of their dog then they should not be pet owners.
- If you get in a car accident do you leave the scene? Same rules should apply to the dog owner!!
- To exchange information for possible compensation and identification of the animals
- Or leave their contact information. As the owner may have to leave with the dog
- They must show responsibility and pay if there were any damages.
- We are liable for our dogs and sharing our information should be an act of a responsible owner. Accidents happen, but a lot of bites go unreported until they are more serious. Raising the bar in regards to expectations may push owners to step up and act more responsibly.

- Of course...you take responsibility for the actions of your animal. The worst bite I've had came from a cat...no one seems to be bothered by them???
- The owner needs to be accountable for their pet's actions.
- Ultimately, I feel it is the owner's responsibility if an animal is behaving badly. They should be accountable for it's actions.
- The owner of the offending dog should be responsible for any medical or vet bills.
- There are 2 sides to every story. Dog could have been antagonized. The owner and other person should remain o scene.
- Why would they not be required to do that already? An enforcement officer would need that information to see if the dog is licensed, if it's had it'sivshots, etc
- Owners are responsible for their animals behaviour and should be held accountable
- Explanation is required as to why the dog but someone or another animal
- It should be treated like a hit and run. They should not be allowed to leave the scene if their dog injured another dog or person. There needs to be a way of contacting them should the other dog/person requires medical attention and they should be responsible for covering the costs. A note should be left on that dogs file/ license.
- I have heard many stories of people rushing away after their dogs bites. This leave the victim of the in a awful position trying to identify the attacker/owners and often these owners (of aggressive the dogs) will continue to put others in a dangerous situation.
- Absolutely the owner of the dog of any breed should take responsibility as well as the vet bill if required to treat
- Same as a car accident. You should not run from the scene of an accident.
- It is the owner's responsibility of the behaviour of their pet as it would be their child.
- Only exception would be the need to remove the dog for safety reasons (ie return them to fenced area or home).
- Too often victims are left with an injured dog and the bills that go with them, and people need to be held accountable for their dogs behaviour
- It's no different than a car crash.
- I believe that it is the owners responsibility to be sure that the injured party is alright and offer help in anyway possible.
- I'm not sure how you enforce this. Many owners of Hesse nuisance dogs, and bully breed dogs, don't tend to be the most upstanding of citizens - but there should be an economic penalty for this infraction.
- The owner of a dog needs to take responsibility for the action. Many owners run because they don't want anything to happen to their dog. Perhaps a tribunal system would be helpful with this
- If you know that your dogs can be aggressive and that dog does bite, you need to take responsibility for the actions of your dog.
- This should be treated as any other accident and information should be exchanged, as well as enforcement officers if there is an open wound, bleeding, etc.

- While bites sometimes happen accidentally, they should all be reported so it can be determined if there is a problem. I've heard of way too many people with dogs that have bitten at the park on multiple occasions. There should be a X number of strikes and you're banned from the off leash park rule.
- Dog owners should remain at the scene to provide their personal information as well as any medical information pertinent to the animal (rabies, distemper shots, etc.).
- They shouldn't just leave, they need to be reliable for the other dogs medical costs because those can't be upwards of $1000. Atleast stay until the owner has assessed the dog that has been attacked.
- This can be a huge liability problem and can have huge costs for the victim. It's the same as your child causing damage - it's the owners responsibility.
- I have a comment to the ridiculous number 3 question...there should be NO breed bans, extra rules etc just fine the owners more!!
- Gives the owner a chance to explain thier case so its not one sided and an animal is put down for no good reason.
- The accountability is with the owners. They need to stay and provide contact info
- There are always two sides to story. Ownership of an animal is as that they are responsible for any occurrence(s) that the animal was involved in
- I believe removing the dangerous animal ASAP likely going to be of higher importance, but I'm also concerned that people would use this as an opportunity to never take responsibility.
- Need to be able to assess dog and verify accuser's statement.
- Dog owner of the buyer should be responsible for paying vet bill costs
- The owner needs to be held responsible and accountable for their dog. They need to remain and should also cover vet fees required to the owner of any animal injured.
- To find the truth and get the right info
- The person should remain on scene so information can be exchanged. That being said, they may need to get their dog away from the situation quickly so the dog can be put away safely and calm down, so this needs to be taken into account.
- The owner needs to be available to explain the situation
- It is your responsibility as a pet owner to have respect for others and other pet owners. There should be a fine for them walking away from the incident if it is serious.
- I said yes, surely you can understand that answer
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for the behaviour of their animals.
- It would help those that are responsible dog owners and help to identify possible nuisance dogs that are not necessarily large breeds
- Stop vilifying pitbul type dogs!
- Ive had a dog attack my dog and the owner brushed it off and quickly left me with an injured dog and large vet bill
- Any human aggression the owner should wait. Not all dog fights/scuffles result in major damage so if both parties are sufficiently fine with the situation, enforcement should not be necessary

- Vet bills could be incurred as well as not knowing the vaccination status of the offending dog.
- 100% should be required to remain on scene. It's essentially an accident. If it was a car accident, regardless of injury someone that leaves the scene would be in big trouble.
- My dog has been bitten and the owner just walked away.
- If a dog causes harm it should be dealt with in a timely matter
- Be a good human.
- Dog owners should face Additional charges if the dog owner does not remain at the scene of an incident or provide contact information.
- Too many times I have heard of a dog attacking a person or another dog and the owner leaves.
- People whose dog attacks another dog or person take off and often evade all responsibility for their dog's attack. If the dog attacked another animal, that pet owner has to bear the cost for all veterinary care and this is not fair.
- Absolutely, a dog owner has to be responsible to the people the dog hurts
- They are responsible for their dog, whether it is the dog's fault or not. This way there are more sides to the story than just the victim
- officers should be able to determine if a human is unfit to own the dog and if the attack was provoked. There are no bad dogs, there are bad owners.
- People should be responsible for their animals; in the same way that you are expected to remain on the scene after a vehicle accident (regardless of its severity), the same should be done for an animal altercation. At the very least, contact information should be exchanged.
- I think responsible owners should recognize they are responsible for vet bills. I also think that all owners are responsible for their pets. Small dog owners rarely recognize aggressive behaviour that may result in their dog being NG injured. A more balanced review needs to be considered. Larger dogs aren't always the problem.
- In my eyes, this is the same as a car hitting another car. If there is harm or damage done, both parties have the onus to come to an understanding or an agreement and if that means staying until an officer arrives on scene because one of the parties called for one, then that is what needs to happen.
- I'm amazed this law isn't in effect already
- Every owner should be held accountable for their animals.
- This should be in affect for all animals
- This cannot always be possible but I DO BELIEVE THE ANY DOG OWNER should be responsible for the actions of their dog the same with their child
- Or if a picture of the dog tags are taken and sent to the victim of the attack along with contact info (similar to a minor vehicle accident)
- I didn't realize this was not the law as. Similar to any other incident all parties should stay on the scene till info has been exchanged.
- I think if a dog bites another dog and draws blood then the owner should provide their contact information to the other owner. It'll be hard to establish who is at fault as many dogs are not well trained and dogs in general will give a warning bite if another dog is acting in a way contrary to pack order.

- To ensure the dog owner and/or the other that was bitten take the correct responsibility for the incident.
- Owners need to be held accountable for damage their pets do.
- Dog bites can happen even with the best behaved pets. If another animal or person is injured, information should absolutely be exchanged.
- Because there could be more damage done to the dog not at fault and vet costs are very high.
- To verify if the animal has their shots up to date
- Too many people flee. People should live up to and accept the responsibilities of pet ownership
- If the dog is repeatedly biting others, the only way to observe repeat offenses is if that person shares their contact details with officers.
- When it's safe to do so.
- Yes, to facilitate tracking of nuisance animals
- They need to be held accountable for their actions
- because the owner or person bitten may have a very biased recollection of the incident, this would allow both sides to be heard.
- The owner of the dog has the right to share their view of what happened. Victims should not have an issue with both sides being documented.
- I say yes so long as the bite causes injury. Sometimes dogs play bite or nip as a warning, and I don't think it should be necessary in those circumstances.
- Yes, these incidents should require the owner to talk to an officer.
- A dog owner should be held responsible for their dog's behavior
- Yes, unless they are in the process of restraint ion the dog to prevent more than damage.
- For dogs to be safely investigated and for the safety of the victims they need to be discoverable, so the owner should remain at the scene such as with a car accident. Recent history of the dog should also be taken at the time of the bite (had they been camping, ill, in a stressfil environment, etc).
- There is no other way for the victim to get the information. If they leave the scene it should be treated the same way as a vehicle hit-and-run.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility and deal with the consequences. There are no bad dogs.
- I had a dog bite my dog at off leash park and when I confronted the owner they ran to their vehicle and left. They were only able to be found and ticketed because someone took down their licence plate.
- With the exception of them being allowed to remove the dog in question and return.
- Too many people just walk away and they should be held responsible for any medical bills for people or the animal injured
- Many stories of problem dogs in a dog park but they owner takes off with the dog = no recourse
- Potential liability and to determine fault.

- Had my dog killed in our backyard by an off leash dog that smashed through our gate. Owner did not stick around but was identified by our neighbor.
- If a dog injured another dog or human then the offending Doha's human should pay medical bills if needed.
- This will help someone receive contact info so they know vaccination of other animal, etc and ability to split vet charges
- Provide history of dog
- Yes I would like the dog owner to take responsibility for said dog.
- Fines for those that don't take responsibility
- Too many reported incidences of people leaving the scene and skirting responsibility. Should be fine for leaving the scene without giving proper contact info (if unable to wait). No point in rules if people can avoid responsibility
- Yes. Just like a car accident they should have to be held accountable.
- Yes. It's the same as if you were in an accident. A lot of dogs have a lot of damage caused by bites of an attacking dog...vet bills can be horrendous!! The owner of the attacking dog should have to pay
- It is important that the pet owner be responsible for the actions of their pets. Also to find out what happened, if the attack was provoked by the person or other animal that was attacked.
- This way there can be accountability and education as well as the opportunity for the victim to get additional information and support if needed.
- My dog has been bitten at an off leash park. It happened so fast and the other owner took their dog and left, we barely got a look at it. That bite cost us $700 and our dog almost died.
- Any dog owner that has been involved should stay on scene and assess the situation. Including giving information of vaccines up to date and contact information should anything further happen.
- I believe that it should be a bylaw for the dog owners to remain at the scene and exchange information, as I was in this exact situation myself. I was lucky to have people stay and exchange their information, although I know others haven't been able to say the same. Your pet is your responsibility and people take advantage during these times.
- This is important to establish the situation on site. People running away after their dogs bite seems to be an issue.
- Unless the dog attacked needs to go emergency at which point both should go to emergency. The aggressive dog owners should be held responsible to pay for all damages to the injured dog.
- The owner can provide important info regarding the health/vaccine history of their animal
- The owner must take responsibility for their animal. It may be that the person or dog that was bitten may have to go to emergency for repairs in that case both parties go to emergency waiting for the enforcement officer. The offending dog owner should also be responsible for paying the medical and/or vet bills of the offending dog.
- When you're involved in a car crash, you need to provide your information, why not when your dog injures someone?!
- Problem dogs should be put down

- Dog owner needs to take responsibility for their pet and ensure the victim is okay, and should also be held liable for ongoing injuries, like if a person can't work.
- As the pet owner it is their responsibility
- That way they have the contact info of the person, in case anything else happens or they need to be contacted
- This is akin to committing a crime. You need to stay on scene to talk to the Victim or enforcement officer and provide your information so that the issue can be properly taken care of. If you flee, it should be charged like leaving the scene.
- The dog is your property and part of your family. Stay and take responsibility for it.
- The communication is necessary to resolve a dispute.
- If there are injuries to the other animal or person the owner should be held responsible
- It's the same as a hit and run.
- Any bite that breaks skin should be reported and kept at scene.
- The owner should remain at the scene but only after the animal(s) have been safely secured
- It is important to take ownership of your animal, for any actions.
- If damage has been done yes.
- In my mind it's the same as a car accident you stay at the scene to swap info when involved
- There is always a reason for a dog to bite, often times it is the owners fault for putting their dog in that situation. The dog or animal who has suffered from the bite is also not always following city bylaws or proper dog/owner etiquette
- Unless the person is under the age of 18, children should be allowed to leave to get assistance
- Politeness?
- Owners need to provide info and take financial responsibility for any injuries. Too many leave parks if their dog injured another animal
- If your dog bites someone, that's 99% on the owner (not the dog) due to the training and proper handling of the animal. You better believe they have to stick around and deal with the repercussions should the bite have caused harm to an individual or other animal.
- Yes especially to receive information on up to date rabies vaccines.
- A bite is an assault - a crime. Staying at the scene of any other crime is considered mandatory as it should be in this instance.
- People need to be held responsible for the actions of their animals. There should be very heavy fines for a pet owner that leaves the scene of an incident
- Dog owner needs to be completely responsible, which includes ensuring the victim is looked after and appropriate next steps are taken.
- It's all part of responsible dog ownership. There is also 3 sides to each incident: the side of the bitten do, the side of the dog that bit, and the incident that actually occurred to cause the bite.
- People should be responsible for their dog.
- Too many people leave and the injured are left to deal with it.

- Unless the person or other animal is seriously injured. Most people have a cell phone with them, and could/should provide their contact info to the injured person or owner of the injured animal. Waiting for an enforcement officer to show up is not helpful
- The owner of the attacking dog should be responsible for medical fines and/or trauma fines.
- All owners of a dog who's attacked another tend to leave the scene, leaving the owner of the injured dog with a large vet bill.
- Dog could have rabies
- I think it's common sense they should have to, otherwise how can they possibly be held responsible? I'm shocked this isn't the rule already.
- Yes, but not wait to talk with an enforcement officer. Exchange of verified contact info including license tag # is sufficient.
- Many times I have seen stories on social media where dogs have attacked and owners don't stay around, give false info, etc. This is not ok considering large vet bills or other liabilities may need to be addressed and fines applied
- They shouldn't just run away to avoid getting in trouble or having to pay for the other dogs care
- Just as a driver of a vehicle involved in a collision is required to stay at the scene, so should the owner and or the victim (barring necessity for immediate medical attention) to avoid a "he said/she said" situation
- I can't believe this isn't already in place.
- Same as a car accident, proper information and documents / contact info should be shared .
- How else would the person or the police know if the dog has had all their shots. My sister has had to chase down a person whose dog attacked a couple of dogs a and people.
- Vet bills should be reimbursed by attacking dogs owners.
- because otherwise there isn't any accountability being taken or proper actions taken such as if this is a pattern with the animal/owners
- As a responsible pet owner it is your due diligence to do this. It should be common sense.
- I believe that there are good dogs that bite when provoked or teased. I also believe that if an animal bites it can be compared to a car accident you have to stay if you hit another car so why not when your dog bites.
- if similar is expected for a car accident over a certain amount this seems to be an obvious and easy expectation.
- Yes. Same like a car accident, witnesses should be there to claim their side and claim their story.
- This should definitely part of the rules. I've read so many stories where dogs or people have been attacked and the person flees, and the victim is left to pick up the pieces and vet care bills
- If an actual bite has occurred the individual who's dog bit, should be responsible enough to leave info or pay for vet bills
- It gives the owner an opportunity to share their side of the incident
- They need to be responsible for biting another dog/person but in the end it's the owner who should be held responsible not the dog

- So many folks walk off after their dog bites, and there is no way to get a hold of them for vet bills, or to follow up with the safety of having their animal out and about.
- Yes, Like any other accident.
- No different than a car accident
- Similar to a car crash... fines should be implemented
- it only responsible owners that will stay
- your question is poorly worded - "and talk with an enforcement officer if necessary?"...of course it is necessary and how long will it take for an officer to get to the scene?
- Remaining at the scene allows the dog owner to explain their side of the story, especially if the bite was a result of antagonizing from the "victim" or another dog owned by the "victim"
- Take responsibility for your animal and make sure the victim is alright.
- The problem is that people take off; provide false information, etc. If people do not remain at the scene, or provide false information - and are located post-incident - they should be banned from owning any domesticated animal for at least 3-5 years.
- like getting tagged by a car or another driver, it seems like it would be wise to stay at the scene.
- I always support this when feasible and logical. However I can hypothesize times in which flexibility is warranted, such as an outdoor cat comes onto someone's property and is bitten by the dog while unsupervised outside in their yard. Although ideal, I do not think it is reasonable to expect all residents to supervise their dogs in securely fenced yards at all times. Another scenario would be in which both animals are injured and the dog owner cannot remain on the scene to wait for an enforcement officer, and needs to rush their animal to emergency care as soon as possible. In that same vein, getting both animals separated and secured should take precedence over remaining at the scene. Two or more animals - one or more injured - in high states of arousal - should not remain in the same area. Without a second person with each of the owners to take their dogs elsewhere, this is not possible.
- Why wouldn't they have to stay at the scene?!
- I think all animal owners regardless of breed, should stay on scene when their animal attacks another animal.
- I believe every dog owner should exchange info without another if something was to happen.
- Owners should be held accountable for the behaviour of their pet. That being said, one must also acknowledge that dogs are animals and animals can behave unpredictably at times.
- Your dog. Your responsibility
- It helps get all the information at the time it happened and can help bring about other factors like the dog being harassed
- My husky got attacked at a park and as I was assessing the damage the owner speedwalked away. I was left with hundreds of dollars of torn ear emergency after hours vet damage.
- I believe the owner of an animal needs to take responsibility for their animals behavior as it is their responsibility to care for a properly train that animal. They should then be immediately beginning training to help avoid or prevent any further issues.
- The owner of the offending dog should pay for any medical bills

- I believe they may have to leave momentarily to remove the dog but they should remain with the person who was bit to ensure they are cared for and to be responsible for their dog's actions.
- I believe this should be the case if the animal causes harm. Witnesses should also be asked to stay/or give contact information about what they witnessed
- Too often you hear that the owner ran off after the attack, this should be mandatory to stay at the scene as long as it's safe to do so. Minimum should be sharing information and/or required to fill out a report
- The owner of the offending dog should remain on scene so the situation can be settled with both points of view
- It is important to take responsibility for the animal in your care and possession. Like any weapon or firearm, if anything were to happen you'd be responsible if it's in your hands.
- As a responsible pet owner, the dog owner should remain at the scene of the incident and be additionally fined for leaving the scene before the incident is cleared up by both parties.
- Owners are responsible for the conduct of their dogs and being able to account for harm caused by their animals is a reasonable requirement.
- The owner should be fined if he/she leaves the scene after his/her dog bites a person or another animal.
- owners are responsible for their dogs behavior. I doubt it will change behavior of irresponsible owners but having extra penalties for not providing info if they are eventually found seems like a good idea
- Leaving would be like a hit and run
- my dog was attacked by another dog and owner left with the vicious dog and then denied that it was his dog when authorities questioned him.
- Responsibility
- Only for serious incidents. If there are no injuries, exchanging info should be sufficient without having to stay at the scene
- "If a dog attack occurs both owners should have to explain the rationale / situation to a bylaw officer.
- A dog bite on a person is socially considered worse; however, I doubt a person causing a situation where a dog bit because of a human interaction would ever be given a fair shake."
- In many cases if a dog bites when the owner is around typically there were warning signs or a reason. The owner should be able to explain what lead to the incident. As well the owner needs to be held accountable to the victim as a dog is acting on instincts only (unless trained otherwise)
- Similar to a car accident situation - there could be legal liability in the case of a dog bite - so an owner should be mandated to remain at the scene until an enforcement officer can come and assess the situation.
- If the person or other animal is injured, then information should be exchanged and the owner of the animal should be held responsible for any incurred costs such as vet bills for the other animal.
- "As dog owners we are responsible for the actions of our pets and must make sure all legalities are met and help the victim if needed.

- It is always a good idea to remain at the scene of any disturbance or biting to protect the victim, yourself and your pet."
- I have friends whose dogs were attacked causing emergency pet care and the dog owner walked away without even offering to share their name. They should be required to produce their phone, and ID, to share contact info with the dogs owner.
- I think only if the bite is severe enough that it requires obvious medical attention that the owner must remain at the scene of the crime.
- Any dog can be vicious. I am sick and tired of the breed specific targeting of pit bulls. And you cannot declare a dog vicious Just based on 2 second interaction. Dogs cannot speak. They cannot say I'm afraid or I'm hurting or that person hurt me so I'm defending myself. I'm sick to death of hearing how dogs get shot when observed for 2 seconds and it's said they are growling. Dogs also bite for various reasons. I'm sick of hearing all dogs that bite are aggressive. No one ever takes into consideration the reason behind the bite.
- I feel dog bites are like any accidents (eg. Car, etc). It's only fair to remain and ensure both parties are ok and happy before leaving
- This should be required as many attacks to animals have large veterinary bills that the owner of the offending animal should be responsible for.
- If bite causes damage to either human or animal the owner should remain in the scene much like a car accident.
- It makes sense for accountability but without proof it could be just hearsay
- That way the owner of both dogs/all those involved are held accountable for their actions. A dog doesn't bite (typically) without provocation. A full investigation should occur and all parties involved.
- That sounds reasonable
- Owners must take responsibility for their animal
- It's called being a decent human being...
- We expect the same from a car accident. An accident where someone is injured should require accountability and due process.
- I've heard of people's dogs getting attacked and the other party provided false information.
- People should be held accountable for their actions or the actions of their dog.
- I look at it like a car accident. You stay there until authorities arrive.
- It's your dog in your care. It's no different if you own a car in a accident. You stay onsite or fined if you leave
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for their bad behaviour and their dogs actions
- You'd expect them to remains at the scene of a car accident or a shooting so why not this?
- Because that's important in being a responsible pet owner
- Promote responsible dog ownership
- Too many people are demonstrating a lack of accountability. Puncture wounds may not be immediately apparent, infection rates with dog bites are second only to human bites. enforce staying and being a responsible pet owner. In the event of a contracted pet walker/sitter they are still responsible and should be insured for this event or decline the animal as a customer

- The owners need to provide all information to victim and bylaw.
- too many people run away after their dogs bites someone or another animal
- Vet bills need to be paid and if your dog has hurt another dog you should have to pay the vet bills.
- There is a huge difference between two dogs getting into a disagreement and a dog attack. To me a bite or attack causes another animal to go to the hospital in that case yes you should remain at the scene. If both animals have minor wounds Scrapes minor bleeding not needing a vet then the owners should be able to work it out.
- There is no other way of finding the owner
- If the owner is not there how can the bylaw officers get the full story, and background on the dog?
- Of course they should remain. How else would you identify them?
- In case the dog needs stitches for the owner of the other dog to be able to provide help paying or insurance information.
- They need to be accountable and recorded I case of reoccurring bites.
- Details of health of offending animal and to track repeat offenders.
- If you discharged a weapon you would stay. Same thing.
- If your dog bites and hurts someone, you must take responsibility. It's how to be a good dog owner.
- Every owner should remain on scene even if it only to ensure the person that was bitten is ok.
- All too often the irresponsible owner leaves the scene, and their are medical issues that they should be paying for. As well, people send their children to walk dogs, and they have no idea what to do is something should happen
- If your dog bites someone or another animal they need to stay for legal reasons and to help pay the bet bills if there are any
- Yes, owners are responsible for the behaviours of their dogs.
- Yes as long as it is safe to do so (not being intimidated or threatened)
- "This seems obvious. Rabies, proper documentation of incident to establish patterns of behaviour, also will help to find dog fighting rings.
- I would like to comment on bandanna issue. If a dog is reactive in any way regardless of how a human approaches, they should wear a muzzle. The onus should be on the owner to be in control of the dog and remove it from potential triggering situations, or wear a muzzle."
- Yes, both sides of the situation should be heard. Not all bites are the dogs fault, most of the time they're not the dogs fault
- There is no way to track the person down if they don't remain at the scene. You may need the owners information if you require compensation for damages to yourself or your pet
- If a dog bites, the dog owner should share contact information with the other party. If one party contacts an enforcement officer then the officer is engaged. I don't think it is practical to wait until an enforcement officer arrives.
- It makes it easier to hold irresponsible owners accountable for their dogs behavior.
- This person that owns the dog to provide identification and contact information in the event there is a veterinarian bill or other expenses as a result of my dog being harmed

- Yes they need to take responsibility and be there when bylaw officers arrive
- I feel that a responsible animal owner should do this - just like an automobile owner is required to remain at the scene of an accident and share contact information and talk with police if need be.
- Self explanatory. Not to stay would be leaving the scene of crime would it not?
- Your dog is your responsibility.
- Individuals should be required to take responsibility for their pets.
- If necessary the owner should stay and willing give their info
- It is responsible pet ownership.
- I struggle to see this working in reality though. I expect immediately after an incident that the owner would detain the dog somewhere, which would more often require the owner to leave temporarily until authorities arrive and take over possession of the dog. It is more important to me to remove the dog immediately than anything.
- yes or at least provide contact info or ID. Owner should be allowed to leave the scene in order to secure the dog (for safety of all involved) provided they leave ID/contact info or their house/property is in view of the victim/s
- People need to take accountability for what happened. I believe too many dogs are being labelled as pit bull type dogs because their owners run off after a situation.
- Again, people need to be held responsible for their animals. An injured person shouldn't have to be chasing you down to get your address or info.
- Good luck with that. Who's going to enforce that?
- Yes. Obviously the dog needs to be reported to the enforcement officer at the time of the incident. The dog needs to be known to the city and the excuse my dog isn't vicious and has never done this before is not good enough
- Dog owners should be held accountable.
- The owner should be held responsible for dogs behaviour
- Owners need to be responsible pet owners. The owner may need training to help their dog. Depending on the situation, I'm the fault may not fall fully on one dog/owner.
- Unless they give the correct information to the person or owner
- It's the SOLE responsible thing to do.
- Unless the dog was defending an attack on it's owner.
- Same as with any other incident, all parties should remain on site. However, there may be instances where, for the safety of all involved, the animal should be removed from the site. In that case, if there's a trusted individual who can remove the animal from the situation, they should do so. If not, the owner should be able to provide contact information and temporarily leave to ensure the animal is secured.
- Too many bite and runs happen and enough is enough. The owner of the aggressive animal should be ticketed and held fully responsible for medical veterinary care required by the damaged party as a result.
- The tribunal should include a vet, dog owner, bylaw officer as well as other people needed to make the decisions

- Just like a vehicle accident where you have to remain on scene, the same should apply to incidents with animals.
- People need to be held accountable for the actions of their dog. This would also provide a more accurate picture of the dogs involved in bite incidents.
- I think animal ownership is a huge responsibility and the owner should show some compassion and responsibility to what has happened, whether the dog is at fault or not.
- It should be no different than leaving the scene of a collision.
- This way the dog owner cannot give out false info and they can also explain their side of the incident while fresh in their mind. Also, if they are impaired at the time the officer can see it and it may have been part of the reason for the attack.
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for the behaviour of their dogs
- If the owner is there, it should be required they stay as a responsible pet owner. Just like car accidents or other incidents you should have to remain on the scene. This helps to know which dog was involved, and makes the process easier.
- It is long overdue that owners become more accountable for their either wilful blindness to their responsibility for owning a Vicious dog that is a likely a reflection of their lack of concern for our fellow citizens
- There must be an explanation provided by the dog owner as and hopefully witnesses as to the event and if there were extenuating circumstances that threatened or aggravated the animal in question
- My son has been attacked by a dog before (a Chihuahua, it was vicious) and so has my dog. It's important to know the contact info of the person for vet bills or vaccination records.
- Any information pertinent to the incident should be properly documented and the owner of the dog should always remain and be present for the report.
- Due recourse is necessary I'm being a responsible dog owner.
- As a responsibility owner should do.
- Pet owners have responsibility to us all
- The owner of the dogs should always stay at the scene of any bite to ensure information is exchanged
- There is always two side to the story. Was the animal teased or provoke to attack?
- That is responsible pet ownership
- Dogs who were provoked or people who did not comply with owner requests when interacting with dog should not be penalized
- This is the only way a person and his/her pet can be made accountable for the incident and assessed (consequences) as a result of the incident. It is too easy to give a fake name and contact info etc.
- Interviewing the dog's owner will give insight if they are able to handle the dog, why would the dog attack another dog, or person. Hold the person responsible. Not the dog. The dog's behaviour is the symptom of the disease.
- Absolutely. Just like a car accident. The owner of the dog is responsible for the dogs actions.

- My dog has been bitten at dog parks in Calgary and most owners of the dog that bit use deny the incident and walk away. The vet bills are very expensive.
- to follow up if dog and owner are repeat offenders
- Otherwise a person does not know if dog has previous history of same behaviour
- A good dog owner would stay on scene.
- Often you hear of dog owners running away when their dog attacks another dog, and I think this will help curb some of that.
- Dog owners are responsible for their animals. If our dog bites someone we need to be there.
- Definitely bites are serious and can cause trauma. I believe the owners should be punished for not restraining their dog or denying their animal could be a threat.
- It's the responsible thing to do
- Take responsibility for your dog.
- This is to ensure responsibility for each pet owner
- The owner is responsible for the behaviour of their animal through upbringing and day to day control.
- When dog owners are required to be responsible for their dog's behaviour, which could include restrictions on how they move around the city with their pet and/or financial responsibility for vetting bills, they may (hopefully) take their leadership more seriously.
- Owners should not be allowed to avoid responsibility by simply leaving the scene of an incident. This is a public safety issue as the offending animal may need to be tested for disease.
- Common sense of owner to be at the scene for questioning.
- I was bitten by an off leash pit bull on a public street.
- Liability reasons, make sure the dog is up to date on vaccinations and such.
- Owners are responsible for their pets.
- Some dog owners play the victim card during a bite. Let officers determine who is at fault. Way too many times the dog owners flee!
- So they can be held accountable for what the dog did.
- They are responsible for their pet
- there are a number of reasons a dog might bite, and not all are the fault of the dog. For example if provoked or cornered any animal will protect itself.
- Cannot leave scene, like a hit and run.
- the dog owner who bites runs and hides
- Accountability, you are not allowed to run from the scene of an automobile accident.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets. If there is vet costs or medical bills for the bite victim, the owner of the dog needs to be held accountable and pay the medical expenses.
- Too many dog attacks and the owners walking away because they don't want the fine
- Half the time you can't find them again
- I think everyone needs to be held responsible for their dog's actions. Too many times the owner of the aggressive dog leaves the scene without giving info to the victim
- Common sense

- If there is injury to either a human or animal, the owner of the offending dog could be held civilly liable. They need to provide their contact details for victims to follow up.
- A nuisance dog that bites any living person or animal should be put down, this should not even be negotiable.
- Owners should be held accountable for their animals and take responsibility if their dog bites a person or other dog.
- Why should the victim beat the brunt? Dog owners often leave the scene.
- People need to be responsible for their dogs. Many people believe that their small dogs don't cause damage. So they just walk away.
- If they fail to remain they should be charged.
- I've been bowled over and nipped at by other people's dogs but the owner doesn't care. The owners need to be held responsible and learn to better control the dog if it is hurting other humans or animals.
- All dog owners should take responsibility for their dogs
- Same as a hit and run accident. All parties involved should resolve the issue.
- Responsibility should remain with owner. Remaining or providing identification for contact should be required in the circumstance of a bite.
- People need to be accountable for their dog's behaviour. Also might be hard with an escalated dog
- If a dog is involved in a biting incident. Both owners should exchange information, and if that does not happen, police shall get involved.
- That is part of being a Responsible Pet Owner
- You cannot leave the scene of an accident with a vehicle and the same should be applied with animals.
- This is common sense
- Too many people walk away and never own up to poor dog behaviour. This leads to no actionable recourse to the bitten person or dog.
- Won't make any difference even if there is a rule. Some will stay and some won't
- Taking off after an altercation does not help solve the problem. Fines and further pet ownership restrictions ought to be imposed on owners who flee the scene of a severe dog attack (between human or other animal).
- Information should always be giving and an officer called to come assist.
- Only if bylaw was going to be available and not make someone wait for hours on end. Also, bylaw never works holidays. How would you support this without increasing taxes and OT costs?
- It's the best way to make sure the situation is dealt with properly.
- Just like after a car accident, if your dog and therefore you are involved in an altercation where someone is hurt you should both be required to exchange information and report it
- People should be responsible for the actions of their pets
- yes, the responsibility is the owner of the dog in question.
- Known of several incidents where the owner of the biting dog just walked away

- Yes - they should be there to explain what happened. The dog could have been provoked.
- This further shows you are a responsible pet owner and affirms that you are responsible for your or your dogs actions.
- that is responsible pet ownership.
- I believe that the owner should act responsibly and be accountable.
- I thought this was already a rule, or atleastbvommon sense.
- Most complaints with animals are not enforced without household information shared. I believe an owner should always take ownus of their animal.
- "accountability.
- All dog owners should be licensed and registered."
- There are often extenuating circumstances, including provocation, that the enforcement officer should record
- Ppl need to be help responsible.
- It's the descent thing to do if you are a responsible person.
- I no longer go to larger offleash areas as I've heard too many horror stories of irresponsible people fleeing the scene of an altercation with their dog
- Just like in any other incident, the owner needs to take responsibility for their pets actions
- Taking ownership helps the community move forward as a whole.
- I have seen dog owners flee a scene once their dog has bitten someone so dog owners need to be responsible for staying at a scene or should face a criminal offence. Victims can be severely hurt by a dog bite.
- Pet owners are just as accountable for their animals as a car owner is accountable for their vehicle. If damage is done, you take responsibility. Period.
- It would be no different than a car accident as more often than not it is the owner is missing the cues that their dog is showing them. If acted upon early the incident could likely be avoided
- Yes, however dogs being left off leash leading to a dog bite from a dog on leash in on leash areas should not be prosecuted
- Same principle as a "hit and run" accident. Owners must take responsibility for their dog's behaviour and their lack of training.
- So that the owner knows of injuries etc. and what to expect from a lawsuit.
- A responsible pet owner would be forthcoming and accountable
- it is no different than an auto accident. If you or your property have caused harm and damage, you must stay at the scene of the crime to help come to a helpful outcome. (if the dog owner is aware that the dog has harmed someone/some other animal).
- It's a criminal offence, the owner should be held accountable, just like when people have to remain at the scene of a car accident
- I believe a reasonable, responsible dog owner would already do this. This will hopefully prevent owners from leaving the scene of an incident that they should be financially responsible for vet bills etc.

- I think it increases accountability rather than the person and dog running off
- Effectively like a hit and run, owners should be required to stay at the scene of an “accident”. Dog bites are traumatic and can be life threatening, owners need to take responsibility.
- Be a responsible dog owner!
- Yes, with the caveat that if a dog bites someone who has provoked the animal, or has been warned to maintain distance, and does not comply, that they not have to remain on scene.
- The dog has caused an injury and the owner must be held accountable.
- Owner should also be responsible for vet bills
- An assault has occurred causing bodily harm. The owner of the dog should stay on site
- This is common sense.
- Often times the dog and owner responsible for the bite will leave the scene without sharing information.
- Incident reporting and documentation is essential for a fair trial.
- Like any accident responsibility needs to be taken and OWNERS held accountable. I see so many people allow their dogs off leash. They’ve jumped on my child in excitement but my child is to this day scared of dogs. That is the owners fault.
- "There is almost always a reason why a dog bites someone.
- All parties need to stay and say what happened as well as bystanders.
- Dog parents need to be held accountable as dogs are animals and need training!"
- My dog and myself were attacked by the same dog in two different occasions, and the owner was clueless. Said owner didn’t even receive any sort of fine or mandatory rehabilitation for the dog.
- Its good to have enforcement there some people would give false info
- There are many incidents where dog owners who’ve had their dog attacked don’t get the other owners information and are left with no options.
- A person should be responsible for their dog and its behaviour and if it injures a person or dog, they should be held accountable. By providing contact information, this will allow the injured party to have the ability to re-coup any expenses arising from the injury and for animal services to levy any fines that may be applicable. If the parties agree between themselves that nothing further needs to occur, that is their decision but first step should be to have that conversation.
- It would be ideal but I doubt most owners whose dogs actually bite other dogs or people are probably responsible enough to stick around and wait for a bylaw officer.
- Unless the dog or the owner is injured as well. In that case they should call/contact 311 as soon as feasible.
- This makes the owner accountable and responsible for their actions. Should this include the actions that the owner took. In many cases the owner will not get in the middle.
- Owners are
- Like any other accident, owners should remain on scene until the information has been provided
- Owner and victim should remain with the dog. Wrongful accusations of similiar dogs in the area are harmful to the system.

- This need explaining?
- Many owners of dogs who bite run away leaving you with a large vet bill while you help your injured dog. This may not stop that but might change a few people's minds about leaving.
- It's hard to find the owner if they leave. Not sure why this question needs an explanation.
- It's just good dog owner etiquette to ensure everyone or every dog is ok. And transfer information in the case of vet bills etc, if their dog is the guilty party.
- Information should be shared and a report filed. There are two sides to every story and both should be documented.
- They must pay for any damage done. To another dog or person
- Your dog, your responsibility
- In my opinion many dog bites are either the fault of an unwise owner or in some cases the fault of the person who approaches the dog without permission. Punishing a dog who is trying to defend itself or it's owner is not at fault.
- Needs to be responsible
- I view it as adherence to responsible pet ownership both to the animal(s) involved and other parties. The medical costs may be prohibitive and if, like driving a vehicle, an incident occurs you must be held accountable. This is additional motivation to owners to ensure their animals are well trained and socialized. Accidents do occur, of course, and having a third party assist in determining the party at "fault" if necessary, may mitigate additional issues that could arise.
- It is reasonable that it be treated like an accident of any kind
- Accountable is key, most dog aggression are the cause of the owner not the dog itself
- Difficult to enforce.
- The dog is the property of the owner and the owners property has harmed another person so the owner should be required to answer for the incident
- As a dog owner, you have a responsibility to manage your dog and if an incident happens, you should have to explain why you think it happened and what actions you plan on taking to mitigate the risk in the future.
- Vaccination records/ vet bill payments are not possible if the owner leaves the scene. It's also potentially not possible for bylaw to find the owner of an animal that leaves the scene. Owners need to understand they're responsible for the actions of their pets.
- They should be responsible they own the dog or they are taking care of hence they accept responsibility
- They should be doing this anyways!
- It is very important to handle the situation immediately and to ensure that it is managed appropriately.
- Is t that the right thing to do? If I hit another car or pedestrian, I am required to stay on scene
- testing for Rabies is important, also assure dog is not a repeat offender
- just like vehicle accidents, the owner should remain at the scene and take ownership
- Sometimes a dog bites that isnt a aggressive attack and the owner staying to answer questions would be helpful

- Ensures accountability
- Much like we are required to remain at the scene of a traffic accident until a police officer arrives, or else be charged with a hit & run, dog owners must remain at the scene until a bylaw officer arrives if there is an issue with an attack or bite.
- No different than hitting someone with a car. If you are at fault you should cover the cost of damages.
- yes because they should take responsibility but being fined or have the dog be put away or euthanized is NOT ok
- Any departure of the scene other than to find a phone / person with a phone would simply be a dereliction.
- I fully believe the OWNER is to stay as if the dog has bitten it's the OWNERS fault NOT the dog! A dog bites from being raised in a bad environment or abused!!
- As long as the safety of BOTH the animal(s) and any humans is taken into consideration.
- Any dog has the ability to cause harm and all dog owners need to be held accountable for their dog's actions.
- The owner is responsible for their dog.
- If there is physical damage to animal or person they owner should be required to give info so the victim of the bite can report it si there can be follow...eg the health of the animal doing the biting and if it is carrying any kind of disease and the owner of the offender should be responsible for any required veterinary/medical costs.
- It's the same as an accident you should not be allowed to leave the scene were you or your animal has caused harm to another person or dog
- This should be a standard practice anyways.
- It is important to collect information where it happens A.S.A.P.
- I think In all situations the owner needs to take responsibility as they are tasked with training and raising the animal.
- Human error, not the dog is always at fault. Training the dog is always the issue, not the breed, not the dog
- Just responsible pet ownership
- It would be hard to regulate but in order to prosecute they need to remain on scene.
- The owner needs to takes responsibility for what their dog did
- I don't understand how this is not already a law. This would be required in order to understand next steps
- They need to take responsibility for their animal.
- How is this not already a law?? If your dog causes injury you should be legally required to stick around until an enforcement officer attends the scene. Dogs KILL people and it's not usually the first bite that results in the death of an animal or person. This requires action following an incident will save lives.
- Many times when a dog bites the owner will leave with the dog. The owner of these dogs need to be held accountable.

- It responsible ownership and ensures it is addressed properly
- If your dog bites a person or another animal the owner should take responsibility and remain at the scene because that's what being a responsible owner is.
- Treat it the same as if it were vehicle collision.
- If my dog was bit by another dog I would like contact information for possible vet bills and also to monitor repeat offenders
- Only if the dog was at fault
- The owner needs to be responsible and accountable.
- yes! they need to be held accountable, too many times irresponsible owners give false information and run off.
- Sage has been done to person or property (the bitten dog) im surprised this was not already a rule
- If someone is hurt at a car accident scene they are required to remain at the scene. Why should this be any different.
- If you hit someone with a car, you need to remain at the scene or it is a hit-and-run charge. Why should it be any different when you assume the responsibility for a potentially harmful, life altering being such as a dog
- They should be responsible for their dog's behaviour and pay vets bills if required. People need training, not only dogs!
- I think that is fair
- Decent thing to do and they should have to pay medical and related vet costs.
- The story of the incident needs to be heard from both sides, as well as any monetary values taken care of.
- Owners should be responsible for any behavior and injuries caused by their dog
- Just like at any accident scene, the offender needs to stay at the scene to share information. Unless for the safety of those involve the dog needs to be removed. But information should be shared before leaving
- Take accountability
- Of course they should remain at the scene as they are ultimately responsible for what happened.
- A responsible dog owner should not fear losing their pet if an incident happens, they should receive support to asses and correct the behaviour
- The owner is responsible for a dogs behaviour. They are the ones who should be punished not the dog.
- Many times dog attacks go undocumented as the owner of the attacking dog is quick to leave the scene. It should be no different than a car accident.
- This seems like common sense?
- "People need to be help accountable for the damage of their dogs. As someone who's dogs been attacked by the same dog twice and nothing was done to help me and my
- Dog I feel the owners should be held accountable and pay for their poor training"
- It is the responsible thing to do.

- Too many owners walk away after their dog has bitten or attacked other dogs making it hard to follow up by bylaw or civilly if the animal bitten requires extensive vet bill
- Maybe then the annoying owners of those little ankle biting dogs will be held accountable to train their pets.
- People need to be responsible for their pets
- A dog owner should be held to the same standard that a Motorist is held too when involved in a collision. They should also be required to produce Government Identification with a photo just like a motorist does and all contact information for proper follow up investigation by Authorities. If a dog owner/handler leaves the scene they are clearly looking to avoid any liability and Court Appearances should be mandatory.
- Makes sense
- This is just basic human decency and responsibility
- Owners should be accountable for their dog's behaviour. However I support management, not euthanasia as a way of dealing with the issue, and careful assessment of the situation that doesn't result in owners or dogs being unfairly punished if they have not been irresponsible, eg if the dog was being attacked or hurt.
- If there are vet bills traceability is important to both parties if a claim is needed
- Owners need to be responsible for their dogs behaviour and too often they leave and the behaviour gets repeated
- Everyone involved in an incident (e.g., victim, perpetrator, or witness) has the responsibility to assist the city officials in obtaining whatever information is necessary to successfully process the incident.
- But people run away all the time. And sometimes what one person thinks they saw is not what happened. There are some crazy people out there that will accuse your dog of biting when everyone else saw the other dog attacking.
- For all breeds of dogs
- Responsible owners will/do always stay-Irresponsible owners leave or never accept accountability or responsibility for their fault as owners
- It's the civil and responsible way .. common sense
- People are more of a problem than dogs. If the person was to stick around to provide more information, a greater picture could be formed about the dogs learned behaviour and home environment. The owner should face greater consequences and animals should be saved from caustic living conditions.
- They should stay to fill out a report. If a dog injured a person or another animal, information from the offending animals owner can be used in medical treatment options for the injured parties (rabies vaccines and such). They should be there to fill out a report as some incidents are not the fault of the reaction of the dog. Animals are allowed to defend themselves.
- In cases of moderate to severe bites.
- People need to be responsible for their pets
- Yes, how can owner be held accountable if he is not at the scene

- Dog bites (and negligent owners) seem to be on the rise. I think stricter laws are required, and heavier penalties should be imposed.
- To provide information, context, and be held responsible. If your car hurt someone you wouldn't leave the scene, or if your child hit someone you would want to talk to the other parents. The same applies here.
- Too many people leave the scene of an incident without the exchange of information. There is no way to track repeat offenders.
- If bite or incident is severe owner must remain on scene until spoken to an officer.
- They are ultimately responsible for their pet, and should remain on scene to help officials process the scene.
- It's like hitting someone one in the parking lot, you need to stay and share contact information.
- The "officers" that arrive to the scene should not just be police officers, they should be specifically trained to understand animals and the abuse of animals.
- A dog owner is responsible for their dog at all times
- Definitely for a person but for dogs, there needs to be a more descriptive explanation of bite as sometimes dogs inadvertently break skin when playing (ie., my own dogs playing).
- Just like a car crash
- I've heard of many dog owners walking away after an attack and the victim doesn't get resolution.
- Depending on the circumstances, the dog owner of the biting dog should be responsible for vet bills. Similar to an auto accident, both parties should remain at the scene, or in the event that one dog needs to go to the vet, both parties should head there.
- A responsible dog owner should/would remain at the scene and share contact information, just as being a vehicle owner must obey those same rules.
- It's the same when someone hits your car, the person needs to stay at the scene to give their information to bylaw officers.
- Ok once the dog is secured or if it must be taken home, the owner returns to the scene or contacts bylaw to provide his contact information
- I feel my response is self explanatory
- They must be responsible for their pet
- This should be common practice
- To ensure that both sides of the story are taken into account and if necessary be find or ticketed at that point. Assessment of the dog I can also be done at that point
- Its important to be aware if the dog has bitten someone previously. If this is a first offense
- Both sides of each story needs to be heard.
- Dog owners are responsible for the actions of their Dog and should be required to give enforcement officers their information should the victim require more intensive medical attention than initially thought.
- The idea is akin to a traffic accident. Dogs are considered property and if I need to repair my property via the negligence of others then similar accident rules should apply.

- I believe a responsible owner would want to take responsibility for their animal(s) but also to make sure all information is provided.
- so further people/dogs are not harmed
- It's a reasonable request and provides accountability if the biting dog has possible illnesses, is behind on vaccinations, etc.
- There have been too many occasions where pet owners have abrogated their responsibility.
- All parties involved in an incident of dog aggression should remain on the scene to ensure the facts are collected properly. Allowing someone to leave after an incident is akin to letting one party in an automobile collision leave before giving their statement.
- "You are doing nothing but contributing to the already biased view of one specific breed, Rottweilers, Newfoundlanders, German Shepherds, St Bernards, Mastiff are all large strong dogs that can do damage, the reality is its the Chihuahua, Dachshunds and Jack Russells responsible for the majority of bite incidents.
- This questionnaire is a complete joke!"
- They need to stay in order to give the side of why the animal bit. If there was teasing etc involved.
- There are often 2 sides to a story and if the dog is at fault then there should be responsibility. Also if that dog is not at fault it should be dealt with too. Example a small dog attacks a larger dog and gets injured. Who is at fault? Yes
- The owner is at fault for not being able to control the dog.
- Many people do not stay at the scene and it can make it hard for the victim to attain medical care if not from Canada.
- Yes providing it is safe to do so.
- Ensures everyone is protected including the animal owner in the event it was a provoked attack
- An owner should be held accountable for the actions of their pet
- Really? Explain my answer? It's virtually the same as a hit and run otherwise. Of course they need to stay at the scene.
- that would be responsible pet ownership and just the right thing to do.
- Information should be exchanged, similar to if you have a car accident.
- Consider it like a car accident. You exchange info.
- If you dog is involved in an event, all owners should stick around and the incident be handled so all parties are determined to be OK and to determine if further action is required.
- You are responsible for your dog. If your dog bites someone absolutely stick around.
- I'm suprised this is not required now
- People need to be responsible for their pet. You may never see that person again if they don't stick around
- How will you enforce this safely?
- Owners need to take responsibility for all behavior of their pets. That includes when it bites someone.
- It is the responsible thing to do.

- Yes to provide information if either the injured person or animal require hospitalization and to pay vet bills or to be charged
- I think stipulations must be in place for this to work in ensuring the safety and well-being of the animal as well as persons involved. Which would give the person the option to provide a photo of their drivers license or other identification before putting the animal away into their car / backyard / home. Somewhere that eliminates potential for further risk. If they flee the scene without providing a photo of their ID (or directly reporting themselves) it should be treated like a hit and run.
- Only if the owner is at fault
- Your dog, your responsibility.
- It's the responsible thing to do and shows that you're a responsible pet owner. "Stuff" sometimes happens out there.
- This ensures accountability for injury to a person
- Obviously the offending dog's owner should be made to pay veterinary costs to the aggrieved party therefore independent investigation is required.
- There was an incident in our nearby park where an aggressive german shepard nearly killed a small dog. The person in charge of the dog, called it back and disappeared. The owner of the small dog was traumatized. When the owner was finally located, she should have been fined as well as charged. It is absolutely disgusting what irresponsible dog owners are getting away with.
- There needs to be accountability
- This way the dog and owner can be held responsible for their actions
- All parties need to wait to be questioned unless emergency to a pet hospital or hospital is required
- If a dog bites the owner should remain at the scene and cover the cost of the vet bills that the other owner will now have.
- I feel that if your dog hurts another animal or human you are responsible for the after math. Vet/hospital bills and all that comes with an injury
- Just like a vehicle accident. Leaving the scene of an accident should be fined. Also recorded and charged.
- Why is this not a law already?
- To give factual information to the officer.
- Too easy for the owner of a dog to take off after a bite incident, leaving the victim without recourse. A responsible dog owner would also want to be able to provide their side of the story. Unfortunately an irresponsible dog owner involved in a bite incident may be inclined to leave the scene regardless of any law/rule in place, but as with vehicular hit-and-run situations, there would at least be additional punishment options if the person was located later.
- It is ultimately the dog owners responsibility.
- Your dog, your responsibility, period.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions
- Dog owners are responsible for the dogs. They should remain on scene of the incident.

- I think that any dog that causes harm to another needs to have the owner take responsibility. And often there can be a leading cause to this having happened in the first place (another dog being off leash and rushing a dog that is on leash for a reason)
- This is to be within reason. If all parties are fine and everyone can leave then no. But if there is serious injury then yes they should stay.
- Regardless of the breed of dog that bites! Owners should be obligated to stay to report no different than a car accident and take responsibility.
- Too many people are getting away with walking away and facing no consequences. We all know someone who has had an experience like this. Remaining at the scene needs to be enforced.
- Liability reasons if the animal needs medical attention then the guilty party should be contacted and responsible for expenses
- I think the dog should be removed from the situation as soon as possible, but the owner should be responsible in providing information and taking responsibility.
- Responsible pets owners should be held accountable for the behaviours of their animals; not to mention theres always 2 sides to a story and if the owner takes off it's like an unspoken admission of guilt
- To help the injured party
- Part of responsible ownership is taking responsibility for whatever happens while your pet is under your authority & ownership. The only exception would be if it's unsafe to do so and the dog needs to be contained away from the scene.
- People need to be accountable for the dogs actions, but sometimes if an incident occurs the dog needs to be removed from the situation, then leaving name address and contact info is ok
- An owner should be responsible.. just like a car accident
- Of course they should remain at the scene to provide information and talk with enforcement.
- How to you intend to implement that? As if a bylaw will ensure they remain at the scene! I'm shaking my head over this one!
- If harm is caused the offending dogs family should be responsible for medical costs.
- Just like a car accident, these situations can cause trauma and monetary loss, and needs to be processed as such.
- A decision by such a tribunal would potentially have severe outcomes for the dogs, owner and victim. I am not confident in the selection process of "City and non-City representatives" who would make decisions of such importance.
- Owners must be responsible for their pets.
- Like a car accident, there maybe injuries. My concern is that if, like a car accident, there are pre existing injuries or Conditions that maybe undisclosed.
- Yes because there is two sides to a story and also because it is important to keep record of these incidents.
- This information is crucial in being able to follow up for injuries.
- It's required when a person is involved in a traffic accident, and most of the reasons why would also pertain to the above mentioned situation.

- Problem isn't the dog. The owner needs to be held responsible.
- Just like a vehicle accident need to exchange valid contact information and verify ownership etc
- If the victim (person bite or owner of bitten dog) wants to have it dealt with via enforcement officer they absolutely need to abide. Information should be exchanged at the very least.
- Same requirement as leaving the scene of an accident
- It is the owners responsibility. It's like if he were to drive a truck and struck another persons car then took off. 'Hit and run'. It is the owners responsibility to own up to the mistake of their dog.
- Dog owner should remain after Animals have been removed from the scene- leaving animal and owner after incident cause more stress to animals involved
- The dog owner has a responsibility to take ownership of the dogs actions & also take that chance to give his/her side of the event
- I'm shocked this isn't in place now, they have to be able to have a record of where the dog is/who owns it in case it becomes reoccurring
- It's your dog. You are responsible.
- I would have assumed that an owner of a dog that bit someone would remain at the scene until police arrived if necessary. It surprises me to learn that this is not already in place.
- It's just the right thing to do i.e. take responsibility
- They should give information but not stay until enforcement shows up because this could leave the dog in an agitated state and could result in further aggression. Should be required to provide the other person with the animal licenses number and the owners identification.
- It's like any incident. The guilty walk away.
- How will we know who it is if they do not stay. This is part of responsible pet ownership
- Responsible
- All depends on what happened. Unfortunately my dog got attacked by two cairn terriers and the owners were across the field and did not care about what happened and my dog needed further care. People that like make everyone else lose the privilege of handling situations.
- It should be an offense to leave, just like it is an offense for drivers leaving an accident in a hit and run.
- There are far too many pet owners who fled the scene because they are scared their dog will be taken away, but they need to stay and exchange info and take care of any vet bills related to the incident.
- but how can it be enforced, uncontrolled digs are usually the consequence if irresponsible owners
- "Its like hit and run, dog parks should have at least have cameras in parking lots. Won't mind paying extra. There are people who cannot support them selves and have 2 or 3 dogs on top not even registered with city.
- Have never seen city officials visiting dog parks."
- Like a car accident, information should be exchanged and pictures should be taken as proof.
- Just as with a car accident, the same should apply to pet owners.

- What a stupid question. Of course they should stay. The problem isn't should/shouldn't stay. It's the ones that choose not to stay-what is being done with them if they're caught? Causing them to not leave if it happens again.
- Similar to getting in a car accident, if person or property is injured, the info needs to be exchanged
- It's like being in a car accident - things can turn for the worst, vet costs can be high, the dog or human that were but might require medical attention and need someone to help them.
- It would be the same as leaving after a car accident. A responsible pet owner would stay
- why not?
- Due to the high cost of vet bills it is imperative that those who own dogs that injure other dogs remain accountable.
- Owners need to be held accountable
- If medical attention is required, then a person should stay at the scene and police can determine if anything criminal was done by the owners. Damages done by their property (the dog) can be assessed in civil court. Additionally, allow people to carry protection (pepper spray) from animal attacks inside city limits.
- The owner is 100% responsible for the dog. Don't blame the dog.
- Same as a car accident. Hit and run. Attack and run. Same idea with fines.
- Severe fines are needed for those that leave the scene. Preferably criminal offenses as well.
- It's like a car accident...owner must answer for actions of his animal.
- It is considered a crime to leave the scene of an accident so the same should apply when someone or an animal is attacked by a dog.
- I would support it, but doubt it will have much effect overall. Far too many people whose dogs are involved in an incident stick around. Even with a rule in place, it will still be difficult to find the individual if they were to leave the scene.
- Yes I'd my dog ever bit someone or their dog it's my responsibility to fix that! And pay for bills but sadly not many people think that
- You have to do this if you have an accident of any kind, why wouldn't you if you had a problem with your dog
- Owners are responsible for their dogs. If their dog assaults another person, dog or animal the owner is responsible for their dog's actions and needs to remain at the scene of the assault to deal with the situation to its end.
- If a dog is involved in a serious bite incident, the owner should be required to provide contact information.
- Absolutely, the owner should make the scene safe (contain the dog etc) and then wait. Much like an accident, the owner is responsible for damage and possibly bylaw infractions that need to be addressed. There should be significant penalties if an owner leaves without sharing contact information/talking with enforcement officer
- It is the owner's responsibility
- The owner should provide their contact information; however, remaining on scene may not be the best course of action. For the sake of the bitten individual and the safety of all involved, immediately removing the offending dog from the location to a safe and secure location may be a better course of action. Lingering at the scene to await an enforcement officer while in care and control of the offending dog may cause further stress for the animal(s) and parties involved (and moving the dog to a vehicle to wait is also not ideal).

- Any responsible owner should want to ensure that the right information is provided
- Most owners would just walk away and therefore never be held accountable for their dogs (and their) actions. Owners should also be made to attend training with their dog.
- If a dog bites someone, I absolutely believe that the owner should stick around to give their information
- Your dog your responsibility
- It's common sense not to leave. How would you track down the nuisance dog afterwards?
- It's the same if someone hit a car, it's damage done and needs to be held accountable.
- I say yes because people have had their pets seriously harmed or killed during a dog attack and often left with a very unfortunate event as well as a costly expense for vet bills, treatment, euthenizing their pets etc. Treat it like a "hit and run" if you do not stay on the scene then there should be harsher punishment for fleeing. The owner needs to be held accountable for their pet.
- if the owner leaves and there is no way to contact them it causes many issues, such as not knowing vaccine history.
- It will be easier to process the incidents if the owner stays present
- The dog owner should be present to present his side of the event. Circumstances that led to the event
- It is the owner's responsibility to prevent a bite, so also their responsibility to deal with the consequences.
- It's important to require responsible pet ownership.
- Whether causing injury by car or dog, the individual may have important information to share (rabies status), and is responsible for their pet.
- All too often dog owner flee the scene and costs and damages are left to be borne by the injured party or owner of an injured dog. These can be serious and expensive.
- Take responsibility for your own pet's behaviours.
- The owner must be held accountable, and this is allows that to happen.
- Should be some sort of offense to flee a scene when your animal hurt another persons pet. Those kind of owners need to be held accountable for their pets actions
- As with any incident you are to wait at the scene and exchange information.
- Owners should always take responsibility for their pet's actions, just like how parents have to take responsibility for their children's actions.
- The dogs owner is responsible for their dog and should be in control of them.
- It would be common sense, just like a car accident.
- These things should be taken care of properly. If i dog has bitten another they should be required to exchange information along with any previous biting incidents to determine if that dog should be muzzled when off leash for safety.

- Self explanatory within the question
- The owners need to be held responsible and that can't happen if you don't know who they are or how to contact them.
- They need to take responsibility for their dogs actions and any vet/hospital bills that arise
- Too often people involved in incidents take off and there is no accountability for the damage their dog has caused.
- I think it is necessary to hear both sides of the story, and for a enforcement officer to be able to make a clear decision if the dog is to be labeled a nuisance
- I think if they leave the scene of the offense it should be treat much like a "HIT & RUN". No Excuses.
- Same thing as a hit and run.
- The dogs owner should be responsible for covering the costs associated with the injuries.
- There are 2 sides to every story.
- Often owners don't take it seriously and will just walk away, sometimes not even acknowledging the incident.
- Just like a person must remain at the scene of an accident, a dog owner remaining at the scene to discuss what happened, would assist in determining if the incident is a one off or more of a problem
- Dog bites should be treated the same as any other accident, it should require the owner to stay at the scene, provide contact information and speak with an enforcement officer.
- Ensures owner responsibility
- Too many people leave or run away from the scene.
- Everyone should take responsibility for their animals.
- As the owner and person responsible for the dog, they must remain at the scene. They are in charge and fully responsible.
- I strongly believe that the individual should stay at the scene. With that being said, there needs to be time to let the dog decompress instead of being held in an over stimulating environment for a long period of time. Leave should also be allowed for animals that are injured.
- Too many owners running off with their nuisance dog and not taking accountability
- People need to take responsibility.
- Humans are responsible for and accountable for their pets as master. Therefore contact information/ownership is very important.
- Accountability for behaviour, responsible for vet/doctor bills
- Owners should always take responsibility for their animals
- Follow up information regarding the dog is necessary
- Yes this allows all the right information to be said.
- I suspect that some incidents where the pet owner has left have been exaggerated by the complainant.
- So that they can be contacted with any consequences or follow-up
- There are owners that just disappear after their dog has attacked.

- It is definitely necessary to get the information about the dog's health and vaccination.
- Yes, not only is it the right thing to do but a person is required to stay at the scene of a motor vehicle collision involving an injury. Leaving the scene of a dog bite should be the same as hit and run.
- I think this is a good requirement but due to the way a lot of these people end up in the media I totally get why people leave the scene so to speak.
- "They are responsible for the attack and should pay the vet bills."

- My dog was attacked by a boxer/pitbull almost 3 months ago. That same dog also attacked another dog a month prior to that.
- That dog is still at the house and still acts vicious. So serious action needs to be taken especially when it's not the first attack"
- It is important the owner remain on the scene
- People must be responsible for their animals and the actions of their animals.
- It's the right thing to do
- It's the owner's responsibility as head of their "pack".
- To me it's like someone being involved in a car accident. They must remain at the scene. If a dog bites someone it makes sense that the owner must remain at the scene and exchange contact information, as well as report the incident to police. Dog attacks are being treated far too lightly by the City.
- At dog parks if a dog bites or attacks a dog often people try to take off and leave rather than stay to exchange information and take accountability
- Require accountability regardless of the reason for the incident. Exception for any person or animal that needs immediate medical attention. Substantial fines for leaving the scene or not contacting animal services within a specified time.
- They should be obeying the law and honouring the situation. If the attack warrants the need for hospitalization for either there needs to be a way to work around but information must be exchanged
- The owner needs to be held completely accountable with witnesses and charged if necessary.
- It may be difficult to find the owner of a dog that attacks, so having owners provide contact info can help with enforcement and getting things like vet/medical bills paid.
- All pertinent information is needed in such a case. Both sides need to be heard
- There have been multiple times I have witnessed incidents and the owner of the offending dog runs. This prevents documenting and dealing with issues.
- Photos and statements of dog bites should be documented.
- That is common human decency. If for some reason they cannot remain there they should call and give their information.
- Bla legislation is complete garbage. Owners need to be held accountable for any animal that bites. Ordered muzzled in public is reaction

- Yes, if a person got bitten or another animal was severely injured by the biting. Dogs quarrel sometimes, that doesn't mean every biting amongst dogs needs to be reported.
- I thought this was already a rule? Basically a hit and run if the owner takes off
- Dangerous animals and their owners should not be able to just walk away when an injury has occurred to another person/animal.
- It's your dog no matter what size or breed you should expect to be held accountable for any actions
- It is like a hit and run if they don't. They should remain (and once their dog is under control) they should provide contact information and be held accountable. If they leave the scene it is likely that they are trying to escape responsibility.
- People need to take responsibility for what their dogs does.
- I was bitten (accidentally) by a large Malamute dog in a neighbours yard (I was retrieving my cat from the yard, she had jumped the fence) the dog was tied up...while getting my cat from the dog's jaws it accidentally bit my leg, I would have liked the owner to come out to talk to me about it so I could find out if the dog's rabies shots were up to date...I took my cat in the house, discovered I was bleeding, looked next door and the dog was inside and all was quiet, I knocked and there was no answer but the dog barked from inside...I had to go to the hospital for a shot just to make sure (tetanus) and get information about possible rabies...the owner should have taken responsibility and talked to me.
- Rabies. Prior violations. Making sure victim is cared for. Same as leaving any accident. What is point of extra insurance if they don't have to stay at incident?
- As long as it's not a dangerous situation
- To help the cost of vet bills
- It becomes hard to remember and locate idiot dog owners when everyone is in shock over an attack...even if the attack has been caught on camera and the owner leaves. Rules for biting dogs should be no different than rules for drivers remaining at the scene of an accident.
- It's the same as a hit and run
- My dogs have been attacked before at local offleash dog parks. Ive had both situations where the owner has stayed to provide their information and where the owner has left with their dog without saying anything. I believe both of the owners have an obligation to stay at the scene to exchange information.
- It is the owners responsibility to know their dog. If it bits once unprovoked it will bite again!
- Owner is responsible for the dogs behaviour and must be cooperative or face charges for leaving the scene of the incident.
- We are the responsible parties for our pets! If they act out we are responsible for ensuring that they are ok and that the other party is ok as well.
- every dog owner is responsible. Only the owner can advise and stand up for his/her dog and defend in certain circumstances (provoked, etc). any dog has the right to express discomfort or protect himself. It is the owner's responsibility to have their animal under control and understand the triggers, thereby avoiding bad situations. Accidents happen....be responsible
- Tell their side is the story

- My dog was bitten and the people fled the scene. When I tracked them down, they mentioned that this wasn't the first time their dog had bitten someone. Remaining at the scene might help to identify repeat offenders.
- I think this is great as many dog attacks to other dogs are due to uneducated, uncaring owners who will just go to another park. This way it can be assessed and accounted for especially if high vet bills are a result.
- Same as losing control of a car and having an accident
- People need to stay to be able to provide their side of the story and accept responsibility and provide contact information to share in any medical or veterinary costs incurred.
- Some bites are out of fear and the owner may need support to help the dog move past biting out of fear. Also if they leave or that not considered a bite and run, like a hot and run.
- The owner should take responsibility for their dog
- Responsible pet ownership & taking responsibility for your dog
- Yes, the owner or handler should be required to remain on the scene as long as it is safe for all involved. If the dog is out of control (and they have no leash, etc) it might be safer to exchange information and allow the owner to take the dog home until bylaw can respond.
- essential for assessing any subsequent legal actions or assigning responsibility
- Yes and often there's are vet expenses, plus follow up should be done for both or all dogs involved
- The owner is accountable and like other incidents or accidents should be expected to remain at the scene
- No different than a hit and run. Stay at the accident site.
- the owner needs to be accountable. Too many times the owner leaves without giving correct info
- A Bull Mastiff attacked my dog and didn't stay at the scene.
- People need to be held accountable and owning an animal is a privilege that comes with responsibility
- The owner must be held responsible and be traceable so that action can be taken against owner and dog. Victim cannot be left alone.
- We have previously encountered incidents during which the owners of the dogs ran away after severely injuring our dog.
- The owner should be responsible for the dogs actions if someone is assaulted.
- Leaving the scene of a traffic accident is illegal, why isn't leaving the scene of an accident where your dog causes harm to another dog or person?
- Unless they have to leave to try to catch the animal that bit or the animal that was bitten....or to take an animal to the vet or a person to the hospital.
- Pet owner should be responsible for any veterinary fees, therefore contact information needs to be provided.
- All parties must remain at the scene unless being attended to by medical or veterinary care.
- They are responsible for their dog's behaviour
- You should take responsibility for your pet.

- Similar to a hit and run accident if they leave the scene, and should be handled appropriately.
- The owners should be responsible for their dog
- It is the responsibility of the owner of the pet to deal with all consequences due to the animals behaviour
- Why shouldn't the owner remain on the scene? to provide additional information? They shouldn't be able to flee if their dog is aggressive and untrained.
- just like a motor vehicle accident
- It's part of taking responsibility for your pets actions and behaviour.
- Same as a car accident. My only thought would be if the person walking the dog is a child, they might go home first.
- Because it will help the victim.
- They need to be there until the situation is closed. They need to be responsible for their dog's actions
- Be accountable and responsible for actions.
- If the dog and/ or owner leave the scene they may not be able to be identified. Should be treated the same as a car accident.
- major caveat - If Necessary.
- Like any incident between two people. Everyone must remain on the scene until all information is exchanged and/or police dismiss individuals
- I would be part of being a responsible pet owner for any breed.
- Absolutely. My dog was attacked and left for dead by another dog and the owner took off with the dog and refused to help
- At the end of the day, the dog's behavior is the owner's responsibility and unfortunately it happens this responsibility is not taken. This is also why I am more in favor of hefty fines for the dog owners than euthanizing dogs.
- Their may be circumstances where the owner may lie about their identity in order to hide from the problem so having it mandatory to speak to an enforcement officer will reduce any issues avoiding liability
- If a dog bites another person or dog, it is the owners responsibility to remain at the scene, the same as it is the owners responsibility to provide food, shelter to the animal. The dog accused of the bite should be taken out of the situation, and all parties should be there to tell all sides of the story.
- Takes responsibility for their pet
- Just like a car accident, they should stay. Exceptions, the dog is also injured and they go to the vet or something.
- Why would they leave?
- Yes they should stay and take responsibility
- Owners should have to show a piece of identification, the city dog tag number and ensure the owner of the other pet has a means of looking after their animal, if injured.
- If it is safe to do so.

- Allows a third party to assess and defuses people's emotions at the time.
- An animal's owner should be responsible to cover medical costs for a dog who has been attacked by their dog. Even if the situation doesn't go to bylaw, there should still be accountability and the owner whose dog was not the aggressor should not be responsible for the medical bills.
- any responsible dog owner should stay if it is safe for them to stay. If the others at the scene are hostile and put owner in unsafe situation then this would not apply. Dog owner should have option to go to police station to report.
- A person has to be responsible for their pet.
- How else can we ensure that dog isn't a repeat offender
- I would like to qualify this answer as I was involved in an incident and was ordered out of their sight when I tried to share contact information. In such a case a person should not be penalized.
- In order to properly attend to matters and record the right information they should stay
- Too many people get away with their dogs of any breed seriously injuring people and other animals and are never held accountable. If your dog causes harm their should be consequences. It's all a part of being a responsible owner.
- Too many people are out in public with aggressive dogs off leash - whether it be at a designated off leash park or not. If your dog causes severe damage to another dog or person you should be held financially responsible and be charged if you don't stay at the scene if the incident is serious enough.
- Absolutely important, strongly in support
- If there is an actual injury and health care or vet care is needed sharing info is the responsible thing to do.
- Yes BUT they must be allowed time/space to remove their animal from the incident. A dog on continuous high alert in an over active situation is a bad situation for the dog and people.
- I believe the owner should remain at the scene, but the dog should be take home by someone. The experience can be just as terrifying for them as it was for the other dog/child.
- my dog was attacked by a dog at an offleash park. The owner took off with the dog and I was left to cover full costs as well as the emotional trauma to my dog. Animal control was ultimately unable to trace this person/animal, despite physical description.
- Most definitely. If you hit someone with a vehicle, it is illegal to leave the scene - the same should apply for an owner whose dog bit/attacked another dog or another person. It should be considered a criminal offense for the owner to LEAVE the scene without exchanging information and citizens should be able to call 911 immediately with the description of the owner if they leave. A police report should also be filed in the case of someone encountering a dog owner who leaves the scene of an attack without exchanging information with the person who was attacked/owns the animal which was attacked.
- They should stick around, on the same note if they are leashed and someone comes up to them and it results in an incident it should also be considered that the the other party is at fault and not the dog. IE jaywalking in front of a car.
- i know of many people who are at an offleash and a dog bites them or their dog and they never stay around to see if everyone is ok and share information, it's unacceptable.

- In case it has to go to court or a tribunal the contact info would be needed
- An enforcement officer should know all details related to the incident (from both sides). Sometimes people or dogs can provoke a dog to bite with inappropriate behavior.
- Small or large dog bits are a issue
- If it's not required to stay by law then that's a big loophole
- Pet owners need to be held responsible for the actions of their dog, especially if the actions result in injury to another dog or a person. I'm surprised this already isn't a rule.
- Being a dog owner, it's your job to protect your dog. People leave, because they are afraid dogs will be taken and euthanized. People shouldn't be afraid to do the right thing. Accidents happen, or other loose dogs approach and then one dog gets blamed! If you don't have evidence to prove which one is lying , you SHOULDNT Blame a dog just because of breed.
- If hit and runs are a crime why aren't "bite and runs"
- if the bite is severe and aggressive.
- Precisely how to you expect to enforce this bylaw? Hire another 10,000 bylaw officers?
- Waiting until an enforcement officer arrives would be an impartial observer.
- no matter what happens, they need to own up to their dogs actions. They chose to own their dog. If they are not responsible enough to stand up to what happened, they should not be allowed to own any pet
- Just like a car accident...stay in the scene of a crime!
- just like a car accident, information exchanged helps the process move quicker.
- Yes, or they have 24 hours to contact enforcement. Sometimes if the dogs are injured they need to be removed. Or if they cannot control the dog it's better that they take the dog away than stand there.
- I have seen many incidents where dog attacks another and the owner takes off leaving owner of victimized dog to pay and aggressive dog not registered. This aggressive dog may have already done and fled several times.
- We have to stay at the scene if an accident or human on human assault, the same should be for dog issues
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs
- responsible owners do this already and the WHY of the bite is determined. It is the irresponsible people who take off.
- At a minimum the owner of the offending animal must provide contact information to the victim (or owner of the injured animal) before leaving the scene.
- All owners shod be responsible for their dogs.
- Sharing contact information is essential but dogs/people might need immediate care and won't be able to hang around until an officer gets there.
- Seems reasonable
- My dog was bitten by another dog, the owner was gone before I knew it and I had to pay the vet bill. I also had to back his dog off mine graphing the hind legs

- If my dog were to be bitten, or if I was bitten, I would want something to ensure that I would have a way to contact the person who's dog did the biting, and a way to report who the owner is. I like the idea of it being a rule, just like it is for traffic accidents.
- The owner should remain at the scene and take full responsibility of the incident
- As long as the dog does not have to be transported to a emergency hospital
- This seems like a no brainer
- Pretty obvious
- Just makes sense.
- If you are in a car accident you need to remain at the scene. A dog attack/bite has parallel similarities.
- Dog owners need to be held accountable
- A responsible owner would stay to talk to enforcement
- I have had a dog knock me over and injure me and the dog and person with it ran off
- This is critical.
- Nothing to explain, it's decent pet ownership.
- This should be similar to the requirement that all drivers stay at the scene of an auto accident and take responsibility for their part in the incident. Regardless of responsibility, everyone should provide contact information and speak to an enforcement officer. This means, of course, that enforcement officers should be able to attend an incident in a reasonable time frame.
- The dog should be immediately seized and the owner should be immediately arrested. If he/she refuses to remain at the scene, a warrant should be immediately issued for his/her arrest.
- I witnessed a small dog get attacked by two large saint bernards in my neighbourhood. All were on leash. The owner of the large dogs walked away and the owner of the small dog was in such shock. It wasn't until I asked the owner of the small dog a few moments after if she was okay, if the dog was okay and if she needed help that she realized her dog had been bitten and was bleeding. Dog attacks can be shocking and the injuries from them may not be known until later on. If one of these injuries needed veterinary intervention, I would expect the owner(s) of the dog(s) who attacked to pay for those costs and be fined accordingly. There information would be required to follow up if this was the case.
- this could be hard to control, as what is stopping the person from running away? perhaps a steep fine could be applied if the owner is located after a "bite-and-run" much like a hit and run.
- If the owners stays then perhaps the situation could be resolved quickly. If the animal is not at fault .
- It's like a car accident, if you hit a car you should stay at the scene. Your dog is your responsibility.
- Unless staying involves risk - information should be shared before leaving
- A dog bite is an assault. Owners must remain on the scene and should be heavily penalized for fleeing.
- I agree that owners should remain at the scene of a bite or exchange information (same as with vehicular accidents)
- I've experienced an owner providing incorrect contact information or not wanting to provide any information.

- Actually thought this was the rule already. Owner of dog that bites, injure should be liable for cost. Dog should be in system to track if it bites again
- Dogs are not wild. Owner who cannot control the animal must be punished
- I have been in a situation where my giant breed dog bit another dog and severely injured it. When this happened we immediately called bylaw to document what happened. The owners of the other dog (who was running off leash in the neighborhood) were not in the frame of mind to have a discussion about what happened and did not want to communicate with us. The bylaw officer was incredibly helpful through the process but it would have been nice to be able to discuss things as a group with the officer, for example were the dogs shots up do date, could they be at risk for disease etc.
- Part of responsible dog ownership is working toward a solution to ensure the victim is ok and facing the consequences
- Owners should stay on scene and help with vet costs if their dog is at fault
- Safety in case there are any future incidents
- I think this is important for severe bites. Bites that don't break the skin can be caused accidentally (when breaking up two dogs fighting as an example). Perhaps there should be ample dog behavioural training for bylaw officers so they can also recognize what has happened.
- This is law for motor vehicle accidents and I feel it is important for dogs accidents too. This will aid in reporting and charging the correct people and allow for learning experiences and potential rehabilitation for more improperly trained dogs/dog owners.
- they should at least provide proof of identity
- As the dogs owner, you need to take responsibility for your dog
- Too many people are leaving the scene after their dog has bitten.
- The rule should cover information exchange, as not everybody can wait hours for an enforcement officer.
- Yes, I support that rule.
- A "responsible" dog owner would not hesitate to stick around to provide information. In fact, a responsible pet owner would not let their pets bark incessantly, urinate or defecate on anyone else's property, bite or attack others. So really, the question is, how many "responsible" pet owners are out there? Not many!
- Like a car accident, both parties should have to remain on scene
- It is that person's responsibility to control the dog. Now sometimes a dog could be agitated by that other person in which case either scenario needs to be identified by both parties. Sometimes the dog gets blamed for something that wasn't its fault. People need to be responsible for their pets!
- The owner needs to take responsibility for the actions of their dog.
- It is their responsibility, same as if you hit another person in traffic
- Same as a car accident, you should be required to stay and exchange info. And stay if police/ambulance are coming or else it's defined as fleeing the scene of a crime
- Collect all relevant information from owners
- Yes of course

- Too many irresponsible people take off and are not responsible for injury of other animal/human
- Required for tracing the owner.
- The dog is the owners responsibility, and thus, the owner should remain on the scene.
- I hear so many times of dogs of all breeds (not just Bully type breeds) attacking a dog and the owner takes off. This leaves the owners with the cost of vet bills, if they are lucky enough to not lose their dog from the attack.
- Bylaw would be useless if the owner disappears and there's no info as to who the owner was (necessary info is a fine/penalty is to be charged)
- If an owner flees the scene of an attack it just makes things difficult for everyone.
- Anytime someone or another dog gets bitten people should remain on scene. Even if an accident.
- Yes, too many incidences of people taking aggressive dogs to parks, the dog attacking and the owners leaving without giving victim dog owner their contact info. Sometimes these dogs return to the park again and again despite multiple attacks and there needs to be accountability for this. Situations such as a dog pestering another dog and the adult giving a quick bite or an owner misinterpreting rough play as aggression are a couple concerns with this rule though.
- Owners should be responsible for their dogs, similarly to remaining on scene of a vehicle accident.
- This will ensure proper safety information is received, such as whether the dog is vaccinated etc.
- This is assuming that the owner has the dog under control. Sometimes the owner may need to remove the dog from the situation. But yes, the owner is fully responsible for what their dog does and needs to be able to be contacted if needed. It's like a car accident of sorts
- Pretty much like a accident where the driver stays or is charged with hit and run
- The dog owner should be accountable and also be prepared to pay damages if any.
- Leaving the scene should be considered an aggravation of the offence. However could there be unstable/mentally ill or simply vengeful persons who would accuse an innocent owner and dog. There should be a penalty for false accusations for the person who claims false injury.
- If it's safe to do so. Some people become violent and abusive
- Absolutely, it is just like remaining at the scene of a car accident.
- The same as a car accident, the owner should not be allowed to leave the scene
- To facilitate the process and clarify/confirm next steps.
- Myself, people I know and strangers as well as other dogs on the street or dog park have been bitten by aggressive small dogs. The owners pick up their small goblin and immediately leave the area. Anyone without morals will not remain in the area whether there is a bylaw or not!
- If he or she were to flee the scene it should be punished the same way a hit and run is punished
- The owner is responsible for keeping their dog restrained if it is aggressive, therefore is responsible for vet or medical bills arising from their dog attacking another dog or person, and they need to be contacted by bylaw officers for further investigation into their dog's behaviour
- They need to be responsible for their dog and any damage it causes. People leave because there is no law which requires them to stay and they avoid the consequences of the bite
- I think circumstances and dog parenting is a huge factor in dog bites. I think that if it's bad enough that they need an enforcement officer then they should absolutely stay until one arrives.

- They are the person responsible, they need to own up.
- Too often dogs will attack a person or other dog and then the owner flees. This to me is no different than a hit and run, especially in the cases of dog on dog attacks as vet bills are expensive and should not fall onto the owner to the attacked dog to pay.
- As long as the dogs are safely separated owners should exchange information.
- It's simple. It helps the owners of nuisance dogs be held accountable for their dog's behaviour. The owner is responsible for their dog's behaviour and perhaps the dog needs to attend more behaviour classes.
- If it is your dog, it is your responsibility. If you have taken on the commitment to have the animal, you must also assume the consequences of any negative actions by your dog
- This is a stupid question - why wouldn't the dog owner be required to stick around and take responsibility?
- "If a little dog bites my med size dog. Nothing happens because bite is not severe enough. My dog has pinned a Pekingese for biting her face when she was smelling her dog. My dog pinned little dog and owner said her dog deserved it. Now I cannot let my dog near little dogs. She was traumatized by this out of control dangerous dog. My dog is very well trained and she does not approach any dog unless I say it's ok. That little dog changes my dog forever. That is wrong. If little dogs cannot be controlled they should - Not be allowed in off leash areas. Bigger dogs bigger teeth bigger bites. Little dogs just as dangerous, perhaps not physically but they can change a bigger dog into
- a fearful dog.
- As for pit bulls they can be dangerous depending on breeding. Some are
- Just wrong. You should stop all backyard breeding. Their are adds for pit bulls on kijiji. Real well bred pit bulls are
- Not violent by nature. It's when they are backyard bred that they get messed up. Also isn't
- Know criminals should not be allowed to own a pit bull. These people Are the problem stray with fining people who breed and sell without papers. That is the
- Pit bull problem. Not the breed"
- They should also be assessed by a behavior consultant on how to mitigate further behaviors.
- Dog owners must take responsibility of their dog.
- Accountability to the victim for possible damages to the victim and/or their animal.
- Need to find out why the animal attacked. Was it provoked? Is the animal sick? This way the victim of the bite is protected from harm, as is the animal, so the animal is not "put down" unnecessarily.
- as the owner would be at fault in the first place to let the dog bite/attack another animal or person. they should be dealt with the enforcement officer and get fined or be reprimanded.
- Absolutely. Owners must be held liable for the bad acts of their animals. It is rare that bad behaviour appears out of the blue and owners must be held accountable including, but not limited to, vet bills. I doubt owners would ever stick around but we need all the tools possible to hold these people responsible.

- As long as it is safe for owner and dog to do so
- people are responsible for their dogs
- Not sure if this would solve the issue as problem owners are unlikely to comply.
- People must be held accountable for the actions of their dogs and this may be a way of ensuring the animal in question doesn't do this again.
- This is that same as if a person assaulted another person or damaged their property.
- The owner of the dog that bites should be responsible for any vet bills or other damage caused and should be required to give their contact information.
- Should be no different that any sort of incident
- Depending on the extent of the injury and the cause. People should be held liable some no one gets hurt again.
- Same as if a human injures another human. If they leave, it's like a hit and run.
- People should be held to account and made responsible for any veterinary fees incurred if their dog bites and injures another dog. Unfortunately in this day and age people leaving the scene is the norm, not the exception.
- It's like a hit and run - they are responsible and should face the consequences.
- The owner needs to be responsible. Should be no different than leaving the scene of a car crash.
- Seems like a no brainer to ensure both sides of the story are captured.
- People are irrational and in the absence of a bylaw will be even more apt to flee.
- We need to make owners accountable. Also important to understand both sides of incident.
- People need to be responsible for their pet's behaviour.
- Depends how severe and how injured the victim is
- Owner walked away after I was bitten. I could not effectively report the incident.
- I think it's reasonable for owners and "victims" to be held accountable and supports can be offered to both
- As much as I hope they can remove the dog from the situation, the owner can give false information to the victim to report.
- The owner should always be held responsible. I feel it's rarely a dog "issue" as it is an owner issue in not Responsibly and properly training the dog.
- Owners must take responsibility, follow up on injuries that may have long lasting impact
- Yes. It's important to understand the history and health of the dog in question.
- Dog owners must be held accountable for the negative actions of their dogs.
- Any and every situation has two sides of a story, and the victim isn't always the one who received the bite. For example, someone could have provoked a dog into an unlikely behaviour and/or act, and the enforcement officer should have both sides of a story.
- The owner should stay on site or charged if they leave.
- Be responsible. And understand that just because the dog that caused the injury may not be the dog at fault. For example little dogs going after big dogs.
- Definitely. That is what a responsible owner should do.

- It's no different than at the scene of a car accident. As well to ensure dogs with a bite history are tracked properly.
- Tough to police, unless the victim or victim's owner knows the perpetrator
- I think owners of dogs that have bitten or have a history of bites should be responsible for providing the information necessary to make sure there are measures in place so that it doesn't happen again and so they are held accountable.
- I think both sides of the story are needed to accurately determine what happened
- Only if they can move the animal to a safe distance for all included, animals don't bite for no reason. They need to be in a safe location
- If the owner leaves the scene, it would be as bad as a hit and run accident.
- "There seems to be a correlation between owner behaviour and their dogs behaviour. The owners who are nowhere to be found likely won't make the necessary changes to prevent it.
- And sometimes there's another side to the story and it's important for the owner to be able to explain. Say in the case of an owner telling someone not to approach/touch their dog and the person doesn't listen and gets bit, I feel that is a different situation and the owner shouldn't be charged (I'd almost consider saying you should charge the person being bit as they didn't listen or take proper precautions)"
- The Owner has to ultimately be held responsible for the behavior of their pet.
- If the owner leaves the scene, to me it's the same as a hit and run. There should be law that absolutely requires them to remain at the scene.
- It is important for everyone to be held accountable for their dog.
- I see many cases on the Nextdoor app, and my community Facebook page about aggressive dog owners leaving the scene and ultimately getting away with attack.
- It's no different then attacking a person yourself
- They must be accountable to deter future incidents and to enforce any subsequent consequence/compensation.
- Once the owner of the dog that has been bitten has gotten home could discover that the bite was more severe than first noticed and the owner of the biter should be contacted for cost of vet bills
- Yes, but only if its safe to do so. Once a dog has been in an altercation they need time and space to lower their adrenaline and calm down.
- Too often the owner of the offending dog walks away and is not properly educated on how to prevent such incidents.
- Too many dog owners leave the scene and bystanders or the other party are left to find where the offender goes. If punishments were harsher maybe offenders would stay put until enforcement officer arrives.
- Currently there is no penalty if they leave. There needs to be accountability
- If a dog bites a person or animal it is at the fault of THE OWNER and not the dog. How would the attacked dog/person get vet or other bills paid for if the owner of the dog that attacked the person/dog left. That is irresponsible ownership.
- Self explanatory

- It's just common sense to remain on the scene if your animal hurts someone. Unfortunately a lot of people like to slip away nowadays.
- It's a sign of being a responsible citizen.
- Responsible owners will always stay
- Depending on severity.
- Absolutely they must stay on scene. It's an assault causing injury. The attacking dog's owner needs to pay for vet bills or replacement animal.
- It's an obvious answer.
- I also believe that people need to be better educated. As a person who owns a large dog I have on numerous occasions gone to a park and had a small dog come running up to me behaving aggressively towards myself and my dog. Large dog owners should not automatically be assumed the guilty party.
- More accountability by owner this way
- I think there should be a condition that if any skin is broken, the owner should be required to stay at the scene. If the victim requires medical attention, they should have the contact information for the owner. If no skin is broken, perhaps this isn't necessary.
- Just like a car accident
- I feel this should be mandatory for BOTH small and large breed dog owners. And equally enforced without bias against large dog breeds.
- Be responsible to the injured pet as well as your own. Always helps with both parties giving there side of the incident.
- This makes a lot of sense.
- It's a bit like car accidents - you need to stay at the scene and ensure the incident is reported
- Although accidents happen and animals have their own nature it is the owners responsibility to be the dog autonomous voice
- It's part of responsible dog ownership. If the dog has caused injury, the owner should ensure the person/animal is okay, and pay for any medical care required. Also, there should be a record of the incident, in case that dog becomes a repeat offender.
- Owners should take responsibility for their pet's behaviour.
- Take responsibility for your pets and their training.
- People need to be responsible pet owners and if your animal is so out of your control in a public area then you need to stay at the scene and be responsible for the consequences of your animals actions
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- Again enable 311 app to accept such a report with photo of the owner and dog to stop them from fleeing the scene.
- Owner responsibility
- The dog is the responsibility of the owner.

- Enforcement officers must be available quickly. Police potentially. I am concerned about the dog doing the biting remaining close to the bite-ee
- Dog owners should remain on scene to take responsibility for their dogs actions, to provide relevant information (i.e. vaccination records) and to provide their account of the incident.
- It would ensure that the offending dog was up to date with any vaccinations (like rabies vaccine), it also would allow for people to get the owners insurance information, and the officer can determine whether or not the dog needs to be seized
- My sister was attacked by a dog, and the owner fled. My sister was standing and the dog lunged for her neck, we were concerned that if the victim had been a child, they might not have survived. The owner was never caught.
- It's no different than staying on the scene of a car accident or any type of accident. If your dog caused an injury, you need to remain at the scene until officers arrive.
- "accountability and responsibility continues to be scarce attribute with some pet owners.
- There should also be consequences if the pet owner or responsible person leaves the scene of a pet incident similar to a vehicle hit and run matter"
- Owners need to be held accountable.
- Essentially the same as a vehicle accident. The owner bears responsibility to ensure a proper outcome.
- As far as I'm concerned it's just common sense for a owner to stay at the scene
- Dog owners should be responsible for their dog's actions
- For liability purposes, all parties involved should be present when the enforcement officer arrives just like any other accident for sharing of information, what happened and as a responsibility.
- No different than any other accident or incident.
- Only if a bylaw officer can attend the scene promptly. Otherwise, exchange of info
- This should fall under the same category as a motor vehicle accident, and people who leave without sharing valid details should be fined.
- owners need to take accountability for their dogs
- do i really need to? this feels self explanatory.
- Its akin to a hit and run. If your dog causes an injury you should have to stay around to respond to the officer.
- Owners should absolutely take immediate responsibility for their dogs (as long as the person bitten, or owner of a dog bitten, chooses to call enforcement or asks for information). the one exception should be if they need to leave to immediately remove their dog from the situation for safety purposes.
- I think it's just common courtesy for the dog owner to stick around
- Hold the owner responsible.
- Responsible pet ownership and accountability. The owner needs to explain the dog's behaviour.
- Owners must always be responsible for their animals

- I support the idea of a tribunal, however, each case should still be allowed the opportunity to be fairly assessed in court.
- Dog bite is no different than a car accident. All parties should exchange info and cops should be called too
- Should be the same as a car accident
- Pet owners should hold more accountability
- People must take responsibility for their pets, including small dogs!.. (Pit Bull owner here)
- This provides accountability and may lead to reduction of incidents.
- It makes sense, we stay at the scene of an accident to exchange our info. This is the same idea.
- There is always 2 sides to every story. Plus, if the bylaw office requires information it is best to have both parties present.
- They should pay for damages or injuries their dog caused (vet bills of other dog, etc)
- Similar to a car accident, the offensive party should be held accountable for damages.
- Too many 'incidents' involve one party taking off or giving false information. The Requirement to stay until Enforcement arrives is necessary. There also needs to be greater enforcement officers either on duty, or available 'on-call'
- In most cases the owner of a vicious dog will flee the scene of the crime/attack, adding a bylaw to require them to remain at the scene adds another layer of enforcement.
- If the dog was in the owner's control this would not happen. I do not support any off leash areas. Private fenced property only for off leash
- Dog owners have to be held accountable
- Details of shots and contact info should be provided
- I support it, but this is a traumatic incident for both dogs and owners so I'm not sure about the dog remaining on scene with the owner after an incident. I would think in most cases removing the dog from the scene immediately would be prudent.
- Proceed as you would for a car crash
- If owner walks away no one knows where to contact them after for information
- Owners should be responsible for their pets
- There can be health concerns (need vaccine records) and financial concerns. Need to trace offenders and multiple time offenders. Get dogs and people the correct help.
- If there is injury or damage to property from any event, accident or not, the involved parties should not attempt to hide their identification.
- I believe no matter the breed of the Dog that the owner will need to be responsible in all cases.
- Even minor the responsibility needs to be taken and understood a small bite could get infected and vet care required. As well if the dog is a repeat offender to asses or fine or require dog training to assure the dog's behavior with owner responsibility is taken into consideration.
- It would give a victim some legal way of demanding contact information. I was attacked by a dog that it's owner was unable to control. I had no way to get contact information and hold the owner responsible.

- If it's not required it's almost impossible for the city to intervene and potentially prevent future incidents. The victim also benefits from more knowledge in that they may need to know the health of the attacking animals to receive proper care. I can understand staying at the scene may sometimes be impossible (controlling an animal that just attacked while staying near the target may be unsafe) but it should be treated like a car accident. Responsible parties should at least swap contact information if not want for the authorities. It should also be made clear who to contact and how for swift attendance (the attacked may need prompt medical care and people won't wait unless rapid on-scene attendance is assured).
- The owner of the dog that bit, if found responsible, should be required to pay for any required medical treatment or pay a fine toward the cost of any required medical treatment due to the bite
- Ridiculous question. Why would it be acceptable to leave? Ditto for auto accidents - it's a crime to leave the scene.
- I have seen many times were a dog attacks another dog (for various reasons), and the owner simply grabs the offending dog and runs off. The rule would be nice, but the penalty would need to be high enough.
- As a responsible pet owner I would want to stay and ensure everyone is ok and all information needed it exchanged. If you leave the scene, you could give false information or none at all.
- They should be responsible for any vet bills and/or wait for bylaw officer to determine whether a nuisance animal
- If the person or owner of the animal that was bitten wants the contact info. I don't think it's mandatory if a minor bit happens and the other person/owner says it's okay.
- Absolutely they should stay. The only problem is sometimes the victim needs to leave immediately to seek veterinary care and doesn't have time to wait.
- I am assuming this would only be in cases of a more severe nature. Not a dog acting like it was going to bite, or giving a warning snap at a person.
- Yes, if there is injury. Any time we (or our dogs) cause injury to someone else, we are legally responsible for that. We need to provide the victim with the information they need to pursue the appropriate remedies.
- Pretty well impossible to enforce
- Common sense and decency. The owner either controls the animal or is irresponsible.
- It would be important to have contact information for follow up.
- To me, it's the same as remaining on the scene of a MVA. It's irresponsible for a pet owner to leave the scene, and it suggests they are not equipped to own and care for animals.
- If you own a pet you are responsible for that pet no matter what they do
- I think that responsible pet owners should stick around and provide any details that are necessary, it reminds me of situations such as car accidents where the party in question leaves/flees its a hit and run
- Question is how do you possibly enforce this ...
- The wording needs some clarification! Minor dog nips/bites commonly happen at the dog park sometimes as a result of playing or when a dog is letting another dog know to either back off and respect their boundaries. A dog 'attack' is another incident all together. This wording should not be vague.

- makes a lot of sense
- Its like a car accident. Share your info.
- This equates to the same as staying at the scene of an accident. It's about accepting responsibility and dealing with the issue.
- "Unless the owner is willing to accompany you immediately to a vet or human urgent care centre and cover any costs associated with the attack. This was our experience when a neighbour's new rescue dog attacked our dog.
- I think all dogs should be registered on home insurance so that a claim can be made to recover vet costs if the owner does not voluntarily help.
- I'd like the conversation with the enforcement officer to be an and/or proposition. If the owner of the dog in question is obliged to trade contact information and willingly shares contact info and insurance information like at a car accident scene then I think any official followup is at the discretion of the injured party."
- With the caveat that it cannot endanger anyone further. A single owner may not be able to safely control an animal without causing further harm.
- But good luck enforcing that one when such people who are inclined to leave a scene and not take responsibility would still do so regardless.
- While I support this, after an incident it may be necessary for the owner to leave to return the dog home. Is there a way to accomplish both?
- This should be a criminal offence if the owner at fault leaves the scene without handing any personal info to a witness or the victim.
- treat it like a car crash
- I don't feel like this is a yes/no answer. I don't think the owner/dog need to stay on the scene with the victim until bylaw arrives. This is very stressful for pets and people. Perhaps the bylaw states that the person needs to show valid govt ID to the victim so they can be contacted later.
- There are many incidents with aggressive dogs where the owners know and see what happens but choose to run away rather than be accountable for the animal under their direct care. In the case where dog-walkers may be involved, they should share responsibility with the dog owner for which they are providing the service.
- When speaking to bylaw officers after a pitbull attack on a child in front of my home 2 years ago the officer told me that pitbull owners regularly flee the scene after an attack. Bylaw officers even had a name for it, a Pit and Run. I strongly support the new rule.
- It's the responsible thing to do, but some people will likely run away following an incident
- The dog owner must take responsibility for actions taken by their pet
- Like a car accident you should be required to stay the scene.
- I support the mandatory sharing of contact information
- Pet owners should be responsible for their pets.

- If it is serious enough to require an enforcement officer, the owner should explain what happened from their prerogative as well as the person that was involved to avoid hearsay on either parties part.
- There are many, many instances of dog attacks where the owner walks off scott-free never to be seen again, with the victim being left responsible for vet/medical bills.
- This should be law and failure to comply should result in a fine. After the dog is removed or secured, the owner should remain on scene.
- Absolutely. It's called being an accountable and responsible owner. If they depart the scene, hefty fines to the owner and confiscation the dog, should ensue.
- I believe the dog owner should always remain on the scene. Bylaw should always understand why the dog bit and the observe the dog's behavior.
- It's part of responsible pet ownership.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs and need to be in control of their dog no matter their breed.
- regardless of severity, if authorities are to be involved it should be treated as a car accident or "first on the scene" situation where you must stay
- hold irresponsible pet owners accountable. It's not the animals fault!
- It's just like if you were to be in a car accident. You can't leave the scene of an accident. Fines should be issued for dog owners that leave the scene of a bite incident.
- They should share information, but then remove themselves and the dog from the situation.
- Every dog owner should be responsible for that dogs behaviour and should remain at the scene to explain why their dog will not bite, or explain the circumstances that caused the dog to bite, i.e., being teased, etc.
- The owner is the one responsible. They should be the ones facing repercussions. Similar to how a driver is responsible for their vehicle.
- I think that they need to evaluate the owner and hold them accountable for an issue, however if it is due to a circumstance beyond the owners control I think that they should not be punished.
- I think dog owners should take responsibility, it's not the dogs fault it's the owners fault. No bad dogs, just bad training
- No punishment if someone leaves. Dog bites can be scary for everyone and bad decisions can happen.
- The owner of the biter should take responsibility for the incident if it was unprovoked
- Yes but only if the dog is not a danger to those around.
- A person should be able to flee the scene (unless information to get in contact with them was given) because they need to be responsible for their dog's actions.
- Owners must remain accountable for their pets, as animal behaviour is most likely due to the owner's behavior.
- Responsible pet owners provide information such as a vehicle accident. Held responsible.
- "It is the right thing to do
- Should your dog bite someone or Another dog"
- Owner should have proof of training for dog.

- It has been in my experience that the owner is responsible for its dogs behaviour that's not to be said that if not given consideration on circumstances or without a medium should not be consulted
- A dog attacked my dog 2 years ago. My mom tried to get the other dog off my dog and in the process the dog knocked her over and broke her leg. The owner of the dog disappeared from the scene and took no responsibility for the attack.
- The safety of the person and animal(s) involved comes first. An incident with an animal should be treated the same as an incident with an automobile.
- Unless owners work out on thier own
- It should be the responsibility of the owner or the instigator.
- Yes and no. If it's a person, yes. If it's another dog, that's open to interpretation based on the severity
- I believe that if a dog causes injury to an individual or a pet the owner should be required to disclose any and all information needed for a bylaw officer, or the other individual to contact them if and when needed. This will aid in promoting that ANY dog bites or attacks be reported immediately as to ensure details are correct. This will also prevent attacks from smaller breeds flying under the radar as they usually have less of a chance to being reported if nothing (for example, an injury) comes from the attack.
- If any dog hurts another dog, or any person or other animal due to owner negligence they need to be held accountable. These should be dealt with with no prejudice against the dogs breed, age or size but by how the owner cares and controls their dogs
- this would add another perspective, as well as shows responsibility for their dog
- As you would like a car accident.
- Of course. Responsible ownership.
- It is necessary for proper follow up
- The enforcement officer should truly investigate the incident, rather than assuming the dog that bit is the only problem. If the person or other animal was doing something to threaten the dog, that party should be held accountable, not the dog.
- Owners should always be accountable to the behaviour of their pets
- no different than leaving the scene of an accident, the owner should remain at the scene
- However I think it would depend on the situation and if the dog would cause more harm in that situation, loud noises, showing aggression towards other dogs/ animals humans. Then information should be exchanged but the officer could visit their home.
- This is responsible pet ownership, and it also means being a decent human being.
- Need to be responsible for your pet
- Seems to be a reasonable expectation
- Owner must claim responsibility, but have all evidence gathered.
- Depending on the situation, I believe if the owner is in a safe mental and physical state to stay and wait for an enforcement officer then they should wait to give their information. I think a severe incident should be treated the same as any other serve incident (car accident, injury, etc).

- If it happens no matter what type of dog it is, its owner's responsibility to deal with it properly. But all this about banning and special rules for specific dogs is [removed]. Rescue the dogs and give the cruel owners jail time for neglect.
- Any responsible owner should do this - why is it even a question.
- This enables both sides of the story to be heard. Circumstances of bites vary and must be judged as such
- Animals are animals, and people are people. Just as someone who swipes your vehicle on the way out of the parking Lot should stick around to exchange information, since their dog acted up, they should have to explain exactly what happened. THERE ARE ALWAYS TWO SIDES TO THE STORY THOUGH, and people have to realize that animals do have different instincts than we do.
- the owner must take responsibility for their dog's behavior as they would their children. It is important for the enforcement officer to learn the facts involved in the case of dog bites.
- If I had to chase down or track some [removed] that let thier dog attack my cat I would [removed] both of them myself.
- I already did the survey, but didn't have a chance to comment on my experience. My dog (mostly border collie, was a rescue) was attacked by a staf bull terrier and a pit bull while my 11yr old child walked him on our block. The bully dogs ran out of their house when a door was accidentally opened without them secured and came running from behind. Our dog was pinned down, his shoulder was pierced and it took 3 adults to remove the pit bull. We knew the owners, they claimed the dogs were "sweethearts" that never did anything like that before. They also have young children in their house. Our 11yr old was scared to walk our dog for quite a while - he still is. Fact is these breeds are more unpredictable compared to others.
- If an owner is allowed to leave without sharing info it is almost impossible to tell if it is an isolated incident. Also not all dog owners are as up to date on vaccinations as they should be and the other parties involved should be made aware of any risks associated with the incident
- More consequences should be placed on the owner rather than the dog
- Owners should be held accountable. Dog bites can inflict pain to another dog, incur costs to heal them and the offending owner should be liable.
- The owner shouldn't take off, that would be like a hit and run car accident. They do need to control the dog that did the biting do if they had to step away a say like 20 feet or do fine but still wait for the enforcement office to get there.
- The owner should stay and the incident should be reported to determine whether this is a recurring issue with the dog / owner
- If there are vet or human bills post bite, information is needed. Especially when a dog has done this multiple times and owners keep bringing those dogs to areas they shouldn't be at.
- A lot of times people leave the scene and because the owner that has a pitbull they automatically get blamed sometimes it's the small dogs you wouldn't suspect. It's only fair both parties stay until an officer arrives
- This would aid in holding owners accountable for their dog's behaviour and to better diffuse a dog bite situation.

- This seems it should be common sense.
- It should be a fine if you leave the scene of an incident, similar to driving, the outcomes can be just as severe and fatal.
- Dog bites must be treated at par with other accidents, eg road accidents.
- That's what responsible pet owners do, as their guardians we need to take the hit as we have failed them if we put them in a position that they could cause harm to anyone or other animals
- there should be some responsibility taken on part of the owner of the dog that bites. A responsible owner would stay and make sure everything is ok whether it was a one time incident or not.
- Staying is responsible pet ownership
- It's just good manners to stay
- As long as the dog could be controlled, no sense in staying around if the dog shows no sign of calming down after the incident
- As a responsible pet owner, you know most dogs do not bite for no reason. Your side needs to be heard so both sides are heard.
- "Both sides should have the opportunity to tell their side of the story.
- Often dogs bite because they were being antagonized and you never get that to hear that side."
- makes all parties involved accountable
- The owners of dogs who bite and injure people or other animals must be identified. This is to ensure the dog is identified.
- Expensive vet bills is a possibility and trauma for the dog or person. This should go for ALL DOGS.
- I believe it is the responsibility of the owner of the dog that bit to take the responsibility...this goes for ALL dogs, even Chihuahua
- It makes sense!
- Depending on the circumstance. I think information should be exchanged between dog owners no matter what to decide the course of action.
- Responsible dog owner
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for the dog's behavior. Stop euthanizing dogs who have been trained poorly! HOLD THEIR OWNER ACCOUNTABLE!!!!
- ABSOLUTELY. For any breed of dog. They should be given harsh fines if they don't as well, it's leaving the scene of a crime!
- Seems reasonable just like a car accident to remain at the scene.
- Absolutely, otherwise it's like a hit and run. I'm not sure why this isn't a law already. You have to be responsible for damages your dog inflicts.
- Owners are solely responsible for dog behaviours not the breed of dog, and they should be held accountable. Plus if the dog was being harassed they could say so.
- The owner and dog must be identified properly and held responsible. A dog should not be put down for the attack though.
- A responsible owner would stay

- Only if it is safe to do so , otherwise give contact information to a responsible person or call the police yourself .
- Just like any incident, all parties should remain at the scene so info can be obtained/exchanged
- It is important to determine the well being of the victim as well as the animal. This is because the breed is not the problem, it is it's environment.
- You need to take responsibility for your pet at all times
- They are responsible for their dogs behavior.
- Ultimately dog owners are the responsible party and need to remain at the scene as drivers have to when in a collision.
- It's just like an car accident
- Accountability.
- You need to be able to gauge the severity of the bite or the situation and be able to contact if anything serious happens further like infection
- They only need to remain there for information exchange and then the dog should be taken home or to bylaw so the dog dosen't do it again
- Yes, if a dog bite occurs with enough severity to call police the responsibility of the owner should be to make a statement. At this point in time though, police officers should be taught that the dog is likely not cause of the problem, and the responsibility lies on the owner or a victim who may have not heeded requests by the owner. The police should also be taught to not escalate tension for the dog - they legitimately don't know any better.
- Accountability
- A responsible owner should have no problem staying on the scene if their pet is at fault, unless the pet needs to be removed from the scene for safety reasons
- I think the owner should stay if their dog did hurt someone.
- Yes, this will allow for the possibility that owner of said dog may be held responsible for any damages done to another person or property or other animals.
- In whose mind would it be okay for owner to leave??
- A responsible owner is responsible for their pet and anything it might do
- Same as a traffic accident.
- I think the owner should be taking responsibility for how they train their dog.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of the dog. They need to ensure they share their information.
- I feel like everyone should be able to state their side of the story.
- necessary information is required in order to properly deal with the situation and being able to communicate with the involved people would help the process
- If the bite is severe and the person needs medical attention then the owner should pay for any meds needed if not covered by insurance. If the bite is not severe and does not require medical attention then the owner does not need to stay there.

- The options regarding pit bulls in this survey are saddening and incredibly out of touch. I encourage you to read a bit more regarding the genetic nature of the dog to realize it has nothing to do with the breed and everything to do with the owner. Pit bulls should not be singled out in this survey.
- As a responsible dog owner, if my dog was involved in an altercation, I would remain at the scene until the issue was resolved. I hope other responsible owners would do the same.
- An owner needs to be responsible for their dog at all times.
- All dogs can bite and the owners of those that do should be held to account. BSL places the responsibility at the wrong end of the leash.
- Common sense, if a bite occurs, there should be paperwork shown to prove they've had their shots, to rule out things like rabies etc when treating the bite victim. And the owner should take responsibility. If a dog bites someone who is attacking the owner, that is a whole different scenario and should be treated as such..
- its their pet
- It's still a form of assault so contact information should be required
- It is the owner's responsibility to ensure their dog behaves properly. It is their responsibility to deal with consequences should the dog act out.
- Need accountability
- And if not major fines to be enforced
- Unless the dog is also injured, this seems reasonable
- It's not the dogs fault they were trained, or lack thereof, to react in a certain way. A dog can only be as good as it's owner. Support more educational measures and not breed specific legislation.
- That should be a given for a responsible dog owner
- To keep a record of the incidents to help any future cases against the dog. Take all facts into account (why did the dog bite in the first place?) To assess if the dog is getting proper direction from their owner.
- Was it a nip or a real bite ? Different people interpret different ways. Some dogs inherently nip for herding and social training of other dogs. The real question is how do you enforce the rule, especially if it's a real bite scenario.
- Owners need to be responsible, PITBULLS ARE JUST ANOTHER DOG AND ALL DOGS SHOULD BE TREATED EQUAL. Owners need to be responsible for THEIR dogs actions
- Its respect
- Owners need to be accountable for the actions of their pets.
- they need to take responsibility
- these accidents are often just as harmful and costly as a car accident, if not more emotionally damaging in some cases. should be treated the same way.
- Information should be shared regardless of the severity of the incident and size/breed of dog. I have had dogs attacked by small breeds before and the owners have simply laughed it off and walked away.
- Recently a putbull got out of its yard and attacked my dog while on leash walking on the sidewalk. The pit bull bit my dogs neck and would not let go. The owner couldn't get it off my dog. The owner ran away with their dog and left me no information. The surgery cost me over $800. It was traumatizing and they should have had to pay for the damage they inflicted on my dog.

- Owners need to be responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- For the same reasons you should have to stay after a vehicle accident, it should be the same for animal related accidents.
- Pet owners need to be held accu
- Yes if a person is bit, no if a dog is bit.
- could then track incidents and flow up foe owner accountability
- If necessary can be determined by the phone call to bylaw officers
- The owner must take responsibility for their let's behaviour.
- The owner should first be able to calm their animal(s). If that requires leaving and then returning, that should be considered.
- Like a car accident. Take responsibility.
- I'm really disappointed that our city is looking at punishing the dogs for being a specific breed, rather than doling out consequences to irresponsible pet owners. I have met far more aggressive and undisciplined chihuahuas and shitzus than I have pit bulls.
- Taking responsibility for your dogs actions (no matter what the breed or size) is part of being a responsible owner.
- I hope this could lead to responsible dog owners but based on the rest of this survey I worry that this will be used unfairly against certain breeds
- Yes. Owners are responsible for the training and care of their pet, no matter the breed or size.
- The owner should always be responsible.
- Legal liability of the owner
- It's their responsibility
- Pet owner should be held responsible
- This law is absolutely necessary so that the victim is not getting into a confrontation with the owner of aggressive dog after the incident. The other advantage of having this law is it will cause the owner of aggressive dog owner to break the law if they flee the scene after the incident.
- NO EXPLANATION REQUIRED
- Owners need to take responsibility for any incidents
- This should be in place if the person that was bitten requests it
- This would allow for effective follow up for the above enforcement options
- Dog owners should be held accountable for the incident. This includes both dog owners. Each owner should give a statement of the incident. Just like a vehicle accident. This includes all dog breeds small and large regardless of the bite or attack.
- As a pet owner we should be responsible for everything that our animals do.
- It is important as part of responsible dog ownership to remain at the scene of an accident and share contact information and speak with an enforcement officer. If a dog bites another person or animal because it was provoked and it was in self defence, this should be taken into consideration. The exception to this is if a dog or person is in need of medical/veterinary attention.

- I think it's only fair you take responsibility for your inability to understand your dog or lack of training. If you're a dog owner you need to know their triggers and their behaviours - you're dog can't take responsibility for their reaction. They should never be put into a situation where they can harm others with their reactions.
- It is a dog owners responsibility to ensure their dog is looked after and trained appropriately. Anyone that cannot put in the time to properly train a dog does not deserve to even have a dog. Period. That being said, dog owners need to take responsibility for their dogs inappropriate behaviours (without euthanizing a dog that is not terminally ill).
- There must be a discussion about the severity of the bite and what the next step needs to be. Also, the aggressor should be assessed to determine the likelihood of such an incident to occur again.
- Only for severe cases (when caused an injury for example)
- The dog is like a person's property, like at a car accident
- It is fair to stay on site so that both parties can explain their side of the story
- Should be a chargeable offence if the person responsible for the dog who bit someone/another dog, leaves the scene of the incident
- If a dog bites another dog there could be vet bills for the injured dog which the owner of the guilty dog should pay.
- as a dog owner it is your responsibility. Dogs should be treated with the same care and responsibility as you would your child.
- I think it's in both parties best interests to be able to make statement while they still recollect the details of the incident
- There needs to be an explanation? To be responsible
- It should be like a car accident, reported and reviewed.
- The owner should not flea the scene if their pet injured another person or animal.
- A lot of the time when a dog bites someone the owner leaves the scene with the dog. I think when they do that the owner should go to jail and get a fine.
- Responsible pet ownership
- Not necessary because bylaw officer should be involved but the vet if the dog that got bitten might need additional information from the other dog to help treatment
- If you are a responsible person you would do this anyway.
- if they leave, and someone was mauled or a pet killed, no one will know who to put the responsibility on
- The owner is responsible for their pet and any damages or assault should be the pet owners responsibility. Too many owners leave the scene and it's difficult to track them down. Their dogs may seriously injure the next person and that should be prevented
- There are always two sides to a story. The owner should remain at the scene but enforcement should only be necessary if the incident is severe.

- I'm not sure why anyone would leave... I am not a dog owner, but if I was & my dog attacked, I would be responsible. I would stay with the victim as long as they need.
- A dog owner is responsible for their dog's actions.
- Just as in any other accident, etc. People should remain on scene. Not only to make sure everyone is okay & be responsible with steps moving forward, but also allow everyone to speak their mind in a professional, safe environment with the enforcement officer
- If an incident occurs NO MATTER THE BREED then the owner should take responsibility and law enforcement should consider the situation— off-leash dog attacks a on-leash pittie, pittie is not at fault etc.
- If any dog bites another animal or person the owner should most definitely give any info they have as well as pay for medical bills. Vet bills, pain meds etc.
- It is always important to have both sides of the story
- I would support fees or fines if a dog owner left the scene after an incident with no contact details
- Same as any other offense committed by an individual.
- The owner of the dog is responsible for their behavior and therefore should remain at the scene like a parent would for a child
- Owners must be held responsible for our pets
- I think it is important for owner to take responsibility for their dogs actions. If they do not take responsibility in that moment, then the behavior doesn't get corrected and it will happen again. This will ensure that this owner is in the system and bylaw is aware of a potential nuisance.
- Same as with a vehicle collision, the people involved should be present when enforcement officers arrive.
- And be fined for leaving the scene. See too much of this
- Owners should be made accountable for dogs that cause harm. If not required to remain and share info, they may avoid the consequences of punitive action, perhaps allowing the dog to become a repeat offender and the victim would not see any justice.
- The pet owner needs to take ownership and responsibility
- It's the right thing to do!
- The owner must be held accountable for the actions of their dog.
- Bites are obviously dangerous and can lead to infection. This may or may not be the dogs first time biting, so I think it's a good accountability measure. It may also deter owners who have anxious/anti-social dogs from taking them to at-risk areas (off leash dog parks)
- They need to take responsibility.
- In most cases, dog reactivity is dictated by the owners own irresponsibility to not provide proper training to a reactive dog, that they do not appropriately read their dogs' body language, or put the dog in an environment where they are more likely to be reactive. I believe that in the case of the majority of incidents such as the aforementioned, the fault lies on the owner, and this rule may increase owner accountability.
- Self explanatory
- Dog owner should take responsibility for the dog they own.

- Pet owners need to be held accountable for their animal's behaviour. And record of repeat offenders need to be built/maintained.
- People need to be responsible and accountable for their actions and/or pets. No different than hit and run accidents. Remain at the scene!
- They should stay if there's a witness to confirm the conditions!
- need accountability
- The owner should be strictly liable for their pets behaviour and should remain at the scene. The officer should be able to provide resources to the owner for how to properly act around a dog and how to train the dog.
- Of course. This just makes sense
- This would improve accountability
- This way they couldnt get away, and police wouldnt have to track them down. However, it might not work if the owner doesnt have a means of controlling the dog while they wait.
- People need to be responsible for there pets plain and simple
- People put their hands on other people everyday; usually it is dealt with in a way no one is hurt. I have personally broken up fights outside my building. I am not asking for anyone to be held accountable; however, as an owner of a Rottweiler I think this is incredibly biased.
- The issue is never with the dog. It's with the owner. They need to be held accountable.
- Person can know if dog is up on vaccinations, person should get help if assistance is require. Person should exchange information so charges can be laid if requested. Person should be liable for any medical costs associated with damage done by their pet.
- People should be held responsible for not having control over there dogs. If someone gets bite by a dog then that person should make the call.
- It's their responsibility as they are responsible for their pet
- A responsible pet owner would and they aren't the people you have to be concerned about.
- The owner should be liable to provide information on the dog and a record should be kept of the incident
- The dog owners perspective is also to be considered such as the actions of the person bitten that may have agitated the dog.
- I think this should be required by the dog owner or the person responsible for the dog at the time (ie. Dog walker)
- To obtain fresh evidence from stakeholders—anyway one must remain at scene of a serious incident, i.e. a dog bite.
- I would want to see more specific guidelines around severity, age or ability of the person bit, etc
- Just like at car crashes both parties should stay at the scene
- It's not already a rule??
- They should be able to defend their dog. Most dogs don't attack unprovoked. Usually there's more to the story.

- I was fortunate when my dog was bit that the owners were responsible. They were incredibly apologetic and forthcoming, and they paid for the stitches and other medical attention my dog required. Many people are not this way, and I don't think the owner should have to shoulder the cost. It also should be on record if a dog has aggressive tendencies, and perhaps they should be encouraged to keep these dogs on leash.
- Any incident invoking 2 or more parties should have to stay until the matter is cleared or can be proceeded with and all information exchanged.
- Yes if there is any injuries and fights
- Its a scene of an incident, wait for enforcement officers
- people need to be responsible for their animals
- It's always the responsibility of the owners.
- No different from other accident situations where parties should remain at the scene until authorities arrive
- Yes both parties involved should remain at the scent to give a full report to an officer.
- They should take responsibility, just like a vehicle collision.
- The owner's responsibility to train her/his dog, and keep it well. It is breed neutral, I have seen pit bull as therapy dog and vicious golden retriever.
- My son got bit by a dog and we have no idea if it has rabies or not!
- animal behaviour is a result of training and handling, owners should be held accountable.
- Same law as hit and run
- They are responsible for their dog, including the dogs actions. Train your dog and train yourself on dog behaviour and body language.
- T
- If someone gets hurt, stay there! Ethically and morally its an obligation!!! Officers also need to focus on bias training not only regarding animal breeds but also what they expect the animals.to behave like or what they assume about the situation because of their reaction to someone's gender, race, or attire.
- This should be mandatory - a dog is a property and extension of the owners liability. If you leave the scene of a car accident where person or property is damaged it's a hit and run. The same should apply to dog bites to humans or property (animals)
- The owner is in charge of their animal since they did not train the dog well enough to not bite someone. Dogs are trained to hurt, singling out a certain dog breed is unfair and we should be punishing the irresponsible pet owners for their negligence.
- of course they should remain at the scene, it is like being in a car accident ...
- we must get all sides of what happened. If the person leaves you can't get that.
- Ideally there is most always a reason for a dog to react. It's best to have both sides heard personally. The dog just doesn't bite unless threatened or possibly Scared.
- You are responsible for you pet

- People need to take responsibility for their dogs' actions. That being said, sometimes it is another's actions that cause an issue with a dog. Having someone at the scene (not an officer, but maybe a representative) might provide a clearer picture of the situation.
- The owner of the dog who bites should take responsibility. If they know the dog is aggressive towards other dogs and/or people, then the dog should be muzzled. But if it was an accident, say a person was annoying the dog before the dog bit them, then that person should also take responsibility. Accidents happen.
- It is your responsibility as a pet owner, and it is the right and moral thing to do. I fully agree with this, and failure to do so should be dealt with accordingly.
- Yes! Because it's the owner's fault for poor training of the dog. Stop blaming the dog!
- It is important to hold the owner accountable for their negligence. This could hold the owner accountable for abuse toward the aggressive dog, or lack of training if the officers investigate the situation. It would also help identify any risk of disease or infection.
- I think it is always a good idea to get the full story right away so to not let people leave the scene just like in a car accident.
- An animal is not just a pet, it's the owner's property, so just like in the event of a car accident, the other party is responsible to share information and/or pay for the damage.
- Yes, regardless of the breed, dogs can bite. Go after the owners, not the breeds!
- If your dog bites someone and you leave, that's not like leaving the scene of a crime??!
- It allows for the person injured to receive real contact information.
- It's like an accident - both parties involved should stay at the scene until matters are discussed with an enforcement officer.
- Owner is responsible for pet.
- This is a thing during vehicle incidents, why is it not already happening for dog incidents?
- Yes, unless care of the injured individual or animal requires immediate care. All efforts must be made by both parties to have shared information. The pet owner is responsible for their pet's actions.
- Of course, the dog owner should remain on the scene to share information. They should be responsible for any bills that arise from the bite. Our dog was attacked and the owner took off with his dog, leaving us with an emergency trip to the vet and a $1,000 vet bill.
- As long as the dog is not taken away from its owner. This will be very stressful for the dog. An investigation should be done, there could be numerous reasons a dog would, it doesn't make the dog aggressive.
- I feel like people will flee the scene if they believe their dog will be taken. There needs to be more forgiveness for dog aggression.
- Absolutely, if a dog bites and someone has an issue with it, then yes, there needs to be a rule that requires the owner to stay at the scene.
- If someone's dog bites a person or another dog, they should give their information and be able to press charges or that person should be held 100% liable for paying for damages done.

- In severe cases. In some areas the cards are stacked against good guardians with poor public knowledge on the breed and people acting out of unsubstantiated fear. Making a mountain of a molehill. However! I do believe in responsible positive reinforcement training and this takes a lot of patience. I would rather see funds going into preventative measures, like educating dog owners on the importance of behavioural training and exercises. This goes for all dogs! Big & small and every colour Inbetween.
- Hold owners accountable for poor dog behavior. Dont generalize and punish an entire breed.
- Pet owners are responsible for the their conduct and that of their pets.
- it seems reasonable and as part of owner accountability that they would do this anyway
- makes sense that the owner gives their side of the story as well
- The owner must be responsible and be able to present their side of the incident.
- Depending on severity, if hospitalization is required then the owner of the dog should remain on scene, if blood is not drawn then there should be no need
- The owner must act responsibly and cooperate with enforcement personnel.
- I feel as a responsible pet owner, the best thing to do in a situation such as the one above would be to remain on the scene.
- I can't believe this isn't a rule already.
- absolutely. the owner shall be responsible for the dog's action like a parent responsible for a child's. This is no different from a car incident or any other incident that requires law enforcement at the scene.
- The owner should take responsibility for any incidents that may occur concerning their pets.
- As like any incidents some information may be very important on what steps to take after like if it has its shots? Is it a neuciense ? Re occurring issue for owner and pet ?
- It's just like a car accident. All parties must remain on scene to provide information
- Its nit the fault if the dog. Its irresponsible pet owners
- I think it's important that if your dog bites a person or another animal, that you take responsibility for it by sharing your contact information if there are any costs. However, sometimes when a dog bites another, it may not have been their intention and could have been the other dogs fault so I think both sides should be taken into consideration.
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for their dog's behaviour as they are responsible for the animal itself.
- Only if it is severe enough and damage is done.
- It is no different than a motor vehicle accident where an injury has occurred. Be accountable.
- If someone dog bites another person there needs to be someone there to explain the situation. Bites often occurs when the victim was being to forward with an animal
- Owners should be responsible for their pets, and dog bite causes can ultimately be traced back to the owner, whether it be lack of training, control, supervision, etc.
- Absolutely also with small dogs not just pit bull type breeds

- Too many owners take off with their vicious dog, leaving victims responsible for all treatment and trauma (physical and emotional) to dogs and humans. Too often it's next to impossible to find the person/animal responsible and hold them accountable.
- First of all no dog should not be loose, without supervision eg: off leash park. Most definitely personal information should be shared..
- Person has to wait for an officer
- The owner of the dog need to take responsibility for it's actions. no matter the breed. Obedience training should be a requirement for owning a dog. Not breed specific
- In the case of a human, yes. In the case of another dog, yes, but in most cases law enforcement should not be needed, just share contact information to pay for the vet bill.
- The owner should be accountable
- Well it's pretty much self explanatory
- It should be treated the same as if at the scene of a MVA.
- How is this not already in place?
- Should stay to deal with investigation
- I believe your pet is your responsibility. Owners should be conscious of their pets ability to interact with people of all ages, dogs of all kinds and in all environments. Accidents do happen, so staying at the scene of an incident and exchanging contact information should be required to record both persons statements and decide if medical attention is necessary.
- You're required by law to remain at the scene of a traffic accident. You should be equally required to remain at the scene of any POTENTIALLY at-fault incident, not just with motor vehicles. This would make sense to apply to ALL pets as well.
- If there is a bite or attack all persons and witnesses should remain at the scene . If my Staffordshire was attacked and defended himself or my life he should not be at blame .
- It's responsible
- People leave before checking the condition of the other dog or person as they know they are in the wrong and it is not the first time their dog has been involved in a situation. They are not a responsible pet owner. People need to be held responsible.
- Vital information about the animal could be shared immediately.
- I support a rule that requires pet owners/the concerned parties to swap contact information for the purpose of creating an online incident report list which would be used to suggest behavioural therapy to 'problem dogs' or otherwise assess ways to help the dog coexist in the world. Euthanization should only be a very last resort, after every other option has been tried and exhausted.
- If your dog attacks someone or something it is your responsibility to make sure they are okay and have the means to contact/know you. It's the equivalent to a human attacking another human.
- Defining what is necessary should be required
- if the other animal needs care this becomes a civil matter
- Housemate bitten multiple times, multiple dogs. Owners never own up to their responsibility. The laws you have are unenforceable, the ones you make will be too, because the owners & dogs walk away. Not every person in the midst of a traumatic attack whips out a camera to document dogs and owners. Mandatory obedience training at accredited facilities with the first issue of a licence would be a great start, since bad dogs stem from lazy owners who don't know how to control their dogs. In fact, it's probably the way to have the greatest impact on aggressive dog situations. Mandate training from first day of registered ownership, automatic refresher if there's any incident.

- Similar to an automobile collision, it is my personal opinion that by making the decision to own a dog, you assume responsibility for what that dog does. If the dog bites a person or other animal, it should be treated in a similar way to an automobile collision (requiring staying at the scene, exchanging contact information, given statements if necessary, etc.).
- You would be stupid to run away and not share contact information
- Be responsible. If a dog bites, it wasn't trained well. That's on the owner. The one who was bitten should be able to get answers.
- It needs to be put on record so if it happens more than an allotted amount of time you can label the dog a nuisance dog, etc.
- People are responsible for their animals
- Dog owners MUST be held accountable for their dogs- this is crucial in order to maintain safe public spaces for every person and animal
- If the victim would like to call an enforcement officer and take this further.
- While being accountable is important, this allows for the owner to help ease the situation and calm people down before a "witch hunt" can happen. Because the lines between victims and non victims are not black and white in the majority of biting incidents. Many dogs don't bite unprovoked
- If you cause harm to any other person or animal in any other situation (ie. Hitting with car, physical assault) you are required by law to remain at the scene to share contact information. Animal bites should be no exception, this should be treated like a hit and run.
- It is appropriate and a responsible thing to do.
- Not fair, they should stay and pay the damages.
- Safety- taking responsibility for your dog
- The owner needs to remain on the scene to ensure contacts are given.
- I agree and feel this should apply to all breeds
- Just like getting in an accident with a vehicle. I find people may flee the scene cause they are worried their animal may die as consequence.
- As a pet owner they are your responsibility. Just like a car accident you should be required to stay.
- the dog owner is responsible for their animal and should be reviewed.
- Like a car accident, both parties need to remain on the scene. This gives officers the opportunity to understand what occurred from both parties involved.
- Owners should absolutely be held accountable for their pets actions. Irresponsible owners should not have pets.
- It is basic human kindness. Something happens you stay and handle the situation
- once the dog is safely confined. If it is better to remove the dog to get it settled they should report it to bylaw.

- It should be treated the same as annoy other incident, especially if further action may be required
- Both Dog owners need be responsible,
- just like a scene of an accident
- Be a responsible pet owner.
- People need to engage and communicate regardless of who's fault it is as well as take responsibility for their dog's actions.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their dogs behaviour from both parties involved, sometimes the offending dog is not the instigator.
- It's a no-brainer. The person responsible should be held responsible and that is only possible if you know who it is.
- Just as with a car accident, it should be mandatory to exchange pertinent information in the event of a dog bite. If there is a possibility of infection by some sort of virus, ie rabies, the person who was bit and the dog owner should be informed
- It the responsible thing to do
- My husband was bit when riding his bike and the dog owner gave fake information. She left before an officer arrived so we never tracked her down. They should have to stay on the scene.
- Responsible dog owner's would never second guess exchanging information and helping anyway that they can.
- Very much like a car accident. Your property hurt someone else.
- They should take responsibility for their dog's actions and now run away from the consequences.
- Like a hit and run, if enforcement is required stay at the scene
- Accountability of the owner!
- Once contact information that has been proven to be correct (Ie: proof of address via drivers license, cell phone number being called to ensure the persons phone rings)has been provided, all involved persons should be free to leave.
- The same as in a car accident, one does or rather should not hit and run. There needs to be responsibility on all sides in regards to dog bites, it needs to be treated in the same manner
- due to how many people say their animal is okay and it results in an injury shows they do not feel responsible to meet the needs of the animal when out in public or a human comes to their home they should be held responsible and this would be a start by taking responsibility for the animal by having this rule or bylaw enforced
- As long as the dog itself can be removed from the situation to de-escalate the problem.
- Of course the owner should stay at the scene. Leaving the scene of an accident is illegal so this should fall under that.
- I've been bit in the past. The owners stayed, exchanged information and were extremely accountable for their dogs behaviour. I feel everyone should be entitled to that.
- It is the owner's responsibility to train their dog properly. If the dog bites another person or animal, the owner should be punished for it, not the dog.
- Drivers are responsible for the results of their driving. Dog owners, all pet owners, are responsible for the actions of their pets.

- It's better for these types of things to be on record for in the future.
- Important information must be shared about current vaccines and shots the dog has.
- "When a dog bites there are only two reasons how it could have happened.
- Bad owner who did not train their dog.
- The dog was aggravated purposefully, in which case it would not be the dogs fault.
- If necessary, the enforcement officer will be writing a report which goes to the Tribunal. The owner of the dog should stay at the scene to make the officer's report as accurate as possible so animals are not wrongly euthanized."
- More accountability needs to be put on owners, not on specific breeds.
- Owners of problematic Cats/Dogs are increasing. Receiving a heavy fine in the spot that can be decreased after registering the pet in behaviour correction courses, the cost of multiple infraction should make pet training a worthy investment.
- "Everyone deserves an explanation.
- It's illegal to hit a car and drive away, why not your dog attack someone or someone's dog or whatever and you walk away?
- Same situation, different variables"
- Owners of dogs that attack often leave without giving info or proper info, leaving victims without the ability to get recompense for injury.
- Self explanatory
- The owner, not the dog, needs to be held responsible.
- I think it can protect eh "victim", the dog, and the dog owner. Owners of problem dogs will still probably take off though.
- If it becomes a legal matter, witness statements are crucial. No better time to do it than asap.
- To regain control of a frightened animal or child by "leaving" is understandable but information must be exchanged and possible consequential bills (vet or doctor) must be paid by defendant.
- Unless the dog is distressed and the owner is unable to keep it under control
- because they need to be held accountable for the damages and the animal should be taken into custody right away
- If an owner is responsible for the animal they should provide their information if there is an incident.
- My last dog was viciously attacked by another dog while we were walking her (small dog picked up in the jaws of a larger dog and thrown around). The dog owner just sloughed it off and had we known there could be recourse for it we would have sought it. Dogs are taught to be vicious, they are not naturally this way. Bad pet owners are the problem.
- Owner's should be responsible if their animals inflict harm on others.
- Once their dog is under control they should absolutely be there to share their info
- Only if the victim requires
- If not, it's too easy for an owner to disappear.
- It is important that the victim obtain information about the dog and it's vaccinations. It also needs to be known that the dog has bitten and may do so again

- If there are actual bite marks, yes exchange information. Remaining at the scene might be dangerous however as it would be very hard to control your dog after a situation like that. YES TO EXCHANGING INFO ONLY.
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- My dogs have been there. They walk away. And say my dogs fine . Running free as mine are on a leash. They should pay for vet bills if need. I breed belong to CKC . So yes I look after my show dogs. I don't need them to be attacked by a dog that a child can;t control. Been there.
- When possible owner should be present to state facts
- Should be treated like assault. Don't get to leave the scene until it's been addressed.
- Owners must be held responsible for their dogs and making sure they are trained properly.
- All owners should take responsibility for their pets behaviour regardless of breed and should be held accountable
- Its called " Responsible Dog Ownership" take responsibility of what your dog did. Its not always the dogs fault, many incidences its the owners fault and the dog pays for it with its life. Not fair at all! Doesn't matter what breed it is.
- It may be serious and leaving the scene is dangerous to track down the dog who may bite again
- Responsible pet ownership
- I believe its the same as a car crash. And there should be a significant penalty applied for fleeing the scene.
- As long as the other party stays too. And enforcement officer is a horrid term. Whatever happened to Bylaw and Animal services? You sound like an American.
- Its an incidental no different then a car accident. You leave the scene its way worse for the person that left the scene. But make sure its in control first.
- It's every owners responsibility to train and maintain their pet. Regardless of breed or situation, each owner is accountable for someone or another animal sustaining an injury due to a dog bite
- It's the same as a hit and run, they need to stay there
- Need to get information to pay for any care.
- It is responsible for the dog owner to do so. They would be able to explain their perspective of the situation. Bias prior to hearing both sides cannot be allowed.
- Any responsible dog owner would remain there and would offer to make the situation right, but this shouldn't come at the cost of a dog's life. Offer course to educate and aid this in not happening again
- If a dog harms someone else, the owner should be held responsible.
- The person can explain what happened
- Owners should have to remain at the scene no different than a car accident
- In case a vet or doctor visit is required....
- Take responsibility as a citizen
- I think this should be the same as if someone ran into someone else with their car... exchange info at least.

- A dog attacking someone or another animal is very much like a person assault another person, doesn't matter the dog size or bite abilities. Too many small dog owners don't get held to account for their viscous dogs.
- The owner could take off and then the dangerous dog won't be dealt with.
- It is depending on the situation. For instance if a dog bites a person always yes. If a dog bites another dog not always. Because the bite could have been a provoked scenario.
- I think the owner is the equivalent of a driver on the road. My only concern is: what happens to the problem dog during this period?
- This is common decency
- If you hit a car you have to stay at the scene call the cops or at least work it out among your selves should be the exact same process
- No need to hide when it's innocent
- May need contact info for Vet bills and to report the dog.
- I have had my pit bull attacked by a golden retriever at a dog park before and the person took off. Yes dogs fight I understand that I wouldn't have want the dog penalized I would have wanted some help with the $5000 vet bill I had from his dog attacking mine. But proof not always the pit Bull attacking
- If necessary, yes. A dog bite can be traumatic for all parties.
- So that an unbiased third party can help determine proper next steps.
- Not related to this question: there is no science supporting the claim that pit bulls have a stronger bite than other dogs and you are feeding into ignorance by stating otherwise
- People should be held liable for the actions of their pets
- If a dog bites and causes harm.. Not a nip or mouthing(warning bite) the dogs history and medical information should be made known.
- The owner should not only be there to take responsibility but to tell their side of the story. The bite may not have been the dogs fault but the other person or dog.
- If a dog bites, the owner is responsible, not the dog.
- I think that putting the responsibility on the owner to provide details before the leave the scene but just like a car accident once information and id has been provided they can go. But safe distance may need to play a factor as well. Of the person can show a drivers license or other id for the other person to take a photo of. And if there is a bit or situation sometimes the offending dog waiting for authorities to show up could cause the situation to escalate further depending on location
- The victim in that case is within their rights to obtain contact information and call for an enforcement officer. If they decline then the owner and dog would be free to go.
- Discussed wether attack was provoked or not.
- They are responsible for their pet and therefore need to follow up if an incident occurs
- It depends on the nature of the incident,
- Yes. It should be illegal to leave a scene until information is exchanged, that or advised by an officer on site that they may leave. If an dog owner leaves, they should be fined for such action.
- I do think both owners should make this decision together if an officer needs to be involved or not.

- Definitely if a dog has bitten a person. Perhaps, it should be determined by the guardians of the dogs to decide if it's necessary when a dog has been bitten.
- It's common sense. Just like road accidents.
- If there is no immediate medical attention required they should remain at the scene
- It's important to take responsibility for your pet's behaviour as many people's pets are considered a member of their family. It's must be transparent and clearly communicated what immunizations the attack dog has had as well.
- its part of responsible pet ownership. Same goes for cats
- People must be held accountable and the owner must be seen with the animal. Was the owner having a bad day? Is he/she relaxed? Are they all amped up? Etc etc
- Hearing from all parties involved is important to best understanding the situation that led to the bite.
- It would be extremely immature and irresponsible to leave if your dog bit someone, regardless of the severity of the situation.
- I think if a dog attacks another dog viciously (this term should also be defined with restrictions. One bite is not vicious , tearing flesh and biting neck is.) or bites a Human (also with redirections, if the human is being an idiot and in this dogs space it can be warranted that they would self defend and bite) at a park or any location the owner should give contact information only for the reason the dog may need to be unlisted in classes to help with behavior. Not at all to be reported to police or to be suggested euthanized
- Totally reasonable and I'm shocked it's not already somehow a rule. It's just common decency.
- Its the dog owners responsibility to deal with the incident
- The dog is not the issue. There are no bad dogs, only bad owners. Blaming the dog (or a specific breed) is lazy and cowardly, and does not actually address the issue of irresponsible people who shouldn't be allowed a house plant owning a dog.
- If you animal bites Someone or Animal and you did not have necessary control of The animal but I reported a Chihuahua that was aggressive and bite me repeatedly and nothing was done. I disagree any animal should be allowed to bit but if you won't up hold in that circumstance you should not have the power to make choices like that as that is someone's family member your talking about having proper people owning Pets not the animals that is the problem
- This should be treated no different then any other accident. Owner must remain on scene until police arrive
- The owner is responsible and needs to be available if there is a problem.
- Everyone shares the same responsibility.
- It's important that the owner is educated and the dog trained if needed. There needs to be consequences for owners when their dog bites.
- Same goes if a person hurts someone, why not their animals?
- You need to take responsibility for your animal
- Should have been in place already honestly

- An animal can be trained as a weapon, any animal, and dogs are no different. We require drivers to stay at accidents, as well as witnesses with no personal involvement, why should an animal attack not hold an owner accountable?
- Seems pretty sensible to punish someone when they run away after they've attacked someone
- I do not think dogs should be restricted. However, I think owners should be fully accountable. Part of that accountability requires cooperation with law enforcement.
- Dog owners need to take accountability for their dogs. Irresponsible owners denying, brushing off, or becoming aggressive themselves about their dogs is a huge problem! The accountability needs to be enforced!
- must be accountable as ultimately it is the owner's fault.
- This is about ensuring accountability, dog owners are responsible for the proper handling of their animals.
- If a dog bites someone yes. If the dog has done no harm then no leave them be
- The owner is responsible for their dog.
- Responsible pet owners shouldn't have an issue with this.
- There should be information shared for medical reasons.
- The key words are "if necessary". A nip that does not cause visible injury should be exempted.
- Yes, depends on the severity of the bite of course and how it was instigated. Sometimes the other person can be at fault so both sides of the story should be heard.
- To ensue a record of the bad behavior in the event of ongoing issues as the consequences may need to be revisited.
- We should know if they have a rabies vaccine up to date especially
- most won't stay, so having a law in place means an extra charge they can receive, which is good.
- This answer depends on the severity, and enforcement officers should be subjective
- Undecided. I think the owner should remain because they are responsible for whatever their dog does, but the dog should probably not stay there if it could lead to further issues
- If ANY breed of animal bites another person, the owner of the animal should remain there to exchange information and give support.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- Or allow them to provide contact information to be contacted if and when an enforcement officer is available.
- The owner is responsible for their dogs actions
- There are no bad dogs. Just bad training. If that person flees, they should be charged
- You are responsible for your dog's actions, no such thing as a bad dog or breed, just poor owners ANY breed of dog can be aggressive, it's YOUR responsibility to socialize and train them.
- Again, owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour.
- It's important to make sure we know who the owner is.
- No different than any other incident that occurs in life, example a car accident. It is still an incident involving 2 parties

- Your Dog, your responsibility. Ensure the space is safe. Sort of like if you get in a fender bender, you say on the scene safely till the proper authorities arrive or you and the involved parties come to an agreement.
- I think it's important to have both sides of the story. Sometimes dogs only bite because they feel threatened or afraid.
- Owners must always be responsible for their animals
- I can't imagine why they wouldn't stay unless the victim said they could leave
- Clear description of the event is necessary to determine if another such event is likely in the future.
- Pet owners should take responsibility for the actions of their pets. Whether that pet is a chihuahua or a pit bull, the responsibility lies with the owner. Breed specific legislation has no place in a progressive society.
- Yes, you are responsible for the dog just like you're responsible if your car hits another car
- Educating owners as to their reasonability to advocate for their pet is crucial none more so in remembering they are animals who don't speak so do use their mouths in other ways to communicate fear (arising from whatever basis). Currently, we have three dogs, our tiny chihuahua is the only resident with a bite history (not since we moved to Canada). She is frequently approached by people (adults and children alike) who think she's "cute", and we never miss an opportunity to educate them to ALWAYS first ask no matter the dog "looks like", and to respect the response, which in the case of our tiny dog is "No, please don't stroke her." If we are ever in a situation where our dog(s) could be the cause of or involved in a negative event, we talk charge. As we commonly say "We are the humans, they are the animals!"
- The owner is the one that trained the dog, but if the person who got bite provoked the dog, than they deserve to get bit.
- People need to be held responsible for that animal they have allowed to have specific behaviours
- I believe it should be like a motor vehicle crash. Regardless of the type of dog, the owner is responsible for how the dog acts, if the dog bites me and it was unprovoked, the owner should be fined.
- If an owner's dog injures someone or their animal (which is considered property of the person) they should be responsible for any damages (as in medical bills or pain and suffering) their dog imposed on the other animal or person, additionally they should stay at the scene to verify that their dog is up to date on all of its vaccinations so additional medications are not prescribed as preventative measures (such as rabies shots)
- No different than a car accident
- How could this be enforced though?
- the dog is ultimately the owners responsibility as hard as it is sometimes
- If a dog bites a person or another dog then the owner should be required to do the right thing and exchange information
- Our dog was attacked 3 years ago, and the man left immediately with his dog. We've never seen him again, and the cost of her surgery was over $1000. We're so glad the Vet Staff cared for her so well because she healed and isn't traumatized!

- It's better to exchange information than to not.
 - It's your dog you have a responsibility to take care of what they might do
 - This should be required as a part of responsible pet ownership.
 - "-has the dog been vaccinated for rabies?"
 - -does the dog have a history of attacks, should it have been wearing a muzzle?"
 - It's called taking responsibility for your animal.
 - "Animal attacks are serious and can potentially begin a dangerous trend (depending on the initial incident)
- I believe that the person mat leave 'IF' they reauire emergency care for themselves, their pet OR a person who is with them AND they should still have to speak to an enforcement officer."
 - This allows the owner to share there information and side of their story
 - People should be held responsible for their pets actions/ lack of training. Treat similar to a hit and run with vehicles
 - This would be similar to a vehicle incident with waiting for police to fill out reports for fault and insurance purposes
 - "I believe you should be required to share contact information (first last name, address, phone number) but do not support a legal requirement to stay on scene to speak with an enforcement officer. Because after an Incident if the owner can't control the dog then he Must have the right to leave for the safety of the dog and the public.
 - I would support a requirement to speak with an enforcement officer as soon as possible after the dog is under substantial control (example a fenced area or car or home)"
 - The owner should be held accountable for the actions of their dogs actions or questioned for how their dog became so aggressive in the first place.
 - I think this is the best way to hold pet owners responsible for their dogs actions. I think implementing this rule would require what level of bite requires an owner to stay on the scene. An air snap? Contact with skin but no injury? A bite that breaks skin?
 - Dog owners should not be allowed to hide from consequences of their animal biting someone. If there is medical follow up needed, the owner should be responsible for it
 - Encourages accountability and fair treatment for both sides... like you would for an insurance claim
 - The owner must stay to speak with an officer to be held accountable for the dogs behaviour and have it recorded reliably by the enforcement officer to get the full story.
 - The owner needs to take responsibility if it's the dogs fault for biting or be there to defend the dog if it's not the dogs fault (ie: they were being provoked in an off leash park or if they were being hurt)
 - people should be held accountable for their actions, and a discussion about the dogs behaviour is important
 - How are you going to enforce this? Public vigilante? Give the public the right to use force to restrain people?

- Only if necessary (teeth entered the skin on any degree of any being)
- Similar to being involved in a car accident vs. a hit and run.
- Being responsible is part of pet ownership and if your dog bites you should remain and be responsible
- Pet owners should have to take responsibility for their dogs actions just like drivers have to take responsibility for their own actions.
- I have been in this situation and the offender fled.
- There's no bad dogs, only bad owners.
- I think that is just common sense and common courtesy
- Too often small dog owners don't see it as a serious issue when their dogs bite people/other dogs. It would be good for them to know they have just as much responsibility as a large breed dog owner.
- Similar to car accidents. If the bite is serious it may be important to know about vaccination status, etc.
- Same as a vehicle accident where someone is injured. Lots could be on the line.
- They need to take responsibility for their pet's behaviour.
- It is very easy for people on a walk with their dog to flee and not be identified. They should be required to remain at the scene.
- Animal owners should take accountability and advocate for their animals if an incident happens.
- Both sides of the story need to be heard. There's always 2 perceptions and 2 realities. There's always truth in the middle
- My youngest dog, at two months old was attacked by two dogs. The vet bills were considerable, yet the owner of the two dogs ran away with the dogs. If there was a bylaw that required her to stay, at least other owners would be willing to become involved if the law requires it
- The dog owner is responsible for what their dog has done. Seems like a no brainer??
- Only right that they stay
- Supports accurate data
- This would allow for bylaw to be involved and for repeat offender nuisance dogs to be evaluated for training sooner.
- It will help to identify problem dogs
- The same goes for car accident and should be for accidents of this sort. Dog owners are responsible for their pet and any actions they take. Ensuring the other animal/person is okay should be a priority.
- They need to take responsibility for their pet
- If your dog is aggressive the owner needs to be held responsible.
- your responsible as an owner to do what's right and as a witness to declare no false statements regarding the situation.
- ABSOLUTELY. A bite and run should be as severely punished as a car hit and run. A bite can leave permanent damage just as a car hit and run.
- If medical assistance is required the owner of the aggressive dog might be responsible, also this will allow the city to know if it is a repeat offender

- Yes, they should have to stay at the scene and exchange info in the case that someone or something gets seriously injured
- Common sense. You must be a responsible owner
- The animal may be the one who bit but the owner is responsible for the animals actions.
- That would be a responsibility as a pet owner.
- It is important to understand the history of the dog and what would have caused the behaviour.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their dog's behaviour, this rule could help make people more conscious about training their dog.
- For severe bites, dog owners should remain present.
- This would be important to track nuisance dogs. It should also be required that the owner of the dog pay restitution to any person/animal injured.
- There are no bad dogs their are bad owners if your dog bites the owner is responsible. This will force people to be more accountable for the actions of their dog and likely force owners to be more aware of proper training
- I believe a dog bite is like a car accident, and should be treated with the same level of care. You cannot live the scene of the accident if it is severe and that should be the same for animal attacks
- The more witnesses the better. It's also important to have the owner around to explain their pets behaviours as they probably know them best.
- I support this, but in cases where two dogs fight and both owners agree that there are no injuries an enforcement officer should not be required.
- This is a given. A responsible dog owner should be on scene to help determine who the aggressor was. Even though a pit bull would naturally be thought of as the aggressor, it is often not the case, but it is easy to lay blame. I personally have never encountered an aggressive pit bull breed and I am in contact with hundreds of dogs in clients homes as a contractor. In fact the most aggressive dogs usually are the smaller breeds.
- All responsible owners should remain at scene to discuss the incident, contact info, vet costs if necessary.
- I know too many people who have been attacked or their dogs attacked and there is no accountability. Ps- not by pitbulls or discriminated breeds!
- If your dog bites someone you are responsible in the same was as if you were involved in an at-fault car accident. You don't just drive away
- Yes some one was hurt and all information should be acquired regarding the situation
- While impossible to enforce without risking dangerous escalation by those involved in the incident, a rule against fleeing the scene that is accompanied by a fine may deter the owners from leaving the scene as well as being an additional punitive measure to owners that do not take responsibility for their animal.
- Yes, as these incidents are becoming more common, a well understood process that is to take place afterward (like what happens after car accidents - people share contact info, contact authorities if needed etc.) could benefit everyone.

- If it has caused any harm to any person or animal, it should at least be required to share information such as: Owners name & phone number, rabies vaccine identification, and pictures/descriptions of the incident and what occurred.
- It should be handled no different than a car accident.
- I am confused as to why this question requires an explanation. It is illegal to leave a crime scene - there should be no exception. Especially when the consequences could mean the dog will be euthanized without proper statements and information.
- An incident occurred and the person responsible for the dog should be held accountable.
- The owner or current handler of the attacking animal should always remain on scene until told otherwise by either the victim/victim owner or current handler of the victim, or enforcement officer
- It's about accountability. Everyone makes mistakes and if your dog causes a problem you need to own it
- The dog owner is responsible for all that their dog does. That includes any actions the dog may do. Take responsibility for what your pet does.
- I have 7 dogs on my farm and if one of them bit a person or pet it is my responsibility to come to a conclusion. Excluding the need for emergency veterinary care.
- If it is a severe injury to another dog and the owner wasn't paying attention or respecting other people & their pets they are also at fault. If their pet is to inflict a serious injury or something that may involve stitches or going to a vet, they should be helping cover that cost as vets are expensive. People need to be aware of their surroundings and recognize animal behavior and how to prevent accidents when possible, depending on the situation. They should be relaying both sides of what happened to the officer so they can make the best decision based on the information available.
- I had a dog attack my dog & I called in but no one came out to the scene & I gave the other person's info to the operator who would not give me the information later when I called back & I had to get a lawyer to help me find the owner to get my vet bills paid. If they would have come out while the owner was there I wouldn't have had to do that
- Again, in theory this seems reasonable but not enforceable. Officers are not readily available and ultimately the people that would stay are going to stay regardless of whether or not there is a rule that they could easily avoid.
- It's like hitting another person's car with your own, to leave would be immoral and you need to take responsibility for your actions. The same thought applies here.
- They need to exchange info. I want to know if the dog is up to date with vaccinations. It helps in treating a person who has been bit and another animal.
- If the incident is severe enough that warrants further action the dog owner should be held accountable
- If both parties stay to discuss and explain there would be less confusion and would practice ownership to the action.
- I would be concerned that the dog would cause additional damage, however, they would need to remain on the scene to ensure matter is dealt with (insurance, Obedience training)
- People should be responsible for their animals.

- People aren't allowed to do a hit and run so why should they be allowed to have a dog that bites people without justice being served.
- Unless the owner of said dog is taking the victim to an emergency facility.
- It's the owners responsibility
- Unless the safety of the owner is at stake, the owner of the dog that bit should be available to give information immediately after the incident.
- I think you are responsible to provide risk information to the person that was injured and provide an accurate picture.
- The owner should be responsible for the behaviour of their dog.
- It is important for pet owners to take responsibility for the consequences of their pets actions.
- Show that the dog can be restrained and it was an accident, or whether the dog is just overly aggressive due to other sources.
- As a responsible dog owner, you are responsible for your dog's actions. Just like a vehicle hit and run, owners should never leave the scene without appropriate follow up
- Any dog is the responsibility of the owner and as such the owner needs to remain at the scene until an endorsement officer arrives. The owner may have some feedback on why the bite took place
- Dog bites/attacks/fights should be treated like traffic accidents. Everyone shares information, and there's a protocol to follow.
- As a pet owner it is necessary to have responsibility of your animal.
- Accountability
- so that the owner and dog can be tracked to see if other incidents have happened before
- Enforces pet owners to be held accountable
- I think owners of vicious dogs should be held responsible when their dogs attack as it's their fault rather than the dogs
- It is the owners responsibility of the dog bite
- The owner needs to still be responsible for their animal actions and expenses if a dog bites
- Responsibility.
- To deter the equivalent of hit & run.
- Just like a car accident.
- If it's a severe enough bite, there should be a requirement similar to more severe car accidents where the police must be involved.
- Many owners are repeat offenders and are never brought to justice over what has happened
- Of course. Many terrible dog owners don't take responsibility for there dog and blame it on others. This is very important that they stay at the scene.
- It would be the equivalent of a hit and run in a vehicle incident. They should stay and be penalized if they flee and are caught.
- people who own pit bulls and let them run loose and attack other dogs and people should be subject to jail time.
- This is like a car accident. Must stay at the scene.

- Or call into 311 to get a file number and share that with the other party
- Severity of bite should be specified. Dogs play-fighting can draw blood and that does not mean the dog is injured.
- The cost of vet bills
- To provide any information that would be relevant.
- my dog has been attacked twice and the owner has fled and left me with high vet bills,
- I have read frequent news reports, and have anecdotal support, that Those owning vicious and/or nuisance dogs which attack citizens and/or animals refuse to identify themselves, or leave without consequence. In order for individuals to be held accountable for their and their animals actions, a legal requirement to stay at the scene is an excellent idea.
- Too many entitled people think they're above reprimand. It's also imperative to get the dog owners side of the story.
- Dog bites are VERY circumstantial, and not always the fault of the dog (ie, dog had been taunted, and the person did not listen to the warning signs and sounds)
- This is what a responsible person should do
- It is your dog, that is in your care. It should be no different than an individual who hits another car and is at fault. You must be there because in the event that the bite/attack was severe it should be on the owner to compensate the victim for their dog's actions.
- Easier to obtain information from all parties at the scene of incident. Plus witnesses can be interviewed.
- This is to ensure that the owner is held liable for the injury to the other animal.
- Some dog owners leave right away, leaving the victim without any recourse, especially if their pet or themselves have been injured. Owners should be held responsible for their pet's behaviour. There should be severe consequences for leaving the scene.
- Charge owners and not the breed. Bully breeds are not the issue, owners are. Do not discriminate against bully breeds
- This should be self-evident. If a dog owner does not remain at the scene of an incident (ANY incident) then it is clear that they are an irresponsible owner. Taking responsibility for your dog, and it's behaviour, and accepting any and all consequences for such, is a fundamental requirement of responsible dog ownership (be it a pit bull or a chihuahua.)
- Actually all parties involved should remain, just like in accidents or as a witness to a crime. Very often people get bit because they are not conducting themselves well around the dog. Before the dog is punished for possibly defending itself, if legal recourse is desired by the person who was bit, they should have to go through the same process as the owner.
- Yes, if a dog has been in a biting situation. Both owners of the dog in the incident should both be there
- Yes they should have to stay
- If the dog owner does not remain they are not a responsible owner.

- I've heard numerous accounts of dogs being attacked by dogs that were not under control and the owner of that dog provides false information or leaves. Responsible dog owners would not leave and take responsibility for their dogs actions. However I'm not sure how this could be enforced.
- The owner should be held responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- I support the rule however many owners don't recognize or take responsibility for their dog's aggressive behaviours. It would be difficult to enforce.
- If your dog bites someone you need to be accountable
- It's the right thing to do. If your animal causes harm to another or person, you are responsible for the outcome
- Owner responsibility
- There are usually a lot of circumstances and different sides to explore when a dog bites. Context is needed to ensure that the proper legal avenues are taken. For instance if a large dog, say Rottweiler, is at a park, and is charged by a smaller and more aggressive dog. The Rottweiler bites the smaller dog in defense of itself, or as a reaction to the aggression. Who in that situation is at fault? (Hint: its not the Rottweiler)
- If there were any serious injuries to my dog (caused by another dog), I would expect the owner to pay for any vet fees so I would need their contact information.
- People can get seriously injured from animal bites.
- Owners need to take responsibility, and enforcement officers should also be looking for signs of animal abuse in these situations
- For future follow up of incidences
- It the right thing to do.
- Why does this even need an explanation? You (your pet) has caused injury to another person or animal. You are responsible. This is no different than a car accident.
- It's the owner's responsibility to avoid a situation where their dog bites
- As long as it is safe for everyone involved. Sometimes it is better if the offending dog is removed from the scene asap.
- Generally a dog bite is the fault/responsibility of the owner, NOT the dog; therefore, their contact information should be given to officers for further discussion. Too much onus is currently placed on the animal instead of the owner.
- It is the responsible thing to do, it seems like common sense to me as a dog owner myself. Transparency and follow up should follow a process that includes sharing contact information.
- If the animal has bitten or attacked another dog. If the 'victim' ignored the warning signs from the other dog then they should be charged. Small dogs have a tendency to aggravate big dogs and the owners let them and then press charges against the larger dog/owner because the system allows it.
- A responsible owner will always remain at the scene, and if the incident is not their fault, will have no problem explaining the situation.
- To many ppl are taking off and not taking responsibility
- There has to be a clear definition of bite and clear and reasonable expectations. If a dog makes a biting motion, or nips another dog, but no harm is done, does this count? If another animal or person is pestering a dog who bites, is the dog and owner at fault? What if there is no visible injury? What if the dog is cornered, or harmed before it bites? What if the owner asks for the person who is pestering the dog, to stop? I think yes, they should have to provide information. I'm not sure staying at the scene is always do-able. You may need to get the offending dog out of the situation. Why is a pit bull, pit bull adjacent, or even a mix that looks similar to a pit bull, treated any different then other dogs. There are may mutts that have no pit bull DNA that look similar. These dogs won't get a chance at adoption with rules like this.

- It is the owners responsibility for their dogs action
- As with any other sort of infraction, an owner of any dog that has been involved in an incident needs to remain at the scene so that immediate investigation is possible.
- In order to hold dog owner's accountable, they cannot remain anonymous and should be reported to the city and local humane society/animal protection agency.
- If they are responsible pet owners they should stay to give the proper information. Ex: are the shots all up to date
- It's the owner's responsibility to properly handle their dog - if it is an unfriendly dog that has a lot of anxiety or antisocial behaviours or bites, the owner needs to ensure that their dog is under control and not put them in a situation where their dog responds with non ideal behaviours. Any incidents that occur should absolutely fall on the owner and they (the owner) need to be held accountable.
- As a long time dog owner I think I understand people who do and do not have dogs for the most part. As well as that dogs by nature are a bit unpredictable. I don't believe most dogs including pitbull's are usually trying to hurt anything, they are exerting dominance. However if a major incident occurs you have to take responsibility.
- Many run from their responsibilities
- If anyone injured needs medical attention it's up to the owner of said dog that caused harm to cover expenses.
- I agree that it is important for people to be held accountable in the event that this happens.
- It could be that the attack was provoked by the person bitten. Both sides of the story should be heard and assessed.
- I think dog bites are due to irresponsible ownership. All parties involved should remain on scene to exchange information and the owners should be given ample resources (access to training resources, be held responsible for vet costs, given resources to surrender the dog to a reputable rescue, etc)
- So the owner can be held responsible
- Owners should be responsible for training their dog and if they let a dog get our of hand ending in injury they should be responsible
- As a pet owner you are responsible for your pet's behavior
- The dog owner has responsibility for these actions which creates a larger priority in proper training,
- If it is a severe bite then I think they should have to stay until someone comes to the scene if the person bitten asks for that

- That is what a responsible dog owner should do. So that the dog in question and the owner in question can have an opportunity to defend themselves.
- Any dog biting incident should definitely include exchanging contact info to deal with any potential related costs from injury etc
- Owner is responsible for the actions of the dog so of course they should stay at the scene of the injury
- Context must be explained and managed when judging the situation.
- If a dog bites a person or animal then the owner should be held accountable; thus it should be at the victim's discretion as to how they should proceed and whether to involve an enforcement officer.
- Required to be a responsible pet owner
- For documentation and record keeping
- It is an incident and this should happen no matter the breed!!!
- It's important for them to stay there so law enforcement can be sure potentially dangerous dogs are identified to help prevent further problems.
- Owners need to be responsible for their animals, and provide vaccination and other information.
- Owners need to be held accountable.
- If your dog bites another person causing bodily harm or extreme injury then you should be held responsible, if you flee the scene there should be some sort of consequences.
- Owners of any breed dog are responsible for the dogs behaviour
- The only exception would be if they are the only one that can get that person or pet to required medical attention.
- Owners are responsible for pets just as parents are responsible for their children
- People need to take ownership of any incident their dog is in, just like their kids.
- When a dog attacks, the owner can feel they can run from the situation. I've seen it happen.
- The dog owner is responsible for their dog and they have a duty to answer and be held accountable for what their dog and/or their own negligence has caused other people.
- If they are at the site of the incident.....should be like hit and run when driving
- Owners are responsible for their pets and their behaviour, no different than auto drivers. They need to do the right thing or be charged with bite and run compared to hit and run.
- owners need to be accountable. Provide proof of vaccinations and proof of identification/ insurance to the officer
- Yes, responsible owners would do that anyway.
- When safe to remain on the scene and if bite/attack was unprovoked
- This would make a record of the dog biting the person or animal, in the case that medical attention would be required.
- I thought it was already required for a person to stay at the scene (whether or not a person actually does). Perhaps there should be an added fine for someone that does not stay at the scene. It is the responsible and honest thing to do.
- This is not even necessary for a bylaw as the criminal code covers this.

- As with any accident whether truly an accident or due to negligence the dog owner should be responsible
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets
- If it cannot be sorted out with the owners than yes
- It's like being in a car accident. If the victim requires medical attention that isn't covered by ahs, then the owner should be on the hook for the bill.
- The attacker dog needs to be held responsible and should remain on site.
- no different than leaving the scene of a car accident
- It should be common courtesy to stay at the scene.
- Pit bull owners are notorious for not registering, vaccinating, and taking responsibility for their attacks. Video after video shows them walking away after their pit bull attacks a dog or human. They are also notorious for claiming the dog doesn't belong to them. Swapping information can lead to determining the dog's owner.
- No explanation needed.
- Makes sense
- Yes I agree, but again, breeds shouldn't be taken into consideration.
- Of course the owner should stay at the scene if safe to do so. If not safe then they should phone authorities asap to report the incident.
- Pet owners responsibility on how animals react/act towards others
- No [removed] it's their fault for not properly training or controlling their pet
- Providing the bite is severe enough to warrant the presence of an enforcement officer.
- Or provide valid contact information if the dog needs to be taken home / away from the scene to calm down?
- Yes, so long as there isn't discriminatory legislation in place targeting pit bulls.
- This will hopefully enforce the owner to take responsibility i.e. if damage is done any and all medical expenses will be covered UNLESS the dog is provoked i.e. by a person antagonizing the dog by poking with sticks, throwing rocks, screaming or shouting at the dog and lastly raising their hand to the dog. By ALL NATURAL INSTINCTS AN ANIMAL OR PERSON SHOULD ALWAYS BE ALLOWED TO DEFEND THEMSELVES
- Dependent on severity. Who determines that? How is it defined?
- Like a car accident.
- It's common sense! Your dog has attacked and you need to suffer the consequences because obviously you can't control your dog!
- Unless it poses risk to the owner and other animals, the owner is responsible for the actions of their dog and should remain on site. If they cannot due to safety concerns, they should provide a valid contact
- "If ANY dog (any breed or appearance) bites, they should remain at the scene - ONLY if it is safe to do so. If they feel that themselves or their dog is in harm by others, they should be allowed to leave and contact bylaw to report the incident.

- In my experience the dog that bites is not the offender, they are the defender. Antagonistic dogs that owners have not trained and do not pay attention to will pester and attack other dogs. Normally a dog does not bite another dog without instigation. Even if the dog that bites harms the other dog, it is usually the biting dogs fault. This is the problem with the whole system."
 - This is the case of other serious incidents (e.g. car accident), so it is logical for it to apply here.
 - Yes. This can help work things out between both parties before it escalates. And if the owner is clearly a bad owner, an enforcement officer can help resolve this by encouraging the dog owner to take part in training.
 - I think if a persons dog has bitten the owners should stay until everything is sorted out
 - Yes because it is absolutely irresponsible for the owner to leave in the first place and they may be entitled to fines
 - Health concerns
 - This should be treated just like a vehicle accident to ensure that all parties are ok. If the parties involved exchange contact information they could, as with vehicular incidents, file the report later.
 - For no other reason than to file an incident report if injury is involved. No apprehension of the dog should be considered
 - Same as a auto collision, all parties need to remain on scene. Bite-and-run does nothing to help the victim.
 - As an animal attack is a serious issue, exchanging information is important for the safety of the victim.
 - Way to many people run when there dog bites another person, this would help ensure there dog does not bite again
 - This would reflect the same concept as requiring someone to stay at the scene of an accident until information is exchanged.
 - Owners need to be responsible for their pets.
 - Is is like remaining at the scene of a crime.
 - The animal is your responsibility and you must deal with the consequences of their actions.
 - It needs to be noted and filed to prove that pit bulls are NOT the problem. Lazy owners of disobedient dogs are the problem don't punish the dog punish the owner
 - "Humans need to be held accountable for the actions of their animals. They need bilaws enforced so the bite hopefully does not happen again.
- DO NOT MAKE THIS [removed] BREED SPECIFIC. ITS THE SAME AS SAYING A HUMAN WITH A DIFFERENT COLOUR OF SKIN IS MORE DANGEROUS."
 - To explain a situation and like a car accident everyone should remain to complete a report
 - Responsibilities- just like a car accident you cannot leave the scene of an accident
 - People should always stay at the scene of an accident

- It is similar to remaining at the scene of an accident. We know how much vet bills cost. The owner of the offending dog needs to take responsibility.
- It is similar to remaining at the scene of an accident. We know how much vet bills cost. The owner of the offending dog needs to take responsibility.
- All involved should remain at the scene of an incident, similar to if one was involved in a crime, or an accident. This ensures everyone's safety, especially the victims. Also, people are less likely to remember important details when they move from a scene that they have witnessed. This will help prevent people fleeing.
- More efficient as officers don't need to track down owner or person in charge of the dog.
- Like a car accident or any other offence, the responsible and involved parties should remain on the scene and complete appropriate paperwork, including police reports, incident reports and insurance claim reports.
- If the person runs off with their animal they are trying to avoid their responsibility.
- Yes, if ANY dog causes harm to another dog or human, the owner must remain on scene and be held responsible for any medical expenses and/or accept any interim orders given by an enforcement officer and prove completion of those orders.
- The owner of A dog that bites MUST STAY ON THE SITE OF THE CRIME (dog biting). Like a car accident- if you hit someone- it is a criminal offence if you take off.
- Yes if the dog bites a person, not necessarily if it bites another animal.
- I think it would be the responsibility of the owner to make sure they could be contacted for follow up. Same as you need to remain on the scene of an accident.
- It just like if you get into an accident you need to be there
- Otherwise it would be leaving the scene of a crime.
- Owners are 100% responsible for their pets.
- This can be helpful yes. The person of dog who is harmed should be responsible for the medical bills. But no harm to the animals.
- The dog owner should be there at the scene of the incident to also tell their side of the story.
- Whomever has custody of the dog day of incident should definitely be expected to stay at the site and release information. Just as you would in a car accident.
- Owners should be kept as or more accountable as their dogs
- Perhaps the dog felt threatened, one needs to know the whole scenario before forming an opinion
- Yes unless it is unsafe meaning the offender is unreasonable
- It's like a hit and run. The owner is responsible for the dog and therefore responsible for providing information so they can be contacted should complications arise as a result of their dog's actions.
- That is responsible pet ownership
- Just like a car accident.
- In case further contact/information is required

- The only time I don't think it would be a good idea is if the dog is still reacting, or if the dog was defending itself and the owner, or any situation where it could compromise the safety of anyone at the scene
- Take responsibility for your animal you trained it
- Owners of dogs that are responsible for causing harm or biting another individual must be held accountable for the consequences.
- It is the responsibility of the dog owner to own what actions the dog takes. If you have a dog that is behaving poorly, the owner should be held responsible for the dogs actions on a case by case bases.
- however, they are not likely to stay so this seems to be a waste of paper.
- The owner must be held responsible for the conduct of their dog.
- Exchanging contact information should be the bare minimum requirement. Allowing someone to remove the dog and themselves from the scene is probably better that forcing them to stay with potentially highly agitated animals and high emotion, but contact information should be required.
- Any dog involved in a serious biting incident has basically committed "assault" - so yeah the owners should stay and give their info to the police...just like if they'd hit someone with their car.
- Owner need to take responsibility for their dogs. And should already be staying if a case is going to be filled
- Proper ownership and responsibility of said owner. Can trace whether rabies needs to be taken into account.
- Likely will need to get that reactive dog away from any further triggering stimulus for everyone's safety so it might require the owner to leave promptly. But in this day and age with cell phones, you could likely easily exchange some key details.
- Just like any other incident ever, the owner must remain at the scene of the incident or else it would be the equivalent to a hit and run.
- It should be considered no different than a hit and run.
- Easier for both parties involved in the dog bite.
- Yes
- The problem is not the dog. It's the owners.
- People need to be held responsible if their dog injures someone.
- Important to treat the incident like a crime so that proper actions can be taken if need be
- If my dog were to attack someone or their pet and the incident was bad enough they wanted to contact authorities, I would want to stay to speak with authorities.
- Failure to remain at the scene should trigger severe consequences for the the owner and treated entirely separate from the actions of the animal. Animals do not understand our system of justice however humans do and should be held to a higher standard.
- I believe that because of the lack of training the owner of the aggressor dog should pay some cost for damages but the dog should not ever be euthanized.
- If a dog bites another person or animal it would make sense for them to stay on scene and speak with an officer to decide how to proceed.

- I think it is important that if a dog bites another dog or a human, that the owner and the person/owner involved stay and wait for law enforcement to come and make a statement. There are many reasons why a dog may choose to bite and sometimes it may not be entirely the owners fault. Therefore, I think it's important that both involved parties and witnesses stay to attest to what occurred and the circumstances surrounding the incident.
- Dog owners regardless of breed need to be responsible. That includes dealing with consequences of an ill tempered or ill trained dog.
- I am in favor of this, as it would reduce (or at least introduce penalties for) instances where the a dogs owner leaves the scene after an incident.
- Prevents false info being given by the dogs owner; accoutability
- Just part of being a responsible pet owner
- We need to know who the dog owner is and be able to track the dog to determine if it is a nuisance dog and apply the required penalties.
- The owner of the dog who attacked should have to take their dog to obedience training. It is always the owner's fault for not training their dog properly. I know very many lovely sweet pitbulls. Because if the way their owner trained them.
- If you get in a car collision, do you just [removed] off? No you sayy and talk and make sure people are okay
- Owner is responsible for all behaviours exhibited by their animal. In case of legal proceedings, information would be needed.
- To me that is a responsible dog owner.
- It's the owner not the dog. Proper training is necessary. A Pomeranian can be equally as bad as a pitbull under immature ownership.
- Yes, but that wouldn't happen, owner gets mad, we had it happen to us, not a good confrontation by the owner
- Incase the dog needs to be taken away
- A person or pet may need medical attention and the offender should exchange contact information so they can cover expenses. An officer should be able to determine if the dog has previously hurt someone
- A history of rabies vaccines needs to confirmed. However sometimes an animal exhibiting extreme violent behavior needs to be removed from an aggravated situation/environment right away to prevent further issues and there should be a way to gauge that type of situation and a way to solve it presented
- identify the legal dog owner
- If there is any damage done by a dog attack, the owner should be held responsible
- If an owner's animal inflicts harm on someone else, the owner should be held responsible.
- The owner needs to be accountable for their dog. A few owners at Southland feel they don't have to be accountable and there are many stories of aggressive dogs hurting little ones. My Bischon was bit by a Ridgeback and the owner told me to leave if I can't handle it. I said if I could get my dog away from your Ridgeback, I would, but I was too scared to.

- If a dog bites a person or animal then yes... Accountabilities then need to take place.
- Too many owners leave
- 100% you are responsible for your dog you need to make sure everything is ok and settled before leaving . Its irresponsible to leave the incident
- If you hit someone with your car would you leave? Enough said.
- People need to be made to be responsible for their lack of management.
- As a responsible dog owner you take responsibility for your dogs behavior. If it is a situation that requires bylaw then absolutely yes remain. Please note there are a lot of uneducated dog owners who think a dog growling is biting so there needs to be some definition on what warrants a call to bylaw not just some crazy person who doesn't understand dogs.
- Owner should remain on scene to determine if responsible pet owner, is willing to prevent future incidents, and is willing to take part in behaviour classes.
- yes. It shows accountability. additionally an enforcement officer should be a unbiased view in the conflict.
- An incident is an incident regardless if it's a car crash or a dog bite
- They should stay and take responsibility for their dogs actions and their lack of control over the dog.
- Just the same a a traffic incident, there are two sides to every story that should be heard.
- Its no different than a vehicular accident. Take ownership.
- Dog owners must be held accountable
- A good dog owner should remain on scene
- This is to ensure the owner will take the necessary steps to be properly educated on prevention and training
- Absolutely! It should be dealt with the same as a driver leaving an accident without doing so.
- Yes, but only if it caused severe injury, if it didn't just get over it.
- Not any different than a car accident. You're responsible for your dog and it's actions.
- People should be responsible for their dogs as long as the other person was following leash requirements in the city. If someone has their dog off-leash in an on-leash area and it runs up to an on-leash aggressive dog and gets bit, that should not be the fault of the owner of the aggressive dog.
- Just a good idea.
- Like a car accident
- Severe incidents need to be tracked, but two dogs playing at a park and someone nips at the other, you really gonna call the cops?
- If an owner or walker is their you can get a more accurate account of what happened instead of the bias statement of the person who was bit.
- Owners must take responsibility.
- People are equally if not more liable for actions of their dogs and animals
- I believe they should stay so they can make sure everything is okay. But I understand why they leave. No one wants there dog to be euthanized.

- If someone is hurt the owner still has to account for the incident to either disprove or approve the claim
 - "All dogs . Singling out of pit bulls
 - Is stupid .sre
 - You planning to take equal
 - Action against chihuahuas and poms .. come on.... a"
 - If another person or animal has been assaulted the owner of nuisance dog is responsible for what happens- it should be treated like a traffic incident
 - yes it has happened to me and the people tried to run away after their dog had injured mine
 - "My dog was attacked by a pit bull that the owner could not control! The owner dropped the leash and let the dog charge us and immediately grabbed ahold of my lab's neck.
 - He didn't even know what to do when he finally ran to us .
 - He was a younger kid .
 - Probably 18.. maybe 19..
 - But he was clueless.
 - So yes ! Owners of the animal should remain on the scene !!!
 - This COULD get tricky because if the animal that was attacked needs to get to an emergency hospital ASAP!
- I've worked in emergency animal hospital and having the owner stay at the scene would help ensure the victims vet bill
 - Be hopefully covered !"
 - Same as any issue. Depending on the situation and if it's safe to stay.
 - The dog has caused an "accident" and the owner must take responsibility.
 - it then gets the facts of both sides and a chance to pull video if needed
 - Owner should stay to notify bylaw if this is the first incident or if it's a recurring issue.
 - The pet owner should stay and make sure that the person/animal who is bitten has the support they need. This may mean the personal information of the owner so they they can help with payment for treatment if needed, as well as to give police/bylaw the information to track animals who are regularly involved in biting incidences.
 - I think the owner needs to take responsibility for the action of their dog not just take off
 - I had a bad experience twice of dogs biting my dog and the owners fleeing. This should be banned for sure. In both cases I am sure it was not the first time. Time to crack down.
 - You may need information about the dog well after the incident. I believe contact information is necessary in case a victim developed an infection or got ill after being bitten
 - Depends if the bite caused injury, if yes the owner should take responsibility. If it's a minor it should not be turned into a big deal.
 - It equates to a hit and run

- It is the responsibility of the owner for how all dogs behave
- So many people flee. I think there should be an ADDITIONAL fee for pet owners who flee from the scene, rather than stepping up and taking responsibility.
- Dogs biting individuals is often the result of poor dog ownership, not inherently the dog's fault, warnings and tickets would help support efforts to deter inexperienced and unsuitable owners from allowing poor behaviour.
- We as owners are responsible for our pets and if something happens that results in a bite, fleeing the scene is not an option
- This will encourage responsible dog ownership and will give both sides in an argument a chance to explain.
- There have been cases in the past where irresponsible owners flee the scene because they do not want to pay for the victim animal's vet bills. At which point the city should question whether that owner is a fitting pet owner.
- If the owner leaves the scene then how can the dog be tracked. Responsible pet owners should be able to own up to the situation.
- It would be important to know if the other dog had their shots etc.
- [removed]
- Comparable to a hit and run. Your dog should be in your control much like a vehicle.
- Accidents happen and owners should stay to be responsible for their actions.
- An owner is solely responsible for the behaviour of their dog. As such, just as in the event of a car accident (for which the driver is also responsible), dog owners should remain present until both parties have resolved the incident and/or until law enforcement has arrived to assist in the resolution of the incident.
- n/a
- My husband and daughter have both been attacked by dogs and the owners just took their dogs and left. They would not give their information and we had no recourse.
- Owner must take responsibility
- There aren't bad dogs there are however bad dog owners, this would hold bad owners accountable and in result force them to fix the animal's behavioural issues
- I agree as the owner of the dog should pay the vet bill. If the dog that got bit catches a disease from the bite the owner must be found
- I think this is a great idea as long as it is safe for everyone to stay. Good for both parties, especially since most attacks are not unprovoked it would be good for both sides to be heard.
- Dog ownership is a responsibility. Owners are responsible for their dog's behaviour. I think it's perfectly reasonable to require the owner to share contact info and/or speak with an officer.
- Owner should take responsibility
- It allows the owner to explain the incident and gives the dog a fair chance.
- Only if it is safe for the animal/owner to remain on the scene.
- For the owner to take full responsibility, they would need to provide and be provided all relevant information, so they should be available to do so.

- That is only fair that the individual stays to provide information. But all reasonings for the dog bite needs to be assessed as well. Just because a dog has bit someone or something doesn't mean they should be automatically punished. If they felt threatened or attacked by another dog then the bite is not necessarily unwarranted. The conditions and causes of the bite need to be thoroughly and fairly assessed.
- If the bitten party thinks it is necessary and requests the dog owner stay to discuss then I believe they should have to.
- Good idea
- Keep the owner accountable
- Yes it is the responsibility of the owner to make sure whatever the dog bit is okay
- You should stay there if the incident is serious enough. If Charlie bites fluffy and fluffy takes a dive then no. Common sense people.
- Owners should accept responsibility for their animal.
- Unless the dog was provoked
- Then the person can get training to work with its dog. More bites are from small dogs but not reported.
- It should be treated as an accident and anyone who leaves should view it as a 'hit and run' type incident
- Your dog is your responsibility, it's like being in a car accident. You don't just drive away. Sometimes dog bites can be fatal.
- Pit bull owners tend to leave the scene with their dogs.
- Owners know their dogs best, therefore should have the right to back their dog up. Same as it works for humans. They have a right to legal counsel, animals should have the right to their human helping them.
- Its the same as a vehicle collision. Stay at the scene, swap information and wait for authorities if necessary. But it Better be the same for any dog bite. City of Calgary is big on diversity and equality right?
- Any dog large breeds are unfairly targeted. I have family members that were permanently disfigured from a shitzu bite
- To ensure shots are up to date, a lot of people walk around without proof of I.D.
- Na
- It should be determined if the owner is fit to own a dog. The dog is not the problem, the owner is.
- This should apply to all dogs and not just pit bulls.leave pitbulls alone!!!! They are a beautiful loyal and loving breed. They shouldn't be considered a threat just because they are strong!
- For liability, medical reasons and to file a complaint. There should be a record.
- Mostly if a dog bites a human. I think it's fair that both parties involved are allowed to voice their side of the story at the time of the incident. I don't believe in a long wait as it could potentially be traumatizing for the individuals involved
- Untrained animals should have the opportunity to be corrected, and the only way that will happen is if the owner sees consequences.

- The owner is responsible for whatever actions their dog have taken.
- If dog owners flee and someone has been hurt by the bite then there is no accountability - it should be an aggravating factor if someone is proven to have fled the scene after their dog but someone/another dog
- It's like a car accident. It's pretty self explain
- It is the owners responsibility to give their contact information if further medical treatment is needed.
- Dog bites, even accidental, can cost a significant amount. Owners of dogs have been known to flee the scene to avoid payment
- What's to explain if a dog bites someone and an injury is incurred contact info should be shared.
- I believe the person should be able to tell their side and if their dog was the aggressor and provoker, be held accountable for fines, vet fees etc. I don't think it's right if a dog attacks another, is injured by that dog and is then able to turn around and claim the dog that defended itself is now dangerous, a nuisance or needs euthanization. (I.e. a Yorkie attacks a lab and lab bites back and hurts Yorkie).
- It is the responsibility of the owner if the dog does anything, because the owner trains and teaches the dog what it can or cannot do, if the dog bites another organism, it is not entirely dogs fault, it is either the owners or the dog responded to a stimulus, dogs do not bite anther beings for game or to hurt for no reason.
- The owner is responsible
- as a first time dog owner, i would not know what to do or where to go. If both parties involved stay, the incident can be viewed from both perspectives and it hold people accountable to each other and everyone else. like a car accident.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their own dogs.
- My dog was attacked and bit at the Sue Higgins dog park years ago by a German Shepard. If my dog had needed stitches I would have liked to have the woman's name so that she could pay for the vet bill. There were many witnesses to the incident and that dog should have had a muzzle on.
- In the case where a set of dogs cause harm to one another both owners should have to speak to an officer and leave information. Harm being the key word. No harm than no issue.
- Not staying in the dog owner equivalent of a hit and run vehicular offence. Owners must take responsibility for their dog's behaviour.
- The reason being is similar to a car accident. If an accident occurs information is swapped and police are called. By running away, it makes the person with or without the dog look all the more guilty.
- Unless dangerous to either animal or human. There are ways to pass on information without staying in a dangerous environment.
- The owner needs to be accountable for their animal's behaviour
- It's important to be a responsible dog owner and take ownership of any events that transpire with them.
- To reduce potential conflicts between owners there should be included in this recommendation a level of injury to the affected animal. This would be to avoid owners taking offence if dogs are play fully engaged and one dominates the other

- Aggressive dog behaviour is almost always linked to owner behaviour. Owners should be held accountable, or at the very least be available to provide information, following a biting incident
- Strict liability should apply here. A reasonable and sound owner should take responsibility of and be held liable for their damage to others. If we can hold a person liable for their car, accidentally rolling and hitting another person, we should hold liable the owners of a dog, that they consciously chose, biting someone. A sound and reasonable person would not choose a dog that is statistically likelier to bite and not train/guard it more heavily. This should be considered negligence. If you can bear to make the choice, you should bear to take the consequences of said choice
- It should be again the law for the owner to leave the scene of an animal bite incident. This would be similar to leaving the scene of a vehicle accident.
- Owner should stay until everything is sorted
- That is a given for responsible dog owners.
- I don't think it's necessary to add any explanation. One should remain at the scene always.
- This places more accountability on the people involved.
- How else are you supposed to deal with the situation if they leave
- It's too easy to just walk away
- While this isn't solely a pit bull problem, Schilder et al. (2019) @ Utrecht University found pit bulls were a whopping 56% of the dogs seized for killing other people's dogs. Fleeing the scene is so common, other pet owners have a name for it: "pit and run" (also "dine and dash"). It's a big problem and making it illegal is a great first step.
- As a responsible pet owner I feel that you would have to stay at the scene and deal with the situation. However if it is unsafe to do so e.g. the other pet owner getting upset and abusive then i would not stay but hand over my contact info.
- Just like a car accident, people should have to stay to report including witnesses
- They should exchange information such as photo id and contact info and if the situation warrants it, remain on site until officials arrive
- If it was required to share contact information I think problem owners could be identified quicker would in time decrease the number of problems
- It makes sense to keep the owners at the scene we're their dog caused damage, much like when a driver has to stay if they hit someone
- My logic for this one is the same that's applied in hit-and-run car accidents - all I want is for people to accept responsibility for accidents (because dog attacks are often just that) and learn the impact of their action/inaction on others. If I had a dog that bit someone or their pet, I think I would want to do my part to make sure it never happened again and that the affected parties were okay.
- Owners are ultimately responsible for their dogs behaviour.
- The dog owner should be responsible for the dog and the damages the dog caused and half to pay for the vet bill or meds for the person. Just like they would have to pay if their child caused damaged or they did in a car accident paying for the vet bill or meds for a person could end up being more than any fine.

- If there is a similar rule for car accidents, it would make sense that the owner should not be allowed to just walk away with no accountability.
- This should be happening in severe dog bites anyways. Definitely depends on the severity. If the victim requires immediate medical attention this rule should be enacted
- So they incident can be explained in detail, as it's not always the owner or the dogs fault.
- It's the responsible thing to do as a dog owner.
- It is a way to determine if the dog owner has been involved in similar incidents before
- its like a hit and run you should definitely have to stay. However if the person who was bitten leaves you should not be required to stay.
- Bites can be very expensive for owners. Owner of the dog which bit should be responsible for vet bills. Requiring information exchanged will help facilitate this.
- Absolutely, especially if an injury occurs because of the bite. I do believe then that the animal should be mandated to be wearing a muzzle in an off leash setting.
- Yes the owner needs to take responsibility if their dog bits someone
- All parties should remain at the scene as all are involved. (Just as you shouldn't leave the scene of a car accident, you shouldn't leave the dog scene)
- A responsible pet owner should be doing this anyways. I think exchanging information is necessary, enforcement officer likely not required in all cases.
- Normally if a dog bites a person or another animal the behaviour is due to previous or current abuse/lack of training. Incident specific action is required not bylaws biased towards pitbulls/large breeds.
- There's always two sides to every story. People aren't always innocent.
- I want penalties for leaving the scene of the incident.
- Same rationale as a car accident. Owners are liable for the actions of their pet, and should be held accountable for providing information to officers when applicable.
- Just like a motor vehicle accident, you shouldn't be able to run away.
- Just like an accident, all persons should remain until an enforcement officer can collect all relevant parties information
- Yes, be a responsible owner for your pets actions & provide your contact info. in case need to address incident.
- The owner of the dog that bites should be held responsible to provide Information.
- All owners should be held entirely responsible and liable for their pets. Penalty should be accurately delivered.
- I believe it is responsible for owners to be accountable for their dogs behavior and actions by remaining at the incident and providing contact information, particularly if harm is caused to another person or animal.
- but rules only work for those who follow rules, and if they are enforced. This is common sense - how do you legislate common sense???
- I feel this is fair. Not doing so would be Similar to leaving the scene of an accident if something occurred.

- If someone's dog bites a person or animal, the people involved in the situation should remain present on the scene to share contact information and share details of the event with enforcement officers. This process will help with insurance claims/medical claims/etc. that might result from the dog bite. The event of a dog bite should be treated much like any other incident that results in damage to someone else's property/person/pet/etc.
- when a dog bites another dog the owner of the dog who bit should be held responsible for any vet costs for injuries, just like with car insurance.
- This better be applied to EVERY breed NOT just the above named!!
- It's like a car accident, if you cause enough damage you need to wait for enforcement.
- It is the owner of the dog that needs the training. The owner is obviously neglectful in their knowledge and training of dogs and needs to talk with the enforcement officer especially if they own a pit bull or a nuisance dog.
- The owner is always responsible for their pets no matter what the situation. In this case it is important for the owner to take ownership for their pets actions and remain on scene to ensure the person or animal is okay and is able to get the help they may require.
- Like any other accident
- Enforcement officers may be able to offer helpful advice to owners who care enough to try to change their dog's behavior
- It doesn't do any good if there is a dog bite and the owner leaves the scene. This makes it more difficult to track down said owner. However, it is also a nuisance if there is a problem dog and it remains at the scene , causing more trouble.
- Its like a car accident, why flee and leave someone injured. That's inhumane and irresponsible. Yes the dog did it, but what provoked the dog? How was the dog raised? Dogs aren't born vicious.
- if you / your dog are at fault you need to be responsible enough to deal with the altercations that come with not training your dog properly. if the was was trained properly it would not bite any human or other dog aggressively
- Yes, assuming they do not need to go to the hospital or veterinarian.
- Similar to a car accident - dog owners just generally leave as quickly as possible. Having been bit before and the owner and dog left saying it was my fault (...) it would be helpful - but likely impossible to enforce.
- The owner should be held accountable but not every dog needs to be put down. Individual circumstances need to be considered in every case.
- Too often I've heard cases where people left the scene after their dog another dog or person. That is not ok. Pepple need to be responsible for their animals, especially when they behave violently
- There needs to be accountability for the dogs actions and repercussions for the owner
- If the owner leaves they are not displaying responsible ownership.
- Contact information should be shared if requested by the victim of a dog bite, or the owner of a dog that was bitten in case any follow up is required for any reason. Refusal should then require the presence of an enforcement officer.

- If a dog bites another dog/person then it is common courtesy to stay. Give info. And if a vet bill is needed for the injured dog the person should at-least have to pay half.
- Contact should be shared unless the dog was touch without the permission of the owner
- If a dog bites another person or animal, I believe it shows integrity and responsibility if the owner provides their information.
- It should be documented appropriately by the authorities.
- May be other circumstances that caused the reaction
- You need to get the owner's information in case there are veterinary bills so that owner can pay for the damages that their dog caused.
- Just like a car accident
- It's just the responsible thing to do.
- It's the owners responsibility to stay
- This rule would help hold people accountable for their animals
- It is your responsibility as a pet owner. Same as driving a car, you have an accident you don't leave the scene. As a pet owner, you stay with the victim until help arrives.
- It just seems to make sense that they would need to remain around
- It only makes sense that the owner take responsibility for their pet.
- Although in principle I do support it, this would be hard for the owner as if your dog bit someone or another dog you would want to get the dog away from others to avoid any further issues.
- A person is responsible for their dog and if that dogs bites/attacks another dog or person, injuring them, that owner should provide information in case medical care is required for the victim.
- What if the bite gets infected. What if this dog is constantly biting. It's a good way to track it
- Strictly for medical reasons.
- because an animal or person is injured and in order for due process to happen, information needs to be exchanged
- I agree only if it was serious.
- EVERY dog bite should have to be reported. If we are going to hyper focus on one specific type of dog, than it needs to be law that ALL bites are reported.
- Same as a car accident.
- To protect both parties.
- We need to hear both sides of the story
- working in a vet clinic, I see many dog attacks and most owners flee the scene without having any repercussions. the owner should stay and discuss with the officer what happened, and either pay for the vet bills or be fined (this should include all breeds)
- How is this any different from fleeing an accident or fleeing the scene of a crime? If a dog bites a person, a crime (assault) has occurred. The owner or guardian should have to be there.
- makes sense for insurance purposes

- In any accident whether it be automobile, pedestrian or animals. The person/vehicle responsible stays at the scene and does not flee, as they were responsible for the situation or at least handling the outcome.
- I will say yes with the caveat that there should be a clear definition of what is a dog bite; dogs often nip at each other while playing, so if it is an issue where the owner's dog has caused significant harm to another dog (requiring medical assistance and/or drawing blood), then yes, they should be required to stay. But I could also see this being abused as I've seen some owners get quite emotional (to the point of physical confrontations) over what appeared to be fairly minor incidents in off leash parks where neither dog appears to be harmed, so I can also see this clogging up the system/being abused by some people who are overly protective of their animals. I agree in severe/serious cases, but the wording above seems too broad.
- Responsible pet owners should be willing to speak on behalf of their pet. Both sides need to be recorded while fresh in memory, regardless of breed.
- The dog is never the problem, it is the dog owner.
- As an owner, we have to be accountable for the actions of our pets.
- Owners should take accountability for their dog's behavior. This also gives the owner the opportunity to tell their side of the story, as we all know there are two sides to every story. Especially if it's a dispute.
- Owners need to be responsible for their animals, and both sides of the event should be recorded
- I support the idea of the dog owners remaining at the scene. The only exception to this, is if their dog is in need of medical attention or if they need to remove their dog from the situation to avoid prolonged exposure to an over stimulating environment. They should however exchange details if they are to leave the scene.
- I see it as similar to a vehicle accident. Owners should be required to take responsibility for their pets.
- No different than a traffic accident, especially if there's an injury.
- owners should be accountable for their dogs actions
- Yes the owner should be held accountable for their dog, the dog should not be punished
- Liability. The story would not be one sided.. witnesses to the attack would be great as well
- The owner should be responsible for their pet.
- This is fair as long as the enforcement officer is humane and understanding
- It's responsible pet ownership to follow up on things pets do.
- If a dog bites another dog there could be a very costly vet bill which could turn into a legal problem and therefore an officer should be present in such a tense situation. This is all depending on the severity of the incident.
- Owners should be responsible for their animals the same as their vehicles. The law considers animals property
- The owner should take responsibility but the whole story should be heard. Ex if owner says no to petting animal and person goes ahead then the person is at fault

- Dog bites can be dangerous; dog owners should show cooperation & care for the victim as much as possible
- N/A
- The owner is responsible for their dog. They should have to wait at the scene of the dog bites. Just like you wait at the scene in a car accident.
- This helps with potential rabies cases and help to understand the health of the dog
- If the victim of a dog bite felt they needed to report it than the owner of the dog should have to wait. If it was a minor incident and the 'victims does not have concerns this shouldn't need to be a bigger problem than it is. Also BSL DOES NOT WORK, read statistics
- If the person leaves, there is a likelihood they will not be held accountable.
- THE OWNER IS RESPONSIBLE. NOT THE DOG.
- Same as a car accident.
- It should be the same as an assault charge.
- Absolutely. All parties involved should be present. It should be the owners responsibility to remain at the scene.
- As long as emergency action required then info should be left
- Any dog bite has the potential to be bad. People need to be held responsible for their dogs
- I've talked with many people at dog parks who have had their dogs attacked and the owner of the attacking dog just vanishes, leaving the owner of the victimized dog with a huge vet bill + traumatized dog and no recourse. It's like a hit and run.
- As long as punishment isn't given to the owner (such as confiscating the animal) then this can be a reasonable rule.
- If not owner should show others his license so he can be contacted
- I believe the owner should be given a chance to explain the behaviour of the dog. Many pitbulls belong to people who are aggressive themselves.
- People are responsible for these things. They should stay to find a solution. But i soynot agree that dogs should be punished for it. They dont even understand what is happening.
- Without this type of law, there is very little preventing the dog owner from walking away from the scene - in this case, there would be no repercussions for incidents involving dogs
- That's kind of a no brainer.
- As with MVAs, the owner is responsible for the actions of their animal and as such need to held accountable.
- My dog was attacked by three German shepherds a little over a year ago. The owner of the dogs left without a word to us. My partner knew he lived in the neighborhood and found him, but bylaw couldn't do anything about it. That is completely irresponsible dog ownership and he 100% should have had consequences for fleeing.
- Treat it as a hit and run
- The owner must take responsibility for their dogs actions. They are the ones that took them out in public

- Dogs can transmit diseases and pathogens so if the dog owner remains at the scene to share contact info, everyone involved in the incident can be clear on what vaccines the dog is up to date on and what possible diseases/infections may be transmitted in either direction (from dog doing the biting to the bit person or animal and from the bit person or animal to the dog doing the biting)
- It would be no different from accidentally rear ending someone on an icy road. No one asked for it to happen, but you can't flee the scene before the police get there.
- Just makes sense
- However, if the dog is still at the scene and a risk to other people or animals, the owner should be able to take the necessary actions to secure the dog away from the scene.
- I support the owner having to take ownership
- Ownership responsibility is paramount in dealing with pet incidents and this is a good way to deal with the issue of lack of responsibility.
- All dogs can be trained as a attack dogs. Every owner should have the same standards
- Same responsibilities as car crash or other incident.
- With the exception of if the animals require medical attention -that needs to be handled first
- I agree with having this rule, but I fail to see how it could possibly be enforced. I have seen far too many instances of owners taking off when their dog attacks or simply being so far from the offending dog that it is difficult to ascertain who the owner is. If a dog is attacked, especially severely, it is often all the owner can do to tend to their injured animal and exceedingly difficult to chase down the offender and force them to remain on scene.
- Dog and owner should be traceable and accountable
- I think its important to take accountability for our actions and if a person or animal has been injured they need to stick around or offer to pay for the animals vet bill.
- If a dog has bitten, the owner of the dog needs to be held responsible for it. Owning an animal is a privilege and a responsibility.
- If a dog attacks a person, the owner should not be allowed to collect their dog and leave the scene of an incident without speaking to an Animal control officer (not necessarily a police officer)
- I am a veterinarian. Often times if a dog and or it's owner have injuries obtaining information regarding vaccine status of the attacker is important
- Sometimes its the other person or dog who prevokes.
- Share contact information no matter how serious but if minor do not need to stay at the scene.
- Too much bias
- It would fall under being a responsible owner and individual.
- well its just like a car if u run over someone with ur car then u take off its called a hit and run... a dog bite followed by leaving is just like a hit and run
- Just as you cannot not leave the scene of an accident due to possible injury or damage you should not be permitted to leave the scene of an animal attacking someone without the police assessing the situation IF it can not be handled without a 3rd party mediator.
- People need to take ownership for their lack of control over their animals. Leaving the scene is a way to shirk ownership/responsibility.

- Would improve accountability
- Dog owners just run away and do not take responsibility for their dogs actions. They say that the other dog instigated the attack
- Yes absolutely I support this rule. That way the issue can be resolved quicker, less likely that the owner will leave before anything is resolved.
- Owners should be punished for the neglect to teach there dog proper public behavior.
- It should be considered the same as a car accident, no one intended for it to happen but it still did. There are massive costs and potential heart aches associated with a dog attack to themselves, their kids or their animal be it from vet bills, hospital trips, time away from work etc. The owner of the attacking dog is ultimately responsible for the lack of training they provided their animal that resulted in the event.
- It's important to understand why the dog felt like it needed to defend itself. Hearing both sides of the story is important to take proper steps forward. If a person knowingly or unknowingly provoked the dog, they need to be educated so that the incident doesn't happen again.
- Responsible dog owners would stay and give information anyways, but people who decide to not train their dogs, or seek help or just run away should be punished.
- Dogs can be unpredictable it does not matter what breed they are but owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions
- When a dog bites another animal or person, the owner must stay on the scene and be held responsible.
- There should be more done when a pet is attacked by another's on public or private property. There should be more follow up on the incident as well. Loosing a dog to an attack by another is terrifying, I know someone who lost their small breed dog to an attack of a large breed dog, it happened on the property of the large breed dog owner but there was little follow up. This incident did happen outside of Calgary, but the possibility of the incident happening within city limits can still happen. There was no penalty to the large dog owners at all. I feel like private property should also be included.
- A responsible dog owner should not flee the scene
- Of course I do. Do you leave the scene of an accident? Not unless you don't have insurance or registration or your a criminal. So why shouldn't you stay at the scene of the accident were the attack occurred?
- I have witnessed owners of dogs that have attacked other dogs simply ignore that there was an attack: they made no effort to correct the behaviour, leave, put a muzzle on, or put the dog back on-leash so it wouldn't happen again. They should be held responsible for their dog's actions if they will not make an effort to change the behaviour or avoid potentially dangerous situations, and there should be a record of that behaviour to avoid these situations in the future. To be clear, this should only apply to actual bites, not just aggressive behaviour. There are many responsible dog owners working on curbing that behaviour and do their best to avoid dangerous situations.
- It's the dog owners responsibility.
- It is a situation that is very similar to a car accident. If your pet allegedly bites a person or another animal and you leave the scene before information is exchange how is different from a hit and run?

- Just like any incident you stay and deal with it. You would do the same with a car accident so why not an animal. I do not believe the dog should be euthanized though or sent away to a shelter because it could make the dog act out because it's not at its home or with the people it trusts. It will be scared and defend its self from people it doesn't know just like we do with strangers.
- Unless the dog cannot be safely restrained at the scene or is in need of veterinary assistance.
- no different than exchanging info at a car accident. those involved should wait
- People should be held responsible when their dog bites.
- If the dog bites (enough to hurt the other animal) then information should be exchanged. The biting dog should go to dog classes, not be euthanized or have to be always on a leash / muzzled.
- As in the situation of a car accident, I feel that animal bites should be taking with the same degree of seriousness
- As long as their ability to control their animal will not invite more harm being on the scene
- Their dog, their responsibility to stay and take accountability for their dogs actions.
- If theres damage and the person wants to involve bylaw.
- To make sure the dog has not been involved in other instances of aggression. There should be a record on all aggressive animals.
- For cost purposes, a vet bill can be expensive especially for a dog bite.
- It's part of being a responsible owner. It's the pet owners responsibility to control their dog. It's against the law to leave the scene of an accident, I believe a dog attack should have the same laws
- All sides have to be heard.
- Similar to a vehicle crash such as in a parking lot
- If there are any medical issues that come to the victim it would be important to be able to contact the owner of the offending dog for health history
- In any other instance, you are required to stay at the scene of an accident or injury so this should not be any different
- "yes however immediate care for those injured, including animals, should be first priority.
- Please stop targeting pit bulls. In the past also german shepherds, rottweilers and dobermans have been targeted as dogs with ""potential"" for greater harm. There is a course through Coursera called Dognition that your research staff should look into. Temperament of dogs and their owners (breeding programs) are the potential for fatalities and injuries not breeds."
- Absolutely. The owner of a dog assumes responsibility of the dog's actions and has a duty to sort the situation out properly.
- Violent dogs need to be identified and so the owner needs to take responsibility
- Just like an accident. Things happen. Animals get prevoked. If a bite occurs the owner should be taking responsibility. Information should be traded. Depending on the severity of the bite depends on everything else. Each situation is unique in its own way. Animals are like humans. Mistakes can be made. And yes some animals are just "bad" but in the end it comes down to the owner, not the animal.
- Just as one would stay at the scene of an incident involving humans(fight, crash ect) they should stay for dogs

- Because their dog could have not been the aggressor you need to know the whole story not an assumption
- the owner of the dog would want the same if it happened to them - if their dog or family member was the victim of a bite.
- The dog is the responsibility of the owner, therefore, the owner must stay to talk to enforcement officer.
- Having been involved with incidents where often a large obstacle to getting a resolution is owners fleeing to avoid reprimand it would an additional incentive/ requirement for them to stay or face additional discipline
- depending on the severity of the bite, type of circumstance then yes
- That should be a basic requirement of being a responsible pet owner.
- If your dog bites a person weather it be a pitbull or not, you need to stay until everything is resolved.
- I'm shocked that this isn't already a rule. Far too many people take their dog and run, how is this any different than a hit and run in a vehicle?
- Yes I support this because often owners shrug it off like it's no big deal, whether another dog has been bitten or a person has. However, in the emotional state that occurs when there is a conflict like this is may not be a good idea for both parties to stay in close proximity and sometimes it is best for the dogs to get separated as soon as possible. It would be more effective I think to simply step up patrols in the parks and fine those with their dogs off leash because there is already very little visible enforcement.
- Ensures pet owners take responsibility for the incident,
- I've seen many posts from owners of injured dogs searching for the owner of the biting dog online, feeling helpless. The owner should definitely stay put.
- Just like any accident they should stay to give information and also get the chance to state their side or explain why this may have happened because it may not always be the dogs fault and it would look better for the case of they were there to explain and give all information
- Being a pet owner requires responsibility. If you can't take responsibility for your pet, you shouldn't have one.
- The dog deemed the aggressor not to be decided based on size or breed, instead based on facts of the actual events
- I think that's self explanatory. How can someone be held accountable if they leave the scene of the incident without providing contact information
- The owner knows the dog and was likely witness to tge situation, plus, the dog will likely be calmer if tge owner is with them. If not, we might want to look at the owner for the cause of the problematic behavior
- "If an individual's dog is involved in a confrontation (ie bite incident) in ANY capacity, the individual should be held accountable to remain at the scene, even if their dog did not directly cause harm. Their witness testimony can be crucial for court proceedings and bylaw investigations.

- ALSO:
- I'm not sure where else to put this, but bringing animals on-leash into a designated off-leash park/area should not be permitted. I have seen many ugly encounters because the animal on-leash feels nervous and defensive (as does their owner) intermingling with the peacefully roaming animals. Signage should indicate that if your dog cannot be safely and comfortably off-leash, the off-leash area is not for them, to prevent confrontations, or have a mirrored fine for having an animal on-leash in a designated off-leash area (much like if the scenario were reversed). Thank you."
- Yes and no, people like to cause problems for no reason. And if your dog is aggressive, don't take it out. And honestly, walking my dog, I've experienced people petting my boy without asking, making rude comments, stuff like that.
- If someone's negligence of training and obedience injures my dog; or child or myself then it should be that owner's responsibility to pay for any medical bills or help needed.
- "My sister was attacked walking down the sidewalk .Dog ripped her brand new winter coat to shreds.That dog owner should have been responsible for that wrecked coat. Just said sorry and left.That's not responsible pet ownership,she should have been remunerated for the - Cost of her new coat.Right!!??!Yes!!!"
- This will keep the dog owner accountable. There are lots of issues of dog attacking other dogs (regardless of breed) where owners leave the scene. Owners of the aggressor dog should have to contribute financially and their dog should be assessed to determine what it needs (muzzled... etc).
- In order to clarify what happened, similar to a car accident.
- The owner is responsible for their pet and should be responsible for what they do
- The owner should have to remain present to minimize resource wasting in an attempt to track them down. Fines if they leave.
- May require to compensate for vet bills
- Imperative to know vaccination status of dog
- Why does this need explaining? People know not leave the scene of a car accident? A responsible pet owner would know to stay at the scene of an incident.
- it's the same as a car accident or any other accident for that matter. Dog bites are an accident or in self defense a majority of the time.
- Any accident traffic or otherwise where there is an injury should require all parties either remain on scene or exchange information.
- Or they are required to give dog license info and contact info
- I think a dog owner should remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information but I do not support an enforcement officer or anyone to have the ability to seize the dog in any instance including this one.
- Again, it is the owner's responsibility to keep their dog and the people around the dog safe. The person is who should be held accountable.
- In any incident, both parties should be present and take responsibility on BOTH sides.
- Owners should be held responsible if they are a poor dog owner 100%. It is not the dog's fault
- Problems should be dealt with quickly

- Only if a dog bites a person. Dogs bite dogs often in defence and cannot be blamed.
- Allows for the ability to have proper contact information to follow up and track reoccurring incidents.
- Because Cause it is the right thing to do
- easier said than done tho as has been shown in the past. A RESPONSIBLE dog owner would stay but not everyone is responsible.
- This is common sense for any dog. Should not be breed specific. Total stupidity if that actually goes through.
- Not sure if enforcement office is police or city. What if both parties agree to not involve enforcement officer's?
- the owner is responsible. these acts of the dog should be documented along with the owners info
- I support remaining on scene to share contact information and discussion if needed
- Only if the dog in question can be secured in a safe place
- False information is given out often by the instigator
- Dogs aren't naturally vicious. They are trained
- Only if it bites a person, dogs sometimes bite other dogs playfully
- An owner should legally be required to provide information and speak to an officer for both the benefit of the victim and themselves. The victim should be able to hold them liable, however for the dog owner it also provides them the ability to defend their side as well. For example if the victim was harassing their dog.
- I think it's common decency
- Dog owner must take responsibility
- It is the owner's responsibility to own up to it. The enforcement officer is there to assess whether the OWNER is a responsible dog owner or not, and seems to genuinely want to rehabilitate their animal. An assessment such as this is much more accurately done in person than over the phone or through emails.
- If you leave a car accident, you're an [removed]. Same applies with animals and humans
- An owner is responsible for their dog. Depending how bad the bite is, the owner should have to be held accountable for their dog.
- A dog attack should be reported and handled appropriately.
- Dog owners should be held responsible for the actions of their dogs.
- Should be standard with any incident. To be able to track behaviours of potentially dangerous animal.
- to confirm all details and just cause
- Easier for authorities to gather all information, when it happens including any witness statements
- Like a car crash there are liabilities to the owner of the biting dog
- .
- Responsible dog owners ought to take responsibility for the dogs in their care.
- Where both pet owners agree that remaining at the scene is not required, they should be able to leave.

- Because owners of offending dogs are often able to avoid accountability by running away before they can be identified.
- Obviously, why isn't this already in place? It's the same as a car crash, the owners need to be present to take responsibility.
- The owner is 100% responsible for the actions of their pets. Just like a car crash, you must remain on scene, a dog bite is the same.
- accurate followup
- Owners should have to stay at the scene of the incident and be held accountable for their dog's bad behaviour.
- The blame should not be put on the dog. It is either the owners doing or the "victims" doing for the dog to bite.
- I think the owner has full responsibility of their dogs actions and need to train them accordingly
- To ensure the correct information is given to the enforcement officer.
- I think that rule should be in place because it would hold the OWNER, not the ANIMAL, accountable. This is an OWNER problem NOT an ANIMAL problem.
- It is an accident. As with motor vehicle accidents or other offences, you must remain at the scene to provide contact info.
- Responsible ownership is a must. Otherwise they need to give up their pets to be raised by someone more capable.
- Humans are responsible for their dog(s). Right of ownership comes with responsibility.
- The same as if you get in car accident. I've seen cases where little dogs were off the lease and out of control around larger dog with lease on.
- Once the dog and owner run away, who knows whether you will find them. These dogs are capable of killing a child & strict bylaws should be put into place
- Both sides of the story should be heard. But if it is unsafe to keep the animal on scene I would support them to leave and return it leave contact info.
- Owners should take responsibility for their pets
- Often when dogs bite, it's because they were provoked and are defending themselves/their owner. Or the owner has trained them to do so. Keeping the owner at the scene allows for clarity into the issue
- It's only common courtesy
- If irresponsible pet owners aren't held accountable for their pets and are allowed to leave the scene after an incident, it allows for irresponsible pet owners to continue to get away with being irresponsible rather than encouraging responsible behaviour
- I had no idea this wasn't already a rule. This feels like common sense.
- The owner should remain present, both sides of the incident should be presented to limit the bias.
- Treat it the same as a hit and run. If damage/injury occurs, the person must stay to face the consequences.
- People should be held responsible for the actions of their pets.
- It is important but sometimes the person who bit was enticing the animal to bite them

- The dog is the owners responsibility therefore. The owner should remain on scene. The bite/agression might be the dogs fault or the other humans fault.
 - No different than fleeing the scene of a motor vehicle accident
 - "Anytime someone is injured, those involved should provide their contact information.
- Also - the issue below is not mentioned anywhere so I'm putting comments here Dog owners that allow their pet to pee on other's lawns and gardens should be fined. Dog pee kills the grass/plants and requires time and money to fix - this should be a bylaw."
 - Once again, it is the owner who needs to be held accountable and not the dog.
 - sometimes it is difficult to know how a dog situation happened, or assess blame, which might be a problem. If the owners prefer to leave and not pursue that should be allowed if both dog owners agree. Human bites are a different story.
 - A victim may need to know who to contact regarding veterinary, medical or other bills incurred due to an incident as well as information required regarding the dog's behavioural or medical history in order to properly care for or treat a human or animal victim. In addition, enforcement officers may require both pet and owner information in order to investigate any history of past incidents or to issue any warnings, fines or other potential enforcement requirements, such as behaviour training or additional fees or insurance.
 - If people don't get the info needed from the owner, then the owner and dog might be able to dissappear without consequences
 - So they may inform the officer of what occurred without the bias of the "victim".
 - "It's like being involved in a car accident- damage was done, responsibility needs to be taken.
 - Note: there may be instances where it is safer to remove the dog before a prolonged discussion occurs. In this instance, only information should be shared immediately, the dog removed from the situation (taken home by owner) then the owner's responsibility to follow up in 24h."
 - If its a serious bite then yes but some dogs will fight and nothing comes of it
 - It's no different from a MVC. Details should be swapped.
 - To tell said persons side of the story so it's not just one sided
 - If the owner does not stay, it's akin to a hit and run. And the owner should be held accountable - too many owners don't take their pet's behavior seriously. I experience this frequently in off-leash parks.
 - It makes sense to remain at scene
 - I absolutely agree with this proposal.
 - as long as the animal also does not have to be seen by a vet
 - Just like with car accidents, there is liability and, in some cases, fault. Sharing contact information with both parties and law enforcement helps identify both parties, and speed up court proceedings if necessary
 - If the victim required medical attention, then contact info should be shared

- "I support this in the case of a severe incident or bite, but not in the case of a minor nip. I think there will be issues with enforcement of this type of rule based on the range of situations in which this type of incident arises.
- Also, I think that thorough recording of how the incident took place, what precipitated the incident, and statements from both parties should be mandatory, and that penalties or fines should be given accordingly."
- I was bit by a dog and she ran off with the dog a neighbor told me where the lady lived
- It's just like a car accident.
- While I support measures to deal with an aggressive dog. I am absolutely against stereotyping or branding any specific dog breed with greater restrictions. Pit bulls are not any more dangerous than any other dog and we should not label them so. It's the dog owners fault not the breed that creates aggressive or anxious dog behaviours.
- To explain why an animal bit. Dogs don't bite for no reason.
- I defiantly agree, no explanation needed this should be common sense.
- They should be able to provide their contact information.
- If you have a dog you need to know how to control it and take care of it. If you can't control it enough to stop it from lashing out, you as the owner need repercussions and education.
- This will allow both sides of the incident to be explained and discussed.
- A victim may not have a cell phone to record the event or to get a picture of the other owner and dog.
- A dog is an owner's responsibility. I am a dog owner. If my dog bite snother dog or person I would feel it is my responsibility to give my information and I would have to pay whatever the cost.
- When two people get into an altercation and physical harm is done and police are called this should be no different.
- Owners should be held accountable for dangerous pets. People and pet owners who are victims of these animals should, at minimum, have the right to follow up and enforce bylaws.
- All info should be shared from all parties involved if an injury occurred from a pet.
- I agree
- It's an attack and the owner is a witness and essentially involved as they are responsible for their pet's behaviour (through training) and the handling of their pet (leash, muzzle, etc) that resulted in the attack.
- The same as a motor vehicle accident.
- Just like you can be charged for a hit and run. Info should be exchanged in case of vet bills etc.
- Ideally yes, though it should be understood that people in that situation would be scared.
- It is the responsibility of the dog owner to remain at the scene of an incident involving their dog
- A dog owner is responsible for the actions of their pet and should be held legally liable to provide a statement of what happened, similar to a motor vehicle incident.
- Any incident needs to be recorded and the owner held accountable.

- The owner of the offending dog should have a legal responsibility for injuries and associated medical costs. There should be a bylaw in place that states they must remain at the scene.
- A dog owner is always responsible for their dog. If they don't stay and provide the required information that is negligent.
- I think if a dog or person is bit by a dog and the bite causes serious injury that is the responsibility of the dog owner to stay and make sure that the person/dog who was bit is okay and if not they should share their information and understand that they could be liable for any expenses that come up because of the bite.
- People need to be accountable for their pets actions. People giving out false information and then leaving the scene needs to stop
- It is called being a responsible Pet Owner.
- The dog owner should be accountable to the actions of their dog, they need to provide proof of rabies vaccination, proof of their name and address etc.
- I support accountability and responsible pet ownership. Being able to walk away from a nuisance animal attack is not responsible pet ownership.
- The owner is responsible for the behaviour of the dog and should remain on-scene of an incident.
- This is in response to 3, as there was no where to put a comment about that question. What you are proposing is discrimination and will most definitely ruin your all time record of low dog bites and incidents. Currently Calgary is the poster child for dog owners and cities that maintain low dog involved incidents. The problem is that when you ban pitbulls, dogs are STILL biting... because ALL dogs bite. Banning pitbulls will increase your number of dog bites and incidents because you will shift your focus from ALL dogs to a group of dogs that look the same ... (btw this includes about 20+ breeds based on your description above, so you did a poor job of naming the types of dogs you're actually discriminating against). If you need proof on why this way of thinking is severely flawed, just look at Ontario... an article was just posted stating that since banning pitbulls, the number of dog bites per year has INCREASED. It is shameful to say the least to have to live in a city, province and country that claims to be so diverse yet is considering discriminating against a DOG. Literally the most ridiculous thing I have ever heard. I hope you are VERY cautious in your decision on this matter consider current events such as protesting and rioting due to discrimination. Calgary has a very large group of pitbull type dog owners. Good day.
- A dog that bites another dog or person needs to be recorded so that if multiple incidents occur by the same dog ... and the owner does not take steps to train the dog better, further action can be taken. Including keeping them at home for a duration, mandatory training, leash requirements etc.
- Common sense
- Just as if your vehicle has damaged another person's property.
- If a dog bites someone or something an owner should stay if requested to. Some run for fear of their dog being painted as the bad guy though while some people who get bit or their dog gets bit were the antagonists and also will play the victim card for all they are worth.
- Every crime has two sides to a story. Both are needed to proceed with blame and punishment.

- This could help to ensure all involved parties have been heard fairly, and statement of facts can be made
- Just like a car accident. You need to remain at the scene.
- the owner of the dog should be required by law to act responsibly, be accountable, and take responsibility for the dog and its actions. remaining on the scene would also allow for both sides of the incident to be heard and recorded.
- Like a car accident, contact information should be shared but in a non violent or threatening manner
- I've heard too many stories of pets being attacked and the responsible pet's owner walking off without acknowledging what their pet did.
- What defines "if necessary"? I'm supportive but as written seems to add more mechanisms for enforcement officers to exercise subjectivity and enforcement officers need to have more defined rules to avoid poor decisions
- Responsible pet ownership to me means if your dog is in an incident, you should remain at the scene until authorities can assess.
- People need to be held accountable, not the dogs - it's training not the breed. So lets make sure the owners are responsible for their actions.
- If an owner can not control their pet, (i.e. let it off leash and it attacks another dog, regardless of the breed) the owner should be responsible for its actions.
- A pet owner must take responsibility for their dog's behaviour
- If a bite is severe, it should be required that an owner stay; however, the guidelines need to be clear around bite severity and exceptions should be made (i.e. snapping or nipping) as some dogs may resort to these behaviours if they feel they are in an unsafe situation they cannot escape (i.e. being on a leash while being bothered by a dog who is not being called off by its owners)
- We have such a rule for motor vehicle accidents. It makes sense that the owner would be required to stay and give a statement. However, it should be clear that such a rule would apply only for severe bites, as opposed to nips, snapping, and otherwise harmless normal dog stuff.
- The dog owner should be required to take responsibility.
- Unless having the dog owner at the scene of the incident is only aggravating the situation then only contact information needs to be shared
- Often owners of small dogs don't think it's a big deal, so they leave.
- But I think the dog who bit should be secured and in a safe place after an event like this happens. So maybe just contact information should be shared
- Allows for increased tracking of incidents and accountability on the owners behalf.
- they should act responsibly and give as much helpful information as possible. if their dog bit someone/someone's pet they should be held responsible.
- Just like staying at the scene of a car accident. You need to stay and take responsibility.
- The same as an accident, the adult involved should be responsible for explaining the situation and providing an contact information necessary.
- either remain at the scene or provide valid dog licence (photo of the license) as well as government issued ID of the person responsible at the time of the incident.

- This will save the time and trouble to track down the owner to get more information. I don't believe that the owner should have to stay after providing contact info, as sometimes it would de-escalate the situation if the dog is removed to a calmer place.
- It is the responsibility of the owner thus they should be present.
- They need to own up for their animals actions
- In the event of a serious incident, both parties should remain present at or near the scene until an enforcement officer becomes available. Exceptions may be made if extreme weather warrants either/or party to wait in a nearby home or vehicle.
- Should be more than just for dog bites. Should also apply when a loose dog takes a person out at the knees causing severe injury, for example?
- For insurance purposes.
- Owners should be responsible for their dogs
- There is no other place to put this. People need to be responsible for their actions against dogs, even children. If a child goes and kicks a dog in the head and the dog bites to protect its self, what are the consequences to the human? That should be addressed also.
- This is no different than a car accident if an animal is injured responsibility must be addressed.
- Common courtesy
- Yes, they need to remain at the scene to give appropriate information but only if their dog is secure and is in good health, physically and behaviourally. If the dog is not behaviourally sound, it should be moved to a safe location (either owner's home, enforcement officer's vehicle, vet clinic, etc.) before contact information and discussions take place.
- I believe in the fact that there are no bad dogs, just bad trainers. I would also like the owner to be assessed if they should at all own a dog.
- Yes, they should be there and give info.
- People should be held responsible. Not the dogs.
- This seems obvious.
- BREED SPECIFIC LANGUAGE IS COUNTERPRODUCTIVE. PLEASE DO NOT LEGISLATE BASED ON SPECIFIC BREEDS OF DOGS. IT BUILDS STIGMA AND PREVENTS PIT B
- definitely having an enforcement officer available.
- Just like a car fender bender, it should be considered a bite and run if your dog bites another human or dog and the human flees the scene.
- We may need help with vet bills
- I would like to see neighbours act a bit more neighbourly when there is an incident. Most people have insurance and are willing to resolve the issue without immediately calling law enforcement
- To me it feels the same as a hit and run with a car. Damage has been done and humans must take responsibility.
- I honestly thought this was already required.
- Because I want to know information about shots. I do not believe any breeds should be specifically called out or targeted like you are proposing.

- How is this not already a rule?
- I don't believe that there should be a discrimination towards any breed of dog. Any dog can act out, and has nothing to do with their strength, etc. But I do agree that there should be incident review and contact information shared.
- Just like an auto accident! Remain at the scene!
- If the dog draws blood and it is in a vicious manor
- often the owner of the offending animal leaves the scene and the remaining individual is left on scene to assume all costs associated.
- Dog owners are responsible for their pets actions. They should be held accountable, including financially if applicable
- Often the dog is threatened by BAD HUMAN BEHAVIOR. Not bad dog behaviour. Any human who owns a dog should be subject to a 2 hour dog behaviour course to better understand dog behaviour, to avoid their pet feeling threatened and put in bad situations where they could get scared and potentially go on the defence.
- Soo the dog can be seized if necessary and they also pay damages and vet bills
- Further steps may need to be taken to protect the public from that dog in the future. Without remaining at the scene there would be no way to enforce this
- Or provide lisenace and contact information.
- Similar to a car accident.
- Why is this even a question? This is the responsible thing to do and should be required for ANY BREED of dog.
- As far as I am concerned if a dog is involved in a biting situation the owner is at fault and should be educated, possibly legally charges, obey restrictions (muzzles etc recommended) and should identify him/herself and the dog owner's care of the dog should be investigated.
- Just like a car accident, one must ensure everyone is alright, or if they require further assistance such as medical care.
- This should be common sense, but unfortunately most people won't stay.
- n/a
- People run off with their dogs leaving the stressed owner to stay and care for their dog rather than chase down a person with an animal that has proven itself to be a danger.
- N/A
- People should take responsibility for their dogs.
- This is required for traffic accidents over a certain dollar value even though no injuries ocured
- The own should have to account for the incident.
- Dog owners should be held accountable for their pets behavior and restitution should be made for damages done. Owners shouldn't be able to just walk away if their dog has injured another dog or person.
- "Presuming the owner is physically capable (i.e. He/she was not also attacked and injured by one or both dogs trying to break up the ""event"")

- How long does it take for a by law enforcement officer to attend? What is a reasonable amount of time to expect a person to wait? 20 Min... an hour, more?"
- "It is literally only 1% of these ""pit bull"" bred dogs that you guys are putting down. It is never ever the dog. It is always the owner. And the smaller breeds are the only breeds I have ever had an issue with. The little breeds like Chihuahuas and breeds like them. I have dealt with dobermans, ""pitbull"" breeds, rottweilers, all breeds like that and have never ever had an issue with any of them other than the little ones.
- Like I said, I believe these bylaws are not needed. Maybe a few more law implementations like owners need to be screened to make sure they are suitable to own a ""pitbull"" breed, or the owners need to have a training course. But the limit to one is ridiculous, the muzzeling is ridiculous, anything in regards to the dog is ridiculous. As previously stated, it is 99.9% of the time the owners not the breed, not the dog. All dogs can attack. All of them. It all depends on the owner."
- Information on vaccines and previous issues must be resolved
- If a dog you own or are caring for bites another dog or person you should be responsible for medical care.
- same as a car accident - stay at the scene
- It's just like getting in to a car accident
- is that not common courtesy and sense?
- Because it's the right thing to do.
- In my opinion it is NOT the dog who is at fault, but the OWNER. Owners actions dictates how a dog will react, the owner should be held accountable and should provide their contact information.
- My dog was bit my a doodle and we didn't get the information so we were stuck with the vet bill
- Like with a car accident, there are two sides to every incident. It's crucial that contact information can be acquired so that the right decision can be made.
- I believe the owner should take full responsibility for the dog bite. similar to when a person is in an accident after driving a vehicle, the owner of said vehicle must remain at the scene until information has been exchanged. I believe the same concept must apply here as the owner is at fault (not the dog).
- Increased accountability is essential
- It's like a car accident, stay on the scene
- Owners are responsible for the actions of their pets.
- No such thing as bad dogs, only irresponsible owners
- We hired someone to work in our yard and our dog bit him. I personally felt responsible and made amends. The guilt was immense and the responsibility huge. I can not imagine a society where I would have walked away in that scenario. We must all take responsibility for our pets.
- This is no different from the rules regarding minor accidents between cars and cyclists. If the victim (cyclist or person bitten by dog) demands the owner remain and wait for an officer; then they should stay.

- If an aggressive incident takes place the owner needs to be accountable
- Owners should be held accountable for the actions of their pets. It's not okay to drive away from a car accident. It should not be okay to walk away after your pet has injured someone or another animal.
- You need to pass along information to the owners like vaccination history. And if this is a reoccurring situation the dog needs to be put in training or be in a more controlled environment other than dog parks. Also if your dog bites someone else's dog I think you are responsible for the vet bills that follow. That needs to be reinforced by police.
- Why wouldn't they
- people get too defensive of their animals and aren't always willing to stay and fix or help with the situation. they should be forced to stay and help since they couldn't control their animal in the first place
- Seems like common sense and courtesy.
- The other person should stay as well. Sometimes it's not the dog's fault it's someone else.
- I think that they should be made to give contact information however if the dog is being aggressive or needs to be removed from the scenario then it may be safest to allow the owner to take them home. If the dog is stressed it may be more dangerous to leave the dog in the stressful situation
- To hold the owner accountable
- Obviously someone should be required to stay if there are bylaws in play.
- I believe it is responsible pet ownership to remain with the victim and to provide all information applicable. I think dog and cat owners should have to provide, when asked, their pet licence as well. It should be mandatory to carry a wallet sized card with you at all times in the event of an incident. Lots of people insure their animals, this is a great way to ensure the public is actually licensing their pets.
- It's like any accident. If you hit someone with a car, you are required by law to stay.
- It should be treated like a car accident
- They need to ensure they stay to figure out how things are to be dealt appropriately
- if someone wasn't controlling their dog, or if a genuine accident, there still needs to be a check in place and they should stay to make sure the other dog or person is okay.
- This will keep dog owners more accountable. Often I've seen owners play off a bite and walk away so they don't get in trouble. This is unacceptable behaviour as a pet owner, they need to take responsibility for all of their dog's actions whether it is out of character for the dog or not.
- It's no different than the scene of a crime or accident. Dog bites most times are not the fault of the dog. It can be from a dog being anxious in certain situations and as human nature tells us, fight or flight is the decision. There's always two sides to the story and animals don't usually bite (even in the wild) unless they're feeling threatened. For example, because a human doesn't listen to a dog owner saying "don't approach my dog for this reason _____" - but a person says "it's ok, dogs love me" and a bite happens, why should the dog and owner face a penalty/euthanize because someone didn't listen to an order from the owner.
- Yes because an individual must take accountability for the pet they are responsible for.
- The dog's owner must provide information, the same as a driver has to remain at the scene of an accident

- like an accident report there should be some way for incidents to be reported, but depending on time frames it may not be that easy for someone to remain at a location for a couple of hours.
- The owner should be taking responsibility and remain. If they leave, tracking them down in the future might be difficult.
- Yes but only if it is a severe injury
- Injuries may take time to develop or appear. A person may not think that a bite is serious at the moment when adrenaline is high but it could turn out to be later. If the owners are required to exchange information (like in a motor vehicle accident situation) it provides a standard procedure that people can follow after an incident. In addition, requiring the people to wait for law enforcement can help to ease tensions because the people do not have to talk to each other they can simply both wait for the officer and tell their side of the story.
- It's about responsibility
- we honestly do need your bs
- It should be treated like any other incident and not to leave the area. Causing physical and mental harm to another person should have a minimum of responsibility on behalf of the dog owner.
- It's the responsible thing to do. It's like leaving the scene of a crime. Stay and take responsibility.
- If a severe bite (blood drawn or skin broken or animal severely hurt)
- Dog owners need to be responsible for the actions of their pets, and should an accident happen (and it's often not the offending dog's fault) the owner should be there to either defend their animal or provide whatever assistance (whether financial or otherwise is needed eg vet bill)
- Of course, they need to remain at the scene, it would be no different than a car accident.
- It would be irresponsible otherwise
- Yes, it is the owner's responsibility to
- I have seen many times the owner will take off. It may be hard to enforce but I think it would help people in keeping the owner of the dog at the scene.
- What's there to explain? Yes, the owner should not leave the scene until bylaw or some other method has been used to confirm accurate contact information.
- They are responsible for what their pet does and should be fined. Dog taken by By-lawofficers
- This is the standard in any other form of violent or destructive incident so people should be required to remain by their pet if these instances occur
- If it had bit a animal or person they should talk to a enforcement officer because they should report about the situation and if there were other reasons to why it occurred
- A responsible pet owner would stay on the scene to meet with an enforcement officer, there are 2 sides to every story. The only time this would not be acceptable if the animal or others involved is also injured in the encounter and needs medical attention immediately. Follow up would then be given. I think whether an enforcement officer or not is called in, this may help individuals resolve smaller scenarios better and have less matters in court.
- Definitely. The owner has a responsibility to stay at the scene. Leaving the scene should be a crime ... a severe fine, at least. It happens too often.
- Does this seriously need explanation? People need to take responsibility

- The owner needs to take responsibility for their animals
- It's their responsibility
- However they need to secure the animal first. This might require them to return to the scene rather than "stay" at the scene
- Exception: keeping the animal at the scene poses a bigger risk.
- They should stay at the scene of the crime like any other incident.
- I believe this would allow for a more efficient process.
- Because these owners need to be held accountable.
- It's hard to report a bite if the owner leaves the scene.
- It is the owners responsibility to be accountable for their dogs behavior.
- Obtaining more information could be crucial
- This comes with responsible pet ownership.
- Because it's like tracing if the dog has done it before the proper actions need to be taken
- Dog owners are held liable for the behaviour of their animal and should thus remain at the scene of an incident if a bite or attack occurs.
- Because it's the RIGHT THING TO DO
- Its important for the owner to explain their side and how the dog was trained as opposed to blaming an entire breed for select individuals wrong doings.
- Treat it like a hit and run. It is your property causing damage to another being.
- The owner of an animal that has caused harm, should be fully responsible for the actions of their pet.
- The person with the dog should be held accountable
- Pet owners should be held responsible for harmful behaviours by their dogs. Leaving the scene where your dog has bitten some person or animal is the same as a "hit and run" and should not be tolerated.
- Dog unable to answer to the situation.
- It's similar to car accidents. And incident happened and both, victim and perpetrator should be forced to stay so that no false information can be given about the incident
- If the other person/animal is injured it should be the responsibility of the owner (unless the owner/owners dog is also injured to the point of needing medical attention).
- Both parties should remain at the scene in any altercation. Whether its a dog bite, traffic accident, assault.
- I believe it the same as I would any accident
- I did not realize that it was not yet mandatory for someone to stay at the scene if their dog bites some one. It really should be
- They should have to stay at the scene to help handle every situation in a healthy manner and without extreme emotional/irrational motives to deal with the situation.
- It is illegal to leave the scene of a vehicle accident, I feel this is no different.

- This shouldn't need to be explained.. if you hit a vehicle and drive away its considered a hit and run. Same thing should apply here.
- Determine whether the same owner has been involved in multiple incidents/has, in fact, followed any potential bylaws as to additional training or insurance required for certain dog breeds.
- It should be treated no different than a vehicle accident. The owner of the attacking animal is responsible for the animals behavior and needs to be available to provide any necessary information.
- It should be illegal for a person to leave a scene if their animal harms another animal or person until Officers arrive, documentation provided and or arrangements made for follow up of situation.
- OWNERS RESPONSIBILITY- NOT THE BREED
- Just like a vehicle, you've accepted an animal or machine into your life that has inherent liability and should be responsible for it.
- We can't track nuisance dogs without contact information; injury may have insurance repercussions for the victim. I can't see the justification for somebody's dog to cause injury and then just walk away anonymously.
- This is a must like it should have been a law already. The owner with her/his dog that bit the other needs to be responsible for the other dog/owner's mental/physical health that caused by the trauma. Also financially be responsible! Many irresponsible dog owners are getting away from it!
- Depending on the severity of the bite and what the victim feels is necessary.
- The "If necessary" part of this statement makes little sense. Who judges if it's necessary?
- Just like a car accident the person responsible for the incident should be required to stay
- If a dog attacks someone or their animal, the owner of the dog who attacked (if unprovoked) should be held responsible for any vet fees
- Both parties need to give their sides of the story so miscommunication doesn't happen and an innocent dog gets euthanized
- The owner should remain available at the scene of the incident as they are responsible and liable for their dog.
- However, I think it's also hard to keep a dog in that state at the scene safely.
- owners need to take responsibility
- Responsibility of ownership should dictate this action.
- Its not fair to just leave a scene. Regardless of what happened.
- Just makes sense
- It will Ensure that the dog owner takes responsibility over the accident
- A dog attacking is how the owner trains the dog, they are held responsible for any damage caused by their dog. The dog should not have to be punished for the way it was trained. It should be on the owner to take all responsibility.
- Dog bites should be considered assault and as a crime has been committed the perpetrator should stay at the scene and give the other person their insurance information.
- Both parties can give their statements. Dogs do not attack unprovoked; it's not always the dogs fault.

- any dog owner should take responsibility of their pet after a bite or incident
- The owner of the dog who attacked is responsible for all vet, medical bills and criminal charges if necessary. Just like a car accident!
- Makes the owner accountable for their pet when any injury occurs. Similar to a serious car accident with injuries or death, the perpetrators should not be allowed to flee the scene.
- I agree that the owner of any breed of dog that bites a human or another animal should be responsible and should have to give their info to bylaw officers
- This will require owner's of nuisance dogs to be accountable for the dog's actions and would hopefully compel them to take the bylaws more seriously.
- If the dog owner is there then they should stay.
- It should be mandatory to stay and give information on the dog that attacked
- It's just the same as a car accident. One party is in the wrong and they must remain on scene to exchange information with those who they have harmed.
- You own the dog legally and should remain at the scene of an accident or injury. Just like a vehicle.
- Dog owners should be responsible for damage caused by their dogs. In dog parks and from friends, one hears of cases of dog aggression causing harm and damages, and those owners should stay and be accountable.
- A responsible owner should exchange information.
- IF an accident happened all party involved should exchange information
- If they leave, it becomes more difficult to substantiate which dog and which owner. Having a similar bylaw to leaving the scene of a vehicle accident makes sense.
- The dog is the owner's responsibility and must provide help and support to the injured party so long as the dog can be contained and that person didn't instigate the attack in the first place.
- Similar to remaining at the scene of an automobile accident, the owner needs to take responsibility for their dog.
- I have had an incident where another dog (NOT a pit bull) bit my dog and the owner just walked away. After a long process of communicating with 311, no resolution came. Once again, rather than focusing on creating bylaws for post incidents, I strongly believe a mandatory training classes for dog owners and the dogs (focusing on responsible dog ownership and handling) should be implemented. Educated dog owners who are capable of handling their dogs are less likely to cause a "nuisance" or behave in a way that is dangerous.
- Good owners take responsibility for their actions. The dog misbehaved because they failed to discipline or correct the behavior.
- I refer to question 4. I didn't like any of the options. What about a behavior change program for the dog.
- My dog has been attacked by off leash dogs on multiple occasions and the owners always leave the scene asap.
- A person is responsible for any kind of bodily injury caused by their pet. You wouldn't leave the scene of a car accident. This is no different
- To resolve the situation

- It's the right thing to do
- Yes there should be responsibility if a dog bites, but there are too many factors involved in that behaviour to immediately euthanize the animal or take it away from its home. There should be reparations made, but do not punish the dog. It is the responsibility of both the owner and the victim.
- Just like a traffic accident you have to remain at the scene until police arrive to give a statement
- Last year my dog was attacked and died due to injuries not once was the owner present.. this happened not in Calgary but I can relate and feel the necessity of this
- It's no different than any other accident. We have a responsibility to show care for one another. If harm can be prevented in the future by owner education the opportunity needs to be taken.
- Yes, it should be treated no different than a car accident
- Your pet is your responsibility. If they cause harm to another being, whether person or animal, they should be held accountable
- Absolutely, if it happens with car accidents it should happen in cases like this when injuries or death of another animal occurs.
- They need to take responsibility for potential liability and vet bills.
- Prove rabies vaccinations, insurance reasons, see if dog was previously a nuisance.
- You get in trouble for leaving the scene of an incident, i.e. car accident, why wouldn't a dog attack be any different.
- The dog owner should be there to face the consequences of their dog injuring a person.
- If follow up is needed then you have their contact information. However stop trying to make us have to run because we are scared you're going to euthanize our pets
- Only if it's severe. Some dogs may feel threatened and defend themselves, so this should be considered
- The dog is the owner's responsibility.
- Each case should be specific to the dog and owner that had a role in the incident with consequences and actions taken to correct that specific case, and not penalizing a whole specific breed for the actions of A.) a negligent person not respecting the space of a dog that they are unfamiliar with, without being told to do so, or given permission to by the owner, or B.) having the actions of the specific dog reflect on the owner, as the dogs behavioural traits reflect their owners and whether they are treated with care, or abused
- It depends on the situation.
- This is essential information for medical reasons and to create tracking of aggressive dogs.
- Too often the offending owner is never found.
- It's up to the owner of the dog that bit to cover costs.
- There are too many "bite and run" incidents.
- Dogs should be euthanized whenever they bite.
- Only if said bite was enough to draw blood or serious trauma
- "Not fair to the owner who has to pay for the vet bills when their dog is insured.
- Cost should be put on the owner of the dog who injured the other dog"

- Dog owners are fully responsible for the well being of their dog. Accidents do happen, but ultimately they should be required to stay at the scene and share their information in case further contact is needed.
- The owner of the offending dog yes. However there should be a process that the owner of the injured dog can follow up with law enforcement so they can get their animal the needed treatment. For example they should be able to give their info the 911 operator and be contacted later by the officer that responds. I'm sure there would be plenty of photos to document.
- It makes sense to take responsibility for aggressive pets.
- no different than a vehicle accident. Owners need to take responsibility
- Very good idea. Pelle shouldn't be allowed to run from their liability.
- The only reason a dog owner should be able to leave is if their dog was injured in the incident and requires care. If the rule isn't to remain at the scene, it should be mandatory to leave contact information and self-report within 24 hours.
- At minimum, information should always be shared. An enforcement officer being present would ensure cooperation. However, I believe the cost of resources for this may not be viable
- See it as a motor vehicle collision. Remain at the scene and exchange information. Its the responsible thing to do.
- I do but I do think it will be difficult to enforce
- They should be there to defend their dog. It isn't always the dogs fault..
- If someone is injured they should both parties should be there to talk further
- Dog bites can happen without the owner even being fully aware.
- My dog was bitten/attacked and the lady left and refused to give any information
- Its not always the dog's fault, the owners should be looked at thoroughly as well.
- The owner of the dog that bites the other person/animal should be held liable of any vet/medical bills incurred by the victim
- If there is a dog bite and people are required to stay at the scene, you will see the majority of dog bites are NOT pit bulls. They're not the problem.
- "Of course they should stay, not staying would be as bad as a hit and run.
- Regardless of that, since you failed to denote a comment section above, there should be no difference in the rulings for pitbulls as any other breed. Breed specific legislation opens the door to a multitude of problems, and should not be included in any responsible pet ownership bylaw. And frankly, I am extremely disappointed in the city of Calgary for even suggesting it. Shame on you."
- Common curtesy.
- It is their dog, and their fault if their dog injures another dog or a person.
- As long as everything can be held under control all parties involved should remain at the scene.
- No different than being in a car accident, you are responsible and need to be charged of you leave the scene
- As with any accident, responsible parties need to be accountable and available to recount the situation.

- a incident has occurred and the owner should be present as the party responsible.
- They need to take responsibility- no different that remaining at the scene of an accident
- There are a lot of irresponsible dog owners in Calgary. They don't care if their dogs cause thousands of dollars in vet bills to other people because they have "no reason" to care, so please give them one. Too many people in this city don't seem to have any sort of conscience or moral integrity so the need for a law requiring them to do the right thing and stay at the scene seems long overdue!
- This applies to ALL dogs
- Similar to a automotive collision, when an incident occurs, it is the responsibility of the citizen to own their mistake and provide reasonable means for solutions in the present and future while the incident is resolved. An owner leaving the scene after an incident is equivalent to a hit and run.
- It's important to hear both sides of the story, and I think it's the responsibility of the owner to give their statement so it is properly documented.
- I think it is only proper for the owner to remain at the scene of the incident until an officer arrives, similar to what you would see with a car accident.
- This is something a responsible dog owner should be doing.
- Similar to a hit and run, should stay at the scene of the accident if necessary
- It is our moral responsibility to keep others safe and comfortable when out walking.
- I previously did own a pit bull, and an incident occurred, and I feel like any responsible pet owner should stay at the scene until aid is provided and the victim is on the way to whatever medical care may be needed. If your dog attacks, you are responsible and should do your best to ensure the best result of the situation.
- As long as it goes for every breed of dog and pit bulls aren't discriminated against because of stereotypes.
- It's the right thing to do. More information of both parties may lead to faster response as to why the incident happened.
- Just makes sense.
- its like reporting an accident it makes sense
- Of course they should stay on the scene, I have heard of too many who leave and then are never held responsible.
- Their dog, their responsibility.
- But this depends on severity as well
- This is common sense. If your pet injures someone or something, that's your responsibility.
- Needs no explanation really does it
- The owner should explain his side of the incident.
- But I also think it's important that the owner assess the situation, they cannot stay on scene with an out of control dog that could potentially cause more damage.
- There has been multiple accounts of owners fleeing the scene after an attack of a person or animal because they dont want to get in trouble. Leaving the victims in distress and not knowing what to do or who to contact.

- the owner should be fully responsible upon attack and should be present. for example, a case of hit and run the vehicle operator should be present, if they leave the premises it can be considered an offence.
- I think this is important to have owners show accountability.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- If the owner runs away from the scene of the incident it indicates they are not a responsible dog owner.
- If they leave there should be fines and jail time possibly. They are fleeing a crime.
- The person owning the dog who bit someone or an animal is responsible for all vet bills, medical bills, and should be charged if the victim wishes to.
- Any animal should be held accountable for biting. Not just pit bull breeds like you guys are making it seem like they are the only ones that bite. Little dogs are the savages
- Because it is like remaining at the scene of a car accident.
- The dog owner should remain at the scene, just like in a car accident. So that they can make sure the victim or animal victim is okay and gets proper treatment and they are responsible for that treatment. I.e. If a vet visit is required for the attacked animal then the owner of the attacking animal should be responsible for the bill.
- Just like a car crash yes fines and/or tickets should be given then
- It is the owners fault for poorly training the animal and the owner is responsible for the environment the dog lives in, it's not the breed it's the owner. If an animal bites or attacks, yes fine them like a person would for assault but don't take that animal from them.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to take responsibility of the dog. They should be available to help with any incident their dog causes, as well as accept any fines/ bills (medical, vet, etc. from the victim) that would be associated with their dogs actions.
- ABSOLUTELY. If an owner leaves the scene of a dog bite they should be held accountable for that action.
- This is necessary for information on the dog so treatment or assessment can be made accurately
- Owners should remain to give contact information and be made to pay for injuries sustained to other animals.
- It is not the dogs fault how it was trained, it is the owners.
- Information should be collected and stored for repeated behaviour.
- Unless the animal/s in question need to be removed from the scene. Either way contact information should be shared.
- Bites and vet bills can be expensive. Sometimes there should be compensation
- Important to have as much information as possible about the incident.
- An owner must be held responsible for vicious animals
- Yes they should.
- it protects all parties involved if proper care and records are made of any incident.
- Dog owners must accept responsibility for their pet's actions.

- Anyone that's involved in an accident should take care of it
- If a person or animal is bitten the owner of the aggressor should pay for injury and damages
- they should own up for what their dog did and take care of medical bills for the person or animal that was bitten.
- Owners need to be accountable especially if they allow their dog to be off leash in an on leash area which is becoming a huge problem around Calgary
- "Just like any car accident if there is damage or injuries both parties must exchange information or wait for enforcement officer if necessary.
- It's very simple."
- There may be exceptions if it is not safe to do so or they need medical attention
- We cannot single out pit bulls
- What caused the problem? Inbreeding, heat ,abuse?
- To me, it should be mandatory that the owner should stay on the scene, just as in an accident
- In case the other dog need vet treatment
- It's logical responsible ownership
- It would allow for tracking of owners that have multiple offences.
- Just like any road accident - stay at the scene
- Regardless of the breed involved the pet owner must take responsibility and provide information to the enforcement officer so the appropriate investigation/action can take place. The only exception would be if the owner felt their personal safety was at risk from the other dog's owner. I ABSOLUTELY DISAGREE WITH SINGLING OUT A SPECIFIC BREED OR BREED TYPE. RESPONSIBLE PET OWNERSHIP IS REQUIRED REGARDLESS OF THE BREED - DEAL WITH INDIVIDUAL SITUATIONS AS THEY ARISE! BANNING PIT BULLS FROM OFF LEASE PARKS AND/OR REQUIRING THEM TO BE MUZZLED WILL DO NOTHING BUT CREATE MORE FEAR OF A DOG THAT DOESN'T BITE MORE OFTEN THAN ANY OTHER BREED.
- A dog owner should share contact information if any incident happens. And if an enforcement officer needs to be involved, there should be levels of how each offence is handled. First time offenders getting warnings, mandatory training and second to third offenders receiving fines, involving a court decision. Dogs can be reactive depending on multiple situations, breed isn't always a factor. It should be focused on training and not the dog. Mandatory training should be given, providing a list of places a dog can receive training and giving a time of 6 months to complete training. Providing certificate of training after could also be necessary.
- Yes they should. Dog attacks can be severe and there is a need for accountability.
- Every pitbull I have every met is the most loving. They are family and better than most humans currently walking around Calgary
- Ultimately the owners should be responsible for their pets actions
- I agree with this as long as there is a safe place for the dog to to while information is given. Not all dog bites are malicious. Many dog bites/incidents are caused by another person or animal scaring or intimidating the dog. I think it makes sense that all owners or persons involved in an altercation should remain on scene to explain all sides of the story.

- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions and should stay there.
- It's like a car accident, have to make sure no one is hurt or any damage.
- .
- It's all about communication. So both sides of the story can be told and so proper steps can take places after to resolve the incident. Dogs should not be seized if the owner remains at the scene of the incident and is co-operating.
- Any dog can bite not just pitbull looking dogs! You should finally get your facts straight!
- Dogs only bite if their owners train them to do so. The owner is at fault for being a bad trainer, or giving the wrong order.
- Only if the bite causes harm. Dogs playing that is misconstrued by an owner as a bite should not be considered an issue.
- Dog owners should take responsibility for the actions of their pets (fines, lawsuits, etc.), especially if they failed to adequately train them.
- The officer should make an informed decline based off owners personality, the dogs defensiveness, as well as the actual circumstances within the situation. Most times the dog is just being defensive of their owner as they feel threatened, they aren't violent they just love too hard.
- I think it will help the individual understand that they are responsible for thier dogs behaviour and to remain and have a discussion would be a very good first step in showing ownership over possible future steps to help train the dog properly
- There needs to be accountability for the dog owner.
- It's not different than a human attacking another human. It's an offense and needs to be followed up with the proper report.
- The owner of the dog needs to take responsibility for the actions of their pet. The pet is a product of its environment and demonstrates solely how the owner is treating the dog
- otherwise it is like a hit and run crash
- This should be a no-brainer
- All owners are responsible for the actions of their pet. If their pet hurts another animal or person they need to be accountable for that action and provide the information required to follow up with them in case of injury or their animal is a repeat offender and must be dealt with accordingly
- The owner needs to take full responsibility for their dog, leaving the scene would allow the dog to potentially cause harm again.
- too many leave and are not held accountable
- Accountability needs to happen and either changing training behaviours for the owner or obedience school for the dog is required.
- These situations are often about the person or animal who was bitten, but very rarely are the situations or behaviours from all parties leading up to the bite investigated. It becomes one sided if only one party is present.
- They should take responsibility and ensure the person/animal that was bitten is okay.
- If it became serious injuries.
- It's the right thing to do.

- "I think punishing one breed just because they usually end up with poor owners is not fair. How about we develop a program screening people to determine if they are right for pet ownership? We are failing these animals. A blanket muzzling law is not the answer.
- Also, what is with this annual licensing money grab. How about I register my animal ONCE and it can be considered mine until further notice. You guys are gouging people in hard times and its not ok."
- There should be follow up to make sure the dog doesn't hurt any one again. Lessons, training for the owner, if the dog continues being a problem, make sure it's the dogs fault and not the owners. If the owner has issues raising dogs that are aggressive they should be penalized, send dog to rescue or rehabilitation. Normally it's the person
- It's important to gather information about the animal's history to properly and safely treat the victim. Eg: up to date on immunizations, history of other attacks or violence, possible exposures the animal has had
- I am a firm believer that dog behaviour is a direct result of the owner and as such owners need to be held accountable. I do not support ANY breed specific legislation.
- Maybe the dog owner can explain if the dog was cohorsed.
- this should be like a car accident. vet bills are expensive and if my dog was injured due to someones negligence in controlling their animal I want them to be accountable.
- Someone needs to be held accountable for their dogs actions. Dogs are never the problem, its the owners
- If a dog bites it is the owners fault. Owner should be held responsible for dogs behaviour
- When it comes to automobile accidents the driver must stay at the incident scene. Likewise the owner is responsible for the dogs behaviour and therefore should stay.
- I believe an owner is responsible for their dog but that sometimes, it is necessary to leave the situation to avoid causing any further stress to the animal. I believe dog owners should be allowed to bring their dog to a suitable distance to calm them, but should remain in sight so that the enforcement officer can talk to them afterwards.
- The owner needs to be held accountable.
- I've been bitten by a Jack Russell terror. Would you even care if a dog bites and they are not a pitbull.
- I believe an owner is responsible for their dog but that sometimes, it is necessary to leave the situation to avoid causing any further stress to the animal. I believe dog owners should be allowed to bring their dog to a suitable distance to calm them, but should remain in sight so that the enforcement officer can talk to them afterwards.
- All about respect and liability
- There are many instances that I know of where nothing is done because owners are not responsible and run away. This way it helps prove who is trying to cooperate and be responsible for their dogs. Dog owners that run off after an incident without being responsible and sharing information to support the victim should be treated the same way as a hit and run
- The dog owners should be held accountable.

- It is important for both parties to have their recollection of events documented.
- If a dog bites a person or other animal, the owner should remain at the scene to exchange information if any serious injuries occur. the dog owner should stay in contact to make sure everything is okay with the person or animal.
- Anytime anyone causes harm to another person or damaged property they are to remain on scene. This should be no different if your dog bites someone. Unless the victim isn't concerned by the incident and doesn't want to have enforce the involved or if the owner is unable to control the dog in that area and ya no choice but to leave.
- As long as they now have the dog in control and the other Person or dog that was injured feels safe.
- If you're involved in an accident, you're expected to stay and own up to your part of the situation. Only makes sense the same goes here
- It should be required the same as it would be in a motor vehicle collision.
- If someone's dog seriously injures a person or other animal, the issue needs to be resolved. Whether it is looking over both animals/persons to ensure no serious injury or exchange info should further discussion or medical attention be required. It should be recommended that the people involved try to resolve things first (in a respectable fashion) before escalating things. Good pet owners do this as usually this is uncommon and something has happened to result in the situation. It is those who flee from the scene who are usually reoccurring culprits. It should also be kept in mind that sometimes the responsibility is with the owner and not because the dog is a bad dog. People put their pets in situations that they aren't ready for or haven't been trained for and the dog may be reacting out of fear or others reasons. We can't forget that when a dog 'says no' it isn't going to be verbally. Nature versus nurture
- And additionally required to pay for any physical damages caused to any persons or animal
- They need to stay at the scene to provide information, just like a car incident.
- The owner should always maintain responsibility of their pet! You have a duty to take accountability for your animals actions.
- For a person, yes no question. For another animal depends on damage.
- If the owner is there, however if the dog is at its home and provoke to bit, than I feel that its the person who provoke the dog should own up to their mistake.
- Accountability
- The owner can defend their animal
- They shouldn't bite and run.
- This might be very hard to enforce but I think dog owners should have to remain or give contact info. They should have to explain their version of why the incident occurred . Sometimes the story is not always what it appears.
- It's the owners fault for not knowing how to control their dog.
- Why should i have to pay for my injuries to myself or my dog if it was caused by a difdent dog. That person should give information and be held accountable, like in a car accident.
- Because if medical assistance is needed it would help to have the information of the person owning animal

- Dogs either have to be untrained or provoked to bite. Assessing the owner on how they care for the dog could show it's aggression meaning you should look into blacklisting people, not dog breeds.
- Similar to car incidents, if the damage is great enough, the person ought to wait for law enforcement to arrive. My only concern is police behaviour with the dog.
- it's the same as any other incident, these injuries can cost thousands so people need to be held responsible
- Owners must be held responsible for their animal harming another person or animal, period.
- Of course, my friend got bit by a dog a few years ago and the owner left the scene
- Common decency.
- Because it's the right thing to do. Especially if the injury to person or dog is serious enough that it requires medical attention.
- Like anyone who causes damage to anyone else's property should .
- Unless the dog is still out of control and needs to go to a safe space
- They need to remain on scene.
- The owner needs to be held accountable.
- Just like any accident, you have a responsibility to report and if you flee from the scene of an incident that should be considered a crime.
- Responsible pet parents would stay. They would care that their animal was aggressive to another dog or to a human. THIS IS NOT A PITBULL ISSUE.. it is the pet parent who is not raising their animal right!!
- Yes, the situation should be investigated. Should be determined who's at fault as it's not always the aggressors fault.
- This makes it easier when it comes to both parties if info was exchanged. Keeps owner's accountable
- Must also consider the danger of having the biting dog remain at the scene with the owner. What does the owner do: control the dog and remove from the dog from the situation, or remain to leave contact info (with dog in hand, potentially not in control). Need to draft this carefully to ensure contact information is left, but that the danger of having the biting dog at the scene (and potentially still out of control) during the time it takes to leave the contact information.
- This is the same as a hit and run car crash in my mind
- Of course. If their dog is aggressive, they should have to pay medical bills and take responsibility for the dogs actions. However I would like to say I'm disgusted that pit bulls and other bull breeds are being targeted specifically for this in the city of Calgary. So many bully breed dogs that I know would never hurt a fly and it comes down to leadership with that animal. If you muzzle all and have breed specific legislation then you are doing all of those dogs a great disservice and I cannot support Calgary if this is not revised. Protests will happen and you can be assured that I will be partaking.
- Owner responsible for their dog. Should be required to admit ownership. Owner should muzzle dog if it has aggressive tendencies. Owner must ensure fencing around their property will not allow their dog to escape & run at large.

- Of course, if somebody's dog bites another person or animal that is the owners responsibility and he/she needs to remain at the scene of incident until resolved.
- The owner should gain control of the dog and then be accountable for the actions of the dog.
- The main cause of dog bites are an owners fault. I believe with a knowledgeable and attentive owner conflict can be prevented and owners are not being held accountable BEFORE conflict arises, therefore dogs are being labeled as aggressive and are euthanized.
- Running away and hiding is not being responsible
- All sides of a story are crucial when people consider euthanizing a pet over what could be a misunderstanding.
- Yes if there is damage (laceration, bleeding, serious harm), or if it was done aggressively and not by accident (excitement etc)
- If the owner was present, they are a witness and need to provide information and possibly a statement.
- I would say they need to share the information with an enforcement officer but potentially if the animal was in a fight it could need medical attention and in that case I would not agree with the owner having to stay after having given contact information to the other party or an officer.
- Similar to a car accident.
- If there is a bite the dog owner or person caring for the offending dog should not be permitted to just leave. It should be dealt with appropriately.
- Yes because that's the same accountability to the offender as a car accident and I would consider this an accident.
- "Any breed can be dangerous.
- If a Chihuahua happens to bite someone, it's should be treated the same as though it were a stringer and larger breed."
- How is this not already a law??? This is not different from a hit and run, in my opinion.
- I think it's responsible and personally better for the person involved to get their story across instead of bystanders with negative opinions that don't serve the dogs best interests because they're biased.
- DOESNT HAVE TO BE A PITBULL STOP BREED DISCRIMINATION, IVE BEEN BIT THE WORST IN MY LIFE MY A [removed] BOSTON TERRIER. ITS THE OWNER NOT THE DOG.
- This is the same procedure as a car accident. The owner would need to ensure a safe distance from the other person involved, and call enforcement officers.
- your dog bit a person, stay same as if you got in a fence bender
- There are always 2 sides to every story. It's is important to know why the dog bit another person or animal from the owner themselves.
- I agree with the above statement due to the plain fact that they may be a witness to what has taken place, additionally by being a responsible owner they need to take responsibility for their dog.
- I don't see how it's any different from a accident with a vehicle. If your pet, regardless of the breed, attacks another animal or person it is your responsibility as the pet owner to follow through.
- The owner is responsible for the animal, so definitely needs to stay put in the place and give the information required.

- To ensure the matter is dealt with
- Both parties need to have answers like if the dog has been vaccinated.
- Yes so appropriate information can be obtained ie: insurance etc.
- It's the same as a car crash, the dog cause an injury, the owner MUST stay and answer for it
- yes the dog/dog owner should have to stay at the scene unless the dog/dog owner sustained injuries in the incident I.e two dogs were fighting both got bit both need medical assistance.
- Yes
- If a dog is attacked by another dog, the liability should fall on the owner of the attacker. They should have to cover any medical expenses involved.
- They should remain if the person bit wants their information and to contact an officer
- If the bite results in a puncture through the skin. Not just for a nip
- To take responsibility for actions
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets. And they can make sure their side of the story is told.
- Common sense IF the "damage is sever enough & both parties agree to the exchange of information.
- This seems like the logical and responsible action of the owner.
- Yes in order to see damage caused and should pay the injured person for the damages and accept responsibility for there dogs behaviour. Many times owners don't pick up after there dog leaving the dogs poop all over the ground. There should be signs put up at parks that are not designed for dogs warning that there is a bylaw against having a dog Running lose in are that is not designed for dogs. See lose dogs countless times at George moss park and there is no enforcement put in place I have encountered Off leash aggressive dogs there and owner will say There dog is friendly. There was also an owner that was to busy on there phone and not watching there off leash pit bull at the kids playground (George moss park) and list his dog because he was not paying attention. In Ogden community countless times dogs have run of private property into public space to attack my dog owner will just stand there and say don't worry my dog is friendly. One time 3 pitbulls came out of a van parked by house it was going into and tried to attack me and my dog when we're walking. Many people don't put leashes on there dog when coming out of a car or in public areas including when walking there dog. There are loose dogs roaming all over Ogden neighbourhood and attacking people I feel unsafe and scared for my son safety and my dogs.
- So both sides of a story are heard
- If the dog bites something it's obviously for a reason, good or bad we need to make sure we have the full story as not to run on hear say or rumours
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets.
- In ANY situation where one person causes damage to another or their "property" (beit caused by themselves, their car, dog, child, or anything else they are responsible for), that person must own up to it and take responsibility for it. Step one, sticking around and exchanging information/speaking to authorities if required.
- Leaving the scene is similar to a hit and run in my opinion.
- The owner needs to accept responsibility.

- That is fair that if an incident would be to occur that the owner must then stay and at least give their information to authorities
- The dog owner should explain what happened, provide reasons for the incident and if applicable, be held responsible for the dog's actions. It is the owner's responsibility to control their dog. It's not the dog's fault.
- Owners are responsible for their pets and should be held accountable.
- An animal is the owners responsibility, so they need to be held accountable for the actions of their pets.
- Any respectable dog owner would stay on scene . As its been done before with small and big breed dogs .
- If the victim needs medical attention, the owner of the animal should cover the charges.
- Sounds like a good way to keep owners accountable.
- It's no different than a hit-and-run or assault. By leaving, you are guilty of fleeing the scene.
- I believe that pet owners should be held responsible if their pet bites a person or another animal
- I feel that if your dog bites a person, it likely should be put down, unless a crime was being committed against your person.
- "Dog owners need to be held responsible for their dogs actions no matter what the breed. I have a dog and have had way more issues eith non bully breeds.
- My dog was attacked by a German Shepard and the owner grabbed his dog and ran away so he could not be held responsible. I think the city needs to monitor dog parks for these dog owners"
- If a victim needed medical attention which could possibly require payment, the owner of the dog should be held accountable for paying for any injuries. It's just important for everyone to have each other's contact information because you don't know what could happen. It's also important to talk to law enforcement if the injury is bad enough.
- Yes, both sides should be heard. And dogs that bite are either not taken care of properly, or the person bit, was being guarded against (guardian breed dog which has been trained properly and only acts during danger)
- Vicious dog owners will often run away with their pet after an attack occurs, this should be a punishable offense as they are fleeing the scene of a crime.
- I believe most dog owners would do this out of good conscience and social responsibility
- Any accident you should stay at the scene and swap info.
- Owners need to take responsibility for the dog (of any breed) that bites. It's not the dog's fault.
- If there's is an injury caused then absolutely contact information should be shared with the promise that vet bills will be covered
- Yes but only if the dog can be safely controlled at the scene. Otherwise contact information and the dogs license# being left.
- If a person leaves after their dog injures a person or another pet, there is no way for them to be held accountable i.e. pay for any medical bills for the person/pet injured.
- Too many times the owner of a dog will try to avoid responsibility of the actions of their animal. They should be held accountable for any incident, minor or major.

- Common sense
- Good luck enforcing it. Many owners run away
- A dog which bites a person (or other animal) has assaulted the person bitten and authorities need to assure the dog has not done it before or will do it again.
- You need to properly understand both sides of a story before making any decisions.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to accept ownership of their dog's behaviour
- Your dog is your responsibility, as is training and ensuring your pet is well behaved and trained
- To defend the pet. Usually humans provoke animals not the other way around!
- nips can happen when people are not paying attention to their dogs kids etc, and some people trigger attacks my running and screaming. Again, education is key.
- If a dog bites another dog or person it is important that the owner stays to share their information with bylaw officers and the victim because it is the owner of the attacking animal that should have to pay the vet/medical bills for the injured person/persons or animal/s and there would be no way of holding them accountable for that.
- The owners need to take responsibility for their animal
- If a bite incident occurs, I do think it is important for the owner to take responsibility. This way they cannot later claim that it was untrue, and potentially give opportunity for more witnesses.
- If the victim feels it is necessary.
- The dog is the responsibility of the owner and that person should remain at the scene until the incident is dealt with in case there is any follow up needed
- Isn't this already a thing???
- Responsible pet ownership includes taking responsibility when your pet has caused a bite
- Regardless of which party was at fault, it is helpful for the owners to know the severity of the bite(s) and the current health conditions of the other dog as there could be transmittable diseases that could emerge after the incident.
- Better than leaving
- dog owners are responsible for their dogs and should take responsibility for their dogs. They should be there to do so.
- dog owners need to take responsibility for all aspects of dog ownership. And if that includes their dog biting somebody else and they need to stay and face the consequences.
- It may add more accountability to dog owners.
- Just like a car accident , you need to exchange information in case one of the animals show sickness to get vet reports
- Take responsibility for your pets behavior!
- Dog owners need to be responsible and accountable for their pet's actions.
- Much like a hit and run offence, owner accountability and liability should be established
- I believe that if someone's animal causes harm they should be held responsible.
- It is the owners responsibility for the actions of their pet.
- It's their responsibility and are accountable for their dog

- An animal attack is assault.
- Yes I think that's responsible pet ownership, however they should make sure the dog is in a safe place away from others. So they may need to walk to their car to secure their dog.
- In case the dog has any viruses that may be passed onto a human
- The incident is fresh in people's mind, better to report it as soon as possible.
- Only fair
- It's common courtesy
- To pay for vet fees
- The dog basically committed a crime to some extent. It is too easy these days to falsify information
- I think this would allow for a better understanding of the situation.
- The dog owner should be held accountable.
- I feel owners of dogs who bite/attack need to stay on scene to help the investigation
- The owner knows the dog and can defend the dog at least. Many of these incidents are caused by ignorant or nervous individuals who have preconceived ideas about animals and it is their behavior that causes these issues. I am completely on the side of the animal and the owner of the animal.
- People with dogs really love to run away and claim attacks never happened because their dog is "sooo nice and would never hurt a fly!!". Even when it's blatantly badly trained and aggressive.
- If damage is done, and an enforcement officer is called then yes.
- I have fenced yard front and back of my house. Dogs are territorial by nature if a person hangs over my fence and teases my dogs they should be responsible for what happens such as getting their fingers bitten.
- People need to be held accountable. But also, share their side of the story. Two sides to every story.
- I feel that all dog owners whose dogs bite should be required to at least provide their info to witnesses or victims on the scene. If they don't then there is a severe fine/penalty kind of like leaving the scene of an accident...
- If a dog injured a person and or pet, the owner must take responsibility by remaining at the scene
- Why is this not already in place? People need to be held more accountable for their pets actions.
- Too many bad dog owners run away hoping they will never have to take responsibility for their lack of pet responsibility.
- Too many times people leave the scene. Information for health and safety needs to be exchanged.
- Only the owner can be the dog's advocate.
- This should be mandatory! A dog bite, even the smallest can cause a lot of problems and/or cost a lot of money. Too many people know their dog is an issue and when something happens they run away because they know they are in the wrong. Any person who leaves the scene of a bite/attack should also face stiff fines and penalties
- If the dog owner stays to give their information it shows that they are responsible owners.
- I think that when a dog attacks a person the dog should immediately be impounded pending the results of any investigation.
- The owner should always take responsibility for dog's behaviour.

- They should exchange information obviously if someone got hurt
- Of course, owners must be held accountable in the same way that drivers who cause collisions are.
- If a person takes off after their dog bites someone then the dog can't be tested for rabies. Also the dog could get away with biting several people with no consequences to the owner.
- With the exception of a bite that is blatantly in self defense / defense of owner, where harm to a person / the dog is inevitable and the only way to ensure safety is to flee, it would make sense for the owner to be present to communicate what happened.
- If my dog were to bite someone or another animal that caused damage or needed surgery then as a responsible pet owner I should remain in scene just like in a car accident to make sure the proper info is given to all parties!
- If an incident happens the owner should take responsibility
- All parties must exchange information no matter the injuries incase of unknown injuries that arise later on. Especially for sever injuries that result in surgery.
- Pet ownership and responsibility dictates this is necessary
- What happens when a dog bites depends on circumstances and this becomes he said/she said without any proof.
- This is like a hit and run. You stay at the scene
- These incidents are typically an accident (unless there was malicious intent). Sharing contact information is no different than if it were a car accident. Depending on severity of the incident, I agree an enforcement officer should be involved. Again, same as car accident discretion — we don't always involve the police on scene, but we do so when necessary.
- I definitely think it is necessary but don't think owners should have reason to fear their animal being killed or taken from their possession when these situations occur, and currently that is a big fear for many Calgarians.
- The owner is responsible for their pets actions. If their pet attacks anyone they should be legally obligated to share their information as dog bites in particular are very dangerous and potentially life threatening
- As the owner you are responsible for the animal and should handle the situation completely
- If any dog harms anyone else the owner should be required to provide information incase any follow up is required
- The dog owner should be held responsible. Unless the dog was provoked!
- I agree unless the owner has to pen the dog, but should then return to the scene.
- "If your dog injures a person or pet you must be held accountable. To run away from
- The scene of a crime should be an offence."
- The owner should be fully responsible for dogs behaviour.
- It is important to receive information from the owner, asses if the biting dog was being provoked and ensure that the biting dog is being appropriately looked after.
- The owner should always be held accountable
- If the offender leaves before the situation has been de-escalated and the victim is satisfied, it should be classified as illegal and follow repercussions including fines and potential consequences

- At the end of the day the dog is the owner's responsibility. This would be no different than being required to stay at the scene of a cat crash for example
- Yes- it should be considered some sort of offence to have your animal hurt someone and not be accountable for it
- yes, because it is not always the Bully Breed or large breed dogs at fault. More times than not small dogs exhibit more reactive behaviour, it is just easier to turn a blind eye to due to size. That being said the behaviour is just as dangerous.
- Does the dog have any medical conditions? Is it caught up on its shots? Easier to answer if the owner sticks around
- It's the right thing to do
- Considerable resources are required to track down owners after serious incidents
- I think it's great for the owner to exchange information if needed
- The owner of the dog is responsible for the incident and like a car accident, should stay at the scene of the incident to provide contact information.
- I think that's fair.
- Just like a car accident, they are responsible for damages and need to be there to be held accountable. However, if the biting dog is out of control, they may need to take the dog home and away from the scene, so there needs to be an understanding of mitigating circumstances.
- One hundred percent; just as someone part of a car accident or physical altercation is obligated to remain present.
- Owners must take responsibility of their pets actions
- This is not any different than being liable to any other accident that may occur. As an owner you are responsible for the actions/damages of your pet and should be held accountable.
- Yes. Bites can occur without showing visible damage until later on (ie if the skin is not broken but there is damage to the underlying tissues) and it is important that appropriate contact information is exchanged should this occur.
- accountability and to hear both sides of the stories, often the dogs have been provoked
- Yes because that is responsible pet ownership which is the issue. Not the dog.
- Many times it's our larger breeds of dogs that are provoked by other dogs and people. But as soon as bylaw or police show up there's a bias already. We (owner and dog) are presumed guilty already
- Owners need to be educated that an attack by a pet should be no different than a vehicle accident where all parties must exchange information and wait for or check-in with officers to report the incident. If the parties do not, they can be charged for leaving the incident.
- A potential serious injury from a dog bite is the same as a being involved in a car crash.
- A person should not be allowed to 'flee the scene'. If a dog bites and harms someone or another animal, the situation should be further investigated. The dog owner should be investigated for neglect, abuse, and bad pet-ownership. Both stories must be heard however! Sometimes, animals can feel easily threatened when approached by strangers (both other dogs and other people). For parks, both on leash and off-leash, there should be some consideration and bylaws to protect pets who are more sensitive. I feel this is a very sensitive topic, and must be treated as such. More must be looked into regarding this section of the bylaw.

- i think this would eliminate some time and resources to find the owners, and if they do not stay at the scene, they get fined.
 - Exchange information and the owner should pay for any vet bills incurred by the offending dog.
 - Owners should be responsible, or be made responsible, for their animals.
 - People need to be accountable and need to be required to educate themselves and teach their dog. The person who owns the dog needs to be accountable and taught better handling strategies for their pet.
 - "It is the owners responsibility to properly handle any situation the dog is in. If their dog causes harm it is their job to follow the proper steps and share information with those effected.
- PLEASE stop grouping pit bulls in with this. They are an amazing breed and so so sweet. I know more unruly dogs out there that are not bully breeds. So please stop blaming pit bulls. It's UNFAIR."
 - It only makes sense
 - Just like a car accident it safer to stay and pass on your contact info
 - If someone is bitten they must stay for health insurance reasons. If another animal is bitten it should be established if there is any fault. Who instigated, how much damage was done, do either animals have a history of violence
 - A dogs owner has a responsibility to stay and answer questions along with other witnesses
 - Owners should be held accountable for the behaviour of their dogs.
 - This is a perfect way to know what dogs are aggressive and maybe you could keep a record of it, instead of making breed specific legislation from assumptions of dog behaviour.
 - The enforcement officer needs to hwar from both parties. Including the owner ofthe offending dog regardless of breed.
 - Because who is stay that dog was defending it self. I have a big dog and have smaller dogs attack my dog and I have had to take her to the vet, because of it.
 - Absolutely owners should be held accountable within reason and should have an obligation to report the attack and have consequences if they do not stay and provide information.
 - The owner should be responsible for the incident, and be cooperative in dealing with it afterward.
 - Otherwise it's easy in the chaos for the owner and the dog to walk away and then it might not be possible to identify them or for them to face consequences, increasing the risk of the dog doing it again without training or other intervention.
 - Responsible dog ownership requires taking responsibility for ones dogs actions. If trained properly, a dog won't bite. At the end of the day it is the owner's fault, not the dog's.
 - There are no bad dogs, only bad owners. If the owners are made to explain why they can't control their dog, they might take steps to attend obedience or perhaps surrender the dog to a more responsible person.

- The owner is responsible for the behavior of their dog, and removing the owner may cause additional stress to the dog who is reliant on them.
- There is a degree of responsibility which should be taken into consideration, but also it is necessary for those taking the statement to have the education to understand 1. Dogs who bite aren't necessarily dangerous 2. They may have been provoked (esp. in regards to children in dog parks) 3. Dog parks are breeding grounds for bites (too small, too many dogs, too many people ignoring their dogs) and 4. MOST dog problems should and can be blamed on the owner, not the dog. Further training can save the dog. A reluctant owner can't.
- Same as a car accident.
- Owners need to take responsibility
- Yes they should stay and share information if vet bills need to be covered and to ensure the animal or person is fine
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their dog. A dog's behaviour is entirely a result of proper training, socializing, and any other activity that is initiated by the owner. When something (such as a dog attack) results in a situation of a victim (the attacked) where commonly a fee (a vet and/or hospital bill) is associated, information and enforcement is absolutely required.
- If the dog bites then it needs psychological assistance. Therefore the owner of the dog should be obliged to obtain the help that the dog requires.
- One thing that really needs to happen when this occurs is that the entire story needs to be told. Just because a dog bites does not mean it was not provoked. The bylaw officer needs to be impartial until all sides are presented
- I think it is extremely important for the OWNER to be held accountable for their dog's behavior. No matter what breed of dog.
- Responsible ownership means being responsible for every aspect of the dog both good and bad.
- This would be in line with any offenses that involve harm to an individual, such as the expectation for car crashes. It also reinforces individual responsibility for the actions of your pet.
- As long as it is safe to do so
- An owner is responsible for the dog, and therefore the actions of that dog. Just as you don't drive away from an accident, you don't walk away from a dog bite.
- The owner need to take responsibility and do whatever is right. For both parties involved.
- The animals behaviour reflects the training from the owner. They are responsible for any action done by their pet and should be held accountable. Should be a criminal offence to leave the scene after the dog attacked anyone.
- Dog owners have to take responsibility for their pet the same as a driver would do in an accident.
- Owner has to take responsibility for its dog's actions. The dog owner needs to make sure the victim is safe and gets the needed medical help
- A dog I had (a rescue Shih Tzu,) bit someone on a path. It was my responsibility to face the consequences.
- any dog owner should be held accountable. Not just pitbull owners.
- It would promote accountability

- if ANY breed of dogs bites anyone or another pet i believe it should be dealt with by an officer. Not just a certain breed ALL BREEDS
- Dogs are never at fault for their actions, it is always up to the owner to be responsible. this vilification of "bully" breeds is ridiculous. It's time the City of Calgary steps up instead of passing blame to the animal.
- If my dog showed aggressive behavior and bit another dog/person, I would want to be held accountable and be able to represent my case. Proper documentation and measures should be taken so that this incident does not happen again. My sweet, loving pitbull was attacked at a dog park by another "accepted" dog breed. He had to get stitches all over his head and body. The other owner did not remain at the scene - He walked away without remorse, leaving me with a mentally scarred dog and a very large vet bill. As a responsible dog owner myself, I have slowly rehabilitated my dog to be around other animals. However he is no longer allowed to enjoy himself at the dog park, because meeting new dogs gives him incredible anxiety. My dog was scarred by an aggressive Golden Retriever and an irresponsible dog owner bringing an aggressive dog to the dog park. It is NOT the breed - it is how an animal is raised.
- Shocked it isn't a rule already. There needs to be a rule on what constitutes as a bite though. Some people are over dramatic when playfully nipped. There needs to be a solid definition so that Karens (sorry people named Karen) dont start making stuff up about dogs they don't like.
- Stop the madness of banning pit bulls. This is disgusting.
- Yes, as long as the situation is safe for all people and animals or no immediate medical attention is required.
- Accountability is paramount. But it's hard to do with a "Karen".
- Responsible pet owner.
- This is an action of a responsible owner.
- The owner of the offending animal is ultimately responsible and this is the same as leaving the scene of the accident.
- Should be no different than leaving the scene of an accident a fine should be levied if the person fails to remain at the scene
- no explanation needed, my pet hurts someone, i need to step up and deal with what comes
- Owners should be responsible for their dogs behavior as the owners are likely the problem rather than the animal itself.
- Should be like hit and run, an offence in itself.
- I went to a dog park and my dog was attacked by a bigger dog. The owner grabbed her dog and ran out of the dog park and didn't even ask if my dog was fine. It should be mandatory for them to stay and share contact information.
- Absolutely. Otherwise, they should be charged with leaving the scene of a crime.
- I believe the owner should be accountable not the dog
- Increased accountability on the owners part is a primary concern of mine relying less on the dogs actions and more on the owners response to those actions
- If the dog bit someone or another animal for no reason yes, if it was provoked then no.

- Yes maybe after getting the dog to a safe place, the owner can stay and explain the situation.
- If it has caused harm to the person or animal - yes.
- I thought this was already a normal practice.
- Common sense dont be a coward
- Your dog, your responsibility. The same as causing a motor vehicle accident, you don't just take off before exchanging info and talking to police.
- if your dog bites anyone or anything you should be held responsible if it was by fault of the owner, but alot of the time it is the victim that did something to agrivate the dog into biting them
- pet owners need to be held responsible for their pets.
- Unless the bylaw officers are going to be hours, stay and take responsibility for your pets bad behaviour.
- My dog has been bit by another dog at a dog park.
- Like a car accident
- All sides of the story should be heard at the time of the incident
- It's not the dog it's the owner, the dog is not the evil one the owner is. You can't categorize all Pitbulls as dangerous!!!!
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for the public behaviour of their dogs.
- They should already have to. It's the responsible thing to do
- "If the bite is bad sure.
- But if it was an accidental bite or play bite then no."
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs behavior. If a dog is involved in an incident where there has been a bite or attack the owner needs to be there to the matter is dealt with appropriately. Leaving the scene of an attack should be treated as seriously as leaving the scene of an accident. Someone could be seriously hurt.
- Only to ensure that the victims medical and/or vet bills are covered by the owner of the dog that bit. I don't think it needs to be a big thing where they euthanize the dog or take it away. Consider certain terms if this is a reoffend. Such as interim orders, the dog having to stay on its own property for a certain amount of time. This should be for any breed though, not just pit bull breeds.
- With in reason. I agree that contact information should be provided to be able to follow up for both parties however if medical attention is required I do not feel like they should have to remain at the scene to talk with an enforcement officer if contact information has been provided to the other party already and they can be reached at a later time once medical care has been received.
- I also think they should share their information with the victim, since the city does not share this. The victim needs more rights
- Shame on Calgary for using breed specific language. Why not include huskies, shepherds, labs, Rottweilers, Dobermans, retrievers, who are much larger in size than "pitbulls", are responsible for similar bite numbers, and can inflict far more damage due to their size?? This makes no sense, the language for dangerous dogs should be BREED NEUTRAL!
- Its simple respect

- Yes this should be treated no different than a scene of an accident. Dog owners need to be held responsible
- The owner of a dog that has caused a issue should stick around for bylaw to understand and receive consequences. Owners right now never stick around.
- A responsible person should remain at the scene. It's no different than a car accident!
- Having an owner take responsibility for their animal
- Simply take responsibility for your pet. The only exception being if the dog is still actively posing a danger to a person or animal and needs to be removed from the area to maintain safety.
- There are reasons for a dog bite that may be the victims fault. Both sides of the story is good
- I don't believe the bitee should be responsible for vet/ dr bills. Therefore the attackers owner should be held responsible for such bills.
- They are a witness to the incident and should stay in order to relay necessary information to the responding officer. It is their responsibility as a pet owner
- The same as if you were part of a vehicle accident, stay to give your side of the story and exchange contact info should it be needed.
- If there is serious injury there needs to be action made against the dog owner
- Please do not put these extra restrictions on pit bulls. They are incredibly sweet caring dogs by nature. While they do have the potential for causing major damage of an attack were to happen, they are absolutely no more of a risk than other large dog breeds (huskies, golden retrievers, German shepherds, etc) and in fact retrievers account for almost twice the percentage of dog attacks. It is completely unfair to single out this breed and put more restrictions on it when they pose no more danger than any other large dog breed.
- it's the owners responsibility to face the actions of their pet
- Irresponsible dog owners get away with things all the time. Make sure they'll be held accountable.
- "Why are you targeting pit bulls ?!
- It's the owners that are the problem. Start looking at dog bites from chihuahuas... and German shepherds ? If the pit bulls have such strength to make the dog bite worse... why aren't we using them with CPS ? German shepherds aren't dangerous ?"
- Otherwise can be difficult to trace owner and dog
- It's called being a responsible dog owner. No explanation needed
- supports accountability - like car accidents.
- Just as vehicle accidents, the owner should stay and give all information required, only cowarda would leave
- the owner know the dogs temperament and can advocate for the dog and provide additional context for the incident
- It's like a car incident party's must stay as one of them isn't at fault and shouldn't have to pay for undue consequences
- Would be the same for any other accident or incident
- No different, in my opinion, than a traffic/vehicle incident where you are required to stay on scene

- It's the right thing to do if an incident occurs
- It's call responsibility
- OBVIOUSLY the owner needs to stay! They are the ones responsible for the animal.
- That way it's documented
- Once someone leaves, there's a good chance they won't be able to be contacted again.
- I think that any pet owner, regardless of the breed of the dog should stay and the scene.
- It's important to determine what led up to the situation, provide medical care for the injured party if necessary and the presence of the owner simplifies this process. In question 3 above, define exhibiting "dangerous" behaviour. I can't give an opinion on this question without more precise information. I am opposed to breed specific restrictions or conditions.
- If i get into a car accident I have to stay and exchange information or speak to an officer. The same would be common courtesy in the event of a bite.
- Dog breeds are not indicative of behaviour, no matter what this bylaw's suggestions may indicate otherwise. Owner behaviour is the root cause of all dog behavioural issues. Owners, therefore, must be held accountable not only for their dog's behaviour in this instance but in all instances. If a dog bites another person or animal, and one would have to be careful what "biting" looked like since many dogs will "bite" in play, a perfectly natural behaviour that is, again, not breed-specific, then it is imperative that the dog's owner be put under investigation to understand why that dog is acting out like that, for the protection of the rights of that animal that is, quite likely, being neglected in some fashion at home. The first step in that process is the owner in question remaining to speak with an enforcement officer. It also means enforcement officers must be available and deployable with due speed so as not to cause unnecessary delays in the days of other people such as witnesses. Moreover, it is imperative to note that this behaviour is not breed-specific and cannot be breed-specific. Thus, it is highly inappropriate and downright offensive that this council is proposing a bylaw that discriminates against pit-bull breeds, going against established science in veterinary medicine for the sake of public appearances. Owners of "nuisance" dogs should be severely fined and prohibited from owning dogs or other animals, the dogs ought to be rehabilitated (at their former master's expense as enforced by the City) and allowed their legal right to continue living a life of happiness in the care of a more suited owner.
- Owners should be required to stay at the scene anyways
- Dog owners must be held accountable for their dogs behavior. They shouldn't be able to run off after a dog has caused harm to an individual or a pet owners pet. Identification is important to place measures such as a muzzle so the dog cannot harm anyone else.
- Remain on scene unless it would be life-threatening to the owner, or other person/animal (i.e., medical attention is urgently required)
- Before I owned a dog... walking with someone who did... a scuffle broke out, I tried to break it up, I was bit, the other owner could not get away fast enough, I had no medical history of that animal or who they were.
- This is about responsibility and empathy and it's wild that needs to be explained.
- If it's a dog fight and it was an accident you shouldn't have to wait for an officer

- If the damage is severe which requires medical attention then the owner should provide information
- Yes, as getting information on identity etc should be up to law enforcement
- People with aggressive dogs need to be held responsible/accountable. They can wait there with their ball cap, sunglasses and the keys to their F150 and wait for a cop.
- My dog was attacked and the owner stayed and took ownership of the incident.
- Each party involved in the incident should be heard, details should be exchanged in case there's an injury to the dog or an injury to the person, similar to a car accident.
- Our dog has been attacked at a dog park. The owner did not apologize or offer to help with vet bills (stitches were required). The owner left. No information was given. Will never know if this dog attacked other dogs.
- The dog owner should remain on site seeing as they would, presumably, have been paying attention to their dog's behaviour prior to the incident and can help to provide a good idea as to what happened and why.
- My German Shepard was bitten by a smaller dog (collie like). He was injured and required stitches. The owner just walked off leaving me with a big vet bill. I think their dog should have been ticketed and the owner required to pay the vet bill.
- Your dog your responsibility !! All depends on severity
- There are 2 sides to every story, both sides must be heard. The responsible party should provide info as they should assist with vet care.
- The owner should take responsibility for their pet - they need to deal with the consequences
- too often owners evade the enforcement officers by running away and not held accountable for the dog.
- Yes unless the other dog or person needs urgent care
- A responsible owner is going to cooperate with the process and that means taking responsibility. Accidents happen but owning up to them is important. If an owner takes off, they should be fined for that offense in addition to any other offenses.
- It is important for the owner to take responsibility. However, not with the threat of losing their beloved pet.
- Absolutely. Dog owners should take responsibility for the actions of their animal. I have personally experienced a dog attack in which the owner of the offending dog did not stay on scene, and that made it difficult to hold the owner accountable for her animal. Luckily, she lived close- but it was still unfortunate.
- "Just like a
- Car incident, you should exchange information to address the damages and costs in the future"
- As long as enforcement officer take into account that these animals are often teased and annoyed to where they get scared, which is often the reason dogs bite. So the person the dog has bitten should also have to talk to an enforcement officer
- The officer needs to be aware of both sides of the story. If an animal was not provoked and attacked or if just cause was made for the animal to defend itself.

- I think the owner should be able to first bring their dog to a safe place away from the scene. However I think that information should be exchanged, as though it were the scene of a car collision.
- Like a motor vehicle accident, people should be required to stay to speak with police/by-law
- Dog owners must take responsibility for their dog
- I feel like both sides of the incident should be explained before immediately putting blame on the dog.
- its simply the right thing to do!
- Although I have never had any bad incidents with dogs, my mom's friend was out running one day when a large dog attacked her. The owner did apologize but the friend was in such shock that she forgot to get the owners information to report it. She suffered numerous minor injuries
- Depending on severity, it is necessary to exchange information in order to track a potential nuisance animal. Again, circumstances will dictate the severity. If it is an accidental play injury it is a completely different situation than an attack.
- Details must be shared immediately while it has just happened
- People must take responsibility for their pets.
- I do provided the bite is serious. I think it is unnecessary for a little nip of another dog, but I do think that it is important for owners to take accountability for their pets actions
- Dog, should be moved to a safe location
- Dog owners must take responsibility for the actions of their dog and their own actions.
- I think it's absolutely fair for the owner of the dog to stay and give information and speak to the officer. If I was that owner, it would be smart of me to give my side of the story, if I saw that my dog was instigated. Also it just looks bad if you leave the incident.
- The dog is the responsibility of the owner, they may be a witness to the incident and should report what happened. As well, if infection or further injury occurs due to the bite it should be the owner of the biting dog's responsibility to cover the expense.
- Responsible pet owner
- A responsible pet owner does not a 'rule' to stay at the scene.
- Owners are liable of their pets, and should be held responsible legally and financially
- If they leave it should be considered "fleeing the scene of the crime"
- If owners stay and take responsibility, repercussions for the dog and owner can be reduced. And with an officer educated in animal behaviour may be able to see and guide owners and dogs for needed training.
- common courtesy and common sense
- Just like a hit and run with a vehicle, pet owners should not be allowed to have a bite and walk lol
- Accountability is key for new dog owners or dog owners that are emotionally unadjusted. I've seen time and time again angry people with angry dogs because dogs read and feed off energy. This is where compassion could play a part in creating safe spaces for everyone. So if they are angry and their dog is aggressive, maybe they shouldn't be at a dog park until they have completed therapy and dog training courses.

- Would need the owner and dogs info so owner must stick around. Just like at a car accident. Info needs to be shared.
 - Provides context to the bite. If the victim was provoking or endangering the owner. Helps identify if it was a random incident or of the animal was protecting itself or the owner
 - It should be the same mentality as if you get into a car accident.
 - The dog owner is responsible for training the dog. In some circumstances the dog is being teased or taunted and any dog in those situations would bite but if there's no instigation than the owner is at fault.
 - Because people shouldn't always assume it's the dogs fault. Dogs can feel free and maybe the person came up and approached the dog without the owners consent. You can't assume the dog with or will not bite based on its breed. Puppies bite and no one wants to get rid of them. Because we understand they are young and it's not in their control.
 - I personally have being falsely accused of my dog biting a person and if this rule had been in place at the time I believed I would have been immediately vindicated rather than having to go to court
 - This prevents false accusations about dog bites. Enforcement officers need to take into account both sides (handler and potential victim) to ensure that it is not a false accusation. Many dogs bite when they play, especially at off leash parks, and enforcement should be mitigated by handlers first. If necessary involving enforcement officers is acceptable but should not be first choice.
 - It shows courtesy and is ethical to do so. The dog owner has responsibility for their dog and must follow through with whatever support is needed.
 - should be a legal obligation
 - This is only beneficial to contact owner in regards to a need for more training.
 - If its very minor then no, if there's blood everywhere then yes. But also depends on the situation like if the dog was protecting the owner
 - Only if the dog bites a person.
 - its an assault and needs to be dealt with.. running away is like hit and run auto accidents.
 - It depends on the situations. For aggressive dogs yes because it should be made aware and to not hurt another.
 - "Any dog can be aggressive
 - I know many pit bulls that wouldn't hurt a fly
 - And would freak out if they had to wear a muzzle just for being a pit bull
 - I know one who is scared of his leash never mind a muzzle
 - Little dogs can be very aggressive
 - It depends on the owner and how the dog was raised that leads to it being aggressive or not
- Please don't issue the pit bulls must wear a muzzle"
 - Like any accident you should be there to make sure everyone is ok and being looked after

- If the dog bites a person, absolutely yes. If the dog bites another dog, it's not as straightforward as it may have been defensive. If serious harm (i.e. significant medical attention) is caused (large dog bites a small dog), the owners should be required to talk to an enforcement officer.
- The owner should be held accountable. The reason for the butting dog is lack of training
- An owner must take responsibility for their pet's behaviour, and similar to a car crash, should be obligated to stay at the scene until law enforcement arrives.
- If there is a bite that occurred you want to make sure the dog that bit the person/ animal is healthy. Also it is important to make sure the bitten individual is okay.
- The owner needs to take responsibility. It is the owners fault not the dogs.
- The owner of biting dog usually take off and leaves the victims to deal with bite
- That makes sense, you couldn't leave the scene of a car accident, you shouldn't leave the scene of an incident.
- just like a car accident. If your property (the dog/car) is responsible in an incident (like an attack/accident) you should be responsible to exchange information and for the damages that were caused.
- If someone were to get in a minor car accident, they would be required to stay put. Would it be the same for a dog bite? I'm not sure how clean or behaved the dog is. I might incur costs as a result of tending to an injury. The dog that bit should be liable, or at least willing to assist in a process that is brought on by their actions (or inaction, anyways.)
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their pets and should remain at the scene of a bite incident to relay information. It makes sense inherently in the spirit of responsible pet ownership
- It is the owners fault for such accident they should be liable and charged for their poor job at raising their animal
- It is the same as a car accident
- It would be necessary to obtain the information if the dog has previously been aggressive or recorded as biting before this incident and proper measures can be taken.
- Make it mandatory that they stay. Too often they leave and you hear of owners with terrible vet bills and no one to take responsibility
- However, I am completely against ethinasing the dog. There are multiple ways to improve behaviour, and they should be used.
- Generally. There may be circumstances that they can't but should at least provide contact information
- If someone has an "accident" in a car and property is damaged they are required to stay. If someone is hurt on your account you should have to stay.
- This is a no brainer, people should be accountable for public safety and the behavior of their beast. Hit and run is a criminal offence, why not bite and run?
- Hit and runs in my car are illegal. Why should I not take responsibility for my dog too?
- The owner should be held accountable.

- This is similar to a hit and run incident. Both parties should remain if there was a serious incident. If it was a minor incident or in the act of play the owners should talk and assess if this justifies bringing in law enforcement.
- "People ought to be responsible for their pets. If someone flees after a serious incident, it is the same as leaving a car accident you caused.
- People should look for a resolution first."
- It is the responsibility of an owner to participate
- This increases dog owner accountability and places blame on negligence in ownership rather than on the dog.
- To understand if this was an isolated incident or a progressive temperament of the dog and their environment/ upbringing
- It just makes sense
- I have witnessed attacks and then been very upset and frustrated when watching the owner of the attacking dog walk away with no repercussions. Also, I was scared to return to the park later, because the owner and vicious dog might still be going there.
- Treat it like a car accident. Someone is at fault some one is hurt both parties stay
- They should be liable for any vet costs incurred to your injured pet.
- Owners are entirely responsible for their pets.
- Exchange of contact as well as vet info
- because most likely the dog inwer does not know what or how to train there animal.
- No different then a car crash your dog hurt someone and there should be repercussions if it was serious! There is a difference between a dog attack biting and causing injusry and a dog that was playing with someone at will and causing an accidental injury though
- Responsible for pets actions, makes sense.
- 100% yes if you leave it's no different then a hit and run
- The owner of an animal that bites a human should be held accountable for the animal's actions. To do so, they need to share their contact information, etc.
- The responsibility should always fall on irresponsible owners.
- I think it's important for a dog owner to explain their side of the story I don't feel that dogs go out of their way to attack someone there's usually something behind it. And I don't believe in destroying them as the only answer retraining and working with a pet owner can go a long way
- Most bites are not malicious in nature, they are caused by someone disregarding the dogs boundaries or not understanding their body language.
- They have to be held responsible
- It makes sense. However if this ridiculous BSL comes in to effect your number of reports won't rise or fall. Because you want to muzzle a dog rarely involved in such things. Would it be taken seriously when the rat terrier attacks a pit bull (this DID happen to my pit bull) and draws blood? Because little dog owners reverse accuse and leave as soon as thier dog has attacked another dog or person.
- Find the truth behind the situation and what the owner is proposing to do to mitigate risks.

- Taking ownership for your animal if good ownership. Like a car accident intentional or an accident all parties need to be known and accountable. Pit bull breeds should be extended the same approach you would any other dog.
- The pit bull ban has me really upset. We owned one for 13 years. He was lovely, never bit anyone, was the kindness and gentlest do I have ever owned. The questions above were completely loaded and unfair. I would like to see the stats that in Calgary pit bull are so much more dangerous that they need this type of attention.
- Owners need to be accountable for their pets.
- If someone's dog attacked me or my dog I would want the person held accountable, not the dog.
- The owner is the one responsible.
- Dog owners are responsible for their pets just like if they were in a car accident and needed to stay to swap insurance. However, enforcement officers MUST be knowledgeable in dogs/dog behaviour and that breed specific dogs DO NOT correlate with aggression.
- All dog owners should demonstrate responsibility for their dogs and the actions/behaviours that occur and if it is helpful, staying at the scene should be required.
- The owner absolutely needs to stay and take responsibility for their dog. Also to ensure that the victim of the bite is tended to and ok!
- People are ultimately responsible for their pet's behavior. They should absolutely be required to remain at the scene of the incident.
- It is the humans fault if a dog bites someone so the owner should be there to be accountable.
- Better understand the situation and the dog
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their pet's actions.
- There also needs to be a way for the owner to remove the issue dog from the situation while they remain at the scene.
- It shouldn't be necessary, but that would require all owners to be responsible and unfortunately not all are
- It is the same as staying at the scene of an accident if you have a crash. Be responsible for the actions of your dog.
- The owners must take full ownership of their animals actions
- Animals, like vehicles, are considered property - and therefore, the owner needs to have full control of, and take responsibility for, them. Yes, I fully support a law requiring owners of offending pets to remain at the scene to process the incident.
- If no harm has been done then no, if injury to dog or human (obvious injury including blood), then bylaw is not required.
- and the owner should be punished not the dog.
- "Only if it is a severe incident and the intent was malicious.
- Dogs play and sometimes bite. It also depends if the dog has been triggered by another dog or human. Humans can be extremely cold hearted with animals and that is not okay."
- If someone receives a bite and the owner/animal leave, there is no way to identify the animal or person and leaves the victim in a difficult situation where you can't always pursue the matter. How will an animal be declared a nuisance if the owner/animal never stay and information is never collected/recorded?

- If there is clear damage then yes. If it is just a dog scrum at the dog park and neither dog is really neuter then no.
- It needs to be treated like a vehicular accident. The owner receives fines for leaving the scene.
- How is this not already an expectation. A dog owner who leaves the scene of an incident should face a fine....no questions asked.
- I'd like to defend the situation if needed. A lot of people are uneducated and help themselves to meeting your dog without asking
- Absolutely. It is the responsibility of the owner, they have raised and trained the dog and should be aware of their potential aggression. If you are aware your dog is aggressive with other alphas for example, the owner should make the decision not to bring them to an off leash dog park until they have improved. If they choose to not do that and the dog bites, they should be held responsible.
- owner needs to give contact info to other party just like any other accident or injury
- I want to know if the dog is vaccinated or not. Also then maybe the dog can and owner can start a training program so the issue doesn't escalate
- I support this if it applies for EVERY breed of dog. Stop singling out certain breeds.
- Depending on severity. If medical care is needed then, yes
- Like a car crash, both parties should remain at the scene (as long as there is no emergency need - i.e. hospital/ambulance).
- If someone has to stay after a car crash where there has been damage, I don't understand why it shouldn't be the same.
- Be responsible for your animal
- Too many pit-and-runs
- It's the same as hit and run incidents in a vehicle. As an assault, it should be handled in a similar fashion. Again, euthanasia is a major contributing factor to dog owners fleeing the scene. This must be taken off the table as it is cruel and unusual punishment.
- As long as the attack has been controlled and nobody is severely hurt they should stay. If medical attention is required for an animal or person, phone numbers and names should be exchanged before anyone leaves. Staying at the scene allows an officer to get both sides of the story as well as see any evidence first hand. They can also talk to any potential witnesses.
- This ensures that proper care is taken to stop the biting from happening again, and allows important information to be shared (eg does the dog have rabies shot)
- yes, because then the chances of another incident become lower because the person has to deal with the consequences immediately instead of taking off
- There are always 2 sides to the story.
- Should only be for obvious injuries, such as bleeding.
- This would allow for a proper investigation and the possibility of an interim order.
- A dog's behavior is a reflection in part of the owner. The owner is responsible for the dog.

- That just seems like common sense, you hit someone with your car your not supposed to drive off. Your dog bits a person you should have to stay, that could be serious damage too.
- If the dog is at large the owner would not be there...then what??
- Of course the owner should stay if safe to do so. Like a car accident, you should remain at the scene.
- To many people at dog parks walk away from these incidents and/or provide false contact information without an authority figure present. The exception would have to be if the injured person or dog required immediate medical care.
- People are responsible for their pets actions, putting down "nuisance" dogs is a cop-out . It is the owner who is responsible. If their training is so poor they can't take their pet out in public they need to own up to that shortcoming, stay at the scene, accept fines etc.
- You are liable for what your dog has done, just as you are responsible to share information and stay on scene of a car crash, you should have to do the same for any dog biting incident
- Why? This is a very straight forward answer
- Its important that the owner be responsible but there are also situations where a dog was taunted, threatened etc and should not be automatically deemed at fault
- I assumed they did remain at the scene
- This should be a practice already in place.
- This allows an opportunity for all parties involved to share their perspective of the incident.
- Anytime a person or animal is bitten both parties should remain at the scene and a report should be made anyone caught not abiding should receive additional fines
- I feel this will hold people accountable for any pets who have the potential to have multiple offences
- I am of the mind that there are no bad dogs, just bad/challenged owners. So yes, I believe that the owner/walker should stay on scene.
- You can tell someone they need to remain at the scene but that doesn't mean they're going to do it. It is the dog owner who has issues, not the dog.
- It's good to hear both sides of the story as to what happened and they should be required to stay to discuss it with the officer so that the officer can get their contact information
- The person is ultimately responsible! It's like a car accident, of course the driver needs to remain at the scene, so does the dog owner!
- They should be held accountable if their animal bites someone.
- It's like a serious accident, you stay until authorities come.
- It's important to know the circumstances
- As with a car collision, one would hope all parties involved can provide swift information to resolve the issue. Remaining at the scene can help this along. When injuries are involved, its even more important.
- Otherwise it is like a hit and run
- A person needs to be able to provide the "other" side of the story. If they leave, the story will only be one-sided and not fair to either party involved.

- If the dog is not well trained it requires support. If the owner is unable to train and provide for the dogs welfare it should be against a bylaw to leave the scene to allow more penalties to build up so they can get retraining faster
- It is not the dogs fault, it is the owner, they should have accountability for their pets lack of discipline.
- Dogs are not animals and though we may train them to the best of our ability, in off-leash parks with large numbers of dogs and other natural stimulants (balls, frisbees, wild animals), incidents can happen, and they can also vary in severity. Most of the time if an incident occurs between two dogs, the severity is low and the humans should be able to talk it out. I say yes to this question but I don't see it being enacted unless an extreme event occurs. Hard to really say without looking at the data the city of Calgary has on this (if any?) because my opinion comes off anecdotal evidence.
- People should be responsible for their pets but the dog should not be subject to euthanasia because it hit a person or dog
- responsible ownership includes being accountable for your pet, period.
- I just like a hit-and-run you can't leave the scene until all your information has been given out so you can deal with it properly
- its the peoples responsibility to socialize their pets.
- Absolutely - this should be treated like a hit and run vehicular collision. There should be severe consequences for anyone who leaves.
- It should be a criminal act to leave the scene
- Dog health and vaccine status must be addressed so who ever was bitten can proceed with care accordingly.
- Dog owners need to take accountability for their dogs behaviour , regardless of breed , as aggression issues are fully related to training and care of the dog.
- As a dog owner and a good human it is the right thing to do
- Like any incident when there is a clear victim, all parties should remain at the scene.
- If they do not stay at the scene you may not know how to find them later
- Accountability
- Ownership responsibility, it's the right thing to do.
- Owners are responsible for their pets and their actions. They should definitely remain on at the scene.
- Yes, just like a car accident, people should have to be accountable in case of further complications.
- Need to know if the dog's shots are up to date.
- Not likely to happen, but would be helpful to determine why an incident occurred. Some owners are a greater problem than the animal.
- The situation should be heard from both sides in what led to the aggressor from the pet.
- Yes, but if the owner needs to restrain their dog or take them home or to their car to keep the dog and those around safe then that should be done first. Then they can return to the scene if necessary.
- The owner must take responsibility and provide information in case of vet bills etc

- Vet bills can be very expensive, any dog that causes harm to other dogs must be held financially responsible.
- ANY dog that bites needs to be dealt with. The owners causes it so there better be heavy fines and they should be required training and proof they took the dog to training after a bite occurs
- This would allow explanation as to what happened and if the owners' dog who bit the other person or animal is innocent then this should be used as explanation for their behaviour.
- It is the owners responsibility to the victim. Dogs learn behaviours from owners and if a dog it kms vicious it's because of a vicious owner.
- Yes as long as the dog has returned to a calm state and the stimulus inducing the attack has been removed from the site.
- Why should it be any different from a vehicle accident with injuries???????????????????? I didn't realize this rule wasn't on the books.
- owners need to take responsibility for their animals NO MATTER WHAT BREED
- It ensures that the owner is identified and it allows the owner to share their view of the incident (if their dog was being harassed, whether warnings were given to keep away from their dog, etc).
- If a dog bites a person or another dog it's the fault of the owner and the responsibility of them to remain at the scene and support the victim and speak with bylaw. Further, because you have not provided a place for comments regarding pitbulls I think its outrageous to condemn an entire breed of dog by enforcing more rules and muzzles for them compared to other dogs. Its pet owners responsibilities to properly train their animal and keep them on a leash or muzzle if needed. Its not fair to make every pitbull or every dog with some pitbull in it suffer. They should be treated with the exact same rules as other dogs, especially since there is no evidence that they do not cause more bites. At the very most the fine for a bite from a pit bull could be increased because of the severity of the bite.
- People need to be responsible for their pets
- Anything requiring medical attention yes o
- No different then a accident stay until resolved
- If a car was involved in an "incident" the owner must stay onsite until officers arrive. If a dog causes an "incident" the own must also stay. (I'm shocked that's not already a "rule".)
- Vet bills are expensive and the risk of the offender fleeing the scene is high.
- This is not limited to owners of pit bull or similar breeds but includes all dog bite incidents down to Chihuahua.
- Sure, depending on the severity of the incident. Also consider the recent rise of abuse of power and regulations and false reporting of incidents (dog-centric or not) because of, for lack of a better term "Karen-ism." Public thinking they are the judge, jury and executioner, when it comes to by-law enforcement will lead to false accusations, and non-issues turning confrontational. The city doesn't have the resources to properly enforce such ideas and this will lead to bigger issues.
- If someone is seriously injured the dog should be evaluated. If the "bite" left no visible signs of injury then I would consider that minor and both parties can walk away.

- I don't understand why they would be allowed to leave. Obviously, just like in any attack or accident, the person responsible should remain at the scene. And if they don't, there should be fine, just like fleeing the scene at a hit-and-run.
- I do support this because the owner is responsible for the dogs actions. If medical procedures are required for the attackers dog, the attackers owner should be at fault
- I have been involved in aggressive dog behavior in my neighborhood and in dog parks. Both incidents could have been resolved between the owners if they stuck around to talk. Stomping off and complaining to bylaw only increases neighborhood disruption and bad feelings. Dogs are by nature aggressive animals but there are often reasons for behaviors. Fines do not fix behavior by either the animal or their owners.
- See above
- Be responsible for your dog's actions!
- The dog owner can't run away from their problems. Separate them from the victim but the owner should be in contact with law enforcement right away, so they can be stopped and brought for questioning to receive fines and jail time. A vicious dog is always the owner's fault, not the dog's (or dog breed type).
- In case an order needs to be issued or a vet/ medical bill needs to be covered
- It is important to take responsibility for your dogs actions if the bites/injuries are serious enough.
- The owner of any dog that bites should be responsible.
- Owners should be responsible for their dog's behaviour at all times, that includes assuring that if their dog causes a incident they help those that have been harmed and give a fair and honest statement. The exception may be when they need to get away to secure their animal - but there should still be a report and attempt to contact.
- If any animal bites , the owner needs to be made aware of the next steps to guide and train the dog out of this behaviour
- I think every attack should be reported, so we can track dogs who are aggressive and prevent severe attacks against children, other animals and adults.
- Same with a hit and run. Obviously if I hit someone's car I'm going to stick around to give them my insurance information. It would be the same if my dog bit someone - I would wait to give them my information for further discussion about how to move forward.
- If injury occurs
- I believe an owner should take responsibility for a dog bite, but I do NOT believe that the dog is to be taken away, it is NOT the dogs fault for aggression, it is on the owner, therefore why traumatize the dog. Perhaps provide small funding for animal behaviourist to work with owners & aggressive dogs in severe cases.
- This is the same as if you are in a car accident. You need to stay and speak to the officer about the incident.
- If a dog bites a person or another dog it should be required they provide property insurance policy numbers or face fines in excess of $5,000 and 100% of that sum should go to the victim and not the crown.

- only exception if a person or animal needs medical attention, then information must be left with someone at the scene
- Yes. The dog and incident is the owner's responsibility to handle. Similar to the expected standards in a car collision.
- It's crucial for that person to provide context for the incident and take ownership of the consequences.
- People need to take responsibility of their pets. Stay and provide your information. This should be no different than leaving a scene of an accident
- It would allow for more effective and efficient information gathering. First hand accounts are always best and even then people's memories are always flawed. If people go home, talk to others then they will have altered views of events.
- Contact information for follow up legal concerns regarding medical matters, loss of income, damage to pet, etc.
- Dog bites are dangerous. As a small dog owner I want repercussions for dogs who bite, whether the bite a dog or a human.
- I explained it but your website sucks, I had to reload for captcha and it lost my answer
- Yes or at least provide accurate contact information
- I think all claims made to bylaw must be made immediately and both parties must remain on the scene for an officer to arrive. The individual that was injured needs to tell the other person immediately for minor injuries unless medical attention is required.
- It would be similar to An auto accident.
- Yes if the other party feels the need to have the cops involved then yes. How else would you get your aide of the story across if the cops are going to be involved anyway.
- should the animal need to be tested for disease it is necessary to know where the animal lives
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dog's actions.
- The victim needs to ensure the dog has no medical issues/diseases, and the owner should be held accountable. Similar to a hit and run. Take responsibility.
- Best way to keep track of these things and identify the REAL problem - bad pet owners.
- Taking accountability for your pet is important. People want to know who's dog bit theirs and why so stay at the scene or return after putting your pet at home or something so you can share info and any important things that can explain the situation is important. The officers may need both sides of the story too
- Accountability needs to be taken. Both sides of story need to be given.
- In the case of injury, regardless of the victim or the circumstances, proper measures must be taken to ensure a proper followup. I believe that this is essential to keeping dog-owners and non-dog-owners safe.
- People need to be responsible for their pets
- There would need to be a quick response from an enforcement officer given Calgary's weather! Dog owners are responsible for their dog's/dogs' behaviour and should be available to explain the situation. Often the other dog involved has instigated the incident and almost compelled the "guilty" dog to react!!! A lot of irresponsible owners out there especially those of smaller dogs!

- If severe injury occurs to the attacked dog in which costs money to treat the owner of the dog that attacked should be responsible for those costs.
- Ultimately it is the owners responsibility to care for their dog & explain the situation.
- Not really a yes/no question as too many variables. People and animal safety and care would take priority over staying at the scene.
- This feels like a common sense action;
- The owner of the dog who bites someone/something should be held responsible for the dogs actions. This may include vet or medical bills if needed. They should be charged if they flee the scene with their animal.
- The owner is responsible to share information with the injured individual
- In some cases it isn't known the severity of a bite until some time later. What may seem like a small bite may in fact have dire consequences. I think sharing basic contact information would suffice in most cases. I have no idea what turn around time is for an enforcement officer to arrive on scene but as an alternative perhaps having those involved submit online reports of what happened to be followed up with an enforcement officer later.
- I believe that the owner should be held accountable in ensuring that the other dog is safe and receives proper medical treatment, and gives information if follow up is necessary.
- Two sides to every story. If the owner was being attacked by the other person and dog protected etc etc
- It's good to see both sides of the story. This way the owner can give their side of the story and see who is to blame for the dogs misbehavior
- My sisters dog was bit twice at the Sue Higgins Off Leash park; vet bill in excess of $2,000. Neither owner stayed at the park or offered assistance. One was a dog walker with too many dogs.
- It is the owners fault not the dogs
- "As is the case with any incident, both accounts of what happened (victim and aggravator) are needed.
- I would add that there should be language in such a bylaw that allows for a dog owner to sufficiently remove their dog from a high stress situation so it can calm down (ie/ leave an off leash dog park but remain in a vehicle in a parking lot next to the park)"
- Simple. It's the owner's responsibility.
- Should be the same as a traffic collision due to the liability along with leave the scene tickets, etc...
- That just seems like common sense. Like a fender bender car incident.
- Just like any accident, we have to remain at the scene or write a report later. Hopefully the two parties could try to settle things on their own first.
- Yes because there are two sides to every story and it is used in human criminal law, it should be the same for dog bite offences
- how else do they get information of the offender?
- Of course the owner should wait and explain the situation.

- There are so many reasons why a dog could be aggressive. Most of the time it is out of fear for previous abuse. Bylaw should hear the story of the owner and dog to determine if the dog is vicious or has history of abuse.
- The owner should be responsible for their dogs behaviour
- People often disappear as quickly as possible to avoid having to be liable if their dog attacks or bites another animal , how ever in the case of injury they should get medical attention right away and might not be possible to wait at the scene for an enforcement officer
- This will enhance accountability
- The person should be held responsible for the injuries incurred by their animal onto another. If there are phones, photos should be taken as well.
- only if the attack results in an injury that is needed to be seen by a vet or doctor
- It's too easy for someone to walk away from the scene and not be found again. They should treat it just like any other accident and remain at the scene.
- The dog owner/dog needs to be monitored so that this doesn't happen again, and possibly made to participate in behaviour classes with their pet and given an order to keep their dog muzzled. Also, they need to be able to give evidence and their side of the story. Depending on the incident they should be held responsible for paying the vet bills or hospital bills of the person or other dog injured.
- "Yes just like an accident you need
- To stay at the scene"
- too many dirt bags giving false info.
- Obviously?
- So many incidents of this nature are 'hit and run'. Dog owners and managers eg pro dog walkers, need to take responsibility for the behaviour of their dogs . Leaving the scene should bbe an offence
- This is 100% necessary. Its the same situation with children hurting other children, car accidents on Calgary roads, or any other form of offence or accident against another vehicle, child, or pet.
- Owners should be held responsible for their animal's behaviour
- If a dog is aggressive or harms another creature, the owner of said dog should be responsible. The way I see it, if you leave the scene of an accident you're fined, so what's the difference here?
- People need to be responsible for their dogs behavior.
- There are two sides to every story and context is critical. Witnesses should remain as well
- Just like an accident with a car
- It's just like with any other situation where someone is hurt. It shows that the owner is holding some responsibility for what happened, not fleeing the scene.
- Assuming there is a place to remove the dog from the situation
- If there is visible injuries yes, if not there shouldn't be enough reason to most likely waste people's time. Common sense
- This is the definition of responsible ownership.

- Allows them to share their side of the story. The exception being if their dog was also bitten or injured and they leave to acquire immediate veterinary assistance, but they call law enforcement within a reasonable timeframe to schedule an appointment to follow up.
- Unless emergency vet or hospital for a person requires them to leave the scene.
- I think this is important for both owners to stay on scene. I own a Staffordshire bull terrier, and because of her breed she easily could be at fault even though the other breed could have exhibited the behaviour.
- This already exists. Whether people honor it or not is another matter. So really??? Calling it a rule now will make that better?
- Taking responsibility is a pet owners duty. May not be the proper spot for this but come on Calgary, it's not a breed issue, it's an owner issue. Don't blame breed specific dogs. My vet said he's been bitten more often and with broken sling by smaller dogs.
- Duh
- Need to know we're to find the animal
- Pet owners should take responsibility if their animal is involved in an incident - whether their animal has bitten another animal/person, or where they or their animal has been bitten.
- leaving the scene of a dog attack should be penalized harshly, even if it wasn't a bad attack. it should be up to both parties whether charges will be pursued
- My dog has been bitten multiple time's and the people never stayed and ran off while I was tending to my wounded dog.
- The owner is liable for their dog and should lawfully be required to remain on the scene and identify themselves
- Same as getting in a car accident and if someone leaves should be treated as a hit and run
- It's common decency.
- Yes with reservations. Sometimes staying on the scene is dangerous for both dog and human, esp when the party that may be at fault is endangered by remaining. In my more than ten years of dog ownership in this City, I have seen vastly more aggressive non-pit bull dogs (golden retrievers, esp) behaving badly with other dogs and their owners tend not to notice or care, but they themselves do get aggressive when their dog does something wrong.
- This is similar to leaving the scene of a vehicle accident. However, there must be consideration of nuance, not automatic condemnation of the biting dog (e.g. aggressively running other dog), or no one will comply.
- hold pet owners accountable for their pets
- They need to explain why dog did it .Maybe not dogs fault but dog being teased or other reasons .there usually a reason .
- Yes they should be required to as the animal can be assessed at that time and the Incident can be properly investigated
- At minimum an exchange of information should be required. But the owner may need to remove the dog from the situation, before waiting around for authorities, if they have been called.

- If the dog owner is not required to remain it would be extremely difficult to track them down later to determine whether there have been previous incidents with the animal and to seek compensation.
- I don't think law enforcement is a requirement for this sort of incident, the person should share contact information. If someone is really hurt you kinda need to go to the hospital or vet
- I have been in a situation similar and I remained on scene and accepted the fine and all preventative measures necessary to avoid another scenario happening. (Dog triggers, past trauma, new dog to the family, pain, etc)
- I think the majority of responsibility comes from the owner, and that applies to all areas that have been discussed; an owner ought to stay if their pet has injured another animal, an owner is responsible for training their dog. Bylaws that support owner responsibility, I support; bylaws that stigmatize a breed, I do not.
- The owner needs to take accountability if their dog is improperly trained
- Once a person is gone it may prove impossible to identify.
- As an owner you need to take responsibility for what just happened. that being said, you should not fear that your pet (family member) will be taken from you. For so many their pets are their family, their children, you wouldn't remove a child because it got into a fight with another kid so why are we treating animals any different?
- The owner needs to be held responsible.
- Hold people accountable and provide relevant history and information in case vet bills arise
- A responsible owner should insure that their dog is safe from a situation that would make the dog bite. ie. keeping other dogs and people away from their dog. In past reports the dog is always shown to be at fault. Staying at the scene will make for a more accurate account of the incident. Example: If at any time a dog runs into another dog and that dog reacts by a bite. Who is at fault? The dog out of control by running in or the dog that reacts? Also people who insist in coming in to pet a dog they do not know and being told repeatedly by the owner to not touch their dog.
- If someone becomes injured it is the responsibility of the dog owner to stay until all is dealt with to avoid misinformation
- It's like a hit and run. Pretty [removed] if you run away because your dog bite someone
- I think it's absolutely crucial a dog owner stays to share their contact information so that going forward actions can be taken and tracked if there is an incident, versus them running off and then they could potentially be a repeat offender.
- My dog has been bit before and the owners took off, I would have liked to talk to them and ask them not to bring their ball aggressive dog to the dog park with a ball
- This is common sense. Only criminals leave the scene if they or someone/something under their responsibility leaves after hurting someone. Is there no rule on this? Really?!?
- This will ensure accountability and responsibility.
- This would only work if the enforcement officer can respond in a timely manner. I also find it critical that the enforcement officer needs to investigate the true cause of the bite. All too often dogs are protecting themselves from a person or animal that has made them feel (I.e. dogs off leash who run at dogs on leash).

- Because it attacked/caused injury. It should be treated the same as a car accident or physical attack by another person.
- Owners need to have accountability.
- "But I understand why this is scary for the owner. Calgary's stance towards dogs is very adversarial compared to other places I've lived in Europe, the States, and B.C. For example, when we first moved to Calgary, we brought our dog downtown for Canada festivities but were told even though he was on-leash and well behaved, we'd have to take him home if we were staying in Olympic Plaza. Meanwhile, people were smoking all around us but that wasn't considered a problem even though, it was a much greater health risk than our dog. The barking by-law also seems exceptionally subjective. We live across from a park and when people take their dogs there ours will often bark, not aggressively but by way of greeting and wanting to play. I've worried multiple times that one of our older neighbors might call by-law even though barking is a completely normal behavior.
- So as dog owners we know the scales are tipped against our dogs."
- In our park, there have been a few incidents on dog biting and owners leaving area or providing wrong data. People should remain in place as the victim is trying to access damage that can't be done in short order or damage is not know for a few days. Plus people need to be responsible for their actions and of their pets.
- I think it is important to keep track of bites, intentional and unintentional. but to also understand the nature of the bite (why, and how). Which could hopefully lead to the owner of the dog who bit to take that dog to obedience training.
- Same as if you hit someone with your car. If your dog bites someone you should have to stay so that the police can assess the situation. It protects both parties.
- People, not the dogs, need to be held responsible. A dog bites from poor training.
- the person/animal that gets injured could have aggravated the dog. It is best to get both sides just like a traffic accident. There are always 2 sides to the story.
- if the dog is biting animals/people the owner should be required to provide contact information as they may need assistance in better training or providing care for their dog to ensure better behavior in the future.
- Unless the incident is minor & the owners come to an amiable resolution (ie exchanging information & willing to cover vet expenses).
- In case of a disagreement between parties best if both parties are available.
- I only said yes because I think if something should happen to the person/animal that was bit then the owner of the dog should be made aware.
- It is the dog owners responsibility to be present if anyone has been in danger/injured by their dog
- I think as a dog owner you have the responsibility to remain at the scene. However, I do believe every situation is unique - if you or dog are in an unsafe location then I believe placing some distance maybe needed. Do not flee but ensure all parties are safe. Things happens tempers can fly and situations can escalate so I think it's not so black and white sometimes
- Essentially sounds like the same as a fender bender. Of course I would want the person to remain at the scene of the crime. As a responsible dog owner, I have been in situation that point to there also being irresponsible non-owners who can taunt, surprise, or harm animals. There are always two sides to a story.

- The owners need to understand what the impact that their pet had on the other animal
- Same as a vehicle incident. Share information. If you require an officer on scene one can be requested.
- Owner is at fault for not properly training and or socializing dog
- They should be fined for leaving the scene and should be forced to pay the victim dogs vet bills.
- Of course someone needs to stay at the scene and talk with an enforcement officer.
- As a responsible dog owner, it should be required to ensure all involved are unharmed/understand the incident. However, enforcement officers attending these occurrences should have the appropriate training and understanding of dog behaviour in order to correctly mediate the situation.
- Dogs are animals. Situations happen during play time, or adrenalin rushes. But it is the owners responsibility 100% of the time.
- Once the dog is safe and secured yes. Sometimes you need to avoid further issue and secure the situation first
- Accountability
- It is a way for dog owner to take responsibility for pet
- I believe everyone should equally held responsible for their dogs action. I would like this also to apply to the smaller dogs that have the highest bite/attack rate but is not reported because they don't do damage. A bite is the same aggressive behaviour why should one breed be penalized more than another due to its size.
- If they can't stay on scene there should be a way to immediately provide contact info to all parties involved
- If a dog bites another person or animal the owner should already remain at the scene of the incidence and I'm surprised if they don't already have to stay. I feel it's essentially almost the same as leaving the site of an accident, i.e owners should be charged or fined if they leave.
- But sometimes they have to go to calm the situation and get the dog away from the other animal. In which case, provide contact details.
- Accountability needs to be with the owner or handler to
- If an incident happens then both parties need to share their side of the story.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions. If your dog is not normally a reactive dog then you should be worried about staying.
- "As long as both sides are heats openly without prejudice, dogs normally do not bite unless provoked or threatened and there for should not be held accountable if pushed to that point.
- We are too quick to judge the animal and not the person that has been attacked or the person that owns the animal."
- Just like a vehicle accident you stay and exchange what happened. Fines should double if they leave the scene
- If your dog is vicious and bites someone or another animal, you should absolutely be responsible to ensure your contact info is given and should be required to take responsibility.

- For any dog breed that bites in any scenario.
- This should be law. If a person injures someone with their vehicle, they must remain at the scene. The same should be standard for dog bites.
- This is what should already be happening
- It's against the law to flee an accident, so why not the same for a dog incident where the dog bites
- If a dog does bite someone else or another dog, there must be a story. Both the victim and dog/dog owner may be at fault or it was a genuine accident. Hear them out and act appropriately.
- Just like vehicle accident, remain on scene until required
- For sure if they bite another person- even just to provide info on the dogs health/vaccines etc (ie rabies, tho person should get vaccine anyways). Though it may not be the dog owners FAULT it is their responsibility. Ex. What if the dog bite & injured then hand of a man/woman who was a surgeon- there's serious implications for the injured individual.
- "I believe this important so that both parties can tell their story.
- Also it would most likely make it easier for the enforcement officer to do their due diligence for the investigation."
- If you get into a car accident you're required to stay. I say if the person leaves, there should be further charges.
- Owners should be responsible for their dogs.
- Dog Owner must fully participate in taking responsibility for all of pets actions on private and public property
- The owner is responsible for their pet and should answer for it. By leaving the scene and not giving their contact information, they are trying to avoid responsibility for their pet.
- If a person is involved in a traffic accident they must remain at the scene and provide all necessary information to the other parties/ enforcement officer. This should be no different for an animal attack on a person or other animal. If the person leaves with out providing info than it should be deemed a 'hit and run' type of situation with more severe consequences.
- Just like accidents you MUST stay at the scene or at least provide identification to report from home.
- Provide context to the incident
- There needs to be communication so victims of the attack can report the dog and see if there were previous incidents
- there is no excuse for dog attacking outside of playing (not real biting). If this occurs an owner should have to undergo training to learn how to take care of their pet.
- I believe it is important for all parties to remain present to provide testimony to the incident, as well as collect eye-witness testimony. As dog fights occur for many reasons and can be skewed by each party, it is important to get information close to the incident time.
- Except when the dogs are playing with each other as sometimes they place their teeth on one another, this is still play and not an act of aggression.
- Given that the dog can be kept a safe distance from other potential conflicts until the officer arrives. This may not be feasible in large off lease parks with many dogs where a small fenced incident waiting pen may need to be constructed.

- It is the pet owners responsibility
- For liability purposes
- I also feel this should be taken more seriously over severe bites. Some are minor and would not require this action. If a dog severely bites another dog they should help with vet bills etc.
- Owners should be held accountable for their dogs actions.
- Same as a car accident. It is the responsible thing to stay on the scene. If they can return the dog to the home and return very quickly that could be ok too. (So the victim isn't further traumatized by continued presence of dog).
- Thw dog owner is responsible for the training and handling of a dog. Therefore, the entire responsibility of the bite should be on the owner.
- Any responsible pet owner would stay and share information. This law could help enforce this for the pet owners that would leave.
- It can be hard to get id and info later. Especially if trauma is involved
- A responsible dog owner would provide this information regardless.
- It would enable a discussion of how the bite event happened and what the owner can do to prevent recurrences. Sadly, it would also be hard to enforce.
- It should be a responsibility of a responsible pet owner to take ownership of there pet as they would for a child. If damage is done they should have to pay for what there pet has done
- That should be the case in any situation or accident. PITBULLS ARENT THE PROBLEM OWNERS ARE THE PROBLEM
- Leaving would only give the impression of guilt and not taking responsibility, owners need to be held accountable for their pets.
- Dog bites / attacks should be assessed, however: this should be with ANY breed. Not just pitbulls. There's no need for hateful prejudice and rhetoric, most pitbulls are typically calmer than other dogs when trained and cared for properly.
- It's ok to ensure people are ok
- Unless if people or animals need to leave to seek medical or veterinary attention, owners should remain to ease follow up
- So many times the owner leaves the scene with the dog and can't be found. It should be made a rule that they remain on scene. If they break this rule, there should be fines and penalties (I.e taking the dog)
- I am shocked this isn't already in place to be honest
- Only if the dogs do not require immediate medical attention.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs actions.
- What do you mean explain? Of course one should share contact info - if your a responsible dog owner one would.
- absolutely, in most cases people run because they know it is their fault.
- Ya obviously. The person should be held accountable.
- Accountability and contact information - same as any other injury accident requires

- Owner needs to accept responsibility for their dog
- The owner of the dog is the one responsible and should both be willing and compelled to make sure the other party is safe before departure.
- The incident should be investigated. There is always two sides to a story. It is not always the dogs fault for reacting the way it did.
- if the bite is severe where it causes medical aid then as a responsible dog owner they should step up and make sure everyone is ok and their dog takes the correct training to avoid that in the future.
- Same as a car accident.
- There has to be context. If a dog bites someone who is attacking an owner or a dog, I see no issue here. If a dog bites a person for no reason this is a problem. Dogs bite each other all the time for many reasons, every situation is unique and should be viewed as such.
- It is similar to hitting a car, I see no reason the dog owner would be able to just leave after their dog causes someone harm
- With a caveat-it may not be safe to do so. Sometimes the priority may be to get the dog away from the situation.
- If a dog bit me and the owner did not remain at the scene, I would make certain that I obtained the information myself.
- It's a dangerous situation. If you get into an accident or hit someone while driving, you are expected to stay at the scene.
- People with dangerous dogs often “disappear” before Information can be obtained! If they leave the scene and are found later, a very, very hefty fine with NO EXCEPTIONS AND NO EXCUSES will be accepted!
- As long as the dogs involved are safe
- I think the owner has full responsibility of their dog and I don't think they should put the dog down, I think they should evaluate the owner to discuss them to be able to have ownership rights on pets.
- But allow them to place themselves and their dog in a safe space away from all others
- This should be a no brainer thing to do in the first place
- A owner is responsible for a dogs behavior and should remain at the scene
- Often people whose dog or person gets bit tell the one sided story. At times the person who reports it is at fault! The other person often leaves to avoid having their dog taken and potentially euthanized (which you obviously want to do). If it was properly investigated and addressed when people remain on scene, then dogs that react appropriately and aren't to blame wouldn't be at risk but people who are at fault would be held accountable.
- The owner needs to ensure that the other parties are okay.
- It is morally right
- So the owner can explain the incident from their point of view
- Injuries or vet, bills could be resolved, the dog that instigated the incident should be held accountable.
- Charges and fines for those pet owners who leave the scene.

- many times it is impossible to find out where the person/dog live after leaving the scene of an incident. This should be no different than an auto accident.
- Dependant on how severe a bite I don't think this is something to enforce and waste tax money on. For example if it should be medically assessed then yes. if it is a minor nip or play bite i do not think contact information is necessary.
- Accountability for your dogs actions
- However if the other person requires medical attention and the owner is taking them for that then no
- or at least be required to provide contact information before leaving
- Only if reasonable. If medical reasons compel the owner of the dog to help the victim there should be some flexibility
- Responsible pet owners would stay, irresponsible do not. Hard to enforce.
- Often times people leave because they're afraid their dog will automatically get put down. I would only support this if the law enforcement officer remained impartial and took both statements without judgement. Perhaps an animal trainer or rescue personnel should be required to go to the scene with the officer.
- So the issue can be addressed and resolved.
- that is just the right thing to do, same thing applies to vehicles incidents, right?
- Like a car accident, if you have nothing to hide, you should stay at the scene. Hand out fines if they don't .
- My old lab was bitten three times. Only one owner paid her vet bill. This should be MANDATORY or lose their dog.
- Having dog owners own up to their dogs behaviour will help change some patterns of behaviour. However, I do not believe this would be enforced very well, as can be seen in the example set forth by cyclists who hit cars.
- There is nowhere in this survey to put this comment, so I'm putting it here: please add a "button" to the 311 app to report nuisance animals... it's not at all obvious how to report this on the app.
- Often problem owners leave and the issue never gets addressed and the person could be the one that is responsible for many incidents
- The owner of the dog should take full responsibility for the actions of their pet. By providing information this will hold the owner accountable for the dog's actions and allow the victim ability to follow with any additional cost.
- We still need to keep responsibility on the owner for any dog related accidents.
- Yes and No, while getting contact information and info about the attack is incredible important, keeping a dangerous dog at the scene might lead to more injury.
- "I think it depends. If the dog owners are respectful and give their information they don't need to stay.
- Our puppy was bit by another dog and the lady was great. She paid for the vet visit that included stitches near the eye.
- But I also get that some owners wouldn't provide their actual correct information."
- Your dog is your responsibility

- just like a car crash - injury done - need to be accountable
- Same as works for vehicle accidents
- a fine should also be placed for failing to remain at the scene of an incident.
- If a dog bites and causes actual injury yes (example, draws blood) however when dogs play they do bite and nip, some owners see this as aggression when it is not. In the case of playing, and no injuries received I do not believe they should have to wait for an enforcement officer.
- The owner of the dog, should always own up to their faults
- Common sense/courtesy
- Yes they should stay and if they can't because their animal was hurt they should be giving someone their phone number to contact.
- For me it depends. If a dog bites a person, then yes. If a dog bites a squirrel or other animal (other than another dog in a public place) then no. If a dog bites another dog and the bitten dog requires veterinary care, then yes.
- Need to take responsibility for their dogs actions. Dogs can be dangerous and people need to take responsibility
- owner to be held accountable
- This is simply common curtesy
- The dog owner must be responsible for the actions of their animal
- "I agree with staying at the scene IF it was serious enough, dogs have a language that most people dont understand and I feel that it gets over looked quite a bit, these things shouldnt be looked at just ""a dog bite"" and the situation should be evaluated more.
- I would like to add since there is no comment box for the bully breed pol I will rant in this box. I think that it is arrogant of the city of Calgary to say that bully breeds ""strength allows the potential for a more severe bite"". WHEN THAT ISNT TRUE. All research doesnt support this, German shepards, Dobermans, Greatdanes have a stronger bite force even Golden retrievers have a similar bite force to the bully breeds. Just because they may look scary doesnt mean they are (even though in my opinion they are the cutest). I would suggest instead of singling out one breed and humiliating them I would start offering more affordable training for people who have dogs that have some sort of behavior issues and offer more education to people buying or adopting for all breeds. I have been bit only by little dogs and the owners just laugh about it because its little THOSE kind of dog owners need to take their dogs to training. Stop initiating fear into people because thats what this is doing instead EDUCATE."
- The behaviour of a dog is ALWAYS the responsibility of an owner. Bad behaviour is not breed specific in dogs the same way It isn't COLOR specific in humans.
- "Any person with integrity would take responsibility and do this anyway.
- What you are not addressing in this survey is that most dog incidents happen because the owners of the dog do now know how to control their dogs and get dogs over their competence level and do not understand dog behaviour. Not all owners pit bull owners should be punished because of the ignorance of a few."

- However, the rule needs to allow for the possibility that the dog owner may need to remove the dog from the scene and secure them to prevent further harm. This would not remove any responsibility from the owner for ensuring they identify themselves and speak with enforcement officers after.
- This would provide the opportunity for both people to provide their story. Some dog bites are human-initiated and not the dog's fault.
- I think if a dog bites someone, it's best for the owner of said dog and the victim to both stay put at the scene if possible! If not possible, exchange contact information. There maybe a reasonable explanation to this attack or it maybe a misunderstanding. Its most likely bad training. Again there's no bad animals, just bad owners. Its not the pets fault.
- Any dog, if it bites anything or anyone should be euthanized immediately.
- It is similar to a car accident. You cause damage to someone else, you stay to face the consequences. Otherwise, it's a bite and run
- The dog is your own responsibility, any damage it may cause is therefore your responsibility to have sorted (much like vehicle collisions).
- DO NOT EUTHANIZE THE DOG!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!! the Pet's OWNER is solely responsible for their animal's actions. Their ruling should be to put the dog into obedience/reactive/whatever training suits their behavioural issues. There then should be a follow up with a PROFESSIONAL dog trainer to ensure the dog's behavior is improving/if the training needs to continue. All of the above should be paid BY THE OWNER. I've had enough of owners not taking responsibility for their animal's actions. Time to start holding the OWNER accountable and not the dog!!!! FINES. WILL. DO. NOTHING. Training will educate the owner and make the animal a better domestic pet.
- If it is severe enough. There is an obvious difference between play fighting between dogs and a vicious bite. However people are afraid to die to euthanasia which should be removed.
- Any breed of dog can be aggressive and may need further training to prevent these instances
- The owner has to take full responsibility of the dogs damages.
- Dog bites are direct reflection of the owners training and control, so the owner must be held responsible.
- The majority of dog bites occur because the owner of the dog has not treated the animal properly, and the owner must be held responsible for anything their pet does
- But - we've been attacked a few times and in those situations - the victim usually wants to get away from the vicious dog and the irresponsible owner asap so not sure how this would work.
- I believe both parties should be able to share their side of things so there's no miscommunication in regards to what happened
- As a pet owner you are responsible for the actions of your pet. If your dog bites someone or another animal you need to ensure that you have taken appropriate action and follow up.
- If medical care is needed for the animal the dog owner who bit should give contact info in case they need to pay the bill
- They should be there, just like a car accident.
- Like a car accident, makes sense. Difficult though if there is just the owner and the dog, because that means the dog has to stay there too.

- This is a reasonable amendment. It would be helpful to have the phone number of enforcement officers posted at off leash areas.
- Yes, that is the most direct source of information regarding the animals history.
- 100% this needs to be required.
- If the owners dog bites someone he should be held accountable at stay at the scene.
- It's difficult to identify dogs and owners who leave the scene
- Self explanatory. Same reason someone involved in a car accident needs to stay on scene.
- If a car accident requires you to exchange information then a dog bite should too.
- That should be a very obvious thing to do that any responsible pet owner would want to do! Again animal attacks have more to do with a horrible upbringing than anything. Please stop at ways to punish the dog and more ways to take away rights of a [removed] person.
- "If a persons dog bites someone, it's the responsible thing to do to take care of it and have it documented.
- I also believe owners who flee the scenes of bites, or refuse to share information should lose their rights to own a dog due to irresponsible ownership."
- If the bite is serious enough that the victim feels an enforcement officer should be involved I believe they should be required to provide contact information as it could happen again and there should be a history
- Accountability for a pet's and your own actions should be a given.
- Yes, but how will you enforce this?!
- I would consider it like a hit and run. Once information is exchanged the parties can leave. If someone leaves without giving information they can face punishment
- Very much yes. So many owners don't believe a dog's actions are their responsibility. "It was just an accident. He's never like this." A strong message needs to be sent that difficult dogs shouldn't be at dog parks or at large.
- I have heard of many incidents where there has been dog altercations at dog parks and the owners involved do not stay around. If you hit someone else's car you are required to stay at the scene, the same should be applied to if your dog causes an accident
- the owner is liable and should share info just like a car accident.
- A dog owner must take responsibility for the behaviour of their dog
- This is vital to collecting information such as vaccination history, behavioural history and contact information. If your dog routinely bites people/other animals then you are responsible if you are taking the dog out of the home and into the world. The owners need to be held responsible.
- just seems neighbourly
- Responsible dog owners should always be with their dogs.
- Not all dogs will get "along" however if there is a bite involved sometimes the severity of the injuries cannot be determined or there is an overreaction and there may be no injuries.
- When any type of accident happens, a person should remain to be questioned.
- When my husband attacked the owner didn't even apologize.

- My granddaughter was bit by a dog and the owner took off, leaving her traumatized. That was completely irresponsible. By the way, it was NOT a pitbull.
- Too many pitbull owners run away after their dog bites another person or animal. It would be about time for it to be a requirement for them to stay.
- We need to know the truth if it was aggression or if it was just over a toy. Or an intact male being an [removed] to another dog and being to humpy.
- This is just basic respect and responsibility for an owner. This could, in the long run protect a pet and the individual involved - to understand history of dog, ensure shots are up to date....
- It's like a car accident, information should be exchanged in case further complications ensue (e.g. dog is not up to date on rabies vaccine)
- for the dog, it may not have been their fault
- we must share information to ensure the animal did not have any deceases, had all it shots
- If a dog bites someone it is necessary to share your information and make sure the person gets the medical help they need and this isn't a reoccurring problem with the same owner and dog. However what THIS bill is doing is WRONG. You do not have more "bite cases" with pit bulls in Calgary or surrounding areas. Singling out an entire breed for arbitrary reasons is disgusting and wrong. The entire province of Ontario has been trying to repeal the BSL ban that has been forced upon them for years. The only thing this will do is make more people go into hiding with their dogs. Most pit bull owners know their dogs and their responsibility to those dogs and in my personal experiences take their role in the dog community much more seriously than ones that own small dogs. I am actually appalled that is bill is even being put up.
- Yes, but only for severe bites that have caused obvious distress.
- I can't think of a single reason why a dog owner shouldn't have to stay. They are responsible for their dog, no matter how tiny or small the bite issues can arise at a later time, they should be responsible for any vet or other bills incurred due to the bite.
- both parties should remain at the scene, however the full story should also be captured, i have seen a german shepard bite someone when they were being aggressively teased
- It is important as this animal is your responsibility. You are liable for its actions.
- Many take off - they need to be there to accept responsibility and see what their dog has done
- Sometimes there are two sides to each story. Would be good to make sure all events are correctly recorded.
- It only make sense that someone be responsible for the actions of their animal in the same way they have to be responsible for their actions when driving a vehicle.
- It is the responsible thing to do. Just like any other accident.
- If it is not legal to leave the scene then it is more likely that people will stay.
- Unless there is a good reason to leave the scene, for example, to deescalate the situation and calm the dog down. The owner should be required to leave contact info with a witness.
- Owner accountability
- Like a car accident, if there is a bite the owner should share their contact information
- Who could enforce this?

- tracking down a dog owner to recoup costs to your injured dog can be impossible - or to file reports against the attacking dog if you can't find or don't know the owners residence
- A Dog owner MUST be responsible of the pet's actions
- I feel it is necessary as the person who was bitten (or owner of the animal that was bitten) deserves to know that the situation will be handled properly in the case of infection of the bite. It is also a good thing so that enforcement officers can see that pit bulls are not the majority of bites, but all dogs equally as it is not the fault of the dog, but the fault of the owner for lack of proper training.
- It should be required to provide your information should an incident occur as part of being a responsible dog owner
- No different then a traffic accident, they must be held accountable, or at the least, explain their side of the story
- "As a dog bite victim, it would be great to have the animals medical records. To ensure the dog gets proper obedience training. And a possible fine.
- As a pet owner, it is my responsibility to ensure I have a well behaved and socialized animal."
- an investigation must be held, evidence of foul play must be presented.
- Pet owners should be responsible for their pets and if an incident occurs you must stay to make sure everyone is ok and offer help.
- If the dog has harmed another animal or person the owner should be assessed as a good dog owner and get their dog to obedience school. Failure to do so should be taking the dog away and placing it in a shelter or better home
- The owner should be responsible for any medical/vet bills. A friend of mine had a $6000 vet bill when her service dog was attacked at an off leash park. The owners of the dog took off leaving them on the hook for the bill. (this happened in Edmonton)
- It's the responsible dog owner thing to do
- Itcis called owner responsibility.
- In some cases. It may not be safe for one of said parties to remain there however (dog is still aggressive, retaliation, etc.)
- Owner needs to be responsible
- Just like a hit and run
- It is the equivalent to a hit and run if a dog owner flees the scene following a dog bite/attack
- Have seen too many times where the owner of the dog who has bitten took off immediately.
- Evidence/context is necessary so they should remain at the scene if safe to do so.
- Both parties should remain at the scene and give their account of the incident. Many times it is not the dogs fault!
- To clarify, as a witness, the circumstances that brought on the incident
- The owner of a potentially dangerous animal must be available to be accountable for his/her animal's behaviour.
- responsibility can be determined
- If any type of dog has done physical harm the owner should stay to be accountable

- Many individuals who own these dogs exhibit aggressive behaviours themselves and I would be concerned about situations escalating. I wonder about a requirement that they report the incident and provide their contact information.
- Owners must be held responsible, and a bite-and-run is very easily done.
- But you can't force this to happen.
- This, but also the bitten party should stay except to leave for medical treatment. The biter's owner/guardian should also be given a fair chance to be heard, as it may not be their fault (i.e. when an off-leash dog approaches an on-leash dog in an on-leash area).
- Dog owner's need to be held responsible for their dogs actions ... they must stay to provide information on the dog's vaccinations, provide a full account from both sides of the incident and face repercussions if required.
- The owner has to be held accountable and monitored if they are being responsible dog owners. If they leave a scene they are obviously not responsible.
- "My dog was viciously and repeatedly attacked at an off leash park next to my three small children. The owner could not physically or verbally control her large mastiff. She finally got control and left the park and me trying to comfort my children and find my dog..."
- A bystander followed her to her car and took down her license plate, he said he was going to report her and insure she didn't bring the dog to off leash sites again. My kids recovered from the incident a lot sooner than my dog..."
- It's important to know information about the dog and owner after a bite to ensure the proper care.
- Provided the animal can be kept away from the scene safely I think it should be mandatory that the owner is held accountable and remains at the scene. It is the right thing to do and I would support additional fines if they do not remain at the scene.
- Dog bites are the responsibility of the owner. If a dog bites another person or pet the owner should remain at the scene as well as both parties involved should. As dogs generally do not bite unprovoked an investigation should be conducted into why the dog bit in the first place such as did someone just walk up to this dog to bite it without warning and did not give the owner the chance to advise against going close to their dogs? I have a friendly great pyr and on ever single walk we go on we have at least one person who just goes fully in to pet him without first asking. Instead of penalizing an owner for walking their dog, penalize the instigator of the situation such as the parents of a child who does not have good dog etiquette, this would minimize the amount of child related incidents as well as children will be more unlikely to go up to service animals to pet them this aiding that community as well.
- It allows the victim to be able to seek financial restitution if the offender does not offer it
- I think the owners should be assessed if they are fit to have the animal remain in their custody.
- Only if skin is broken. I.e if a dog bites but does not break the skin
- that's just a given!
- I'm surprised this isn't already a rule!!!
- Any incident should involve sharing of contact information but waiting for an 'officer' is not an acceptable expectations.

- However I am also in full support of investigating the full context of the bite. Was the dog being abused, picked on or teased by a person or another dog.
- If this was actually doable yes! Absolutely but unfortunately the lack of available officers on any given shift is not even close to sufficient to be able to attend incident scenes within a timely manner. Most offenders will leave without providing any information long before an officer is able to arrive on scene.
- Of course however everyone runs because mistakes happen. Doesn't mean the dog is bad. People hurt others all the time by accident they aren't killed for it.. why should An animal
- The person who was bitten should be able to allow the owner to leave, (if the bite was minor.)
- "I think anyone should be charged if any dog bites a person. Unless that person who owns the dog tells whoever not to touch or pet a dog.
- I also want to add.. if you're at an off leash dog park and you're scared of dogs, you shouldn't be there in the first place."
- Should act like a car accident. Info exchange, if a visit to the hospital is needed they should have some info on the dog IE shots.
- Why is this not the law right now?!
- If the person walks away, it looks as though they are the guilty party. It's best to tell enforcement exactly what happened before too much time has passed.
- I compare it to a hit and run. The damage is just as bad if not worse and the owners of the dog bite need to be held accountable.
- Most definitely. If the owner flees, it should be considered a hit and run.
- If necessary is key word. People must take responsibility. Share contact info is the main thing. A safe environment is needed for all parties.
- Owners need to be more accountable. Education is the key.
- owner must remove their pet from the scene and place in safe environment - no good is done when the pet remains and is surrounded by anger, fear and anxiety
- People should take responsibility for their animals
- If necessary
- So then a dog with a history of being anti-social can be identified
- Why would they leave? How do you get the animals history of shots without the owner present? If they leave, they forfeit their rights. If they care about their animal they will take all means necessary to protect them. If this is mandatory, then people will understand this is their only way to prevent automatic euthanasia.
- Dog owners are entrusted to be responsible for their dog's behaviour toward other Calgarians. This is the right thing to do for the dogs and the people. The enforcement officer would need to be quickly available. People cannot be expected to wait for more than 20-30 minutes - especially if someone needs medical attention.
- Yes, if a (bite) is substantial, no different than comparable to a minor fender bender vs a car collision.
- As long as the dog can be placed in control or that contact information can be provided

- The owner is responsible for the dog period!
- Replace "dog" with "car". Replace "bites" with "collides into". And replace "other animal" with "other car", and tell me what you think. Why should dog owners be exempt from being held responsible for their property?
- Ensures the owner accepts the responsibility for the incident
- Although depends on severity some dog owners are over the top when another dog simply plays with theirs
- This just seems like basic courtesy...
- All dog Not just Pitbulls...It's the owners not the dogs
- Is the right thing to do
- Everyone should have the right to explain the situation. Staying at the scene at least shows the person cares.
- Dog bites can be traumatizing and dangerous and if the dog doesn't receive the appropriate training and rehabilitation, it could happen again.
- I think it's a responsible thing for a pet owner to remain at the place of the incident so they can discuss with the person or other owner about what to do. No hit & runs.
- Similar to a car accident it should be necessary for an owner of an animal to provide important information.
- Like a car accident
- not different then a car accident
- All responsible dog owners would, this would penalise irresponsible dog owners
- "As long as this applies to ANY dog that bites regardless of how it looks or its perceived breed.
- Also as long as the owner is REQUIRED to demo state they are fit tow own and care for and nurture a pet and that the owner can prove they are not abusive and neglectful of their animal - because THAT is what creates a nuisance dog, not presumed ""breed.""
- Everyone should be responsible for their animals.
- To an extent absolutely. However you must also look at safety of people and other animals.
- People bring their poorly trained aggressive dogs to the dog park and then flee when their dog causes harm. This enables the victims to have access to names, contact information, and vaccine records of the other party involved.
- Absolutely.
- "Dog owners should absolutely be held accountable for the aggressive and violent behaviour of their animals.
- Stop trying to discriminate against pitbulls. Punish nuisances but leave breed out of it."
- Depending on the severity of the incident. A minor tussle with another dog should not warrant the involvement of law enforcement. If either dog or owner is moderately or severely injured, it would warrant law enforcement.
- It would be a lot harder to assess the danger the dog may or may not pose without the owner present, and it likely would even protect the owner as the police (etc.) would not just be relying on information from the victim. Also, if your dog bites someone, I don't think it's that inconvenient to have to wait a few minutes.

- Part of being a responsible dog owner regardless of breed
- I believe it is important for owners to take responsibility for their dogs actions. I refuse to go to dog parks anymore because my dogs have been attacked so many times. Owners often say that their dog was just playing rough.
- PEOPLE are the issue. Both parties are likely at fault and BOTH parties are responsible for dealing with the issue.
- People need to be held responsible for animals in their care.
- In the case of biting a human: yes; biting another dog: no. To me it seems there's no point in having punitive measures where dogs bite people if the owners of such dogs are not expected to remain where the infraction occurred to be accountable to enforcement officers.
- It's the same as a car accident, you don't leave the scene
- I think person absolutely and I think if there is another animal or dog then both parties need to remain at the scene. Some dogs bite in self defense.
- This encourages open communication and responsibility for dog owners
- Responsible pet ownership.
- Absolutely - its like being in a car accident (Trauma, injury to victim)
- The owner should be responsible and stay to deal with the situation but the dog should be removed.
- This makes sense. It's like a car accident- you need to share your contact info. My only concern is if the animal is agitated, they may need to leave.
- I would consider this leaving the scene of an accident if you left knowing your dog was involved in an incident
- Nobody should own pit bulls, they kill more people than any other dog.
- Owners should take responsibility
- There are two sides to every story. I think it's important to get all the facts.
- Think of it as a car accident. If there are no injuries the parties can exchange information. If there are injuries, the police are called.
- You are responsible for your pet. If your pet bites someone, you should not only cooperate with authorities but stick around to make sure the victim is safe.
- I am shocked that leaving an incident site without providing this information and meeting with an enforcement officer is not already a violation
- It should be the same as a car accident - both parties need to stay until bylaw arrives to assist or night parties are required to share information including Calgary license information - there should be a large fine for not staying as well
- As a pet owner you are responsible for the actions of your animal at all times.
- Responsible thing to do. The nite may be serious
- I do, but it might be hard if they are trying to remove their animal from the situation to provide any further distress on anyone else

- Any bite should result in exchange of information ie to pay vet bills if minor bite on dog. If bite is really bad then law enforcement should be involved and steps should be taken with that owner.
- I kind of support this but I think it would be unreasonable time wise to wait for an enforcement officer as they are busy. I think similar to an accident, they must provide their information and contact information to the other party involved or face significant fines. This would also help enable remedy through the civil court process as the owner and perpetrator would be positively identified at the time of the incident and would allow enforcement officers to better follow up to confirm dog registration, training, shots/vaccines etc.
- Pet owners need to accept responsibility
- If you are in a car accident you are legally required to stay at the scene. Accidents involving dogs should be no different
- I have several friends who have been bitten and best the owner does is apologize and leave. They have never offered their information. But the City of Calgary has been very lax in their communication of what a dog owner is responsible for.
- This is a good, however, there are many dog owners who claim an incident happens when they have not in a public area.
- I think dog bites should be treated the same way as assault.
- "If the bite
- Is serve enough."
- Too many people allow their vicious dogs to attack other dogs and then immediately leave the scene. They should be liable for the obscene veterinary bills/trauma caused by the incident.
- Seems only fair to take responsibility for your pets actions
- Of course!! The info of the owner should be shared asap, but the dogs also need to be secured.
- Dog owner is a responsibility and owner need to be held accountable for there dogs actions
- if my dog bites someone it is my responsibility to stay there no different then driving a car!
- Be accountable, what was the scenario, was it vocalized that the dog possibly didn't like being touched etc
- Again the responsibility is with the owner. Not the dog.
- Its called a hit and run because you ran and didn't want to be in trouble. If your dog bites you should remain at scene until spoken to by officer. I support sky high fines for individuals running from responsibility.
- Owners need to be held responsible if their dog has a lack of training or if they let that dog off leash and are aware that their dog doesnt not have proper socialization skills and may be a danger to other dogs.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their animals behavior, so stick around and share info, otherwise a dog could be a nuisance several times and there's no record of it.
- Dog bites can do alot of damage and can be quite costly if it bites your animal or yourself! The owner of the dog (unless they where being physically attacked) should be responsible for paying for the personal damage
- Would you leave the scene of an accident?

- Just like any accident.
- Then the officer will see that the owners bad attitude affects the dogs behavior
- I think the issue should be addressed at the scene.
- Ensure owner of dog has responsibility to remain on site in case a solution can't be found between owner and victim.
- Enforcement fails more often than not because bylaw officers cannot or will not follow up with irresponsible dog owners.
- Depending on severity of bite. If there is damage done then yes, otherwise no.
- Having a dog is a privilege, not a right. People's dogs, when in public, have the potential to interfere with people and other dogs. Sometimes violently. If your dog hurts someone, in any way, it's a serious matter, and so the owner must remain on the scene to accept responsibility for what has happened. Owners are 100% responsible for the control and and behavior of their dogs.
- They should stay there to discuss their side of the story, so that contact information can be shared. It's common decency and it's what happens in other accidents such as car accidents, etc, so why not for dog bites
- Like a car accident, information should be shared if needed
- I think it is important to have the household contact information for an animal that has caused an injury
- "It's just like a car
- Accident you need
- To take responsibility for your actions or say if your child was driving you are responsible for that vehicle"
- a dog bite could be caused by a number of factors. The more information the better. All parties should remain on scene
- they need to distance animal, put it in a vehicle etc but be there for an officer to take info down. but this should go for ALL dog breeds
- A dog bite can be related to a hit and run. You legally have to stay after you hit someone with your car. Why don't you have to stay when your dog has bit someone
- The owner is legally responsible for their pet just like a vehicle. If they cause an injury they must rectify the problem.
- Except when they or the animal also require medical attention. Should be allowed to attend a veterinarian.
- If someone's dog bites wether it's malicious or not it's important the owner take responsibility ghat their animal caused the damage and provide contact information
- Should be treated much like the Scene of an accident
- Yes, otherwise the victim may have difficulty finding out who the owner is. I would also support an opligation to provide insurance information as well.
- They are accountable and must remain on scene
- it ought to be the same as a car accident.

- Yes if there is blood drawn or a serious injury
- I believe if anything occurs such as a dog bite, you have to stay and explain what happened because not all bites are aggressive. The officers that respond should be well versed in how to spot the difference between an aggressive dog and a scared dog.
- Owners need to be accountable and responsible for their pets
- It's like any other accident. If someone was hurt, then an officer needs to be involved. You wouldn't hit another car with yours and leave would you?
- Ownership and expenses should be placed on the dog's owner.
- If your dog bites someone then yeah you need to be fined big time. But no reason to kill them. We don't even kill pedophiles.
- The owner should be there to ensure everyone is safe. But should be able to take the dog somewhere else out of the situation
- Like a car accident, one should be required to remain on the scene
- The humans should be held accountable for all dog attacks including covering the hospital bills that come with the injuries. ONLY IF the circumstances were 100% the owner's fault. If it's a break in, trespassing, teasing the dog, invasion of space, at absolutely no fault to the owner, they would be exempt
- Both sides should be heard not all dog bites are not deserved and some are caused by the victim's abuse of the animal
- It's no different than a traffic accident.
- It's important that key information be collected so the dog and owner are known.
- It is essential to at least know vaccination status of an animal that bites another animal/person, as that will determine whether rabies is a concern and whether the animal needs to be quarantined. It would also be beneficial to get everything sorted at the scene (i.e. vet bill payments, hear both sides of the story, etc etc) as opposed to either catching up or being unable to find them later on
- It should be a common courtesy.
- common courtesy
- No explanation needed. This is common human decency.
- It is important to discuss the issue and have responsible conversations in regards to the issue. The pet owners should have the info needed. Dog owners need to be responsible for their dog's reactions and if it bites another need to cover expenses for that injury.
- Treatment for dog bites is costly and traumatic. The owners should be responsible for these costs as well as responsible for and involved in any resulting investigation or legal action.
- It is important for contact information to be exchanged in order for follow up, however, depending on the circumstance the safest option might be for the owner to leave the scene with their dog in order to avoid further conflict/altercation.
- Bites can have serious and life-altering affects on those bitten. This would ensure pet owners understand their responsibility when a dog inflicts damage or bodily harm this also gives a formal process to understand number of nuisance dogs and opportunity to recommend education or alternative measures.

- Same concept as remaining at the scene of an automobile accident. Should be a no-brainer. Dog owners need to stay accountable.
- Again understanding. People now get a bit crazy on both sides
- If this experience was traumatizing and the dog needs to be taken to a safe place, they should be able to offer their information to the victim so then the officer can contact them in a less stressful time
- I was bitten by a dog being walked by someone on a bike. The dog nearly took me down and broke skin. The guy did not stop biking even when I yelled after him. Because he didn't stop I had to get rabies shots along with a tetanus shot. The dog was a lab.
- The person is responsible for their dog. Either stay on scene or report it.
- Information should be exchanged in case vet attention is required. It's common decency and respect to take accountability for your pet's actions.
- They should be held accountable for any resulting vet bills, as well as providing information regarding vaccinations, health concerns, etc
- Yes the owner should take responsibility.
- The dog owner must have assurance that their dog will not be seized at that time and must be allowed to provide witness accounts of what happened.
- To ensure that they remain responsible for their dog's actions
- Dog owners must assume responsibility for their dog's actions
- Be responsible for your dog's actions.
- Yes, but if the bite is caused by a person approaching with our consent or bites another dog not on a lease and the biting dog is they should not be charged
- Some dogs bite because other dogs or people DO NOT listen to their warnings. Both parties should remain to speak with an officer because they BOTH have a side.
- A person should take responsibility for their animal's actions.
- Health reasons need to be taken into consideration.
- I feel like it will force the owner to have accountability!
- If someone's child assaulted somebody with a knife they would be required to, and a mauling from a German Shepherd is potentially as bad.
- That should be an automatic requirement as a responsible pet owner.
- The owner is responsible for the dog. The rules should be similar to a car accident, you can't just leave.
- Accountability is required.
- A dog assault is still an assault, hit and run is a crime.
- It is the right thing to do if they are responsible pet owners
- enforcement officer should be contacted, and the owner should be allowed to explain the incident.
- I think the person should be allowed to leave if a dog or person need urgent medical care or if animals need to be removed from the situation. A way to contact each party must be established before leaving.

- Responsible pet ownership should require the owner to be responsible
- It allows both parties to share their story
- owner needs to explain the incident, and whether it was provoked by the dog or in many cases, the person who was bitten
- Always should stay
- When a dog bites a living being an investigation should be launched. A thorough investigation must include an interview with the owner who was in charge of having control over their dog (or the person who has possession of the dog on the owner's behalf, whom I assume would also be required to stay to provide contact info/discuss the incident with animal control if the dog bit while in their care and under their supervision).
- Owners are the issue, not the animal. Simple and you [removed] who think otherwise should smarten up.
- Only required to remain on scene if the incident has caused visual tissue damage or puncture wounds.
- The owner staying would help the situation be resolved in a rightful manner.
- the owner should remain and be responsible for the actions of the dog
- I think they should be required to stay for the sake of filling out a police report. But the dog owner should always leave with their dog.
- If your dog bites, you are responsible, not the dog.
- Let's get serious here the dogs aren't the issue it's the owners.
- Like any accident you should exchange info
- I myself have been bitten and my dog attacked. In both cases, the owners fled the scene.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their pets.
- This provides more responsibility to dog owners
- A responsible person should (notice I said person, not dog owner... This should be valid in any context)
- It would be helpful in tracking repeat offenders
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets and their actions
- I see too much of a grey area here so it would come down to the severity of the dog bite on the person or the animal. Just like in a traffic accident it isn't always necessary for an officer to be on scene but I like the concept that at request - personal information has the right to be obtained to provide assurance in case anything goes wrong after the fact due to the injuries sustained.
- If the bite requires medical attention then contact information may be needed by the doctor who treats it or the insurance company who may have to pay for it.
- There are too many pit'n runs to avoid fines. A $500 fine should be issued to anyone who doesn't license their dog like the Richmond, BC Model. They also require pit bull owners to pay a $300 annual license fee if not speutered and $50 incentive if speutered. Non-dangerous designated dogs only pay a license fee of $50 if speutered and $100 if not. This has been a successful system since 2000 and it keeps the pit bull population more manageable.

- "Hit and runs are illegal so why the hell wouldn't an assault by an animal also have a requirement to way for authorities.
- I feel like I'm being punked here..."
- No comment.
- The person is responsible for the behavior of their pet. They should be held accountable.
- It forces them to take responsibility as they should and encourages them to engage in training or assessment of the dog to help protect the dog from being put into another situation that could set them up for failure at the fault of their owners lack of responsibility
- I think its important to get an account of the incident and make sure the appropriate parties are held accountable.
- Because it might cause damage
- Now if the victim so injured and it is determined that it is the owners fault take it out on the owner not the dog. The dog doesn't know any better
- "This can be seen similar to a hit and run situation.
- the owner of the animal in question should stay at the scene."
- I think it's a good idea because I'd want to have the proper contact information in case of a severe attack to me or my pet.
- Insurance wise and legally wise this is the most responsible act.
- When it comes to the behaviour of a dog, the owner has a large part to play in it. The amount of time spent on training pets is often portrayed in the pets behaviour. Therefore if a dog is to be violent and bite someone the owner should be held accountable.
- Owner should explain but no punishment should be put towards the dog as there are unknown factors such as mood of the dog or how the dog reacts to certain breeds or dogs/animals themselves
- Owners should be held accountable, it is not solely blameable on the dog. People can use words and explain situations, actions, and outcomes.
- Because it is the owners' negligence and they should be held accountable.
- If it is a severe incident, it should not go unpunished.
- Your dog is your responsibility and you should fairly well know how your dog behaves so you must take responsibility even thou am accident or not
- No matter what breed, when a dog bites another you should take ownership of your dog and provide all options available.
- A driver must stay at the scene of a car accident. All responsible pet owners would stay at the scene of a negative dog encounter.
- For tracing for rabies or other information the dog owner should not be allowed to leave.
- Forced accountability
- If an incident does occur owner should have to remain at the scene same as with a motor vehicle accident.

- While dog attacks are almost always preventable, some owners do not take responsibility for their pet in these situations. While most attacks I have witnessed did involve the owner exchanging information with the victim and offering to help, a rule that requires it might encourage those who would rather leave the scene to stay in order to ensure responsibility.
- They are the owner of the dog and should therefore be responsible for said dog. Similarly to a car accident, driver must stay at the scene.
- There would have to be a rule of how long an owner should wait, if no bylaw or police is available to attend the scene, proper contact information should be provided. (Ex. A photo of a driver's license, a text sent to provide a working phone number, etc.)
- There's always two sides to a story and most times the dog is triggered and that's why they attack and the "victims" usually won't explain everything
- Just like any other incidence of accidental damage to someone else's property.
- I believe dog bites can be caused by humans not knowing about dog behavior or knowing signs dogs give before a situation
- Pitbulls should be banned in Calgary
- I feel it is the responsible thing as a pet owner to stay involved and concerned regarding any incident involving your dog.
- All parties should
- Only if it's more than a one-time offender. Or the owner is known to CPS.
- This should be a standard rule. If you have to stop and exchange information for scratching a parked car you should be required to do the same if your dog injured someone.
- I think it's important for the dog owner to be present because there could be more to the story than what the individual who was bitten may say especially in pursuing action when filled with emotions rather than thinking rationally as many things can make dogs react
- The dog owner must be held responsible for their animals.
- Owners (or the person handling the dog) are accountable for the actions of their pets and should bear greater responsibility for the behaviour of their pet; they need to be actively assessing risk and avoiding unsafe situations for their untrained or aggressive dogs.
- No. A yes is self explanatory.
- An enforcement officer would be able to put more details on record and therefore add important information to each case.
- Only if bites person
- To create accountability and prevent future accidents from the same dog
- Responsible pet owners do remain at the scene or call for help.
- Their side of the story is just as important. Their dog may have been provoked or they might be responsible to cover vet bills.
- It should be like a hit and run. People are afraid of getting in trouble and having dogs taken away. If they have to stay this may lessen that issue. It also may help identify the dogs for future offences.
- It is important to know if a owner is going to take the appropriate measures to rehabilitate the dog before engaging it with groups of dogs again.

- Accountability
- Accountability
- Here's an analogy: It's like getting in a car accident. Damage has been done. Information needs to be exchanged and if a dog attacks due to negligence on the owners behalf, then they should be responsible for the vet bills.
- It is not the dogs fault. It is something that the owner is doing and the owner should be taught, fined or have to finish and complete a training course with the dog through a trusted and proper company.
- They should be held responsible and pay the vet bills!
- We do it for automobile accidents. And require them to share their insurance information. When someone gets bit, they need the at fault owner's home insurance info. I say from experience that if you don't get it at the scene, your chances of getting it go to about zero. Realistically, the ones who flee are often uninsured. So yeah, it's very important to get that info ASAP.
- I believe that the owner should be given a warning and possibly a fine if their dog is continually being aggressive. This aggressive behavior reflects how the owner is raising the dog and the dog should at no point be punished for this. However the owner should have to take actions to ensure the dog is not put into a position that it would react with aggression. This may include mandatory training.
- Because it is their dog they should have trained
- An owner is responsible for their animal and needs to take accountability for their actions.
- As long as there is no danger to people or animals
- Statements should be taken by both parties involved
- You must remain at the scene of a car accident or you can receive an addition charge; so you must remain at the scene of that incident or potentially face another fine.
- Are you [removed]? It's an assault by the PERSON, dogs are property.
- "pit and run" is a term common on social media - it refers to a pit bull type dog owner leaving when his dog attacks to avoid liability and financial responsibility as well as put his animal's rights over the welfare and safety of other pets. there should be additional fines for leaving the scene when the owners dog has attacked, just like there is in the case of a vehicular accident.
- Obviously.
- It should only be fair thy the officer gets both side of the story
- If there is a severe incident it is up to the owner to stay and deal with the situation, like like with cars. However, just like with a car, there are 2 sides to every story and each side deserves to be heard and judged appropriately.
- Yes, however in an aggression situation with a solo owner it should be allowed that the dog be safely removed from the area.
- I see it as an accident, you want to ensure that both parties have said their story of the events and should exchange info like one would if in an accident
- Should be the same as staying at the scene of a car accident.
- Well if you dog bites some one there could be 2 reasons. You may have been harassed and your dog wanted to protect you. 2 the dog is being neglected and should be cared for which is why an officer should take information.

- The dog owner should remain so that they can take responsibility .
- but not necessarily the owner. Likely best if the handler or one in charge when incident occurs is the one to remain. Unless handler or dog are hurt or circumstances make staying at the scene dangerous.
- Yes. The person needs to provide information about their dog and vaccines.
- Too many people let their dogs run wild, attack others, and then run away. You are left with expensive bills and not knowing if the other dog had it's shots.
- People need to be accountable for their pet.
- if you hit someone with a vehicle you'd be expected to stay. Why should it be any different
- Because the Owners should be responsible and accountable for their animals behaviour.
- This is similar to a hit and run. Or otherwise the owner must report to a police station to make a report as soon as reasonable.
- It is the owner's responsibility to know and understand their dog. Owners should be held responsible for how their dogs behave, and not the breed of the dog. If someone knows their dog can be dangerous, the owner should take precautions and accountability for their dog. It's not the dog, it's the owner.
- Owners should be held responsible for their pets. Owners who have dogs with behavioural problems are frequently failing in some aspect of pet ownership. They should be held responsible and the dog's general home-welfare would be more likely to be investigated
- Yes to ensure there is no serious injuries
- As a responsible pet owner I would want to ensure the person or animal is OK. I would also want to be able to give my side of the incident if needed. Provide my information in case further information is needed.
- As a pitbull owner it is my responsibility to give my information during such a time and as a paramedic working in the city whenever we are called to a dog bite the owners are never around and we have questions
- an owner should be responsible for their pet
- Owners need to be there to explain from their view point what occurred and take ownership of the incident. Just like an injury accident in a motor vehicle.
- Ownership and honesty.
- Simply appropriate
- "It is much more difficult to track down an owner or dog than it is say compared to a car accident where there is licence plates that are easily visible and easier to track down.
- It's unfair for someone's animal to attack another person or animal and just leave the scene with very little means of locating them again for proper investigation"
- It is necessary for OWNERS to take responsibility as the dog can only do as much as they have been taught. Training should be mandatory for all owners, this is what would actually prevent issues with dogs.
- It is far too easy to run off and deny responsibility and liability.

- Yes, if a dog bites, the owner should not be able to walk away without consequences/an action plan to prevent further attacks.
- Unless the person who was bitten agrees that they can leave.
- As a responsible dog owner you need to take responsibility for the actions of your dog and deal with the incident
- Owner should remain at scene or provide contact information to victim for follow up by medical staff, bylaw, insurance purposes.
- Their dog is their responsibility
- The owner of the dog should remain so they may explain the story without any bias the “victim” may have.
- Humans need to take responsibility for bad dogs
- The owner needs to take responsibility. They should get a ticket that can be reversed if shown proof of training.
- The owner should be responsible for their dog’s behaviour at all times and should be held accountable for the dog’s behaviour.
- The owner should be present to explain the actions leading up to the incident - oftentimes the dog is provoked by the victim, or is not properly handled by its owner.
- Don’t need to explain ... if you don’t stay at the scene it’s just like a hit and run ...
- Yes, absolutely! Just as you are required to remain at the scene of an accident. Vet bills can run thousands of dollars and the offending owner should absolutely be held accountable to the actions of the dog
- It’s your responsibility to stay like any accident.
- The dog owner is responsible, and should be checked to make sure the dog is in good hands. No bad dogs, just bad owners.
- Dogs are bad and bite from being with bad owners. The owners need to be held accountable for their dogs actions
- I have witnessed one particularly dog on many occasions attack other dogs and once another dog owner. Unfortunately this dog i new as a puppy was the sweetest pup. Unfortunately the owners are what destroyed this dog. The owner runs from the dog park each time and blames the victim.
- Have witnesses and both parties present. Dogs don’t bite unless they have reason to.
- How are they supposed to find the attacking dog if they leave without exchanging information?
- Yes because the animal could have done this before or even had a disease.
- We need to be responsible for our dogs. Though if it is a mouse I don't think I'd stick around..
- I don’t understand how this isn’t the case.
- I agree that a bite can be a serious issue. Although, I do NOT support this if this is only applied to pit bull type dogs or enforces the idea that pit bulls are in anyway more dangerous than another breed of dog.
- It’s part of being a responsible and accountable dog owner

- If an owners dog bites a person or animal, it is the owners responsibility to ensure that the proper protocols are followed
- We must all be responsible for the animals in our care, that includes all situations including bite incidents regardless of how they began.
- I've heard of and experienced numerous incidents where the owner just leaves the scene.
- A dog is not sentient and therefore not responsible for its actions, its owner is.
- I think that all information needs to be gathered. Was the dog that bit the instigator or was it provoked
- If I hurt someone and the cops need to be called then I would be expected to stay so why wouldn't you expect the same from a dog owner
- You should be taking ANY vicious dogs away from people who have a history of substance abuse.
- As a responsible owner you should always stay to ensure no one was injured. If no injury then I would agree the owner can leave
- They should stay if possible, but should be able to leave if the dog can't settle down or if the exchange between owner and attacker because violent verbally or physically
- No more pit and runs, owner should be required to remain at the scene of an attack and the dog should be surrendered pending a rabies test.
- The dog owner can then be identified immediately and can therefore be held accountable if need be.
- Most dog bites are a result of poor training and ownership not the animal itself. I believe it should be law for someone to wait if the dog bites not because the animal is the problem but the owner needs to get training for themselves and the animal
- Remain at the scene long enough to exchange contact information
- They are responsible. It's not different from leaving from the scene of a car accident they were involved in.
- "My dog was attacked at an off leash dog park and the owner left immediately- $1000 in vet bills. The same dog sent another dog to the vet the next day.
- I was attacked by a different dog and the owner refused to provide information and I required an emergency dental apt.
- In both cases, I was unable to hear if the dogs were vaccinated/healthy, or provide follow-up."
- Owner is 100% liable for ANY charges and bills which may incur as a result of their dog's actions.
- I think the owner should remain at the scene so they can explain the situation and as to why the dog may have attacked.
- They need to be held responsible for their dogs actions from poor training. As well as ensuring the victim is properly taken care of.
- It's the responsible thing to do
- Owners need to take responsibility of their dogs - all breeds.
- Depending on the situation it would be good to get both sides of the story
- This dog could be involved in multiple instances and if they attack someone there should be a record kept of such attacks

- If your dog bites somebody, you are responsible and therefore you should stay to talk to enforcement.
- The human is in charge of the training, behaviour and wellbeing if their animal - they should be accountable. Instead of euthanizing a dog that has bitten, how about we solely hold the owner accountable instead of the dog?
- It is important for dog owners to be liable and held accountable if their dog causes injury to another human or animal.
- Any dog who attacks a HUMAN should be held accountable. Dogs can be territorial and this cannot be blamed on the owner and dogs should not be put down because of this. There is a reason they bit said human/animal
- A dog owner needs to be responsible. When a bite happens there are more than one side and the owner needs to defend their animal
- If owners are allowed to leave, then they likely will not take responsibility for their dog's actions
- there needs to be a point of contact for medical purposes. but no immediate action should be enforced. individuals need time to decompress from a traumatic situation.
- He should definitely have to provide contact info but if his dog remains a risk to others he should get it home.
- People need to be held accountable for their awful pets
- The person who owns the dog needs to demonstrate responsibility. If the dog causes Injury to a person or animal the owner must be held accountable and provide their information for follow up much like a car accident.
- The owner should remain at the scene and do all the things mentioned above because there needs to be more accountability on the owners for their pets
- That would be responsible act on behalf of the dog owner unless the dog cannot be controlled. Then the owner should be able to provide info- scannable tag via a smartphone?
- This is a part of responsible dog ownership regardless of breed
- The owner needs to take responsibility for what their dog has done. It needs to be documented and assessed accordingly, as dogs who are biting repeatedly need to be properly handled.
- If a dog bites another dog , the owner of the aggressive dog should be responsible for the costs associated/held responsible depending on the severity of the bite wound.
- Like any other assault, or like a car collision, it would make sense for the owner to remain at the scene to share contact information and talk with an officer if necessary.
- The dog owner needs to be accountable for their dog just like how a parent should be responsible for their kid.
- For record and if there has been another biting incident then they can take disciplinary actions.
- It will allow for more justified and reasonable probable explanation.
- communication between all parties involved should be encouraged
- Of course all the parties Involved should stay at the scene
- Accountability is important.

- It is important to get all sides. I saw an incident where someone had a yappy, growling tiny dog in the big dog area of a dog park; after it went for legs, feet, and other sensitive parts a big dog snapped back. All were upset but it was owners fault not the dogs. Every situation needs assessing from all parties.
- It's responsible to exchange information to make sure the dog has shots and it's health, as well as if the victim has severe or long lasting damages.
- Same idea as a car. If there's no damage then they can leave. If there is enough damage to cost money then yes
- Just for vet bills
- Dogs should be treated similarly to children. Where if someone's child attacks another child the parents need to share contact information.
- Absolutely yes. People need to be accountable for their dogs actions, bites can be traumatic both physically and mentally. Perhaps this would push people to train their dogs better and be more responsible, and keep a closer eye on the needs of their dog and behaviours their dog is exhibiting. If they knew they'd be held to account for their dogs actions, perhaps people would try harder to prevent something bad from happening.
- It would be the responsible thing as a dog owner every story has 2 sides best to make sure everyone is present to make sure details given are correct.
- This creates ownership of the dog's behaviour. However (!!) this rule needs to apply to EVERY single dog breed as little dogs are generally the instigators in incidents but generally are not labeled as an attack because of their small size. A bite is a bite, regardless of the jaw size.
- I and my JR terrier were ambushed and attacked while on a public path by a St Bernard, and I had great difficulties getting the owner to deal with the damage and vet bills her dog caused. There needs to be more tools to hold owners accountable for their pet's behaviour.
- Absolutely, as their dog is their responsibility, and leaving the scene prior to officials' arrival and documentation should be viewed as a hit-and-run and an attempt to avoid liability.
- A dog owner should be included in communication regarding his or her dog causing harm.
- Only if able to get the animal under control. If not able, the dog should be moved so it's not disrupting investigation.
- The owner and animal are often not positively identifiable without this information. Also, the victim may require aid.
- I have had an experience at a dog park where another dog attacked mine and the owner of the dog refused to talk to me or acknowledge the attack.
- requires increased responsibility of dog owners
- It's responsible pet ownership.
- Owning a pet implements responsibility. As one would buy a car with the awareness of vehicle collisions, one is also aware of misbehaving pets - as is evident to be a known hazard given by the existence of this poll.
- My shitzu was attacked by a bull mastive and although they gave me their info once bylaw came there was very little they could do as the person walking the dog was not the owner. They should also be responsible for vet bills if the attacked dog. I ended up $6000 in the hole they got a $250 fine that they didnt pay.

- Common sense. A person with information about the incident should not flee the scene in any case
- An animal attack is no different than a car accident in that, you may not have seen it coming and it was likely not intentional but it is your responsibility to remain at the scene of the incident to both help the victim and provide a statement to law enforcement.
- "In many cases, dog bites occur because the victim approached the dog and intruded the dog's personal space (i.e. a younger child runs up to the dog and gives them a hug, or an adult gets in a dog's face while attempting to pet it. Dog's go off of body language before spoken language and dogs can read that type of body language can be read as intimidating or with intent to harm).
- With that being said, sometimes the victim or victim's parents do not realize that they intimidated or scared the dog, and thus accuse a normally kind and sociable canine as aggressive and dangerous. The owner should be there to speak up for the dog.
- In other cases, a bite can happen because of the owner. Improper training and handling of their canine can lead to loss of control or they simply didn't socialize their dog so it doesn't know how to properly react in social circumstances.
- Very few dogs wake up in the morning and decide that they want to hurt a human. Most dog bites occur because of fear aggression, not true aggression."
- just like your children, you are responsible for your pets. If you pet injures someone they need to be held accountable. No matter what breed.
- I think the owner should stay ONLY IF the bite/incident is severe enough to require medical attention or police.
- Seems like common sense.
- Again I believe owners need to be held accountable in certain situations, I also believe that as an owner you need to be responsible, and deal with what is happening in regards to your dog.
- I'm any incident the person responsible for the dog at the time it happens should remain and be accountable
- Absolutely yes. Their dog is their responsibility and if they bite someone, the owner should stay at the incident as it is the owner to blame.
- That's just common curtesy and responsibility
- "This will hopefully make some pet owners more accountable for their dogs' behavior. I do think it is important to have options for dog training for all income levels as obedience training is often too expensive for most people which I think leads to behavior issues.
- There isn't a comment section for the thinly veiled breed specific legislation the city is trying to pass but this is not the answer. The project team all shows photos of their animals, some ([personal information removed](project manager)) have dogs that could pass as 'pit bull looking' and have restrictions based on them regardless of their pets behavior. BSL is unrealistic, unfair and unkind. It is not something I support in my city AT ALL."

- If the animal that has been bitten is injured, the offending dogs owner should be responsible for the damage, depending on how the altercation came about ie: if a small dog was off leash and charged a large dog on leash and got bit, I don't believe the dog that bit should be at fault.
- Yes but if they are trying to manage a highly agitated animal it may be best if they leave their info but DON'T remain on scene.
- Yes, but no dog bites without a reason, like an accident there should be two witness accounts and a bystander account.
- Dog owners that have a dog bite need to be aware and involved in the process. If only just to work on training or other measures not necessarily to punish or fine.
- In my view, responsible pet ownership should include the requirement to satisfy the exchange of details in the case of an accident/incident - should be similar to that of car accidents.
- The incident needs to be reported so that follow up can be taken. Is training happening? Are there multiple incidents for this dog?
- The owner should stay and talk with an officer. I have seen incidents that a dog was provoked by people and actually pulled and hit and the dog naturally tried to defend itself. People need to be held accountable for their own actions as well.
- E sise this is what an actual responsible dog owner should do. They can wait in their car if they don't feel safe.
- There are liabilities towards one or/all parties involved
- The dog owner should be held accountable for there dog its common sense stay on the Sean to make sure everything is good
- Noting this, if a dog catches a squirrel/ mouse I feel this would be different. Perhaps qualifying the statement with "another person or another person's pet."
- Just like any accident scene, any parties included in the incident should remain at the scene until an enforcement officer arrives.
- People need to be responsible for their pets. They are like children in that they are a reflection of their upbringing and environment.
- They are responsible and need to take accountability as well as provide insurance and contact information.
- They should be held responsible and stay to address the issue.
- They should be held responsible for the incident
- Owners need to be held responsible for damage by their pet.
- Absolutely!
- Both parties and witnesses should be present.
- Yes but only if said animal was not injured in any way themselves.
- There needs to be accountability for the animal.
- we do it with vehicle incidents, it makes sense.
- Absolutely. There is liability and risk involved similar to a car accident.
- "They are otherwise leaving the scene of a crime, and if not

- Present should be fined"
 - As owner they need to be accessible to victim/authorities in event of damages.
 - Owners of ALL dogs types should be required provide personal contact information after this type of incident.
 - Making sure shots are up to date
 - This would ensure dog owners are held accountable and cannot simply walk away from an incident without consequence. It would also ensure public safety as dogs involved in serious incidents could be identified.
 - Same logic as not leaving the scene of a car accident
 - The dogs behaviour is SOLELY the responsibility of the owner, so yes.
 - "This acts the same way as a car accident would. If you do not stay at the scene of the accident, its a hit and run, which has a higher punishment.
- Having the offending dog's person there, important information (like vaccination records) can be obtained."
 - The person who's dog started the fight should be responsible for their dog and any medical bills that also come from the dog bite. If my dog ever was to bite someone I'd stay and I'd expect the same from anyone else.
 - It would ensure that the owner is talked to and the situation is properly handled.
 - It's being a responsible citizen to stay at the scene. Also, the owner will have the opportunity to advise their side of the situation. Not every dog bite is solely the dogs fault. What was the reason behind the dogs action? Was the dog threatened, teased, hurt, mounted by another dog? Not every situation is black and white.
 - Same as an assault, or a traffic accident. Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their animals.
 - I guess it's kinda like a car crash because the result of an attack could have costs and things that need to have contact
 - Context of the situation needs to be found out as to why this behaviour occurred
 - Proper responsibility maintained
 - It would like be leaving the scene of a car accident, use common sense.
 - It is the responsible thing to do to ensure everyone's safety that they remain at the scene
 - The owner is responsible for the dog's behaviour.
 - This seems pretty self-evident
 - A responsible dog owner would do this anyways!
 - The pet owner mist take responsibility.
 - There could be a very valid reason.
 - The dog reflects the owner, owners should be responsible for their dogs actions

- The owner of the dog that was aggressive should also be required to pay the vet bill if they injured another dog- my dog was attacked by another dog and the owner just left and our dog had trauma and Injuries that we had to pay for.
- That is just common courtesy. BUT fear of severe punishment (animal being taken away/euthanized) would cause many people NOT to stay and take ownership of an incident. Example - my doberman was attacked at Sue Higgins by a shepherd mix dog. The wound required stitches. I did get the owners information. Note - my dog was the victim...and it is perhaps a breed that would be deemed the instigator.
- "They need to stay at the scene so contact information can be obtained in case there is personal injury to a person or animal. Too many people are getting away with - their animal causing injury and they have no repercussions. It isn't right."
- Does this really require an explanation?
- I believe as mentioned there are not bad dogs or breeds, just awful owners. If you didn't train your dog and it bites someone that's on you. You should have to stay and face the consequences. The victim shouldn't have to deal with the consequences. If the owner leaves it should be treated as a hit and run.
- Seems like this should be done already!
- The dog owner is liable for the actions of their animal much the same as I am for damage or perceived damage from my car. The law should be the same-you cant just leave.
- I would think this is necessary for the details of the incident to be fully recorded as well as the owner be offered education opportunities or given ideas for various training for their pet to reduce the likelihood of an incident such as this happening again.
- This seems to be common sense, if there is a need. By law officers would be too busy if this was required for all incidents because most bites tend to involve small dogs and often no harm has come to the victim.
- if it happens and is severe & pretty bad bite then yes but if not & didn't leave any mark or the persons not hurt let it go
- In order to get a full history both parties should give a statement
- Not in regards to this but in regards to "pit bulls" - German shepherds actually have more force in their bites, and there are many dogs that are much more aggressive and dangerous, yet these are demonized and they shouldn't be. All the ones I have met are the sweetest, kindest dogs. It is often the parents/trainers responsibility and fault for a seriously aggressive or mean dog, not the dogs fault. This shouldn't even be an option above, chihuahuas are usually more aggressive and mean.
- I see this as no different from an at fault car crash
- I think you owe it to the victim - whoever that might be; whether another pet or a person - to ensure they're okay, and in the case they're not to exchange information and cover any costs incurred by the incident. Similar to how you would when in a car accident.
- There are so many variables as to why the bites occur and care must be taken to hold an owner responsible. Not necessarily punishing the dog

- because it shows acknowledgment of responsibility
- My late mother was attacked by two dogs whose "walker" lost control (but were well known to the community). An ambulance was required, but the woman went through the usual litany (wasn't her, then was her but wasn't her dogs, then it was her son's dogs and she was doing him a favour, then ultimately she walked them every day but had trouble controlling them). It took three days of nonsense to confirm all this nonsense because the dogs had a history and (of course) the dogs were no longer at the house by the time the animal control officer finally was able to contact her, but the witness couldn't confirm as the dogs were no longer in town (they returned about four months later). AS a dog owner, take responsibility.
- It is likely the owners fault that the dog was not trained properly, so they should face the repercussions, not the dog
- It is important for dogs with behavior issues to receive help and training. I support ASSISTING dogs with behavior issues.
- Most dog bite incidents are due to people not paying attention to behavioural indicators of the dogs. If a person is not paying attention to the dog, Or disregarding the fact that the dog is indicating their discomfort in the situation, that is on the person not the dog.
- The dog is the owner's responsibility and must take responsibility for the dog's actions.
- "Yes -
- This should be required to support further action eg law suit, charges"
- Depends on severity of the bite/incident
- The owner must be in control of their pet. Their owner must communicate. This is exactly like the owner of a car hitting someone. You don't blame the car, do you?
- I believe the owner of the animal should be responsible enough to account for the instance which may have occurred. It would also be beneficial if different points of view were to be presented on the incident, to be on site and have immediate evidence available.
- As long as it is safe to do so for the owners, the dog, and whatever it had bitten.
- Common sense..no.different than leaving a car accident.
- They should provide info for follow up
- As with any incident, I believe both sides should be heard and listened to with equal intent and sympathy.
- As an owner, you are responsible for the actions of your pet and assume all liability associated with that pet.
- would take case load off of judges, but if its appealable its pointless. Anyone who gets a judgment they dont agree with will appeal and use up court time anyway.
- Stay at the scene. It is your dog that caused troubles, be accountable for its actions as you are the responsible dog owner/guardian.
- An animal in your possession has harmed another person or animal. You are responsible for that animals actions.
- Your dog your responsibility just like a dependent.

- I think people should take responsibility for their animals and stay around to find out if there are any injuries.
- Liability
- If it's actually a real bite, not just a squeeze. Some people are dramatic about nothing.
- SMALL BREED dog owners are never held accountable for their dogs actions. Pitbulls don't need to be prosecuted, but breeds such as chihuahuas do.
- If an owner didn't stay and take responsibility that would be horrendous behaviour
- A hit and run in a car is illegal, it is the same principal.
- It is the dog owners responsibility to make sure context is provided and all parties involved are ok. Negligent pet owners would be the ones to flee because they know their dogs bad behaviour is a result of their care and training
- If the dog owner doesn't remain at the scene, what's to prevent it happening again. There needs to be an official record.
- All owners should be responsible for their pets' behaviour and should be held equally liable, regardless of the size of the dog.
- I don't understand. Why would a person not stick around?
- It's the right thing to do
- I believe the owner should stay and talk to officials if their dog bites another person or animal
- Proof of vaccinating may be necessary, and also a history check if its a repeat offense
- This is a no brainer. This is the responsibility of the owner. Doesn't matter circumstances.
- I walk my dog on a leash in my community. This is because I feel it is important that when I am in public I have control of my animal at all times. I have had many dog owners have their dog off leash and their dog comes rushing towards us. My dog sees this as aggressive behaviour and the instinct is to protect her owner and herself. Let me be clear though my dog does not react this way to children. This is not wrong behaviour and neither of us she be penalized for this and I would like to have the opportunity to correctly explain the situation.
- "This is the only way to record multiple
- Incidents"
- Common sense.
- The owner should be responsible and if need asked to take specific dog training with the dog. Do not punish the dog without knowing the owner and the whole context
- Yes, for any clarification needed about the incident and for proper identification and follow up
- Share contact information to cover the cost of vet/ medical bills.
- "No different than a car accident.
- However, humans that taunt dogs through a fence while the dog is on their own property should also face fines."
- If someone damages another persons vehicle they are required to stay at the seen.
- Owners should take legal responsibility for dogs.
- Less investigative resources needed. Statements can be completed more efficiently

- Dog owners should be responsible to those who are harmed by their dogs.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their actions. It may not necessarily be the dog that's the issue, majority of behaviours in dogs corresponds with the owner and the education and training the dog has. The animal cannot be immediately put to blame.
- Pet owners must be accountable for their animals.
- Of course, it's the same as a hit and run if they leave the scene before providing their details. It's an offense in my mind.
- I believe the owners need to take responsibility for their dogs action as it is the owner who trains the dog to be the way they are.
- It is necessary to prevent it from occurring again
- They must or should receive an increased fine (leaving the scene fine)
- Oh f a dog bites someone and any financial problems occur they should be held responsible
- Dog owners need to be held responsible for an aggressive dog. Small or large.
- Yes, so both side can explain the situation. Most dogs bite out of fear so this needs to be considered.
- When owning a dog, the owner should ALWAYS be responsible for the dogs actions. They should stay and wait to talk to a city official, not a police officer (as its one more thing for them to worry about it), more like a 311 employee. The dog should not be held responsible for their action of biting someone when it's the owners job to make them a functioning and healthy dog in Calgary. If you can't train the dog properly, you shouldn't have a dog. Dogs should not be punished by death.
- This seems to be an expected response.
- they should take responsibility for the incident their dog caused
- People are responsible for how their dogs are trained regardless of breed.
- This is a reasonable expectation so long as there is any sort of injury sustained. If it was a non-contact nip in the direction of a person or other animal, then this is too stringent.
- Just like we must remain at the scene of a car accident.
- Although if the dog is upset this may be dangerous. I'm not sure about this one
- Owner should not be able to walk away & get away with their dog injuring a person or other animal.
- the owner should be held accountable for dog bites. It's their fault the dog bit anyone or someone.
- People are responsible for their animals. If they cannot bare the consequences of owning an animal, they should not be in a position of owning one.
- This is good so everyone involved makes a fresh statement
- This shows that they are responsible pet owners
- However getting the offending dog home and secured is very important
- It should be treated like any other accident/incident.
- If anyone including another animal is hurt or injured they should have the contact information and an enforcement office present to assist. The purpose isn't to try to make anyone feel worse, but to assist with the process for both parties and all animals involved
- Holds the party accountable

- All dog attacks should be taken seriously and looked into by enforcement officers, even if it's a family golden retriever or a Chihuahua.
- Obviously yes
- It's a responsibility as a good citizen to follow through with doing the right thing. Be accountable
- It should be like a car accident. Both parties should have to remain.
- owners are responsible for their dogs and should be held accountable when they do something wrong
- Civil responsibility. You don't leave a car accident scene: this should be treated the same way
- Owners are responsible for their dogs behaviour, it is not the dogs fault
- The owner should be held responsible for damages and follow up on care of the injured just like in a car accident
- There are two sides to every story. The enforcement officer needs both sides to determine the correct course of action.
- Responsibility if insurers occurred
- The owner is responsible for their dog and should take responsibility for any incidents and should want to resolve the issues that led to the bite
- The person should remain at the scene if it's safe to do so but definitely give their information as they should be responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- The dog owner needs to take ownership of the attack and it is important that they remain there so proper vaccinations can be verified. Many people provide false information after to avoid any repercussions which makes vaccination verification impossible.
- If necessary, the owner should be able to present their side of the story.
- If an owner cannot train their dog properly they should be held accountable for any wrong doings their dogs create.
- Like any accident, remaining on the scene is a moral responsibility. And to exchange names and contact information if the case needs to go further
- I have witnessed dogs biting people and their owners running away.
- Provides accountability
- Just like a car accident, it's an important issue
- So the own can take responsibility and pay for damages just like if the owner child caused damaged or the own caused damaged in a car accident.
- It would be harder for people to let their dogs get away with things if they had to stick around and explain what happened.
- If vet is required
- It is the owner's responsibility to be accountable for their pets actions.
- owners should be responsible for there animals
- I think its important to have tge info on file just in case it happens again so they have the ability to make more informed decisions
- No different than an accident; additional medical issues, lawsuits, etc could occur.

- If a dog bite it needs to be documented, the frequency of attacks should be taken into account when assessing a dog.
- Responsibility answers require questions. Is the owner behaving responsible
- Be responsible for your pet regardless of breed.
- Yes because some dogs can be a problem but again do not just base it on a breed.
- If the bite is serious, both sides need to be able to come to a civil conclusion on how to proceed.
- There's always 2 sides it's good to get a different perspective of what happened and shows responsibility
- Regular etiquette of a person how is responsible for an accident.
- They need to provide information at the scene.
- The dog owner should remain at the scene the exact same as a driver would need to remain at the scene of an accident. Otherwise it would be the same as a hit and run.
- Making people responsible for the behavior of their dog is integral to the process. People must train, restrain, and manage their dog(s) with the safety of the public in mind. All responsibility should be the owner's.
- The owners. Red to be in control of dogs at all times
- Only in the case of severe injury
- It's the dog owners responsibility
- Need to know dogs history i.e. if the dog has it's shots
- Just like drivers must remain at car crash scenes and exchange information, so should the dog owner in the event of a dog bite. It should be required of the dog owner, within a specific time frame, to provide the victim with his name, address, telephone number, and the name and license tag number of the dog.
- Too many dogs get bitten and the owners take off.
- Any responsible pet owner would do this.
- What if the dog has rabies? I would want to know who bit me or my animal. Also, medical expenses depending on how severe they are should be paid by the offender. Also, the animal should be noted for future or past attacks. Again, the owners are usually at fault for bad training most of the time or not acknowledging that their dog is temperamental and taking their own safety precautions for both their dog and others.
- They need to ensure they take responsibility for any injuries and this also helps better track an animal who becomes aggressive multiple times.
- Should the rare situation arise where significant damage is done, then the owner must take responsibility for their animal. The animal cannot take responsibility as they are, well, an animal.
- It should be the same as leaving the scene of an accident. And just because a dog bites, it doesn't mean it was the dogs fault. Kids tease dogs or sometimes antagonize an animal just to be mean. Then the kid should be punished, not the dog.
- The challenge however would be to prove whether the dog bite was defensive or offensive.
- Absolutely! There are to many times where an animal attack occurs in an off leash park and the offender takes off as soon as possible as to avoid getting in trouble. This way if a license plate is taken down there is an extra fine for the offender. It will hopefully make them think twice before running away from the scene.

- How else can the dog be traced
- As long as the dog that caused the issue has been safely secured & calmed down. When a dog is attacking another they are viewing something as a threat, removing the dog from the situation will prevent the attack from escalating further. If this can not be done then the owner would have to leave their contact information so the bylaw officer can follow up.
- The dog owner is responsible.
- Pet owners are responsible for the actions of the pet
- Responsibility for ones dogs behavior should be enforced, there have been too many attacks where the owner takes off fast.
- They should be held responsible.
- Similar to a human-to-human incident, owners should be held to the same standard.
- If you dog physically harmed another dog or human it is the owners responsibility to address the issue. There are only irresponsible owners not irresponsible dogs.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for the actions of their dog, and pay any vet bills that their dog inflicted, and the situation would need to be reviewed by a third party to see if training for pet and owner needs to be enforced.
- Get rid of this whole "Target Pitbull type dog" baloney BS. Aggressive dogs are mostly the results of bad owners. Owners that keep the dog locked up and not allowing them to be social at a young age or the results of abuse. Enforce mandatory training for high risk repeat offences and allow the chance for the owners to understand what they must do or To allow trainers to determine if the dog is the actual issue.
- Dogs should always be under the control of the handler, therefore some of not all the responsibility is in the handler of the dog that bit.
- as a pet owner, one should be responsible for their pets actions but if both personal involved remains on site it will give the enforcement officer a full picture and they'll be able to make an unbiased opinion of the incident and not based of the type of dogs that are involved
- It might be easily explained. It's not always the dogs fault if they felt threatened,
- It is common courtesy
- I have had my dogs attacked and my dog has also bitten someone, previous dog I talked about. I would expect the same from any other dog owner.
- Owners must take responsibility for their pets.
- [removed]lost it all. This is dumb. We should ban all white people from Starbucks. Or would that be racist agai st white people. Kind of the same way your [removed] city 8s being racist about a certain breed of dog who have no i put i the way they are raised or treated 9r the way that may have had to fight to survive their whole life. CLgary.... youre a disgrace.
- Should be treated like a hit+run, i.e. a crime to leave the scene of a dog attack (i.e. any injury including bite)
- "They need to take responsibility of

- Any harm the dog May have
- Inflicted upon others."
- The owner needs to be held accountable for any actions leading up to the incident, and any possible follow-ups as well regarding the dog.
- If you get in a fender bender, the right thing to do is stay to exchange information. Or if people get into a bar fight, witnesses and those involved have to give statements.
- I feel like my answer speaks for yourself. Same with other accidents, people need to be responsible for their pets and that includes if they are aggressive or bite.
- Many bites come from ill trained dog owners. They need to be held accountable for the actions of their dog. Further training and requirements should be obtained before that person can own a dog again.
- The owner and the dog needs to be accountable, and record keep on the owner AND the dog. Maybe it's the owners fault. Not the dogs.
- If a dog viciously bite another animal or person then it is up to that dog owner to take responsibility
- As a delivery agent for Canada Post, I'm instructed to call bylaw, police then my supervisor. Get all details of the situation. Some owners have no clue on how their animals react. I'm not scared of dogs, been in my family my whole life. I have more issues with small dogs than large dogs. I've been attacked more than once on my route; owners says my dog is friendly as it's lunging at me after I've asked the owner to put their dog in another room. One of these dogs bit my winter boot one year. These small dogs are worse than any large breed I've come in contact with.
- I think the dog owner should be on scene 100% but I think they should be given the opportunity to remove the dog (if still reactive) from the scene as it could further escalate or introduce prejudice into the situation seeing the dog in a hyperactive state
- Yes, a husky attacked my dog and it's owner screamed and swore at me instead of apologizing and offering to pay vet bills. They should be made to pay the vet bill.
- Some owners (especially of small dogs) don't take biting seriously. They should be required to share info or talk to an enforcement officer. They should have to take their dog's behaviour seriously.
- No waiting for officer. Just required to share information.
- Yes, if it is a serious incident. I've had small dogs nip my ankles and wouldn't want people to overreact in such a case.
- If an animal attacks another person or animal, the owner should be held responsible for that attack. If that means staying on scene AT A MINIMUM, then I support it.
- While I don't support targeting dog breeds or low income households, I also know full well that most (though not all) cases of aggression in dogs is the result of poor training or treatment by the owners. I have heard of cases where one dog serverly injures another and the owner simply flees the scene. I fail to see how this is different from a hit and run, and it should be treated as such.
- For insurance purposes.
- None
- Responsible owners should be doing this already.

- any responsible person would. But i know that you hold your officers back from arresting people. i think that they should be able to arrest people who don't obey the law
- So long as officer attends in a timely fashion.
- Should be the same as a car accident. Remain on scene or be penalized. This dog caused injury.
- As long as both owners have seen what happened and which dog initiated the fight.
- People need to be accountable for the actions of their pets.
- And Owner is responsible for anything there pet does I'm leaving the scene should be treated just like leaving the scene of an accident
- It would make sense. No bad dogs just bad owners.
- If damage/harm is done requiring a vet or a doctor, the individual with the nuisance dog should be liable. Just like a vehicular collision.
- People should be responsible for the care of injured animals/people
- Owners should be responsible for the behavior of their animal
- Accountability
- Bite victims may require medical attention. This could be costly and should be considered a cost of the aggressive/instigating dog's owner.
- The owner can then explain the situation. Giving the situation two sides. What if the dog was scared, threatened, or cornered.
- Contact information should be exchanged.
- This is necessary of responsible pet guardianship. As guardians we need to take accountability for our pets actions and support the process and those who are victims whether it is human or another animal
- Owners must be held to account for their dog's behaviour
- There have been too many occurrences of a attacking dog's owner leaving the scene after their dog attacks a person or another dog.
- For the purpose of being able to follow up on the victim of the bite, and to make sure the dog has been properly monitored thereafter
- Only if said attack was entirely unprovoked. Many people get bitten by dogs because they approach them too fast, and don't ask the owners permission before petting. Another animal may get attacked because their owner didn't allow time to communicate with the other owner or give the dogs time to properly introduce themselves to see if they will behave nicely or not
- It should be treated like any accident. You have to remain on scene for a car accident so why not any other incident.
- If the bite is substantial. If it was nil and likely and accidental hand in a place it shouldn't have been then no. But if it's one that was out of Agression sure.
- If someone has been injured, all parties should remain at scene
- If your dog bites you should be responsible.
- Na
- Of course

- If a dog bites a person or animal, they should remain on the scene and provide a clear explanation as to what happened. However, pit bull discrimination is incredibly antiquated and out of touch. The problem is bad owners, not bad dogs.
- Taking responsibility
- Would like to know dog history and vet records
- Animals are a privilege and owners are accountable for them.
- You should be responsible for your animal and own up to it if an incident happens
- As a responsible dog owner, I would always remain at the scene if this ever occurred. I would expect the same from others.
- It does not matter the breed, if your dog bites someone, you are responsible for it. Dogs do not have any fault, they do what they have been taught to do.
- Every owner should be responsible for their dog. This includes all breeds, not just the said "pit bulls".
- Yes, so the investigation can happen on scene and witnesses can report.
- Punish owners not dogs
- It is important that the owner takes responsibility for their pet and that appropriate steps are taken to ensure the dog is properly cared for and to prevent further incidents by educating the owner.
- Owners must take responsibility, whether it be a bite from a chihuahua or a mastiff, same rules
- You are required to remain at the scene of an accident when driving. It'd be no different here. As a dog owner, you are responsible for your dog's actions, no excuses.
- I'm against putting restrictions on pit bulls. I'm disappointed with Calgary that they are even considering it.
- The owner is the responsible individual for their animal. You don't leave the scene of a car accident, you shouldn't be leaving the scene when the animal you are responsible for injures someone or their animal.
- The owner should be questioned with the other victim or owner of the pet that was bit. They should be assessed for if they feel remorse for their pet, or if the victim did something to instigate the attack. This should be treated just like a car accident.
- If you hit someone with your car you have to stay.
- The more information given as to why this had happened, and what previous history the dog has had, the better. If this dog had never been known to be aggressive (PIT BULL OR OTHERWISE), it is important to note during and after the incident.
- Deplorable. This is disgusting
- Yes
- They should be charged like hit and runs are charged. You cannot flee the scene
- But rather than remain at the scene it may be better for the owner to provide the other party with ID and licensing info so the owner doesn't have to remain at the scene with a dog that has just bitten someone as that could create further conflict for the owner and/or the animal
- Owner accountability.

- Dog owners should remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information and talk with an enforcement officer if necessary.
- A person should be held responsible for their pets as well as have the option to engage as to their perspectives of events
- The owner KNOWS their dog, if the person approached the dog in an aggressive manner to indicate fear in the dog (the dog would bite) they should be able to explain what happened and not put the future of this dog in the hands of someone who inappropriately approached an unknown dog saying "that dog but me for no reason"
- I have heard anecdotes of too many irresponsible pet owners refusing to share contact information or remaining at the scene to share information with affected parties. There should be consequences to this similar to leaving the scene of an automobile accident.
- It's the exact same as hitting a car with your car. You stay and make sure everyone is ok. Irregardless of your dogs breed.
- Too many people just leave and do not take responsibility for there animals actions
- In my opinion this is similar to a traffic accident causing harm. People remain on scene for them
- This makes sense. It's important to know if the dog is up to date on vaccinations. Also, the person who received the bite should be eligible for compensation.
- An owner is responsible for their pet, however the individual bitten should also be reviewed for what they were doing.
- You should have to explain to an officer what happened, but my no means should the dog be forced to be muzzled, or put down.
- Owners should always take responsibility for their animals behaviour and need to stay
- Too many people are quick to leave the scene when bites occurs to avoid payment of injuries.
- No such thing as bad dogs, only bad owners
- To ensure that people and animals are protected
- I feel that is important
- They are responsible for their animal and the animals actions or the costs associated (vet bills etc)
- Absolutely it is your responsibility as a dog owner if your dog bites, you need to stay on the scene. Too often I have heard of dogs being attacked and the other dogs owners leaving the scene, leaving an injured dog and vets bills. Also, why are these questions targeting pit bulls? My dog was attacked as a puppy by a golden retriever in an off leash dog park I.e The breed of the dog is not the problem, it is the owner. Any aggressive dog with any bite history should not be allowed in public off leash areas. This includes small dogs.
- Of course. An incident such as this should be handled correctly. Both parties should wait for an enforcement officer.
- All dogs can bite, the owner is responsible and needs to be responsible
- For dogs listed as pit Bull like, when there is an attack the owners should also be charged as though they committed the assault.
- Information should be exchanged when an injury occurs involving multiple parties.

- Owners should be responsible for their dog. This does not differ in the way a parent should be responsible for their child. Owners should be kept at the scene and should be required to provide all information.
- They need to be held accountable.
- I'm unsure how enforceable this would be. What response time would we expect from by-law? What about areas of the city where the attack could happen with an off leash dog on an on leash path, eg Fish creek or nose hill. Having seen several encounters where a dog bites another dog and the owner effectively runs away apologizing, how would you enforce this practically?
- That's being a responsible pet owner. And that's for ANY dog. If a little dog bites mine I want them to stay and me me info.
- The dog owner has a responsibility and remaining present to talk with an enforcement officer it the first step in accountability for their pet's actions.
- If it was a bad enough bite that required enforcements attention then all parties should stay to explain what happened.
- Getting details from both parties regarding any incident as soon as it happens & is fresh in everyone's mind is always a good idea because it potentially could mean more accurate information
- This could present dogs from being wrongly accused.
- Contact information should be shared in order to further assess any disputes
- That way there can be proper follow up
- This is similar to a assault on a human, and information should be shared.
- It would protect both parties, as there are always two sides to the story. Unless the other person or animal needs immediate care, or there will be further danger if they stay, there shouldn't be an issue with waiting for a little longer.
- Owners have to be held responsible for ALL issues with their pets.. damage, noise, etc.
- Their dog is their responsibility. They need to be accountable of their dogs actions and control them or face consequences.
- Just like a car accident, people should be held accountable for their actions. If an owners dog bites a person or animal, they should ensure that they are okay, and if needed call for assistance.
- Even accidental, car drivers remain until info is exchanged.
- You're responsible for the actions of your pet. You should have to pay the consequences.
- This isn't already required?!
- responsibility.
- people need to take responsibility of their dogs actions. If a person's dog bites a person or another domesticated animal, the owner needs to remain at the scene to give their information.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their animal's actions, which includes staying at the scene of an incident.
- Sharing contact information
- As long as the owner can keep their dog. People might be afraid if they think the dog will be taken.

- My dog and I were bitten years ago while waiting at a crosswalk- bites required stitches. Owner gave fake name and number and I was out $1000 for emergency vet.
 - People with so called nuisance animals must take responsibility for their actions.
 - Their dog is their responsibility. In the event of a motor vehicle collision, drivers are expected to exchange information, I see no reason why the same could not be expected of dog owners in the event of an incident.
 - Many vicious dog attacks (I personally have had three incidents) occur during periods of surprise and dismay. Owners most often shuffle the dog away quickly requiring the victim respond to their injuries without having an opportunity to obtain demographic info.
 - The dog owner is responsible for the vet bills that their dog has created. It's like leaving the scene of a crime.
 - The owner has the best interest of the animal at heart and should NEVER be leaving their animal alone in public regardless of any situation. Also if injuries are severe the owner should be present to receive either ticket or summons to training/rehab program.
 - once the attacking dog is gone, so is that negligent owner
 - Information and report is required for court cases if it gets to that point
 - If someone's dog attacks another dog on private property or in public, they should stay until a police report is taken
 - "The owner should stay at the scene because too many times a dog has attacked for no reason and the other person or animal is meant to deal with it alone and too many times the owner of the aggressive dog has gotten away with it without any punishment and they usually don't help their dog to improve it's behavior.
- I also don't think we should be putting any kind of negativity towards pitbulls because breed-specific legislation does not reduce the incidence or severity of dog bites, penalizes responsible pet owners and kills innocent dogs. We definitely can't penalize a dog just because it ""looks like a pit bull.""
 - Any good person SHOULD stay at the scene. What the hell?
 - Responsible Owners will want to stay on site to explain the situation & make sure that everyone knows all sides of the story.
 - It's out of courtesy to ensure the victim of either party to receive appropriate justice.
 - It should be like a vehicle collision scene in which people exchange insurance information.
 - it would be easier to get ahold of them when needed instead of sending a letter or getting someone else to deliver it
 - This should be mandatory! Owners of dogs that bite typically take off in most scenarios I have heard about!
 - Dogs owner is also responsible for the dogs behaviour. They should know to take extra precautions if their dog is new to the home or if it has behavioural issues and therefore should be required to take responsibility for any action they allow their dog to take

- The owner needs to take responsibility for their pet!
- It is owner responsibility to respond to their dogs behaviour and should it bite or harm a person or animal, it is their responsibility. It is like a hit and run in a car, the person must remain at the scene
- Both parties should have to stay and explain what happened.
- If a dog bites the dog owners are the only faulty and they need to be responsible. Dogs are animals and how you treat them and behave them they will act.
- Depending on the severity and if the other party was involved. Dogs for protection on private property should be exempt, and small tussles without major incident at the dog park should be exempt.
- Yes, if it is a serious bite, not just a playful nip. If there is an injury to a person or animal then the owner should remain on site to speak with an officer so a clear picture of what caused the incident can be put together.
- ANY Dig owner should remain at the scene if their dog was involved in any type of altercation
- Yes just due to someone being able to take responsibility for the bite and help the next steps in the process go easier if the degree of the bite is bad enough. I have been bitten badly by a dog and having the owner stay and exchange information made the process smoother and more efficient.
- Response to: "This would be an alternative to provincial court and would include City and non-City representatives." - It is the legal right of Canadian citizens to have a legal proceeding be governed by a proper legal process and qualified judges. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms protects every individual's right to be treated equally before the law. A tribunal consisting of citizens uneducated in the law will likely not be able to approach the trial without bias or with the proper education to be able to interpret the law.
- This is no different than a car accident. All parties should have a voice
- The owner is the one ultimately responsible, if leashes their shouldn't be any incident. The only issue is the owner might not be able to keep the dog at the dog at the scene if they don't have control of the dog
- The owner should take responsibility as the animal does not have the same brain understanding as humans do
- Because if the dog has done severe damage that will insure that the owner of the animal will pay for any damages that the dog caused
- As owners we are responsible
- I view this to be like a hit and run, but obviously to a lesser degree. If the victim is present and doesn't know the owner of the dog, how does it get reported properly otherwise. A dog biting someone or another animal should not be treated lightly. I support this concept. Bite, or extent of biting, should be clearly defined. For example, puppies nip and while undergoing training may nip or "bite", but I think in most of those cases, it wouldn't qualify as a true bite causing injury.
- Too many pit and runs. Victims are left with huge hospital/vet bills while the vicious dog owner runs like a coward
- It is the owners responsibility to answer for their dogs behaviour.

- Most likely the owner already knows their dog is a bite risk. This forces the owner to take responsibility for their actions.
- It is the same as a car accident or an assault. The person who takes legal responsibility for the incident must remain at the scene.
- They should be responsible and deal with it immediately
- This is to ensure the bite is documented
- If the dog bites someone, the owner should be there to explain the training that dog has had, what could've led to the incident. Past incidents if there have been any.
- Then the officer can secure both accounts, witnesses, etc. Also helps the situation from escalating.
- Look it's common human decency not to let your animal attack another living thing and if it happens the right thing to do is stay at the scene
- It is the responsible thing for the pet owner to do.
- Just like an accidental car crash, both parties should stay to share information as good human commutation.
- I know of several cases where dogs bit other dogs and the owners fled. This could prevent that from happening.
- I saw a person's dog kill another dog at an off leash dog park and they left with their dog and did not stay to give contact info. The other person had no way to confront the person or provide any information to the police when they arrived.
- Too many people with dangerous dogs leave the scene of an attack, leaving the victims unable to pay for care. These dangerous dogs are allowed to go back in to society with no one knowing how dangerous they are.
- owner should remain on the scene.
- It's ultimately the owner's fault for allowing their dog to attack. They must take responsibility and not flee the scene, no different than any other attack. The attacked should also remain so both parties provide info, as it might have been their provocation.
- The dog should under go behavioral assessment.
- This is not limited to "pitbull" type dogs - it's unfair to classify them as dangerous when some of the smallest dogs are more "bitey" than any pitbull I've ever met
- Owners are ultimately responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- They need to be responsible. HOWEVER the person bit and their witnesses need to do the same. In fact the more witnesses the better.
- Keeps owner accountable and holding responsibility for their dog. Intent would be to help prevent "hit and runs" .
- Any accident should require contact info to be exchanged in case there are costs that should be paid for by the dog's owner or criminal charges if the owner trained the dog to attack.
- If an owner whose dog bites a person or animal leaves the scene, he/she could therefore evade responsibility.
- I think you have to take responsibility if your dog bites and do what you can to help the person that was bitten (medical care etc). I don't think an enforcement officer is necessary though.

- Owners need to take accountability. If their dog bites someone, they should have to exchange their information and should be responsible for any medical or vet bills related to the bite.
- If they're unable to stay at the scene then contact information needs to be exchanged and verified at the scene
- I believe that all dogs who prove to be a hazard to the health of others or other peoples animals they should be held accountable and responsible.
- They could then explain vaccination history, temperament issues etc
- Regardless of breed there are repeat offenders, requiring the owner to stay would help to track that and track dangerous dogs
- They should share contact information and stay at the scene unless an animal is injured to the point of needing immediate medical attention, then they shouldn't need to wait for an enforcement officer.
- To me it's no different than a hit and run
- How is this even a question. If you hit a car, you need to stick around. If your dog is aggressive and an incident happens, stick around.
- Maybe then you guys will see it's not always pitbulls.
- This seems like a no brainer, of course they should have to stay and accept responsibility
- Two sides of the story need to be documented to determine the best consequential outcome for the situation.
- The owner should have to explain why the dog bit someone. It should be the same as a car accident you can not leave the scene til it is reported.
- Only if an enforcement officer can get there in a reasonable amount of time, or if both people exchange information and they've been waiting more than 30 minutes for an enforcement officer, there can be a follow up call later.
- It is important for a dog that is improperly trained to get specific training
- How are you going to enforce anything if the person doesn't remain at the scene.
- The explain possible diseases but not to punish the animal.
- It's owners responsibility
- Their animal, their responsibility.
- More often than not, the owner of the offending animal leaves, and the owner of the injured animal is stuck with vet bills. The offending owner also very rarely faces consequences.
- The dog owner needs to have the opportunity to explain their version of events (especially for dogs that are provoked by others)
- If the dog that was bitten is in need of medical attention, the owner of the dog that attacked should be responsible for medical expenses
- Depends on severity, but a significant dog bite to an animal or person should be treated as a serious incident and owners should accept responsibility for that.
- Within reason - people out walking dogs do not expect their dog to be part of an incident and thus must have non-negotiable constraints on their time (eg child care). I would support a rule that requires a dog owner in this situation to make every reasonable effort to share contact information and speak with an enforcement officer.

- It is a responsibility, just as vehicle ownership requires the driver to remain. They are responsible for the damage their vehicle can incur, just as they should be with a pet.
- Similar to a car accident people should have to stay at the scene
- Or at least provide contact information
- Like a car accident, need to exchange information in case you need to follow up on an injury or damage.
- All owners are completely responsible of their own dogs and if something should happen they must take the responsibility to ensure anyone affected by it is ok.
- If a dog bites someone or another animal they should be required to stay on the scene and take responsibility for their pets actions.
- As long as it's safe to remain at the scene of an incident. There should be a fine for leaving without providing contact information, unless it is truly unsafe.
- The person responsible for the dogs behavior must provide contact information in the event this requires medical or veterinary costs which they should be made to pay to the injured party
- Owners are responsible for their animals. Unless they feel threatened for some reason there is no reason they should leave. If they leave there should be fines involved.
- All dogs owners should be responsible dog owners.
- Any dog owner should have to be accountable for dogs actions regardless of fault/cause of incident
- seems to make perfect sense, much like a hit and run.
- To make sure that other dog has all the vaccines. And cover the veterinary if is necessary.
- I believe it is on the owner for the Animals Behavior. With the owner remaining at the scene this will allow for the enforcement officer to interact with the owner. I think all pet breeding should require a licence, That licence # is then given to the owner. This # should follow the animal for life. When you take your animal to the vet they check the number. When you register your animal with the city they have your number. Something like that so we can control and track all animals and where they come from.
- I think the owner should remain as it is the responsible thing to do. Make sure the victim is alright/gets medical attention and hopefully the officer is trained to offer the owner information on training resources to start the process of correcting the dogs behavior as soon as possible.
- The owner of the dog responsible for the attack should be responsible for providing contact information to enforcement officers. Enforcement officers should also provide additional resources for preventing attacks and training dogs properly.
- I would want them to stick around for info in case of any medical concerns etc.
- Yes to ensure the dog a has had its shots and to take responsibility for the the cost of any medical treatment to the other person/animal
- After a bite this may not be practical with emotions running high
- It should be treated the same way as a car accident. Both parties stay.
- Or at least return ASAP once bringing the dangerous dog somewhere safe.
- But please ban pit bulls before a child is killed in Calgary.
- The owners are supposed to have control over their animals should be treated like an other accident

- The owner is responsible for the animal.
- Maybe the person that got bit was harassing the dog or not listening to the owner about leaving the dog and them alone and was aggravating the dog to the point it bit them.
- That would just be pure common sense. People need to be accountable for themselves and their animals.
- As long as no discrimination is taken place
- I believe that a huge part of addressing the follow up of an incident is the way the owners handle the event and what comes after. This could prevent unnecessary euthanasia and potentially identify more irresponsible owners
- I think this is common sense, the same way you wouldn't leave the scene of an accident
- Owners need to be held liable for their dogs actions. I believe that if a dog is to cause serious pain/mauling/damage to another animal or human that it should be treated just like any human doing the same thing. It's the owners responsibility to know their animal and how it reacts to other members and animals in normal society:
- Tracking purposes same as any accident
- This will prevent the owner from avoiding taking responsibility.
- A similar rule exists for traffic accidents. I see no reason why it should differ in a situation where injuries might occur.
- Yes to determine if it is a repeat offender and dealt with appropriately.
- Same as car crashes, if it's above a certain amount of damage they should stay on site.
- This would hold owners accountable.
- The owner should be held responsible
- Most of the time they flee the "scene" and the owner of the hurt dog left to deal with the consequences, which is not fair
- Contact information should be made available. However sometimes people need to get their dog out of that situation as something may have scared or set them off. For safety I think they should be allowed to leave as long as they gave contact info
- This shouldn't even be a question. Dogs can and have severely injured both individuals and other dogs. It is the pet owners responsibility to stay at the scene and provide the proper information if their dog has caused harm and bit another animal or person.
- They must be responsible for their dog
- "Just like a car accident
- Need both sides of the story
- Can't just be he said she said."
- In response to Q3, it is unfair to single out a single breed of dog for punitive action. Labradors have stronger bites than pit bulls; by this logic they should be the ones proposed to be muzzled and restricted. Preventing a group of dogs from socializing normally can also lead to behavioural issues. I am strongly against any breed specific restrictions. For Q9, I am concerned these fines could become punitive without evidence to support them. I feel a balance needs to be achieved between the rights of pet owners and those accusing their pets of specific actions. I also feel the circumstances need to be considered prior to implementing a fine. For example, was the animal goaded into biting an individual by the owner, or was the person who was bitten baiting the animal?

- It is important for information to be shared for damages, and medical reasons.
- I think they should need to remain at the scene to provide information on the animal, such as vaccines and contact info
- As stated, my dog was bitten by a pitbull. The owner fled. The owner (and family) lied to Bylaw. What a waste of time. Criminal Code sanctions must be put in place - Bylaw is useless. Sorry...
- if injury is caused (ie blood drawn by bite) owner needs to share contact info to be able to ensure things like up to date shots, and cover any out of pocket expenses like vet bills etc...
- It should be treated with the same severity as a hit and run
- If you are a responsible you you would never consider leaving the scene unless your animal was in medical distress - in which case you would leave complete contact details.
- As a dog owner this should be an expectation in order to ensure everyone's safety.
- Because the owner should be responsible not the dog
- That way they could explain as to why it bit in the first place. There could have been lots of reasons, provoked etc
- As the owner it is your responsibility to uphold your dog's behaviour. If your dog was involved in a incident then you should be available to provide your info and witness statement.
- You would remain on scene (hopefully) if you hurt someone. Your dog is your responsibility.
- The owners should be held accountable.
- Any issues the right thing to do would be to remain at the scene.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs behavior.
- It should be a crime if they leave a scene and a person or pet was badly bitten
- Since the dog is responsibility of the owner. He/ she must care for the person who was bitten
- I seriously cannot believe this is not a law already.!?!?!?
- I think it's only right regardless of the circumstances of the bite, it's still a chargeable offence.
- I thought this was already the law. If a dog bites, the owner needs to take responsibility
- The owners should be responsible to share information regarding vaccines and reasons for the bite.
- This helps to ensure safety of all parties involved. It is also crucial to note that pit bulls are not innately aggressive or dangerous. Any dog has the capability to become dangerous based on the actions of their owner and how they are treated by their owner. Banning a breed of dog based on a dated reputation is unacceptable.
- I have heard of multiple incidences where a dog ha bitten a person (full thickness) and the owner and dog have left and identification has not been possible
- Both sides should be looked at, wether the dog owner is responsible or the person who got bit is responsible for getting bit.
- C
- I would consider the leaving of the accident by a person and their dog the same as a hit and run
- Can't leave the scene of a crime, this is no different.

- Its important to take down information.
- Keeps owner accountable and responsible in their role in their dog's behaviour.
- It can help protect the victim, making sure they know which shots are up to date. Thinking of also the rules of car accidents - this is no less serious
- No
- Dog bites are OFTEN not the fault of the dog. A full account of what happened must be obtained. Responsibility must remain with the human.
- Unless the dog or person needs to go straight to hospital
- Yes. But there is a difference between dogs being dogs and behavior which isn't always interpreted correctly by humans. Also I think the verbiage nuisance is incorrect. An aggressive dog is difference than a Nuisance.
- Bylaw officers take weeks to respond and are indifferent, useless, and bloated parts of the bureaucracy.
- The owner is responsible for good and bad behavior. They should remain on scene.
- Unless their dog is injured they should stay to explain. Sometimes its equal blame but the persons who dog is more injured pleads the victim card. If you have a tiny dog that comes at me off leash. That's should be considered. I've seen it too many times.
- The owners of the animals are required to take responsibility for the incident. In addition, both parties can give their side of the story to the bylaw officer, which is of particular importance if the offending animal was harassed or provoked before the attack happened.
- I think it's important to ensure that owners are held accountable for the actions of their aggressive dogs.
- Experiencing this myself, I find that we can't talk thru options for the situation but rather create a bigger concern for the care of other dogs in the neighbourhood.
- If a dog bites the owner of that dog need to take responsibility. A dog bite is usually the result of poor training and people not reading their dogs cues properly. The owner may need training on how to properly care for their dog & this cannot be accomplished if the flee.
- Please keep in mind if the dog need to be removed to avoid further issues the owner should deal with that as a priority
- just like a car accident, owners must provide Tag numbers and contact information. If the dog is without a tag; or owners leave the scene of the incident; immediate and harsh fines must be enforced, animals apprehended and licenced/chipped/tattooed and all costs pased to the owner and PAID IN FULL before released including a behavioral assessment. If the owners cannot afford the fines then the animal must undergo behavioral assessment before adopted out or euthanized. Costs again to the owners. The city must then issue a no pet order for 10 years against the owners due to lack of responsibility or means to care for an animal. Breach of those conditions would fall under criminal law and be prosecuted with fines and or a reasonable amount of community service/jail time and a criminal record. The only way to protect the public is to hold offenders accountable. This should apply for ANY animal owned that attacks and causes injury to another person.

- Owners should be held liable if the other animal or person gets injured by their pet - as long as no laws were broken (ie. bitten dog was off leash in an on leash area)
- i agree
- Only if it is sever enough that the person requires emergency care
- Because in every dog bite/attack case I've heard of the owner of the dog never stays, why would they as they don't want the dog to get in trouble.
- Your animal is your responsibility. If the animal bites or attacks a person it's your responsibility to do your diligence and take responsibility.
- It shows responsibility and accountability for their part of the incident
- its the correct thing to do, and if the complaining owner files a report its going to be written in their favour, if the accused owner stays on site the truth hopefully be correct on the report ,
- It's called responsibility.
- The owner has to own up to the situation since their dog caused it.
- I think accountability of the owner to make sure the injured party is ok is necessary just the fleeing a hit and run or something like that is punishable this should be too ie. Fine
- Depending on the scenario, the owner should be held responsible. If a loose dog ran up to a leashed dog and the leashed dog bit it, the owner of the unleashed dog should be responsible for all costs.
- I feel that this is no different than if you were involved in a car accident. You are required to remain at the scene.
- To many times owners flee with their pet so as not to get in to trouble.
- Accountability should be a requisite of pet owners.
- If a dog butes a person or another animal it needs to be in record so that if another incident occurs it can be dealt with properly. There have too many cases of dogs severely injuring or killing people in the last 2 years and it needs to be addressed.
- It should be handled like with automotive accidents.
- An owners responsibility of a pet includes making sure they dont hurt other beings it should be treated similarly to an assault.
- as a dog owner the responsibility is on the owner for the dogs behavior and needs to stay on scene of any incident
- You'd stay at the scene of a car accident, wouldn't you?
- I think that if there is a bite personal information should be shared incase the situation gets worse (injured dog dies, person bit needs dogs medical history) etc.
- Owners of dogs that bite are responsible and must be held accountable.
- Just cause
- Person should be liable not the dog. It is a persons responsibility and duty to take care of the dog and surroundings while out in public.
- As a responsible dog owner that should be your top priority if your dog has been involved in a bite situation.

- It is important for owners to take responsibility. If a dog bites another pet, that owner could have serious vet bills that should be covered by the offending dog's owners.
- I think if your dog bites someone it is your responsibility to stay at the scene until everything is dealt with
- The dog & its behavior is your responsibility. You should be there to accept it
- If the injury is serious enough they need to remain. Though im most certain theyll run away.
- If it bites a person seriously you should not take off. Treat it like a traffic incident.
- Yes staying at the scene demonstrates responsibility of pet ownership
- My dogs have been bit at dog parks and the owners don't even bother to apologize let alone stop and see if your dog is okay. It should be like leaving the scene of a car accident.
- A dog owner is responsible for their pet, regardless of the breed of dog. Far more small dogs are aggressive/bite than large dogs, and their owners tend to just go 'aww, they're harmless'. By remaining on sight and answering will mean that a repeated behavior can be tracked and the dog can be dealt with accordingly.
- What??? They don't have to stay now???????
- The owner is responsible and MUST take full responsibility. If the owner does not stay all means to track down the offender should be taken and the dog should be destroyed.
- The owner should remain at the scene. And account should be offered by both sides. It is often the human that is bitten that is the cause. Ignorance blames the dog.
- we are required to take responsibility for other aspects of our life that involve harm (ie motor vehicles) people need to be responsible for the actions of their pets and potential lack of training that results in harmful events
- If there is an injury caused the owner should be required to provide valid contact information and possibly be liable to medical/vet expenses incurred.
- A lot of pit bull owners are irresponsible.
- The translation from the owner, is important and should be required. As, getting the owners side, is very beneficial to their case.
- Better to resolve what's happened and get each other's perspectives and understanding rather than one crazy person freaking out over something probably minor.
- there should still be responsibilities as a dog owner to ensure well being of others.
- Sometimes the owner is the root of the issue, this would be better assessed if they were present at the time
- If they are claiming responsibility and that pet to be a family member, they should be present when an officer needs to speak with them. That way, they can't give false information and run away and never be known. the follow up needs to be immediate.
- Good for understanding what happened. As well, just for their well being! Make sure they're okay.
- Full details of the event should be recorded
- My daughter was bite by a small dog years back at a play ground the people basically called their dog back and left. That was the end of that for them as we went for a tetanus shot and tried to soothe a crying scared child. (It isn't always the pitbulls)

- Just like if someone got in a car accident, if it's serious the owner should stay
- Must be enforced with all dog owners, not just "pit bull" owners
- responsible ownership means being liable for damages. If you do not remain at the scene the victim is unable to obtain this information.
- Easier for vet bills
- Similar to a traffic accident. If the vehicle / animal that you are with and responsible for causes an accident / incident, it should be illegal to "hit and run / bit and run".
- If a dog bite occurs both parties of the incident should remain on scene to provide contact information. This does not mean either of the dogs should be seized, only that contact information should be provided.
- To be able to also provide their side of the story
- Responsible dog owners will do this anyways
- Common sense and responsibility.
- It would be no different if a child hurt someone. You'd want to have their parents info.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for controlling their dog.
- Follow up should be required or information so that the incident can be followed up appropriately if it is unsafe for the dog and owner to stay and wait
- It should be treated like an auto accident. Information needs to be exchanged. Needs to have an officer present. Owner of dog who attacks needs to be accountable.
- Owners need to report incident
- If someone dogs bites someone they should stay and take responsibility
- If someone's dog bites another dog or person the owner needs to take responsibility for that action
- Great idea
- you don't know what shots the dog has or doesn't have and if your dog is breaking the skin of a person you should stay ofcourse!.
- All owners should be held accountable , not the dogs. They only behave how their owners allow them to.
- The dog's behavior is the owner's responsibility. It's the owner's responsibility to ensure the dog has no history of aggression, and no genetic aggression in the parents. The owner is responsible for proper training/socialization/vetting to ensure the safety of their dog, as well as other people/pets. The consequences of failing to do so is entirely the owners fault and they should be held accountable where applicable.
- I think this would support responsible pet ownership.
- Sure. But I don't agree with euthanizing a dog for this. So as long as the officer is fair
- technically is treated as assault, so the owner needs to stay to talk to the officer
- If a dog bites someone very few owners are going to stick around if this is something of a common behavior for their dog, which hurts everyone in that scenario.
- Only if the victim requests they stay, otherwise they victim and dog owner should just exchange contact information.

- Being held responsible for the animal you have is important to responsible pet ownership
- Much like in the event of a car accident this would give all parties opportunity for testimony and perspective on the matter. This will likely result in more accountability as well as a more nuanced understanding of events prior to the incident.
- If a dog bites a person or another animal, the owner should remain. Hopefully law enforcement can implement training sessions for both the dog and owner with a reputable dog trainer to help them.
- Your dog, your responsibility for it's training.
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets
- they do need to stay. It is their responsibility as a pet owner
- Accept your responsibility
- They often take off
- There is no punishment if they leave now
- I'm surprised there isn't such a rule in place yet
- Too many dog owners, especially pit bull owners, give the wrong information and run away with their vicious dogs.
- When dealing with dogs bites, it is important to know who is responsible, and if both dogs are up to date on their vaccines. Even for minor bites, there is still risk of infection and trasmission of diseases from one dog to another and possibly even from dog to human through zoonotic diseases. If both parties are not required to stay at the scene, this could lead to future health problems and could possibly be fatal.
- Dog bites need to be taken seriously, the dog owner needs to share their side of the story as well.
- Even if you think dogs on both sides of an altercation or even a person, issues can arrive medically later on or be worse than you originally thought. Contact info should be exchanged in case this happens. Especially if one party was clearly at fault.
- If that dog is unprovoked biter or repeat biter, or if the bite is clearly serious then there should be enforcement whether that looks like training for dog/ owner, fines, etc.
- If your dog injures a person or dog, you should at lease provide your information and pay half of the vet bill
- Only if injuries occur, other than that information could be exchanged.
- Yes. There are many reasons for a dog to bite. It's important to see accountability on all sides.
- You must be able to identify the owner and the animal
- Yes as is the case when involved in a car accident.
- Just like hit and runs, it's terrible to leave if your pet is involved in an altercation
- This could allow for better enforcement and follow up after an incident.
- If there is cost related to this , the owner needs to take responsibility and help cover those costs according
- Yo make sure everyone is ok

- If there are injuries to the animal that has been bitten the costs may need to be born by the owner of the animal that bit. Without their information a suit could. It be filed and the city could not follow up on any rules out in place
- Accountability! The dog owner must know their dog and only put them in situations they can handle. If your dog bites a person or another animal the owner needs to own up and have consequences. I am a Vet Tech at a Specialty Hospital. So often families are stuck with vet bills trying to save their pet or having to make that difficult decision to have to euthanize them because an irresponsible owner left with their dog in a hurry after it attacked their dog. BTW I have never had one of the aggressor dogs be a pit bull.
- It depends on the situation some own take responsibility and do the right thing. Go to the vet and pay for anything to assist the other owner.
- First, what if the dog has a zoonotic disease? Second I've read stories where someone was bit and the owner just fled the scene. Responsible ownership means taking responsibility for your pet, whether they "escaped" or someone else "let them out".
- It is part of responsible pet ownership to be accountable for the actions of your pet.
- If a dog bites a person or animal, I believe that it makes sense for the owner to remain at the scene if possible as long as it does not endanger them or their dog and to make sure that the person who was bitten is okay, if not directly on the scene, but close by.
- Absolutely! Fine for leaving scene of accident
- In a perfect world that would be lovely but how do you enforce it when people also leave the scene of traffic crashes, assaults etc. It could be another unenforceable by law
- They should remain to explain there side of the story
- Owners should be responsible for the actions of their pets. And being responsible means speaking to the proper authorities if something were to happen. Like a car accident. Don't leave the scene.
- I feel like all dog bites can either be the owners fault or the person it bites fault. As long as bias isn't used by enforcement to issue fines then I support this. For example if a child pet and got bitten by a dog, as a result of their parents not teaching them to approach dogs or pet a dog without asking the owner if it's ok. I believe the owner shouldn't be punish and fined.
- simple, accountability and responsibility.
- Shows they are taking responsibility which is the first step in being a good pet owner
- Too many times I have seen owners struggle to pay for their dog to be seen to sutures wounds, get antibiotics etc from the owner and hearing that the owner of the dog that attacked just shrugged their shoulders and walked away. Owning pets are a responsibility
- Any incident that may have costly implications that can be associated with fault, should require responsibility.
- Any responsible owner would do this!
- Dog owner absolutely needs to share contact information, however, it may not be possible for the owner to stay and await the arrival of an enforcement officer. In some cases, it can take awile for officers to show up.

- Accidents happen sometimes but I also think that if you are a pet owner that you should be responsible and stay at the scene where it happened to explain that your dog really is a good boy and you are working on improving his skills but the accident happens you should always stick up for your animals' innocents and life
- People need to take responsibility and we'd need their information to know who the dog belongs to.
- A responsible owner would do that anyways
- This seems fair to me.
- It's necessary for this so they can be held accountable and so the victim can get comprehension
- If it is a severe enough attack to require an enforcement officer then it is reasonable to expect owners to wait and provide contact information
- Owners need to be responsible. Also they should be able to provide their side of the story. How many dog bites happen because people are acting irresponsibly around a dog. Or teasing them.
- Yes, if an animal is normally well behaved and has no signs of aggression previous to the incident, and was either antagonized or threatened by another person or animal and lashes out, having information exchanged and involvement of law enforcement would be a good idea. This also goes the other way, if your animal is attacked without provocation, and emergency medical care is not immediately required, the exchange of information and law enforcement would be ideal.
- If this is a repeat offending dog the owner probably won't choose to stick around.
- To discuss whether medical treatment, if any, must be paid for and/or to educate the owner about proper behaviours.
- Dog owners should be held accountable for their dog's behaviour.
- Well it would eliminate the "My name is John Smith" and "I don't have my ID on me" when a pitbull mauls a child.
- This is an attack and a crime. Should carry the same charge as leaving the scene of a crime.
- In case of further questioning being required. To give their side of the story
- My dog has been bit and thankfully I got their info and they paid for the vet bill. It's pricey if this doesn't happen.
- Otherwise the victim would be unable to bring civil or tribunal pleadings
- The owner should stay talking to an officer help out the victim in anyway he can be responsible
- They are the ones responsible and need to hold their pet accountable to what happened.
- It's like leaving the scene of an accident.
- Like a car accident the person responsible should not leave the scene.
- Owner should be responsible for dog bite and vet bills
- Information should be exchanged and whoever caused the incident should be legally obligated to pay any costs incurred.
- Owner of "dog attacker" should be responsible for vet bills
- It's the owner's responsibility if their dog attacks someone/something; they should 100% remain at the scene.
- How is this not already a thing??

- The owner and by extension need to be accountable. It could be difficult to find the owner if they leave the scene. This could prevent future bites by taking action early.
- It is a good idea to share contact information so that proper steps can be taken to deal with the situation.
- "Absolutely.
- If there are any damages, injuries or illnesses that occur the owner should be liable."
- Should be treated similar to a vehicle accident
- My dog has been attacked by a pitbull and was nearly fatal, I think it is important To make the owners held accountable for their animal.
- Dog bites are not always the dog's fault, but precautions need to be taken to ensure that the dog, the owner, the victim and the community are safe. Part of that is knowing which dog was involved and to whom the dog belongs.
- If a bite happens, it is the owners responsibility, not the dogs fault.
- I believe this is good as problem dogs and owners should be tracked. If it becomes a habit other steps should be taken. Training, muzzles, etc. If it continues, that person might not be fit to own a dog.
- Its the right thing to do anyways it should be in place already.
- We need to explore whether or not the dog has the potential to be rehabilitated and to also determine what caused the bite (e.g., did the person or other animal actually antagonize the dog?)
- You are responsible for your animal.
- Makes sense. Like a car accident, etc.
- Dog owners should be held liable for their dog's actions.
- Common sense
- Common courtesy among fellow dog owners and community members
- It's likely that the owner needs some education and should stay at the scene of the incident to be given more support and resources
- No one should ever leave a scene
- Bad owners would then face higher fines for not staying around after their badly trained dog has harmed another living creature. Bad owners are the fault not good owners.
- Should be treated similar to a car accident
- It's their responsibility
- Make sure someone gets both sides of story
- Owners need to take responsibility and have their side of the story heard
- They need to take responsibility for their animal and the harm it causes.
- All parties should remain
- It makes sense that an owner should have to stay at the scene to make sure no major harm was done.
- However, how will you enforce this?
- My dog was attacked, it's a bite and run

- It is only right for them to remain at the scene and also be accountable for any vet or medical bills incurred.
- Only if there is damage (medical/vet required) to what the dog bit.
- All information should be supplied to a officer so that they have an idea how the incident came to be
- Dogs can't talk! Seriously, how would you even track the owner down afterwards if they left the scene or person who was bitten without giving any contact information?
- So many times, attacking dogs are whisked away by their owners and are never identified or properly assessed. Staying on scene needs to be a requirement.
- It's important to know both sides of the story. Also to understand where the dog is coming from and the behaviours/energy of the human behind the dog
- Yes, because the dog is their responsibility and they need to be sure that there was no harm done or if there was they need to be help accountable
- Because it's an assault!
- The owner must be held responsible for the actions of their pet (especially if this is reoccurring)
- The owner should be held responsible
- Yes often people leave and the owner is then having to pay out of pocket for the vet expenses.
- The human is more at fault than the dog; the human should have just as severe consequences as the dog, if not more.
- Treat it like a car accident. You own the dog, and if it is your dogs fault you should pay
- Should be the same as a car accident.
- It's the right thing to do? It's like fleeing the scene of a crime?
- If we have an incident involving two cars, both drivers are expected to remain at the scene, exchange information and if damage is over a specified amount, police must attend.
- Responsible owners need to be accountable for their pets. Remaining on the scene is responsible.
- They need to stay and claim responsibility for damages
- If a dog were to cause an incident, it's the owner's responsibility to make sure the victim is okay, and whether or not there needs to be further investigation.
- I think the role of the owner is to be there to take care of the aftermath of the problem that has happened
- To encourage responsible pet ownership. Owners should be accountable for their animal's actions.
- If it safe to do so a pet owner should always remain at the scene for proper assessment
- Need to know if dog has had its vaccinations.
- You are obligated to exchange information at a traffic accident. A dog bite incident should be no different
- My daughters dog was bitten last summer and the woman refused to give her any info. She denied the dog actually bit but the wounds said otherwise
- Because at the end of the day the dog owner should be held responsible for the actions of the dog

- This would only apply if the owner were at the scene to begin with. Taking responsibility and providing another perspective on the incident are vital. There should not be penalties for owners that cannot remain for extenuating circumstances, if they have provided contact information.
- Of course. It may have been aggravated as in human caused or caused by aggression from the dog. A full story is required for this situation just as it is required in human in human court of law.
- It should be the same as when in a car accident, the owner should provide contact details this is very important if veterinary care is needed and to know the vaccination history of the offending animal
- It is the responsibility of the pet owner to stay and give a report, just as if it was a crime or motor vehicle accident
- You don't know if that dog has a history of attacking other dogs or people and whether or not the owner has taken any corrective actions
- Yes just like a car crash but not to blame the dog
- The dog is the owner's responsibility.
- I think you need to have both sides of incident. Offending Dog could be put into vehicle to de-escalate situation but owner remains on scene to tell story
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their dog. If the dog damages property or another person/animal, that owner is responsible to make sure all aspects are taken care of
- Responsible pet ownership means taking responsibility for your dogs behavior, even if it's not normal behavior for the dog. I think pet owners are scared their dog will be punished, but mostly people want to ensure the dog has up to date vaccinations and the victim is okay.
- Because how else can the issue be resolved
- Even if your dog was simply protecting itself, you have a responsibility as that owner to be that dog's voice in what lead up to that action.
- Most owners are able to leave and thus avoid being identified. There should be a fine for leaving a scene of a dog attack/bite.
- It should be mandatory if your dog bites someone/another animal that the dog and owner stay (or leave correct contact info if the dog is being a "nuisance" as described above) to allow the proper steps going forward to take place, whether that's obedience training or restrictions.
- It's the same as a car accident. If there is injury, all parties must remain until the authorities arrive.
- This should have always been the case
- N/a
- How will you make this happen? Do owners just leave. Is the victim supposed to follow them home and risk assault by an aggressive pet owner? There needs to be a "hot line" to report issues with dogs so that police or bylaw officers are dispatched quickly.
- Because in these situations it is critical that Information be shared for safety purposes.
- There is always two sides to a story, and responsible owners should be willing to talk to officers
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs behaviour. It would seem fair that both parties would be able to give a statement to the enforcement officer. This would be best if it was reasonable to wait for an officer.

- incase further action is needed at a later date
- Responsible owners would definitely stay on scene
- Owners should be held accountable for their dogs behavior, the breed is irrelevant while assessing a bite in question
- Its sort of the same idea as a car accident in this way, however that also could cause different issues later on with insurance coverages and prosecutions.
- The owner is liable, and sometimes due to temperaments of animals it is hard to assess the whole situation at that time. Information should be exchanged same as a vehicle accident.
- If vet costs are involved, the owner of the attacker should be responsible
- Punish the owner, not the dog.
- the owner should stay and exchange information, but i don't believe the dog should be taken away immediately or euthanized. Dogs behaviours are trained by humans. The owner should be extensively and adequately evaluated to see if they are fit for the dog, if not, the dog should be trained & re-homed to a family that can handle, understand and care for it. Dogs & certain dog breeds are NOT the issue, humans and inadequate people OWNING dogs for their own pleasure are the issue.
- Part of being a responsible pet owner. People also own cars and aren't allowed to leave the scene of an accident - they shouldn't be allowed to leave the scene of an alive animal incident they're involved in
- If a dog bites to cause severe injury, then yes they should remain on scene.
- It is just like a car accident causing injury. That person is responsible for that dog and needs to remain on scene until the necessary reports are documented.
- Owners are responsible for their pets and pitbulls/dogs shouldnt be villanized
- The dog owner needs to be accountable and should be fined and required to have the dog assessed
- An owner must take greater responsibility in the case of a bite
- It is important for the owner to take accountability of the situation. Even if the owner may not be at fault (for example if someone decides they want to pet your dog without asking). It is important to make sure that the person/animal bitten is okay.
- Dog bites are due to the owners not controlling their animals. It is the owners responsibility and should have to stay on the scene.
- But it's most likely that the person did not give the dogs space and or ran up with out asking to pet the dog
- They should remain at the scene unless there is an injury to them or their animal which requires emergency treatment
- No different than a motor vehicle accident
- Trauma to the dog is the not usually the victims fault
- Dogs don't bite with out being provoked. Instead of punishing a dog for biting a child perhaps take into consideration if the child came up to the dog with out permission from the owner OR if the child was taunting the dog. In instances where a dog bites another dog (which is instinctual for animals during play or conflict) I feel the owners shouldn't have to remain at the scene unless there is significant damage to one of the animals. In that case the hurt animal should be taken to the animal hospital and the owner of the other dog should stay and speak to an enforcement officer.

- Owners should take responsibility
- I think the owner should be responsible if their pet hurts another. For example, it's like a car accident and the person at fault should be the one fixing it.
- Owners should be held responsible for the actions of their dogs. It is their duty to raise and train them to not harm others.
- A dog owner should be responsible for the behaviour of their animal, much like a vehicle owner is responsible for any damages incurred by their vehicle.
- There are so many variances as to why a dog would bit someone or something. The owner could give a little background info as to why it happened.
- similar to in the event of a car crash, in which you stay at the scene for questioning.
- As a responsible pet owner you are responsible if you dog injures another dog or person
- Owners of dogs involved in an incident need to be held accountable and the issues of the dogs behaviour need to be addressed so it doesnt continue or escalate
- They should remain on scene to ensure they can provide proper proof of current shots etc
- It should be treated like a car accident in that mandatory reporting is required. This would ensure nuisance animals/owners are correctly identified.
- It's just like a car incident the owner should be in control and and injury occurred so there fore the person responsible needs to be available for info
- Absolutely dog owners need to take responsibility
- Common sense.
- Would be no different than if a car accident occurred it's the responsible thing to do
- The owner should take full responsibility for their let's actions.
- Pet owners need to show responsibility for their pets.
- The same as you would if in a car crash. Especially if someone may have been injured.
- If there is damage it is fair to work that out with the dog owner. Or up to debate with the owner if the dog was not at fault.
- It is the owner's fault, not the dogs and if there is a negative consequence, it should fall on the owner
- Yes because a lot of people after getting bit are kind of in shock and don't always thing to get contact info
- I think ultimately the owner is responsible for the actions and training of their dog there for they should be held responsible to any damage their pet may have caused. The only exception being is if the victim then in turn begins to assault the owner and escalate the situation
- More owner accountability
- If the affected party is concerned about it yes. But dogs can have small skirmishes all the time and every small bite shouldn't be reported
- I do not believe this bylaw should be targeted towards pitbulls. I have seen more attacks by other dog breeds such as rottweilers and poodles, never a pitbull. I think the bylaw that should be put in place is whether or not the person wanting to purchase and have an animal of any kind is fit to have an animal. Fit meaning, financially stable - be able to house, feed, and have the means for any medical emergencies, mentally stable, proper training to train animals, no record of abuse of any kind. This is excluding support dogs/animals which should be funded by the city anyways considering that family or persons that need that support dog/animal most likely already has a tremendous amount of bills to pay, of course being situational. But just like children, the dog/animal behaves according to how it is brought up and the environment that it is in.

- Yes, the owner should stick around. That's just common courtesy.
 - Only if it was indeed, a vicious attack or one of the animals got severely hurt. If it was an accident or in play or in anyway provoked, then no.
 - again i expect it from anyone doesn't matter on breed.
 - If a person leaves the scene before the police arrive they may not able to contact them.
 - Must be handled just like an accident. Must remain at incident.
 - "I feel as tho this is unfair. There are many aggressive dog breeds that your not considering that bite way more frequently then a pitbull.
- Like chihuahuas, other smaller breeds. Pomeranians.
- I feel like the owners should be more responsible for nuisance dogs. Fines and mandatory dog training course. If its is a repeat offender of biting or aggression move towards euthanization
 - Don't judge the breeds judge the owners."
 - This should already be the rule
 - Owners are responsible for their pets 100%. Owners should be responsible enough to report incidents or remain at any scene necessary.
 - It's no different then a car accident. Dogs bite and fight for number of different reasons. Usually it's due to poor socialization. Also looking at the dog bite pit bulls type dogs are less likely to bite people. It's in the staffordshire bull terrier standard that they need to be good with people particularly children.
 - The owner should be held responsible for any incident as well as the other person/animal involved to assess how it happened and how to prevent any future incidents. Education should be a part of any punishments.
 - Self explanatory
 - Much like when an individual gets into a car accident, certainly
 - Yes. Dog bites are typically often the result of bad ownership/not enough training. The dog owner should have their information taken always so the dog can be effectively rehabilitated and, if necessary, explain the actions of their dog.
 - Absolutely! They need to take responsibility for their pets actions

- Victim may require assistance. May require future care.
- Yes, the owner should be held responsible for their dog, especially if this dog has no had proper training, or is the in process of being trained/rehabilitated
- Accountability
- It should be treated like an accident..... That shows being responsible for your animal
- If a dog should bite or attack anyone or any animal, the owner should be held responsible. Plain and simple. Unless the dog was provoked or hurt by someone or something else. Dogs may need to defend themselves as well
- Remain on scene and/or file report with authorities. Treat bite and run as if hit and run with car.
- Too many times, the owner just stands there, watches their dog bite a person or another dog, and does nothing at all. They don't even try to call it away. My border collie was attacked and bitten by a pitbull and the pitbull's owner just stood there with a stupid look on her face and got annoyed when I asked her to get her dog away from mine.
- owners should take responsibility and be given training classes or something but not euthanized dogs
- The owner has to be accountable.
- The situation needs to be examined. If a kid is chasing a dog with a shovel and the kid gets bit, that's logical and the dog should not be harmed or punished. The kid should be taught appropriate behaviours.
- Each dog owner is responsible for their own pet. A dog's attitude/aggressiveness is a reflection of how the owner raised the dog, a dog should not pay by being put down or anything for being badly raised (similar to a child, you blame the parents not the kid).
- because the victim shouldn't have to pay for damages.
- I've been attacked by dogs and the owner should be held responsible for not taking proper precautions with their own pet in public areas. Owners generally know their own pets and what courses of precautionary actions should be taken.
- I have witnessed dogs attacking other dogs in the park and the owner walked away. It would be better if they were obliged to stay
- The owner needs to be held responsible for the pet at fault. My own dog was attacked twice, once in an off leash area and once walking down the street by a dog that was off leash. Both time the owners ran off.
- Although I think a rule is a good idea, sometimes it might be safer to remove the dog from the situation.
- Your dog your problem. Just like a hit and run
- too many dog bite incidents flee the scene leaving affected with hefty vet bills. Witness reports and stories must be taken. It is not unheard of for a smaller animal to start fights with bigger animals
- You should give your info if you or your animal are involved
- And pay medical bills if needed

- Just like a car accident, the person responsible should take accountability for the incident. It would also give cops a chance to record info about the incident to determine if the dog is dangerous or a nuisance dog.
- Absolutely. It is no different than a vehicular accident. Unless urgent medical treatment is required to address a life-threatening injury, the owner should be legally required to remain at the site of the incident until an enforcement or police officer arrives to record the specifics.
- Treated as a vehicle accident, everything needs to be documented and reported.
- A responsible pet owner should remain at the scene to explain and/or defend their dog's actions...for example, was the bite a result of the dog being teased or threatened.
- People need to take responsibility, not the dog.
- Same as a car accident, they need to stay and accept fine/punishment
- The owner and pet need to be appropriately identified and take responsibility for the incident. Often leaving should be seen as fleeing. A statement needs to be insured for the incident.
- the owner should be a responsible person
- Absolutely! This is already the social expectation for any decent dog owner so it should definitely be formalized in the bylaw to punish those who try to bolt. There should also be fines for leaving a scene of an incident.
- If the injury is severe enough then yes they should stay but minor occurrences should be done on a case by case basis.
- Particularly with increased penalties, there will be an increase in people who try to "pit-and-run," so to speak.
- Na
- accountability for pet owners seems to have no negative effects.
- Of course this should be the case, you should never leave the scene of an incident.
- I do think a person whose dog has bitten another person or animal should be required to remain at the scene, but only if that can be done safely for all parties involved.
- Too many owners are not taking responsibility for their animals actions.
- just like a vehicle accident, the owner should remain at the scene to explain the incident
- There are many reasons why the dog may have bitten a person or other animal. Like any sort of incident, you are responsible for your pet and should remain to provide proper explanation and witness to the incident.
- Its the responsible thing to do.
- Its the responsible thing to do.
- If a person or animal is harmed, powers should exist to compel contact information and contact with enforcement. A reporting framework would help establish documentation if dispute arises later
- If you are supposed to remain at the scene of a vehicular collision or incident where a person or property was hurt/damaged, then the same should apply to incidents involving dogs/animals.
- Dog owners must be responsible for their dog bites
- The owner is more responsible for the bite than the dog is.

- It's completely ignorant and unlawful to segregate Pitbull type breeds. I frequent dog parks often and own a very well socialized friendly dog who has been confronted on multiple occasions by Shar Pei's, shepherd mixes and especially small vicious poodle mix dogs that get away with ANYTHING with zero recourse. This has nothing to do with breeds and everything to do with irresponsible ownership! There should be more bylaw patrolling dog parks like Sue Higgins to enforce fines on aggressive dogs and warn unruly owners not to return.
- It is important track if a dog or owner is involved in multiple incidents.
- If a dog bites, not in all cases but in some, it can be for a lack of a better word justified/provoked. There are two sides to every story and the owner is responsible for that dog whether a provoked bite or an attack.
- They should be held responsible for the incident if it is their fault or if it's not their fault to make sure that everything is ok even if the dog was provoked
- Owner is ultimately responsible for the actions.
- Forensic evidence should be obtained, if possible.
- Should be treated like any other accident/assault
- It is the owners responsibility to take ownership of what happened
- The owner is responsible for their property (pet) and therefore needs to participate in the process. If the dog owner does not stay at the scene then they should be fined and the dog taken into custody.
- It's the responsible thing to do. Animal accidents should be treated the same way as car accidents.
- They should be there to deal with the situation and talk to make sure the situation is cleared
- That seems like a reasonable request for someone involved in any incident as long as the response time to the incident is also reasonable.
- To me that would be no different than a hit and run with a vehicle if you left
- Accountability and responsibility
- They should be available for whether their rabies vaccine is current, possibly to pay the other person's vet bill if necessary and to find out if this has occurred in the past.
- As long as it is safe and/or they have taken the offender home
- Just like a car accident, you must remain at the scene to provide a statement. Same should apply.
- It's the responsibility of all pet owners to stay at the scene to ensure the safety and accountability of all involved
- Yes you stay at the scene of an accident. That's common sense
- "Situations can be taken out of hand by emotions. I think it is important for law enforcement to have the whole story. All dogs deserve to be treated fairly as aggression and being a nuisance is not breed specific.
- I work in the veterinary industry and can say first hand that everyone adores all bully breeds as they are known to be the sweetest. It's 2020, time to advance past one consequence fitting every situation."
- As long as the dog has a place to go
- It's just the right thing to do as it is an incident

- Animals bite for a reason. Any good owner can articulate why their pet felt that biting was necessary
- In my opinion an owner leaving after their dog bites someone and law enforcement is called, if they leave it's just like a criminal fleeing the scene or obstruction. Unless they've got a genuine reason to leave (of great importance) then they should stay.
- I think there needs to be responsibility for the owners.
- It shows the owner taking responsibility.
- You should be responsible if your dog bites and be there in person to deal with the consequences. This will also save time/money by enforcement officers not having to track down the owner and the owner denying it.
- this is extremely important to get all information of the dog bite and information of people involved, also requires the dog owner to take responsibility
- to give info and see both sides of the story.
- Yes because I have had my dog attacked twice by another dog
- As long as the dog is under control and it is safe to do so. If not, the owner must provide contact info.
- They need to pay for vet bills
- Dog owners should not be leaving the scene of an incident if a dog has bitten a person or other animal as injuries might have occurred. The dog owners are ultimately responsible for the behaviour of the dog.
- All owners are responsible for the actions of their animal and any costs or management of their animal. They should stay unless a person or animal needs medical attention
- I believe all involved parties should remain on scene to ensure that a full and comprehensive report of the incident is provided, including the dog owner experience and any relevant circumstance that may have led to the incident .
- Depends on the severity of the bite. Any bite that breaks the skin of animal or person should have to stay until bylaw attends
- If it is a person it is an assault! Charges should be mandatory. They should also give info to victim for health information and so the owner can be sued for the injury.
- If the person's dog attacked first, was off leash, etc. Then they are responsible.
- Only if there is an injury, so the owner can be held liable for medical costs. This answer also applies to question 9, the fine should be the cost of medical treatment and/or property damage.
- It is important to understand why dogs bite, and when. It should be mandatory for bylaw officers to engage in and complete behavioral training as it pertains to dogs. They have a different communication system than do human and that should be considered when responding to dog behavioral situations.
- Common decency
- Most responsible pet owners would stay making it law will not change this
- You shouldn't hit and run why would you be allowed to bite and run.
- Any kind of conflict should always be resolved. Address the problem, determine what triggered the dog. Seek proper advice as to what to do next.

- Yes as they will be able to provide extensive behavioural background of their dog to enforcement officers and take the opportunity to train/ allow their dog to assess the mistake it has just made. Ensuring the animal it is not okay to act in such ways.
- This is like a hit and run. You should remain at the scene and be accountable.
- Yes. It is an incident that causes damages to another person or persons animal or there could be a process by which they could provide their info via phone reporting in the event that either party feels threatened at the time of the event
- If someone flees the scene after the dog causes bodily harm, it should be considered the same as fleeing the scene of an accident. A responsible owner would be willing to be held accountable for their dog's actions.
- How do you plan on enforcing?
- The owner should be there to convey their side of the story such as why the attack took place and should be held liable for their animals actions
- Witnessing a crime by their own pet, they have a civic duty to stick around to talk to police.
- Your dogs are an extension of you and your ownership. If you damage or hurt someone else's property or themselves, they deserve immediate remediation.
- All part of being responsible. If something happens, stay and deal with it no matter the outcome.
- Accidents do happen. Good dog owner remain
- Common sense. Just like what you guys don't have when it comes to question 3!!!
- it is important to take responsibility for your dogs actions.
- yes they need to take responsibility even if it is an accident.
- As long as the dogs are in control - both parties should give their information and their sides of the story of what happened.
- irresponsible owners need to be held accountable and i believe they should be required to remain at the scene of an attack for the proper course of action to be discussed with an official
- The issue with this is that people who have dogs on the receiving end do not always ask the person to stay or state they are calling bylaw, in this case it would not be reasonable to then say the person whose dog bit broke rules if they did not know. I do think absolutely anyone who is involved in a bite incident should share contact information at the bare minimum in case there are unforeseen vet costs or follow up required.
- Owners need to take responsibility sibility for their dogs. Dogs are dogs, they only do what they have been trained to do.
- Ive had neighbours say a dog bit their child, but they couldn't find the owner as they walked away (leaving the scene) immediately and the victim couldn't inform officers who to speak to. I think that's completely unfair and should be prohibited.
- The owner is responsible for their dog
- I think owners of ill-behaved dogs need to be held accountable for their actions. It can be fines, or mandatory training, and (if necessary) removing the dog from the home if the owner continues to neglect their obligations. The dog could benefit from being in a new home where the owners take the time to properly socialize and train the dog to avoid negative instances.

- But how do you make that owner stay? And let's be honest, you're targeting pit bulls and other large breeds. It's more a case that certain people should not be allowed pets more than the pet is dangerous.
- another person was injured due to another person/dogs actions, they should have to remain on scene and provide what ever is needed.
- I have heard where a dog has attacked another dog or person and the owner leaves without staying. The RPO is about pet ownership responsibility. The owner should be fined heavily for leaving a scene.
- You can't sucker punch someone and run away why would you be able to let your dog do it
- The owner must stay with the victim to ensure they are okay while restraining their dog(s), the owner also has a responsibility to do this as it was their dog(s) who attacked the person
- Yes, it's the scene of an accident. Everyone should share their side of the occurrence.
- it is the responsible thing to do. Any oner who flees the scene should be charged, the same as a person would be charged if they fled the scene of an automobile accident
- Responsible dog ownership means you ate responsible for the dog and therefore you remain at the scene.
- A friend was bitten by a dog and the owner left. She was not seriously hurt but was shocked and didn't know what to do. If they took pictures of the animal/owners hopefully people would be more responsible.
- This protects both parties, as if the individual was provoking the dog it would allow for the owner of the dog to act as a witness
- Same as a car accident, you should have to provide your information.
- Owners have to take responsibility. It is how they raise the dogs that's the issue, not the breed of the dog
- Yes of course, the fact that they are already not required to do so is ludicrous.
- there are times when a normally submissive dog turns protector, either they are cornered or they are protecting their pack, ie, person/child. It is not right to blanket statement an animal as a nuisance if they or their pack were being threatened. I have a loving boxer that would never harm anyone but he might if he ever felt that we were being attacked or if someone was to corner him and he was being tormented. No way for anyone to know if owner leaves the scene
- The problem is often the owner
- It should be the same as if you get into a vehicle accident.
- Additional fines should be given if an owner leaves the scene of an incident with out doing either of these things
- I think any level of dog bite incidents should be treated as seriously as any other public incident (like a car incident). The owner should be required to take responsibility for their dogs, as their dogs actions are a result of their own actions. In addition to sharing contact information, dog registration numbers should also be shared.
- So that obedience training can be offered to the owner of the dog
- If owner does not remain at the scene how else are you going to find them????

- The owner should take responsibility if at fault but should also remain to explain the situation fully so misunderstandings do not occur, for example if the dog was provoked by the person or animal bit the provoking party should be held accountable
- An owner is responsible for the dog. It is only fair that that they are responsible for responding to an incident directly involving their animal. If you have an animal, be accountable for it.
- I've seen people walking their dogs at the offleash park, and parents bring their young children who want to go up and hug the other dogs. This lack of respect from the parents towards their child and another animals personal space can be devastating and NOT the fault of the dog. They give warning signs for a stranger to back off.
- if tour dog bites another person just like a car accident thw victim should be able to get your information to mke sure the issue is properly resolved
- People should be held accountable
- many owners of offending dogs will leave the scene rather than take responsibility for injures to another dog
- people are expected to remain at a scene of a crime or accident they are involved in. same rules, laws and fines should be enforced for this.
- I think that the owner should have to explain to an enforcement officer and there should be a look into the owners training or treatment of the animal. Do not automatically assume it is the animals fault.
- The owner needs to be responsible
- It's important for dogs and owners to be held accountable for bites.
- Dog owners need to be held accountable in these situations.
- People need to be accountable for the actions of their pets.
- Owner should be present
- A dog bite would have to be well defined.
- It would allow for better accountability
- There are too many stories with owners leaving after their dog has bitten someone or another dog. If it's a dog that bite another dog. I think the owner of the aggressor dog should have to pet all vet bills and have to take their dog to behaviour training
- It's common sense
- Yes I do
- If your dog injures someone you should be required to stay so that it can be recorded as part if the animal's history, and so the animal can be tested for possible diseases. You information should also be made available in case a lawsuit should arise.
- My father was bitten by a dog in Calgary and the owner left to "contain the dog" so we never were able to get more info to inform bylaw
- Yes but an attack needs to be better defined. Sometimes a dog just snaps at another dog that is bothering it, and is not harmful.
- Yes a dog owner should be responsible for their pet and remain at the scene.
- Yes, a the dog owner should be present to explain what actually happened.

- It is important that the owner is responsible for their animal. However, if the situation is dangerous the owner should be able to remove the dog.
- The sharing of contact information should be mandatory, although the dog owner should be permitted to leave the scene of the incident to remove the potentially aggressive dog from the situation
- This is the case for every other incident, crime or altercation, so it only makes sense to make it mandatory in this setting as well.
- If the bite is significant
- How else would you find out where the animal lives and it's owner?
- If a person is not required to provide their information, how can they be held accountable when a bite is severe enough to cause damage to another person. If the bite victim waves it off or doesn't want to obtain the person's information, that is the only time when they should not be required to stay.
- It is the owners responsibility to pay for all medical fees or vet fees or loss of wages due to an attack.
- This should primarily be to ensure the well-being and safety of affected parties, and ONLY in severe situations, such as injury. (Dogs fight from time to time, involving officers, and stopping to share information is not always necessary)
- Responsible pet ownership regardless of size or breed
- If a person is injured it is because of the owner not declaring that their dog does not like certain things or because the injured person ignored warning signs. The owner should stay not only because they should make sure the other person is okay but also because they should explain the circumstance.
- They should be required to share contact information in case the attack results in medical bills, they need to be isolated for a rabies observation hold as per MOH, need to be held accountable for dog's behaviour etc.
- Pet bills aren't cheap, so the owner of the victimized pet shouldn't have to pay for an entire vet bill.
- Otherwise it's a bite and run
- Irresponsible dog owners should be required to take responsibility and not allow certain breeds to take the fall for people who should not own dogs.
- The dog owner should be responsible for their dog and needs to be present.
- I've heard of owners ferrying away their pet after it has become aggressive and the victims are often left on the hook for any medical or vet bills. That's not fair
- it is the same as a car accident. Everyone should stay at the scene until enforcement shows up and all sides of the story have their say. Only exception should be if the person or animal needs medical assistance.
- Staying at the scene of an incident is responsible dog ownership and should be mandatory
- Responsible owners will remain at the scene of an incident and provide their contact information. This should be required for everyone.

- It may be challenging to implement as the owner may be struggling with the dog, and the victim may want to get away from them.
- If you hit someone by hitting them with your car, it is illegal to leave the scene. Why wouldn't the same rule apply when your property hurts another.
- It helps find all of the necessary information required. Like a hit and run, but with animals
- It's your pet, you should take responsibility.
- Our golden retriever has been attacked twice by two different pit bulls. The wounds to our dog were so serious that immediate veterinary intervention was required. We couldn't stay and get personal information from the dog owner or wait for Animal Services to appear. When a pit bull attacks - the attack leaves serious wounds.
- My boxer/mastiff was attacked, and the owners just left... I would have liked them to at least take responsibility.
- How else would there be restitution - ie reimbursement for vet bills, ripped clothes etc.
- No bite and runs.
- It's the responsibility of the pet owner to stay at the scene, no different than a car accident. You don't hit and run.
- Too many people are leaving and skirting accountability for injuries.
- People need to be responsible for what they or their pets do.
- Seems reasonable obviously. Like a hit & run. Stay with the vehicles..
- No different than a hit and run
- Owner must be responsible for their dog
- I thought this is already a rule!
- People don't do this already?
- Almost all dog aggression incidents I have heard about involve the owner of the aggressor leaving the scene as soon as possible to avoid persecution. Owners must be held responsible for their aggressive animals and attack incidents
- I feel it is important for owners to be responsible for the actions of their dogs.
- It shouldn't be different then if a car hits someone. Don't be a hit and run or a bite and drive
- Yes as I am confident my dog (Pitbull would not harm another animal !
- I think of it as being the same as a hit and run in a vehicle. It would be irresponsible of the owner to leave the scene of a crime until it has been sorted out
- Should be treated like a hit and run if they don't stay
- There are too many incidents in Calgary where a person or animal has been bitten, and the owner of that dog leaves the scene. They should be charged just like a hit and run.
- It's important that all information is shared so that a harmless dog doesn't get put down because they were provoked by a rude child.
- Dog owners need to be accountable to their animals same as if they were driving a vehicle. Leaving a scene where someone or another animal was attacked or hurt would be the same as fleeing a scene of a vehicular accident/incident.

- As long as the enforcement officer does not jump to conclusions and acts with professionalism, then I'm fine with the owner staying and giving contact info.
- Any type of injury should be dealt with immediately like any other accident leaving or fleeing the scene should have bigger consequences
- Vet costs and the well being of the animal or person is important. I understand why most don't as they are scared their animal (family member) will be taken away from them.
- If the bite was due to aggression and creates an open wound.
- It seems like common courtesy to make sure the person is ok and take responsibility for what has happened. Also gives an opportunity to explain both sides of the story to the bylaw officer.
- How can a person and animal be punished if they are allowed to leave the scene? It should be similar to auto accidents, depending on the degree of offense (human attack vs animal, severity of animal injury) the offender should be required by law to stay at the scene until an officer can take their information.
- I have seen and heard of many dog bites (on other dogs or people) where the owner of the aggressive dog leaves and no one knows who they are, so difficult to enforce unless the victim is able to get and address or licence plate number...so great in theory, but hard to enforce
- Owners should be responsible for their animals. Leaving a victim to deal with the damage and trauma by themselves, and with no way to seek redress for an attack, is not fair or just.
- Reinforces the accountability and responsibility of the owner and sharing in any incurred expenses.
- The owner must wait at safe distance for law enforcement to arrive
- It only makes sense to have the owner present.
- As the victim of 2 such incidents, my emergency vet bills might have been covered if this occurred.
- Should be no different than leaving the scene of an accident
- It makes sense to be able to ensure that things get resolved and that all parties feel heard.
- Owners should be held liable for their pets actions.
- Having the owner there with the dog will show how the dog is with the owner (maybe the dog was being protective of the owner or maybe someone provoked the dog to bite it ei: reaching for them after the dog expressed it didn't want that or someone else's dog went after the dog that bit the other one) dogs are gonna react to people around them like kids do, ei. Shying away from someone they aren't not comfortable with or trusting and having the owner there will also allow the owner to advocate for the dog seeing as dogs can't speak for themselves.
- But only then.
- dogs are animals and should not be blamed for animal behavior. It is the owner that is liable for actions, ie: was the dog not on a leash in public areas. If the owner has violated the rules of responsible dog ownership, then the victim has the right to seek repayment of damages. Therefore contact information should be immediately available.
- dog bites should be treated like car accidents (must remain at the scene of the crime until law enforcement can attend and make a report). Its much harder to find a dog/owner (there are no plates to run, just a visible description)

- If your dog hurts someone, it's your duty to do what you can to remedy the situation. It's the same as a car accident or any other situation like that.
 - This is common sense and courteous.
 - Depends on severity of bite (eg. Mouthy dog "bite" vs. actual bite down)
 - I agree a responsible owner would already do this
 - Would cut down on people hiding the offending dog and/or denying responsibility
 - Should remain on the scene like any other offence
 - Like any accident you should stay to talk it out with the others involved and the proper authorities
 - As someone who was severely attacked and bitten by a nuisance animal that was at large and who had no contact with the negligent owners because they were not responsible owners, I would prefer if they are required to present themselves, share contact information, and take responsibility.
 - unless there is a possibility of the situation escalating. Contact information should be shared.
 - So often I have been at a dog park and many dog (none of them pit bulls) have shown aggressive behavior towards other dogs/ attacked other dogs. Often owners will leash up their dog and continue to walk through the park, letting their dog off leash again.
 - It should be considered part of responsible ownership to take responsibility of the dogs behaviour.
 - same as a car accident, if you have caused injury or damage, you should exchange information.
 - It is the dog guardians' job to take responsibility for poor behaviour including appropriate training.
 - "I said yes because, my dog was attacked at the dog park and the person ran away while I was assessing my dog to see if she was ok.
- I wasn't mad at the person or the dog or anyone... but it made me sad because I know if my dog did that I would stay.
- My vet bill was 1600 dollars, not that I care. My dog is more important then the money. But it would have been nice if the person stayed..."
 - It will increase owner feelings of responsibility and lead to the fear of higher consequences for incidents, which may reduce the negligence that allows these incidents to happen in the first place
 - The person or animal bitten deserves to have the ability to be aware of the vaccination and possible bite-history of the aggressive dog involved, and to allow for further investigation of the circumstances surrounding the incident.
 - If there are expenses as a result of the bite, the dog owner needs to give his info so that he can be contacted later.
 - Dog owners have to take responsibility for the dogs actions.
 - To explain their side of the story.
 - Similarly to if a child hurt another child, the parents must be accountable for the behaviour of their pet. Fleeing from a scene in which someone/another animal is hurt should be punishable. It is reasonable to get control of the animal and move away from a target, but if an incident is bad enough to call for law enforcement, it needs to be formally reported.

- The owner must be held accountable
- Just like with an incident, you should have to remain on the scene.
- If a dog bites someone than I feel the owner has an obligation to provide their information as well as be responsible for any damages to the other dog.
- There has to be a degree of responsibility of the owner to the person bit. However, involving law enforcement or those who are not trained in animal handling can lead to unlawful seizure of the animal (either to be unnecessarily euthanized or placed in a shelter until court, causing trauma)
- Just like the scene of an accident, an owner should have to stay
- Dog owners need to exhibit personal responsibility, no different than operating a motor vehicle in an accident.
- Owners should be punished for mishandling there animals
- The owner needs to be accountable in that situation. If the injured party wants to sue, they need to know who to sue, and if enforcement measures are required, the owner should be made to stay to face those consequences.
- A person has a right to defend their dog. Some dogs are aggressive, and in such a case need to have muzzle or be monitored more closely. Its not always the dogs fault though, sometimes kids run up to a strangers dog, step on its tail, scare it , etc and if a dog turns around and bites a kid for any of these reasons then its 100% the child or parents fault.
- The owner needs to b responsible for his animal.
- Dog owners should be held responsible for the action of their children.
- Just like a car accident you must remain at the scene
- Too many owners refuse to take responsibility for a dog that is poorly trained and acts in an aggressive harmful way.
- Owner must be present to report the incident. Just like in a vehicle accident.
- Yes of course
- Any breed that bites someone who be staying on scene yo give information
- Because whatever breed of dog, the owner is responsible for it and should remain on scene.
- I don't believe it is ever the animals fault for acting aggressively. That is the responsibility of the owner. I believe the owner should face the consequences not the animal.
- The owner and animal should stay at the scene so that information and to figure out the proper story on why that situation happened
- Sometimes the owners of the dog who had bitten someone take off, and no one can find out who they are for future contact
- Bullys are not the problem owners that are uneducated are the problem and they should be forced to either take a two week training course at their expense to keep an animal who has bitten.
- The owner should clearly be the one held responsible...
- Yes, including witnesses. It's important to understand the situation the dog was in leading up to the incident. The dog shouldn't be treated as guilty immediately.

- Only makes sense.
- It shouldn't be on the victim to find the perpetrators. They have a responsibility to remain that the scene until the proper authorities arrive.
- I've had my 84lb elkhound pinned to the ground by a loose dog that the owner may or may not have been holding onto. This was not the first incident with this dog or the dog owners. My dog was basically traumatized and they walked off and that dog still goes nuts when he sees my dog
- The owner should be able to explain what happened from their point of view.
- Pet owners have to be responsible for their animals and make sure that everyone is safe including their pets.
- I thought this was already a rule. Or maybe just common courtesy. My only concern is that sometimes people aren't very reasonable based on whether or not they are 'dog' people and can blow things out of proportion which can lead to the dog being put down unnecessarily. Most dogs just need time, patience, and understanding in order to rehabilitate their behavioural issues.
- An owner should take responsibility of their dog.
- Aggressive dog owners should be responsible for their dogs actions. Fines are appropriate in certain cases.
- I believe the owner of the dog who bites the other animal/person should be responsible for any damages cause. Yes, exchange of information should be legally mandatory.
- it should be considered a crime if they leave the scene. Much like any accident.
- This seems like common sense to me! Yes you should remain if your dog attacked someone or another dog!
- Its just like being in a car accident
- Provides third party (enforcement officer) to collect unbiased account of events.
- Or if it is better for the situation, share contact information with valid picture ID and remove animal from the situation.
- The owner is responsible for the dog. The owner must be held accountable for the actions of the dog, regardless of severity. The victim has no way to do so if they cannot contact the owner.
- I believe they should be present to speak with an officer or be made available. It may be safer for them to secure their animal in a vehicle or at home to lower increase stress to the animal and the owner
- Yes, but only if it's safe to do so ie. dog is under control and no chance of the situation escalating.
- A pet owner is responsible for their pet and so they must act as such. This includes staying at the scene of an incident and sharing their contact information.
- The owners are responsible for their dogs
- As a responsible owner they should stay and provide information to authorities.
- To get both parties info & both stories.
- That this isn't a requirement already is insane. If a dog bites someone or an animal, it is now subject to enforcement. The owner has an obligation to not evade that enforcement. Accountability and responsible dog ownership means providing this information to enforcement officers. There can be an exception for providing contact information to another involved party AND to self-report to 311 within 24 hours.

- Only if the dog and or person don't require medical attention.
- To exchange info and discuss vet bill payment
- So information can be provided
- Sharing of contact information should occur for follow up reporting and vet/medical bill accountability. Of danger is still present, owner and offending dog should wait in a safe location.
- Owners should be responsible for costs incurred Asmara result of their dog bites a dog or person.
- Absolutely, regardless of size this should be enforced.
- The dog owner needs to be accountable and responsible for dog behaviour.
- The bitten person or owner of the bitten dog needs to have Rabies vaccination information and the owner of the biting dog should be held responsible for associated vet costs.
- Because there are always two sides to the story and if it is a law shouldn't the law enforcement deal with it?
- Remaining at the scene is simply the responsible thing to do.
- You have to exchange info after an incident. If you leave the scene it's a fine.
- If an animal inflicts injury, it should be viewed as similar as a car crash. Driver must stay at the scene or be charged with leaving. The same should happen with dog owners.
- Yes it's accountability for what has happened. The owners have created their problem by their abilities with animals.
- Just like staying at the scene after a car accident-the animal is our property and responsibility.
- Yes cuz if some lady with a small dog bites mine but it's no big deal and she leaves and never has a report filled that's wrong ! Or when a small dog constantly nips at a bigger dog until the bigger dog reacts in self defence !
- People need to be held accountable for their dogs actions. Financially and otherwise.
- This should be treated no different than a vehicle accident and leaving the scene should be punishable by law
- I believe this is fair and appropriate due diligence to expect. However in the case that the individual who was bitten begins behaving aggressively and engaging in harassment, this expectation should be waived.
- Dogs that are not under their owners control need to be held accountable.
- They should be allowed to leave if the animals are agitated, but all contact information should be shared before they leave.
- Nuisance is a broad definition for some, lacks by others. If a dog barks a few times in an hour during daytime hours some would consider them a Nuisance. Which is excessive and thus the suggestion of required obedience training or additional insurance is unreasonable.
- No way to assess dog, owner or situation if they leave. Leads to a one sided story
- Obviously yes, an incident has occurred.
- Determine if dog is provoked and it's not it's fault

- As a responsible pet owner information must be disclosed.
- Owners need to be responsible for the actions of their animals
- Owners should have their dogs under control so they can't bite anyone
- Regardless of breed an animal owner should be responsible for poor behavior
- They need to take responsibility for their pets.
- Provide clear picture of situation
- It is the same as a car accident, you should be required to stay and provide aid. I think an exception is required if the dog poses a threat and the owner needs to secure the animal first
- It's important to not be ashamed for something happening, take accountability of your pets actions
- If a dog bites a person or other dog the owners should exchange information and depending on the severity. Also start reviewing the owners as most of them don't even train their dogs which is neglectful for the dogd
- Common sense
- It is the correct thing to do
- its like a car accident the owner should be responsible and give their information to those who were affected as well as law enforcement.
- I agree that they should be accountable.
- Because the dog that attacked quite often the owner runs. And the owner of the injured dog is left with the vet bill.
- If the owner is present at the time of the incident, they have a responsibility of care and to provide their information to officers.
- Treat it like a traffic accident.
- For serious bites only.
- Depends, most people don't understand dog behaviour enough to say who was at fault. If it's at a dog park or other public place probably not necessary but for dogs that are running at large yes.
- It isnt fair to other that if the owner leave once their fog has bit another. It is the owner of the dog that bites to have responsibility in helping the injured dog as it wouldnt be their fault . Especially if the dog tends to be a bit more aggressive to others
- Right thing to do.
- It's the right thing to do
- It would mirror car incidents as an obligation to stay at scene of an accident.
- This ensures that all parties involved can provide their statement as to what happened.
- It's the owners responsibility to control their dog, therefore they should do whatever they can in that situation.
- The owner is responsible for their animal, much like a parent is responsible for the action of their child. If a minor commits a crime, their parents have to be involved. Same same.
- Just like a hit and run
- Dogs can seriously injure to the point it may have pasting effects on a person. The owner should be held accountable

- Everyone should have to ensure full disclosure of information when a bit occurs
- You know very well that the owner will not remain at the scene, I know of 2 incidents that were serious and no owner.
- Much like a vehicle incident, any event that results in damage should require the owner to remain to speak with enforcement.
- It's the right thing to do
- If it is not resolved between the two parties you should have someone come before the two parties can leave. If the two parties involved can part with necessary info and/or understanding if anything needs done in the future no officer needed
- Dogs that are raised properly will not bite. If there is a reason why then that needs to be looked into. Pitbulls are not dangerous it's the owner that makes them a danger due to the raising of the dog. Saying this is a pitbull and that is the issue makes you naive and uneducated to the extreme. I am a pitbull owner and never has my dogs ever shown aggression to any dog or person. Don't think that because of a breed that is an issue always look at the owner, they are the issue 100%.
- It is no difference then if it was a vehicle accident. Fines given for leaving the scene.
- Pertinent information needs to be taken
- If a person is a responsible pet owner, they need to take responsibility for the action of the pet. Remaining at the incident is a minimum requirement. There should be clear examples of what constitutes an incident so there is NO confusion or room for interpretation.
- Same as car accidents, share info before absconding.
- Often there are injuries that require vet assistance. The owner should be held accountable by an officer to provide ID and address for further communication. I have had a horse bit by a dog and had the expensive rabies shot and X-ray on a bone chip because the owner loaded their dog into their car and took off
- This makes owners accountable. Too many stories of dogs biting other people or dogs and the owner runs away. Should be treated like a hit and run in a vehicle.
- A responsible pet owner should never leave without exchanging information. If the person needs medical attention or a vet bill needs paid they should offer assistance and help out as it was their dog. Or it should be disputed who was at fault.
- You have to claim responsibility for your dog's actions if they are severe enough to warrant an officer coming.
- Many bites and repeat offenders and were simply not approached properly the first time.
- It's the right thing to do
- Should be the same responsibility as a car accident
- The owners should be held responsible for their dog's behaviour
- It's the responsibility of a pet owner to ensure that anything their pet does is being handled. Leaving the scene is like leaving the scene of a crime and they should be charged for same.
- People or other animals could have been hurt and may require attention and the owner of the offending dog should have to pay.

- Our dog (is a "pitbull") was attacked and bit at an off leash park by a larger dog (not a "pitbull". She required vet bills and the guilty dog/person vanished.
- It is a way for an owner to take responsibility. I would do it if my dog were to be involved. I do not believe in breed specific bylaws. I believe that an aggressive dog must be handles the exact same way no matter the breed.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the dog and as such, needs to share their information and accept the consequences.
- How is this not already the case?
- The owner of the dog should be able to explain what caused the bite, if the dog has shown aggressive/defensive behavior in the past, and if yes, if the dog has ever attended some form of professional training in the past.
- Yes the owner should stay but the dog should be able to be picked up and taken home so the dog does not feel threatened and potentially cause more disturbance.
- Owners should be required to own-up to the event and deal with it immediately if a negative event happens with their dog.
- I think owners should take responsibility if their dog was involved in an attack. It also gives them a chance to share their side of the story as well.
- The owner will have to verify the shots that the dog has had, the nature of the incident and if the other person was provoking aggressive behavior, etc.
- They should have to remain at the scene to be held responsible if that's the case
- Just like any other incident, if police are contacted or any emergency services the people involved should stay at the scene to tell their side of the store to the officers who arrive.
- No different than a car accident. Contact info is critical and and enforcement officer taking a report and potentially issuing a temporary order is easier if all parties involved stay
- Only if the victim is wounded.
- This is any dog owners responsibility and should happen regardless. As an owner I am responsible for my dog and it's actions as I am my own. This should be treated similar to a car accident.
- Owners should do the responsible thing and take responsibility for the actions of animals in their care.
- I support this as it is the responsible thing to do
- Because that's common sense.
- Its a crime, don't flee the scene
- I have been bitten by a freaken rat terrier and a dalmatian. How dare you go after pitbulls!
- It should be treated as a car accident as to allow for the authorities to make a judgment on it as fairly as possible
- Both sides of a story should be told. Often times it gets blown out of proportion
- It should be the same as property/vehicle damage. Someone has to pay for the damages and be accountable.
- It is the best way to ensure the pet is safe and the owner knows what has occurred

- Owner needs to be responsible for dogs actions, outside private property
- Treat it like any other accident that may require insurance. Follow up information regarding pet registration is a must.
- A dog bite should be treated seriously and handled just like a traffic accident like a fender bender you have to stay and give insurance details for those so why not a dog bite
- They must be accountable for these actions
- It is a no brainer, if I were to assault someone it is expected I stay at the scene. Same should go for dogs and owners.
- Accept responsibility, the bite or attack could be defending itself, it is not always the dogs fault
- My husband has been bit twice in the last 4 years, once cycling and once walking in our neighborhood. The dog that bit him in our neighborhood left and we luckily found him via social media.
- If you are required to go to a tribunal then your info will be needed.
- There are far too many cases of people not taking responsibility when a dog becomes hurt off leash.
- The dog's behaviour stems from its treatment by the owner.
- They are responsible for their dog. They should stay unless members of the public show violent behaviour towards them.
- Of course, as with any other injury incident
- Should any serious harm be done to a person or another animal by the dog, this rule would help ensure that all cases are tracked and reported
- It makes sense, like the scene of an accident
- There could be expenses that arise from the attack and the owner needs to held accountable for the expenses
- Yes treating bites more seriously would be a good thing in that it identifies specific owners and pets that are dangerous rather than punishing entire breeds.
- The owner of the dog that was the cause of the incident should be held responsible for their dogs actions
- If its necessary they should share information incase a wound becomes infected or the owner continues to not train their dog to not bite the dog may need a more responsible owner.
- yes as long as the owner can prevent a further/worsening attack, if the dogs are already agitated/injured it could result in a much worse situation (sometimes dogs need to be fully removed from the issue to return to a normal state of mind)
- This would help with both sides of the story.
- It shouldn't be any different than a incident or accident involving humans. All parties should remain at the scene and give information for potential vet bills etc..
- My dog was previously attacked by dogs and the owners left in an attempt to avoid the seriousness of the situation. Witnesses were able to assist with identifying the dog owners who took zero responsibility. Dog ownership includes the full responsibility of the dogs actions, including any costs related to an attack on a person or another animal. In our case it was approximately $1000 in emergency vet bills to stabilize and administer care to our dog - entirely at our expense.

- Pet owners need to be held responsible.
- If the owner leaves, there is no way to completely identify the situation.
- Obviously yes. If a dog is vicious, it's a fault of the owner for providing improper training.
- Poorly trained dogs are the ONLY issue. "Aggressive breeds" are not an issue when properly trained.
- responsibility is on the owner
- If a dog attacks any person or animal it should be recorded on the owners record and include a fine of some sort for not understanding their animals behavior
- Just like driving, a major ticket for failing to stay at the scene of an accident
- Accountability
- if it turns out the human that got bit was teasing the dog or acting violently first - then what? I object vehemently to pit-bulls being singled out!!
- For enforcement or liability, you shouldn't be able to just run away and avoid enforcement
- Accountability
- Absolutely. There are always two sides to a story. The dog may have been tainted by someone, it's space may not have been respected by another dog or human, etc. There are other owner may not have proper control over their animal or a proper understating of how to read a dogs body language.
- I think it is important for the owner to remain at the scene so all correct information can be shared and corroborated by the officer.
- The owner should have the opportunity to express what they saw, rather than only the statement from the victim. These could both be taken a later time if the situation is too emotionally charged at the time of the incident.
- Need to know who owns the dog so appropriate discussions can take place to determine if dog is a continuing threat to others/other dogs
- Yes, it is wrong to leave the scene if their dog bit someone else. My friends dog was bit and ended up with 20 stitches and a large vet bill after a large abscess formed. The owners of the dog who bit their dog didn't pay for anything and they should have been held accountable for the damage and vet bill.
- When you own a dog you're responsible for that animal, you need to own that .
- The owner is responsible and that is a condition agreed upon with you become a dog owner.
- I only support this if the dog bites a person.
- Accountability
- Nuisance dogs must be dealt with immediately
- I think the owner should be responsible for it's dog's actions
- There is nothing to explain. The individuals responsible for an incident are obligated to remain at the scene until it is resolved.
- Yes they should as they need to take ownership instead of leaving.
- Its there dog and they get can give their information about what happened then and there,
- Owners should take responsibility for their animals.

- An animal is an animal, they will act out of instinct and behaviour. How humans react however, is very different. That person should remain on scene and give a very full description of the care and procedures they use with their animals
- I have had my dog attacked and been given fake info.
- People should not leave the scene of any incident involving injury. Especially if people were injured by their property (dog)
- This shouldn't be any different than assault/battery. If the owner of the animal flees the scene of the crime they should face additional charges of fleeing the scene of a crime.
- It should be treated like a car accident - leaving the scene without disclosing information/talking to enforcement officer should result in extra fines for owner
- Dogs are a reflection of the owner and the owner must take responsibility for the dogs actions as if it were its own.
- If the owner has to pay any medical attention for another dog or a person, they have to remain in the scene.
- It is, and always should be, the responsibility of the owner to ensure their dog is well behaved, and socialized.
- Only if the bite draws blood or severe injury; otherwise, inexperienced dog owners could be complaining for dogs playing.
- Must provide the same level of information as required during a car collision.
- The owner needs to be accountable for their pets actions.
- It would only be the responsible thing to do.
- As long as the dog has been controlled.
- Accountability for injury is necessary, victim must be able to receive contact information if injury is severe. And allow both parties to document the incident
- The owner should be held accountable for their dog's actions
- If a dog bites me, I sure hope the owner sticks around and gives me their personal information
- Any bite incident needs to be reported and investigated, however response time to said events needs to be consistent and rapid as an upset or aggressive dog should not remain in a public place for extended periods of time.
- A dog, whichever breed, shows signs before he/she exhibits a negative behaviour. The owner is responsible for recognizing this.
- Yes, unless they share their correct information without supervision involved. How else are they going to be held accountable for the incident if they can just leave the scene.
- The owner of the dog that bit someone or another animal needs to be held accountable for that dog.
- You are responsible for your animals.
- Yes because incidents occur that result in a non-violent dog biting and both sides of stories are required for an efficient and fair reprimand.
- Only to share contact information with other party. Similar to a motor vehicle collision. Report to authorities as necessary, not mandated to wait for them to arrive.

- Enforcement officers shouldn't have to track owners down. If your animal has bitten another animal/person, you need to accept responsibility and stay at the scene, similar to if you've had a car accident.
- "I want to have the owner to remain and have a police report filed if there dog bites another dog.
- This way they cannot run off and if they do they could be fined for violating the bylaw - if the owner leave then a fine to them like a hit and run be given out"
- If my dog or myself require medical attention, I want to know that that person is who they say they are, and that they are there is a legal record of the event and those involved.
- If a person is a responsible dog owner they should remain at the scene
- It's just like a car accident. Both parties should remain at the scene to explain their side to an officer.
- A dog is the owner's responsibility
- This is necessary and should happen.
- Important to get the facts and information from all parties
- Yes if any kind of dog bites an animal or other human the person should stay around and have to pay any vet bill if an animal is involved or any type of disability if a human gets bit
- This is common sense and the fact there needs to be a law says alot about people
- "This Completely depends on the severity of the incident. If the bite is not Severe, e.i. No tissue damage, or anything that requires immediate medical response, the Persons should not be required to remain on seen. A complaint can be made, if the victim so chooses to do so.
- For Severe Bites, e.i. Tissue damage, blood, immediate severe bruising; both parties shall exchange information, and call authorities, if necessary."
- Our dog was attacked and my husband was bitten also. We did not get any contact information from them and they left. This left us with huge vet bills and trauma.
- You need to know the dogs has their up to date shots.
- It should be considered a crime of assault and fleeing the scene otherwise.
- it's an injury so treat it like any other injury report
- I do feel this should be done as my dog has been attacked by a lot of small dog breeds and they never control their dog.
- With the exception of the owner not being able to control their pet, then it would de-escalate the situation to separate.
- And further action to be taken such as obedience training and or a muzzle & leash while at off leash parks
- The owner should be open to covering expenses if the person requires a vaccine or antibiotic prescription.
- I agree if there has been a dog attack that the owner of the dog is responsible for any vet bills etc
- Many times people shrug it off and there also needs to be accountably to the person bit as to their actions leading up to the bite.
- Animal is the owners responsibility, is only right they basically follow the same rules as if there a motor vehicle accident that causes injury.

- I agree because the owner should be held accountable. It's the owner's responsibility to train their dog appropriately. There are no bad breeds, only poorly trained dogs due to bad owners.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their animals behaviour. If they flee the scene, that is not responsible pet ownership. I own a dog who is a huge bite risk and it is my responsibility to keep him safe, keep other animals/people safe, and put him in appropriate situations.
- A bit like car crashes, it makes sense that all parties remain to exchange info, communicate with an enforcement officer if needed and decide whether further steps are required. However, I do not believe that Pitbulls should be specifically targeted, as it does not address behavioural issues and rather gives in to unfair assumptions.
- As a pet owner you are responsible for your pet's conduct at all times.
- it's an accident
- It should be treated like a traffic accident
- You stay for a car accident. Should stay if your dog causes issues as well.
- My dog was bitten by another dog at the park. The owner pretended not to see me trying to address this and rapidly left.
- Any animal that bites, the owner should wait and pay the consequences of the bite.
- Makes sense.
- No explanation required. It's common sense
- I've been bitten by a friends dog and let it slid only to hear later it wasn't that dogs first incident. The owner needs to take responsibility!
- "It, would show that this person is responsible pet owner.
- If they don't stay then larger penalties, should be incurred, again for all type of breeds"
- Depending on the incident that occurred and would sustained; yes - they should stay. No different than a car accident.
- .
- I had a friend whose dog just recently bit someone, and the incident was handled poorly. It seemed my friend was 'off the hook' as bylaw and the vet would not do anything, include euthanize the dog. And now all of a sudden he is being charged.
- This makes sense if the person or animal bitten isn't in serious distress. If they are, an exchange of contact information to be forwarded to the enforcement officer makes better sense.
- It's common sense
- If a pet that you are responsible for is directly involved in the injury of another animal or person(s), you should be required to remain at scene or provide information to assist the animal bylaw officers to properly investigate the incident. Just like collisions under the traffic safety act. This would place more accountability on the owner and help ensure safety measures are more likely to be applied by the owner. (Muzzles, avoiding off leash parks, etc).
- Depending on the severity, financial compensation could be necessary. Having a law enforcement officer involved would also give both parties the ability to provide their side of the story.

- If someone assaulted the other it would be required. The only time someone should leave the scene is if the animal needs medical attention in which a bystander can collect information and be witness to the attack
- It's like anything more information is better.
- "As long as one or all owners want to involve an enforcement officer. If all involved in the incident agree that there is no need to talk with an enforcement officer then they should be able to by-pass this step. My other concern is that if veterinary care is urgently required then the requirement to talk to an enforcement officer at the time of the incident should be waived. If my dog required urgent veterinary care it would be unreasonable to make me wait to provide this care.
- It should still be necessary for contact information to be exchanged."
- It should be the pet owners responsibility for their pet no matter what the case.
- Just as I think the owner should stay, I think the one who was bit should also stay as it is often HUMAN error that leads to this, NOT the dog.
- It should be common curtesy
- i feel as if that a dog were to bite someone else out of no where that the owner must be held accountable because if your dog bites somebody without reasoning of defending itself or the owner it would be the owners fault for raising it to attack. if you raise your dog in the correct way like most people do your dog should not bite other people or other dogs. it is never the dogs fault it is always the owners.
- When a person punches another person, he is required to remains on the scene or he's going to be search. Same for dogs.
- It is the owners responsibility to take accountability for the actions of their dog and defend their dog if the bite was precipitated on the bad behaviour of another person or animal, however if the owner is with dog at the scene they may not be able to de-escalate the situation and more harm could occur.
- You can't just run away...
- If your dog bites someone, it's your responsibility to stay until an officer comes - also it is not always the dog's fault.
- It is the same as staying at the scene of other crimes
- Yes, within a reasonable time frame. (I.e. an officer will arrive within 30 mins). This is an opportunity for the owner and victim to provide on record explanation of the incident.
- You are responsible for your animal. Including its actions
- Again, it's poor animal husbandry not particular breeds that are to blame. Hold people accountable.
- Owner should be forced to take responsibility for the dogs mistake.
- It just is common curtesy to ensure all involved in an incident are ok and if medical attention is required everyone involved can contact each other
- It is the owners responsibility to make sure their dog, and others, are safe.
- ownership of
- A fine similar to "hit and run". If someones dog attacks someone or something, they need to be held responsible

- The owner is ultimately responsible therefore needs to be the accountable person if a situation occurs.
- I do believe that any dog who bites and the owner is in scene should stay until reports have been discussed.
- makes complete sense
- Unless doing so would cause harm or physical injury to another person. Ei: child ran off during incident
- In my experience, dog owners often flee the scene after an incident. This makes it hard to check on vaccinations and seriousness of the incident. They should be required to remain on the scene.
- Quite obvious isn't it. How could a tribunal committee do its job if they can't find out who the offending party is.
- I believe it should be the responsibility of any dog owner who is involved in an incident to stay at the scene and provide any and all information required, ie; license number, vet info regarding vaccinations, any prior incident.
- It is no different than a car accident or something like that
- It is important that the dog bite perpetrator remain and pay for the damages done to the victim.
- The dog's owner should be on hand to provide further information on the dog's medical history (recent vaccinations, for example)
- Provide background and other info
- People are responsible for their animals. If there are vet or medical costs they should be held accountable. If they just take off, it's like a hit and run...
- Some people don't have extreme funds to cover for their vet bills or their own health reasons. For some owners of the dog that was bitten this could be a matter of spending all the money they have or take loans, worst case scenario to put their loved animal to sleep not being able to afford potentially very expensive procedures. The person / owner needs to stay on site just as the owners of the vehicles that get into the accidents.
- People hide vicious dogs and then they bite again. Tracks repeat offenders. Most poorly behaved dogs have poorly behaved owners
- The owner should be responsible for the actions of their dog and stay at the scene and take responsibility for their actions
- I feel like it would help identify where the problematic animals are and help deal with them efficiently
- My pitbulls have been attacked by collie type dogs and the owners ran away afterwards and my dog was severely injured.
- There is always 2 sides to every story, both should be heard.
- Usually dog bite is followed with a big bill at the vet so having an info from an owner would help settling those kind of issues.
- determine if dog is nuisance, rehabbing, rehoming (if owners are obviously incapable of providing the dog with a safe environment [ex: bad dog owners])
- That's like hit and run with an automobile. Owners should be willing and cooperative in taking responsibility for their dogs actions

- As an owner I've done more than my share of ensuring one another are okay after a dog interaction. Dogs are animals and need to be handled and respected as such. We however equally take ownership and must behave responsibly.
 - Need the whole story which includes the dog owners account of what happened.
 - The owner of the dog should remain at the scene. In the event a bite causes more trauma than what is covered under AHS, the owner of the aggressive dog should be required to pay for antibiotics, etc.
 - Too often do people run off, it should be the same as fleeing the scene of an accident. You are responsible for what your dog does while in your care.
 - Pet owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
 - it may have been the bite victims fault. Dogs do defend themselves.
 - Yes so both parties can have a clear understanding of why the dog lashed out
 - I think it's important for the dog's owner to be present and to see what needs to be done.
 - I think this is vital.
 - Just as with a car accident, this should be mandated.
 - I do believe it is the responsibility of a dog owner to properly train the dog and it's a dog has bitten a person or an avid animal I do feel that the owner is liable for a fine and maybe some retraining for the dog
 - There's always 3 sides to every story, everyone involved should remain at the scene of incident to share details of what happened.
 - It's important to remain at the scene to explain the situation.
 - If your dog has caused harm, you should be held responsible. To leave would be the same as a hit-and-run.
 - "If it is a severe bite from one dog to another or a person has been bit without provoking the dog or trying to break up a fight.
- If unsure then just stay. Although, officers reviewing the cases should understand that not all dog owners understand dog behaviour and don't recognize when their bouncy, hyper active dog does not get a get out of jail card anytime there is an interaction with another dog. Owners need to be able to always be aware of other dogs and owners. If your bouncy dog runs up to a leashed dog or one that has given multiple signals it is not interested in playing and you don't correct your dog eventually the dog that doesn't want to play will do the correcting. It is not only the dog that does the correcting at fault. The other owner needs to know when to recall their dog and not just walk with their dog off leash and not pay attention and instead spend the entire walk talking to a friend or other owners and not be aware of where their dog is and what it is doing. A bouncy playful dog does not equal a good dog and a good dog owner.

- I fully support the bandana idea. Education to owners will be required to ensure this is effective. Owners that don't respect the bandana coding and continue to just let their dog interact with any dog even though the bandana clearly gives a visual of the type of dog it is. The owner not caring to respect the colour code should be held accountable if there is an altercation. Also who will regulate the bandana colours, ie who will be responsible to assess the dog to ensure it wears the appropriate colour. As not all dog owners understand dog behaviour or recognize when their dogs behaviour is not a favourable behaviour, thus potentially leading to issues. Lots of education for owners would need to be done around the colour coding."
- Dogs are wild animals and occasionally there can be a situation where one dog attacks another dog for a number of reasons. Although no owner wants this, the vet bills can be quite expensive for the owner of the dog that was attacked. The owner of the attacking dog should offer some sort of compensation for their damage.
- treat dog bites like car accidents. It should be illegal to leave the scene of a bite accident.
- If people could be fined for a "bite & run" and forced by law to pay vet bills, that would keep pet insurance costs down for responsible owners.
- Both parties, and witnesses should stay if bylaw is required. There is more to a story than your dog just bit my dog cases. Often both parties are in the wrong at some point. Fines could potentially be brought into both parties with understanding of situations.
- Much like a car accident
- I was bit by a dog on a path. It was not an off leash area. I was walking alone. The owner did not provide information and left. It was a pit bull crossed. I received a tetanus shot and antibiotics from the hospital and nothing happened to her.
- This is pretty obvious, isn't it? Enforcement needs to know who the dog's owner is... is this the first time for that dog, has it bitten before... what if there are significant vet bills for the bitten dog... also, you would like to be sure that the biter doesn't have rabies.... amongst other reasons...
- Because our pets are our responsibility. If your child hurt someone or something would you walk away?
- Had a friend who had been attacked by a dog and the owner ran away.
- It's the same as remaining at the scene of an accident. The relevant facts can be manipulated if the owner of the offending dog is allowed to leave.
- It is their dog
- A bite should be like a car accident. If there's blood an officer should be present.
- as in any accident involving person to person injury, responsibility is placed on the owner of the pet to take the responsible action to assure the person injured is appropriately cared for and that both sides of the issue are heard out
- Its your dog you need to follow through if they bite.
- Vet bills may result and it's like staying on the scene of a vehicle accident
- Owners must take responsibility
- In what other assault would it be okay for the perpetrator to leave? How is this even a question?
- If bite is severe enough to draw blood. If one party insists on it.

- No different than being involved in an accident
- it is the responsibility of the owner to remain on scene
- The owner is responsible for its animals actions.
- My dog was attacked several times by the same dog when I lived in a condo complex. Bylaw was unable to do anything about it except document the experience. Please update your bylaws to support good pet owners!
- If there is infection the victim should be able to notify the owner. This also seems like the way to track repeat offenders. I also believe that the owner/handler should be assessed as "fit" to handle their dog (i.e., that the owner is invested in training their dog, socializing it appropriately, etc)
- Dog bites can lead to further health complications such as infections in both humans and other animals, as well both parties should be held accountable to their own animal /self as it could have been either side at fault for instigating the dog bite it may not always be the pit bull owners or the pit bulls fault.
- A dog just doesn't bite for no reason. The owner must stay to explain what happened so it isn't a one way story. But that also being said if the incident was unprovoked and the dog bit someone or something its good for the owner to have to stay and get a better background of the owner. Because its not always the dogs fault. It could be the owners fault for poor training.
- Yes, this is part of responsible animal ownership.
- Just like if a driver hits another driver or vehicle or person you must stay and exchange information...
- People need to take accountability and responsibility for their pets actions. If a dog attacks a person, that dog needs to be put down. Coming from a Pitbull owner.
- like any accident or injury, people need to be responsible and accountable. you choose to own a dog, you have to assume the risk and do your part. at minimum, if the dog is agitated, some effort needs to be made to go be your contact info, and then parameters made clear when to stay on scene and when you should leave (ex; your dog is agitated and at risk of another bite or not under control)
- If another dog bites my dog for example, I would expect the owner to come and explain the situation, if they run from the situation with the dog i feel they are not responsible or not willing to be accountable for their animals actions
- I believe the owner much like a traffic accident that way both parties can give their events that happened and the officer can make a determination then.
- Or must share contact info before they leave.
- Too many people who have an animal that is reactive do not take responsibility. Both parties must remain at the scene to give statements like a person against person attack. Whether evoked, or a one time incident or a dog that has had many counts against them. This would be the only way to find that out
- If anything were to happen to myself, my loved ones or my dogs. I'd want all of that persons information for fines, payment of treatments and to be able to know that dog is getting the help it needs.
- Exchange of information is necessary to get vet bills covered for the injured dog.

- If it is safe to do so. Otherwise they need to immediately contact animal services and give their name address and phone number and make arrangements for the animal to be checked out.
- Common decency
- Two sides to every story. Credibility of owners/complainants can be evaluated in person .Important measure for the animals sake.
- Should be held accountable and illegal to leave scene
- I've seen enough owners run away after incidents like these.
- Dogs do not bite out of no where - unless diseased. If happened once, it will happen again. A dog biting another dog or person needs to be addressed by the owner and enforced rather than fleeing.
- The owner should be held accountable for owning a dangerous dog.
- Yes I think they should stay and answer any questions.
- It should be an offense, just like an assault. Parties responsible should be held accountable. Dogs with previous offenses would be treated more harshly.
- The owner is at fault not the dog. Their responsibility
- No responsible owner should ever leave the scene of an attack or bite. Make some distance so there's no further issues, but don't leave.
- Owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their pets and their own inactions
- If an injury or damage of person or property cannot be ignored simply because it was caused by an animal. The owner must take ownership and responsibility or be give a VERY large fine.
- This could be considered assault.
- I think it's fair if it's a TRUE altercation. Meaning broken skin or major issues.
- vet bills cost more than my truck payments. if someone's dog put mine into surgery they can cover the cost.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the dog so they should be required to remain at the scene, just like with car accidents.
- A small dog bit and didn't let go of my pitbulls next, she remained calm and tried to shake it off, I was about to boot the little dog but the underage child that was walking it grabbed it before I could. First of all no underage child should be walking any dog without a paren, second this is a prime example of how "pitbulls" are not the problem.
- As a responsible owner this should always be done in the unfortunate event of a bite
- No one should ever leave the scene of an incident that you directly or indirectly have caused.
- Only if it is severe
- so they can be made to be responsible - often never see some of these people or dogs again otherwise - like a car accident - need to stay unless it is not possible due to the nature of any injury/need for medical attention
- Common sense and the golden rule of being a good person lead me to my answer
- More often than not, animals bite because of people not respecting their space, being approached without permission, being scared, etc. People should be held accountable whether that be the owner or the individual who has been bitten

- This is fine, but you cannot "ban" dog breeds!! Come on people!!
- As a car accident or other issue, should have to remain at the scene.
- You don't know the severity of a bite until assessed by a vet/doctor. Internal damage doesn't necessarily reflect on the exterior, therefore, providing contact information and a statement to an officer is a necessity!!
- Owners of aggressive dogs usually disappear without giving any info.
- They need to take responsibility
- Same as any other incident.
- Yes, however the situation needs to be permitting. If both dogs end up injured or the owner is also injured or the dog can not be controlled then no, I do not believe someone should have to stay at a scene. That person also has a responsibility to others around them and their dog. I do support that information between the people and dogs involved needs to be exchanged and if it is not exchanged then there should be consequences.
- If their dog bites someone...they are responsible. In Skyview some Dog Owners with high anxiety dogs blame people for their dog trying to attack others meanwhile their dog does not have a muzzle and they are walking their dog on public property.
- Uhhh yea? If your dog bites somebody you better talk to the police/byla/whatever about it
- Any injury is the responsibility of the owner
- Not if the dog is only playing. There could be different perceptions of a "bite." You should also be allowed to get your dog to a safe situation first but you should state your intentions to return. Just be a good samaritan.
- As a responsible dog owner you should own up for your dogs actions
- It's a liability like an accident so yes.
- This should absolutely be a requirement. There should be stiff penalties for dog owners who leave the scene of an incident when the victim wishes to pursue investigation/enforcement.
- Or pass on info for contact. Sometimes leaving is better for all parties to avoid conflict.
- Repeat behaviour, costs the city money. It should cost the owner.
- Their dog is their responsibility
- Even if it was an accident, the dog owner should still remain on scene to answer questions, assist, and provide their information.
- Just like a car accident
- Keeps people accountable for the care and training they are providing their animal so their can be a paper trail if something really bad happens
- Owner should be responsible for their pet and sometimes a pet is not approached correctly.
- If a person leaves the scene of an attack, it should be considered the same as a hit and run incident
- Owner must take full responsibility.
- It's the responsible thing to do

- "At the end of the day , no one wants to be responsible for their pet in hurting another animal or person. It happens and is unfortunate but it would be great to know that they're held accountable and accidents do happen especially when taking ownership of other living creatures.
- On the other hand - banning certain breeds is not necessary and will be ineffective. I know personally if these laws were implemented if one of my dogs were to harm or injure another animal I would be less likely to stay and report it to law enforcement as I'd be scared for my pets safety."
- If a person is bit by a dog the owner stick around to resolve the situation. A dog biting another dog is not a bit deal...however a dog full on attacking another dog is.
- Of course the owner should be responsible.
- In case of accident. Or in need of more training. And a check of rabies or other serious conditions. And check of abuse to animal if that is a reason that the animal is aggressive so judgment can be passed on owners and training can be given to animal so it never occurs again.
- If serious harm is done it's important that the accountable party remain involved and potentially pay for damages.
- Same as a traffic accident
- This is something all responsible pet owners should do anyways - you are responsible for this animal and therefore should step forward when an incident like this occurs
- There's more to one side of a story
- You should be required to share contact information to move forward with the situation.
- Should be considered leaving the scene of assault.
- So the owner can be held accountable for the actions of the dog
- Enforcing the need to stay on scene will help determine the psychology of the owner, as research heavily suggests that deviant behaviour in domesticated animals are a symptom of poor ownership and lack of resources from owners versus dangerous temperament of the domesticated animal in question.
- Well obviously the dog owner needs to take responsibility, if they are there when the dog bites, unless it was the victims fault in the first place, or the person was teasing or hurting the dog.
- Pit bulls and similar breeds of dog should not be regulated any differently than other breed. They are not the only breeds with more potential to dangerous bites based on their size. These breeds and their owners should not be scapegoated as problems due to a stigma that has been created around the breed(s).
- An act of aggression should still be delt with in a civil fashion
- If a dog attacks, it is the owners responsibility to make sure the other person is okay.
- There are many of these incidents like these at the dog park, the owner shy away from the incident and uses excuses like "my dog was just playing rough" and makes excuses to not help pay for the vet/doctor expenses.
- Same way you have to remain at the scene of any accident.

- Of a dog bites then the owner should be responsible.
- Need owners to be responsible.
- I was bitten while riding my bike on the slip road adjacent to Edworthy off leash area and the owner was not nearby. The bite broke the skin and I had to get a tetanus shot. Owners should be in control of their pets at all times.
- It may be the person who antagonizes the dog and the dog should not be penalized for that circumstance.
- Within reason only if it is safe for both dog and owner to remain at the scene.
- Most dogs who bite and misbehaved are more likely trained improperly. It makes more sense for the owner to receive consequences than the dog
- If a dog bites a person or an animal. The owner should be charged. It is not the dogs fault the incident happened. It's the owners for not properly training their dog. The owner should be treated the same way a parent is treated for not taking care of their child.
- An owner is responsible for his/her pet.
- it just makes sense. like a car accident.
- You have to stay at the scene of a motor vehicle accident. Same should be with dog bites.
- Should be given a fine on site
- If the victim of the incident was teasing/bothering the dog to the point of aggression or for the incident to happen, the dog and their owner should not be liable given that the dog was provoked
- As long as no further harm could be done during that time. If safer to remove yourself and animal i believe it should be okay to.
- Simple legal responsibility.
- How is there not a rule for this already????
- When you adopt or purchase a dog you are making a 10-15 year commitment to be responsible for them. You would not leave the scene of your child got into a fight with another person and there were injuries, you stay and make sure everyone is sorted out.
- The owner of the dog (or cat) that bites a person or other animal needs to be held responsible for necessary medical assessment and care, loss of work time / wages, and any required long-term care resulting from the bite. The owner needs to provide full contact information before leaving the scene - but also needs to remove the offending animal and get it safely restrained at home as quickly as possible. Waiting for an enforcement officer in public with an offending animal, or forcing the victim to wait to receive medical assessment / care until an enforcement officer arrives seems detrimental to health and safety.
- Overall less stressful for the dog and owner
- The dog owner should be held responsible for their dog and its behaviour.
- Sounds like the same idea as a car accident.
- If a dog bites a person or another animal it is necessary for both parties to explain the actual event. The owner of the perpetrating dog must be held accountable at the time of the incident. Leaving the scene allows the owner of the offending dog to avoid consequences. I have two small dogs which I pickup and carry when walking past other pet owners with large dogs. Too many pet owners of large dogs state, "My dog is gentle and harmless." However, it is pet owners that display complacency instead of caution that become shocked when their dog suddenly attacks another dog unaware of what triggered the attack, and quick to justify the event or divert blame.

- If a dog bites a person or severely bites another dog, the owner should have to wait for an enforcement officer, but in small incidents of dog nipping another dog it should be left up to the owners to discuss the situation.
- It should be the responsibility of the of the pet owner who's dog has bitten someone or other animals to shoulder all necessary medical expenses of the victim/victim's pet, thus, exchanging of contact information is a must.
- I feel it is the owners responsibility if their dog is a threat to anyone or thing in anyway. A lot of people don't realize their dog is not friendly to everyone.
- Just like a car accident...they need to be responsible and share their info in case other issues come up.
- Owners must be held responsible
- The owner needs to accountable for their dog
- As long as safe to do so. Sometimes it can get quite tense and situation may escalate between people and dog may have to be removed from environment to ease tension. Info must be exchanges though.
- The owner is the problem, not the dog
- Owners are liable for their dogs behaviour therefore it is their responsibility to acknowledge and be held responsible for their dog's reaction.
- As long as the biting dog can be safely contained during this time. If not, then the enforcement officer could go to the owner's home for further follow up, so the dog is safely contained until things are worked out.
- If they are able to do so without causing additional risk due to the dog or the other inhabitants they should as they are responsible for their dog and their dogs actions.
- You're responsible for your pet and the way it acts. It looks bad on you to leave the scene even if it's not the dogs fault.
- Dog owners who cause harm have an obligation to remain on scene to share information & to talk to enforcement officers if necessary. If the same logic applies to people who drive, who also have a duty of care for pedestrians & other vehicles/bikes on the road, people who own dogs should be obligated to follow similar rules as well. That should be a clear responsibility for people who choose to own pets.
- This is a crime, like an attack. If a person hits another person, they need to explain to the police. The same goes for if a dog attacks a person.
- I think they should be present to speak to the officer what exactly happened
- To many just leave the scene. They need to be held accountable.
- all pet owners should remain at scene of incident
- No different than fleeing a scene of an accident.

- "The owner is responsible for controlling their pet and therefore are at least somewhat liable for their actions. Should be treated the same as hit-and-runs if they leave after a dog bite.
- For dog-on-dog bites, should not be as much of an issue unless it was clearly intending on/succeeded in injuring the other dog."
- Yes, however I have witnessed dogs owners who dogs have 'Fought' (varying degrees of dog behaviours, not always an actual fight) get into physical fights themselves. People get protective over their dog, it's like a loved on. And I do agree exchanging information is needed.
- I think it's important for owners to be responsible during an incident. It needs to be up to the involved parties whether enforcement officers should be included. If necessary, then yes, the owner needs to be present for the consequences.
- too many times the owner of a dog that bites leaves immediately and there is no prosecution.
- This is important in case of additional expenses to the victim. Same as vehicle accidents in my opinion.
- If there's a victim, whether dog, kid, cat etc. Then you stay at the scene of the crime, just like a car accident.
- that rule applies in ever aspect of life ,, leave name and number and submit report pertaining to the incident ,,
- medical attention may be needed for the person/animal, and if bitten rabies is a possibility and should be treated for within the animal. As well, it's dangerous and irresponsible to leave
- If the dog was to bite a person, that is the owners responsibility and should be sharing information for the next step, just as you would a car accident etc.
- They should definitely stay and exchange information if blood is drawn. If not severe, then a report should be made (information exchanged but you do not have to stay until enforcement arrives)
- A person should be responsible for the actions of their pet especially if it causes injury. Similar to vehicle accidents.
- Of course they should be accountable for their animal. If one of my dogs were to bite another dog, I would want to be sure that dog received the proper care, and that I would hopefully be required to get the needed training for my pup and myself by the enforcement officer.
- This is a responsibility of being a dog owner.
- It's like any incident that occurs when injuries are involved, all parties should talk to the authorities
- Getting both sides of the story and accountability are important, same as a car accident.
- My dog was bit by a dog that was with a dog walker. I forced the issue for her to have the dogs owner call me so they could be informed, but if I didn't they would never have known.
- This is assault and since the dog cannot take responsibility for its behaviour, the owner must. The public must be protected from a bite occurring again.
- If a responsible owner has a dog that bites, they will stay. If not, they will flee the scene

- You can hear both sides of the story. I would also like to see this with small dogs. Every bite, big or small, needs to be documented
- Accountability should be required in all aspects. Owning a dog does not make you special or put you above the law.
- Own up
- I feel like regardless of the breed the dog's behavior is owner's responsibility. If dog bites someone, it's not because of the breed, but because of the poor training, and owner should give up his/hers info and take responsibility
- The owner should be responsible for their pet hurting people or other animals. That responsibility should include sharing information and explaining the situation to enforcement officers.
- It's called being a responsible person
- No more runaways
- Because most of the time it's the little dogs that have the problem.
- My dogs have been bitten in off leash areas with owners scuttling off before I can get contact info. It is unlikely that such a rule would change this behaviour but there may be firmer consequences if you can determine who the owner is
- We need to make owners accountable for their animals, people says pets are family then have your family member abide by the laws.
- The dog's owner needs to provide information to victim but shouldn't necessarily have to wait for an officer. Depends on the severity of the attack.
- The person should be held accountable for the attack, it is easier to do this if the owner converses with an enforcement officer. However, if the dog was defending itself and/or owner against a perceived or actual threat the owner and dog should not be charged.
- I believe if the bite is bad enough information should be exchanged and people should be held accountable
- "Within reason. (On leash, separate from other dogs.)
- I believe that not everyone takes accountability for their/their pets actions. I believe there are TWO sides to every story."
- behaving in an accountable way for your animals behavior is something I feel and think that responsible pet owners should have to do.
- The owner should be responsible for how the dog reacted.
- It's responsible ownership
- Responsibility and accountability
- They should be able to explain if the animal was provoked.
- Qualified yes as long as animal in control.
- Dependent on there being an injury. Also, both parties must be able to safely stay in the space and have their animals under control.
- Yes but only if they can calm their dog down enough to stay.

- Because often once the offending animal and its owner leave the scene the victim or victim owner are left to handle things including vet costs. The offending owner isn't held accountable. Should be treated like a hit and run
- People take their dog biting other people and animals not seriously at all
- Owner shares responsibility for assaultive behavior
- My dog who is a bully breed was bit by another dog and they took off. Again, the fact this survey shows bias is totally unacceptable and also creates fear and outcome that are bias and emotionally based.
- That is key to responsible pet ownership.
- It's just like getting in a car accident. You are responsible for what happened.
- if a dog bites then yes
- Owner should take responsibility of their pet
- I think owners need to take accountability for any actions their animal has
- People should take responsibility for their pets.
- It is important to obtain vaccination information from the owner.
- Like a car accident.
- People yes, Dogs no. To many people have their dogs off leash where they shouldn't. If their animal gets hurt in those circumstances with any breed, it should be their responsibility.
- It is the dog owner's responsibility to ensure their dog is safe. The least they can do is share information and talk to the by-law officer.
- Depending on how severe.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- If your dog injures any living creature the OWNER should be held responsible for poor dog training.
- So all parties involved can report what happened and have their information taken for future reference if needing follow up. In case medical services are needed for citizens and/or animals.
- Vicious Dogs will continue to bite and harm other animals and humans. Best to take information for next steps regarding what to do with the dogs.
- Pet owners take on the responsibility of their pet and their pet's action when they buy/adopt a dog. This should include dealing with the consequences if your dog bites someone or another animal.
- It's common courtesy.
- Much like a car accident people need to stay and exchange information for future vet bills, any charges etc
- Too many people don't take responsibility if their dog is involved in an altercation whether their dog is the aggressor or not.
- Yes, in cases of serious bites. If no injury is felt or visible, this is unnecessary.
- I believe ANY bite will cause physical or psychological damage to the victim and the owner must do their duty in being a responsible owner to stay at the scene and make sure the other person is okay. I believe there should be the same process as when a parked or unattended vehicle is damaged, the person responsible should stay at the scene or leave a note in that situation, and the same framework of decision should be the same.

- If the dog bites somebody or something the owner should stay at scene
- It is their responsibility for their dog not being trained.
- Dog owners are responsible for pets.
- It's like cars, it makes sense to have the owner there if your dog bites another creature.
- Any dog of any size who bites someone, the owner should stay at the scene.
- It's almost always poor dog ownership that is the issue, not the dog. There are too many repeat cases because the owners do not get properly educated or reprimanded
- "Dog bites are serious and can be traumatic for the victim.
- There needs to be more accountability for dog owners"
- Somebody's dog biting somebody else should be considered a form of assault attributable to the owner, they should have to stay the same way in a car accident you can't flee the scene.
- Same as a car accident. Cooperation with any investigation is required
- Owner is responsible for dog-information should be exchanged but it is unnecessary to stay at the scene when the dog is obviously agitated. Would be best to leave with the dog ASAP.
- Yes
- That would be the respectable act to follow
- Any witness should be required to give a statement
- It's important to have the info of the dog not just for reprimanding but what if the dog has a disease, these things should be known
- If a dog bites regardless of breed the owner should treat it like a car accident and talk about what happened and what caused the dog to attack, a lot of cases the dogs are provoked by other parties that lead up to the attack
- Action should always be taken for these events.
- How else do you enforce this?
- They can't get away with it and leave
- Of course, just like an accident. It is the responsible thing to do
- They have to provide contact details for follow up
- They should be held accountable for the behaviour of their dog
- Of course the owner of the dog should remain after a bite. Ridiculous that this isn't already a bylaw.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their animals & for the injuries they may cause.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their pet's behaviour.
- If an incident occurs, it should be properly documented.
- "Yes it is the same as a car accident.
- If animals are treated as one's property in the eye of the law then the owner is responsible for any damages caused by the aggressive dog."
- Yes, for any dog. Not JUST bully breeds.
- No explanation needed.

- The owner should take responsibility if the dog is at fault. But if the non owner is at fault it should still be explained why
- Common sense... unless of course person or animal is transported to a hospital, in which case leaving information should be considered
- It makes sense. We'd expect the same level of action in the case of a car accident (the sharing of information) to help resolve the issue.
- Both owners should be present to properly assess what caused the incident. My primary concern is related to responsible owners with larger dogs/pit bulls being unfairly blamed for a potential bite situations caused by another irresponsible owners dog acting aggressively. If a leashed pit bull reacts to an aggressive Yorkie that runs up to it off-leash, should the pit bull be at fault?
- This would help track the animal and owner.
- Owners must be responsible for their dogs.
- Humans who own dogs are responsible for the dog's behaviour and for their own negligence and failure to control their animal. Humans need to face much more consistent punishment for being a root cause of poor animal behaviour.
- The owner is the one responsible if their dog bites & should be held accountable.
- Owners need to be held accountable, this should be a given.
- This would make it easier for information sharing amongst everyone involved.
- If the dog can be safely restrained and apprehended while awaiting for an enforcement officer to show up. If it cannot be, it may be best to flow up with contact information or meeting at a different place.
- You shouldn't leave when an animal or person is hurt.
- Too many people flee the scene of the crime leaving the injured without compensation or even knowledge that thr animal has had proper vaccinstitutions.
- The fact this is not already law is ludicrous. This should be a hefty fine that is staggered by your income level.
- The owner of the Attack dog should be required to pay for all the vet fees required by the dog(s) it injured from the attack.
- It would depend upon the severity of the bite against another animal, if blood is drawn then they should have to wait. Attacks on humans should have to wait no matter
- my dog was bit at the dog park and the couple grabbed their dog and left. My wife was alone and didn't know what to do. Now my dog does not like other dogs so we can't go to the dog park anymore
- To show papers that support the dog has had their shots and to do the right thing
- Nothing should ever be harmed and then ignored. It's your responsibility just as it would be when you hit a parked vehicle.
- In the case that the animal bites an individual causing great bodily harm, owner should remain as a safe distance from victim while waiting for officer involvement in a safe and visible location when necessary
- The owner should be held accountable

- How is this not already a bylaw?!
- Again, ensure officer is taking statements from both parties.
- Documentation of incident from all parties involved must be recorded at the time and place of incident. I have had my dog attacked at an off leash park by another dog and the owner fled, with no responsibility nor repercussions.
- Makes sense to take responsibility
- The owner of the animal should be responsible and must stay at the scene
- A dog is just a dog. The owner needs to be accountable.
- Why are you singling out pit bulls if they are not responsible for more bits!!
- That would be a good idea
- Like a collision. Makes sense to me.
- Often times at Vet Clinics the owners say that they have an agreement that the offending party will pay for the vet bill. However 9 times out of 10 the offending party is never heard from, and these owners have no choice but to pay for the injuries received from another dog. I believe having formal police records of this agreement will make it more binding and hold people to their word more effectively. Or at least be able to work out a fair solution.
- Just like a car accident. If there is an accident. Exchange info.
- leads to more responsible pet ownership, and fines for lack of training.
- Owners should be held accountable for a dogs actions and placing them in a situation they could cause harm if they know their dog is aggressive
- Should own up to their animal doing harm. Also should be able to provide records of shots so there is not unnecessary boosters given to the person being bit
- Must give contact info/ show id to victim. Bylaw will follow up. I have no faith bylaw will show up in a reasonable time.
- People need to take responsibility for the costs and trauma their dogs cause.
- If it's a actual bite with significant damage you should have to stay on scene. But not for someone crying wolf if the dog does not have a real wound.
- Dog owners must take full responsibility for the actions of their dogs. If their dog bites another dog or a person, they need to pay the costs for treatment of the bite, and they must share all of their contact information in order to be held accountable.
- Follow up information will always be required.
- Owner of the dog who bit should be responsible to pay for the other dog's vet bill pertaining to the bite.
- The dog owner must take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- The owner should be held accountable
- Be a responsible pet owner
- I think its important both sides can speak. Many times dogs are provoked, or strangers do not heed warnings about dogs that are not good with strangers etc.
- The owner needs to be held responsible

- In case any follow up is required. I think if the owner leaves it is like a hit and run accident.
- People need to take responsibility for when their dog causes damage to anything.
- I think the owner should be held responsible over any medical bills, but no euthanasia whatsoever.
- It's personal responsibility. If my dog causes an altercation, it's only right that I should remain at the scene to both support the accusations and/or defend against the accusations, if need be. If a person should flee the site of an altercation, that person should be heavily fined and automatically found guilty of what they are being accused. Innocent people don't flee.
- Like if you hit and run, why would you leave after injuring someone
- There should be accountability for these actions and fines if the scene is fled.
- As a responsible pet owner it should be their commitment to their beloved pet to explain why the event happened (dog was tormented) if applicable, and concern for the victim.
- Just like a car accident, the owner needs to stay on the scene until arrangements are made, if not they should be fined.
- I believe and have seen dog owners leave after a bite and I believe a fine should be imposed if they leave such as with a hit and run
- Vet and medical costs should be covered. Vaccinations records are needed.
- They are responsible for the actions of their pet and need to discuss all consequences with law enforcement
- "Dog bites can result in expensive vet bills that is unfair for the victim to have to pay.
- Should also have a record of aggressive dogs in case of repeat offenses."
- The dog owner is responsible for controlling and training their animal. An animal doesn't know as well as humans do, and could be acting out for various uncontrollable reasons. Owners who have animals that are aggressive should act and be responsible for the proper care and training as well as any incidents. This ensures the victim is compensated.
- No matter the damage caused at the time, there could be internal damage that goes unnoticed at the time.
- Too often the owner flees because they know they are at fault
- Of course. A dog owner is responsible for the actions of their pet at ALL times.
- Owners need to be accountable for their dog's actions. This can only happen if the investigating officer can contact them. All dog owners should be held to this standard. However, the owner needs to be held accountable, targeting specific breeds is not effective and unfairly penalizes responsible dog owners.
- Look at the owner before you look at the dog.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their dogs behavior.
- My dog has been run at and nearly hurt by a few dogs in my area. I would the owners to have to share their information to pass onto the city like any crime. They may be more careful or train their dogs then.
- This is logical, you would be expected to do the same in the case of a car accident.
- the owner needs to be accountable however if there is no way to secure the dog that is acting out and there is a danger, the situation should be followed up at the residence.

- Taking responsibility is a must if an animal is thought to be aggressive then the owner is the problem
- Everyone should remain at the scene of any accident
- Any responsible dog owner would take responsibility for the actions of their pet. They would also have the opportunity to shed light on the situation from all sides
- I support it but more information is required on how you suggest this would be followed up if the person fled
- Or they could phone 311 from the scene to report the incident and provide contact details that way. Dog bites should be documented and documentation should be tied to both the dog and the owner.
- If your dog caused harm, the owner needs to take FULL responsibility. The dog should NOT be punished, but instead make training mandatory.
- Punitive measures are not the point, however support for both victim and offender are necessary to improve socialization in the future
- Just like any altercation with people or vehicle accident all parties should be available to speak with law enforcement and take responsibility for the action that has occurred.
- It makes logical sense
- People are responsible for the actions of their pets. They should either be there to defend that their pet was provoked into attack or they should take responsibility for the poor training and socialization of the animal.
- Shouldn't leave the location of an incident
- That's the only way to ensure that both sides of the story are shared and that the owner takes responsibility for their dog's behaviour.
- Information should be exchanged but the owner of the animal should get the chance to remove it from the situation as to not aggravate it (take the dog to a car or home quickly) then return.
- It is ethical to ensure that all parties are contacted, involved, and informed with extent of injury and next steps.
- Yes as it's their responsibility. But also in some situations other people's dogs are the blame
- Causing injury to person, and/or property needs to be reviewed. Review and discussion are difficult if there is no bylaw put in place to discourage those who leave without permission/exchange of information.
- If a dog bites an animal or person and draws blood, the owner should be responsible for costs associated to the injury.
- I have had my dogs who are pitbulls bitten by other dogs who are the aggressors, and their owner high tails it out of there and I'm left with an expensive vet bill for my dog and they ran free with no consequence
- Just like a car accident, you were involved where someone was injured and you should be responsible for making sure everything is ok and bylaw officers or police as the case may be, can get the information needed
- Dog owners need to take full legal & financial responsibility if their dog damages another dog or person.

- The owner should be the one at fault, not the animal. If the animal bites or causes harm, it's clearly because that animal was not trained properly and or needs more training.
- Yes. If another persons dog regardless of breed leaves area they should be faced with large fines
- Just like leaving the scene of an accident, pet owners should also be held accountable and stay. Many leave for fear something will happen to their dog.
- Having the owners present is important for obtaining information.
- Yes, they should remain at the scene, as should the person who was bitten (or their parents/guardians). There are two sides to every story and at the bare minimum both parties should have contact information if an incident did occur.
- People need to be responsible and accountable for ANY pet they own
- I think everyone involved should feel supported and cared for - and this would be a way for that to happen.
- Having a dog is like having a child. If someone hurt your child would you let them just walk away without information?
- there are issues with dog owners leaving and the victim getting left behind with a vet bill. however this is an issue with ALL breeds not limited to pit bulls.
- If a dog bites an individual the owner is responsible for that pet
- Only if necessary. It depends on the situation and severity of the bite.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their dog but people also need to be held responsible for their own actions. Yes dogs can be aggressive, but people can also act inappropriately towards dogs. It is important for both parties to remain on scene in order to give statements and if possible have witness's remain on scene to help corroborate the incident.
- As mentioned above, a dog is a reflection of the owner. If the dog bites a human or animal, the owner is responsible.
- because you don't know what the dog might have and to get the proper care by a health professional is best
- The owner is ultimately responsible for vet bills if another animal is injured. Plus its just common courtesy.
- To explain the situation.
- It's like a car accident
- There should be an exchange of information and any witness statements of what happened too.
- I have friends where the dog and owner have run after biting another dog
- To provide information on temperament of the dog and actions leading up to the incident
- Ultimately the dog owner is responsible
- No
- It's the same as getting into a car accident so the owner should stay and exchange information.
- It's like hit and run laws
- The owner needs to be a responsible party and give information such as vaccine history, address, phone # etc.

- A dog bite can be serious and a dog owner should be responsible for their pet
- Too often victims are in shock and the owner is anxious to move on. It becomes a missed opportunity to document an aggressive encounter
- Why does this need explanation? Of course they should stay & exchange info; just like if you were in a car accident.
- Yes, however each party should be able to temporarily leave the immediate area in order to put their dog in their vehicle etc.
- Too much "pit & run" nonsense. If a person is going to have a nuisance dog, they should have all the consequences of their choice.
- Allows the owner to give their side of the story as sometimes a dog may react to negative action against it or its owner resulting in a bite.
- I view this the same as a motor accident. All information should be exchanged and if necessary all parties should wait for law enforcement.
- I've been in an incident like this, and have been bitten on the face by a dog. We exchanged information but I wasn't going to do anything. They called an officer to report our dog. So now I wish I had stayed there and waited for someone. I think it's important for other people to do the same.
- Yes. The dog is the owner's responsibility. Both parties should remain present.
- I think an enforcement officer should be there in order to determine how bad the bite is. Some people will play up injuries, or proceedings in order to get money out of the dog owner.
- It is part of accepting responsibility for an animal that you also accept responsibility for its behaviour.
- Provided their dog is now under control. If two people present leave one person while the other removes their dog. If only one, remove dog to vehicle or house and return to the scene if dog cannot be under control on scene.
- Owners of a dog that has attacked another should be liable for vet bills.
- Dogs are not inherently bad - owners have responsibility in training that dog. Applications should be sent to those who want dogs prone to aggression. If the OWNER does not qualify then they should not be allowed to buy or adopt a dog prone to aggressions.
- Like a vehicle accident, the dog owner should be accountable for the dog bite and any harm or damages it may have caused.
- You can't leave if you hit someone in your car, you shouldn't be able to leave if your dog bites someone.
- Yes, this allows the matter to be dealt with. If however the owner leaves the scene it should be considered a crime. Just like a hit and run.
- This provides protection for a responsible individual or dog owner if they or their dog are attacked by an aggressive dog. The responsibility and financial burden should fall on the irresponsible owner.
- People need to be accountable for their pets. As a responsible owner it should be assumed that you'll stay on-site.
- "I would say that dogs do not actually attack without a reason. It must be either the owner's or the victim's problem or both.

- An enforcement officer can take the words from both sides in this case if the owner also to remain at the scene of an incident - and it will be fair to both the dog and it's owner, and the victim(s)."
- Similar to requirements for vehicular collisions
- So they can explain the situation to authorities so that the "victim" can't twist to story in their favor.
- The dog owner has to take responsibility for the dogs actions and submit relevant information.
- If it's your dog, you should be held accountable for the dogs actions
- This is important information for liability
- "Yes. Absolutely yes!
- If a vet is needed the owner or the dog who caused the injuries needs to pay for All costs the other dog (and their own) requires"
- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions. Need to confirm with the owner if the dog has it's vaccines ie. rabies
- Not all cases of dog bites are the result of a nuisance animal. All parties should remain on scene and all sides should provide a statement, as is the case in any accident or assault case. Dogs may be reacting out of fear or in an attempt to protect their owner from an assault. This should always be taken into account.
- It's a good way to understand the whole situation that led to the bite. You are not basing fines off a one sided story.
- If you hit someone with your car you have to stay on scene. If your dog bites someone same rules should apply.
- Yes because its similar to a car accident and dog owners should be held accountable.
- Most times it is the owner who needs the training. Having the ability to assess how the owner behaves with their dog is important in determining next steps
- A pet is a person's property and responsibility. If that pet injures someone or someone else's pet, they need to be held accountable if it was due to their own negligence.
- Too many people, especially those with attacking pit bulls, tend to leave the scene of an attack to avoid having to pay medical bills (either to a human victim or pet victim) and to avoid having their dog taken away and euthanized. Often, they get away with this.
- Only if injury occurs. Owners should have to exchange information in case medical/vet bills are incurred.
- Treat it like a car crash
- So long as the dog can be placed in a vehicle or separate area. So the dog may not do this again. It could also help access the total story, if the dog was defending itself or other extenuating circumstances.
- This is logical to me not to leave the scene of a crime.
- To share contact information. They should not need to remain at the scene of contact information is shared anything further can be dealt with at another time, as is with "fender bender" incidents
- The owner needs to be held accountable, period.
- Victims should have an opportunity to safely consider their options.

- If it is a scrape or a very minor injury there should be no reason to peruse any further if it is a serious injury the owner needs to be help responsible for that
- Of course they should be required to stay in scene, it reduces the investigation needed to track down the dog and owner.
- All those involved should remain, to ensure due process and safety of all involved.
- My uncle was bitten by 2 dogs and the owner fled the scene with the dogs and he only found out who owned the after he got a bone infection,
- A dog owner should be held responsible if their dog bites another animal or human and should remain at the scene with their animal.
- They should be held accountable
- In personal experience, I have been bitten as a result of something the dogs owner was at fault for, not the dog. Explaining your experience of what occurred may result in finding the owner at risk, not the dog. Most dogs exhibit behavior problems relating to how they are treated. I would like that to be taken into consideration instead of just blaming the breed.
- Always stay on scene to pay bills that your dog has caused
- You never know the kind of damage done to the other individual so It's important the dog owner stays and takes responsibility for their dogs actions
- If you can't be responsible enough to follow through if your dog bites then you are not responsible enough to own a dog.
- Everyone should stay on scene, like for an MVA, until the matter is documented and reported.
- Dog owners should take responsibility for their pets actions.
- This is required, if violated they get charged bwith fleeing the scene. We need to accurately record nuisance dogs
- It's just like a hit and run and should be treated the same. If the owner fleas they should be punished at a higher degree but if they stay, as long as they have placed their dog in a safe space away from people and animals like in a car for example.
- Owners to be responsible for dog's actions and subsequent consequences
- Because obviously.
- Breed isn't an issue I have two large breed labelled dogs and both are registered canine good citizens - focus on responsible ownership please not breed bans
- I think that is just what every responsible owner should do now..
- Responsible pet owners should be doing this. But it's the irresponsible owners who are not following bylaws and general dog protocols.
- Yes 100%. They need to be held accountable and be required for obedience training.
- Hold them accountable and be traceable
- They need to be held responsible for their dogs actions and ensure safety of others by being a responsible dog owner.
- there may be associated costs as a result of an incident - the pet owner may be held liable for some of those costs - his/her information is required for this.

- Same as a car accident, if someone is injured the person responsible should have to stay
- It would give the dog a voice to be heard. A lot of 'bites' and 'dog attacks' are provoked and not treated correctly.
- Dogs are property in the eyes of the law. Up to the owner to maintain safety with their dog. No different than being in an accident and leaving the scene. Dog owner should be responsible for the cost of the dispatch of emergency services, hence the need for a large liability policy and to cover costs for the victims.
- It is important to hold pet owners responsible for their pets and having something in place to protect the public and their animals is something I support.
- There should be no reason to leave. Far too many people leave the scene when their dog bites and the victim of the attack is left with vet bills. People need to take responsibility
- When a dog bite/attack occurs, the owner should be considered as liable as the dog. It is important that owners are also involved in the process of justice so that they do not encourage negative behaviors (jumping, biting) in the future. There aren't any bad dogs-- only bad owners.
- It makes sense, just like if there was a car accident.
- It's no different than a vehicle accident. Bite and run is just as bad as a hit and run
- PUNISH THE BAD OWNER NOT THE DOG
- so both parties involved can explain what happened
- Because it's the right thing to do.
- While I support the concept of this I believe the execution of it would be cumbersome. If a person leaves the scene, what realistic recourse is there? I will say this here because it appears I have nowhere else to offer any other final comments: the problem isn't nuisance or vicious dogs. The problem is the people that own them. Solve the problem of nuisance people having access to and purchasing dogs, regardless of the breed, and you won't have nuisance and vicious dogs. And for god's sake let go of this "pitbulls are scary and dangerous" mantra, it's old, boring, and not the 80's. What's next a rebirth of satanic panic? ALL DOGS have the potential to be scary and dangerous. 9/10 a scary and dangerous dog is scary and dangerous because of a human being. We are the problem. Dogs are not the problem. Let me say this one last time: dogs are not the problem!
- People should be responsible for their pets. The person bit should also be required to stay along with witnesses. Sometimes the person bit is at fault for treating a dog poorly. That is bit the dog's fault if they bite after being hit or teased. Everyone should be accountable
- I think that there are far too many dog walkers and dog sitters that are taking their clients to off-leash parks without knowing about the dog's temperament. In this case I think it should be classified as negligence on the dog walker AND on the owner for not taking appropriate precautions or giving adequate instruction. However, I don't think that this should be limited to breed.
- Our dog was bitten, and the other owner took off leaving me with a $160 vet bill.
- If my dog were to cause any kind of harm I would hold myself to this standard. Vet bills can be expensive and it should be clear who is going to be covering what.
- This seems logical to me. If you're in a car accident you must remain on scene to exchange your information with the other person and with CPS.

- Yes it is important to get both sides of the story and both perspectives.
- if a hit and run is a crime, instead of talking to the other vehicle owner, then a "bite/attack and run" should follow the same guideline.
- You are responsible for your animal and should be responsible for the repercussions as well
- In case anyone has been hurt the dog owner should be liable and NOT the animal. The animal should have to go to training and taught to not bite or attack. It is the owners fault and not the dogs
- If your dog bites, you are responsible for it
- It is the owners responsibility to train a dog properly. If a dog bites it is the owners fault, if a dog is aggressive it is the owners fault. The owner shall take responsibility of the dogs actions. I believe if owners aren't equipped to train a dog properly they should be stripped of the right to own such an animal
- I think if someone could also be fined for leaving an incident then it would act as a deterrent for leaving the scene.
- This is important as it holds people accountable.
- There needs to be more emphasis placed on the responsibility of the owner. EX: If the dog is known to be reactive and they still bring them to the dog part it is not the dogs fault for it's response. Also there needs to be collateral on whether this has happened before or if it was a one off poor interaction, or even caused by harmful behavior by the individual that was bit.
- If safe to do so. How else would the incident be dealt with? Info needs to be exchanged.
- So everyone has necessarily info.
- Unless it is not safe to do so (e.g. they need to remove their dog from the scene and then return)
- Of course the owner should stay at the scene.
- Both parties need to stay at the scene to ensure accurate information is translated to the enforcement officer.
- Yes, I do. I have read/heard many stories about how the dog's pet parent take the biting dog and run. I also think the city should also talk about little dogs. As quite often little dogs are instigators and they get away with bad behaviour cause they are little. Pet parents should be held responsible even if the bite is small cause it came from a little dog. I live across the street from a pitbull. It is the sweetest dog that I have ever met. I know how some of my neighbours react to that dog just because it is a pitbull. I think we should judge each dog on their own merit and not just because of the breed. The only dogs that have ever bit me were a miniature poodle and a golden retriever.
- This would ensure that the owner and dog are identified so that accountability is ensured, and proper training of the owner and dog can be recommended to prevent future instances.
- If the dog bites a person they should make sure the person is ok, it's human decency.
- Hold the owner accountable. If my kid punched another kid in the face, I'd expect any parent to wait to speak to enforcement and not run away. The owner needs to be enforced to take responsibility and train their dog properly
- it lets the owner and officer communicate properly and allow for a proper solution

- If your dog bites someone then you should have to answer for it. Although I can see it being avoided. I can easily claim someone's dog has bitten me and if that person leaves they are fleeing the scene of a crime.
- Allows for both parties to provide information at the time of the incident
- An incident meaning there was injury or negligence. Dogs attacking is a non-issue in the owners can control their dogs within the situation.
- Only in cases where the other person or dog become injured
- If the dog bites another person or animal, it's the owners responsibility to cooperate in any way possible
- The responsibility should fall on the owner of the dog as well as the person who was bitten because they may have provoked the attack.
- It's important to take responsibility.
- This is an incident that requires investigation and as such statements need to be taken.
- Except in cases where the person needs to remove the animal to reduce the risk of further injury, or in the cases where the person needs to leave to find medical care.
- If a dog has bit someone, it is the responsibility of the owner to stay on scene. Always. Regardless of breed.
- It should be like remaining at the scene of an accident.
- To provide vaccination information etc
- If there is no bylaw that requires this, I think people feel they can just walk away with no consequence.
- It is the part of a responsible pet owner to accept responsibility for actions done. However, if there was no actual damage they should be able to leave.
- It's their obligation to remain onsite and exchange information just as it would for any accident.
- It's responsible for owner whose property (ie dog) causes damage to people or other property.
- This should apply regardless of the size of dog, an owner should be held accountable even if it's a 'cute toy breed' that bit a child. Simply because they don't have the jaw strength doesn't mean they should be any less liable.
- It isn't always obvious why a dog has bit someone. Often a dog is taunted by the person. The whole story needs to be heard.
- This just make sense, kind of like remaining at the scene of an accident. If a dog bites someone or causes injury to another dog they should be responsible financially.
- Owners should take responsibility for their animals behaviour.
- Only upon request of the victim or owner of victim animal
- Both sides of the story are important, but exceptions must be made if the dog needs time to be at home to settle down.
- This just seems logical
- Similar to hit and run. All parties need to remain at the scene to give statements.

- It's a serious event if a dog becomes that unruly. If both parties can mutually work it out that would be a consideration.
- Have heard of several dogs biting people and owners fleeing the scene
- I work at a vet hospital and numerous times clients say that the people just take off and they cant get ahold of their contact info or rabies information.
- Its like a hit and run accident they should be fined or jailed just like in hit and run incidents
- Pet ownership cannot be taken lightly. An owner may not be identified if they leave the scene
- It's important to keep everyone in the same place, but the dog should be farther away from this person, so it doesn't attack again.
- Often people skitter off quickly to avoid penalty. More penalty could be added if a person hasn't got the moral ability to accept responsibly.
- It's respect. Just like a car accident.
- I have had an owner refuse to pay for the damage their dog has done to mine so would like more enforcement to get vet bills paid
- Just like a car accident, need to stay around to exchange and assess damages or health risks.
- A dog bite is the responsibility of the animal who is guilty. They need to stay so they can pay if there are vet or medical bills involved.
- Pitbulls are not the problem. Owners who do not train them are!
- Should be treated like a car ACCIDENT .
- If a dog bites a person or other animal the owner should be accountable for their dog's behavior but also given the right to discuss their version of events and what led to the attack.
- If your dog bites me or my dog , you will pay my vet bill. If this is the first time a dog has bit a person whatever I have free coverage through alberta health but my dog doesn't. So they should pay the vet fee
- They are responsible for their dog and what it does.
- "the owner of any animal regardless of breed or species should be held directly liable for the actions and behaviour of said animal.
- Animals should have the same rights as small children."
- Many people get away without having to pay for the consequences of attacks and this needs to be addressed!
- Only makes sense to stay in scene and report all information about the dog from the pet owner.
- Accidents happen. Taking responsibility for an incident is part of responsible pet ownership. HOWEVER, there are dogs that ignore viable cues from other dogs and in the end are bit. The dog that did the biting may not be at fault. An owner who allows their dog to torment another to the point where the biter has no other method of communication is more culpable if a bite occurs. There are far too many instances where pet owners are responsible for ignoring the escalating signs.
- The owner should be allowed to secure their dog in a safe, nearby location to avoid further conflict. The owner should stay available near the scene to provide any needed information.
- Your dog is under your care, you should take as much responsibility that is reasonable.

- It may be a repeat offender
- A responsible dog owner should welcome resolving the issue and cooperating.
- You don't have aggressive breeds of dogs. You have IRRESPONSIBLE OWNERS who don't know how to train/treat dogs properly. Depending on the situation, owners should be heavily fined. Start a file at the very least and/or investigate a designated "nuisance" dog -- on the owners. Start a file on the pet owners when a complaint is submitted to see trends easily especially if owners will have a history of complaints.
- It should be viewed as an assault.
- Because I feel like if it happens once then it may happen again and it would be better to have past records kept on the owner and dog so they can keep track of it and also assess them in person right after the incident.
- Take responsibility for your dog.
- "The owners body language and the way they are holding the dog needs to be seen. As in remorse.
- If the the dog was on leash and provoked by someone."
- When my dog was bitten, she needed multiple stitches. We have insurance, but that doesn't cover everything. If another dog bites my dog unprovoked, that is on the other person and they should pay for damage of property. Assuming the law that my pets are my property is still valid.
- Yes because they often run away in these situations
- This is only common sense!! If they leave the scene, they should be charged like a hit & run
- Owners need to be accountable for their pets actions and not leave the scene
- This is like driving a car you own and people own dogs so you should have to stay and exchange information
- It's obviously proper pet ownership.
- pets are family members and people need to be held accountable
- Yes, if the other party deems it necessary
- If a dog bites and causes harm to another animal/person, they should share their contact information so that a follow up can be done. I'm not sure they should be required to stay at the scene of an incident, however, as that may make the whole situation worse if the dog is being aggressive and/or out of control. If contact information is shared the owner should take the dog home and away from other animals/people.
- How would the city enforce those items listed in section 3, especially around dog bites
- I believe that this protects both the dog owner, dog and victim. I think it's important to have law enforcement have a verified copy of the facts incase civil lawsuits ensue.
- it's our responsibility as dog owners to own up and be present to protect both other animals and our own. If your dog bites another dog or human, it is your responsibility to be present and not flee the scene.
- Dog bites are caused by bad ownership so it would be a key factor for the owner to remain at the for officials to determine what happened

- That would be ideal but I can't see how a victim would be able to force the offending dog owner to remain at the scene
- This can give you insight to the handling of the dog and then the proper steps can be taken to better the situation.
- Similar to a hit and run.
- I have been through traumatic attacks against my dog. It's a chaotic situation and not knowing what to do adds to the stress. An established process that was communicated to all owners would be very helpful.
- Any dog can be aggressive. Just like any accident involving people they must stay on scene. Also people are legally not supposed to be judged separately for their ethnicity this should be the same for our local animals. Every dog big or small she be treated the same.
- Dog bites to humans or other animals should be treated like car accidents. Exchange of information along with a bylaw or enforcement written report.
- A dog who bites human should be put down. Period. Owning a dog is a privilege not a right
- All animals deserve the same love and care as a human or a CAR
- How about you stop breed discrimination and start applying your [removed] laws and suggestions to every other breed that attacks people and dogs frequently. This is absurd and you are all disgusting for suggesting these laws. 31 years I have lived here and over my dead body will I muzzle my dog for you inept morons. Start fining people whose dogs initiate the attack!
- Absolutely! That's common sense of being a responsible pet owner.
- Owners should be accountable for their animals, regardless of breed.
- Owner must take responsibility for their pet
- I think this should apply to Dogs that come up to people barking and/or showing aggressive behavior.
- I believe taking ownership for your dogs actions is part of being a responsible dog owner.
- It is similar to an accident scene. You need both parties for a full account.
- As with the scene of an accident, all involved parties should be required to remain at the scene.
- it is the responsibility of an owner to train their dog and must be present for anything that may happen.
- Yes, dog owner's are 100% responsible for their dog's behavior. Incidents need to be documented to show if there is a consistent behavior.
- It is important for the person whose dog caused the issue to be there as they are at fault.
- If you get into a collision in your car you must remain at the scene, same should apply for dog bites/similar incidents
- THERE ARE ALWAYS 2 SIDES TO EVERY STORY AND STAYING TO GIVE YOUR PERSPECTIVE IS THE RESPONSIBLE ACTION.
- Dog owners should be responsible for their pets
- Accountability. It depends on the severity of the attack.
- That is part of the responsibility of dog ownership

- I've had to follow people back to their car to get their license number after an incident in the offleash park, most people will just grab their aggressive dog and run to avoid fines or worse.
- It is our responsibility as dog owners to stay at the scene until contact information is exchanged if there was a situation where there was an attack.
- Dog is owners responsibility. Owner should be held accountable.
- Like a accident stay at the scene
- The owner is responsible for their animal and must act as such, including owning up to incidents.
- Or information needs to be shared between both parties
- That is part of the responsibility of owning a dog
- The owner of that dog is responsible for how that dog acts. If the dog is viciously attacking people or other animals I believe the owner needs to be held responsible. I have never known an animal that came from a loving family to ever attack someone.
- Too many owners of dogs that bite do not stick around to take accountability.
- They better be staying to give their information and should pay for any bills etc. If their dog did any damage to another animal or person
- Same as remaining in scene for a vehicular accident
- Yes IF it is safe to do so. The owner may need to get their dog back home or away from the scene to get it under control.
- This should be the same as a car accident. Fleeing the scene should be a punishable act.
- Common courtesy
- People should be responsible for their dogs
- Obviously don't leave if your pet attacks someone.
- Yes... there is a difference between a dog grabbing someone with its teeth if that someone was doing something the dog didn't like vs an actual bite.
- It can be difficult to track down those who are involved. If severe damage or lasting effects are determined AFTER the event, it would be beneficial to be able to talk to the owner of the aggressor dog (in case of infections, rabies, etc.).
- In the event of a dog, the owner should be required to stay and provide details.
- yes if an incident occurs. But alot of the time, careless owners are the main reason for issues, especially while "the aggressor" is in the middle of training in more public settings to be able to get used to have their owner in control all of the time, everything from recall training to simple obedience
- This would give a chance for the full story as a lot of the times a dog is provoked and it is not their fault
- This is no different than getting into a car accident and leaving the scene without giving your information.
- Not unlike a vehicle accident, the dog owner is responsible for their dog and should remain on scene until the incident is reported properly.
- Common responsibility
- This should be practiced already

- N/A
- Every situation is different the owner has the right to state what happened from their point of view. Would your car at the scene of a car accident? NOPE.
- This should include ALL DOGS, even tiny dogs that "can't do that much damage" this is not a breed specific problem.
- Seems like it should follow the same rules of a traffic collision. If an injury has occurred they should remain on the scene. Caveat: the offending animal needs to be removed from the situation.
- The owner is responsible for any damages the dog may cause, and if the person wants to press charges especially if there's severe injuries it is important that the dog owner is required to allow them to do so.
- You have to stay at a car crash for the same reason.
- If injury is caused by an animal it is the owners who needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions. If the person must stay at the scene of the incident there is more hope in that person getting the right guidance to help them and their dog to avoid further incidents.
- To ensure that the dog has had their shots and severity of bite.
- It's like a car accident. Share your info.
- This ensures that if the animal is an issue it is properly identified (not identified based off of what a witness thinks happened which can lead to improper reporting). Ensuring the owner speaks to an enforcement officer can lead to a more pro-active approach to rehabilitation of any aggressive behaviour, and if required proper fines which can be used to support further community-based and non-bias bylaw enforcement.
- How would you know information regarding the assault if the owner left?
- Owners are responsible for their dogs and must act as such.
- If the injury is to the point where law enforcement is required then yes they should remain on scene.
- All too often perpetrators flee the scene, causing so much trauma for the victims. And it is irresponsible.
- To often one owners side of the story is not enough.
- Yes of course, it's important both parties are heard
- Some dogs might be protective of their owner's which could play a factor in why some dog attack other dogs. If a dog attacks a human it might be due to body stance or if they make a sudden movement which will cause the dog to react aggressively.
- that way both sides of story are documented
- It's the responsible pet ownership
- Too often social media is used to track people down.
- That person or animal may require medical attention. This refers back to potentially requiring insurance for breeds with powerful jaws.
- I think it's important, as a pet owner, to take responsibility.
- The owner should have to share information, however medical attention for humans/animals must take priority, and so if the owner, the owners animal, or someone under the care of the owner is injured, they should be able to go receive immediate medical care and report to animal bylaw later

- Owners are responsible for their animal's behaviour. If their animal hurts someone the owner should do everything in their power to rectify the situation, which includes sharing information with the victim(s)
- ..
- Only if it is severe and requested by the effected party. Otherwise minor incidents shouldn't require that much process.
- It's important because if the dogs are dangerous then appropriate steps need to be followed and if these laws to enforce fines and harsher consequences come in to play then we need to be able to id the owners.
- Yes, especially if the other dog or person instigated the dog, didn't listen to the owners instructions to back off and stay away from their dog.
- The dog and owner should remain but targeting one dog breed over others with immensely strong jaws is ridiculous and pathetic. If pit bulls are on the list then German Sheppard and all other large breed dog should be as it's not the dog who is the problem it's the owner for not properly training and socializing the dog. Give your head a shake.
- People need to show responsibility for their pets, health concerns from bites need to be addressed without the owner running away.
- They need to be held accountable
- providing it is safe for the owner/dog to do so (ie: exception if the owner/dog are threatened by the victim or bystanders)
- Owners need to be accountable for the way their animal behaves in public. Should anything occur the owner needs to provide contact information, etc for follow up and fines.
- Beyond the obvious sharing of contact/vaccination information, there needs to be an opportunity to talk to both parties and to educate about typical dog behavior. The owner of a dog that bit someone maybe needs some information about socializing and training the dog; a person who got bit may benefit from follow-up counselling/education to help them be more dog-informed (so they can confidently/successfully interact with dogs in future).
- The dog owner is responsible. This is Kong different to a hit and run.
- To explain what happened.
- I feel it is the responsible thing to do
- This should help bad owners from running off and not being held accountable for how they deal with their pets
- So the owner can be held accountable and take necessary measures to correct
- Information should be given but the owner may need to take the dog away to a quiet place.
- The owner should be held responsible for the actions of their pet.
- My girlfriends mother was attacked with her dog at a park and the man left with the dog right away didn't even care if she was ok. Should be law, that upsets me he left and nothing was done
- the owner of the dog that bites another animal or person should be financially responsible and they should be providing vet records for their dog so that the injured party has all information necessary for care. By remaining at the scene there is a better chance the incident is reported properly to the city and appropriate follow up measures taken to prevent further incidents.

- I agree that they should stay on scene but if they need to remove the dog from the dangerous situation there should be an allowance for that.
- The owner is responsible for what their dog does as it is likely due to the negligence of the owner (inappropriate supervision, lack of proper training etc.) Similar to the scene of a car accident, the owner should be held responsible for any harm caused.
- There are no bad dogs just bad owners. To be a responsible dog owner you should stay at the scene
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions however no dog should be euthanized for these actions. They should receive support, training and rehabilitation.
- Share contact info for insurance. Not sure an officer is necessary.
- Just like a car crash, you stay and exchange contact info and call authorities as necessary.
- We should be responsible if we allow our animal into a situation in which it has the chance to bite
- Any person or animal that causes damage or injury should have to stay to share contact information.
- The dog is not to blame. The owner is and should be held responsible.
- It's a common courtesy to make sure the other person is alright
- Too many owners of aggressive dogs do not get held accountable after incidents. It is 100% their responsibility to pay for any damages caused.
- This is much like a vehicle accident. We need to make sure there's contact info and the pet is up to date on vaccinations.
- the need to be charged for not controlling the animal, it is bad owners not bad dogs that is the problem
- The owner is always responsible not the dog. Its all psychology. People need to learn about how to help their dogs and listen to them. Its the persons fault.
- I agree
- Treat it like a hit and run
- People need to be responsible for their animals behaviors and deals with the consequences.
- If a dog bites a person or animal, the dog's owner should be liable for vet/medical bills for the other dog/person.
- Information needs to be exchanged in case the bite becomes infected or requires a hospital trip/hospital bills.
- That's the best way to get a full incident story, collect data and ensure proper measures/training are carried out afterwards
- I think it is your responsibility to take ownership for the actions of your pet. Definitely including when they have harmed another dog or person.
- Not every bite is a result of aggression, many things factor in and having the owner explain the situation could help.
- If this is the dog that did the attacking then absolutely yes.

- Unless an enforcement officer is unavailable. Then they can call or visit the owner at a later time to avoid inconvenient wait times.
- Normal rational human beings would do this
- This rule would be essentially the same as a car accident. People are expected to stay, as they should if their dog is causing physical harm regardless of it being human or another dog.
- yes
- I view it similar to a car accident. Dog behaviour is 90% how they are trained and the rest is how other people interact with that dog. Fleeing an accident is illegal. Same should go for fleeing a scene where your dog as reacted to a person or situation poorly and bit someone.
- This should follow the same logic as if a person assaulted another person.
- If for some reason the person cannot stay at the scene, they would need to provide photo ID to be able to leave and agree to have their photo taken. Any responsible pet owner should be willing to do so.
- If a dog bites someone and the owner leaves the scene, it should be treated the same as a hit-and-run car accident.
- Unless situation is unsafe for person or dog.
- Ultimately it is the owner who should be held accountable for the dog's behaviour. If they knew the dog was aggressive or had the potential to harm they should be the owns that need to answer questions.
- If there is injury that needs to be addressed further, having the dog and owner leave seems similar to a hit and run scenario
- Dog owners are responsible for the dogs actions
- It's good to have a person's information in case what looked like a cosmetic bite turns into something more once looked at.
- Yes, however it must be well understood that dogs have the capability of biting for MANY reasons, majority of which are unrelated to whether or not that dog is a safe pet/animal. Also, if this rule applies to 'dogs', then pet owners with small dogs (chihuahuas, beagles, pugs, etc.), are subject to the same rules as large dog owners. Lastly, this rule should only be used to protect the rights and safety of dogs (including large breeds), NOT to demonize them. I have been a large dog owner my entire life, and I have only ever felt concerned over my dog's safety when it is being aggressively approached by a small dog, as they tend to be more vicious and ill-behaved.
- It's out of respect but gov't is taking way to much control of everyone's lives. What's next?
- This is self explanatory. Any offence they should be there to have their contact info ready.
- I am veterinary office assistant, who'd worked at the Calgary Humane society, so I u understand the issues regarding problem dog owners.
- It holds the owner liable for their animals actions.
- It's either their fault or the other person/owner and either needs to take responsibility for being bad
- I would support this as long as the dogs involved don't need immediate vet assistance (this should be primary)
- It is their dog and their responsibility.

- You are responsible for the dog and the damage it does.
- Need to be able to exchange contact if needed and let affected party know if rabies vaccine up to date
- It's called being a responsible dog owner.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their pets no matter what.
- Absolutely - there are always 2 sides to every story. Dog owner and victim (whether a person or another dog) should all remain at the scene and exchange contact information.
- Yes, I believe that the owner should stay. However there are situations where the dog should not have been pet by a stranger yet, they were still pet anyways
- I think I support this, my concern is around people who harass animals they don't know. An owner is responsible for their pet, but on occasion strangers or kids might approach without consent and provoke a defensive response from an animal. In such a case the owner should not be penalized.
- If serious or needing medical attention or breaks skin then yes the owner should have to report and make a statement
- Too many people jumping to euthanization...this is obviously a deterrent and that concern should be fixed so people are willing to stay instead of punishing people for leaving when they think their pet will be killed
- Just like if your child bites another child. You are responsible
- When a dog bites, it's the people involved (the owner and the victim/victims owner) who are responsible for the incident.
- They should be responsible the owner should be investigated as welk dogs aret born vicious they are made that way mostly
- Running off is not ok but I can understand as some police and bylaw officers go over board in handling the situation. Owners need to know that thir dog won't be treated roughly or shot at.
- depending on the animal for example another pet (not necessary for wild life example coyotes) but if a dog bites another dog information should be exchanged or bites a human
- They should take responsibility for vet or medical bills
- "Contact information should be exchanged in the regards of it being a serious bite, opposed to a dog play fighting in a friendly manner.
- BSL does not work."
- Yes, it is their animal and they should be there to help with the situation.
- If a dog does bite someone or some other animal, the dog's owner should be there to be held accountable.
- At minimum, both parties should remain at the scene to exchange contact information and talk with an officer if necessary. I also would want to ensure that, particularly in the case of two dogs where one gets bitten, that the behaviour of both animals and their owners are addressed to ensure there weren't extenuating circumstances ie. one dog antagonizing the other until the other snaps and bites back. Many, many small (supposedly non-vicious) breeds dogs are not properly obedience trained and in a lot of cases, it's the antagonizing dog that has the problem behaviour that led to the attack, whether or not they were the ones doing the biting. It's not always the "big bad terriers" that are at fault, but they certainly take the lion's share of blame in every case. Banning or restricting breeds will do nothing to reduce the number or severity of attacks if the dogs (and their owners) that remain do not have their behaviours and attitudes addressed. Moreover, I'm particularly concerned by the inclusion of any "dog that has an appearance and physical characteristics that are substantially similar to those of dogs referred to in any of clauses (a) to (d)". Way too much grey area that will absolutely result in docile and well trained animals being unfairly punished for their looks rather than their behaviour. We can do better than that.

- Owners must take responsibility.
- My boxer/pitbull Cross has been bit 6 times while on leash for a walk in parks and street. The owners simply say sorry and leave. I have spent about $600 in 3 years for vet bills due to this. All the attackers were small breed dogs.
- It's the same as if you are in a car accident.
- You are responsible for your dog, if it attacks someone or something you are responsible as you did not train your dog properly. It's not the dogs fault any more than the owners.
- As an act of respect and also the person who got bit could need medical assistance. And also the pet owner should be able to explain his or her side of the story.
- Owners need to be held accountable for the behaviour of their animals. They should also be required to cover the cost of vet bills, damage to property etc.
- If they were a witness to the incident they must be there to provide information.
- At present some leave the scene without much worry leaving victim's owner to cover expenses etc. Give steep fine for leaving without ensuring contact info is exchanged.
- Far too many 'bite and runs'. Do the right thing and wait and share info
- Your dog is your responsibility. If your dog harms another creature you need to take responsibility.
- I think it is prudent for proper information to be shared in the same way that we share insurance information in the event of a car accident
- I think that both parties need to make sure they if they can (not a vet emergency).
- You should have contact info
- As long as they can contain the animal.
- It's kind of like if you're in a traffic accident, common sense is that you stay until you have ensured the other party(s) are alright, have your information, etc. It should be the same with animals.
- Dog owners should be responsible for their dogs actions, even if it was an accident
- Yes because you have to remain at a scene if you where in a car accident you should remain at the scene if your dog attacks something and take responsibility for you dogs actions.
- it is important for dog owners to be accountable for their dog's behaviour regardless of breed.
- If a dog bites an animal or human, the owner of the dog most certainly needs to remain at the scene to exchange information. They should be responsible for vet / hospital bills 100%
- Right thing to do.
- No different than fleeing the scene
- Owners must be responsible for their dogs actions.

- I believe this should apply whether it was a person that was attacked, or another animal. It's illegal to flee the scene of a motor vehicle accident. The same should go for animal attacks. And the owners should be responsible for paying any vet bills that the victim ends up with.
- They need to be held accountable for their dogs actions
- How else would you be able to hold the owner responsible
- Yes, as it's important to get a history on the dog (rabies vaccination, etc) for effective medical treatment of victim
- Dogs could be lethal weapons if the owner don't pay attention to their responsibilities (proper license, training, behaviour control etc) If the bits happened the owner should remain at the scene etc like when car accidents was happened
- Its important for everyone involved to share their details to allow insurance and Healthcare issues be addressed immediately.
- Yes I do agree with this if it was complete negligence on the owners part. However, I do strongly hope city of Calgary would be smart enough to not immediately jump to conclusions with a bite. For example, if I was walking my dog in the evening and was attacked by a person and my dog retaliated to protect me resulting in a bite-then that would in my mind NOT be at owners fault. I'd like to think city of Calgary or Calgary community standards would have some common sense with particular situations.
- This should be mandatory for animal and human bites.
- An assault has ocured. The owner or handler of the dog is 100% reponsible for the assault and must be held accountable.
- That way both sides of the story are heard and not just the story from the alleged victim is heard.
- again. it's the owners fault. not the damn dogs. people need to understand this & get it through their heads. there is NO bad dogs.
- Dogs owners need to be accountable for their dog's behaviour that may cause bites/aggressive incidents. Victims need also be held accountable if they have teased a dog that resulted in them being bitten or barked at.
- Treat it like a serious car crash
- You need to take responsibility of your dog and understand your dogs actions as yours.
- this is what responsible dog owners do. If they flee and get caught then u can fine them.
- I would consider that good ownership.
- If your pet damages another human, pet or property it is your responsibility to take accountability for them.
- I think if a dog bites or injures another dog they should be responsible for the bitten dogs vet expenses
- I think it'a important to obtain as much information about the situation that led to the dog bite including the dog's history.
- An dog owner is always responsible for their dog and being aware of it is reactive or not. If a negative interaction occurs a responsible pet owner should always take responsibility for what happened.

- Its like a car accident or someone brawling at the bar. Therw might be further issues that need to be adressed.
 - Owner takes responsibility for pets actions
 - "Like any other incident, it's important to be courteous and take
 - Responsibility. dog bites can be from
 - Big or
 - Little
 - Dogs"
 - If necessary
 - Only if the dog is adequately contained - if not, they should be able to leave
 - If it is safe for the animals and owners to do so
 - They should pay for any vet bills accrued
 - just as any assault or any time someone gets hurt if you are a witness stay to give a statement
 - Each person should be responsible for their pet at any given time
 - I don't think the onus should be on the victim to determine what the next course of action should be.
 - I think it shouldn't be a hard rule, because I can imagine in some scenarios the dog owner needs to get the dog away from the situation in order to prevent further problems. I do think it's a good idea for them to stay and provide information is possible.
 - Na
 - The owner should always stay and talk with anyone necessary if an attack happens, but not allowing pit bulls to have the same rights as other dogs because of an assumption is cruel.
 - Pets can get sick or injured, requiring more finances to fix.
 - If that means all dogs including small dogs. Small dog tend to bite way more but people brush it off cause it doesn't hurt as much as a large dog bite. Rule must be the same for all
 - Of course
 - This is simply responsible human behaviour and required so appropriate legal action can be taken if necessary.
 - Why should the dog owner be allowed to leave the scene? If their dog caused harm of course they should stay
 - "Questions need to be asked - keep in mind that it is not always the dogs fault with parents not parenting their kids and small dog owners thinking it is okay that their dogs are jumping/ being aggressive to bigger dogs
- Discriminating towards breeds is absolutely ridiculous and the city should be ashamed for stereotyping one breed over another and who is to determine if a dog "has pit bull characteristics"
 - I've had an off-leash pitbull bite a dog on my backyard. The owner left the scene with no offer of help even though the dog was bleeding from its neck and required vet attention. I had to have someone find the man owning the dog by searching through the neighbourhood so that it could be reported. Even then the man was only fined and the victim had to pay for the expenses themselves. I'm honestly surprised there has not been a rule put in place like this before. Having to track down an owner with a violent dog after an incident is just more stress put on someone already in a tough situation.

- If an animal harms another the owner needs to provide information in the event the person/animal requires treatment.
- if your dog bites u are responsible and should stay to make sure everyone is ok
- It's harder to identify people/dogs who seriously attack someone. They must remain or be severely fined.
- Just like in an auto accident, the owner must stay and answer questions.
- If it severe yes. Bi Law would be called anyway and this way it can be discovered if the animal is up to date on shots and or if the person or other animal is injured action can be taken right away.
- Yes same rule as a car accident. If there is injuries, no one leaves until situation is accessed.
- Yes they should remain at the scene as a common courtesy. But no dog should have to be put down or put back in a shelter. We should be trying to aim for better training to prevent these incidents. I feel as though all these rules will result in less people even wanting pit bulls which breaks my heart to think about there being even more just left in shelters. All dogs deserve a loving home. and the city of calgary is just plain stupid if they decide to pass this. I will be ashamed to calm myself a Calgarian. No seriously. you should be ashamed for even considering this. And this is coming from someone who's dog was attacked by a neighbours pitbull a few years ago. He had trauma from previous owners and felt threatened by my pup, can't help that. we need to try to teach these dogs that they r okay. but they will never feel that way trapped in a cage in a shelter. :(
- Any violent interactions between animal-human or animal-animal should be handled with care. If the owner of the aggressive animal leaves, this is negligent and would not allow the pattern to be documented.
- As long as the enforcement officer is trained in animal handling and social factors instead of law enforcement
- I have actually been bitten by a dog in the NW, and when it occurred, I did not report it. The owner quickly left the scene with the dog in tow. The dog was a smaller breed but managed to break skin and cause bleeding.
- Because by would you not as a owner of a animal.
- Yes, the owner of every animal is responsible for whatever happens before, during, and after a situation in which said animal displays aggressive behavior.
- They are responsible for their dog, and it's actions. They can provide vet contact and dog history.
- Self explanatory
- Basic dog ownership? Accountability for an animal?
- If a dog bites to defend, it should never be at fault
- It's important to track the owner/animal for issues such as rabies, etc.

- Most dogs are good, but poor training and aggressive owners are the leading cause of these problems. They shouldn't be able to run off to skirt their responsibility.
- This should be common practice, however, even making this a rule does not mean individuals will abide by it.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions
- Pet owners need to be responsible and accountable for the actions of their pet.
- A dog's behaviour stems from their owner, the owner should be held responsible.
- My dog has been a victim of a dog bite and this would have been helpful.
- I like this idea but typically those with dogs who bite or attack a person or another animal will not stay at the scene regardless. Needs to be fines associated with leaving and not providing your information.
- It's just like a car accident. Simple.
- Only fear would be that the dog would be taken away
- For the same reason you remain at the scene of a car accident. It is the right thing to do.
- The owner and their dog need to be kept accountable. This will ensure repeat incidents are tracked and dealt with appropriately
- Too many irresponsible owners will simply walk away from a bite incident, leaving the victim with no way to truly report the incident to any real effect.
- In case of injury that results in medical care or vet bills an information exchange needs to take place.
- You never know if after a bite if an infection will happen or something plus if this dog it's continuously fighting people, but it's not being reported, then nothing can be done
- It provides the opportunity for the owner to explain their side of the story. Responders should be trained to recognize that the biting dog may be highly distressed in the situation and needs extra space. Do not unnecessarily antagonize the animal when it is already stressed.
- Yes, because if information is not given from both sides of the situation, proper action can not be taken. It also makes it more difficult to keep track of incidents and dogs/owners with repeat offences
- they still need to be held liable
- Yes to ascertain that the dog has had required shots including for rabies.
- It keeps dog owners accountable, in addition to providing a chance to clarify the situation.
- Should t be able to walk away without providing information
- Yes this is the same situation as a car accident.
- Please do not consider pit-bull specific breed ban legislation. This is proven ineffective. Please, many more dogs will die unnecessarily because of this.
- If visible harm is done and there's still visual aggression bylaw report would be necessary in order to prevent future attacks
- The owner is in charge and responsible of the dog. If the dog hasn't received proper training, that is the owners fault.
- If a owner doesn't stay on site there likely are not a good owner anyhow

- You have to be there to advocate for your animal in the case that someone picks on the animal enough to make it retaliate
 - The owner should be able to identify exactly what triggered the attack at that time and why it did
 - So nobody else/or other animal gets bit by the same dog
 - People should be responsible for their dogs, it's like getting into a car accident.
 - Just like a car accident, if injury has occurred an exchange of information is required in order to hold the offender accountable for any costs that may incur.
 - Yes, this is essentially like a car accident. When the offending party leaves the scene, it is hard to hold someone accountable for the damage(s) caused.
 - "Biting a human: Yes, the owner of the attacking dog should stay to provide contact information. The owner should take responsibility for it's animal's actions, as proper training or precautions were not taken to help eliminate the indiscretion however, the situation should be looked into further as to why the dog bit a person in the first place. Was the dog put in a place of uncertainty or uncomfortably and the human chose not to read the dogs body language? That is the person's fault, not the dogs.
- As for biting another animal: Dogs are animals at the end of the day and fights are going to happen, but it's up to the person in care, custody and control of the animal to be aware of it's temperament and ensure that it is not put in a position to be aggressive towards another animal."
 - Too many times, a dog and owner flee the scene. The law should require the owner to be present.
 - They should definitely have to exchange information, at the very least so that they can pay for any vet bills that are incurred. Kind of like getting into a car accident - the at-fault person should be financially responsible for the damage.
 - It's called being a responsible person!
 - A responsible dog owner should be present during any and all incidents
 - Any owner of any dog should always take responsibility for their pets actions. It's not the dog but the person raising and training the animals fault. Any breed! Pitbulls should not be treated any different, it's pretty much like being racist towards other people and that's not right! It's how a child is raise just as it's how a pet is raised! Nothing to do with race or breed for any thing they do, accidental or purposely..
 - Why should they be allowed to leave after and assault?
 - If you're dog bites it's your responsibility unless the dog bite in defence. If you or your dog attack my dog they have every right to protect them self just like a human.
 - Yes for sure, it's not always the biter that is really at fault. There may be underlining reasons why the dog bit...maybe the other dog was being a jerk and provoked the other dog
 - Unless they must be taking their own animal or self for medical care. They should however exchange info with the other party.

- Owners can be so irresponsible. If your dog is at fault it's because you haven't trained the dog properly (most likely) they need to pay for vet bills if their dog bit another animal and they should also be charged for neglecting to control their dog.
- No different than a car accident.
- A police report should be made and both parties should be required to remain at the scene. The victim can then choose to go to civil court to pursue charges. The municipal government should have no further involvement.
- I like the idea of having a chance to provide context/background. Maybe a dog is biting due to being provoked; this can be explained to an officer if people remain at the scene.
- It is the dog owner's responsibility to properly train their animal so it does not engage in vicious, potentially life-threatening behaviours with other beings. Therefore, just as one is legally entitled to stay at the scene of the crime if they were involved in a traffic incident, it makes sense that they would legally be held responsible for staying at the scene after their dog bites, or attacks, an animal or human.
- Only makes sense. Owner must take responsibility. Same as hit and run otherwise.
- Including small dog owners
- People should be held responsible for their pets.
- This seems obvious
- No different than a car accident, if they can secure their dog in a safe space it would obviously be preferred
- I believe that if a dog bites a human or another animal the owner should stay on scene because it is the right thing to do and information may be required from the owner.
- That is a huge aspect of being a responsible pet owner. Accidents happen, but it is imperative the dog owner remain on scene after gaining control of their dog.
- Only if the bite resulted in injury required to be seen by a physician or veterinarian
- Yes all bites need to be reported to an enforcement officer and the dog should be quarantined for 10 days. Responsible pet ownership is taking responsibility for your pets actions.
- Owners should be held responsible for their dogs actions.
- It is important to hear opinion from both parties before further actions are taken
- Sure, with the knowing that the consequences does not include the dog being seized or euthanized. Refer to answer above.
- It's just like a car accident
- Just like any accident that happens you need to get both sides of the story so everything adds up
- Owners need to take responsibility for their so called "children", the same way real parents need to.
- ...
- A dog bite should be treated like a car accident where contact info must be exchanged in case further follow up due to injuries is required
- Owners whose dogs were involved in a biting incident should be required to take responsibility and also allowed to share their side of the story.

- I feel walking away would be an omission of guilt. Why wouldn't you stay at the scene to make sure everyone is OK?
- No different then any other incident, ie: car accident. You wait and deal with the situation, leaving the scene is not an acceptable response.
- It's the same to me as if you accidentally hit someone in the head with a rock you've thrown. It may have been an accident, but you're still morally obligated to be there.
- People run away and don't take responsibility.
- If there is a serious bite that causes injury then people should at the very least have to exchange information. If someone needs to take an animal or person for emergency care, they should not have to remain at the scene, but should have to exchange information before leaving.
- Reinforces dog owner responsibility and accountability for the behaviour of their dogs.
- Why would there ever be a reason to not wait and provide your information? To think otherwise is ludicrous.
- As a dog owner of a dog, I firmly believe that all owners are responsible for their dogs no matter what the circumstance. If my dog ever bit anyone, I would give my contact info freely as it is the right thing to do.
- Considering the bite is serious and is something that would need medical attention. It should be treated kind of like a car accident. That is fair!
- Any dog fights should be resolved with a mediator especially in cases of an animal being harmed.
- That would be the way to do it, makes it easier to get things resolved.
- Victim and offender stay on scene.
- "I won't bring my dog to off leash parks anymore for this reason.
- My dogs have been attacked and injured a few times by other owners dogs and they run off after calling their dog while not even being close to their dogs to control them during or prior to the attack."
- BOTH sides must be heard
- While I think it's important the dog be moved to a safe distance where it can be managed by the owner, it's also important that we ensure the dog and owner can receive the support they need to ensure the dog isn't a risk to the community, so yes I support a rule requiring them to stay and provide contact information. I think that follow up to ensure dogs are registered for training with approved, evidence-based dog trainers (ie positive reinforcement) would be valuable for owners and dogs alike.
- If there is any aggression toward another animal or person, all parties involved should need to wait or at minimum exchange information. Often, the dog that has bitten has been harassed by other dogs and is only asserting itself. The circumstances become he said/she said as the biter is often perceived as an aggressive dog.
- Owners must take responsibility for their dog. It's not the breeds fault. It's the owner.
- Absolutely the dog owner should remain at the scene. If a dog bites someone/something it needs to be assessed to prevent it happening again. If the dog owner leaves there is too much room for error in the incident. Both sides also need to tell their side of what happened to the enforcement officer.

When it comes to pitbulls or any bully breed type dog people are very quick to point the finger. Each person involved should be present to explain what happens to the proper action is put in place.

- It's common sense
- Too often owners leave when there is an issue. Contact information and dog license info must be shared for sure. If the victim wants to report it the other must remain on the scene.
- They should be near by but they would need to talk the dog away from the incident before enforcement officers arrive to avoid anymore bites.
- The owner should have to share contact info--it holds them accountable for their dog.
- The offending dog owner must stay while the injured person or animal must seek medical attention.
- If a person can not control their dog, or their dog is inappropriately off leash, and bites a person or animal, the cost of medical care should be on the owner, as well as a fine for off leash offences. It won't happen if the owner leaves the scene immediately to avoid responsibility.
- Just like an accident. You remain at the scene until help/police arrive.
- So many dog owners have gotten away when their animal bites someone/another animal and face issues that can be easily resolved (As someone who got attacked by a dog)
- Any dog can bite and some people don't listen to the owner when approaching a dog. The dog/owner should not be punished on the other persons actions.
- it is about owner responsibility
- Bylaws need to reflect responsible pet ownership, any incident injuring a person or animal involving bylaw officers should include a responsibility to be present until bylaw arrives
- If someone leaves the scene they are showing they are not a responsible pet owner. The City needs to keep track of problem animals, they can't do this if the pet owner leaves the scene.
- To many times people dogs (mainly small dogs) bite someone and the owner leaves and then it is harder to find the owner to hold them accountable for their pet. My only exception would be if they leave their information to go to the vet or dr to attend to wounds and the dr/vet has to report if someone comes in with dog bite wounds.
- N/a
- The dog bit a person it could have been for all sorts of reasons maybe a person pushed the hand in the dogs face after the owner said not too. Thier animal also hurt a person they should be held responsible
- This would help in tracking nuisance/viscous animals and hold owners accountable.
- Generally the owners are big problem not the dogs - if not trained properly - all dogs can be classed as nuisance / more needs to be done to owners not the dog
- I think it's important for dog owners to be accountable for their dogs, if a dog bites another person or other dog (animal) then we need to ensure that dog is accessed properly to avoid future incidences.
- The owner and the victim (and family if under age/incoherent) should both stay present. Both sides are needed to come to a proper decision.
- Both parties should stay at the scene to share contact info. If the injured person or animal needs urgent care one person should stay if possible but at the very least contact information should be shared so the guilty party can be charged accordingly or pay for vet bills etc.

- Its the owners responsibility for their pet. They need to stay and make sure all information is given.
- I agree but an report should be made some times the dog was provoked
- The owner should remain on scene as they are responsible for the animal and it's training.
- You should be responsible for your dog.
- Depending on the servility of the attack done the owner should have to stay at the scene. If done to another dog they should be responsible for the vet bill.
- Owners should be 100% responsible for their dog. Breeds should not be discriminated against. Perhaps behavioral training should be mandatory for those considering owning a dog that can overpower them. not breed specific, but large dogs that are high energy. Owners should face higher fines and consequences if they do not train their dog appropriately. the dog should not suffer as a result of an irresponsible owner.
- It is the right thing to do. If you flee the scene then it'll make you look very bad.
- Poor dog behaviour needs to be accountable by the owners
- An attack of any kind, to me, is assault. It should be seen the same way that we look at car accidents and physical altercations.
- It promotes responsible pet ownership and ensures accountability and ensures follow up
- I view it the same way as a car accident, the owner is responsible for their actions.
- If a person has an animal they know to be "nuisance", or reactive, and that animal attacks another dog (unless the 2nd dog is off-leash in an on-leash area, which is another matter), then the owner of the 1st dog should be at least partially responsible for the vet costs of the 2nd dog (unless, again, the 2nd dog is off-leash in an on-leash area).
- A person should always be in control of their animal, animals are considered property and people are always responsible for their property. If a person allows their animal (by way of negligence or unavoidable circumstance) to harm another living thing, that person needs to take responsibility for that.
- If an owner is deemed at fault and a dog attack was unprovoked the owner of the unprovoked dog should be compensated for vet bills. I however do not support taking the dog from the owner unless they are repeat offenders attacking unprovoked and behavioral rehabilitation has been unsuccessful.
- To later discuss options
- Absolutely people should have to stay and give info. Just like a car accident.
- The owner is responsible for the dogs behavior.
- It is a dog owners responsibility to follow up with anything their pet does. If a person experiences an injury, only a doctor can really say whether it's fine or not. If the injured person believes they require some medical assistance, it should be taken seriously until the end. Due diligence.
- Well as you should. If you dog does damage to another pet or person. You as an owner should be responsible and deal with those consequences
- It is similar to being in a car accident and not leaving the scene. The pet owner needs to be there so that details can be gathered in a timely manner.
- The exception to this would be if the dog/owner requires immediate medical attention (in the case of a dog fight).

- A dog bite is an assault and damages can be sustained to the person or the other dog.
- Just like a car accident exchange info or talk with police or bylaw
- One would be charged for leaving the scene of a car accident, so dog owners should remain.
- AGAIN, IT IS THE OWNERS RESPONSIBILITY NOT THE BREED ITSELF
- If I was bit by a dog I would want to make sure that the dog is healthy to be better prepared if I needed to go to the hospital.
- No matter what the situation the owner is responsible for the dog and should be held liable and considered criminal if they leave without at least giving contact information
- They have to be accountable.
- It depends on the severity of the bite- it should generally be regarded as a non-incident if the skin is unbroken however
- Responsible ownership is mandatory for all animals, should your animal injure another you should attempt to remedy the situation as best possible for the outcome of BOTH animals and owners.
- I do think they should remain on scene
- Both sides of the bite story need to be heard to accurately establish if the animal is actually at fault or was provoked
- Yes, often times the extent of injury may not be immediately obvious.
- I thought that was already a law.
- as an animal owner you are responsible for it. give your side of the story.
- The owner is responsible for the dog's behaviour.
- Explain my answer? This is common sense. Who thinks you should be allowed to leave the scene? Of course they should remain. Who thought of this question? Duh. By rule I assume you mean bylaw?
- Remain at scene same as MVA
- If an incident occurs, it is the responsibility of the owner to stay and take accountability for what happened. Plus it's just the decent human thing to do.
- I can't believe this isn't already a requirement. There needs to be greater accountability for all dog owners, especially those whose dogs injure others. There's a clear reason why we require driver's licences, insurance, and vehicle registration when operating motor vehicles. We need to treat the ownership of dogs and possible injuries in like manner.
- Yes - however there must be some consideration for the owner and their safety, if they feel threatened by the situation or feel the best option for the state of the dog is to put it in a vehicle/house if it is acting up they should be able to leave contact information
- Owners of pets that have caused harm, must take responsibility for their pet's actions.
- A stupid German Shepherd bit my Shar Pei while on a walk when the owner let his dog run across the yard and street. He was unwilling to wait with us and exchange information. Rules like this apply to traffic accidents and will provide accountability to pet owners. All breed owners, not only pitbull
- Being involved in an unprecedented situation like this is stressful on all parties. Get personal/contact info. Keep animals secured and away from the area of the incident. immediately attend to any injuries (vet or hospital). Keep in contact with others involved and follow up on what steps come next. Communication can only help in times like these.

- To be held accountable
- similar to hit and run. owners need to assume responsibility for animal bites
- Information gathered for both sides are important in assessing how/why the bite happened. Both the victim and the accused should be able to share their information to give a complete picture.
- dog OWNERS must be responsible, y'all need to stop criminalizing 'bad dogs' and start criminalizing bad owners. and [removed] you guys for being breed specific. [removed]
- The dog owner and the victim should both have to explain the situation. The only exception should be if the dog who attacked cannot be kept at the scene in a safe manner (safe for the dog or the victim), the owner must first control or contain the dog before calling bylaw (or the governing body) to explain the situation.
- Many small breed owners whose dog bites strangers or other dogs choose to just walk away as if nothing happens as the bite is typically not severe but they should be held responsible and educated to know that it could be due to their dogs behaviour that causes another dog to bite or be aggressive.
- The reason a dog bites is due to how the owner trains their dog. So it should be their responsibility.
- This is common sense
- If the owner of the dog that was bit would like an enforcement officer to come, then yes. Otherwise no.
- Should be the same as a traffic accident. Depending on the situation you can exchange info at the scene or wait for bylaw
- Basic courtesy but is often ignored. May help if there are repercussions for not doing so.
- This seems common sense - the dog hurt another person, so must share the information to prevent future incidents and pay for any damages (health) caused to the other person or animal.
- They should have to stick around similar to a car accident.
- There are a lot of dogs that have multiple bite incidents, if the owner can run off before it is reported then the misbehaving dog may never be reported and may cause more serious harm or death if its allowed to keep attacking people or other animals.
- Often times dog owners walk away and the victim is holding the bag for all incurred vet bills
- If an owner's dog is aggressive towards a person or other animal, that owner should remain at the scene of the "crime" until a enforcement officer arrives.
- You have a dog, it's your responsibility. Doesn't matter what breed it is.
- I believe owners should take responsibility for the actions of their dog.
- An owner or handler is in care and control of the dog and responsible for their behaviour
- Yes ultimately it is the human who is at fault they should be held accountable . It is the human ego needs direction and education on the type of breed their dog has. If the human is weak the dog has no pack leader and is lost ..
- No dog is at fault, any misconduct occurred by an animal is directly related to the owner. All pet owners should be responsible for their dog wether it is a pit bull or Chihuahua and should be required to stay at the scene of an incident and provide proper information, just like it is required to do after a car accident.

- Only if the problem dog isn't a continued problem, the owner should have to stay at the scene.
- Responsible pet ownership would be the owner staying and taking responsibility.
- Victims of attack shouldn't have to pay the vet bills for stitches / infected wounds, that should be on the owner of the attacking dog.
- That is what responsible pet owners do.
- If a pet is involved in an incident resulting in bodily harm the owner must be required to follow similar rules to that of a car accident and stay at the scene until information is shared and emergency services are at the scene if required.
- Similar to a car accident you are responsible as the dog's owner and must take accountability
- If they require any further information due to an incident the owner should be liable and provide any required information.
- Yes but only in a situation that is severe and 9-1-1 needed to be called for the injury
- "Absolutely. But please, no breed specific laws. Any breed of dog can end up as a "bad dog" if it's not raised properly.
- I don't own a pit bull breed dog.)"
- It's impossible to track down an owner after an incident since it's often based on witness descriptions. Need something to motivate people to stay if their pet is involved in an incident.
- Owners' need to be held more accountable. If you own a dog that bites someone you should be 100% required to provide info/speak to bylaw - or not be allowed to own dogs.
- The owner is responsible for the animal's behavior.
- If it's their dog the owner must be there like a parent would talk to the principal with their human child. It's their responsibility
- I understand why owners would want to leave as more and more we move to the termination of the animal - an animal they love and have a bond with. If that wasn't the knee-jerk reaction, an owner should stay for the sake of responsibility and care of the others involved. It's traumatizing to both the animals and humans.
- There is no reason why a dog owner shouldn't take responsibility for the incident.
- They absolutely should stick around and be held responsible if this happens
- Yes
- Intentionally leaving the scene of a dog bite/ attack should be treated similarly to a hit and run incident, and owners be subject to fines/ punishment if they intentionally leave the scene.
- BSL is unacceptable and not a solution. A disgusting proposal by the city.
- The dog owner should be liable for any damages or harm caused by the animal. By leaving the scene the owner should be just as liable as fleeing an accident or crime.
- Only the owner can provide information on the dog's history, such as behavior and vaccines.
- For the health and safety of other animals it should be necessary for the owner and the dog to remain at the scene.

- They should be ready to give personal info but not remain at scene. Trying to control a dog once it is worked up to the point of biting is not safe for anyone in the situation.
- If a persons dog hurts another person or animal, it is their responsibility to pay for any medical care required.
- it is simple responsible pet ownership. Much like a car accident
- If any dog breed bites or hurts someone they should be required to stay.
- Just like an auto accident, it's difficult to assess harm at the moment an injury occurs. Dog owners should be responsible for any injury or damages caused by their dog, and therefore they should have to provide their contact information for follow up and resolution
- Only if the bite causes damage IE punctures
- An incident involving an injury needs to be handled accordingly regardless of the cause.
- This is important from a liability perspective and to ensure responsible pet ownership. The owners that don't stay are often the owners that have not trained their dog correctly and are not willing to.
- many times the owner leaves which makes the incident worse. I understand leaving so the dogs can't get into it, but contact information should be exchanged.
- All parties involved should remain at the scene to record proper statements.
- They should be responsible for their dog and explain if there were any other factors as to why the dog could have bitten someone (teasing, feeding, attacking, etc.)
- The owner should be held accountable and must remain present to do so.
- This is along the lines of a car accident - you need to stay long enough to at least share contact information should there need to be follow up on the victim (ie. vet bills). An enforcement officer should also be required to attend the scene to determine who is at fault - for instance a leashed dog biting a dog that ran up to it while unleashed in a designated on-leash area should NOT be penalized, the unleashed dog should receive a fine instead.
- How do you keep the dog on scene if the owner leaves
- I think owners need to be held responsible if their dog bites another animal or person. It can be a very traumatic experience for the person or animal that was bit and the owners should have to come clear and deal with the re precautions.
- Requiring the owner to remain would make them more likely to remain vigilant with keeping their dog out of dangerous situations, and could reduce false reports if both parties were still on scene.
- The animal is your responsibility and likely the bite was caused by your raising or by instigation from another human.
- Punish the owner, not the animal who was taught by the owner. STOP BLAMING ANIMALS FOR STUPID HUMANS
- "It is part of being a responsible pet owner.
- People flee the scene often and that should be considered a fineable offence."
- Owners should always be responsible for their pets part of that responsibility would be staying to exchange information should their dog hurt someone.
- There have been many instances when my family dog has been bitten (NOT BY A PITBULL BREED) and the owner fled the scene. We were stuck with the vet bill as our dog required stitches.

- Owner needs to be accountable for actions of their dog.
- It is a form of assault. Refusing to stay on scene to exchange this information may cause future risk to other animals and people.
- If there is significant damage done
- It should be treated like a car accident. The whole situation should be looked at, just because a dog bites a person/dog it doesn't mean is at fault
- Just the same as with a car accident, I believe people should be held with the same level of accountability
- Responsibility of ownership.
- If the bite is serious to require medical treatment, yes. It could be harder to determine if dogs are play fighting with each other or if there's an off leash park and the owner is distracted/distanced and doesn't see the incident occur. Things like that should be considered when educating the public about the bylaw
- Pit bulls don't deserve to be treated this way
- All too often you hear of stories of mostly pit bull owners running away with their dog after their dog attacks someone or someone else's dog. The victim is then left without any possible way to discuss what happened and charge.
- Only if it is safe to do so, depending how the dog is behaving afterwards
- Too many people leave the scene, either thinking it is not important or don't want to be held liable.
- Dog owners need to be responsible. If their dog is not under control they need to stay if an incident occurs and help the other victim with costs incurred from a bite or attack
- Dogs bite for many reasons not all of them because the dog is vicious. Dogs need their owners to advocate for them. Stay at the scene.
- Take responsibility for your animal(s)
- It's important that when a dog bites, information is provided and verifiable by bylaw
- That seems very reasonable
- Yes so we can be sure the dog has all vaccines
- It's no different if you hit someone with your car. You are responsible for injuries caused by your car and your pet
- Owner is responsible not the animal.
- I thought people would have already been doing that
- Should be no different than a car accident.
- Need to assess damage, trauma, responsibility, and fitness of owner.
- I like the idea but think there should be limitations similar to car accidents where police don't need to be involved unless the damage exceeds $_____. Maybe if the bite was small or no blood was drawn or both parties agree to go on their way, that should be permitted.
- The dog owner is completely responsible for the dog and should remain at the scene.
- It is important that an owner shows responsibility regarding the incident.

- I believe they should stay as this should be treated like any other type of assault, it should be considered the same as a hit and run if the owner leaves.
- Owners need to take full responsibility for their animal, including paying fines and taking training courses deemed necessary.
- As someone who has a small breed dog attacked by a Pitbull at a dog park, I would appreciate this as a rule. The owner ran away while I was tending to my dog and I would have liked her info.
- It's the same as a car accident it needs to be reported and or handled in case something comes up in the future.
- They need to answer questions and provide health information of their pet.
- As long as there is evidence there was an actual bite
- Good idea
- This way the owner can tell their side of the story with true knowledge of their dog's behavior. Many victims are only victims because they antagonized the dog to the point of it snapping (just like any human). This also gives the officer the opportunity to judge the relationship between human and dog, and ensure the human is not abusing or neglecting the dog. This will also give the officer the ability to judge a dog's training, and order obedience classes to the human (to be followed with a fine or something if they do not follow through). This will help reduce the number of bad dog owners, and as a result, bad dogs. I firmly believe the dog should be given every chance at life and shouldn't be killed cause they have a bad owner.
- owners should be held responsible for their animal. Its not the animals fault its the owners
- Dog attacks should be treated similar to car accident, in which information is required to be given, otherwise it is treated like a hit and run with higher consequences
- If an owner leaves the scene of a bite (that requires a visit from local enforcement, as some bites are very minor and the victim decides not to involve local enforcement) the animal should be seized and the offender be unable to own future animals (should extend to immediate family also or persons living within the same residence).
- It is important to make sure the owner is responsible for not properly training the dog correctly but not all blame should be put on the dog.
- Treat it similar to a car accident. Require both parties to exchange information and if injury is severe wait for an officer, otherwise both parties should be encouraged to take photos for their own records.
- In case this is a repeat offense
- If this has to be explained to you, you shouldn't be in a position of power to decide these things. All parties involved should have to wait and explain their side of things to the by-law officers. No one should be able to abscond from the scene of the incident without incurring some sort of fault or fine.
- Yes to ensure no one or animal has been harmed or needs medical attention
- The owner should share info so they can be liable for the dogs behaviour or the dog should be seized.
- Yes because sometimes certain pieces of information do not get exchanged between the two parties, especially if there has been a traumatic incident. (Ex. Dog city ID #, addresses/ phone numbers etc)

- it should be treated the same as a car accident.
- i think it's important for the owner to be there if they witnessed the incident to explain what happened, and to be there for their animal during this time
- Two sides to every story, important to hear both and to have contact information and identify the owner, dog and "victim"
- Yes if it is safe to do so, it may be the case that the owner needs to leave to remove the dog from the situation. Ideally they would leave contact information for the enforcement office to get a hold of them but it may be safest to move the dog to a building or car to prevent further reactions.
- Both sides of what happened is important to be registered whilst still fresh in everyone's mind and any witnesses statements should be taken. All too often the dog and it's owner are charged when the incident was created by non responsible people, dog owners included. I have many times asked people to please put their dog on a leash in a public park only to be told, oh it's OK he's friendly..... well my dogs don't bite but they also don't like big dogs and if they don't know the dog they could bark if the dog approached them. Or parents let their kids walk up to your dog, my dogs are good with kids but not if they run at them or grab at their fur or pull their tails. There needs to be something in the by-law to address these issues. It's not always the dog or it's owner.
- The accused dogs owners should be able to tell their side. Maybe the dog was provoked or scared.
- Absolutely need to stay! If owner left, that is similar to hit and run and should have same consequences when person of hit and run located.
- I think it is very important for dog owners to be responsible for the actions of their dogs. If their dog caused a bite to a person or other animal they need to at minimum provide contact information and follow up as necessary.
- Owner should be held accountable
- The owner should have some responsibility in damages
- Why would they be allowed to leave?
- "Only if a vet or a dr is required.
- Otherwise people will be calling and making people stay for play bites."
- Rabies prevention
- So that the owner can clarify if the other dog or person intended to harm the bully breed . Just in case the dog was defending itself
- If your dog attacks someone it's your responsibility to stay and figure out a solution.
- Gg
- This is common courtesy currently. Contact information should always be shared in the event of an incident.
- The owner should take responsibility if their dog has bitten another person or animal.
- As a responsible owner you should have control of your of your dog. If an incident were to occur, you should be held accountable - no different than a traffic accident.
- Absolutely, the owner needs to be held accountable and pay for medical treatment and maybe a fine if applicable

- The OWNER is responsible for the pets behaviour and by extension should be held responsible for damage done to other people and animals in the event of an incident
- To give the person a chance to defend what happened.
- I believe it is important for all parties to be involved with providing a statement of the events at the scene from their own perspective
- I think an owner leaving the scene of a dog bite is equivalent to fleeing an accident scene. However, they also must be able to control/restrain their animal.
- Dog bites and attacks can cause a lot of vet bills. Often these bills can be more than a minor car accident
- too often the owners take off, and you can't track them down
- A dog's owner is 100% responsible for what that animal does and, just like a traffic accident, should stay on the scene to deal with the consequences/aftermath.
- N/a
- Leaving a scene where your dog bit someone is no different than a hit and run in a vehicle. Personal injury occurred.
- Absolutely you hear all the time about dog attacks at dog parks and owners just get in there cars and leave fast. The owners of the dogs that are victims are busy assessing there dogs injuries and usually cant follow them to their vehicle to get license plates. If dog owner has to stay at scene it would make them more accountable for their dogs behavior .
- The owner needs to be held responsible. The dog should not be responsible for bad pet ownership.
- Owners need to be accountable for their dog's behaviour. Invariably, it isn't the dog's fault yet they get blamed and often lose their life. Wrong on so many levels.
- Your dog, your responsibility regardless of circumstances
- Puts the responsibility on the owner, especially during a severe incident similar to a guy and run.
- If there is long term injury to the person or other dog thete needs to be contact information. There needs to be discussion around of this is habitual, the dog needs more training the owner needs more education, etc.
- The dog owner is just as responsible if not more so than the dog.
- This is super important in terms of finding out this dogs vaccination status and whether or not this dog has a history of the same. Owners must also be held accountable for the actions of their dogs.
- You hart of many dog owners that have incidents with other at large apressive, non behaving dogs that have attacked or bitten or both and they always seem to flee the situation.
- Both the dog and the person bitten deserve to have all details noted before any decisions are made.
- Of course
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- This seems completely reasonable, no different than remaining at the scene of a car accident.
- Unless the parties involved have come to an agreement (trade vet info, guilty party says they will pay) then you should have to stick around.

- Yes I agree with this because I currently own two bullies and they would never hurt a fly but if a different breed attacked my dogs, which has happened by the way, I'd want the persons info.
- Responsibility of ownership. Maybe the issue for the dog behavior is the [removed] home life. Help the dog.
- Allows for both sides to explain what happened. If the dog was provoked or not etc
- It's important to get all information possible on the events to stop them from happening again
- If this needs explanation there's no hope.
- Not sure if it's even enforceable, but requiring face-to-face accountability with bylaw enforcement is IMO a good idea and might even act as a deterrent
- Yes. I hear of pets being attacked in our neighborhood by certain dogs and then the owner has to pay out of pocket for their dogs medical bills instead of the other party having to do so.
- Unless both parties agree this is not necessary.
- Just like a car accident. It's important both sides are heard, and case by case decisions are made based on circumstances (NOT BREED).
- The dog is ultimately the owner's responsibility and they are the one that needs to answer for any incidents involving their dog.
- Both sides of the story must be heard in every situation.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- The way this is worded is that you are Singling out pit bull type breeds. These rules should apply to ALL dogs. This is prejudice against the breed because of a few bad eggs. Punish the deed not the breed!
- Obviously people need to be responsible for their pets,
- Surprised this isn't already the case.
- The owner of the dog that has injured another animal should be liable for cost accrued for medical bills
- it's the same as a car accident vs a hit and run
- The dog owner (or custodian) should be available to answer the questions of enforcement officers. The dog is their responsibility, and they should be held accountable for any misbehaviour.
- May need medical information about the dog (re: rabies) or contact info for owners.
- It should be treated in a similar fashion to any other incident causing harm (like a traffic incident).
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their pet.
- My dog was bit twice- one time the other owner covered expenses but the second time, the owner left and I was responsible for 1000 in vet bills
- I've witnessed too many owners leave the scene when their dog bites another dog, and the victim is left responsible for dealing with the vet bills and any fallout from the situation. The owners of the dog who bit should be held accountable instead as they're the perpetrators. Same should go for humans who are bit.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their actions.
- It is a reasonable part of responsible pet ownership.

- As with any assault, witnesses should remain at the scene
- It is ethical to explain the incident from both parties involved. I believe the owner is to blame, not the breed when it comes to dog bite incidents. The training the dog is given from its owner, therefore the dog is not at fault, it may have been over excited or not kept in well living conditions at home with the owner. But it is always good to explain what happened instead of running away.
- It's best to get the full story of what caused the incident. Sometimes it is not fully the dog's fault as a lot of people do not know how to properly interact and treat a dog
- So they could be held accountable.
- It's a difficult one to enforce as my dog was attacked and I wouldn't have waited at the scene. My dog needed to be seen by a vet ASAP.
- Seems reasonable. Much in the same way insurance is required to switch hands in a car accident, information should be exchanged in the event of a dog bite.
- We need to be responsible for the actions of our pets. It's like remaining at the scene of a hit and run or car accident. It would provide a learning opportunity for all involved. But it would also mean that the response times to call of dog bites were about to be responded to in a reasonable amount of time.
- You don't get into a car accident and flee the scene.
- Should be a crime to leave the scene of a dog bite
- It's the same as a car accident. Any decent human would stay on scene of an accident of any kind if authorities are required to attend.
- If the dog is at fault, the owner should be responsible for contact information and should wait for an officer if the case/dog needs to be fined or taken to court.
- Dog owner is responsible for it
- A "viscous" dog is almost always the result of bad/irresponsible ownership and is the responsibility of the owner when a dog attacks or harms somebody/another dog. This will also help reduce the stigma and just put the blame on a breed
- No different than remaining at the scene of a vehicle incident. Treat it as a hit and run and similar consequence.
- Dog guardians should be accountable and responsible for the outcomes of their dog's behaviour.
- Owners need to be available for contact if a serious incident occurs and should be prevented from fleeing a scene.
- It's the right thing to do
- They are responsible for their dog biting. They are the one who raised that dog and failed to teach their dog not to bite.
- Breed specific legislation is wrong and uneducated
- Just like a car accident but this is fully related to injury so of course they should have to remain
- If at least one of the parties wishes to involve the authorities then all involved (incl. witnesses) should remain at the scene. Depending on the situation, when a dog attacks and injures another dog, it should be required for the attacking dog's owner to cover veterinary expenses with some exceptions (such as if the incident was initially provoked by the injured dog).

- Think of it like a car accident; the owner should be legally held accountable, it is their dog (just as if they hit someone else with their car).
- Absolutely yes. And the owner of the dog that bites must be responsible for any related vet expenses.
- While other factors may be at play a owner must remain in control of their animal at all times
- i can't see how ppl would stay though
- Because then you would get both sides of the story
- If your animal has caused harm to another being it should be your responsibility to make sure that the proper information has been shared I.e. car accidents
- Owner can be required to stay on scene provided that neither the animal owner and the person bitten are required to talk with an enforcement officer.
- I've been bit by many small dogs and the owners brush it off as "oh they are just little and your fine" while they just leave, instead of taking responsibility for their [removed] dog.
- ..
- People are responsible for their pets and should be held accountable.
- Too many fakes names or just leaving happens. The dog and it's owner need to stay there, no question
- If a dog attacks another animal or person, contact information should definitely be shared.
- I believe all details should be shared with an enforcement officer so that the individual harmed is treated justly.
- Owners should always be present
- I think it is very important because in many cases they just walk away and thus can't be held liable for the subsequent costs incurred by the injured party.
- I would consider the owner leaving the scene of the incident as equivalent to living the scene of an accident.
- Owner's need to be held responsible for the actions of their pet. This includes the financial side of these incidents (veterinary/ medical costs) as well as ensuring the incidents are recorded.
- That way the person who has been bit can confirm current vaccination status
- Just like a hit and run, an owner of a dog that has bitten should remain at the scene and be accountable for the behavior of the dog.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for the actions of their pet.
- It is important to have all the information about the animals involved, for both/all parties. Should an animal need medical attention.
- Yes, for reasons of liability
- How else is a victim to have a chance at compelling compensation for the costs incurred due to an attack, if the owner is free to leave the scene? An owner could be involved in multiple attacks by his animal with no accountability. Citizens shouldn't be put in the position where they have to choose between following or recording an owner "thereby possibly further risking their safety" and letting the owner walk away, along with their chances for compensation and justice.

- I believe if your dog bites someone you need to stay until help or a police officer arrives
- In order to take financial responsibility
- "otherwise its like a hit and run? u cant cause damage to someone and then just leave the scene, u are liable for any damage or harm
- ur dog causes"
- This is demonstrating responsibility aka responsible pet ownership
- it is similar to leaving the scene of a crime in my mind, my only concern would be people abusing this like they already do when calling the police a lot of the times as a threat.
- The owner is responsible for the dog's behavior and as a result the owner should have to answer for any wrongdoings by the dog
- The dog owner should take responsibility for the incident, as well as provide any additional information to the enforcement officer.
- well this seems obvious, like leaving the scene of a car accident
- Several times the offenders leave. If there is significant damage to the human or animal, it should be treated like a hit and run of the offender leaves. Because it can take bylaw to respond, perhaps exchanging information (like in a car accident) would suffice.
- there needs to be severe penalties if they do not stay. Owners names should also be made public
- But only if the dog that bit can be contained/controlled in a safe manner (on leash with proper control by the owner, in a crate or in a vehicle.) Remaining at the scene should only be done if everyone's safety can be guaranteed.
- Pet owners need to be responsible for their pets, they are the ones who train them so just like car insurance you pay the expenses caused by the incident.
- I support sharing information if there are concerns about the severity of the bite.
- We need to hold the owners of the dogs who bite accountable.
- Because it's the right thing to do! if my dog bit someone, or their pet, I sure as hell wouldn't run off.
- Its the responsible thing to do
- It protects both sides having the pet owner being able to defend their dog if the person who the dog bit was antagonizing the dog.. they should get a ticket
- People still have to take accountability for their pet.
- because it falls on the owner regardless NOT THE BREED. that is some regressive and shameful thoughts to think it would be best to ban a specific breed of dog and honestly quite sickening to think the city i grew up in would consider such a thing.
- Get the owner has a bad dog... get them training, it's not the dogs fault the owner is incompetent
- It is responsible to stay on scene after any accident, a dog bite included. That said, there should be considerations made that allow for the person to remove their dog from a stressful and traumatic situation. For example, if my dog bit a person, I would want to remove her from that situation quickly since there was obviously a trauma/stress/trigger which provoked her to bite. Dogs almost never bite for no reason. I would communicate with the person that I would be right back, I would secure the dog (for instance, in my house or vehicle), then I would return to administer first aid, if necessary, swap contact info, etc. Removing your dog to safety as long as you return or make arrangements should not be penalized.

- A responsible dog owner would remain at the scene of an incident to talk with an enforcement officer obviously if the dog bit a person or other animal there is a problem with the dog.
- The person whose animal has acted out should be required to provide their information, although If their animal is unable to stay on the scene due to behaviour or injury, the owner should be able to provide contact information and then be able to wait at home or in a safe place for further action.
- Any breed should be held accountable.
- The owner of the animal who bit another dog should also share their contact information with the owner whose animal was bit so that they can compensate for their veterinary fees associated with the dog attack.
- As the owner it is YOUR responsibility to be in control of your dog and you should be liable for any vet or hospital bills that that person or animal gets from your animal.
- The owner should remain at the scene of an incident regardless of what happens. They should not be able to get away without trying to deal with the incident.
- I believe that that should be the ethical thing to do, it's also better this way because then you can provide information about your dog such as if they have had all there vaccinations.
- Same as a car crash, it is just the right thing to do.
- As in most other conflicts (car accident, physical fight, etc), the owner should have to stay on scene to either call the appropriate authorities and/or collect information in case monetary compensation is sought (vet bills, ambulance ride, etc).
- They absolutely have a responsibility as dog owners, to admit fault when/if something happens. I know too many people who have been left with a dead pet, or an astronomical vet bill because of negligence. They should absolutely be expected at a legal level, to stay at the scene.
- Of course. People need to be held responsible for bringing their dog to a dog park that shouldn't be there. When my Staffordshire terrier was bit by a german shepherd, i spoke with the owner.
- Owners should be held responsible, but they should not fear their dog being killed as a result of an accident.
- The owner should be required to provide their contact information
- Owners should absolutely be required to stay at the scene, and share contact information.
- It depends what is best for the situation. If it makes sense for the owner and dog to leave to prevent further issues then they should be able to leave.
- Only if the bite results in substantial injury.
- Sharing information is important. Just as if there was a car accident, you should keep the information of the other individual for your records
- owners should take responsibility for the dog they raised.
- You should do that no matter the incident
- I had an experience with this situation which in retrospect I feel was unfair. I stayed and my dog was given a warning. She was a herding breed and a pup so was deemed aggressive because the other owner called the authorities. Had I just left I wouldn't have had to rehome my dog. I stayed because I thought the other owner had overblown the situation.

- If your dog has bitten anyone it is your responsibility to stay at the scene and meet the needs of the people affected/involved.
- The dog is their responsibility
- "Vaccine history (rabies) is important to know.
- Exceptions should be allowed however, if the dog/owner needs medical attention."
- The owner or responsible party should be held responsible for any injuries to people or other animals.
- I think it is important that the owner takes responsibility especially if there are vet bills to be paid
- This should be self explanatory, there was an incident, someone or something was hurt, possibly killed you don't just run away.
- I think that's it's very important for dog owners to talk responsibility of there dog no matter what the breed is
- The dog handler is the party responsible for the damage. The same rules should apply for any situation where you're responsibly for bodily harm to someone (ex. If you damage property with a motor vehicle, the operator is responsible and expected to provide contact information). There is also the health safety component in regards to disease (ex rabies vaccination status, etc).
- At the least they should exchange information. We need to enforce obedience training and if it is severe I expect the attacker to pay for vet bills
- It is necessary to document the incident for future resolution and to maintain a record of the dog's behaviour
- It's like a car accident. Also, the attacked individual has no opportunity to perpetuate a fraud by making the attack "appear" worse than it was. Video footage of the resulting attack should be mandatory when possible.
- Same rules as a car accident.
- Part of being a responsible dog owner.
- Pretty self explanatory the same way you're supposed to stay at the scene if you it another car..
- You are responsible for your dog.
- As a dog owner, these are the actions I would take and I would expect other dog owners to do. If your child bit another child you wouldn't just run away.
- There are not enough owners being accountable for their dog's behaviour.
- The owner is responsible for their dog and should provide all information as required. I've had the experience where a lady's dog bite my dog and she took off without giving her information we had vet costs to cover for the damage done.
- As with all accidents no matter what is involved the parties involved should be required to remain at the scene.
- To make sure the person/animal was okay at got the right medical attention
- Yes, as the owner should be able to plead their case if necessary
- its your responsibility to be in control of your animal staying at the scene is the right thing to do

- To confirm the dog has been updated with vaccine and how big the damage was
- To obtain accurate information they should be waiting for an enforcement officer. Otherwise freely showing government issued ID.
- I expect someone in a vehicle accident to stay and provide insurance information. I would also expect someone in a bite situation to do the same. I do respect the owners right to find a way to safely contain their dog while they deal with paperwork, which may mean returning the dog to its home or a vehicle. Having the dog right there while people share information is not a safe situation.
- If a dog were to bite or attack my dogs they should be required to stay on scene. They should be held responsible for any injuries to my dogs, especially those that result in a vet bill.
- The owner of the dog that is responsible for the bite, should be held accountable, similar to that of an assault.
- Yes, unless the dog is really riled up and it may be safer to actually provide the contact information first, secure the dog at home and then have the owner return to the scene of the incident to meet with the enforcement officer.
- I believe that this would allow enforcement officers to more effectively reprimand the owner of the animal. I believe that most negative behavior of animals is due to owner negligence.
- Both sides of every story deserve to be heard and information should be shared the same as in any other accident/incident.
- I am surprised this isn't already a rule as it makes sense for a person to remain at a scene to provide information much like a vehicle incident
- If a dog bites another person or animal, it's the owner and only owners fault for not providing proper training.
- There should be consequences for animal behaviour especially when it results in harm to someone or someone's pet. If there is no repercussions for fleeing, why would anyone stay and risk being charged?
- As the victim of a pit bull attack that cost me $1000s of dollars in vet Bill's and a diagnosis of PTSD, I support this rule as the owner fled the scene and when caught, refused to pay the vet bills
- Exchange of information is needed as the severity of the bite isn't always known right away (if bite gets infected)
- Should be no need for explanation, this should be just like a traffic accident or similar. I've been bit by a dog in a public park and have also been approached by threatening dogs in public parks (dogs off leash in on-leash areas no less) and I'm tired of irresponsible pet owners.
- Owners have to take responsibility for their pet and what their pet does.
- Yes because it is the owners responsibility for the dog biting and if they know they can be aggressive it is the owner that should face the penalty not the dog
- All owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions. Keeping the owners accountable if their dog attacks/bites should be a priority. No dog owner should be able to get away with their dog attacking a human or other animal.
- Bad pet behaviour is the responsibility of the owner. Period.

- Dog attacks should be treated like any other offence. You can't leave from a car accident, the same should be said for dog fights
- Unless the parties involved come to a mutual agreement, both should stay on scene- same as a MVA
- We have this rule for vehicle accidents, it should be the same if an animal harms someone.
- I believe it is important in order for safety but believe if it makes matters worse they should remove the animal for safety but sign we registering dog with city that if during an animal attack a victim has the right to take a picture of the owner or vehicle if they leave
- Yes, I feel like a lot of irresponsible owners talk down the severity of the situation. If you got in a car accident that resulted in injury/damage to someone else's vehicle, you would be charged for a hit and run. Anything that results in injury should require those who are accountable for the animal to stay on scene.
- This is just common sense
- A dog bite is an assault so it is not ok for the dog owner to take off, especially as there are often huge costs the victim has to undertake in terms of vet bills. The dog owner needs to be held accountable.
- I support it with the caveat that if the owner leaves their contact info in order to leave to contain their animal, they would not face consequences for this action.
- Yes, under any circumstance where person or another dog sustains any harm
- Hear both sides of the story
- Unless unsafe to do so. Both parties should remain on site.
- They should be responsible for damages.
- I fully believe that a dog's behaviour is learned from the owner so the owner is more responsible than the animal for any incidents.
- I support the requirement to share contact information, but not requiring people to wait for an officer. Bylaw has taken hours to respond to complaints in the past
- I think this rule should only apply when the incident results in moderate or significant injury to people and other animals.
- The owners of dogs that have attacked other animals or people need to be held accountable.
- I don't think it's responsible for a person to run off if their animal has bit.
- It is helpful to know the offending dog's vaccine history and it should be determined if this dog is a repeat offender as it may need restrictions such as a mandatory muzzle
- I can't believe this ISN'T already a rule that's in place!!
- Owner must take responsibility of pet.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to deal with the situation and be held accountable
- There are two sides to every story and sometimes dog attacks happen and it's not the owner's fault. Some dogs just don't like each other and sometimes it's dogs that are not properly trained. Owners should also have to be trained to handle their pet.
- Only if safe to do so for owner and animal(s) involved and this gives all information from both sides of incident as it may bring clarity and ease of information regarding the situation

- If the bite is severe and the person or animal needs medical treatment the offending dog owner should pay the bill!!!
 - People should have a way of contacting the person who's dog bit them in case they need to inform them if anything.
 - I think it's reasonable to do so in some cases. In other cases maybe just exchanging information (or even pet licensing information? Assuming that pet licensing could be made more widely known and available (a LOT of Calgarians aren't aware that you need to license pets, or don't have the resources to do so.) Im imagining it somewhat similar to exchanging info after a car accident. In some cases you need to stay but in others you're free to go after exchanging info.
 - Because it's their responsibility and they should be held accountable and talk to police.
 - I've heard too many stories about people getting bitten and the dog owner running away with the dog. Owners need to take responsibility for their dog's behavior
 - people should take responsibility for their pet's actions in the case of attacks at dog parks/etc
 - "The fact that a city is trying to put bans/control measures on a specific breed is repulsive. A pit bulls bite is NOT the most powerful do bc bite. Their bite is NOT on top of the PSI list. There are many other breeds with jaws just as strong but are not mentioned at all. This is no different than racism in humans. Unbelievable how [removed] disgusting pieces of garbage humans are in charge of things they have no knowledge in and don't even do the research to fact check themselves.
- You should be embarrassed."
 - The dog owner who attacked should absolutely stay and talk to authorities as they are the owner and responsible for their pet.
 - I think in extreme circumstances, definitely. If it's a minor encounter, there's really no point.
 - I think if owners must remain at scene and if not, can receive a fine, it would be beneficial for the city of Calgary to understand what breeds are causing issues and which individuals shouldn't be allowed to have a dog if they can't probably train them. It is unfair for a dog to bite and there be no repercussions. I also think owners should be fined and dogs be monitored before getting in trouble. Dogs can be behaved well if they have responsible owners.
 - Their dog, their responsibility. It's no different than hitting someone in a car.
 - I believe that it is the owners responsibility
 - Common sense says to exchange information?
 - I also think they should pay for any damages like vet Bill's as well
 - It is important for pet owners to take accountability for their pets actions.
 - Take ownership for both your animals as well as your own actions.
 - Contact information exchanged, with photo ID
 - Depending on the situation
 - People need to be responsible for the behavior of their animals
 - If an officer is necessary, then maybe they should stay.

- The dog is the responsibility of the owner. An owner should be able to control their dog the way they would control a car. If you hit someone with your car you must stay and exchange information.
- It's no different that a vehicle collision or an assault. They should have to stay and speak to authorities.
- Information should be shared between involved parties and City should have tracking information.
- Accountability. The owner knows the dog best.
- The owner is responsible for their dogs actions and must answer for them.
- Can't run from a problem
- You should take responsibility for what has happened. But if the animal needs urgent care and is unsafe it should not be required although information should be shared just as it should be shared with a car accident.
- This is no different than a traffic accident. If you cause someone or something harm you need to be held responsible
- Its your dog, the dog is trained by you. It is not the animals fault it is the owners.
- It is the owners that need to be held liable for their animals actions. Owners should be educated that their animals = their responsibility.
- To hear both sides and for admission of guilt.
- Yes, the owner should be liable the pain and suffering of the victim and there should be documentation for dog bites to track problem dogs.
- As a responsible owner/human being. If your dog was to bite you should do the right thing and stay at the scene.
- I do support the requirement for both parties to remain on scene for the bylaw officer to investigate
- Like a hit and run
- Owners need to be responsible.
- Would make the process easier for the victim and easier to track the offending owner and dog
- Like any accident, the person's involved stay on site.
- That is simply common courtesy
- The owner is responsible for their pet, if there is an attack they need to stay (or provide a way to be contacted if they cannot), so that follow up can happen to ensure another attack does not happen again
- Yes and no, the dog should be removed from the situation to lessen tensions and the possibility of another attack but its the owners responsibility to ensure the victim is okay and to provide their information. If the dog is unable to be removed without the owner then unsure of how one would assist a victim/provide information.
- A vicious bite is an offense and owners need to be held accountable...many vicious dogs can be little ankle biters that instigate the whole attack and then its their owners who run away or cry wolf
- Proper dog ownership
- Self explanatory.

- I think it's the responsible thing to do- it's your pet and it should be in your control- if not it should be muzzled or kept away from public, so yes you should stay and give your info in case further steps are required
- If the bite is serious enough, there should be an officer present and contact information given by both the owner of the dog and the victim
- The owner is responsible for its dogs actions
- Owners should be held personally liable for any and all damages caused by their animal. I believe criminal charges should be filed in many cases.
- Dog owners are legally and financially responsible for their dogs and their dogs behavior, they should be held accountable.
- That would be the right thing to do.
- Sometimes damages and injuries are not immediately visible. Staying to supply contact insures there's a way to reach the owners should a delayed outcome arise.
- I feel that the incident should be discussed with the 2 parties concerned. If the 'culprit' dog owner does not do so, an enforcement officer could be contacted.
- Yes, it is the responsibility of ANY BREED, ANY DOG OWNER to stay and ensure that the accident is covered. Similar to an vehicular accident.
- It's imperative to obtain information about the dog and the owner is the person who would have that info.
- If your dog injured someone you should stay at the scene
- Similar to a vehicle collision. People should remain on scene
- I think its a good idea so that both sides of the story are given at the same time.m
- There is nowhere to comment on the above, but it is ridiculous to treat pitbulls and bully breed dogs as different from other dogs. The majority of the time these dogs are much more loving and better behaved than other dogs. They are sweet natured and so loving. It isn't right to penalize them or people who want to own such special dogs simply on their breed. If a dog is aggressive that is a different story, but that is across breeds and in my experience bully breed dogs are much less likely to be aggressive naturally than other dogs.
- I worked at the humane society for a time, and saw how people's stories could change once they've talked with other people to help shape the story. It's a lot of he said she said, and I think if people had to explain at the time of the incident, things could be more honest.
- Yes, the dog owner should remain at the scene to provide information to the victims and law enforcement.
- If they arrive in a timely manner and can be respectful.
- The dog is his owner's responsibility. Thus he should of course stay on the scene. As you are supposed to do when you are involved in a car accident.
- Be a responsible owner, it's not the breeds it's the lack of responsibility from owners
- The owner will need to provide information on whether or not the dog has had its shots. Makes sense for them to have to stay at the scene.
- If an owner flees the scene they are trying to hide from the incident.

- They should stay to talk about why the incident happened to begin with or explain the situation from both sides.
- Is that not providing a witness statement to an incident??
- So that the owner can be identified in case of repeat offences, and possibly so the dog could be tested for any transmittable diseases.
- Yes, I think the owner should take responsibility. The owner should be required to go to reactive training to support the dog.
- Too many owners run away or the dog has never had veterinarian care
- Yes they definitely should because a lot of dog owners after their animal is engaged in an attack tend to just run away/are difficult to find again. It should be an offense if they escape the scene.
- Don't let the coward get away. Unleeeessss the dog is uncontrollable in which case it should not be in public
- It's like a hit and run if they leave
- You have to stay at the scene of an accident that you're involved in so why wouldn't you be expected to do the same in a situation involving your pet.
- They're responsible for the training and control of their pet, even if well-mannered, dogs are still animals that will sometimes act on nervous energy or an instinct. It's the owner's duty to control that, and their responsibility to care for anyone harmed in the case they lose control.
- The owner should be held responsible for their dogs training , the dog is not necessarily always at fault.
- If a trip to the vet is necessary, then the owner of the aggressive dog should be providing compensation. Accidents do happen when dogs are playing, but pet owners should be able to have a civil discussion to determine what next steps are necessary (not running away).
- Regardless if it was intentional or not, if you're an owner you're responsible for the dogs behavior.
- Any good person would stay and help and also go to vet with victim to hand over their credit card for the vet bills of victim
- If you cannot control your animal and there is an incident, you are responsible for payment of any medical treatments the victim(s) require. Same as if you cannot control your vehicle and get into a car accident...
- Fines should be upheld for dog owners fleeing the scene of an incident
- Seems only fair and the responsible thing to do
- They should remain. Treat it like it is a crime scene/car accident.
- Yes but this would be very difficult to communicate and enforce. This can come down to two different perspectives of the incident between the owners (arguments), and may just end up taking enforcement officer resource time away from other duties.
- Part of responsible ownership is to take responsibility for your dog's poor actions. I do believe that the reason for the bite must be assessed though - even the best dogs will lash out if provoked, hurt or scared.
- Yes, that's the responsible action to take.
- The people/owners of the aggressor should be responsible to pay vet bills of the injured dog.

- Yes, when it is safe to do so. However if the owner is not able disengage the dog from the incident, they should have to give their contact info to victim so the police can speak with them later.
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog and their lack of control/care resulted in the bite.
- Only if there is a somewhat decent amount of blood drawn, and other dog would need to be taken to the vet right away is in somewhat serious condition.
- Seems like common sense. The handler or owner of the dog that bit should be required to cover all vet or therapy costs of the human or animal that was bitten including physical therapy.
- NO MATTER THE BREED. DO NOT DISCRIMINATE.
- It's important for owners to be responsible for any incident regarding their pets and the safety of everyone involved in an incident involving their pet.
- Too many owners take off after an attack or situation
- Most dogs don't bite unless provoked. Even if it's a kid/adult sometimes they go to pet animals that don't want to be pet. The animal didn't consent and protected the owner. So the owner should be there to be able to defend
- The owner can provide clarification, aggravating or mitigating factors
- Bites from animals can often come with medical complications, that should be paid for by the guilty party - but not if their dog was acting in self defense. If a chihuahua bit a pitbull, and the pitbull bit the chihuahua back causing serious injury, the pitbull would not be at fault, as it was protecting itself. It needs to be recognized that although they don't do as much damage, small dogs biting people or other dogs need to be treated equally as large dogs or certain breeds behaving the same way. A dog's size does not excuse their owner from training them properly.
- If a dog attacks another dog or person or pet, this should be recorded so that the owner can be mandated to get the dog proper training
- too many times fake info is given or people run away
- You should be responsible for the damage done, vet bills and so on
- The owner should be required to provide contact information to an enforcement officer, however if the animal is in a "high emotional" state and is at risk of biting again the owner should be able to remove their animal from the situation to decrease the risk of another incident.
- Understanding animal behaviour means some dogs are provoked into biting; even by a person. Dog bites are simply not as black and white as the dog decided to bite someone because they are dangerous. While I agree this is true in some cases, it is not true in all cases. If my dog was being cornered or attacked and decided to bite back, I would not blame the dog! If this happened I would expect this to actually be heard and listened to by animal services and would stick around to explain the situation absolutely. ANY breed of dog can bite someone, ANY BREED.
- I believe in being the bigger person. Share both sides of the story
- The owner needs to take responsibility but the animal should not be punished for the owner's incompetence and being irresponsible
- I think that humans should be held accountable for their dogs behaviour. A dogs behaviour is generally directly correlated to the humans behaviour (either the owner or victim). A dog, regardless of breed, is a product of their environment. And their aggression is in response to an action, be it visible by humans or not. Better owner training is required before a dog should be euthanized

- It's important to take ownership of this kind of behavior.
- you are responsible for your pet and should be held accountable for its actions.
- This is the only way that bylaws and appropriate follow up can be done
- any injury to or by a third party should be required to remain at the scene. (Unless both parties agree that it is unnecessary.)
- Much like a car, you need to stay and exchange information
- The owner of a dog who bites another animal or person should be held accountable and they should have to stay at the site just like a driver who crashes into another person's car.
- A dog bite can cause permanent bodily damage. If the owner is not required by law to remain at the scene of the incident, they have no incentive to do so and it could be difficult to locate them in the future.
- People can't walk away if it's their responsibility
- The OWNER needs to be held accountable for the action of their pet. Both sides of the story should be told.
- Important to document bites and the dogs/owners responsible.
- It's common decency to stay at the scene, share information and pay any required vet bills if a dog bites unprovoked.
- It's like a car accident, don't let your dog bite and run.
- For the protection of the animal or people involved it is essential for that a law is in place to exchange information. This is extremely important in reducing future bites or vicious behaviour as initial incidents will be recorded and documented.
- If one of more parties recommends they owner stay then yes. Especially if vet bills are required.
- Yes, however it is also important to consider they may have to leave the scene and come back in order to get the dog home (or in a secured space) safely and away from the heightened situation.
- I think that is fair. However, some people who are bit by dogs will take advantage of the situation so you have to be careful.
- similar to a car accident, i feel information needs to be exchanged should there be veterinary costs, or possible bylaw infractions
- I support this answer. However, what happens if there is no other person to take the dog home? What happens if the dog who bit the human is a smaller dog?
- As a responsible pet owner it is your job to remain at the scene and take accountability for your pets actions.
- part of being a responsible dog owner and citizen
- Within reasonable wait times. Would also accept a registration of complaint online
- Dog owners should be held accountable or be able to dispute the event - dogs cannot explain their actions. I don't necessarily blame the breed - all breeds can be sweet and aggressive.
- They should remain on scene however we cannot always assume the animal is at fault

- Leaving the scene of a crime is illegal. If your dog bites someone or another dog unprovoked you are responsible.
- Yes; however, only if it is safe to do so. In some instances, the owner has to remove their dog from the scene for safety reasons (e.g., another attack possible/ not under control); however, whenever possible and safe they should stay and connect with enforcement.
- Regardless of which dog is at fault running away never helps. Also laws need to be evaluated for who is responsible when an off leash dog comes up to an on leash dog and causes a fight! This is not the on leash dogs fault!!! There are many laws that need to be examined!! Any type of law that has a specific dog breed is not effective! The humans (owners) are the problem!!!
- Medical bill and concerns can then be discussed and addressed
- Logical that the owner would be required to be accountable and cooperative.
- The owner is and must be fully responsible for the behavior of his or her dogs
- Both sides need a voice and uncovering facts must be the goal of the enforcement officer.
- Provides a way of contact for the people/animals involved.
- Best to track minor incidents in an effort to avoid larger incidents before they happen.
- I don't see how this situation is any different than in the case of a motor vehicle accident where there is an injury. The parties involved are expected to remain at the scene. That should be the case in this situation too.
- Strict fines if an owner leaves the scene.
- Dog owners and bite victims should remain present to provide context of the situation to the enforcement officer.
- I just dont want to see any animal euthanized because of people period
- I;m sick of people not taking responsibility for the behaviours of their nasty dogs; if they don't remain at the incident scene, issue them a massive fine and destroy the animal - you have to be tough or people don't take the rules seriously
- Unfortunately it seems to be the pets that pay the price for irresponsible/negligent owners. Owners should be held accountable for the behavior of their animals
- Owner must held responsible for their animals
- n/a
- Legally, dogs are property/chattel. If a driver hits a car or injures a person, the law states they must stay at the scene of the crime. If an owner is in possession of a dog, it would make sense to apply a similar law where the owner of the animal must stay at the scene. We don't allow hit and runs, and we should not allow bite and runs.
- Regardless of breed if your dog bites, you are responsible
- Ultimately the owner is responsible for their pet. Be it a dog, cat, bird, etc. I feel like the scope of blaming the animal is misguided and we should focus on making sure there are adequate owners teaching the right types of behaviour for their pets.
- You are responsible for your animal. If they cause damage or injury to anything, you need to own up to what happened.
- That's just responsible and respectful for ANY dog that bites.

- A responsible dog owner would do so anyway.
- maintain responsibility for the actions of your animal
- Ensures the owner is held accountable for the actions of the animal.
- It should be like getting into a car accident. You exchange information and wait together until an office is able to come by.
- I think it's important for an enforcement officer to hear both sides of the story to determine if there were other factors involved in the dogs behaviour (ie. another dog or persons approach was inappropriate and your dog reacted)
- The owner of an animal is responsible for what that animal does, period. The owner should have to remain at the scene so all information can be exchanged and a potentially dangerous animal can be dealt with.
- Then the person can stay and explain the situation, or be issued a ticket.
- the owner is responsible for their dogs actions not the dog also the "victim" has a responsibility if the failed to heed owners warning.
- My concern is the offending dog owner will not abide by such a rule
- If someone or another animal is injured, especially to the point of life threatening conditions then both parties must be expected to exchange information and wait for emergency response
- Dog owners should by right make sure everyone is ok and it should be reported. But let's try to make that a law. It won't. People will run
- Yes. One time a dog attacked my dog, and the owner ran off with their dog and didn't speak a word to me. I would like it to be a rule so that doesn't happen to anyone else.
- I do think it's important that the owner be as cooperative as possible.
- Unless they need a minute to remove their animal from the "trouble" or emergency care is needed for a person or animal.
- It's the owner responsible to do so if the animal attacks another animal or person
- The owners are who need to be responsible here. Rottweilers and Doberman's can have the same amount of bite strength as bully breeds so it is the owner that should be responsible
- Dog bites can be due after the animal is provoked and if the owner has asked the other party member to step away/remove the cause and the request went ignored leading to a bite then the owners representation and word should be taken seriously. That way any officer can have both sides of the story immediately and assess from there.
- The owner is the one responsible for the dog. The dog is simply acting within the rights that it was taught by its owner and no breed should be blamed for negligent owners
- When damage is caused to another vehicle it is required - it should definitely be required when the damage is done to a living being.
- All pet owners who cannot contain their animals should be required to obtain training for said animal if given the opportunity to keep their animal after any incident in which an injury occurs has taken place. Legally, the owner should be present to the scene of any injury until dismissed by a bylaw officer. In the event that a fine be written or an injury has occurred, the owner should be responsible for all fees associated with their animals behaviours. If they leave the scene when it is not appropriate to do so, they should be found guilty of leaving the scene of an accident and be punished with increased fines or legal charges based on the severity of the incident.

- Too often owners of problem dogs simply leave the scene in an attempt to avoid responsibility. These people should be held accountable, just as you are not allowed to leave the scene of a major car accident (ie: hit and run)
- They should have to give their information to both the cop and the victim
- It's not unlike remaining at the scene of a vehicle accident you're involved in.
- People need to be held responsible for their dog's actions.
- Because my dog was bite and the owner took off and cost me over 500 dollars at the vet from the damage
- It allows for the owner to explain their side ex. if someone was harassing their dog
- People need to be held accountable for their actions. They should be held liable for actions of their pets.
- The owner, not the animal is generally responsible for a dog bite and should be there to 1) share their side of the story 2) make it easier to keep track of them
- The victim and the owner of the dog should remain, just as both drivers should remain in a vehicular incident.
- It's an important part of collecting necessary information
- Ultimately the dog owner is responsible. Treat like any other offence. "Leaving the scene"
- I work in a vet hospital. The number of attacks that come in with no information of the offending party is alarming as they literally run away.
- They need to give their statement
- Animal bites don't happen if A. The dog is not intimidated/teased ex parents not watching children/pets irritating the dog and not paying attention to warning signs and B. Proper education/training has been given to the animal and owner and other people ex. Learn warning signs of aggression in dogs, using proper harnesses to identify nervous/friendly dogs
- If a dog bites, their owner is responsible for all injuries. Common sense as the dog cannot pay for injuries incurred.
- If the dog bites a person the owner should be required to take responsibility for it. Should not be legal to "bite and run"
- It makes the most logical sense however how is it enforced? Fine for leaving the scene? How do you contact bylaw in an after hours situation? Could an exchange of contact info and licensing info be exchanged similar to a car accident? Difficult to police.
- You should remain at the scene of any accident or incident you're a part of, with or without dogs involved. That's just common sense.
- Leaving is like leaving the scene of a car accident. Heavy fines and charges should be implemented if the "bite and run" owner is caught.
- If you have to do this when you hit someone with your car why wouldn't it be the same with your dog.
- I think this is important to get both sides of the story
- Common courtesy

- I think this is valuable to hear both sides of what happened. Sometimes dogs are not well trained and are the cause of the incident, but other times I have seen non owners blatantly ignore the request of the owner, and be the actual cause of the incident in the first place.
- if a dog bites some one the dog owner should stay and give info. Kind of like a car accident you still give your info.
- People need to be responsible for their pets.
- In the chaos that surrounds an dog attacking and biting someone, the victim is often not calm enough to get all the information from the owner and often the owner has little interest in staying around to take responsibility.
- This would be smart considering some people can give fake information.
- It's just like getting in a car accident. The owner is responsible whether a vehicle or a dog caused the damage.
- A person who is the victim of a dog bite has a right to make sure the dog has been vaccinated and to request documentation proving such.
- I've heard of alot of dog bites and attacks happening and either the owner is no where to be seen or the owner takes off. The owners of biting and aggressive dogs should be required by law to stay at the scene.
- People are responsible for their dogs. It's unfair to target all dogs and not problem owners. Please crack down on problem owners and explore the possibility of having them no longer allowed dogs if they continue to be a problem.
- Remaining at the scene helps officers understand the full story and hear both accounts of what has occurred. Additionally, this ensures that the right dog and dog owner is held responsible.
- It's called taking responsibility for your dogs action.
- This does not already happen?
- If it's a tiny little bite no.
- This increases accountability on the part of owners but also gives them a chance to explain if the dog was provoked by teasing or something by the victim.
- It should be treated similar to a car accident both parties stay until officers arrive
- If it's a small bite where no blood, severe pain, and or vet visits occur then no you shouldn't have to stay. Although if any of those conditions happen yes absolutely you should be forced to stay and be held accountable for your dogs actions.
- If any dog of any breed bites or attacks anyone, the owner of that dog should be held accountable and responsible for the outcome of incident. Not the dog, if the owner cannot display the ability to properly train their dog, then the dog should be removed from that persons cate.
- Should be held responsible for his dog's attacks.
- The owner should be required to stay at the scene to exchange information in case the bite is severe so the victim has the option to sue in case of large medical or vet bills related to the incident
- I think it's valuable to know who owns/has trained the animal that bit a person, but not to punish the dog.

- The enforcement officer needs to hear both sides and this way if it wasn't the dog's fault then that can be discussed right away
- Only if the incident is severe. Accidents happen and they should be treated as accidents, not crimes. As police are not needed at every fender bender the same should be with all incidents.
- No different then a hit and run, stay and take accountability
- The situation should be explained with all present. Sometimes a dog is spooked from trauma and not normally vicious then all areas should be explored.
- Like a car accident.. even if it was accidental an owner is responsible for the actions of their dog
- I have been attacked by a vicious dog and the owner left promptly. I believe they should have been held accountable
- The dog owner is responsible for the behaviour of the dog. I do not believe being breed specific is called for.
- They need to take full responsibility for the incident
- Victim would need medical attention, the doctor would need the dogs medical records from its veterinarian.
- People need to take responsibility for their pets
- as a dog owner, if a dog attacks the owner should exchange information, and allow an investigation
- Owners need to be held responsible for the actions of their dogs.
- Owner should take responsibility and make sure person is okay.
- This bylaw would help in follow-up after an aggressive incident to ensure the problem dog is being rehabilitated or better contained.
- Irresponsible owners need to be held accountable. Not the dogs.
- It really depends on how bad the bite/attack is
- I feel that this would be a benefit to the owners on both ends of the attack. The person who owns the dog who attacked would have a chance to explain the situation in the event that their dog was antagonized. Otherwise, if the attacker owner wasn't fit to be a good owner ei: had it's dog in dog fighting, etc. this would allow for authorities to take action and ensure this owner was dealt with accordingly.
- Owners need to be held accountable for their animals actions. This rule needs to be especially enforced for small dogs who often antagonize larger breeds. Larger breeds may be more 'dangerous' due to their strength but poorly trained smaller breeds I feel are the main issue.
- It is important for the dog owner to stay on scene and explain what happened in the incident
- People should be given the option to explain what happened and take responsibility for their dog and the situation
- I see it like being involved in a vehicular accident. If you leave the scene, it is considered a hit and Run. They only issue I see is if the dog is aggravated enough to bite it may be best for the dog to be removed form the scene as other people and animals may be put at risk.
- The owner of a dog who has caused harm needs to take responsibility. It goes to show the owner has not properly trained their dog.

- Just as how you are required to stay at the scene of a car accident, the owner must either remain on scene until enforcement arrives, or have someone (the owner if it is a dog walker per say) attend the scene immediately.
- I believe it's in everyone's best interest to have all of the information gathered at once, allowing informed decisions to be made.
- Even if it's not necessary the dogs fault for what has happened, the owner is still the owner and liable for what has happened.
- So the dog and owner can be tracked and if it's a repeat incident they can be dealt with appropriately
- I think it's only fair that if your dog harms a person or another dog, that contact information should be exchanged and the owner be held responsible for the actions of their dog
- This should be treated like hit-and-run. However, if it is to be implemented, there would need to be a commitment for a law enforcement officer to be sent out as soon as a call is received.
- This should already be in place.
- You would have to remain at the scene of a car accident, an animal incident should also require a trade of information - including smaller breeds.
- It's the owner that is responsible. And too often you will see the person left behind exaggerating or out and out lying about the incident.
- If a persons dog bites someone they should have to stay their. Until the person the dog bit or an officer says they can go
- Dogs and or owners with a history of aggression towards people or other dog's should be tracked and restricted as such.
- If a dog bites someone severely enough the owner should be willing to support the victim. But in some cases it makes way more sense for the aggravated dog to leave the scene as well to calm it down.
- So they have a chance to prove whether or not their dog acted out of self defence and to give information
- It should be the same expectations as with a motor vehicle accident.
- People should only be forced to stay if there are bite marks, cause lots of people like to cry wolf. I think that role changes are doing to cause a lot of problems
- it's the same as a hit and run
- My dog was attacked (unprovoked) by a much larger dog that the owner did not have proper control of. The owner tried to run away, refused to give contact info and tried to blame my dog for the attack when we didn't even see it coming.
- I think it's important this way the bylaw officer can advise the owner of that dog the issues at hand
- The pet owner must be responsible for the actions or lack of control of their pet and the damage they may cause.
- This is just common sense and anyone who fails to comply should be charged - I see this scenario the same as a motor vehicle collision and swapping information

- It seems obvious that all parties should remain at the scene of an incident to take responsibility for their dog's actions, provide contact info and speak with an enforcement officer. That is responsible dog ownership.
- Similar to a hit and run. Must stay and take responsibility. If owner/caretaker had to leave they MUST call 311 and leave contact info. Failure to stay at scene, or contact 311 would be a very high fine ie. $1000.
- The owner needs to be held responsible, I think if there was a dog bite maybe order mandated training class.
- Dog bites can be fatal or seriously injure the other party. A responsible owner should pay for their dogs behavior.
- Common sense would be you remind on scene!
- Owners are just at fault as the dog .. They should know their animal well enough to determine if they are ok with others and humans
- They should take ownership for dogs actions.
- The victim might be intimidated at that moment or not be collected enough to think of all the steps they should take. Also I consider a dog attack similar to a vehicle accident. Damage was caused and leaving the scene is a "hit and run".
- Depends on the situation
- Ownership of a dog is similar to ownership of a car. They should not leave the scene.
- It is the responsibility of the owner to manage their pet. The city should be reviewing these rules under that guideline.
- To many people run away from their responsibility if a dog is seriously injured it should be the owner of the dog who bit the person or dog to cover associated costs
- People should have to stay at the scene of any accident. If people knew that their dog wouldn't be instantly guilty and euthanized, (even if the person or other animal instigated the reaction) they may stick around instead of running.
- Yes - it's important to be able to answer questions about the bite if the person needs to go to the hospital or if the other animal needs to go to the vet.
- Too many people try to leave and I feel the owner should always be held responsible for the bite, and any fees associated to the care of a bite
- Common sense. We are responsible for our dogs, if there is a bite incident, we need to take that responsibility.
- Yes
- Like a car accident. Remain at the scene, exchange info and make your case with whatever witnesses you can. Leaving the scene should have similar consequences as a hit and run. A bite is a guaranteed injury and the owner should be responsible for that incident.
- Any dog bite, the owner should stay and help support both animals involved.
- The same reason why people are supposed to stay at the scene of an accident???
- This is sensible providing the owner was present at the incident. If not, they shouldn't be penalized for something they did not know about, but should deal with their dog being at large.

- it's the right thing to do
- I support if the owner or responsible person is present at the time of the incident. If the dog is running at large unsupervised this is a different issue
- If you hit someone/something with your car you must stay behind to exchange information and talk with an enforcement officer so I believe the same rule should be in place for accidents involving animals. If the animal bites and the owner takes off it is like a hit and run.
- Information from the owner is important to establish if the animal is current with required vaccinations and to determine if the animal is a first time offender and be responsible for costs incurred for the bite.
- Reduce likelihood of distorted facts from witnesses and other 3rd parties.
- To many people get away with dog on dog bites and the owners are stuck with the cost to fix their harmed animals
- It's just the right thing to do. Why do you need an explanation?
- Seems like common sense
- Yes, too often I see complaints on our community facebook page of a dog attack where the dog's owner either blamed the victim or fled the scene. They need to be held accountable for their dog's poor behaviour because it is their responsibility to train their pet.
- Just like in a car accidents happen. If there's an incident you stick around and do what you can to make it right and not run away.
- Depends.
- I believe the owner of the dog responsible for injuring another living being should be held responsible for their dogs actions
- The owner should take FULL responsibility for the actions of their own dog.
- Even if enforcement isn't not necessary, this is an opportunity to educate.
- Should the person or animal require further assistance/meds they have contact information.
- Owners must take responsibility for their pets. A misbehaving animal is due, in large part, to the owner's attentiveness (or lack thereof). Owners should be held responsible for their pets' actions.
- Please don't run away from a mistake that was made by the person not properly controlling an animal.
- Yes, must share contact information with the other person or animal owner. But not necessarily in all cases to wait for an enforcement officer - would not be practical for minor incidents.
- This should be part of pet ownership of any animal
- It is better to deal with the situation at hand at the time of the incident than wait, or hope that information can be collected/provided at a later time. That said, if it is an emergency, clearly waiting is not going to be an option in all cases.
- Dog owners are ultimately responsible for their dogs and should always remain at the scene.
- Just like any vehicle accident or pedestrian accident
- Why wouldn't they? It is their dog and they need to be held accountable.
- so they can pay the other owner for vet bills or things like that

- Allows victim to have police officer facilitate some reconciliation given the assault that has occurred and hopefully solve the situation on the spot.
- It's the same as any other accident, you are responsible to make sure the injured are okay
- They must take responsibility for an accident or incidents.
- It's important to hold accountability to the person and animal even if the "attack" is minor.
- Absolutely they should remain and give their information. The dog or dogs should be sieged
- Ownership and liabilities. Must demonstrate accountability and ownership of incident to work out options to resolve
- Owners should be held responsible as they are the ones who was supposed to train the dog to act in an appropriate matter. Hold owners responsible.
- It is important for the owner to be responsible for their dog
- All dog owners should be responsible for the behaviour of their pets. But the approach of the officers need to be trained to be empathetic and understand that some situations are not always black and white. Educational resources need to be on hand, and punishments need to be handed out on a case by case situation. If it's their first offence then have it mandated that they need to go to these behavioural classes (resources handed out). There are some situations where the owner is aware of their dogs anxiety and keeps them controlled and far away. But then other owners lose track of their "friendly" dogs who approach the anxious dog and a dog bite occurs when the owner did everything in their power to keep their distance. Every dog has their space radius around them, and if someone crosses into their space/property are likely to react. Basing judgement on breed and not owners negligence is not the way to handle these situation. Therefore, owners do need to stick around as they would a car accident to state what happened. There will be bias but a trained officer should be able to figure out the truth with witnesses and statements.
- They should stay to provide details and exchange information the same as you would for a car accident.
- Yes, provided the owner is able to control the dog. If having the owner remain at the scene causes the situation to escalate, then it would not be the best approach. The owner she be obligated to provide contact information if they leave the scene.
- They should also have to pay vet bills
- Its no different than a traffic incident
- It's the owners responsibility to train their animal properly, therefore they should take responsibility when something goes wrong.
- It depends of the situation, they should be able to give their information to be contact. However, in most cases this situation will escalate cause more issues and potential having the animal at higher risk.
- The above notes on dogs who may be a "nuisance" is insane and stupid. These kinds of thoughts makes these kinds of dogs more scary, when they are largely big babies.
- No different than an at-fault vehicle accident. You have caused bodily harm and are responsible to own up for it.
- This ensures that any liability and enforcement may is attributed to the dog owner.

- Dog owners should remain at the scene to provide information regarding vaccinations.
- There are 2 sides to every story - the owner should have the right to explain their side and what they witnessed just as well as the victim.
- The owner is responsible for their pet's actions and needs to be held accountable.
- I think it's the right thing to take ownership and try to resolve the incident in the most peaceful way.
- It is the liability and therefore the responsibility of the owner to account for their dog and its wrongdoings.
- It is the dog owners responsibility to manage, control and train their dog. If the dog bites someone, there could be extenuating circumstances that has caused the dog to bite. To make sure that everyone is represented (especially the dog) they owner should step up and stay at the scene of the incident to show proper responsible ownership.
- My dog was bitten and required multiple vet visits yet I was never told what happened to the owner nor any money recovered for costs.
- I believe this is necessary to ensure that all safety measures are put in place to support dog owners and victims.
- I think ALL dog owners should be responsible if they're dog bites. The nature of the bite of it is regarding another animal should be further investigated a dog doesn't bite for no reason especially another animal. Owner should be responsible for vet bills pertaining to the other dogs injuries
- Bad dog owners are bad dog owners
- Dog bites can be traumatizing and dangerous, regardless of breed
- Staying at the scene of a bite incident should be required, leaving the scene should be considered something along the lines of a hit and run situation.
- a responsible owner should hold themselves accountable for there lack of properly training there animal
- If their dog bit another person or another dog, they should definitely remain at the scene and be accountable for their actions.
- They should still remain there but separate from the other dog. Otherwise they will continue to cause issue.
- just the right thing to do
- Leaving the scene of a dog bite incident is like a vehicle hit-and-run.
- It's called responsible pet ownership.
- Too many owners leave the scene and can not be found.
- Of course, otherwise they can possibly do it again.
- Owners should take responsibility but also be able to explain their side of the incident
- All animal attacks are circumstantial. Both party's need to be able to define the parameters of the attack to ensure the proper picture is represented. Dogs are our children and the severity and extent of the situation can be construed if not all parties are able to elaborate on the situation.
- Both sides of the incident (victim and aggressor) need to be present in order to assure there are no false claims due to breed discrimination

- If a dog bites there should be an investigation! Dogs bite out of fear! So what did that person do to provoke the dog! We are humans! Why would we subject our dogs to this type of abuse!
- IF ANY dog, seeing as i've been bit by a chihuahua & needed stitches but have never EVER been but by a pit bull, i would appreciate it greatly if the owner AND dog stayed in scene so that documents can be made stating WHAT KIND OF DOG EXACTLY IT IS, rather than assuming it's a pit bull ;), & record what type of animal is REALLY doing the biting & attacking
- If a person or another animal is attacked and assaulted by the dog, the owners need to be held responsible for the attack. Bad owners have bad dogs. The owner needs to be fined and required to take courses and training for dog ownership and obedience. People are required to know how to handle a vehicle, people need to be required to know how to handle dogs that are dangerous to others if not raised properly.
- Owners should not be allowed to leave the scene of an accident (dog bite) and brush it off. They need to be responsible to help the other dog and/or dog owner in paying for expenses related to injuries.
- The dog owner should be also held responsible
- It's the responsible thing to do. The reason they don't is they are afraid their dog will be euthanized
- It is a part of responsible pet ownership.
- Should be same as a car accident. Share your personal and insurance information at the scene.
- "If you were in a vehicle accident would you leave the scene
- If you were in a vehicle accident would you leave the scene? Common sense"
- I think it's important that all parties involved in an incident discuss what happened with an enforcement officer and not just the dog owner. The enforcement officer should hear both sides to gain full understanding of the incident.
- They need to investigate whether or not the owner is being abusive, neglectful, or encouraging their dog to be aggressive. Pit bulls aren't inherently aggressive, and when they are brought up in a loving and caring environment, they flourish into loving and caring dogs, and wonderful companions. Investigate the owners.
- If you hit someone's car, you have to stay and make a statement. I don't see how that's different when your dog bites someone else. It's like a bite and run.
- People need to be responsible for their dogs and how they are training them.
- PITBULLS AREN'T THE [removed] PROBLEM, BAD OWNERS ARE. LEAVE THE POOR CREATURES ALONE.
- Should be treated no different then flying the scene of a motor vehicle accident.
- Then, we can make sure that it really happened and that the owner is being responsible.
- It is only proper for owner of dog to exchange information
- Yes so there can be follow up and learn why it happened and if obedience training is needed or other factors where involved.
- should be the same as a car accident ... all parties involved should remain at scene unless emergency vet/Dr visit requires
- It is like a hit and run with a vehicle.

- If a dog is biting because of poor ownership these owners should be held accountable.
- To calm the situation down and explain what happened.
- They should have to be involved in the whole process since their dog just bit a person. They shouldn't just get to walk away.
- There are good bully breeds out there if there owners are not there they can't say there statement explaining the incident. Most times bully breeds are provoked by bad behaviour
- Info should be shared between parties immediately. Same requirements as a vehicle collision.
- Depending on the damage the other party might need to be held liable and pay for the damages done
- Dog injuries are incredibly expensive and owners should be held financially accountable for injuries created be their animal
- Owner should be held responsible for the action of their pet.
- Owner should be held accountable and made to pay for damages and vet bills
- Only if the victim believes an Enforcement Officer needs to be contacted.
- Owners need to be held responsible for a poorly trained animal. And should be easily contactable throughout any issues that happen after the incident.
- It is the owners responsibility to ensure the dog is trained well and will therefore not be aggressive, so they must be accountable if an accident occurs.
- To me it can be compared to car accidents. If you hit someone, you have to stay at the scene until a solution is met by usually police. The same should be with animals. If an animal creates a dangerous environment for another animal or human the owner should be responsible for the dogs actions, as a number of things can contribute to the behaviour. Such as; little to no training, home environment, and care from the owner. These should all be considered before making a decision for the animal
- Refer to Criminal Code of Canada definition of assault.
- Dog owners should be responsible for themselves and their dogs behaviour
- The human is responsible for what happened, and they should have to explain it. Not the dog.
- The person who is with the animal at the time of the offense needs to be responsible for that animal. There should be charges if they do not stay on-scene.
- All of this breed specific legislation is absolute nonsense. This kind of ignorance doesn't belong in 2020 - you would think Calgary knows better as a self touting progressive city but here we are. Absolutely disgusting.
- A responsible dog owner should stay on scene and share information.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for the actions of their dog, weather intentional or accidental
- If they leave the scene, it is less likely that there will be enforcement on the owner.
- A dogs behavior (regardless of breed) is largely predicated on training or lack thereof. Enforcing dog owners to stay at the scene holds them accountable as the stewards of their pets and also offers an opportunity for education regarding how to be a better pet owner. Reprimanding and punishing the owner should not be the primary intent.
- Because there may be a very valid reason why this happened and need to have their story heard

- If they do not stay at the scene it's like a hit and run car accident which is you can be charged for. If you are a responsible pet owner you stay at the scene and deal with the issue.
- It would be nice to think this would be the usual event. However, I suspect it will be difficult to enforce as it is often reported that owners of dogs that have bitten leave the scene of the incident. If the owner can be located after the fact, this rule could come into play in terms of actions against the owner of the dog that has bitten.
- Makes sense
- It only makes sense
- That seems very reasonable. Much like how you are to stay at the scene (if medically appropriate) if you are in a motor vehicle accident.
- Owner is responsible for dog behaviour; dog may not have tags
- Responsibility and ownership needs to become the norm. No different than fleeing the scene of an accident or crime.
- If your dog bites a person or other dog, it's on you for being a bad dog carer.
- The owner of the dog that did the biting should get a chance to defend their pet and explain their side of the story before the animal is just carted off on someone else's word.
- A report should be made on scene when these attacks occur. Many owners with dogs that bite have been known to give false information, or flee the scene.
- If the incident is severe enough, the owner should be held accountable
- I support the owner being required to talk to enforcement but I understand there are times when it's best if the owner leaves the area immediately (for safety of all) and then report in.
- It is your responsibility as a decent human being
- As long as the dog is under control, the owner should remain at the scene to be held accountable.
- as with any damage or injury, if the people won't act responsibly on their own. then we should require them to
- This seems as though it should already be a law. No brainer.
- It is the owners responsibility to make sure the situation is dealt with properly if their pet does injure someone. In the case of a dog on dog encounter, and no people are hurt then their should be an exception to this.
- Absolutely! As mentioned before, it is never the dogs fault for biting. Yes, they did the action but it's the OWNER who is responsible for the animal. The owner must be held accountable for the dogs actions and ensure they are ticketed for such actions. If it continues to happen, the owner must have restrictions on owning animals.
- The dog owner needs to take full responsibility of their dogs actions
- A dog bit is serious and further investigation is required. The owner must provide contact information.
- It is important to know all factors in a dog bite situation. Was the dog attacked or harassed, intimidated, pushed to protect itself or owner etc.
- I do NOT support in any way any wrong-headed, unscientific racial profiling of dog breeds. BSL increases dog bite incidents and reduces accountability of owners of any dog deemed to be dangerous regardless of breed. Furthermore, "pit bull" is not a breed, and cannot be determined by appearance. Also, Staffordshires have not been involved in any incidents anywhere more than a poodle or any other dog. Calgary has been cited as a North American role model in how to be a responsible dog owner WITHOUT BSL. What on earth are you thinking?

- Just like a car accident those involved should remain at the scene
- Information should be given between both parties and then verified. I guess depending on the condition of the dog or person, you might not be able to stay.
- If the dog owner does not remain at the scene, then I consider this to be the same as a perpetrator of a crime trying to escape apprehension.
- This is a no brainer. A dog owner is completely responsible for their pet same as a car driver. You cannot hit and run so you cannot bite and run.
- The issue is NOT the breed, it's the owner. The owner NEEDS to be responsible and take accountability when a bite occurs.
- It's important that owners of dogs who bite, bear the burden of vet or medical expenses incurred. Victims should not have to bear these costs.
- OF COURSE! This isn't mandatory already?!?!?
- If the injury is to a specific degree of severity requiring medical/veterinary attention they should be required to share contact info to the victim.
- Bad dogs are a result of bad dog owners
- The law and basic moral decency requires this for things like hitting a pedestrian, lest it become a hit and run. The same should apply for all injuries.
- Responsibility. Accountability
- "Owners need to be responsible for the damage their pet inflicts.
- They must remain in scene and take the proper actions"
- Pet health care is expensive
- People need to be held accountable. And leaving is just not right.
- Yes, because we should be educating people to the fullest extent possible. Again, it is not the dogs who are at fault.
- The owner should remain on scene to ensure the victim is given accurate information about vaccinations records and about the animal in question. They need to be accountable for the actions of their animal.
- We need to know the medical history of the animals involved. The owner's information to request payment for vet bills.
- Someone shouldn't leave a scene of a crime unless the victim is ok with it
- Purely a common sense bylaw that would keep people accountable
- The owner should be in control of their pets. They need to stand up and accept responsibility, now cowardly run/walk away as if nothing happened.
- I believe everyone is accountable for there animal, if you do not have control of your pet it would be like not having control of your vehicle and leaving the scene of an accident. If your dad attacks someone UNPROVOKED i think its your duty and responsibility to face consequences, however i don't think it's appropriate to punish someone whose dog is attacked and ends up defending itself or its owner and punishing them.

- This will enhance an owner's responsibility over his/her dog's actions.
 - There are not always known/obvious injuries to human or dog immediately following a bite. The owner should provide contact info and be responsible for any vet/medical bill. Not staying on scene or providing info may leave costly vet/medical bills to the victim.
 - We need to know where offending animals live. Owners need to take responsibility
 - "Yes, you need to hear both sides of the story. Not just the victim. Like I mentioned before did the person run up to the dog, did another dog run up to a dog that was on leash. Which this does cause stress on the dog on leash.
- Both parties must stay at the scene"
 - they need to provide medical information and contact information to assure rabbi's shots and health is up to date
 - All dog owners need to be responsible so if your dog does bite, you need to ensure you stay and be accountable for your dog's safety as well as anyone else that may be impacted
 - People need to take responsibility for their pet
 - Both owners need to be at the scene, there are always two sides to every story.
 - Necessary and part of being a responsible pet owner
 - To reduce the chance of repeat offences by the same dog and owner
 - Biting dogs are usually a result of poor ownership. Leaving "the scene" is just another show of that. Bad owners should be held accountable instead of leaving the scene of the incident
 - Any dog owner should take responsibility
 - Dogs can bite for a number of reasons and if it's safe to do so, it is important for both parties to remain on the scene to provide statements
 - It's too easy for pet owners to escape their responsibilities
 - The owner must stay at the scene and take full responsibility of the dog. It is the owner's responsibility to ensure the dog does not bite and it should be the owner punished, not the dog. The owner should attend training classes with the dog to work on ensuring the dog is appropriately trained to be in a social setting.
 - Too often, people don't know the name of the person and dog that bit them (or their pet).
 - The concept of having a new court system set up for the purposes of reviewing and making a verdict does not bode well - considering the language used on pit bulls in particular this sounds like it would be a biased and uphill battle for almost anyone but particularly those owners of a certain breed.
 - Absolutely. Any damage caused by a dog in your ownership or possession at the time of incident is your responsibility and therefore you must atone for its actions.
 - That's part of responsible animal ownership. If your dog hurts someone/an animal they should pay for any related medical attention

- I look at it the same way as car accidents. You are involved, you remain at the scene.
- Then the dog owner is able to indicate if the dog was provoked or give a history of incidents
- Yes they should explain what's going on with the dog and be given a fair chance to speak on it
- So that the officer can understand both parts of the story, as the dog may have been approached by an unwanted visitor. In some cases the dog is not the problem, it was an individual who wanted to approach the dog without permission.
- If there is damage the owner should be responsible for costs incurred (vet bills, medications not covered by health plans, etc.)
- People should have to stay and communicate with authorities after such an incident.
- Multiple stories of dog owners simply leaving the scene when their pet attacks another pet/animal. There should be a requirement for people to stay around
- Yes, but this can be difficult because both dogs will be aroused. There has to be a provision that allowing a cellphone picture of the dogs (with tag number showing) and their owner is enough. Also, please consider that while I am training a highly excitable dog, who is on-leash, and I call out to other owners not to approach, but their dog does approach, either on-leash or off, if my dog bites the fault will be placed with the approaching dog. Please set up a yellow-ribbon rule so that everyone knows not to approach a leashed dog with a yellow ribbon on its lead. I went further in the survey and I see you have anticipated this. You did not give me the option to elaborate on your question about fines, though. All fines should be on a sliding scale - eg. first "at large" $25, second $75, third and beyond $200, with "demerits" expiring after three years with a clean record. This type of sliding scale approach should apply to all, or nearly all fines. It allows for learning to happen!
- It's like an car accident you don't leave the scene even if everyone's okay till until you've contacted to police they have come or you and the other person have exchanged contact information.
- If my car is involved in an accident I'm required to remain at the scene. If I'm involved in an assault I'm required to stay at the scene. If an animal is considered property then how is it any different than your property causing damage in any other case? Why is there a special case for dogs?
- need, to stay and not run away when you know your dog has bitten someone. has happened in past
- Staying to Talk with the officer can help de escalate the situation however
- Too many people get away with having bad dogs by offering to pay vet fees or apologizing so they don't get reported and their dog never gets better
- It seems to be the only way to consistently track such incidents and ensure proper steps are taken to compensate the victim (if applicable) and prevent it from happening again
- Same as any accident, there should be rules if a person leaves the scene.
- If your dog bites another animal you should be required to remain on scene or leave contact information.
- Owners should behave the same way as if they were involved in a car accident.
- Idk what there is to explain I agree with staying at the scene
- accountability is key from the owner and animal involved in the incident.
- I think it is ABSURD that there is even a mention of BSL for pitbulls. Do your research! This has been proven over and over and over again that BSL DOES NOT work. I used to pride myself on living in a city that was progressive enough to realize that any dog can bite, any dog incident can cause significant physical and emotional harm, and all dogs can be aggressive in the wrong hands. The proposal of BSL in Calgary shows that whomever is running this is ignorant and uneducated. Maybe go get an education in understanding statistics and truly grasp pit bull related incidents. Also, to show your lack of education, pit bulls are NOT more powerful than other dog breeds unless they're specifically trained. They do NOT have a stronger jaw than all other breeds, they do not have lock jaw at all. In fact, the kangal, wolfdog, rottweiler, German shepherd, chow chow, and malinois all have stronger and equally as strong bites as "pitbulls". I am ashamed that my city is even considering this! What a joke!!

- Makes sense, much in the way we stay at the scenes of car accidents. However, the dog owner should be given the chance to make sure their dog is safe even if that means taking them off scene and returning. For both the comfort of the dog and the bite victim.
- Liability issues and vet bills
- It's like a car accident, it happened so just as long as the owner is present so nothing escalates it's fine.
- within reason - if medical attention is required for either animal or person, that needs to be responded to!
- If a dog bites another dog or animal there should be an exchange as that owner should be responsible for vet Bill's unless it happened on owners property and the other animal was not invited on to the property. If it involves a person it should be left to bylaw to get information from both parties
- Again, the owner of the dog is responsible for the behaviour and discipline. Many owners love their dogs, but never discipline or train them, and the dogs unacceptable behaviour is the owners fault, not the dogs.
- Unless the owner cannot remain on scene because the dog needs to be removed from the scene immediately.
- They must be held responsible for the dogs actions.
- Owner of dog that bit, should be held financially responsible for injuries.
- It's like running away from the scene of a crime.
- As the dog owner you are responsible for the actions the dog takes. If there is an incident you should be required to take responsibility. Obviously this is within reason, your dog is acting aggressively and the situation is unsafe for others it is more important that you remove the dog from that situation.
- Important to know about pet medical/vaccine history, possible pet or home owner insurance for a claim. The only reason someone could leave is if the situation doesn't de-escalate (pet or human interactions).
- I think it is fair to investigate bite incidents, so long as no bias exists. I am concerned there would be breed specific bias.
- The owner of a pet needs to be heard as well as being accountable for its actions.

- It's much like a scene of a car accident. You must stay present to answer any questions related to the dogs health like immunizations and to give proper information to an officer in case of someone trying to give false information.
- If someone's dog bit mine I would expect them to provide their contact info to me and pay the vet bill.
- It is necessary for the dogs owner to provide necessary info.
- Oftentimes bites happen when one or more parties to an incident do not remain in control (I.e. not keeping their dog on leash or secured, ignoring signs that a dog is in distress and leaving the situation, people not heeding an owner's warnings, commands, or advice about approaching their animals) and that needs to be accounted for when dogs bite other people or animals
- People should be in control of the pers at all time and if they are not then they should be held personally responsible for any damages that have happened
- I've been bites by a dog (pomeranian off leash) called bylaw and made a report but nothing came of it because I didn't I the address of the owner. The owner is continuing to walk the dog without a leash
- It's too easy for the offending dog's owner / caregiver to take off and leave the wounded person or animal. The dog owner / caregiver should be forced to remain on the scene.
- That's a responsible thing to do.
- There needs to be some follow-up to the incident to prevent its re-occurrence and possibly to either educate the owner or make them get training for the dog.
- A dog bite should be dealt with like a car accident. If the owner leaves the scene before information is shares it should be treated as a "hit and run."
- Owners are accountable for their pets.
- How is this even a question? Information should be exchanged if injury/damage was done
- The owner should be accountable for their actions, same as if you're in a fender bender or accidentally harm another person in any other scenario. Both parties should be able to assess the situation, trade information, and handle the situation amicably.
- Animal control need to have contact information for people whose pets prove a nuisance.
- If there is an incident it is important that both the owner and target as well as the bystanders are consulted. Sometimes the biting dog was provoked and not in the wrong. If the target was harassing or allowing thier dog to instigate without being checked they would be in the wrong. Bites are not cut and dry.
- It is the responsibility of the pet owner who bit the victim to remain at the scene and take responsibility for the actions of their dog.
- If an enforcement officer is available, then yes; but enforcement should only be used when necessary and when the owner isn't complying or following up appropriate steps.
- As long as the dog is under control.
- If it causes severe injury not just a nibble
- Owners must be responsible for the behaviour of their pets, just as parents would be for their children in a similarly dangerous instance

- An owner should be responsible for staying when their animal bites someone/another animal and exchanging information, similar to vehicle accidents
- Yes, except if they need to leave to help their Dog calm down
- To ensure health, vaccinations and licensing information is received by needed parties. For the owner of the animal to be held accountable in the situation. To determine an accurate account of the situation from all parties.
- Makes sense. Just like a car or any other accident causing an injury.
- Like a car accident, holds people responsible if there is lasting damage
- The owner takes full responsibility for it's pet and actions. Pet attacks are a reflection of the owner's training of the animal, and NOT the breed.
- It's the only decent thing to do.
- I've met people with dogs that were attacked and they don't know how to get the person that owns the dog.
- They should remain at the scene so they can get both sides of the story
- There are various reasons a dog will bite, and sometimes it's not the dog who bit who is the instigator. Dog behaviour plays a grand part. All dog owners should be educated in training and dog behaviour to seen the signs prior to a bite. There are always signs, just owners that are not educated. This needs to be discussed with both owners.
- Any time there is a server dog bite no matter the breed of dog (shepherds, retrievers, chihuahuas.) they should remain on scene.
- Responsible dog owners should absolutely stay and share contact info with the victim. The circumstances and severity of the attack should be considered before reaching out to authorities.
- It's an issue that still needs to be dealt with, but I believe properly training the dogs after issues like this would be best. We don't euthanize people with DUIs. We take away their license and send them to classes. The difference between people and dogs is that people can make premeditated, conscious decisions. Dogs react out of emotion, they don't premeditate hurting other people or animals, they are afraid or uncertain.
- Many Dog owners, not just "bully breeds" have dogs capable of biting. It should be required that contact info be exchanged just like auto accidents. Dog vet bills can be insanely huge, not just for immediate care but also for followup.
- They should be responsible for the damages their dog causes to a person or their pets. Running shouldn't be an option, without severe penalties, just like with hit and runs.
- I feel like it should be no different than a car accident someone has been hurt and should remain at the scene until information can be exchanged and statement etc can be obtained from an enforcement officer.
- Yes a responsible owner will take accountability. Keep irresponsible pet owners from having pets, do not discriminate based on breed. Look at the human.
- Dog owners are responsible for dog behaviour
- Na

- I feel not staying there to talk to someone about the situation is like a hit and run if in a car accident and leaving
- the dog OWNER needs to take responsibility for the actions of their pet. It is not the fault of the animal
- An owner should be held responsible for the actions of their pet.
- Both parties should have the choice to deal with the incident by themselves or call an officer if the other person is not cooperating or fleeing
- The animal or person bit need the info so they can ensure that bite are treated properly. But dog breed should have nothing to do with the bite
- a dog's misbehaviour is the fault of the owner, not the dog. It's their responsibility of a dog attacks and they are liable
- The owner should be held accountable for not controlling there dog while outside of their private property and should be made and held accountable to any damage fees and vet bills
- The owner should stay on the scene to hear both sides of the story rather than just the victims.
- If you are a "pitbull" owner and since they always get the blame for everything it's important to show what evidence you have such as, videos, photos, witness, time of the event. Unfortunately, Pitbulls have a bad stigma and we must be a voice for them. Discrimination my stop. We live in a country of freedom and that should be the same with animals. The breed shouldn't have to implicate their future pimpls have a bad stigma and we must be a voice for them. Discrimination must stop. We live in a country of freedom and that should be the same with animals. The breed shouldn't have to implicate their future.
- The person should remain so they can give their side of the story since most of the time when a dog bites, it was provoked (ie when my dog is on a leash and someone has their dog uncontrolled off leash)
- The person with the dog that bit should have to pay full coverage of any wound care, or treatment needed.
- Best to explain both sides immediately as the situation is still fresh.
- Yes as long as the dog no longer poses a further threat to the people present.
- I previously worked at an animal clinic. I experienced far too many cases of dog bites where the owner of the offending dog just doesn't care and receive no consequences for their irresponsible behaviour because they simply walked away after the incident.
- Need both sides of the story. But also need to ensure the dog has been removed from the source that caused them to react the way they did.
- Dog bites can lead to infection and if the owner doesn't have control of their animal they should be held responsible for that.
- I firmly believe dog attacks can be prevented, but if a dog attacks it must be put down and the owner fined and available for legal action. So they take both a financial and emotional blow for not controlling their dog, money is easily replaceable friendship and companionship isn't, they won't re-offend. A tribunal does not force a person to reflect on their actions, they sit trough it and tell the people what they want to hear and re-offend later. If police/animal control simply shoot the dog, and slap like a $5000 fine on the owner they are going to suffer to inflicting pain on others, they likely not choose to have an aggressive dog.

- Humans should be held accountable on how their dogs behave.
- Your dog is your family. If your human child bit someone you would be expected to remain at the scene.
- Yes because it's not the dogs fault it's often the owner or the person who got bit for teasing or annoying dog
- It should be no different that having to stay at the scene of an accident.
- No different than staying at the scene of a car accident!
- It is important to share that kind of information in any accident, it should be no different with animal cases.
- Just like an accident
- There are problems with owners fleeing the scene where a dog has attacked. And bylaw officers must be prepared to enforce the requirement to share contact info. My dog experienced an attack that was witnessed by bylaw. The officer fined the offending owner, but refused to let me get their contact info and would not share it with me, citing privacy laws. I had to take my dog to emergency to get examined and I was out of pocket for that expense because of bylaw. I had no way to recover my cost because i was refused my right to obtain contact info on the owner. This is just wrong and is not actually legal ti do that
- Dog ownership requires a level of responsibility, especially regarding safety. If a dog bite is substantial enough to require the presence of an enforcement officer, then the owner has a responsibility to remain on scene. I also believe that both parties (the owner and the complainant) both need to remain on scene (providing it is safe to do so), so that an enforcement officer has the opportunity to hear both sides of the story. I have seen cases in my neighborhood where someone was taunting or mistreating a dog, resulting in a bite, in which case does not warrant a charge against a dog owner.
- Like any accident all parties must communicate and have statements
- People are the ones who train or dont train their dogs. So they are responsible for them
- The information should be collected in a timely manner from the owner.
- Most times a dog bites is because its scared I feel if possible they should be allowed to put their dog inside or give their contact information over the phone to an officer
- I've seen too many people who are not in controls the of their animal walk away
- To avoid going to small claims court against the owner and potentially just exchange liability insurance to handle.
- But only if they have a safe place to put their animal while they wait for enforcement. If the animal is still in a state of anxiety or panic with no safe place to go and people panicking around them, another incident could be likely.
- Its the dog owners responsibility to stay at the scene of any incident involving their dog, doesnt matter breed. Your dog, your responsibility.

- Especially if it's a child the owner of the dog should be held accountable for the dogs actions. The owner is ultimately the one who raised, trained, and encouraged and or all behaviours displayed from their pet.
- I think they should stay. Both sides of the story need to be heard. Other dogs or animals could have provoked the dog or approached the dog that made the dog feel unsafe and that that was it's only option to defend him or her self.
- In my view, it's like staying at the scene when you have a car accident. People should be responsible for their dogs behaviour.
- It's part of being a responsible owner
- Dog baiting results in bites that people will use against the dog. They should be able to explain the situation and look at both sides
- I believe, like any accident or injury incident, all involved should be there to discuss the matter, unless the victim needs to leave the scene for medical attention, whether an animal with their owner or a person or parent with their child.
- It's kind of like a hit and run, you you leave the seen of a accident? No, there for I don't think it's right if you were to leave after a animal attack.
- Should be treated similarly to a car accident. As long as information can be obtained. If the person leaves without info and can be found, additional fines should be placed.
- N
- It's illegal to hit a car and run, so why would it be any different for a dog bite? Owners need to be willing to take responsibility if they're going to have pets.
- I think this should be treated like a car accident for example!
- This is absolutely necessary for people to take responsibility for their animal. By taking off, the offender adds to the trauma of the situation.
- Bites that break skin only.
- The owner needs to be responsible for their pet - this applies to ANY dog breed.
- There must be transparency and accountability on the part of the dog owner to provide their information and they must be held responsible for their pet's actions.
- You are responsible for your dog, plain and simple.
- Important to understand what happened and potential condition on dog
- Any bad owners dog can bite including little dogs. I fi d small breed dogs are worse in temperment and their [removed] owners think its cute when little dixie is biting my pant leg or ankle.
- It is a privilege, not a right to be a pet owner. Part of that privilege is to take responsibility for abhorrent behaviour regardless of how it reflects on you as the pet owner.
- Absolutely. As long as contained and isn't creating more of an issue by staying
- Owner should take responsibility for the dog's behaviour, and should be legally required to do so.Ã
- The owner should be held responsible for the actions of the dog.
- Yes. This rule must apply to all dogs. Little terriers have bitten me before but it's âœœokayâœ• because they're little. That's not right.

- If necessary, if it's severe damage yes. I think there is a witch hunt on certain dogs and they do not get a fair deal. I see other dog constantly biting or harassing dogs and no one does anything, Pitbulls do something and everyone wants to lynch them. Usually these pitbulls are harassed by other dogs and THEN they react and yet it's their fault. I don't own one and probably never would because of how other people act/treat them. I think a bigger concern is was the other dog behaving? Was it unprovoked? Usually it's not. I feel like yes they should stay but I feel like they also won't get a fair trial by anyone.
- if a dog bites some one or another animal regardless of size or breed yes they should stay because small dogs and big alike both have problems with aggression
- Absolutely.
- Many dogs will not bite unless instigated. If it were my dog that bit anyone or another animal I would want the officer to get all the information instead of just that the dog bit someone because there is a high chance the person did something to cause the dog to act out in a way that, in my opinion, would be justified and there person (not the dog) would be at fault.
- If the bite is severe enough that it will require veterinary attention. So, perhaps if the bite breaks the skin and bleeds, the person should stay on the scene to at least speak with the other person/owner.
- This just makes sense so that information can be shared and both sides of the story presented.
- They need to be more responsible.
- Contact information with the person/other dog owner should always be shared like a traffic accident. An enforcement officer isn't always necessary on scene though.
- Dog should be in a safe place away from people. Owner should remain on scene
- Owners and witnesses should share contact information. The dogs owner(who bit) should have a bylaw officer visit the home and also a specialized dog trainer assess the dog before deciding what should be done with the dog. A fine should be given to the owner if it is not the first offence.
- Accountability and responsibility should always be demonstrated by a dog owner. Not to mention that it is the right thing to do.
- It keeps the owners accountable
- If there any other issues arising from the bite, this would be beneficial for all parties
- Anyon en involved in any incident should remain there, obviously move the pet to a safe location where it can be treated fairly, but the owner should stay and assist if it were to happen.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dog. If it bites something or does any damage, the owner and dog should stay to file any report needed
- The dog owner can provide necessary pertinent information about vaccinations and other time sensitive facts to prevent unnecessary trauma for the injured party.
- Dog breeds are not the problem. The owner of the animal needs to be held accountable. Pit bulls are babies the behavior they display is a taught behaviour.
- I believe there is always two sides to what happened during an altercation and should be addressed then and there so there is no confusion or blame where it should not be laid.

- I think it should be treated like a car accident. Hit and runs are not acceptable, however the two parties can figure out what the next steps should be together, including involving an enforcement officer.
- Regardless of breed of a dog bites another dog or human just like car accidents they need to remain at the scene and provide all their information and be held responsible.
- But it does depend on severity. If it breaks skin and draws blood
- But not with each other, they should share their information with the bylaw officers. People can get weird about their dogs.
- It is a responsibility in my mind to remain at the scene just like you would be required to in an automobile accident. For the sake of a victim it is appropriate that this is a requirement as they may not know what questions to ask a dog owner.
- Multiple reasons exist for when a dog bites. Having a clear picture of the incident will help determine the best outcome.
- This would help victims with possible compensation if necessary and force owners to take responsibility
- This should always be a YES.
- The owner should be held accountable for what their dog did. Especially if vet costs are involved.
- Only when biting an adult, unless injury has occurred to the other animal. There are many dogs that are pushy with others and can get nipped as a result causing no injury, just a yelp
- The person is now as responsible for the attack as the dog itself. They must remain on scene until proper authorities have responded and taken all info pertaining to the incident. And seized the dog
- Problem animals are always a result of a problem owner. Fines and punishments should always be directed to the owner, not the animal, regardless of breed
- Owners need to be responsible if a dog bites, same as if there was a car accident
- If ANY KIND OF BREED OF DOG bites yes.it should be a rule anyways for any kind of dogs.
- This is assault and should be dealt with. Why should anyone who owns a dog biting other dogs or people be allowed to leave a scene after committing assault? Owner responsibility needs to happen!
- If the bite is severe on a person or another animal there should be an obligation to share contact information with the injured party.
- You have to stay at the scene of a car crash so it should be the same for this.
- All parties must remain at the scene for the appropriate time, if safe to do so. Otherwise people will just run away and never be seen again.
- I had a dog that was attacked by 2 others, and the owner simply went home, so bylaw said they'd come talk to her but there was nothing they could 'really' do
- Should be fined for fleeing the scene before giving information
- Be responsible. But also depends on the severity.
- "Yes but no one will if the threat of their dog being taken away is there.
- Mandatory training and classes should be enforced."
- Owners need to take and accept responsibility

- If injury is sustained by a dog bite, it should be no different than a car accident. The owner of the aggressor dog exchanges information so that they or their insurance would pay for medical expenses
- To take a note that's all
- Dog owners should remain on the scene to answer any questions that may need to be answered such as vaccination update and etc.
- But exceptions should be in place if the owner of the biter fears for their safety
- The owner of a dog that bites is responsible for its wellbeing as well as the behaviour of that dog (ANY breed). The alternative to this is information supplied by a witness which is in my opinion insufficient to appropriately identify the dog responsible.
- This is a prime example of being a responsible pet owner
- If someone is seriously injured then yes the owner must remain present. However if it is a minor issue then no.
- There needs to be a way to track how many times a dog is a nuisance.
- Both should be present. If the other dog instigated the bit. The dog biting shouldn't be at fault. Also common sense used on behalf of the officer
- It is important to hear both sides of the story
- You need to be responsible for your dog, don't flee the scene of an incident
- They need to be accountable for that. I also think that by having to stay at the scene this allows for there to be documentation of the event from both sides (perhaps the dog was provoked).
- It would identify patterns.
- I think it is the owners responsibility to react when their dog has bitten someone. It is certainly important they remain at the scene. It is similar to a car accident, when you are at fault you must remain at the scene to provide information... why should this not be the same?
- I think the owner should absolutely be required to stay. I actually can't believe that isn't already a thing. It's like a car accident, the owner should have to remain at the scene. It's the owner's responsibility.
- Being a responsible pet owner implies "responsible" and remaining at the scene should be mandatory. Increase fines substantially for an owner who just walks away.
- I feel like if your animal caused enough damage to call the police you should stay, similar to a car accident. If the person who was attacked is okay to leave and just trade info with the owner that's their discretion
- Yes - Only if there is no discrimination towards the dog based on their appearance. I believe an owner should stay on site in order to offer to pay medical expenses, etc. However, I believe many owners are discouraged from staying as they feel their dog may be judged on their appearance.
- I think people should be responsible for their dogs regardless of breed.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for dogs actions
- Dog owners need to be held accountable for their dogs behaviour. Especially if there are injuries
- I do feel all pet owners are responsible for their pet and have a duty to deal with these situations according to a protocol. However, this could perhaps educate the city officials in what statistics of what breeds are actually involved in bite incidents, which is actually all breeds, of all sizes which you clearly fail to account for.

- Responsibility.
- The owner is responsible for their dogs behaviour but can also provide context to what caused the bite
- Because then it is easier for enforcement officers to track if a dog is a repeat offender. As well then the enforcement officer can request a dogs medical records to ensure they don't have any contagious diseases. Also, if the bite is severe enough to require medical attention the owner of the aggressive dog should be required to pay for any medical fees.
- A dog owner is responsible for harm done by their dog, regardless of breed, and should remain on scene so that the situation can be handled properly and insure that the victim is okay
- Only if it is severe, same as a car accident, if it's minor then require contract exchange and move along.
- if an owners dog bites another individual or animal, they should own up and take responsibility for what their own pet has done. It's only fair.
- Responsible pet ownership starts with the OWNER!
- If the dog is aggressive, it's the owners fault/responsibility. Contact should be exchanged, additional training for the pet and a follow up
- Yes but you need an unbiased and experienced Dog person. They need to be trained and have extensive knowledge on dog training. These breed specific laws are so flawed and bad owners aren't held accountable.
- The OWNER (and NOT the dog) needs to be held accountable for their dogs behavior!!!!
- Unless their animal requires medical attention.
- Dog owners should take responsibility for their dog.
- I think any type of attack should be documented
- The owner responsible must be held responsible. Too many times the owner flees and no action can be taken because their identity is unknown.
- If a bite is serious enough either party wants to call the officers. Absolutely they should wait
- Be accountable. If they don't remain they must provide contact information.
- If the scene is safe to do so
- In my experience, people don't take responsibility for their dog's actions when someone is bit. My partner has been bitten twice now, and both times the dog owners put the blame on my parter, when we was either running or riding a bike.
- An owner is responsible for their animals behaviour and they should ensure they can be contacted after an incident.
- Unless immediate medical help is need for the owner or dog.
- Yes and no because the situation could of been them being attacked and the dog reacted for the owner as protecting and the attacker may try and use it against them and the owner might be frighten or afraid

- If your dog bites either a person or another dog, they should be legally responsible to remain at the scene to ensure the health of the person/dog involved and so that a fair and reasonable investigation be performed.
- I think it is a good idea
- If necessary, the owner should be held accountable and his:her information should be taken for record.
- It's important to get both sides of the story from both parties. I have heard of too many times where a small dog provokes and attacks a bigger dog in a park, and the bigger dog bakes back in defence BUT then the larger dog gets punished. A neutral party should be able to take accounts of the incident and meet both dogs to determine how things should proceed.
- A pet owner is responsible for their pets, therefore if there is an incident involving the pet, the owner should take responsibility for said incident.
- It's just common sense.
- It can get deadly duh
- I think it's important to meet the owner, so you can get a feel for whether the owner isn't training the dog well
- The owner of the dog is responsible for the dog themselves and should make any afflicted by a bite or reporting a bite aware of any relevant medical issues and vaccination status
- It's supports responsible pet ownership and accountability... as long as the dog is secured and under management
- The owner is responsible for the dogs behavior, therefore is responsible for the incident and must be held accountable at the scene
- This is so both parties can discuss the issue with the enforcement officer
- As in a vehicle accident, to stay on scene and provide information
- That is fair to determine past history of dog behaviour.
- Basic common sense; if a dog bites or attacks another person or pet, the owner should be legally mandated to 'do the right thing' and remain at the scene
- A full history of the animal needs to be taken, to rule out potential health concerns and any previous aggression issues.
- The owner of the aggressive dog should cover costs associated with the bite, vet bills, time of work, etc.
- If any dog breeds bites someone the owner of that dog should stay to talk to the officer
- Like a car accident, the owners should be held responsible. regardless of breed.
- I've had my dog attacked many times (20+)at the dog park by other dogs (none of which being a pitbull by the way) and I've only ever had one person take responsibility for their dog and stay and apologize
- It's the same as someone fleeing the scene of an accident. A dog can be a deadly weapon just as a car can.
- Dogs don't always bite out of aggression, sometimes its fear, or due to being provoked and not properly understanding the animals needs, I believe this should be taken into consideration, and owners on both sides need to take responsibility for not doing what is best for their animals. Small dog owners in particular have a bad habit of not accepting blame when their dogs are aggressive and attack, but should a larger dog respond to their aggression with a bite, both sides need to be heard and understood.

- But only if it is safe to do so, normally after an attack the victims first thought is to get to safety.
- This will ensure a victim in case of especially severe damage knows the owner is being held accountable.
- If a dog is reactionary or aggressive the owner should be responsible monetarily - in order to be held responsible obviously they have to remain at the scene
- Yes, when safe to do so. There are also times when the owner needs to remove the dog for safety or health reasons. For example if there is an issue in an off leash area it may be safest for the owner to remove the dog which may require them leaving the scene. Or the dog may require medical attention. They should be able to share contact info but may need to talk with an enforcement officer offsite.
- No
- Having the rule in place could give some added force to a repeat offender, but in actual fact, this is virtually unenforceable.
- As long as the dog is kept under control.
- I think its always important for information to be shared in an incident. But also I think its important for people ie officers to not be prejudice against pit bull breeds and believe it is 100% their fault as soon as they show up
- Responsibility of the owner
- People should be responsible for there animals and there actions. meaning dealing with the situation as best you can.
- It's needed to stick around and exchange contact information for future vet bills
- just like car insurance, one must share info. I do not agree to put such ridiculous laws in effect regarding pitbulls, however, yes the owners should be absolutely responsible for attacks or bites!
- I think the owner needs to stay at the scene and give their information quickly and then leave the scene to get the dog out of the environment. If an enforcement officer is involved, they should be calling said owner or setting up a meeting at a different time and location. Being in a situation like that would be very stressful, meaning dealing with the situation right then and there wont have any positive effect for either party. Let the stress calm.
- As it isn't necessarily clear about the situation even if the dog in question has offended. Eg. Specifically if the victim's dog was off leash and the offender was on leash and possibly in training.
- The dog owner should definitely remain at the scene of the incident for the safety of the dog, the person/other animal that got bit, and so that communication is clear on what the next steps are for the dog/pet owner.
- I am surprised that this requirement does not already exist. It is the owner's responsibility to attend to the instance where their dog bites another person or animal similar to vehicular accident situations.

- It's important to get details on a possible rabies infected dog AND build history of the dog
- It only makes sense for a person to stay at the scene. To leave or flee the scene when a person or animal has been bit or injured should be a chargeable offense.
- That way the dog can be assessed for shots ie rabies and recorded as part of its nuisance history.
- It makes sense that the person remains on scene to provide information. That way by law can see if there is history with the animal/owner, information can be exchanged for purposes of vet bills etc.
- An owner is responsible for their dog, at the end of the day they should be accountable with their information as such
- If a dog bites, the owner should be able to explain the circumstances (ie, person was hitting my dog, my dog bit back in defence) to ensure it's not a one-sided, victim only story.
- If your dog bites it is on you to be there to deal with the consequences or you can exchange information so that you can be reached at a later time
- Because the situation needs to be fully understood.
- If your dog attacks someone or someone's pet you should be held responsible, your information should be given to the city so they can make sure you are taking the necessary steps to keep the public and their animals safe such as wearing a muzzle and not attending off leash areas. If serious damage is done you should also have to contribute to the vet bill if the person or pet needs medical attention.
- So that all facts from both parties are heard
- The owner should 100% stay, by moral obligation alone. If you impose a rule making pit bull offenses more expensive, owners wont stay. That's why the increased penalties for pitbulls SHOULD NOT EVEN BE ON THE TABLE.
- You can't hit someone with your car and flea the scene, it should be the same if your dog bites someone.
- Dog owners should be given resources to help train their dogs to avoid future incidents.
- There needs to be a record of the bite. After a specific amount of bites/severity I believe the animal should be put down for everyone's safety.
- This is a no brainer - NEEDED.
- It's just like getting in a car accident. Exchange information with the person or animal owner before leaving the scene.
- Vaccination history for victim of bite
- I dont see why this needs to be explained. Otherwise it's like a hit and run. Or an assault where the person runs away.
- It is never the dogs fault. If the owner can not or will not do proper training or care of dog then the owner is at fault and the owner should be the owner to blame with consequences.
- It's usually the owners fault or the fault of the person or animal who was bit - dogs rarely bite while unprovoked or without warning signs.
- A dog biting a human or other dog should be seen as assault and the offender should be penalized if they leave the area without exchanging information or speaking with law enforcement

- Officers should be able to support the dog owner in the situation and help them find appropriate actions to correct their dogs behavior
- Like a hit and run you should be there to explain and help negotiate the situation. If you run away it's because you did something wrong stay and talk it over maybe it's not because it's a bad dog it is because of a crappy person.
- This is basic good character of a responsible pet owner.
- It should be treated like a car accident and failure to remain is subject to fine or charge
- If it's the animals fault. If the other person or animal provoked it, it should not be the fault of the other.
- Just like a car accident you need to stick around I believe a dog bite should be treated the same
- it is responsible petmanship , pet parenting ..
- For the safety of the victim person or animal, the owner should remain on the scene. They are still responsible for their dogs actions and are thus responsible for correcting the issue
- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions and therefore must be responsible for providing information to police. Dogs are reflective of their training and owners.
- If a dog bites and injures my dog or son, I want that persons info and to be held accountable.
- The owner of the dog should be held accountable.
- These situations should be treated just like a car accident you stay and give your account of the incident, leaving before the police or bylaw arrives is an offence
- It's the same as any other assault crime or accident
- My boyfriend was attacked by a dog in his mom's alley. Guess what? he called the police and they did nothing. Was it because it wasn't a pitbull that no one cared?
- Seems like the same logic for a car accident
- A dog owner should take responsibility for their dogs actions and face consequences.
- Fairly clear that you would want the owner to be questioned quickly after the incident.
- Reduces bylaw time tracking the owner down. If they leave the scene then a fine should be imposed similar to leaving the scene of a car accident
- Owners are responsible for their pets behaviour. This rule should be applied to ALL breeds.
- Should be charges if left, should be considered an offense that they must remain present for
- The owner needs to be held fully responsible if an animal in their care does harm. They should face fines and be banned from owning animals if they cannot put the training that is required for ALL dogs
- I didn't know they were allowed to leave. They aren't actually. They would totally get charged for the bite anyways (negligence) so this new bylaw will change nothing. You guys couldn't have taken 1 law class??? Just get the police/animal control to deal with this, why do you want more money to hire more people, right, you're the city.
- Just like a car accident, people should be required to stay at the scene of a dog bite. I don't know if this is realistic (ie: how long does it take for an enforcement officer to get to a typical incident?)
- There are a lot of breeds that exhibit vicious tendencies and it needs to be recorded

- It is not the dogs issue it's the owners who are responsible so they should stay. It's lack of training and love the dog receive as I have witness many breed considered dangerous that have been nothing but loving and protective.
- Owner is responsible for their dog if it bites someone or another dog they need to make sure everything is alright and leave contact info for future reference
- It should be the same as if it were a car accident
- Cooperation should be considered before euthanasia
- Yes and No - if the animal is also injured, then priority needs to be the wellbeing of the animal, not to wait for law enforcement. The important part is that contact information must be exchanged in a timely fashion - that is the only part that should be legislated.
- it's just like a car accident. They need to stay on the scene
- Pretty obvious that if your dog bites a person or another dog you should remain on scene. Exception would be if people/dogs need medical/veterinary attention.
- Most definitely they need to stay to share information, but if the dog that bit, or the person/dog bitten requires attention, or is too agitated then after information is passed on let them go to get things taken care of.
- They must remain at the scene of an incident to do a report as to why the dog has bitten someone
- The owner of the pet is ultimately responsible
- It should be like when you're in a car collision. Everyone should remain on the scene and be fined if they leave before they are allowed to by authorities.
- The owner of a dog can know something about the dog that is imperative for the human to know. (i.e. Dog medical history)
- This is no different than a hit and run, once you leave the scene there is room for evasion and error in the facts of the incident.
- It should be like a car accident. If something happens, at least exchange contact information to make sure all is safe
- I agree with this because the owner and dog have to be dealt with.
- It holds the owner accountable
- Taking responsibility for actions
- Regardless of cause, remaining at the scene to share contact information is the responsibility of the owner.
- I would consider this to be the same as a traffic infraction. If there is damage to a vehicle you share info. If an injury has been sustained to one animal by another then you should share info. Most respectable dog owners would agree
- The dog and owner should stay a good distance away from the victim, until enforcement arrives. That way there's no mixups with stories, and you get both sides of the story right away.
- I assumed this was a law already
- similar to leaving the scene of an accident
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the dog, therefore should pay for any medical expenses, it should be treated similarly to a car accident

- Most dog bites go unreported especially smaller dogs
 - People need to be made accountable for their pets actions
 - To make sure no further issues happen.
 - As long as the victim is okay with that
 - They need to tell their side of the story. I have seen dogs bite a) they were playing with another dog n the other owner is over reacting b) if the person who got bite was being the troublemaker n the dog was protecting, was getting manhandled by the person n it's not there dog etc.
 - "Yes and no. Depending on the situation.
- DONT BAN PITBULLS THERE LIFES MATTER"
 - If the incident is severe enough to warrant bylaw involvement all parties should remain
 - The owner of the dog needs to take responsibility and it is important to have their information for many reasons, but mostly to track the dog for reoffending. In my experience, it isn't always the offending dogs fault, but if the dog is problematic in the future, more needs to be done to keep that dog out of stressful situations.
 - I feel like both parties should be at the scene so there is no discrepancy between stories
 - You do it for cars, why not dog owners?
 - We're all responsible for our dogs if the person bit is calling enforcement that person should stay too
 - If we treat the bite like an accident, it should help to protect animals and people.
 - I feel like it is more the owners responsibility for how the dog acts
 - They are responsible for their dogs behavior therefore they need to explain what happened and give contact info for further investigation if needed.
 - If the problem was solved I see no reason for enforcement officers
 - For all attacks big or little. And if every breed of dog
 - As dogs may or may not have shots done they should remain and have information available, if dog harms people or other pets all Bill's should be paid by the person whose animal attacked.
 - It's your dog, your responsibility.
 - I stay on scene of a car accident to exchange info. Same should be true of animal incidents
 - You would be wrong to leave the scene of an accident
 - Similar to offenses involving people. It is important to be required to stay at the scene, otherwise you will never be able to track down the individual responsible for the incident.
 - Every dog owner is responsible for their dog. I actually don't support any off leash activity in public areas, regardless of dog breed. Responsible dog owners should walk their dogs on a leash.
 - It would be helpful to know if there was something that provoked the dog. Did the other dog antagonize the biter, what caused the bite. Dogs try their best to communicate their voices and sometimes another dog doesn't respect their answer.
 - If the bite was malicious and either human or animal was harmed I believe they should stay there and exchange insurance and contact information.

- The owner needs to be held accountable
- Important to maintain responsibility for your pet if it bites. Also gives opportunity for two owners to discuss issue and resolve peacefully.
- "I do think this is the responsibility of the owner to make sure they stay and give information and statement.
- Not every situation is the same."
- It's important to get identification and the vaccines records for the dog and know what actions will be taken
- Important for all parties to know and explain their case. There are many reasons why dogs bite including being provoked but a victim is likely to exclude that type of information. while talking to enforcement officers.
- Easier to charge if the person is forced to stay at the scene, and if they don't stay, it's another offence (if it's an offence chargeable under the by-laws).
- It's the responsible thing to do. Owners who don't should be fined.
- Its the right thing to do
- An owner is responsible for their dog's actions, it is important they remain at the scene to provide their version of events. However, I also understand that they may need to remove their dog from the situation for its own safety and/or the safety of the others involved. At a minimum they should provide their contact information and return to the scene or arrange for someone to pick-up the dog while they wait.
- Owners should be held accountable for their animals
- My own dog was attacked in our own yard by a neighbours dog through a gap in our fence. Our dogs dogs nose was severely damaged and required emergency surgery. The neighbour didn't stay and when we tried to contact them to get assistance with our $900 vet bill they ignored us. Having a rule that requires them to stay will ensure people take responsibility for their dogs actions and it will help give support to those who are affected.
- Otherwise you may not get that information
- This is evident
- i believe that dog bites happen for a reason; the dog is trying to defend itself or perceived space. Having the owner at the scene would ensure that the entire story gets told. If training for the owner or dog is required this is a good time to find that out.
- Owner is responsible for their pet. Absolutely they should remain at scene.
- If an attack or incident occurs, a dog owner is responsible to ensure the proper/legal steps are taken.
- Same as a car crash - your dog shouldn't be able to bite someone and then you run away
- These incidents may require investigations.
- "Only if severe injury occurs.
- Small nips are dogs nature. It is also best to inform dog owners to let others know to go and get a doctors check if their dog doesn't have their shots up to date."
- Owners should be responsible for their pets.

- That way we'd know what dog was a regular aggressive. If a dog is consistently biting then the animal can be banned from public parks etc
- I believe the owner needs to stay to share contact information and the pet's latest updated vaccine information as to make sure the bitten is safe from getting sick
- I think this is 100% necessary, it's a traumatic event to be attacked or bit by an animal and having a rule that you need to stay would be very helpful
- An owner is responsible for the actions of their pet. If it is considered a serious incident by the victim, the owner of the offending dog is liable
- My brother was bitten and the owner and dog left the scene so no fines or any discipline were ever imposed
- They should give a report and information showing they are taking responsibility for their pet. However if the animal is in distress and needs to be removed from the situation the owner should have the right to leave and keep everyone safe.
- If I leave the scene of a crime or car accident there are reproductions, this is no different
- All parties should stay until enforcement is there. There are two parts to every story and dog bites are sometimes provoked. This way both parties can share stories and responsibility
- Only if it's a serious incident. However, people's definitions of 'serious' may differ, so specifics may be helpful for people to determine if they need to stay or not.
- I've had a few people whose dog has bit me or my dog and they just run off. It would be nice if there was some way to hold them accountable
- Enforces responsible dog ownership
- Your dog, your responsibility. And maybe people just need a little guidance on what to do with their dogs and where to get behavioural training. (On ALL breeds)
- It would secure the accuracy of the event as well as input from bystanders to confirm such events. Otherwise it becomes difficult to pinpoint cause/penalty.
- This will allow both sides of the story to be heard so a fair assessment can be made.
- It is the best way to determine animals with problem or repeat behaviour
- It's leaving the scene of a so-called accident idea
- I fully support all parties should remain at the scene of a dog bite until authorities arrive.
- It protects that owner of the dog, as much as the victim.
- Real pet owners don't run they face things like this.
- There's always two sides to a story, this way they get to explain their side
- If a crime occurs you don't leave the scene of the crime. This would help hold people accountable and it's always best to get the story right away as opposed to waiting a few days.
- Otherwise it's a hit and run. Same thing.
- Owners should be held responsible
- This rule makes sense and I am surprised that this isn't already in place.
- Contact info necessary for resolution matters
- "Accountability, and vet costs associated with a dog altercation can be costly.

- Being able to have a scenario breakdown/record with enforcement officers/witnesses is important for both parties, and their potential liabilities."
- An owner needs to be responsible for their pet, therefore would need to take responsibility and tell the police what happened.
- If the owner is there, they can explain what happened, so both sides of the story are heard. If someone was antagonizing a dog, and it bit them, the dog should not have to be put down.
- People need to be held accountable for their animals
- I think this is important as a dog owner you are taking responsibility for your dogs actions to ensure whomever it but is okay.
- It should be required for the dog owner to provide accurate contact information and talk with the officer about what happened.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dog's behavior, just like a parent must be present and is responsible for their child's conduct.
- The owner should have to stay at the scene, share contact, and talk to law enforcement because evidence needs to be gathered
- It is the responsible thing to do. The only reason I would say no is if the dog is further aggressing and the situation is becoming worse.
- There's always a reason as to why a dog will bite. A dog would resort to biting as his/her last option.
- Nobody knows their dogs behaviour better than the owner. Having the dog owner on sight is the best way to de-escalate and further reduce an already traumatic situation.
- That's just common courtesy as a dog owner. This would make you a bad dog owner-no different then fleeing any incident
- This will lead to owners taking responsibility over their dogs and not just running off after an incident occurs.
- It is like a car accident. If appropriate training hasn't been taken they need to stay
- I think to hear all sides of the story, verify if dog shows signs of aggression or not and decide an offence from there
- This makes sense. A responsible owner would do this anyways
- The person must remain at the scene and provide correct contact information.
- To ensure all stakeholders are heard at the time of the incident
- Regardless of breed, a responsible dog owner should own up to their animals behaviors. If that animal causes harm, they need to stay and ensure everyone is ok and take the fine as given.
- My service dog has been attacked and the other owner fled
- Common courtesy and For insurance and vet bill purposes
- Owners must be held accountable for poor animal behavior. To ensure this, they must stay at the scene of any incident and provide contact info.
- I believe remaining at the scene would be an act of responsible pet ownership
- The owner is responsible for the dogs behaviour and as such should be required to be held responsible.

- Accountability and responsibility as a pet owner is important for everyone.
 - It's common sense. However it's the same like a car accident. People flee. You can't really enforce this without spending money to have officers are dog parks which is a waste of money and time.
 - There are many reasons that a dog bites, although unfortunate, in some cases it is the fault of the victim or the other dog.
 - "Information should be exchanged for the owner to be liable for damages caused.
- If the owner waiting for an officer to arrive puts others in danger they should give their contact information and remove the animal from the scene."
 - They need to say what happened and take responsibility
 - Dog bite offenders who flee the scene set themselves up for repeat offences
 - Unless the environment is unstable. But owner should return in a timely manner once dog has been placed in a secure area...such as home, car, etc. Safety for dog and victim
 - Owners must take responsibility for their animals. Just as law requires you to stay and provide information in a car accident, so too should you need to stay when there is an animal accident.
 - It allows for documentation that the animal was involved in an incident, and allows the owner to be accountable to their dog's actions. Contact info is a good idea to follow up on the incident
 - Absolutely. No matter what "breed" does the biting. It is the Owners responsibility to make sure their dog is trained and under control. If a dog bites and their owner takes off that's ridiculous. It's almost as bad as a hit and run. the dog was out of control, the owner needs to face the Consequences, and should be charged if they leave the scene.
 - If not remain at the scene they need to at least be required to leave contact information
 - I think education for the owner is key...,
 - They should leave their contact information, though they may also need to take the dog away to a separate area, or their home.
 - It's important to have everyone's input
 - You should stay at the scene of any accident or crime until police allow you to leave.
 - All dog owners must take responsibility for their dogs actions
 - The owner of the dog that bit should be held responsible for all vet/medical costs that are incurred by the victims.
 - Responsibility and accountability is an important part of being a pet owner
 - This is what responsible dog owners should be doing anyways.
 - Fleeing to prevent a dog from being put down happens and can leave victims in scary situations when there is insufficient information about the dog and possible vaccines
 - Provided that is it safe to do so, for the owner and dog.
 - Yes, to a point of sharing contact information with the other dog owner. We know enforcement officers in Calgary will take their sweet time to arrive to an incident like this, and I am not sitting in a public park for four hours to abide by some daft ordinance.

- If a dog bites a human or another animal the owner should be held responsible.
- We are seeing an increase in uncontrolled dogs in offleash parks where owners are negligent in attending to their animal and it's behavior including waste management and aggressive behavior. These individuals then leave without exchanging information and some animal owners incur expensive veterinary care after their dog has been attacked.
- A person should naturally take the responsibility for what happens to their pets, just like a driver takes responsibility for what happens with their car or a parent with their kids
- This ensures both sides are heard
- Unless there is a medical emergency get information and get medical treatment
- There are too many repeat offender incidents in my community and there needs to be a bylaw that prevents owners from escaping all scrutiny over their nuisance dog.
- Nothing to explain, this is very obvious.
- Only if it is a severe bite and will physically/medically affect the bitten.
- It is their dog. They should know what happens. And maybe the officers can judge the owner and not the dog.
- just makes sense
- Many people seem to flee if their pet causes an issue, and that's unacceptable
- A nip is one thing, same with a mutual fight. An attack needs to be dealt with and vet bills and emergency care need to be compensated by the guilty party.
- I would support it but it wouldn't be enforced when someone leaves and doesn't share the info.
- Same as a car accident the owner is responsible
- The owner remaining at the scene is necessary in establishing responsibility for the animal involved. The only exception would be that the owner needs to remove the animal for the safety of others in the vicinity (i.e., the animal cannot be calmed down without being removed). That being said, I feel that "nuisance dogs" are an issue of the owner being fully responsible and treating the animal with respect and properly training the dog and not a breed issue.
- If it's necessary, a third party should be involved to sort things out. A mediator if you will to confirm events with both parties.
- Wouldn't this be the same if there was a car accident and if you left it would be a hit and run? Stay at the scene.
- How else does anyone get the information of the dog or the owner
- Its the owners responsibility where its a big or small dog.
- The incident can be blown out of proportion and if the person attacked is only there then you only hear one side.
- If there is a car crash you are required to stay at the scene and not drive off. It is the same with a animal bite.
- Because it is the owners responsibility of the breed
- if a dog bites someone out of aggression. It has behavioral issues that need attention. Any dog can be aggressive. It's all about the owner

- So both sides of the story can be told.
- All too often an altercation requiring a vet visit will happen at a park but the owner of the attacking dog will leave so there are no consequence and no monetary assistance
- If someone is injured by a pet that is not their own, the owner of the pet should stay. Not only for fairness to the individual injured, but to the pet and owner as well. A lot of the time we hear of a dog bite and assume it was unprovoked however this is not always the case and the potential for a tormenting of the pet and/owner also deserves fair judgement and trial where necessary
- Common sense
- As long as everyone is safe and the dog is not at risk of attacking again the owner needs to remain at the scene.
- You are responsible for your animal and should remain with the person/animal until information is given
- It is just decent
- Makes sense that they stay and pass along appropriate info
- Owners should be accountable for their dogs.
- Just like a car accident with any breed of dog a owner should stay with victim at incident scene to trade information or wait for law enforcement
- As long as the dog owner has control of their dog (the dog isn't at danger to harm someone else)
- Owners should be held responsible if their pet assaults another animal or person.
- The owner should remain in case of liability issues. Once they have left there may be no way to contact them.
- Critical for receiving health/vaccine info on the dog
- The dog owner needs to be held responsible as it's a big part of training NOT breed that makes a dog attack something or someone
- The owner must be held accountable for their dog.
- Owners must take responsibility for their pets and must be obligated to stay at the scene of an incident
- Yes, but the dogs and owners should be separated to prevent escalating events, if the individuals leave than fines should be considered
- Regardless of breed, the owner should be held accountable for their dogs behaviour (from the smallest to the largest sized breeds)
- I think that dog attacks should be treated as human attacks. The owner should remain on scene to provide all contact information- especially if the dog that was attacked needs medical treatment
- Too often owners aren't reliable to stay if their dog bites another
- failing to stay at the scene of a an aggressive dog incident would be similar to a hit and run in a vehicle
- Owners must assume all responsibilities
- Dog owners taking off is like a hit and run to me

- During a tribunal - how would victims be reimbursed for any medical expenses, or being off work etc?
 - makes sense
 - It is always the dog owner's responsibility for their pets. they need to hold accountable.
 - Often, there are extenuating circumstances. Dog "owners" have taken on a huge responsibility when they get a dog. But that does not mean that the general public does not have to be responsible, also, for understanding what will trigger bad behavior. This is a dog loving society.....I always figure, if you can't handle drunks, stay out of the bar. If you or your kids are afraid of dogs, or don't understand the ramifications of your behavior, please stay out of dog parks.
 - I recently watched a video where a lady's dog attacked and killed someone's dog. She just pulled the dog away and left the owner and dying dog. It was horrible to watch. I can't imagine being in a similar situation with my own pet. It should be treated like a hit and run. The owner should hold responsibility for the harm caused.
 - They are accountable for the action of their pet. With cellphones there is no need to leave an accident scene
 - There are way too many people who give incorrect contact information because they don't want to deal with the aftermath of their dog's bad behavior. All dog owners and any witnesses should remain at the scene until an enforcement officer can arrive and take note. All dog owners should also be encouraged to have a Go-Pro type of camera when out in public with their dog, for their dog's safety and their own, regardless of what kind of dog they have.
 - I treat this like a car accident. Stay and give your info or be gined for leaving the scene.
 - Owners should take responsibility, it's not the dogs fault
 - its common sense
 - "Like all the small dogs.
 - Why does a difference in bite pressure matter.
 - A chihuahua that bites a baby can do as much damage as a pitbull that bites a adult.
- The action should be the determining factor both the amount of damage.
- A bite is a bite and should not be different for a small dog and big dog.
- Also to single out pitbulls know full well they are not as likly to bite us beyond wrong"
 - owners have to take responsibility
 - The bitten party must also remain on the scene, similar to motor vehicle incidents involving police to officers

- Regarding any other accident or injury it is expected the perpetrator remain on the scene. As pets are owners responsibility, the owner should remain on the scene whenever an incident occurs with their pet.
- Failing to remain at the scene is an additional offence that the owner of a dog could be charged with, creating - hopefully - a bit more of a deterrent to negligent pet ownership.
- good luck with enforcement
- Pit bulls aren't dangerous. The owners are the real danger. Don't make dumb rules cause people don't know how to be a pet owner
- No matter what breed the dog owner should remain at the scene and cooperate with authorities as a responsible pet owner.
- Unless this is part of play biting with dogs that are just having fun. So, if the bite is to a person - YES, if the bite is to an other animal and is predatory in nature - YES, if it is two dogs playing and being dogs and they get a bit carried away (but not in an aggressive trying to do real harm manner) - NO
- Easy, make people responsible for their animals actions.
- It's the owners responsibility to give information if their dog bites someone
- If such an incident occurs I believe the owner of the dog should be able to explain why it happened.
- As the owner it is their responsibility of their dog bites.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their animals, victim and perpetrator. There are always 3 sides to a story.
- Why should this accident be any different than a car accident? Additional punitive action for those that leave the scene.
- "Of course the offending owner must remain at the scene of an incident, as is required of drivers to remain at the scene of an incident. When someone is at fault, they must be required to remain at the scene so that resources aren't wasted finding them. If they leave, they should be fined for failing to remain at the scene of an incident.
- That being said, enforcement officers need to arrive in a timely manner."
- "This allows for both sides to be heard. The dog should not be seized immediately though.
- There are extenuation circumstances when removing the dog is safer as well."
- The owner needs to take responsibility for the dogs actions. A dog lashing out with a bite is likely not proper training, guidance from owner or ignorance of owner putting dog into a situation where it feels threatened. The individual needs more education and training on dog behavior and should be given these resources at the scene.
- Why wouldn't you stay to address the incident.
- If the bite is violent/severe and an unreasonable reaction (not provoked by a frightening or dangerous situation for the dog) it makes sense to require the ability to follow up with the owner.
- It promotes responsible dog ownership
- The owner is as responsible for the behavior of his/her dog.

- Both the victim and owner should stay in order to hear both sides. Sometimes a dog bites to protect that dog in cases like that should not be punished. Know the full story before accusing, fining, hurting the dog, etc.
- Owners must stay and take responsibility for the actions of their dog(s)
- Yes this will ensure it get reported accurately
- But only if the animal is in control - if not they should leave to ensure public safety- my big dogs s have often been bitten by little dogs at off least- we no longer walk out dogs there because of smaller aggressive dogs-
- The owners need to be held responsible for the actions of their pet.
- The owner is ultimately responsible for not training the behaviour out of the dog.
- Absolutely the owner should take responsibility for their dogs actions. That's what being a responsible owner is!
- If a dog bites another person or animal, the owner should be held responsible and face legalities for the trauma inflicted. They should be required to give all the information and talk to authorities if this does occur. Owners should be held responsible for their animals' actions as they should know how to properly raise and train their animal.
- My dog was bitten at public off leash dog park. The owner then fled the scene with his dog, and my small dachshund had a puncture wound that cost upwards of $700 for surgery to fix and heal.
- I don't think it matters, honestly- how are you going to force someone to stay put? Unless you physically restrain them, or disable their vehicle, your options are limited if they want to leave (and enforcement takes time to show up). Additionally, these statements often turn into one person's word against another, which is useless.
- Owner needs to stay put.
- Needed to identify the dog and get vaccination records
- If there was an act of aggression it should be addressed.
- Owners should be held accountable and in control of their dog. If a dog bites another animal, their may be hefty vet bills that the offending party should pay, or at least a portion. At the very least, accurate and truthful contact information should be left.
- As there need to be accountability to raising a pet.
- I feel a person should stay on scene until information has been exchanged.
- Dog bites can be extremely severe ans traumatic. The owners of dogs responsible for bites must take that responsibility upon themselves, as dig behaviour is largely the product of owner training and treatment.
- owner should take responsibility of their pets and should ensure their pets have proper training
- If your dog bites someone and it's serious you should stay and figure out what's going on and how serious the bite is.
- It's the responsible thing to do, however there is a fear that their dog will be taken away immediately which likely encourages owners to leave the scene. I do not think that bylaw should remove the animal But gather information for due diligence.

- Owners should be responsible for the behaviour of their pet and should not be able to walk away when harm is done
- Not just pitbull owners like I said. I've seen incidents with little dogs and another with two dogs that were not pitbulls who left the scene. I have never seen a pitbull get away with an accident.
- Of course! Dog bites are the responsibility of the owner.
- Owners are responsible for any and all actions
- Owners responsible.
- Your responsibility as a dog owner
- The person must be accountable for the behavior of their dogs, and all perspectives are best considered immediately after it happens.
- To ensure there is an opportunity to educate owners and provide help managing dog behaviour
- This definitely should be put into effect. Just as a police report would be made by both sides during a traffic accident.
- We need training programs for situations where dogs may get out of hand because their owner isn't taking charge and leading the animal, both human and dog must be trained
- So potentially dangerous animals can be tracked
- It's common decency and could spare the victim from rabies shots as well as taking responsibility for your dog.
- Owners must be held responsible for what happened.
- It is always the owners responsibility to ensure the safety and well-being of their pet and others, so it's important they stay on scene so proper and correct information can be obtained from all parties involved.
- Information shared is necessary for possible medical bills/issues
- If the case is severe, the person in charge of the offending animal should remain at the scene. A minor incident should not allow a person to use this for personal gain
- I had thought this was in place already. It's common decency.
- If its your dog, then you should be liable for what it does
- I believe they must remain to ensure the victim is ok. By the way- pit bull bans are wrong and I think it's a shame you're feeding into this
- The owner(s) of the biting dog (or both dogs if it was two way biting) must provide information for contact for tribunal or vet fees.
- People should to be responsible for vet bills if their animal causes harm! Allowing them to legally walk away prevents any responsibility.
- I think if people are to run away with their pet after it clearly injured or hurt another person or animal should at the very least do this. Just as if it were an car accident you provide information because you are at fault.
- Its similar to a vehicle hit and run in my opinion. If you cause damage, you should be held responsible.

- When the owner of dog that has attacked another person usually leaves the scene so they are not responsible for paying and sometimes give false information.
- An owner must take responsibility for their dogs actions
- Absolutely, this should be treated similar to a car accident. Again, it should not be mandatory in every situation but if a victim requests an enforcement officer's involvement the owner of the offending animal must be required to stay.
- If there are any damages, absolutely. You need to know if the dog in question has its shots, if the owners will cover vet/doctor costs if needed.
- It just makes sense to do this.
- Its their animal they have to take responsibility. Too many people are held unaccountable for their animals.
- The owner of the dog is responsible for the actions of the respective dog and impacts the dogs actions are the owners responsibility. An owner who is not responsible for their pet should be fined and not allowed to own animals.
- A person is responsible for their dog's actions
- It seems reasonable, if my dog ever bit another dog I would provide the dog owner with my information to cover any vet bills necessary
- It is important that all parties remain present to provide as much information as possible about the incident
- A dog attack is just like a car accident. If people got hurt then information needs to be accurately obtained and documented to provide further information about what happened including what happened up to and following the attack.
- Much like any incident with a vehicle, or other property, the owner should stay at the scene of an incident to share information and talk with enforcement as necessary, and those that run away from severe incident should be charged with a "hit and run" type penalty.
- Regardless of who's fault the incident actually was it's the same as a car accident. Contact information needs to be exchanged.
- if your dog harms another animal or human you should be held accountable
- It's like a car accident, you have to remain at the scene there, should be the same for severe dog bites.
- If the bite resulted in significant injury to person or animal, owner should have to legally give their information so a report can be filed. As a veterinary professional, I know of many incidents where bites have occurred and the owner of the dog that attacked will leave immediately (run away) or not share any/the appropriate info or lie about who they are or who the dog is. It makes it very hard for officers, veterinary clinics, and victims to follow up and file a report.
- The owner should then go into training for themselves and the dog
- In order to hold the owner responsible, they should remain at the scene if the victim indicated they wish to involve an enforcement officer
- If a dogs bites, it's the owner's responsibility and their poor training of the animal.

- The dog owner needs to remain on scene and provide proof of rabies shots, and their information as most dog bites are the fault of the owner or the person who got bit, not the dogs.
- Dog owners must be held accountable for their pet's behaviour.
- If you are in a minor car accident you are required to stay and give your information, if your dog harms a person or an animal you should also be required to stay and give your information
- Yes they should remain there. And the police or bylaw officer can then assess the owners!
- It shows responsibility to stay at the scene.
- I agree with this if there are parameters to further define "bite".
- of course, it is illegal to flee the scene of a car accident, a dog accident should be treated the same way.
- If your dog rips up another dog and you run away you should be charged with something similar to a hit and run.
- A animal Bite is no different than being in a car accident. If a pet causes damage or harm the pet owner should be required to stay and give their information.
- its the right thing to do .
- Just to be able to check in on the injured party
- Yes it would be like a hit and run if you leave but people are scared to lose their dog in this type of accident
- If your dog causes a serious bite yes you should stay on scene and be required to give your contact info to a officer
- It is just like a car accident. Details of owners needs to be exchanged.
- If this rule was in place it would allow quicker identification of possible nuisance dogs. And can allow the owner to receive proper information to curve the aggression or rules to be in affect for their dog. It would also allow owners to trade information to pay for vet bills or if needed to be brought to civil court.
- Thatbwould be the sensible thing to do. We do not flee the scene of an accident. Why would we flee a scene where our dog jist bite someone?
- accountability and the truth
- I believe both sides of the story need to be heard. And the owner needs to be responsible for the dog. Some dogs bit for no apparent reason and other dogs bit for a reason. Its important to find out why the dog bit the person or animal.
- Two sides to every story. Dogs bite because they are jerks and some bite because they are provoked or scared. This is all part of fair judgement
- It's appropriate to make sure everyone involved is ok, & if vet/medical care is needed.
- It should be like any other accident that involves 2 parties both exchange information before parting ways
- if another dog attacked my dog, that person better stay and provide me with his info. If not, I would find out who they are and sue them for all vet bills present and future, all mediations, all training for my dog's. entire life. What the city wants to do, that's your prerogative. Me, they will pay dearly.
- Yes. It keeps owners accountable for the actions of their animals

- The owner should be responsible for any possible expenses or fines.
- There's 3 sides to every story. It's important to find out the reason why a situation happened so it can be dealt with properly.
- If an injury is sustained, it's responsible for the dog owner to provide contact information.
- it's the same as if a person hurts another person they're required to stay.
- It is against the law to leave the scene of an accident, the same should apply to persons whose dogs have been involved in causing injury to another person or animal.
- If a incident occurs it should be reviewed by an enforcement office to determine if it was a split fault/provoked indecent
- I believe that's just called common curtesy
- Depends on the severity, case by case situation
- Your dog, your accountability.
- Unless they are helping the other person get to a doctor.
- The owner needs to explain why the dog bit someone (if there was a reason) - need to hear both the victim's and the owner's sides of the story.
- The owner (or guardian) is responsible for the dog at all times. If something happens, they should remain at the scene. No different than a traffic accident.
- If a dog attacks another dog or person, that dog's owner is liable and must accept responsibility. Bylaw officer needs to know which animals are a risk
- If your the owner of a dog. And it bites someone it's your responsibility to make sure the person is okay and safe.
- Common curtesy is to stay.
- People need to be accountable
- Accidents happen, leaving the scene of one - regardless of it being a bicycle, car or dog bite should be something you are not allowed to do without cause (you fear for your safety, child is waiting to be picked up elsewhere - who knows. I also don't think having to wait for hours for a cop is ok either, being able to leave contact info with police dispatch and get a case number or something to say you did that, would make sense. As long as you can be contacted later - add it to the city phone app - grabs a map ping and assigns a number. low tech -Even just a voicemail line pet owners know to call, leave contact info and get a reference number or something.
- If this is to promote responsible pet ownership, the responsible thing to do when someone is injured is ensuring that contact information is shared/being available for discussion with an enforcement officer.
- It's called being a responsible adult and animal owner. No different that hitting someone with your car.
- You're required to remain at the scene of an accident when it comes to vehicles, the same should apply for this situation because a dog bite is still considered an incident. It's important for everyone involved to exchange contact information in case anything happens to the victim after the incident.
- When you take on responsibility for a pet you are responsible for your pet's behavior.
- I think it should be treated like a car accident

- It is imperative to get owners information and witness accounts of the incident, as well as informing owners of the process to follow
- As a responsible dog owner, you stay and take responsibility
- However there are concerns with this. As is proven small dogs bite and act aggressive more frequently. When a small and large dog have an altercation the large or pitbull type dog is always found at fault. Even when defending themselves.
- The owner is responsible for the dog's actions and therefore need to deal with any consequences of the dog's actions
- If the owner leaves, especially if there is a victim (either human or another dog at the scene), it increases the similarities to a hit and run vehicle incident. Owners need to be accountable for their dog's behaviors at all times. I say this as a dog owner, who is always safe and responsible for my dog's behaviors.
- To ensure adequate follow up and gathering of necessary information.
- "No
- Explanation needed"
- I mean, it's like a car crash, don't leave the scene.
- If it was a severe bite and victim calls authorities then yes, all parties should remain at the scene.
- It's no different than a car accident
- The dog owner is responsible for their dog's behaviour at all times.
- If a dog OF ANY BREED bites or attacks, the owner should be available to discuss. That being said, so too should the victim. If a dog is being attacked or provoked by the victim it should not be the owner who is at fault.
- I think that this should apply to every dog breed. The owner should be at fault if the dog bites another person or animal. It is the owner's responsibility to insure their dog has had the proper training.
- I do support it but when the owner does not want to be found how are you going to enforce this.
- A crime is a crime. If you must stay at the scene of a car accident, you should also stay at the scene of an animal related incident.
- When I was bit by a cane corso, the police and bylaw had to search for the owner. This meant I needed to identify the dog hours after the attack and be re-traumatized
- If your dog bites a person, you should remain at the scene. As both a witness and as someone who can bare responsibility in the fact the person was bitten. If you were to leave the scene, it could be considered almost like a criminal similar to a hit and run.
- It is important to get information from everyone when a violent scene has occurred
- Similar to the scene of an Vehicle accident people should be responsible to remain at the scene to give statements and information to the officers that need it
- At the very least it would be helpful to know the dog had been immunized against rabies
- If the person who is bit, or their animal, has health or vet costs, it should be the owner who is responsible to cover that.
- Necessary to hold the owner accountable and establish next steps

- Everyone should be involved in the incident and an official should be there to help determine a correct course of treatment and how to move forward. This also allows for the owner to defend the dog.
- Because sometimes it's not the dogs fault.
- They need to remain on scene to be responsible for their dog
- Owners need to be more responsible
- 2 of my friends have been bit in the past year. If a dog is even slightly aggressive they should never be allowed off leash or near people who aren't aware of it. Owners have to be responsible for their dogs.
- For safety and enforcement.
- It allows for better follow up and support for the victim.
- I think communication needs to be clear in these cases
- Be responsible if something happens
- The owner is responsible for the dogs actions and should stick around to give there side of the story as well be able to provide the dogs health informtion.
- As if a person had harmed another, or as a witness to any potentially harmful act - on purpose or by accident, I feel it's that persons responsibility to stay on the scene until resolution or you are told you can go.
- Holds owner accountable
- Owners should be accountable. I would prefer ownership licensing that requires training.
- To be able to defend themselves if the accussions were false. And also to easily be able to swap contact information.
- I am surprised this already isn't a rule, owners need to be responsible for their dogs.
- There is always two sides to a story, a responsible pet owner would stay the more information given at the time of the incident the better.
- I don't believe any animal should EVER be euthanized or seized from the owner. I think the owner should have the opportunity to discuss what happened instead of the "victim" claiming what happened and the officer making a hasty judgement off one person's word.
- The owner of the dog has to take responsibility for their animal wether it's an accident or ignorance. This also allows the owner of the aggressive dog to defend if the circumstance involved another dog at large in a leashed area. Discrimination should not be put on pitbull type breeds, thats just silly.
- If the victim, wants to contact police or bylaw immediately due to an incident, then the offending dog and owner should be required to stay on scene and under control.
- Accountability is important
- Too many irresponsible dog owners leave the seen and are not accountable
- If the dog has bitten another person or dog, and that person or dog is visibly hurt the owner of the nuisance dog should make every effort to make sure proper care is in place.
- I see little dogs always biting people and other dogs. So it would be nice for them to be charged and held accountable instead of what normally happens.

- I have heard of so many people leaving and then it is difficult to get a hold of them later.
- It is the owner's responsibility to handle the fall out and repercussions of the dogs actions. The owner is responsible for what the dog does.
- Of course they should stay .If anything to tell their side of the story.
- I'm completely against any bylaws that single out a particular breed of dog. I don't believe 1 breed is any more or less dangerous than another, it's how they are raised and trained.
- It is no different than a 'hit and run'.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets
- You are responsible for your dog and if it bites and injures another human or pet you should be able to be held responsible. However "dog bite" and "injure" would need to be clearly defined. Too many owners are quick to say their pet was attacked when a larger dog simply growled at it or them...
- It's the owners dog it's like a car you wouldn't leave a car crash
- People should be held accountable for their animal's actions
- Just like a hit and run you should exchange information.
- Absolutely. I think the fear of their dog being put down is a reason someone may not stick around. If penalties didn't mean instant euthanization, people might be a little more likely to follow this rule. For the record, every dog should be included in any of these laws. I've been bitten by three dogs in my life, all of which were small dogs. I have scars from two of three.
- The other party should be held responsible. They should at least share their information with the other dog owner and not run away.
- more efficient to get the facts
- all dog bites are a result of the owners behaviour therefore the owner should always be held responsible.
- Responsible thing to do similar consequences to hit and run
- Similar to a car accident, I think all information should be exchanged if there's been an incident. If severe enough, both parties should wait for law enforcement.
- Because of infections and medical bills.
- There is always 2 sides to a story
- It's an assault, and a crime.
- I don't care what the breed would be on the dog, all responsible owners should remain at the scene until the police arrive
- Peacefully resolve the situation with the people who were there originally.
- Just like you would exchange information if you got into a car accident, you should do the same if there is an animal bite.
- If my dog ever was responsible for an attack being a decent human being I would wait and assist that person in anyway I could.
- My then-6-year-old son was bit by a large dog and the owner ran away

- It's important to hear both sides of a story, at the time the incident happens. It also helps if there are witnesses. This principle is used for traffic accidents, so why not for these incidents as well.
- As an owner you responsible for your animal
- Your dog has harmed someone running away makes you look ignorant and having to hunt you down is the definition of an irresponsible pet owner you as the pet owner are responsible for your pet running away after they bite someone is ignorance
- Owners are responsible for their pets in public just as vehicle owners are responsible for staying at the scene of an accident so pet owners should have the same responsibilities.
- We do this for car accidents, seems only logical.
- If any dog breed bites, then information should be shared and a FAIR investigation should be done.
- You need to know the other owner to seek medical information of their dog in case of rabies etc
- How is that incident any different that being at the scene of an accident? It's not information should be given out.
- If a dog bites it is not because it is a bad dog it's be cause the owner did not or doesn't know how to properly train the breed
- I believe that the owner of any aggressive dog should take full responsibility for the animals actions and remain on site so that a record can be taken of the incident and their information taken in the event that they need to be reached at a later time.
- Yes to explain what happened
- Dog owners need to be held responsible for their pets. Responsible pet ownership need to be the objective. Breed-specific legislation is not supported by any scientific facts.
- Owners should be held accountable and by having to remain on the scene it allows all parties to assess the situation, contact enforcement if necessary but also exchange information for any further action required.
- I've heard stories of the owner of the dog who attacked another dog leaving and not taking responsibility for what happened. I think the owner needs to be held accountable so that they don't continue to take their dog to places that make the dog stressed and then the dog attacks another dog or person. It seems the only way for people to really understand what they have done wrong, is to have someone of authority explain this to them. I think the owner of the dog that was the one who attacked, should be responsible to pay for the vet bills of the dog that was attacked, or pay some percentage of the vet bill.
- I think that's just a courtesy thing. The owner is responsible for the dog and should be the one to deal with the consequences.
- So both sides can be told.
- I believe people should have to exchange information when a bite occurs, in case there is any health problems that occur later on, due to the bite.
- They should be responsible for their dog if it bites anyone or another animal
- It is important to ensure that both parties understand what happened and share information as needed.

- If the bite is serious they should be required to stay. If no signs of broken skin or injury to other dog or person, there is no need.
- Because the owner of the dog needs to be accountable for what transpired
- Any responsible pet owner would stay at the scene to give contact information for any incident
- Similar treatment as a car accident makes sense depending on severity of attack
- It works with accidents
- It is the right thing to do.
- There needs to be explanation on both sides. "This dog bit my kid" vs "I asked the parents to get their kid to stop hitting my dog and we tried to leave"
- As a responsible pet owner you should stay and give your information if your dog bites another dog or person. I think that should just be common sense. There are many reasons a dog will bite...and sometimes it is very valid to protect themselves.
- First By-law would need to answer a call and show up. Following that minor miracle, a report should have statements from both the animal owner in addition to the one making the claim
- A RESPONSIBLE dog owner would not leave the scene of their dog bit a dog/person. Fine the person if they have left, do not punish the dog for an irresponsible owner.
- The owner of the dog should be held accountable to any incidents that may occur or have happened and documented proof is necessary
- if your dog bites someone. The owner should talk to the person that their dog bit. But there should not be a 3rd party involved. If your dog bit someone it is for a reason...being, the person might of been trying to take something, the dog was protecting their owner. Ext.
- Pet owners need to take responsibility of their animals. I understand however that it is not always the owner who is walking the animal, and that needs to be taken into account.
- Yes. This shouldn't be different than leaving the scene of a car accident.
- I see a lot of cases where a dog bite (to other dogs) is not noticed at the time but later requires vet care, owners are often at a loss at finding the dog in question to seek help with the bills.
- If the people involved in the incident stay then a more accurate story and picture of what happened may be able to be recorded. My only concern though is that this might start more arguments and allow things become more heated between the individuals involved.
- Dog owners hold a sense of responsibility over their animals actions
- I feel that if a dog bites another person or animal you should wait for bylaw and explain what happened because there's a numerous amount of factors that could have caused the animal to lash out. Some of which includes commands from thier human protection reasoning and triggers.
- It's good in theory but I have my doubts about enforcement
- as long as it is safe for both humans and animals to remain at the scene, the humans need to take ownership and remain at the scene. If not, enforcement should be able to be directed to meet them at their place of residence
- That makes sense that they should offer their contact information as a courtesy
- If it is serious only. My dog would never bite someone purposely but I have seen kids come up behind him unknowingly when it is windy out and makes it difficult to hear and they surprise him. In that case I would not blame him whatsoever if he bit someone. Parents need to teach their kids the proper way to greet a dog.

- Its their responsibility
- The owner should be held accountable for their dogs behaviour and also be given the chance to tell their side of the story.
- The owner is responsible for the dog, they should stay on scene.
- Yes, but they don't anyway. Owners of nuisance dogs rarely care about others or laws.
- If it's save to do so. Sometimes it's important to get the dogs apart. Depending on the situation it might not be realistic to stay, weather, injuries, trauma might force someone to leave but they should leave information
- Absolutely. My dog was attacked in okotoks by a lassie dog, and the owner fled the scene, so nothing could be done.
- should be the same as any other incident, eg. car accidents require people to remain on scene
- The owners behaviours have a significant impact on the dogs. Having a dog off leash when it shouldn't be, or improperly trained is the owners responsibility and not exactly the fault of the animal!
- Like a car accident, that`s what they should do. Not run away.
- Both sides of the story should always be available. If a person cannot leave the scene of an accident then why should they be allowed to leave the scene of a bite incident? It also ensures the dog owner is held accountable (if necessary).
- ONLY if the bite was significant enough to need medical attention.
- Just like a car accident, you should need to exchange all information to make sure that you can be contacted if needed
- Would be beneficial as no one could lie or create false accusations, etc.
- A record needs to be taken. On the dog and owner.
- Owner is ultimately responsible for animal behaviour
- Depends on the severity of the attack
- If an owner leaves the scene they should be charged with a crime, the same as leaving the scene of a car accident.
- It's not right that someone may be seriously injured or death and the owner is no where to be found
- Fines for leaving the scene should be comparable to those of leaving the scene of a motor collision.
- There are two sides to every story. To prevent dogs getting a bad rep, the owner should have to stay on scene and discuss what/why it happened
- Owners need to be accountable for what happened
- People need to be held responsible for their pets actions and their poor training of their animal! We need to take specific breed names off of all bi-laws and just focus on nusance dogs of all breed. We need to focus on owner responsibility and commitment to training any animal to be friendly and well behaved!!
- I believe dog owners need to take liability for their animals, and if they cause harm, they need to be responsible, and stay on the scene of the incident.

- Taking responsibility for one's animal is the absolute golden rule of pet ownership. Leaving the scene after an incident is tantamount to a hit and run vehicle accident.
- I believe that pet owners should be responsible for treating their animal in such a way that it feels the need to lash out. I do not think the pet should be punished in any way, as it is the actions of pet OWNERS that cause these animals to lash out.
- This would be reflective of responsible pet ownership to stay on scene and share valuable information such as contact information, vaccine (rabies) details, etc.
- No different than a car accident. You must stay to provide contact information
- "Every side should be considered, not just the side of the victim.
- If the victim was shown to have Provoked the biting dog THEY should be fined"
- I believe owners should be Held responsible If their dog attacks and hurts someone or their pet. If the person with the aggressive dog leaves they may never be found again, meaning the dog has the potential to attack/kill someone or their pets in the future.
- It's just like staying at the scene of an accident. It's the owner's responsibility to give their information and that if their dogs with things like are their shots up to date.
- I do think an owner should at least exchange information if their dog bites someone.
- It's the responsible thing to do as the pet owner
- There's two sides to every story and both need to be heard. Who know if the person hurt the dog and it was a defending itself or it's owner?!?
- The owner needs to own up for their lack of attention and training. A good dog won't bite unless provoked or LACK of training from the owner.
- Leaving a dog bite incident is like leaving the scene of a crime
- Yes unless medical attention is needed asap. Info should ALWAYS be exchanged
- My dad was jogging on a city path and a dog that was on a leash jumped and bit my dad on the thigh - this was near Carburn Park along the Bow River. It broke skin and ripped his clothes. The guy said sorry and that was it. I was mad that my dad didn't get information because it could have become infected or something worse as time went by. I'm all for dogs as pets but I can't stand when they get abused or neglected. I live in Douglasdale and I stopped walking on the Bow River pathway by myself because I had more than one instance where a pitbull was off-leash and ran to me and went up and down the path. I'm terrified of large dogs, pitbulls in particular. Last year my kids and I were playing tennis in Douglasglen. My son was running around the field and went to play in the rink right beside the tennis courts. A couple was in there letting their THREE pitbulls run free and they were screaming 'close the door' at my son. Luckily he closed it before they ran out but it still irks me at what could have happened had those 3 dogs gotten out at him. For all of these instances I called 311 but they said there was nothing they can do unless it's happening as I call or if it's recurring. I have sent complaints about our next door neighbor. They have a small and a large dog. They used to leave the large one outside all the time barking, starting as early as 6am until late in the evening. We had to ask them not to as it was driving me crazy and I wanted to move. What's worse is they let their 2 young boys (under 10 years old) abuse it. I actually sent a complaint to 311 in July. They chase it, hit it, hit it with a shovel...I try to not pay attention but a couple of times I couldn't help but watch and it's disgusting how the parents allow this to happen. Finally the dog gets fed up and bites the kid to defend itself, the boy cries, then the adults come out and give the dog crap when it's not the dog's fault at all. Sorry for my rants but I had these instances stick in my mind because they impacted me so I have strong opinions when it comes to pet ownership.

- Don't be the scene of a crime.
- It should be treated like any other accident that involves people
- Same as a hit and run.
- It is the owner's responsibility to take accountability for what their dog does. It shouldn't be up to witnesses or victims to try to find the other party.
- Specific breeds are not the problem. The problem is poor training from owners. The owners need to be held accountable, not the dogs.
- Accountability and ensuring correct fog is investigated for previous issues
- Bite and run is the equivalent of hit and run.
- no need to explain if your dog bites you should be responsible
- It's important to take responsibility and remain at the scene
- The owner is responsible for the dog and the dog's well-being. If they are unable to properly train their dogs to behave in a public area around other dogs/people, they should be held accountable for any altercations that occur.
- They can be expensive.
- any responsible owner should remain on site, but sadly we need a rule
- Take responsibility for your animal
- It is important in any situation or accident that both sides of the story be heard as soon as possible after the event.
- I see too many stories about animals or kids being bitten and nothing happening about it.
- Each situation should be investigated thoroughly to ensure the facts are presented and it is not the other human provoking the dog.
- its the dog owner to explain their side of the story. As good dog owner that is the right thing to do.
- Owners must be held accountable if their dog bites someone, if their dog in out of control, they need to learn how to reassert that control.
- So the accused is able to speak up just in case the claims are false and untrue.
- Owner should take responsibility if they don't want to train their dog properly.
- There are many sides to a story and I think both owners need to share their's. It is not as black-and-white as my dog bet your dog so I am at fault.
- An owner must take responsibility for the actions of their dog
- Most owners who own the attacker dog don't stay. It should be treated just like an accident with a car; considered a "bite and run" and should be wanted if the bad owner leaves.
- 100% the owner (or person overseeing the dog) should be required to stay on scene
- Too many times I've witnessed a dog attack another dog and the owner just laughs it off and often leaves the park in a hurry.

- Not necessarily remain at the scene, they or their animal may be injured also and that's more important to seek medical attention, but should absolutely be required for all parties to leave contact information and be allowed to speak with an officer when able to do so.
- I think it's stupid that you are singling out pit bulls. There are hundreds of dog breeds that are aggressive. You're literally playing into the stereotype. Ever seen a chihuahua go ape [removed] on someone? It's not pretty .
- This should be treated like a car accident. Especially if there are medical bills required for after care of the incident.
- Depending on the damage to the other animal or person ie breaking skin, people should be present unless the dog is too agitated.
- These issues should always be resolved. However it is the owner that is responsible, not the breed. Do not make the dog suffer the consequences.
- I would support this only if the dog has been violent (e.g., biting). Responsible owners with well behaved dogs should not be restricted more than other breeds.
- The dog's actions are its owner's responsibility
- It is important that with any accident/incident, both parties need to be present to have at the very least a discussion. In this case, if the bite was severe enough to require an officer's presence, both parties should remain to talk with them.
- Absolutely, again bite/attack could be a result of a defense or protection. If a weaker dog starts the fight and stronger dog (like pitbulls) ends it, that doesn't mean that pitbull is at fault. The facts are to be presented to the officer!
- It's the owners responsibility to ensure their dog is properly trained and under control.
- owners are liable for their pet as a parent is liable for their child
- The dog owner needs to provide information and too many people get away with their dogs attacking people otherwise.
- Bites need to be documented right away in case the bite becomes worse and needs medical treatment
- I liken it to a car accident. All parties must remain to give their statement as well as any witnesses.
- Unfair to victim if dog owner is just allowed to leave without sharing contact information.
- What is to explain, one should always remain at the scene of a serious incident. As well as any witnesses.
- I have seen many confrontation triggered by an uncontrol dogs that claims they were attack because their dog got injured. Witnesses are key to identify the cause of the incident. Making it a penalty to leave before information is exchanged would likely help
- It should always be investigated to see what happened. I owned a pit bull who was accused of biting a man and the officer who dealt with it trained dogs so after a long time of questioning this man and him lying the officer informed him he has never seen a dog bite that looks like that. He admitted that he is terrified of dogs and hit my dog and fell down when my dog jumped on him. (Because that's what happened my dog loved people and got really excited and ran out my front door) I got a thousand dollar fine for dog running at large but it goes to show people lie about what actually happened because they don't like pit bulls.

- You should take responsibility when things happen. Running away is not ok.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs.
- It's the owners responsibility to ensure the other parties involved are okay. They should be required to pay for the bills associated with the incident
- Yes. Yes. Yes. a Hit and Run if not.
- Yes, under certain conditions. Unfortunately, for the immediate safety of all involved, it might be necessary to get the offending dog out of the area
- People should be taking responsibility for their animals. It's no different from a hit and run. If the victim requests you to stay, you have to stay.
- Yes
- If your dog bites somebody you should have to face the consequences of not controlling your dog.
- It is important that the owner be held responsible in some way. This is not very different than the owner/operators of vehicles having to remain at the scene until information has been shared or investigated by authorities.
- It creates accountability.
- at the very least they must give their info the the owner of the bitten animal/person and show ID
- It's like a hit and run. If you commit an offence and do not remain on scene to deal with the consequences you should have committed and additional offence.
- Yes, people need to be accountable for their animals actions regardless of breed
- If someone's dog attacked another one because they couldn't control their dog a) they shouldn't bring it to and off leash park b) they should have to pay the expense at the vet or hospital if they hurt your dog or the person
- Not sure why I have to explain what I would consider common sense behaviour.
- Yes. The owner is responsible for their dog, they should answer any questions or concerns to law enforcement
- Treat it like driving a car when you hit another car. You exchange insurance, license and registration. This would be very similar.
- The owner should always take responsibility
- The owner should be responsible for all costs associated with the bite.
- Yes so long as the dog does not pose another immediate threat in which case removing the dog from the scene should be a priority
- Yes. There needs to be a record of the event.
- People are responsible for their pets.
- It should be treated the same as a traffic accident; you have to stay on scene if your car hits another car, or another person. It makes sense to stay and talk to an enforcement officer.
- I think remaining at the scene would show the person is trying to be responsible instead of fleeing the situation.

- It is important to get both sides and photos of the incident so the story is not one sided. It is important for the bylaw officer to see both sides.
- It's a safety issue. In order to be sure of the issues leading to the bite, all parties must stay at the scene to give statements.
- If a person is not prepared to train their dog properly, they should be prepared to accept responsibility for their actions
- The owner is responsible for the dogs behaviour. If the dog is violent that's on the owner for not training them properly.
- It would be common courtesy
- Of course, like any accident or incident, all parties should stay to take account of what occurred.
- If they didn't stay and give information, how would anyone know if that dog had done it before.
- It is not fair for an owner to avoid accountability.
- Absolutely with additional punishment to owners who leave.
- Contact information should always be exchanged in any incident. However is an officer necessary in every situation? It would depend on the severity of the bite. First time offenders should be mandated to attend a bite prevention course to better understand their dog's warning signs.
- It is like leaving the scene of an accident. They are legally required to provide information.
- It should be treated like a car accident. Exchange information and make a report.
- All breeds can bite! Bad dog owners should be held accountable (not all bully breed owners are bad, and should not be painted with a widespread, dated BSL legislation. It's 2020 Calgary, come on now)
- If their dog hurts someone or something they need to stay to make sure everything is okay
- Like an auto accident. There should be responsibility assigned and information exchanged for processing.
- If someone has been bit and law enforcement is called. The owner must stay on site
- It's the right thing to do, however, people still hit and run cars so I don't see many people sticking around after an attack
- It is the owner's responsibility to take care of the dog and the dogs actions based on the training it has received from said owner.
- I don't think it is much different than remaining at the scene of a car accident
- The bitten party may require treatment, the cost of which should fall on the owner of the biter. Also, officers should be able to easily find those involved.
- There are repeat offenders that just keep jumping dog parks. They should be identified.
- Important for accountability but I do not think fair to discriminate against a certain breed.
- two sides to every story plus if there was an assault they need to answer for it.
- Just like a car accident, I do believe that if a dog has attacked and drawn blood then the owner should stick around.
- it is the owners responsibility. no different than a child incident or car accident

- Pet owners should be responsible for their pets in public and private spaces and if their animal is involved in an incident they should be accountable.
- Sharing contact information is important but I am not sure that remaining at a scene with an aggressive dog is a good idea.
- I believe it would be important to share information, however it may be prudent for everyone's safety to remove the dog from the stressing situation instead of remaining in the environment, possibly escalating things.
- Something has happened, and an investigation is in order. I feel that the onus should fall on the owner of the misbehaving dog to start that investigation process as soon as possible. Staying at the scene allows officers to potentially make observations.
- Yes I do. However, I do not believe pit bulls need a muzzle in public! It's absolutely horrible that the city of Calgary is even suggesting that. What are the statistics of dog bites in the city? It's not pit bulls biting people. And you do realize, they are much stronger breeds than pit bulls! There are multiple mastiff breeds all over our dog park. They are stronger than pit bulls.
- The injured person has been assaulted (by the animal), the owner of the animal is its guardian (they are responsible for the animal). The owner needs to stay at the scene and be held accountable for the injuries the victim suffered.
- Too many dog bites happen where the owner takes off with the dog, and then nothing can be done about it.
- Targeting one breed like Pitbulls under the guise of any reason is bad. Bad dogs are bad because of their owner training them to be that way or not training them at all. The focus should be on problem dogs case by case.
- It is the owner's responsibility to control their dog. They must be accountable for the dog's behaviour.
- This would make it easier to deal with the incident if they stayed to talk to by-law, like traffic law.
- Dog should be taken right away.
- People should be responsible and accountable for their pet's actions.
- Should be euthanized.
- Treat it like a car incident. Waiting for police or exchanging insurance.
- Responsible ownership.
- Wouldn't be fair if another dog bites around an animal and the owner of the dog who bites gets away with it. ALSO NO BSL PLEASE.
- Yes because if the person accusing the other of their dog acting a certain way, whether it may be true or false, the individual will be able to defend themselves & speak up for themselves.
- Only makes sense for an owner to be present as only an owner knows their dog's temperament best. And the incident should be investigated as to what led up to the bite. And action taken based on if the bite was provoked or not.
- Explain their side. Often dogs are euthanized when the injury was their fault. The city doesn't put down pedophiles yet the offend unprovoked. Animals typically bite in defense. Training should be mandatory for repeat offenders due to poor ownership. Dog should not be penalized.

- It is important that there is accountability for this for owners. Too many people leave and then have no consequences later, leaving the other owner to deal with medical or veterinary expenses on their own
 - Yes because then there is two sides to the story its important to understand what lead up to the bite incident. What was the dogs behavior, what was the victims behavior prior to the attack (was there warning signs that could have prevented the attack? - BTW all dogs show signs even subtle ones)
 - Like a fender bender
 - Dog owners are responsible for the dogs behaviour. They should stay at the scene as if it was a car accident
 - "Yes I think if a god bites a person for sure.
- This as a bylaw would become more problematic at an off-leash dog park as dogs get into scuffles all the time at what point in the bylaw would it be deemed an incident requiring enforcement officers. Legislation like this would need to be very clear otherwise it could be easily misinterpreted or abused for nefarious intentions."
 - Just like having a child, the parent needs to take ownership of their "children's" behaviour.
 - Would be no different than when a person hits a car. There's a rule you must stop and give information. I believe you must do the same when a dog bites someone.
 - I think it's just like a car accident and both sides need to be heard to get the story and then you can see if the story was even true for some cases.
 - Its part of being a responsible dog owner.
 - The owner should stay and accept responsibility
 - Because things could be WORKED OUT . They may figure out a plan to be ther to insure this doesn't happen again .
 - I think that it is the responsibility of the owner to be responsible for their animal, regardless of the breed.
 - It is important that owners are held accountable for the actions of their dog. It is not the dogs fault that they were put in an uncomfortable situation that caused them to have no bite inhibition. Absolutely hold the owner accountable - people need to understand that this is a serious problem
 - same as any accidents
 - I think a few irresponsible dog owners take off after their dog bites or attacks someone (or another dog). They need to stay on the scene and share contact information. If they do not- there needs to be repercussion.
 - They should receive extra fines/charges for fleeing the scene as well
 - The owner is 100% responsible for their animal and the training of said animal, if their dog bites someone they are liable
 - Owners should shoulder all the responsibility of their dogs actions including attacks. It's imperative they stick around.

- Responsibility should lie with the owner.
- I have witnessed incidents at off-leash dog parks where a dog owner who had little to no control over their pet (horrible call back) and their pet has instigated a bigger dog who might be deemed "a dangerous breed" and this dog with much restraint has tried to ignore until they can't anymore (dogs have a limit of patience also and are still animals) and of course a dog fight breaks out. But I have seen where the owner of the instigating dog declines to take action and admits it was their fault only to later post on a dog park forum on facebook or other social media platform changing all the details and blaming the other dog for "damages done". Now everyone on the internet is crucifying the "dangerous dog" and the breed and are now "keeping an eye out to report them" . This creates horrible negative stigma and unwarranted harassment when the other party is NOT at fault (but who will believe them now?). Having an enforcement officer come (even when it's a minor issue or no visible damage is seen initially, owners may later find wounds on their pets that they did not see initially in the heat of the moment) is necessary to have an official record of events to protect the owners and the dogs and not rely on a "he said she said" situation.
- Being both a dog owner and a bite victim, staying at the scene is the least a person could do.
- I believe people should remain on scene to take responsibility for their animals's actions.
- Poorly behaved dogs are to the fault of the OWNER ONLY. The owner should be held responsible for the poor training they give their dog.
- I agree that the dog's owner should stay and take responsibility, or provide a contact so they can leave to put their dog in a safe location
- As pet owners we are socially responsible to society as a whole for our pets behaviour. While dogs reactions can be their own and happen quickly, the owners need to stay and provide any information to help
- Take responsibility for your pet.
- People need to be held accountable for their pets actions.
- Am incident where a dog bites a Payson or another animal isn't that different from a person assaulting someone and responsibility needs to be addressed in both situations.
- responsibility and ownership is decent human behavior. Break the circle or [removed]
- I think it's best to get the owners idea of what happened instead of a one sided story.
- Owners should provide contact information in the event of a bite.
- I feel if you leave the situation you know you have done something wrong take the dogs home to de escalate the situation and return to discuss the following steps between owners
- Would help with accountability.
- The owner needs to be held accountable in these situations and they are often not.
- If my dog bit someone severely enough that it required medical attention I would agree with staying and giving contact information for any further questions or concern.
- if the owner is at the scene then they can be held responsible
- If the dog bites someone, there should be a further investigation in to why. It's not always the dogs fault. People can be just as if not more aggressive than dogs.

- If there is a need to escalate this to bylaw or medical attention, then all parties should be involved with all aspects.
 - It could be the person or other animals fault that they got bit.
 - They should also cover the necessary expenses of the incident
 - It is obviously your responsibility to train your dog so if they injure someone you should absolutely have stay and exchange information and a welfare check should be done on the dog to ensure it has the proper environment to thrive.
 - The owner is responsible for their pet, if they are aware their dog was involved in an incident, they should remain present to ensure any parties involved are safe and information exchanged for future use if needed.
 - Responsible dog owners take responsibility for their dog
 - In the event something like that would happen treat it like a car accident.
 - The owner must be responsible for the actions of their pet and it is the compassionate thing to do.
 - "As long as the dog is contained safely away from others, they should be required to stay.
- Treat it as a hit and run."
 - There needs to be more accountability on all dog owners regardless of breed. Many small dog owners will allow their dog to bite or instigate other dogs and then leave as they feel small dogs don't do the same damage or need to follow the same rules. All dogs should be held to the same standards regardless of breed or size
 - same as a hit and run with cars if they don't stop
 - Dog owners need to be responsible for their dog's actions. I've had many dogs go after mine and the owners don't give two [removed].
 - If a pet injures someone it is the owners responsibility to deal with the consequences of the situation
 - It's like a car accident, it's an accident. So treat it like one.
 - My puppy was attacked and the girl and her took off running...while I was laying on the ground...these ppl should fined huge for taking off.
 - Any damages (i.e. vet bills) should be paid for by the owner of the dog that cause the incident.
 - Owners need to be held accountable for their dogs actions.
 - The dog obviously needs help of some kind, so the owner needs to be held accountable and helped to change their ownership. It's not the dogs fault.
 - Too many times, dog owners just say they haven't seen there dog do that before and leave the scene of an incident, where it is likely that dog has a history of issues and these must be recorded.
 - This only makes sense.
 - I think a responsible pet owner should take responsibility for their dog. Plus an owner should want to ensure the well being of the victim.
 - Part of your responsibilities as a pet owner is to be held responsible for your animals behavior.
 - Most dog owners are inclined to run and not take responsibility.

- If the owner is on scene, they should by law remain at the site of the incident.
- When a dog bites another person/dog, it should be noted in the event that the dog should require training with an unbiased trainer in order to make sure another bite doesn't occur in the future. Set our dogs up to succeed.
- Common sense
- They should stay and be accountable for their pets actions. No breed is bad, it's is on the owners how the animal acts so it is their responsibility
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog and should do the right thing and share contact info. This may be hard if two dogs are very heated but should still be done but once that happens they should be able to leave and connect later with the enforcement officer if a vet visit is necessary.
- An owner should be held accountable for their pets behaviour.
- It should be treated like any accident where bodily harm is inflicted. People lie about there information and an enforcement officer can make sure this process is easier for both individuals.
- Define if necessary? Information on what the process is or what's that could mean for them would need to be released as many may not wait for fear of having the dog seized or euthanized which should not always be the outcome
- If there are any vet or medical bills because of the bite the owner of the dog should have to pay those bills.
- People lie
- BSL IS COMPLETE BS AND NEEDS TO BE STOPPED. ALL ADDING BLS IS DOING IS TRYING TO DISTRACT FROM MORE IMPORTANT ISSUES. Like how kenny is giving away our taxes and forcing us to raise costs on services used by all.
- Too many incidences of small chihuahua type dogs biting kids or adults have fled the scene.
- you should be held accountable for an animal under your control
- You are responsible for any damage the dog does to anyone or anything.
- Long term effects and if in case of needing records
- Pet owners should be held responsible for their actions, good and bad.
- It would depend on the severity of the incident.
- It is no different than a car accident. Information must be exchanged
- Might be medical bills
- Remain at the scene of the crime, just like a automobile collision
- This should be similar to car accidents where a police report must be submitted and the owner can face additional fines for fleeing the scene.
- Any bites from any size of animal should be equivalent to a car accident. Contact information and follow up should be hosted. Dependent on severity the owner should be responsible for talking to authorities and contributing to vet bills and be held responsible for the re-training, obedience, and safety measures responsible with their own dog.
- Non-responsible owners typically do not remain at the scene of incidents--so can be difficult to track ownership of the animal

- Dogs bite when they are stressed. I believe the owner should be punished, not the dog.
- The responsibility is on the OWNERSHIP. Not the animal. The owner should be expected to deal with the situation.
- It's the owners responsibility of the dog. To give contact information.
- its just like a car accident you are expected to stay at the scene until police arrive. Also keeps them accountable.
- The dog owner should be responsible, if there are vet fees and such. Plus the owner should be held accountable. It's not usually the animals fault. It's the owner who failed to take care of the animal.
- There should be an exchange of information, and if the offender tries to flee that there be strict consequences.
- Should apply to all animal owners, not just dog owners.
- As with any accident causing harm
- dog bites are serious no matter how small.
- If any dog causes harm to another animal or human, authorities should be called and that owner needs to stay.
- Contact information should be shared so the owner of the bitten dog can claim vet bills, etc.
- So people don't run off without fines or punishments
- Owners need to be held responsible for their animals. If a dog bites someone and they require medical attention, the owner should be held liable for any incurred costs as result of the dog bite.
- Dog owners should be responsible and this only what a responsible owners would do.
- That's common courtesy but many don't do that.
- If a dog bites a person or other animal 9/10 times it's the owners fault in some way. So they should take full responsibility for the attack by remaining at the scene and helping in any way possible.
- At the end of the day the owner is responsible for their dog and needs to be held accountable. If the offending dogs owner is not around when enforcement arrive they will be unable to receive the proper punishments and teaching moments that could prevent something of a similar nature from occurring in the future.
- If a dog bites a person that owner should have to remain at the scene and be held accountable
- There need to be more incentives for owners to be responsible for their dog's actions.
- Just like a car accident. Be responsible for your dog
- It would be bad ownership to leave.
- The owner is the one responsible for the dog
- If it was a car accident, they would have to stay. Same rules should apply.
- The victim will at least need to know if the dog has up to date vaccinations (rabies). The owner of the dog is responsible for the dogs behaviour, therefore if the dog bites it's up to the owner to provide information in case it's a serious wound that needs immediate medical attention
- Their dog their responsibility. If someone's dog bites someone it should be handled similarly to assault.

- I think it is very important to exchange information when a dog altercation results in an injury to a pet or human.
 - Yes, only if the dog doesn't pose a risk - the owner must stay with the dog
 - its the right thing to do. i know i am probably in the small group of people who would actually stick around and make sure that the person/dog that was attacked was okay. my husband and i have said that if our dogs ever attack that we would stick around and deal with the situation and then immediately head to the vet to euthanize the dog.
 - The owner of the dog is responsible for their dog, it's behaviour and actions. They should have to take responsibility for what their pet has done. The only exception I would consider is if the dog attacked in selfdefense of itself, or its owner, and with that only if the dog or it's owner are being attacked or threatened by an individual.
 - Both sides of the situation must be shared. Again, knowing why the dog is biting is important. Also if the owner already stated the dog shouldn't be approached, and was approached, the owner and dog are not at fault.
 - "A lot of people don't treat this as an accident when it should be, and many don't want to give out personal information should a dog bite happen.
- By having a rule in place this helps victims get the information required, for example figuring out the dogs information to check for rabies."
 - Only in the case of the person or severe injury to animal
 - No bite and runs acceptable. Responsible pet owners should have to remain at the scene to answer any questions.
 - absolutely . An owner needs to take accountability for the dog
 - The owner should share information, with the exception of in the case that they (the owner) was doing their due diligence- animal was leashed and/or protective measures were in place (muzzle, training collar, etc.) Reactive dog owners cannot control what other people/ their animals do, and should not be punished for another person's irresponsible actions.
 - Just like a car accident. It should be the same with animals
 - Owners need to be responsible for their animals
 - Yes
 - It is important for the dog owner to be able to answer questions about their animal and provide any information.
 - This should be required so contact information can be obtained and the dog owner can be held responsible for healthcare costs if necessary
 - As long as there is no severe injuries that need to be seen by vet
 - It's similar to a vehicle accident and is the responsible thing to do
 - Similar to fleeing the scene of a motor vehicle accident. If the owner leaves they should be fined.
 - this gives a voice to both sides

- this is very similar to a traffic accident type situation.
- It's no different than a car accident. It's important the incident be documented and details exchanged for accuracy and transparency.
- Responsible dog owners should always stay to provide their contact information if their dog does something harmful.
- You are responsible for your pet. If they cause harm to someone else, you need to take responsibility for that.
- because too many times no one is held accountable
- When a person flees the scene, it's like fleeing a hit and run scene, especially if there are potentially serious injuries.
- The history and health status of the dog is important information to have immediately. The owner should of course be required to stay on scene, otherwise they are like a hit and run driver.
- It should be mandatory in EVERY harmful interaction (even minor), so that repeat offenders can be flagged not to go to dog parks.
- i believe that owners need to be responsible for the actions of there pets.
- Reducing the incidence of dog bites requires active community involvement; passive attention or a token commitment is not sufficient. By actively focusing on dog bite prevention, the State of Nevada was able to reduce the incidence of bites by approximately 15%. Members of the AVMA Task Force represented a broad range of disciplines and designed the program described during this presentation and published in the Journal of the American Veterinary Medical Association (also available on the AVMA Web site at www.avma.org). It was recognized that a community approach must be multidisciplinary, and that different communities will have different needs based on their level of commitment, preexisting programs, and available resources. Although the best results will be obtained by adopting the entire prevention program, the program is designed so that it may be adopted as a whole or in part. Either way, the goal remains to reduce the incidence of dog bites within communities and improve quality of life for their citizens.
- As a responsible dog owner, you need to take responsibility for your dog's actions, good or bad. If a bite occurs whether a person or another animal , the owner of the dog needs to be held accountable for anything that may come up and an authority person should get the owner's contact information for future contact if needed.
- Anyone attacked by any dog not just the city's arrogance and discrimination against the imaginary breed "pitbull" shame on you for singling out these perfectly normal dogs.
- Again it isn't the dog ... it's the owner not training the dog
- We have to many owners afraid to stay at an accident because they don't want there dog taken away. Weather due to breed or history. By eliminating the chances of the dog being destroyed with put proper counsel and non bias trainers official say. This would greatly reduce people fleeing the scene. By making it a bylaw people stay at the scene and provide license info on the dog, name of dog, owners name and contact information it would make the situation documentable. By having more city owned private parks or more bylaw officials monitoring parks or would make calling in your report of bite or dangerous dog easier and more beneficial. Officials would be in close proximity and fines could be issued immediately.

- At the very least the dog and owner need to provide contact information
- You need to be able to exchange contact information it's no different then a car accident.
- I agree with the above conditions.
- It's being a responsible dog owner to stay
- Owners are responsible for their pets, these situations should be held to a similar standard as a car accident.
- Able to get both sides incident at the same time. Dog can be accessed in current environment. Owner can show ability to calm down the dog and get it under control.
- Only if severe, it should be treated like any other assault. If it's minor (caused a scare but no damage) then no
- Owners are responsible for their pets behaviour and if a serious incident occurs, it should be dealt with appropriately (owner whose pet caused the damage should cover the cost of vet bills, meds etc.)
- It doesn't matter what breed the dog is. If it bites someone, the incident must be explained to a third party. They cannot rule out the the dog could have also be protecting the owner, and justifiably so!
- Owners have a degree of responsibility in ensuring this doesn't occur. If it does, they need to be present to take the onus
- Owner has to be accountable and responsible for damage or injury to others.
- Absolutely, it's what responsible owners do.
- Damage caused by a dog is the full responsibility of the owner.
- It's just like a car accident you should have to stay there
- The dog owner should be held responsible for any vet bills or anything else caused by said dog.
- Owners should be held accountable for the actions of their pet, however they also deserve a chance to explain the incident to enforcement officers, as animals rarely attack unprovoked
- Just like a motor vehicle incident the owner should take responsibility for the actions of their animal and remain at the scene to provide a statement.
- Many people run off or provide fake contact information.
- You own a dog, you must be responsible for that dog & that requires you to stay at the scene & take responsibility.
- A majority of dogs do not bite unless they feel threatened. If an incident escalated to where enforcement officers are involved all parties should be there to explain their views on the situation.
- This information needs to be provided.
- But if the dog is still showing aggression the owner should be able to leave to put the dog away in a safe place, but not leaving before ID and a phone # are provided in case they don't come back
- Responsible pet ownership
- It's obvious they should have to stay. No hit and runs

- Well, they should want to make sure the person bitten is ok. Perhaps there is an explanation - maybe the dog was provoked? There should be discussion and allowances discussed not just a solution for all. There should be a report for historical purposes - is this behaviour recurring. One bite-one time -one judgement should not be the norm.
- like a car accident, should be illegal to leave
- Owner needs to be responsible for their dog.
- My dog was attacked at a park and owner walked away. luckily only a $300 bill that I could afford but the other owner ideally should have paid.
- There may be details a victim might not know to ask
- It makes sense that the dog owner remain at the scene to provide contact information. I live in an area with a huge number of dogs and when I have been charged by dogs (small ones, usually), the owners scurry away, pretending they are not the owners.
- If a dog causes physical harm to another body, this is negligence on the owner's part. The owner is fully responsible for damages, not the dog. It is the owner's responsibility to know his dog and to keep his dog, and others, safe. May not need to remain at the scene but certainly exchange information.
- Good to have contact info for after the fact incase of unknowns
- A dog owner should be responsible for their dogs behavior. The dog behavior is a reflection of training/lack of training, abuse/ or no abuse. As dog owners no matter the breed we are responsible for these dogs and should held to accountability. The dogs need rehabilitate and proper training.
- To aid in providing the entire account of the incident. Better to clarify what went down than to allow a befuddled boomer to spin a tale about a "scary" dog.
- Similar to being in a car accident. A responsible owner should stay at the scene and be responsible for damages/injuries.
- Full investigation required on any reported dog violence. If the "scary" looking dog is continually determined to be the issue, or the larger dog that inflicted more damage, people will be less likely to stay at the scene. Often it is the small dog that starts these situations and the larger/stronger dog naturally defends itself and inflicts more damage.
- Common sense.
- Too many people flee when there is a problem.
- For their own protection to verify details I believe it is anyone's best interest to not leave.
- The number of persons leaving when an incident occurred is too high. This leaves all repercussions to the victim and their families (financial and otherwise) as often they leave without exchange of information.
- If an animal has displayed aggressive behavior, the owner should be held responsible
- You don't leave the scene of a car accident, be a decent human and stay at the scene, tell your side of the story and go from there.
- The pet owner and victim should both have to give their story to an enforcement officer at the scene of the incident, same as a car crash.

- It is an incident that has caused injury or damage to someone else. Like car accidents, responsible individuals need to stick around and take ownership for their dog's behaviour.
- I believe this will force the owner, who is responsible for the animal and its behaviour, to be more responsible and accountable to the system
- Yes an owner of offending dog should stay and share info.
- Its the responsible thing to do to ensure everyone involved is able to speak to an enforcement officer. I also think more attention needs to be paid to what led to the dog bite, I.e. how a person interacted with the dog, were they being aggressive or abusive towards the animal. It terms of a animal bite, were both dogs behaving aggressively? More often than not a domesticated animal only reacts violently when provoked.
- If it is safe to do so, considering the dog/persons condition. Just like in a car accident
- Holds people accountable for the actions of their dog, rather than disappear and not face the consequences.
- I feel it's incredibly important I'm hear the owners input as well as having the officer able to see and assess the dog
- The person who owns the dog should at the very least have to identify themselves to bylaw. The caveat to this is that bylaw would have to respond quickly otherwise it is unreasonable to make a dog owner wait for a long time.
- Definitely. This is the owners responsibility to advocate for the dog and the victim and stand witness. But again, NO BREED LEGISLATION PLEASE.
- Should be treated just like an Automobile accident. they should be required to wait to speak to an enforcement officer!
- It would be the same for any other incident
- You should be held accountable not the breed. People need to grow up and stop banning innocent dogs like pit bulls.
- It is important that owners can give their statement regarding the incident.
- If a dog bites, it should be the owners responsibility to take care of the situation properly similar to a car accident
- It's responsible, like a car accident they should have to do the same thing
- If there has been an altercation, the dog must be allowed to leave the scene as to prevent any further arousal and incidences. The owner should have to speak with enforcement even if just to have a clearer picture of what happened (ie: both sides)
- If your pet harms someone you should take responsibility and also (depending on damage done) be able to discuss an effective management and training plan. Some dogs just need more socialization in a better controlled environment, some need to ensure their pet is safely managed away from other pets and people (private dog parks etc). And some, of any breed, may need more specific management.
- Often, dog owners will try and explain away their dogs behavior, and then leave immediately to avoid consequences.
- It's just the responsible thing to do.

- Sometimes incidents are not what it may look like and the owner needs to be heard as to what actually happened. A dog biting another person or another dog could be the fault of the person teasing the dog or another dog being aggressive towards another dog to the point where the aggressive dog or person not knowing it's boundaries from the warning signs of the dog until the dog bites.
- Offending dog owner should remain to provide information should further complications arise from the injury. If they leave the scene, they could very well get away with the offence which is not right. Victim owner could leave the scene immediately if the dog requires medical attention, otherwise they should also remain on scene.
- Yes they should be able to explain what happened, but I am very conflicted on the animal staying in the stressful situation. However ai understand if people are allowed to walk away they may not be willing to talk later. That's a tricky situation.
- Similar to a collision: the parties must remain present.
- The owner should stay behind and be responsible for their pets actions.
- Owner have to take responsibility for their pets.
- Held accountable
- Much like getting into any accident, it is the responsibility of the owner to remain on site to discuss how the situation happened and further steps
- My dog bit another dog. I stayed, I gave my number. I paid 1000$ vet bills for that dog, and the 250$ by-law fine. As an owner it is my responsibility to take ownership. And my dog is not a pitbull. DO NOT discriminate breed!
- It allows the victim to get health records on the animal as well as get a possible reason for the animals behaviour.
- Dogs can hurt people. If you can't drive away from a car wreck you shouldn't leave the scene of a dog bite
- Yes people can be injured from dog attacks and that should be taken care of properly
- By remaining at the scene the owner can both provide clarification and defense for their own dog if necessary, and be accountable for all actions.
- Well its as if it was your child who harmed another child. Essentially you are the one responsible in making sure all parties involved are taken in account and all make a statement about what happened.
- Proper ownership
- I've witnessed people running away.
- Owners need to be responsible for the actions of their pets.
- Be responsible, if you leave, heavy fines, automatically lose the dog for life. Not allowed to owe a dog for ten years
- Should be same as traffic accident... you must take responsibility.
- The owner should be held accountable for dogs actions
- Unless the dog is injured and needs immediate veterinary attention.

- A severe bite (meaning blood drawn), yes. A little playful or non harmful bite that the victim could be trying to play up, no.
- If this is to happen the dog owner needs to be responsible and assist in solving the problem. The only time to leave would be if the animal or person needs medical care
- If it's a serious incident both parties need to stay.
- They should be accountable.
- Perhaps the dog was provoked, scared, threatened by the victim and law enforcement needs to understand that just because the dog bit, does not mean that it was the aggressor, as they easily could have felt they were defending themselves or their owner.
- yes it's good for all parties to remain at the scene of an incident whether they are the owner or victim etc., in my experience there is always more to the story than one side lets on. often times people are the ones unintentionally escalating the situation and dogs are reacting to them when they bite, so not only do dogs need proper training but so do owners. that also needs to be taken into consideration during an incident.
- taking responsibility for your dog is part of being a pet owner.
- To give dogs health information.
- It should be the same as a traffic offence.
- Just like a car accident, we must stay at the scene of the crime. Although understand if the dog needs to be removed from the situation for safety concerns.
- This way you can get details of the owner, such as name, phone number, insurance, and do not have to chase them down via social media
- My dog had gotten bitten by another dog (small little [removed]) and the owners took off I was stuck with the vet bills for the bite.
- I believe that owners are solely responsible for any behaviour presented by ANY type of dog. Therefor I believe a dog should not be euthanized because of an owners fault. There should be a system in place to rescue and rehabilitate ANY type of dog that is exhibiting dangerous behaviour due to bad owners.
- The person should be held responsible. If a dog is not good with other dogs or humans, it should never be put into a situation where it could bite.
- A person should stay on the scene and talk to an officer. Both sides should be heard. Dogs bite humans because they aren't trained or because they felt threatened.
- Pitbull are strong but they are no more dangerous than other dogs, it's not fair to single them out like this. Some of the sweetest dogs I've met are Pitbulls. This legislation is horrible!
- This encourages responsible pet ownership
- Like the traffic offense - a bite scene is a crime scene and those involved should remain at the scene.
- You should be liable for the actions of your dog
- We cannot criminalize animals. The way the city of calgary is demonizing pit bulls is ridiculous and disgusting. I was raised with many pit bulls from my own family, our family friends ect, and they are powerfully loving dogs. Owners should go through more learning and training to own any dog or animal, its not about the animal, its about the owner. Start addressing the ROOT CAUSE of vicious dogs rather than addressing a symptom. I very disappointed in the city of calgary for this new engagement.

- The owner responsible for the animal should have to provide their contact information as well as be able to offer their side of the story (especially in the case of animal provocation, see above).
- The owner needs to be accountable for their dog as its likely their fault (or through their negligence) that the dog is behaving that way.
- Dog owners with aggressive dogs should be held accountable.
- I think this similar to road accident and exchanging information is required by law in that case so same should be applied to this accident as well.
- ALL people should share contact information. There are always mitigating factors to reveal. Stop generalizing dog breeds with [removed] owners. ANY continued nuisance breed should have identical implications. Bylaw is uneducated to determine breed based on site. Most "pit bull" looming breed owners are so highly sensitive to breed selective legislation that they are the owners investing in training and responsibility.
- Accountability
- It is usually one word against another's, so this could be a good way to get all parties together to talk in a safe setting, and there will be someone there to interfere if need be
- Yes I think they need to dry on site - however I also believe they have a responsibility to try and catch their dog if it has run after the incident. So if they flea the scene to get their dog their should be a number that they can call to follow up on the incident or report. But yes same as a car accident you are responsible for staying on site and exchanging information or it is a hit and run
- Accountability for their dogs actions.
- Of course, all pet owners need to take responsibility for their pets and their actions.
- I think it certainly depends on the bite, But yes if there's a severity where there's a concern for someone's dog or a person who got better than yes there should be an exchange of information
- We have to remain at the scene of any other accident causing damage to a person's belongings or being so why not with dogs.
- You must take responsibility for your property. Being that a dog is part of your property - you should be held accountable for the actions of your dog. If there is a bit that causes damages to another animal(s) and or person(s) - like a MVA, you should stay at the scene for further measures to be taken
- Dog bites are not a condition of the dog. Its a condition of poor ownership, deliberate aggressive training or lack of training all together. A dog bite should act in similar fashion to a car accident or incident that requires people to take down information and witnesses to make statements.
- Just good morals
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their lack of training.
- This is the case when any law is broken isn't it...?
- Accountability, as a responsible pet owner you should stay at the scene.

- Talking with the people involved is important, however getting enforcement officer involved isn't necessary.
- Identifying owners is actually far more crucial than identifying an animal. The problem and the blame do not typically lie with the dog, it lies with the owner who raised the animal that way.
- Being an owner of a dog that is a hit or miss with other dogs is feel better knowing that both parties stay until enforcement arrives there fire zero he she said
- My dog was atracked by a smaller dog and because my dog was bigger the owner thought it was no big deal. In my opinion there are way too many owners like this and the city of calgary is ignoring THIS problem. By focusing on a certain breed you are creating an even bigger problem.
- Dog owners should take full responsibility for their dog and provide contact information as well as explain their take on the incident to an enforcement officer.
- If the bite is serious enough or draws bad blood and needs medical attention
- I totally agree with this. A dog owner MUST stay of their dog has bitten someone to provide information.
- The owner is responsible for the dog. The owner is responsible for training. Just as the human would be responsible for any ill will they caused to a person, so they should be if their animal does the same.
- there could be situations where information is needed from all parties to come to am decision.
- Humans must be held accountable for their dog's behavior or reactions.
- The owner needs to be held accountable, and understand that all dogs need training, depending on the severity of the bite it could be required for the dog and owner to attend training classes.
- Owners need to be held more responsible
- I agree 100%. Why? Because this is the responsible thing to do. It is no different then a vehicular accident, stay and be accountable for your dog and its actions. It should also be a hefty fine for leaving the scene.
- Dog tags need to be verified, people have to right to sue if damages occurred
- Dog bites can be serious and should be treated like any other serious physical injury.
- Multiple perspectives are necessary to maintain an objective understanding of the incident at hand
- I support it in theory but it could be hard to prove that an owner was aware that their dog bit someone before they left the scene. It could be a "my word against theirs" situation unless you have witnesses.
- A friend of mine had her dog taken away because he bit a jogger. My friend had no say at the incident and couldn't see him for over 6 weeks. It came out during the investigation that the woman he bit had punched and kicked the dog in the face first and then the dog defended itself. When the dog was returned, he was dirty, traumatized and stunk terribly.
- Really? We require people who hit others with a car to remain on scene. If your dog has [removed] behaviour the person should be taking full responsibility
- Your dog is your responsibility and if there is an incident all information should be shared for proper follow up
- It's just like a car accident.

- Fines and Jail time just like leaving the scene of a auto accident
- Taking responsibility is important
- Many people are in severe denial about the behavior of their animals and need to be held accountable. Dog bites especially by small dogs are gravely under-reported.
- It's important to hear from both sides with no bias.
- You are responsible for the animal and must do everything necessary to do the right thing
- Just like a car accident they're responsible and should own up to the incident
- Yes because far too many dogs are being attacked at dog parks and then the owners are left with big vet bills. It should be treated as 'leaving the scene' and fines need to be imposed for those who don't exchange information if caught.
- If they can not have their pet under control then they are responsible for any hospital/vet bills or more depending. I lost my job due to a dog attacking me and nothing happens if it and the owner even laughed and said she had worse. There is no help for people like me
- Some dog owners are simply irresponsible. If an incident occurs they should absolutely be required to remain at the scene. Every situation is different but the owner should be held accountable for the actions of their pets.
- It is the owners responsibility
- With the only exception being that owners/animals can leave the scene if they are hurt and in need of emergency medical attention
- Hit and runs are bad, why wouldn't a bite and run be? I'm not sure what the current jurisdiction is.
- The owner needs to pay for damages to victim
- Have a french bulldog that got scratched and bit by another dog, owner didnt even say sorry or acknowledge the incident.
- Same rules as major car accidents seems fair.
- Absolutely. We have had incidents where our dogs have been attacked and the other owners left the scene.
- If a dog bites, it bites. There has to be something that triggers the dogs instinct to do so. Most notably due to not the owner, but a stranger who doesn't know how to respect a dog's personal space.
- If their animal causes significant damage to your pet they should be held liable for vet fees.
- my dog was attacked by a "professional" dog walkers clients dog at the Sue Higgins offleash, i had to use social media to get the owners attention as the lady who was in charge of the dogs was rude and didn't take ownership. She should have been fined for not taking the dog attack seriously, she also shouldn't have had 12 dogs under her care at one time!! too many dogs for one person.
- As owning an animal is a privilege, we should also be required to be responsible for its actions and therefore if something occurs, the owner should remain at the scene to take responsibility for that item.
- If someone has a vicious dog I don't think they should be able to run away from the problem
- if the bite is severe
- The dog owner should be charged for failing to remain at the scene of the crime.

- Yes, because an assessment of the damage of the bite is necessary to decide on further action. As well, if the offending dog causes the victim to incur medical bills, the cost should be on the offender and not the victim. Also, law enforcement should be required to perform an assessment of the offending dog and it's liveliness to reoffend.
- Owners need to take responsibility, as well there are two sides to every story.
- If a dog bites then the owner has a responsibility to stay
- Bites causing harm need to be addressed. This should not be used as a way to euthanize dogs, but rather to address poor ownership.
- I only support it in cases when an animal bites a person causing injury or a dog in severe cases. Dogs bite each other often in play and some owners have zero knowledge about dog behavior. Uninformed citizens also target larger breeds when making complaints because they perceive them as more aggressive.
- At the very least, contact info should be given, such as a photo of the persons ID and their phone number. It should be treated like people swapping insurance info at a car accident. This option should be available to anyone who would have to wait too long for someone to show up.
- I've had to deal with rescues and negligent owners. I don't believe in bad dogs, just bad owners. And many times victims aren't innocent.
- As long as the situation does not increase the stress of the people and the animal involved.
- Witness to the incident.
- If you get into a car crash you have to wait
- People need to be held responsible for their dogs actions. BSL and blaming the dog doesn't work the problem is always the owner
- The pet is a reflection on how the owner acts, so if the owner has a short temper, why should the punishment be taken out on the animal?
- bite and run should have similar consequences and rules to hit and run
- I feel tracking these incidents will reveal that "nuisance dogs" cannot be generalized by breed
- I thought they were already supposed to do that.
- owner responsibility. regardless of breed, size or degree of damage.
- Owners should be staying at the scene, sharing contact information while the enforcement officer is on route or present
- Should be a norm anyways, it shows responsibility as an owner.
- People need to be accountable - whether that's required training for the owner and dog or a fine, and if the bite is severe it's in the interest of public safety
- I believe a rule about exchanging contact information is needed, but if the dog has to be removed from the scene for safety reasons the owners should have an opportunity to call in their information to a reporting office, failure to stay or to check in with their information should result in a much more significant fine.
- I believe the dog owner should be held responsible for the lack of training or holding back of their dog. The dog should not have to suffer consequences because of an irresponsible human.

- Too often people dodge the consequences of a badly behaved dog by leaving the scene. Given the abundance of cell phone cameras it would also be easy to jointly record a statement by both owners if they were 'ok's with both parties going there own way, in the event that one party changes their mind later
- As long as it's not a dog fight situation.
- It's not the breed of dog it's the owners that are at fault for these instances
- Any incident with a dog should be dealt with with enforcement.
- Justice needs both sides of the story
- After ensuring the dog has calmed down/ removing the dog from the scene. Owners should have to take responsibility for the actions of their dog.
- Yes, if a dog owners dog attacked someone and hurt them very bad! BOTH parties need to stay on the scene and explain what happened, as well as any witnesses
- As long as the animal didn't accidentally get out, the owner should have been aware of there whereabouts. If owner is present during any attack. They should have to stay at the scene. Just like a car accident
- To assess if the person was in offence of anything else (ie. off leash in a park when the dog has been deemed "a nuisance" previous etc)
- I thought this was common sense. Just like leaving the scene of an MVA, it should be a bylaw offence
- Accountability must be had for poorly trained animals
- I think all pet owners should take responsibility for a dog biting another person or another dog and should always stay at the scene of the incident.
- Two sides to every story
- Similar to a hit and run with a vehicle.
- It is their responsibility to stay, same as a vehicle accident.
- If your dog bites a person or their dog, it is the owners fault and not the dog that this happened mostly likely from a lack of training and not properly handling their dog, and it is their responsibility to take responsibility for their pets actions
- As long as it can be done safely, without further trauma for either dogs or humans.
- Too many small dogs get attacked and just left by the other owner.
- They should exchange information for insurance purposes and to keep track on how many incidences the dog has had in the past
- It makes sense for the owner to be present so the next step is clear and followed through with
- Allows for record of incident with the city to track recurrent behaviour. Contact info may be difficult to obtain otherwise.
- people should take responsibility for their pets
- It's common sense but people don't stick around. it should be treated the same as leaving the scene of a vehicular accident.

- I believe that staying at the scene is important as to share any information required. I believe they should be allowed to return home to take the dog home first or have a family member grab the dog as to not cause more stress
- Every dog owner (regardless of breed) should stay at a scene of an incident.
- Like any incident, every person involved and witnesses should stay in order to get all sides of the story. It's not always the dog who bites fault. Taunting and such needs to be looked at.
- It will decrease the chance of future incidences with the same dog.
- The situation needs two sides and the owners information to accurately deal with the situation.
- It requires people to take accountability for their dogs behavior.
- The owner should be full responsible for the dog and it's actions. If training is needed to prevent such situations they should require to do so. They should be held responsible for their dog.
- If we were to treat it like a car collision then the owner should be present to explain what happened.
- People need to take responsibility for the behaviour of their pets. We have to stay in the scene of a car accident, you should have to stay on the scene if your dog bites another dog.
- how is this not already the rule? just like a car accident or other crime, leaving should be punishable.
- I'm a dog owner, I have a 2 year old German shepherd. If someone asks to pet my dog, I usually say yes. I CAN and DO say no. Every owner has the right to say NO. If someone approaches my dog without permission and my dog were to bite this person this should NOT be something I have no say over. Absolutely every pet owner should have the right to explain to an enforcement officer what happened without fear the dog will be thrown into a shelter. That's RIDICULOUS. :(
- It depends on the severity of the bite. If it's a nip I don't see why it would be necessary.
- People need to take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
- Yes! There have been too many cases where people leave the scene.
- Otherwise how do you find them later?
- That should be standard. Like a car accident.
- Seems to me this would be just like a car accident. People need to be informed of what they did wrong and held liable for their and their pets actions. It would be important for them to speak to someone about what they can do to mitigate the situation.
- If i hit someone with a car or bike or baseball how is that different than a dog?
- its part of being a responsible owner and its the right thing to do
- dog bites are serious and should be dealt with immediately
- Every person has the right or responsibility to address this issue of dogs bit someone or pet. They should remain at the place where this happened. The city is liable because of unsafe areas for people to enjoy the green space.
- allows the opportunity for the owner to provide their account of events
- But the officer needs to have a open mind and realize that there is two sides to every story and not just blame the person with the bully breed and realize Dogs bite for a reason. Anxiety, bad owners, defending themselves or their companions, someone or something invaded their space, etc. Dogs deserve respect. But at the end of the day dogs shouldn't suffer. The humans should. Humans should get the fine and they should get the blame. If it's reasonable of course. If they dog was just defending themselves or their human they shouldn't get in trouble for that. Officers need to not blame and get the whole story and be reasonable and understanding. They should have proper training for dealing with dogs also. Dogs shouldn't get the blame. They are animals and don't understand and if they have bad owners they should get the chance at a new home with someone who will actually care for them and teach them right from wrong well giving them the love and attention they deserve. The dog shouldn't get the blame. The owners should get the blame. The dog shouldn't have to suffer because they have crappy owners. Dogs should not be Euthanized unless they are sick. Not because they have bit someone or something. That's not fair. That's the owners fault. Not theirs.

- It's like a car accident. If damage has occurred, information should be exchanged. If the victim will require expensive medical treatment, there should definitely be authorities involved to keep things safe and fair for everyone.
- Should be an offence if a dog bites anyone
- It's the right thing to do.
- Yes, it is the owners training who is at fault. Not the animals.
- Only if the dog can be safely contained and it's not getting more aggravated at the scene.
- Some dogs should not be approached by strangers. Most people do not think of this, and pet a dog, who may lash out. A large amount of dog bites are NOT the dogs fault. It is people.
- It is the owners responsibility to train the dog properly and be a representative for the dog.
- My dogs been attacked three times and each time the owner fled. (Lab, lab, shepherd mix).
- if you keep the dog there then you can get a sense of what time of dog this is, possible reason for biting and see how the owner treats the dog. If the dog calms down there must be a valid reason, taunting/hitting which made the dog react. I think its time to stop killing dogs for the sake of killing them..an easy way out. Get the owner involved, fine them, proper training/school will go a long way.
- 100% agree. The owner of the attacking dog needs to be held accountable for their actions and in order to do so, must remain at the scene and MUST provide contact information.
- As long as it's safe to do so
- I think If there was injury or damage caused, both parties should remain at the scene until the situation is resolved and a solution has been reached
- As a responsible pitbull dog owner. It would be right for any dog owner to stay behind and until the situation is cleared up.
- That's just common sense
- I would like owners to take ownership for their dogs.
- Too many people think it is nothing and take off with the offender. The owner is left with vet bills or other costs.
- Yes, because a responsible dog owner will likely have important information regarding the incident (ie was the dog provoked by someone). And a vicious dog owner should be available to take responsibility for how the dog was trained.
- I say this to ensure that all sides of the story are taken into consideration. It's not always the dogs fault. As in teasing etc.

- "I love animals, all animals, and I do not agree that certain breeds are to blame. It is 99% the owners responsibility to train their dogs properly. It is not the dogs fault. If they have a health condition or neurological condition that makes them not in their right mind is the inky exception to this.
- As long as there is no seizure of the dog at the scene I agree with this.
- If the dog was being taunted or needed space and wasn't given that, there is always a reason why a dog bites and it is almost never the dogs fault."
- Any one who owns a dog is responsible to look after their dog and make sure that they are behaved and to know your dog some dogs aren't good around kids other dogs etc... It's up to each owner to know their dog and not put them in stressful situations if it can be avoided. If your dog bites someone or something that responsibility is on the owner.
- my dog has been attacked numerous times, all unprovoked at a dog park, and the attacking party just left the second it was over.
- It is important to hear both sides of the story, the only way to do this is to hear from both parties.
- It is important to hear both sides of the story and to make sure the person that got bit is okay
- The fact this is not already required is surprising.
- You have responsibility for your dog.
- I think it's important to share information in case anything bad comes from the bite and as long as everyone is being nice to the owner and the dog.
- Own up to your mistakes. But stop acting like dogs behaviours is directly related to their breed. I know chihuahuas that have bitten more people than pitbulls. Makes the laws based more around the owner and less around the animal
- Too many incidents of owners fleeing after their dog has attacked or bit someone. It should be considered fleeing the scene of a crime. Similar to assault or driving away from a car accident.
- Time is an issue. But I think that in these circumstances everyone should stay until information is exchanged.
- "Pit bulls are responsible for the vast majority of fatalities and too many pit owners are purposely ignoring this fact.
- I believe that even small dogs who bite talk with enforcement. We need more responsible ownership in this city."
- If another dog bites my dog and hurts him, I want to know that my dog will be protected and I will not be the one paying the insane amount of money if he needs stitches, etc.
- Pet owners need to be responsible for their pet and ensure any other pet or human is taken care of if attacked.

- Bylaw will need to get the facts as soon as possible
- As owners are required to be in control, same as driving a car. Leaving the scene of an incident is inappropriate. The bitten person has been assaulted and should have recourse.
- If the owner is there to witness the incident then they should stay to give their side as well as being there for their dog it's just being a good owner
- Just like another incident they should share information so things can be taken care of and the correct people are involved
- People need to be responsible for what their animals do. Hold them to it.
- Like with a car accident, both parties should explain what happened. Some dogs will attack or bite if they are provoked, and so having the owner present will provide context.
- When a human crime happens we are held accountable, dog only learn from their humans on behaviour and what is right and wrong, humans need to be held accountable for how they conduct themselves and the way they teach their animals, like how they would teach a child how to act.
- This is common sense and decency
- It should be considered just like a car accident. If they leave they should be fined even further
- Absolutely. Owner should at all times take responsible or be accountable for pet's behaviour.
- A person should be held accountable for their pets actions.
- Responsible thing to do
- In the case of pressing charges yes or seeing what party is at fault
- If you have to remain at the scene of a car accident, yes, remain at this scene. All apart of being a responsible dog owner
- "The focus should always be on taking responsibility and actively working to correct a wrong. The question is, how enforceable is this rule?"
- Punishment doesn't change behavior, how will this correct behavior."
- You have to be responsible for your pet when you are in public.
- The owner should be there to provide contact information and has access to the dog's medical and vaccine history
- I'd think it's necessary in the case of an attack
- should follow similar protocol as a traffic accident.
- The owner is responsible for the dog from picking up waste to the attitude and actions of the dog. It should be considered the same as a hit and run.
- why wouldn't an owner be required to stay onsite and be accountable.
- the owner of the dog is responsible both morally and financially for any damages or injuries.
- Yes, is important to have a record, and if The dog have all vaccinations
- It's in both parties best interest to remain on scene
- The dog is an extension of its owner. Leaving the scene would essentially be fleeing the scene.
- Like any accident everyone should stay at the scene of the crime.

- It has everyone involved in the account of the situation
- Seems like common sense
- I believe that would be responsible dog ownership. Although this would potentially keep the dog in a stressful situation if it cannot be secured while waiting for the officer
- Due to the nature of a dog bite there are legitimate health concerns to consider. The animal owner should remain on scene to give health and contact information
- This way the dog owner can't run off and get away with out consequences.
- Both owners information should be exchanged and you cannot assume a dogs breed just because of appearance.
- Don't let the person leave if an animal under their control has assaulted a person or another persons owned property (alive or inanimate)
- There is a reason a dog bites someone or something whether they have a prey drive or they were over threshold and then something set them off. It would be response for a person to stand up for their dog and the matters that have been caused
- I believe that the person should remain and aid in the care of the person who's been bit, but it should ultimately be up to that person if they'd like to peruse charges or whatever.
- Your dog, your responsibility to take accountability.
- Sometimes it is necessary to remove dogs from the area to keep from escalating.
- Dog bites are serious and without the owner staying it can be difficult to track them down
- A dog owner should stay on scene because for the most part your dogs do not have a voice you are there voice.
- BSL is unacceptable. Dogs are innocent. Owners should be held responsible and dogs should be rehomed rather than euthanized.
- It is akin to leaving the scene of an accident.
- Too many owners and their dogs leave the scene (seen more with little dogs than bigger 'nuisance' breeds)
- So that owners can't take off without consequences.
- If a person is not in full control of their animal at all times and it bites another person or animal, the owner is responsible for that animal's actions and should be accountable.
- Allows them to tell their side of the story and it keeps them accountable if the bite is severe
- I'm shocked that as it currently stands, pet owners can simply leave the scene. A dog bite can cause as much physical damage as a car accident, and vehicle owners/operators cannot legally leave the scene of a crash. Logically of course the pet owner should have to stay.
- Depending how severe the incident was, and if people or the dog itself requires medical treatment.
- The only exception would be if they can't control the dog while waiting but must still provide contact info before leaving.
- If person bit requests it
- It is the responsibility of all pet owners to take care of any issue caused by their pet

- People must be held accountable and responsible for their pet's behaviour.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions
- The victim has the right to proceed in anyways legally possible to any information relevant to any injuries to any living being. If they run, it should be the same penalties against the owner as it would if they were to perform a hit-and-run
- I think this is an important step in tracking.
- The dog owner should be solely responsible for the actions of the dog, and as such, should remain on the scene to provide information.
- It is common curtesy to do so. Dog owners have to deal with the consequences when something happens to their dog or when their dog injure another animal or human.
- The owner of the biting dog should be there to explain their side of the story.
- The dog owner created the conditions that allowed the dog to bite by not properly caring/training it. There needs to be responsibility on the part of the owner. [removed]
- The owner should take responsibility for their pet
- Yes. Many times these people are not responsible enough to wait and may not be held responsible for their dog's actions.
- It's the same as a car accident, someone got hurt so you should be there to be held responsible for your dog.
- Vet bills are expensive! The owner of the dog who caused the bite should be responsible for paying for the dogs wound care.
- [removed]
- This includes any small breed dogs
- Treat it the same as a car accident. You need all the information before you place the blame.
- This is common courtesy and respects the trauma to the victim.
- Often owners and dogs walk away without taking responsibility
- Yes the owner should remain on scene. Its like a car accident, you are not supposed to leave an accident scene if you were involved.
- Just like a car accident. If both parties can't come to a decision.. bulaw gets called. It really depend on severity. Dogs will be dogs in aserting dominance,its different if it attacks another dog..
- Should be the same punishment as fleeing the scene of an accident.
- The owner needs to be responsible for their dog
- Yes, because often people could lie about their contact info, and then the information is lost once that person leaves. There should be an exception if both or one of the dogs requires medical attention and the officer can be called to the nearby emergency center
- The owner of the dog should either be held accountable or able to contest the situation.
- It is no different then at a car accident
- Any animal incident that results in injury should be treated as a vehicle accident stay until told by authorities or be charged with fleeing scene

- Remain or Return. Once their animal is calm or put at a safe distance, it is an owners responsibility to make sure their animal didn't cause injury and to face repercussions.
- Yes, just like at a motor vehicle accident you are responsible. The same should go for a dog attack, especially because you are here targeting "pit bulls" - perhaps with this rule you will see how many breeds of dogs are actually aggressive that are not pit bulls
- All parties must remain at the scene and must exchange information.
- Absolutely.
- It's the owners responsibility
- There is no way you should leave if someone/something was hurt by your animal. I would treat it like a car accident. You can't just leave the scene. It is almost impossible to find someone once they've left
- People need to be held accountable
- Owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their animals. For legal purposes, it should be considered a crime to not remain at the scene.
- The owner should be held responsible and charges accordingly!! Of course they need to remain at the scene of a dog attack!!
- They need to pay for the vet bills. And if bad enough get put down
- My well behaved, sweet PITS have been attacked by German shepherds and the owners ran away
- People should be accountable for their animals
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their pet. It is likely the owner's fault that a pet was put in a situation it viewed as threatening. Pet owners should require training themselves.
- Obviously yes. We have to stay at the scene of an accident where someone may be injured but the car is damaged. If a dog bites someone I'm pretty sure you should stay.
- The human should be held responsible for the dogs behaviour, not the dog itself. They are a product of their upbringing & can be rehabilitated when given the time and attention and affection it needs.
- Owners are 100% responsible. DO NOT punish the breed.
- If a dog bites a person or animal the owner(s) should be required to cover any medical expenses not covered by insurance, and, as such, should remain at the scene of an incident to provide contact information.
- The person should be held accountable for the dog's actions.
- If it is an actual dog attack. I don't support this if it's a minor spat between dogs with no serious injuries, those happen too frequently to call out enforcement officers.
- If a dog bites another person it is the OWNER'S fault for poor training
- It's important that people take responsibility for their dogs.
- It's an owners responsibility to care for their dog. Typically if a dog bites it's an owners training or lack of training. Also, if the owner was there and explained to the human not to approach or give instructions things might be avoidable.
- If at all possible, information should be exchanged. Although gaining control and removing the animal from the situation might be more prudent so as not to escalate the situation. If possible, the owner should remove the animal from the situation quickly - but be required to swiftly exchange a name & number?

- People have a responsibility keeping their dogs properly trained for the safety of others.
- Only makes sense. It's assault.
- Just like in a vehicular accident, any incident should be thoroughly examined and proper information shared to ensure everyone is aware of the risks.
- The responsibility of the owner is required for such circumstances, especially if something like that happens off their property.
- As a pet owner you are responsible for ensuring that your pet (in this case dog) is under control at all times. In an event where you failed to keep your pet under control, resulting in injury or harm to another then yes you should be legally obligated to remain at the scene to exchange information and speak to officials to ensure the matter is handled in the most fair, and efficient way possible to all parties involved.
- Yes because that way the person will be held accountable and they will be forced to put their dog into classes or have their dog declared as a nuisance if it is serious.
- Just like a car accident. You are responsible for your dogs actions, therefore you should stay and the scene and provide the appropriate information. Also STOP singling out a specific breed. Pitbulls are not dangerous, all dogs have the potential to be dangerous if not treated properly. It's the owners that are responsible for their dogs. How about we implement mandatory training for people who own dogs, specifically ones that cause issues. I DO NOT support the singling out of Pitbulls over every other breed. I've seen Chiawawa's who are way more viscous than a Pitbull. I suggest the city go sit down and invest some time into watch Cesar Milan and learn a little more about dogs.
- There needs to be multiple witness accounts including that if a dog owner.
- A lot of pet owners aren't taking responsibility for their dogs actions so by making them exchange contact information it will make them more responsible.
- Follow up for health ramifications for victim, further investigation and accountability
- This is so pet owners are help responsible. The same would go for their child
- Shouldn't leave the scene of an incident, just like traffic bylaws.
- Yes but only if the owner is able eg May have to leave to escort dog from site.
- As a responsible pet owner that is your duty.
- Yes- depending on the severity of the bite. If the bite has broken skin/caused injury then the owner should stay. As someone whose mother had her arm broken from a fall as a result of an out of control dog, we were not in the mindset of asking for the owner to provide contact information nor were we supported by a legal requirement that she provide it, resulting in physio etc that we had to pay out of pocket to provide rather than insurance. Having an enforceable bylaw and clear direction on this would be helpful to all in a stressful situation.
- It depends on the situation and even if it's a bylaw terrible people are still gonna walk away
- Too many owners of dogs that bite or act aggressively leave the scene and the other person or pet owner is left with hefty vet bills. This needs to stop.

- As the dogs owner we are responsible for its actions and the consequences of the actions
- I own a reactive dog myself and one hundred percent believe that if you take on the risk of a dog that may have an issue, you owe it to your dog and anyone else involved in a potential altercation to be responsible for the consequences of that choice
- Just yes.
- all situations are different ; it is not solely a breed issue. an untrained, unsocialized, unleashed small dog can cause severe injury in a short amount of time, just efficiently as a larger breed. enforce that obedience training is part of the Registering to Own a Dog process. Owners not invested in socialized dogs should not be bringing them into areas accessible to the dog being in public (a short walk "around the block", unfenced property, etc). being invested in having a well trained sociable dog should be the focus of City actions.
- For victims sake and owners sake, it is important for enforcement officer to be able to obtain the full story before a decision is made.
- It's app responsibility of the owner to own up to any incidents and accidents bites or anything related to an accident or an injury with their pet and another person or another animal as well
- An investigation should be done if a dog bites another or a human - so the owner needs to remain at the scene.
- It is important that the owner take responsibility for the dogs actions. Dogs are not inherently bad or badly behaved, regardless of breed, it is the owner's responsibility how a dog acts and reacts.
- I think people need to be held accountable for their dogs actions. Bites don't happen out of the blue and often a owners refusing to follow leash laws or other basic issues are what cause accidents. I also think we need to look at both parties as well. If an off leash dog or child rushing an on leash dog that needs to be taken into account and the owner needs a safe place to discuss this as well. Both sides need accountability in some cases. Again I think ensuring we don't add BSL to the mix will make people more likely to stay. BSL has been shown to be ineffective in many areas. Responsible pet ownership is key regardless of breed and needs to be the focus. Education needs to be provided to all parties in how to read body language, know the breeds you are getting, understand bylaws in place, and understand how to respect animals. Having both parties stay at the scene may allow some of this information to be given as well as giving both parties a chance to give their story helping determine what actually happened.
- Need to take responsibility for their and the dogs actions
- Treat it like a car accident
- They should have to stick around! It's irresponsible to just leave
- There would be no way to hold people accountable if the nuisance animals owners are not required to stay at the scene
- Only in severe cases
- if damage has been done it's important to get both sides of the story and parties to be held accountable
- extremely important. There could be medical costs incurred that the bitera owner should finance. And it puts them on record

- If possible, remove the dog from the situation, to avoid further trauma for any involved party. Ensure that appropriate information is shared so that liability can be determined, and appropriate action can be taken.
- Yes, that way it gives opportunity for the owner of the dog and the person who is alleging the bite to explain their sides. Sometimes, people who are scared of dogs will exaggerate the incident or lie. Also, if the person who was bit, was tormenting the dog, they should be blamed, not the dog.
- Of course they should remain at the scene..otherwise its like fleeing the scene of an accident
- Accountability for dog owners, hopefully would ensure a fair resolution for all parties.
- The owner(s) MUST be held accountable for the actions of their dog, as they are responsible for its training and behaviour at home and in public. Same as a child with a guardian.
- just like a car accident
- Of course if a dog were to bite a person or dog they should be held responsible!
- I think we as people and a community should own our wrongs and exchange contact numbers or emails so that in the case that the victim needs to see a doctor/vet the aggressor will have to pay the medical bill. No further consequences should be taken.
- No different then a vehicle accident - owner should be held there to ensure accountability and responsibility
- Any responsible pet owner would/should stick around to make sure all parties involved are safe. If a pet owner leaves there should be additional fines (just like walking away from the scene of an accident
- The owner and dog needs to be reachable and held accountable.
- You need to talk to [personal information removed] at Town of Olds. Also there is a new breed that pit bulls are getting blamed for their actions. They are American Bullies. Look them up. You can not blame a breed, the owner needs to take responsibility. And you can not say pit bull type breed or pit bulls in your bylaws (use dangerous dogs instead, and define what that means). Try instagram Alberta bullies and you will see.
- Depending on what happened. If dogs are playing and then a fight breaks out, the owners should talk through the situation. If not resolved, call law enforcement. If someone's dog attacks another dog, or a person, for no reason (which does not happen often for people, but may be different if bringing a reactive dog to a dog park), the owner of the problem dog should be willing to pay for all medical expenses for the dog that was injured. And if things are not dealt with, law enforcement should be called.
- The person's whose dog was bitten, or the person, needs to know if the dog has had vaccinations for rabies and other potentially deadly viruses. Also, what if the bite doesn't seem as severe at first glance as it later proves to be. And lastly, if damage is caused to another person or animal, the owner must be prepared to deal with consequences, whatever they are (legal, enforcement, civil damages etc.)
- Far to often the owner leaves and the medical bills fall on the victim
- All dog owners should remain at a bite scene regardless of breed

- Most owners run and try to hide the fact it was their dog. They should be held responsible for their dogs behavior.
- Similar to a car accident, owners should both stay on the scene until the proper information is exchanged. If necessary, an enforcement officer can be involved.
- Because in most cases it's the owner's fault. The owner should be the one being punished as it's choice in how the dog is raised caused the dog to lash out and bite someone.
- Getting both sides of the story is important. It is the owners responsibility, dogs can't talk.
- It is no different than an incident with a car, information should be shared between parties involved, and authorities called, only when necessary
- It is important to ensure the victim is completely aware of any health issues the dog could pass to the victim.
- Dog OWNERS need to take responsibility for their dogs
- I think it is important to get all sides and the owner is liable for that dogs behavior. Dogs aren't just bad for no reason!
- You are responsible for your pet just like you are for your child.
- The dog is unable to speak for itself. I think it is important that all sides of the story are shared. Also, if a dog has bitten someone the owner needs to take responsibility for it.
- I think this is a good idea in theory but will be hard to enforce. Consider cameras in off-leash parks?
- This is just common sense. Take responsibility for your animal's actions.
- The owner is responsible for their dogs behavior. While accidents happen with animals, the owner of the dog who has bitten should provide their information to the person who was bitten or who's animal was bitten and should stay at the scene to do what they can to help.
- If it requires yes it would be treated like a car accident would.
- It is SO important no matter the size, breed, or severity of bite for people to stay at the scene. A full vaccine history should be required.
- This is serious and the situation and outcome needs to be discussed while fresh in everyone mind. Although if a note had happened it might not be what to keep the dog and owner at the scene immediately after but do a follow up.
- Absolutely!! They need to be there to support the victim whilst keeping their pet in check!
- I support responsible ownership, and as a result I support a rule that requires owners to remain on the scene of an incident
 - unless both parties agree not to get city bylaw involved
- Yes too many bad owners get away and the dogs will end up biting another
- I habe personally witnessed 2 unprovoked attacks where the owners were not held responsible because they left. Both attacks were not Pit Bulls or a bully breed. I feel the responsibility lies solely with the owner and how they train their animal!
- Just like with a car accident, the dog owner needs to take responsibility.
- They should stay to give their side of the story and provide information.
- Dog owners are responsible for the behaviour or their dogs.

- It's impossible to get connect information of other dog owner, even after bylaw shows up.
- Include provisions for when the owner is not at the scene when the bite occurs. Prevent abandonment of said dog as well.
- Yes, unless it is a minor bite to another animal I think the two owners can deal with it on their own without law enforcement (minor meaning no vet visit required)
- Owners must take full responsibility for their pets
- I think it is an act of curtesy and humanity to ensure that the person who was bitten is safe and gets the help they need. As well as required as part of proper dog ownership.
- If someone's animal harms another person/animal, their should be opportunity and requirement for an explanation from both parties. If the dog is not well-trained and is a danger, that needs to be noted and should require some monitoring. If the person/animal who was not was in the wrong (this can absolutely happen, it's not always the fault of the dog who bit) then the person who owns the dog needs to be able to explain what occurred to cause the bite.
- The owner needs to be responsible for the training of their dog. If a dog bites, it comes down to training in most instances. Mandating training for a dog that bites is a better option than seizing and killing a dog that doesn't know any better or how to react when harassed. This can be enforced through law enforcement. I don't support killing the dog, nor just issuing a fine to the owner. Education must be applied.
- It's the owners fault not the dog.
- You need the whole story to determine what happened before the bite. Meaning youll need both the owner an the victom
- It's the same as a car accident, they are responsible for their animal
- It is no different than a vehicle accident. If your pet has injured another person you must be responsible for their action.
- When possible yes but keeping acreactive dog in the situation isnt always right either
- Sue Higgins dog park is one of those places where you see dogs biting other dogs and the owner of the dog biter will take off before anything can be done. Owners should be held responsible for their dogs.
- The cause of the bite and the temperament of the dog should be evaluated at the time of the occurence. A dog that has been harrassed or antagonized should not be at fault
- As a human, you're required to stay at the scene of an accident.
- I think it is just as necessary as staying at the scene of a MVC
- There should be a full investigation on the attack including the owner. Punish the owner not the breed.
- People must take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
- Seems like the common sense thing to do.
- Yes, however it isn't always in the best interest of both parties to keep the animals together for an extended period of time after an incident has occurred. If both parties agree with exchanging information there is no need for either person to stay at the scene of an incident.

- The owner should be held to full account for their animal no matter what the breed. If they do leave or flee and can be proven as the owner who left with the dog they should be fined.
- It seems reasonable, we expect this in fender benders, we should expect this when serious harm is done too.
- ONLY if injury has occurred. Many dog nip as play or as a warning sign - there is nothing wrong with this. If we do not allow dogs to communicate by barking, growling or nipping when they are uncomfortable they will jump right to aggressive and dangerous biting. It is okay for dog to exhibit signs when they want to be left alone, this is how they communicate.
- If the bite had caused damage to person or other animal
- My dog was attacked by a bully cross breed at an on leash park and the woman ran off, i tries submitting a file to court and it got thrown out, despite the 1000 dollars for the vet hospital bill i had to pay because the owner of the attacker told me to "[removed] off" bylaw services despite writing on the file that my dog was on a level 7 of being hurt (which included that the dog that attacked would be put down) nothing ever happened.
- There should be additional fines if pet owners leave the scene of an animal bite or attack
- All of us must accept the responsibility of the pet especially if there's an incident
- Thats the right thing to do
- Dogs should be under control when with owner and off property. Owner should answer for their animals actions. Regardless of breed of dog
- if they dont stay at the scene, they can disappear into the community and be hard to find afterward.
- Obviously you have to be responsible for your dogs behavior, so yes staying at the scene should be required.
- Only if injury occurs.
- Just like a car accident, the person and their dog should stay present.
- The owner is responsible for their dogs actions. They should remain on scene until law enforcement has arrived and taken proper information and statements.
- Too many people walk away and possibly shirk responsibility in dog attacks. They should have to stay and be held accountable for what their dog does.
- As a health care professional, we require information about the dog and owner for doing paperwork following a bite/scratch.
- I would equate this to a hit and run which is illegal.
- An owner should be legally responsible just like a car accident. You do not leave the scene
- Strongly agree that it is the owner who needs to be disciplined for the act. Whether it be required that the owner attend training, etc. There are numerous dog owners (all breeds) that need training on how to care for a dog.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dog.
- To make sure the dog isn't attacking people or animal regularly and should go with the victim to the hospital

- The dog is the owner's responsibility, if the dog bites it's the owner's responsibility to ensure information is given to the victim. This will also help keep record of any owners who are not properly training their dogs.
- An owner of a dog that bites must always remain at the scene. I think there should be more laxity given with a responsible owner who stays vs one that would leave the scene
- It is the owners responsibility if their dog bites. They should need to stay to find out if any vet care is needed, and be responsible to pay for that care, if not in full then partially.
- Contact information should be shared, but they should not have to stay for enforcement eg; if someone is injured and they need medical attention, if the dog needs to be deescalated and removed from the other person or animal and placed in the owners home/seek vet attention.
- People are responsible for their dogs behavior. This should be mandatory.
- Again, it comes down to the owner, not the dog. They should be the one held responsible.
- It is important as in some cases a dog that bites may be defending itself. It would be beneficial for the owner of the dog that bit to present their side of the story. If the wound suffered by the other dog / person is not life-threatening then that party should also be present.
- Actually not sure on this. I support the person needing to give their info, but keeping the person there means keeping the already stressed dog there...
- should be the same as a car accident, passing info afterward
- It's your responsibility if your dog is involved in a incident of any aggressive manner.
- Seems like the human thing to do.
- The owner is at fault for this, not the dog. Therefore, the owner must explain their reasoning as to why they did not train their dog enough to not have them bite another being.
- It should already be MANDATORY that people stop and give info if any sort of altercation happens with any animals because injuries can appear after the fact!!
- It's no different than a hit and run. If you cause damage, you should stick around to help address the issue.
- If possible, the owner responsibly should stay to take responsibility. However, assuming the owners dog bit someone/something out of aggression it seems reasonable that it would not be the best case scenario to keep that dog in the place where it was aggressive.
- To ensure vet records are up to date.
- Any type of breed can be provoked to bite. The owner staying could provide them a chance to explain their dog's behavior. For example, a child pulling on a dog's tail may provoke a bite reaction. If a person is not watching their child who approaches a strange animal, the owner can only do so much. Animals should not be punished when humans are at fault for their natural protective instincts.
- The dog may have been provoked to attack - I feel it is important to ensure you hear both sides of the story.
- so they can get a warning/fine/ or a necessary training for their dog
- Of course the owner needs to take responsibility for their dog.
- The dog owner should remain on scene; however, the situation has the potential to escalate and it would be important to ensure an enforcement officer responds promptly

- A person is responsible for their dog and therefore should take responsibility just as with any other incident
- The situation could be interpreted from either side, the person or other animal that was bitten, and the dog owner. Just like both parties and a witness stay at a car accident to find out who was at fault, these situations should be handled the same way. There is always 3 sides to a story, one person's side, the other person's side, and the truth.
- It's the same as a car accident; you should remain on scene until information has been exchanged between involved parties.
- Assuming it isn't a small bite while playing, where there is no serious injury, I don't think it's necessary to call law enforcement and have to stay at the scene. As long as the parties involved are satisfied there are no serious injuries, I don't think it's an issue. Similar to a fender-bender on vehicles, you deal with it between parties if there is no serious damage.
- Their dog, their mistake
- We all have to be reasonable for our own pet
- Common sense. I know it's a lost art but some of us still have it.
- All dog owners should be required to take full responsibility for the animal's actions, including remaining at the scene of any incident until appropriate medical/enforcement personnel are present. Fleeing the scene of an animal attack is like committing a hit and run.
- It is the owner's responsibility to share what happened in this situation
- If your dog bites anyone or other animals it's your responsibility to share your information instead of leaving like a lot of people do.
- All pet owners are responsible for their pet's actions and remaining at the scene helps to ensure this happens.
- It's important to educate dog owners about why dogs bite. Many dogs bite because their owners are not educated on dog social skills, interactions, body language, etc and put their dogs in situations where the dog feels it has no other way out. 99% of dog bites are predictable, and dog owners need to be more educated to keep their dogs safe. I also do NOT support any type of Breed-specific legislation. In my experience it is smaller dogs that have been more of a "nuisance" and they are allowed to act inappropriately around larger dogs, and when the larger dog communicates to the smaller dog with a growl or other warning, the larger dog gets in trouble - when the owners of the smaller dogs were totally naive to how inappropriate their dogs were acting. More education for owners to understand their dogs better is key, in my opinion.
- Exceptions for those that need to remove the dog from the premise and could be talked to later.
- Simply to make sure the dog has proper shots so no health concerns arise
- It's like a car accident don't flee the scene
- It should be the same as leaving the scene of an accident.
- Owners are responsible for their animals and their behaviour
- Yes. No matter the breed, if my dogs or myself or family are attacked, it's the owner's responsibility, even more so their fault than the breed. The owners should be reprimanded, and blamed. Not the breed. So yes, the owners should be made to stay and share information when necessary.

- If something more serious results from the bite, then it is good to have that information.
- No different than a car accident. If a dog bites no matter small medium or large, the owner should take responsibility and share the information with whomever is involved.
- Yes treat it the same as a car accident
- The owner is responsible for their dog. Yes, I totally agree
- Should be similar to "leaving the scene of an accident" if involved in an auto accident. If you leave the scene, you are considered guilty
- Much like a car accident, there is harm done to the victim party. An owner should remain as an enforcement officer collects information.
- If a dog bites then yes information exchange should be necessary.
- It is similar to the requirement that those involved in a car accident remain at the scene of the incident. The individual owns the dog and is able to provide information regarding the incident but also the dog's regular behaviour and temperament.
- If the bite is severe, needs medical attention/insurance to get involved, responsible pet owners should remain on scene and work together to get a resolution
- Too often dog owners of dogs who attack other dogs flee the scene and there is no contact info available. The owner of the attacked dog usually ends up having to then pay for all the unforeseen vet bills and there is also no way of pressing charges if warranted.
- Similar to a car accident, the more information collected from both view points of the incident the better a well informed decision can be made on how to proceed
- I mean it's similar to a car accident. This seems more than fair in this case as well.
- Be responsible.
- *Key information is if necessary - I have heard of incidents being taken out of context by one party and that can have a very negative result on a dog and it's family. I think it's important to have accurate evidence and correct information before proceeding with any formal components.
- It doesn't work though. I am a member of my community block watch page and in 3 years I have seen as many posts about dogs attacking and biting other dogs and people but the owners flee. Between Nosehill and Confluence park there are monthly incidents where dogs are out of the owners control and they flee without penalty. How do we enforce these laws?
- It's the right thing to do.
- The owner is responsible for the consequence of the incident.
- It is absolutely necessary for the person who was injured to get information regarding the animal and owner who injured them
- Need dog health history, human to take responsibility for dog's actions
- If the victim wishes to proceed with investigation- not all bites would be serious enough to warrant
- I would never leave the scene. A scared person can over exaggerate and make situations seem like they were not In fault. So I would want to have the full story explained before the "victim" tells some outrageous story
- Too many people just flee the scene

- This is the same concept of being in a car accident. We should all remain at the incident to figure everything out
- Making sure everyone is safe is important. Some people are disrespectful at dog parks and have their children running or on bikes teasing dogs. Dogs are animals and should be treated fairly in an understanding way. I have witnessed a lot of dogs chase bikes and children at dog parks at the person's fault, not the dogs. All cases are different.
- Accidents always happen. And to force someone to speak to enforcement if both parties are in agreement. That's an abuse of power.
- Listen. Understand.
- Absolutely, just like a car accident it should be reported and both sides should be there.
- I agree with this as it is what a responsible pet owner would do in my opinion.
- you hear of too many owners of these dogs that just take off. They need to be responsible for their dog's behaviour
- If you as a human injure another person you are expected to give a statement of what happened and what led up to a specific situation and I believe as responsible dog owners the same should happen. I believe there should be an investigation just as there would be with a human to determine if the dog was truly at fault or if the fault would lie on the other individual with events leading up to the situation.
- Yes they should stay, if not it should be treated as when one flees the scene of a crime
- Owners should be responsible for the actions of their dogs, even if the situation is excusable.
- The owner needs to be held responsible, as it is their wrong-doing that lead to the biting.
- Even with the rule many will still take off from the scene.
- Bites can be serious by all types of dogs and it would make sense to have the owner remain on scene with their dog if possible.
- The owner needs to be held responsible for their dogs actions. If their dog contributes to wounds that require veterinary/hospital assistance, then they should be held responsible for any bills. If they don't remain on scene it is nearly impossible to track them down
- TOO many incidents of owners leaving the scene when their dog has bitten either human or other dog..!
- This would just make sense. People need to take responsibility and be held accountable for what their dog does, especially if it causes harm to another animal or a person.
- They should as the dog is their responsibility
- So the person can get the veterinary history prior to seeking medical care
- They should be responsible for their dogs behavior!
- The owner should take responsibility for their dogs actions. Most responsible owners will anyways, but holding the irresponsible owners accountable is important.
- This should be the same as any accident. But by law should not have the authority to confiscate the dog.
- Responsibility and accountability for your pet

- If a dog bites someone, all parties involved (and witnesses) should stay put until officers arrive. That way it isn't he said she said, and the facts of why the incident occurred in the first place is documented. Most dogs don't attack unless provoked and to assume it is the dog/dog owner at fault is unfair
- If a dog bites a person, the victim should have the right to request the contact information and expect compliance. If the owner of the offending dog doesn't comply and leaves, that person should be subject to charges. Similarly, if the victim wants an enforcement officer involved, there should be procedures in place for making that request.
- It should also be a condition the receiver of the bite stay to give information. If the dog owner instructed the bite receiver to stay away from the dog and they didn't listen then the bite receiver should be held partially / fully responsible.
- There's a nuisance dog in my neighborhood that has attacked multiple dogs and the city has done nothing about it. Maybe if more people could their contact info we could build a better case
- It shouldn't be a rule it should be LAW, no different then a car accident. And more often then not it's those repeat offenders that flee. The one ofs, etc, generally do stay. It would be nice to have an officer show up for a bite however depending on severity it may not be possible as medical attention may be needed which would mean one or both parties would need to leave in a timely manner. I do however think that bigger fines need to be in place for those that run from an incident. The owner should absolutely have to deal with the situation but catch 22, if they are staying and taking responsibility then there probably isn't a need for an officer, if they are fleeing then yes an officer is needed but how do you track the person at that point and chances are it has either happened before or will again.
- Yes, that is common respect. But the dogs should not be kept in a shelter away from their parents while someone else decides what needs to be done. I see nothing listed about requiring the owner to have them trained and I do see euthanasia listed as an option... not okay.
- Owners are responsible for the actions of their pets.
- Individuals are responsible for what happens with their dog, if an incident should occur they should stay and solve the problem
- Yes. Dogs exhibiting dangerous behaviour need to be tracked.
- This is a no brainer
- YOU are responsible for your dog NO matter what Breed they are
- Not liking the breed specific rules, its not right, in having loved a bully whom was never offleash or aggressive or involed in any incidents I hate the idea of condemning a breed because they are strong. Its silly and going to upset/enrage responsible bully breed owners, during a pandemic, while people are going broke and struggling.
- the onus is on the owner of the dog, regardless of the breed. They absolutely should be staying!
- I would support this but removing a dog from its home just because of a bite shouldn't happen. The reason why people flee is because they don't want their family member killed or removed from their home.
- Essential the owner takes responsibility, same as any other accident.

- A responsible owner will have compassion for the victim and should cooperate with law enforcement.
- I feel that this should apply to any animal that is in public with their owner, not just dogs.
- The owner is responsible, like a car accident all parties should exchange contact info and both parties info shared to enforcement officer.
- Usually, if a dog bites someone it's out of fear. Dogs need to be socialized and trained. It's usually the owner that doesn't know how to handle a dog. The owner should be held responsible, not the dog.
- As a responsible pet owner you should be required to stay at the scene. If you crash your car you must remain on the scene and that should be no different than your pet.
- Owners are ultimately responsible
- Because then the city would get accurate data to see that pit bulls are not the culprit of most bite incidents: don't bully my breed.
- It is important to obtain the necessary information about the dog from the dog owner.
- Staying on the scene is the bare minimum a responsible owner can do to provide vaccination information and veterinarian information. An owner should, if possible, offer basic first aid. Leaving should be considered in line with a hit and run in a vehicle.
- If the bite was enough to injure. If it was a minor bite that does not lead to blood or injury especially if the party of the dog that engaged in the biting behaviour was not the cause they should not have to stay or get enforcement involved.
- It is the owner that is responsible, like any crime, they should stick around.
- The pet is the owners responsibility. If that pet caused harm to anyone, it is the owners responsibility to see it through.
- Any incid not involving harm to another person should require the offending individual to stay with and offer support/contact info
- a person should be able and afforded the ability to explain their side of why their dog may or may not have gotten aggressive and bit another animal or person. The victim should not be the only voice heard.
- Yes - as mentioned above, when a dog bites/attacks another human or dog, that is a training issue and should fall on the owner. The dog should not be punished.
- It is like a hit and run. Accurate information is sometimes hard to obtain if they do not remain on scene.
- It would be the same thought process as a hit and run.
- But only if there is care and no bias involved, taking the dog right then and there is NOT what should happen.
- Too many bad owners leave the scene and are unable to be tracked down to take responsibility for their pet
- Shows dog owner responsibility
- They need to take responsibility for the situation and so that things aren't blown out of proportion.

- just like a car accident they should have to stay on scene, trade information so the injured can ensure that the dog is up to date on all vaccines. This includes attacks from small breed dogs
- They must stay and be held accountable
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs, and leaving after an attack means they potentially avoid that responsibility. Also a matter of safety.
- need to have description of dog bite - draws blood, vicious behaviour (though subjective)
- There is always two side to the story. It is not always the dog fault for the bite
- Responsible
- If they don't stay at a hit and run with a vehicle they get charged why should it be any different with a dog bite. It's easy to give information and you should be able to control your dog on a leash which you should have with you at all times anyways.
- It is no different than hitting another vehicle with your vehicle. Stay on site. Period.
- It needs to be addressed at time of Incident as sometimes the dog that starts the fight loses and then we just blame the pitbull.
- Remaining at the scene is responsible pet ownership. If they don't and are located major enforcement should take place.
- It's no different than a hit and run if it causes injury to a person. They should remain on the scene.
- People need to be held accountable for their own dogs behaviour. Because we will find it's not the bully breeds and a lot of other ones doing the biting
- If someone has an unruly animal or uncontrolled they need to be educated by bylaw officers
- Contact information should be offered in the event of any accident, including dog bites.
- It maybe required to speak to the person after to have proof of vaccines, etc. Also in cases of dogs that bite other dogs, the owner of the dog that bit should have to pay the vet bills from the injuries.
- Give a chance to explain the case
- Their dog their responsibility no different then a car accident if you hit someone you are just as responsible
- It is part of being a responsible dog owner and human. Keeping a record of the incident saves both owner and victim potential additional stress.
- My puppy was recently attacked by an off-leash dog in an on-leash park and sustained a jaw fracture as a result. The owner(s) were not there, however, the dog was with two girls. I have not been contacted by the owner. If there is any indication that a dog is not obedient/trained/properly socialized, the owner(s) of the dog should always be with it whenever possible should the unfortunate happen and there is an attack. If I didn't have insurance I would be out of packet a large sum of money. As it is, I'm still out of pocket a decent amount which I won't be able to get back as I don't have owner information and they haven't contacted me.
- It's difficult to contact, or trust that you're being given accurate contact information
- Any dog that bites anyone or anything the owner should remain on site. Doesn't matter what kind of dog it is.
- I think it's important for the individual whose dog caused harm to take responsibility for their dogs actions.

- If someone has a dog that is not trained and attacks another, it should that owner's responsibility to pay for any vet or medical bills that resulted from the bite.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs behavior and need to held accountable if they are not behaving
- Responsibility
- Just like a car accident, you should remain at the scene and exchange information. If you leave you should be charged.
- Absolutely, usually owners run away with their dogs and compensation is impossible.
- If your dog bites a person or animal you should stick around and have to pay vet bill or to prove your dog is up to date on shots.
- Don't think an explanation is necessary
- Yes, owners need to be accountable
- My boyfriends Mom's pitbull was attacked at a dog park by another dog at an off leash park while running towards her mom coming out of the water. She said she would pay for damages, as the pitbull had to be taken to an emergency vet hospital. Then once she got the bill, she refused to pay. Enforcement officers should get involved right away, as it would reduce the stress on dog parents which is already high because their baby got hurt.
- This should be common sense
- To determine multiple offenders
- You should always provide information if something happens.
- The ya re responsible for their dog which means any behaviours that the dog displays or accidents the dog is involved in. It is part of being a good owner - taking responsibility.
- You have to do it for a car accident. You should be responsible if your pet attacks anyone.
- Many owners involved in incidents run away and refuse to give their information to avoid consequences.
- "There is probably a story
- So learning both sides is important"
- I don't believe city officials should be acting as law..unless they are actual law enforcement . Why not set up a program with a rescue or foster to foster the Animal while waiting for court
- Owners need to be held accountable when their animal does something wrong.
- Sometimes things get blown out of proportion so to ensure the proper story both parties should stay on scene, and at NO POINT should the dog be euthanized, instead trained for better behaviour, it is not the BREED it is the OWNER that isn't properly training the dog
- This is the way
- A lot of the time owners [removed] off and don't deal with the issue. It'd be nice to see it treated kind of like a car accident.
- I believe that anyone involved in a dog attack (owner or otherwise) should stick around and ensure than when the incident is reported to the authorities that it is fair and accurate. Not just blaming a dog for the attack and ignoring any triggering or provoking factors that led to the event.

- I believe if a dog bites a person, then absolutely. However, dog fights in dog parks happen all the time.. between any breed, big or small. So to enforce that every single time or to allow people to take advantage of that Bylaw is not reasonable.
- I think the city should be aware of animals who bite people and/or other animals, and by remaining at the scene, it can be ensured that the person/animal harmed gets help. Additionally, if an animal is a repeat offender, the city should know about it.
- Like a car accident. Dont leave the scene
- If any medical expenses arise they are possibly responsible and if the dog is repeatedly biting then it needs to be addressed
- "It's basic human decency.
- Also, it's important for AHS and monitoring of dog bite victims and getting them medical attention, I.e. rabies observation period, tetanus immunization of the victim, bylaw follows-up, etc"
- I think you should share information with any witness party once all parties and animals involved are safe. If an animal or human requires emergency care then sharing any details in a timely verbal fashion should suffice
- I would consider it like a car accident. If someone else's dog has hurt your dog then it's that dog owners responsibility to own up for their dogs actions. As someone who has had their animal attacked at a dog park, it would have been great to get the owner's information as I feel like they should have incurred the vet bill.
- Yes both owners/person involved should both be required to exchange information and both have a chance to explain the situation. I definitely do not agree with taking a dog from its owner. This is cruel, the dog attacked for a reason, was scared or felt threaten and taking the dog will make that even worst...same reason you don't take kids away from their parents...
- Allows for a record to be started to establish a history to reference if there is a pattern to owner/dog to be assessed in dealing with any possible future incidents. Also, depending on severity of the incident, charges may be laid and responsibility needs to be owned up to.
- It instills accountability, as it can be difficult to locate an owner or dog after an incident.
- It's the owners responsibility. They should be going to jail for training the dog to attack. you should also look at the person that was attacked. They (especially kid) instigates these attacks by poking, hitting and teasing them. I have seen it too many times and the dog gets blamed,
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs and therefore need to be held accountable when their dog misbehaves
- Share information but not necessarily wait for an officer especially if there is medical attention needed
- Owners should be held accountable for their dogs actions.
- Yes, BUT the dog should not be taken away or if it dies be put in a shelter for rehabilitation. Dogs shouldn't be euthanized because of the owners. Also there should be fines/preventing from having an animal depending on how serious the attack is.
- If it's a bad bite yes they should have to stay on site.
- Same as car collision - owner responsibility

- If someone has a dog that bites that's on the owner. I have a dog that doesn't do too kind with people so when I'm walking her I'll stop off to the side when people walk by. The dog is not at fault in biting situations it's the owner/person who was bit.
- Owner to take responsibility of the situation.
- ABSOLUTELY! I have had encounters with aggressive dogs but fortunately never been bitten. Typically the owner just moves away, certainly doesn't provide contact info. It should be illegal to run off, especially after a bite or attack.
- Help ensure responsibility
- As in any substantial injury both parties should stay and report unless both owners agree not to report it
- If a dog severely bites another person (not just nips), the owner of the dog should stay (similar to a car accident, all parties need to stay until police arrive). This will ensure all parties are held responsible.
- Everyone needs to take responsibility for their actions. Some times it was a human or animal that was taunting a dog to make them bite. This should be a chance to explain what happened to the officer.
- Too many [removed] in this city who would flee the scene and place blame on others.
- It is the same as a car accident, if there is damage done or possibly damage done they should take responsibility for their pet.
- Dog bites are serious and many owners of bad dogs are quick to leave before trouble comes.
- If one party wants to involve an officer then the other party should remain at the scene.
- Yes I think if ANY dog bites someone you should remain at the scene to share contact information
- Basically the same thing as a vehicle hit and run if they leave.
- If a dog bites a human, I absolutely think they should have to stay at the scene. They must take responsibility for their dog's actions.
- If your dog bites someone you need to address the situation and take responsibility. If the owner can SAFELY remain at the scene, they should. If the dog needs to be removed from the area to prevent further issue or trauma to the victim (like a child who the dog may scare) then that should be done ASAP. But there are ways to mitigate the situation.
- Yes, but only if the dog is able to be brought under control.
- I think it's important to be accountable for your dog's behavior and to ensure that the entire truth is being told regarding the incident. Too often, and I've witnessed a dog bite when it has been teased, or scared - and it reacts in a way dogs do. Human interaction has a huge effect on their behavior.
- I think it is the responsibility of both pet owners to exchange information and or speak with an enforcement officer, if there needs to be a vet visit paid for, injuries sustained to either the owner or pets.
- PIT BULLS ARE NOT BAD DOGS. THIS ISN'T FAIR TO THE ANIMAL. IT'S ALL IN THE OWNERSHIP. EDUCATE YOURSELVES!!! This is what Ontario has been doing for years and it's so [removed] and unfair. Breed specific legislation has never proven to be efficient or to work. Don't hate the breed. Penalize the owners. You can have a lab, a shepherd or a husky with bad attitude if the owner isn't a responsible person. Like this is not reasonable

- Only to make sure the injured party is taken care of, not because I believe the dog (who bit) is to blame. Honestly dogs generally only bite when provoked. Not all the time, but a high percentage.
- It would be similar to staying at the scene of a car accident, in my opinion, and a responsibility of being an owner of a dog.
- "Also why the discrimination against Pitbulls?"
- They have very gentle demeanor's and are often the sweetest dogs. Not to say that there aren't bad pitbull's around, but that can be the case for any dog depending on the up-bringing and how they were socialized. I think the discrimination and targeting of the pitbull breeds is unnecessary and was a gross oversight on the real issues this bylaw is aiming to address. Because all breeds can be aggressive and I have seen more issues with un-trained Labradoodles than pitbulls."
- Both parties should stay (when necessary and if possible) at the scene to make sure that all information is collected.
- I've witnessed small dogs aggressively attack. But because they are small the owners dismiss it and leave.
- I think it's important to support all those who are involved. They need to be accountable.
- People need to be held accountable. But also feel safe enough to stay and talk through the incident because it could have been the dog protecting itself and being wrongly blamed
- This gives the chance for ownership and accountability for the owner of the dog to uphold. These owners of pets need to realize the consequences of not properly training their dogs
- Yes, a responsible pet owner should stay at the scene and exchange information.
- But people have to understand to not attack the individual with the dog that did the biting. They are wild animals no matter the size, if this is a continued offence then that's when muzzles, restrictions on how many and the use of dog parks should play a factor! Don't punish the majority because of a few.
- I think it should be required for any dog involved in a biting incident to exchange information.
- No explanation required, this is the decent human thing to do when your dog is involved in a biting incident. However, how would the city expect civilians to enforce this if the other party refuses to remain at the scene until an enforcement officer arrives?
- I've been bite and the owner got mad at me and said it was my fault as they quickly ran away.
- Yes as long as they can contain the dog and there is no more danger.
- Just like a hit in run in a car. The owner needs to be there no matter what breed of dog big or small
- Absolutely - the majority of the time it is the owners fault that a dog had to resort to biting. The owner should take full responsibly and remain on scene.
- Yes. I was involved in an incident where my dog was bitten at an off-leash park and the owner of the other dog fled the scene. We got a photo of the man and used social media to find out his identity and he was eventually charged, but it could have saved a lot of time and energy if he had remained at the scene. I'm not sure how you would be able to enforce this though.

- Dog bites happen because the dog is not properly trained. Owners should always be held accountable for a violent dog. A dog, however, should NEVER be considered at fault. There is no such thing as bad dogs, just bad owners.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- And pay for vet or medical bill
- So that they can be there to explain their view of the incident.
- It is what a responsible dog owner should do
- It shows pet ownership responsibility.
- B
- Owners need to take responsibility no matter what.
- A GOOD dog owner of any breed should have the common knowledge to stay
- Owners need to be held responsible for the actions of their pets.
- Good to get both sides
- The dog owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- Seems like a reasonable expectation, but let's be sure it's really bites, not two dogs playing with a bit of nipping.
- Any dog owner should stay. As well as pay for the vet bill of injured dog.
- it's your dog, you should stay at the scene regardless....
- Would help with follow up
- Only if it is severe
- Should be a requirement to share contact information
- Too many dog owners leave the scene when a bite of any kind occurs. A fine also needs to be attached if they do leave the scene.
- Cause then they will know how and what happened
- I have heard of several incidents where a dog bites and the owner leaves the scene. At the very least the owner should ensure the person or animal that was bitten is okay. An enforcement officer doesn't necessarily need to be involved but yes they should stay at the scene.
- There are always two sides to a story and since animals can't speak for themselves, it's up to the owner to take responsibility.
- Dog bites will always happen, but it's up to us to make it right. The person should take responsibility for their dog and shouldn't get the chance to leave because vet bills are expensive
- If your dog bites someone it is responsible pet ownership to stay
- But it should be equally responsible for the person who caused a dog bite to be held responsible. Often times dogs are just protecting themselves
- It is the same idea as someone who got in a car accident. They have to stay to assess the incident and provide support for any damages done.
- Absolutely! It should be standard to take responsibility like with a car accident!
- "Too many irresponsible dog owners take off, leaving the victims stranded with injuries and huge vet bills - which comes down to training and control.

- All dog owners, no matter the breed, should have to attend training before even considering taking their dog into public spaces."
- Yes, as often the owner quickly leaves the scene before you can properly assess damage. This would be very difficult to enforce though. This would only work if the city could ensure prompt response times (if an enforcement officer was contacted).
- It is the dog owners responsibility to stay at the scene if their animal has cause any type of injury to a person or other animal. It is like leaving the scene of an accident.
- need info on dog
- The owner is responsible for their dog as well it's just a good thing to do
- Your dog hurt someone else... it's like your car hurt someone else. Your car is your property. Your dog is your property. If you flee the scene of the accident with/about your property, especially if it's your fault (ie negligence), you're still held accountable. If your dog bites someone else, you should be responsible for mending that person much the same as your insurance company would be responsible for mending the person in the event of an MVA.
- The owner is liable for all injuries to the person and/or other dog bit. The owner should be liable for all vet bills
- It is important to know who the dog belongs to, if the dog was with the owner or someone else
- its responsible pet ownership
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions and pay vet/doctor bills if necessary.
- I do believe they should just in case the bite of injury is severe enough, just like a car accident, if someone is hurt. You wait
- It is important that they stay on scene because we need to know things about the dog like vaccination history
- It should not be the financial responsibility of the person or owner of the dog your animal attacked if your animal drew blood.
- Having experienced a pit bull breed attempting to "play" with my dog (it would not let go/stop nipping at it and when I turned to say "no" and walk away, it snapped at me), the owner did not seem to care and brushed it off and just took the dog away. The owner must be responsible for their dog's actions and lack of training. When someone hits another car with theirs it is a hit and run, would this not be equivalent as a "bite and run" if they just leave?
- We need to know that the dog doesn't have rabies or any other health issues that could be passed on by a bite.
- They need to take responsibility
- Definitely must provided contact info, though they cannot be expected to wait more than 30 minutes for an officer to arrive, especially if the dog is riled up and might attack others.
- A dog that bites someone needs to be trained, no matter the breed. This should be handled the same was as a car accident.
- Owning a dog has responsibility, owners are accountable for their dogs.

- Yes. Two sides. I've witnessed small dogs attacking large breeds. The large breed defends itself and injures the smaller breed, I've witnessed the larger breed get fined just because they the owner of the smaller breeds dog is more injured although the smaller breed provoked it.
- Dog bites can be sever and even if the victim seeks immediate medical attention can have effects later having the owner and dog information could be necessary for follow up
- Yes, they must be held accountable for their actions. They should remain on scene as long as they have their dog under control and do not pose a further threat. If they cannot control their animal they must provide information where they can be reached.
- I do believe if ANY dog bites someone, the owner should be liable and held up to training requirements
- often when an altercation occurs someone or an animal is injured and immediate steps are required to deal with that which can limit the amount of time someone has to obtain details of owner/dog and often times people that know they are in the wrong try to avoid the responsibility or to simply step up and deal with the issue.
- You don't leave the scene of an accident, this is no different
- To protect the owner or parent the high cost of vet Bill's when the owner of the aggressor has fled
- All pet owners should be responsible for their pets actions and beahavioura.
- I can't believe this isn't a requirement already.
- Its just the responsible thing to do. I don't think the SPCA, Law enforcement, or Vets are suited to give the dog an assessment. Should be an actual behavioralist. Would ypu let your dentist preform open heart surgery?
- A responsible pet owner should always stay on the scene unless its unsafe to do so.
- The offender fleeing leaves the injured party with no recourse and
- Like a car accident, people should exchange information for vet or hospital updates. Should the bite be quite traumatic, an officer should be called to take down the information and how to proceed. Just like any other accident.
- That's just being responsible for an injury you're at fault for. Not different than a hit and run. Maybe at least leave contact info if they really need to leave for some reason
- Owners are responsible for their dogs actions
- That should be a crime for a dog owner to walk away after their dog bites a person. That dog owner needs to give his identification.
- If the dog owner leaves the scene there is the potential for the aggressive animal to attack another person or animal while leaving the scene. The owner is responsible for the animal and as such should stay around to justify and explain the situation surrounding the incident. This would also add a voice to their animal's ultimate welfare and any decision taken after the incident.
- Put the dog owner in jail also. Sick and tired of blame the dog and not the owner.
- It is the owners responsibility to provide appropriate information to enforcement officers
- If you have to stay for a car accident, a dog incidet should be no different.
- They should be on the hook for all medical expenses related to an attack. It should be treated similarly as a hit and run. I believe this should be the case for most offenses

- Any pet owner should have the decency to stay at the scene to give information. That shouldn't have to be enforced, that should just be known by the pet owner. I think a fine should be enforced if they do leave.
- The dog owner should have full responsibility for their pet and their pet's behaviour.
- Any owner of an animal that bites should be required to stay on scene provide info and if necessary surrender their animal
- The owner should be responsible for helping the other dog if necessary.
- Too many irresponsible dog owners. Dog owners MUST and NEED to be held accountable. This is not only for the safety of the public but for the animal as well. This will also allow for proper follow up to occur and proper measures to be put in place to prevent this from occurring again.
- As the dog owner you are responsible for your dog and any actions of that dog, 100%.
- its the responsible thing to do.
- It's like the scene of a crime. No one should be waking away without information and statements
- They need to take responsibility so it does not happen again
- Accountability for your animal's actions is very important.
- Limits the need to try & track these offenders down
- Too many known cases where the owners left denying any responsibility
- I've been attacked by a dog and was glad it's humans stayed and were responsible.
- As it holds the owners who are causing a bad reputation for dogs such as the PitBull accountable. Especially if the dog, no matter the breed hurts someone! What if the dog has rabies?
- Unless they cannot control their dog
- If it's a bad enough bite to draw blood I completely agree.
- "All
- To often people give miss information and aren't held accountable for damages"
- Often times when a dog bites another dog or a person, the owner will leave the scene without sharing their information. I believe that it is their responsibility to own up for their dogs actions and provide their information
- If a dog bite occurs the owner should be held responsible for vet fees or other compensation. They should also not be allowed to leave as they may be attempting to avoid other consequences as well
- The owner needs to be held accountable for their dogs behavior
- This is a no brainer; of course they should have to stay. When you get in a car accident are you allowed to leave without leaving information?
- No explanation required. It's the right thing to do.
- Yes, we need information from that person. Its like a hit and run they get a higher fine and dog gets euthanized.
- It is the responsibility of the dog owner to remain and exchange! This should just be a given in the event of the incident. It may be a dog/owner that this is a habitual and if you don't have contact info how is this tracked!

- You are required to have control of your dog at all times, so it would be like a vehicle accident where you stay at the scene and provide your information. But if your animal is being aggressive then you need to remove the animal from the scene and come back and provide your details.
- There are cases of the owner taking off and not being held responsible for their dog, as well as dogs being wrongly accused because they looked like the dog that attacked.
- Yes they should remain on scene and be able to explain their point of view as well. Dogs biting humans is not always the fault of the dog. Sometimes it's the human who got bit that is the aggressor in the situation.
- All dog owners are accountable
- Yes because if another dog bites someone or animal. The person should be accountable for the dog's actions. Since most dogs, any dog to be exact is only vicious mainly because the owner. And this goes for any breed that's out there.
- Of course they need to remain there. I have seen a dog bit another dog or child but the other dog or child was provoking the dog. If this were the case I would hope the officer would consider this in the investigation and therefore having to stay the owner could explain this
- It's important for owners to take responsibility for their dog but also to have the opportunity to share what happened as sometimes it is not the dog's fault.
- Dogs should not have to be put down for acting like animals. Maybe making the owner put their dog in obedient classes would help. It's all about the owner and not the dog. However, a bite is serious and should be taken seriously, but should never result in euthanizing the pet.
- They have a responsibility to help those injured.
- The owner should be held accountable for the actions of their pet. I would consider an incident such as a dog bite to follow similar legislation to that of a car accident whereby the affected parties are required to remain at the scene of the incident as necessary.
- It's irresponsible to leave after your pet has bitten someone, especially when that means the victim ends up paying vet or medical bills.
- If the person leaves it should be a fine at minimum. That animal is dangerous and the owner must take responsibility
- Seems like a no brainer
- The owner needs to provide contact information if a dog maliciously bites a human or another animal. That said, they should also be given the opportunity to explain the situation in the event that the person who was bitten was provoking the dog.
- I feel it is important to have all the information at the time it happens in order to process more efficiently.
- It's important to get both sides of the story. Whether the person who was bit was bothering or hurting the dog, the dog was acting in self defence.
- There is no reason the owner of a dog cannot be held accountable to explain the situation after an incident. If they are to try and prove the dog was provoked or to plead their case.
- They are responsible for that injury and should be required to be a part of addressing the problem and ensuring the victim is okay.

- The owner must take responsibility for their dogs behaviour and do what is necessary to change it. After an owner leaves the scene it would be very difficult to find and locate them
- "Basic reasonable behaviour - after a car crash or dog bite
- Share contact info"
- Although it may be better for the person to get the dog home to a safe and less stressful space.
- You need to ensure past medical history (updated vaccinations) before proceeding.
- My dog was bitten by a mastiff. It cost $4000 and I wanted the owner to help pay but they took off
- Most good people are doing this anyways if something happens. I think it would help keep certain people accountable
- This would ensure communication between all parties and would allow owners with aggressive dogs to be held accountable for repeat offences (ie mandatory training, limit to dog ownership, etc)
- Truly beneficial to all parties included in this incident
- There could be extenuating circumstances for what transpired
- Owners should be responsible for dogs
- That's not already a law?
- both sides of the situation need to be heard from the dog owner and the person/animal involved.
- I think as long as there is also an opportunity for the individual to explain their side as well.
- The owner should be legally required to stay and accept personal responsibility for their pets actions
- To clear up any question as to exactly what happened, everyone should remain on scene.
- Animal owners need to take responsibility for their animals. There's always two sides to a story as well and if on off leash areas a small dog attacking a large dog may not cause as much damage but as soon as a larger dog gives a warning bite when being attacked to protect itself the larger dog is now considered at fault. This needs to change .
- People need to learn how to take care of their animals and take ownership for their mistakes
- If the person or other dog has any issues from it, the owner is liable. They must cover all expenses (or their insurance much like a car accident). Also to follow up to report to the city. Again, if a bite happens the dog (OWNER!) should be in obedience to learn how to manage their animal in a way that is safe for them and every one around them.
- Treat it like a hit and run. If you leave the scene after your dog has bitten someone, that's inexcusable, you are responsible and should be required to answer for what had happened.
- Never leave the scene
- You are responsible for your pet, but this has to apply to little jerk dogs not just big ones that people are prejudice against. It should also exclude self defence, if a dog bites my dog and he fights back you best believe that I'm paying no fines for someone else's poor training.
- This should be compared to a vehicle hit and run accident. If the offending pet owner flees, they should face harsher punishment.
- Any altercation with dogs or humans, all parties should remain to exchange information and talk to an enforcement officer. Owner of dog that behaves negatively needs to be held accountable for their dogs behaviour.

- If the situation was felt with and mild, scratch (an oops playing ball, no blood.... maybe fine) however. Bad situation, Why wouldn't they? Any other type of accident it would be needed.
- I had an experience where the owner took off, so yes I support a rule that requires them to stick around
- It's an incident report just like you would if you had a car accident
- The dog owner is ultimately responsible for their dog's behaviour.
- The owner is responsible for their dog, so they should work with authorities
- Pet owners should be responsible for the behaviour of their pets. If after a first offence, there was no effort made to prevent future issues, that would be a sign of guilt towards the owner.
- I think that ANY breed of dog that bites the owner should be held responsible
- The owner is ultimately responsible for the dog and is accountable for its behaviour.
- Every dog owner must be accountable for their behaviour
- There have been too many people give incorrect info or just leave the scene. This must change. Also if there was a way to have dog owners scan the city dog tag upon arrival and departure of dog parks this could help locate people who leave without providing proper info.
- That's just responsible dog ownership
- No different than a traffic accident
- It is rarely the dog that is the problem, it's the owner. When they can be identified, owners should be fined heavily, depending on the degree of injury. Like any other "accident", those involved and witnesses should stay to provide needed evidence of what happened.
- owner should have input as to why bite
- This isn't a thing already? This is like a car accident, if they leave it is like a hit and run.
- Too often people leave and there's no support for the person or dog who was bitten.
- This holds the owner accountable. But if the dog was provoked- improper behaviour from the other animal or teasing from a human. That other party should be held accountable as well.
- Liability should stay with the dog owner so they should have to remain on the scene just like any other incident
- We had an incident and the owner didn't not provide information or stick around so we had to send officer to what we thought the house was. Nothing was dealt with.
- You need to take responsibility for your own animal
- If your dog bites another animal, you should be responsible for paying for the cost of veterinary care required for that animal.
- The owner of ANY dog that bites should have to remain on scene and share information. The owner of the dog that bit should be held financially responsible for any costs the victim may incur including vet bills, reconstructive surgery, shots, etc. If the owner doesn't stay on-site getting compensation is not possible. Additionally, if a dog bites that information should be passed on to the City so that a file may be created for that dog and the owner to identify a long-standing or growing issue with the owner or the dog.

- I think if the event is severe enough and the claimant requests officers, then the owner should stay. This is a traumatic event and it is common for the owner to leave without the claimant even realizing the extent of the bite
- The behavior of the dog is the owner's responsibility
- once a dog bites it should be investigated
- Dog owners/handlers should be held accountable for the animal's behavior.
- Like any accident, incident.
- Some repeat offenders slip through the system because they don't stay to provide help/information - the owner of the injured animal is always going to be more concerned about the health of their dog rather than chasing down the other owner
- I don't think they should flee the scene.
- Its the same as a car accident. Have an accident you access the damage, swap information etc. Only licenced/ dog friendly animals should be able to be at dog parks.
- We all need to be accountable so we can make more efforts to be good and responsible owners
- Typically, if a dog is biting (with the intention to harm, not play nibbling which is a healthy dog interaction), it is 100% the owner's fault - due to poor training, neglect or abuse in the home, and the human needs to bear the responsibility for being a bad pet owner.
- Long-term damage from a dog bite/attack may not be immediately apparent. Additionally, this would be a good way to track dog bite statistics, patterns, etc. to assist with future enforcement.
- Need to stay because a person's property (dog) damaged another person's property (dog) or injured a person. Requiring personal info to be shared in these incidents is very reasonable and concurrent with minor vehicle incidents.
- I'm not sure why any responsible dog owner would not stay at the scene of an incident. It is also important that the victim stay at the scene and explain their actions prior to the incident (i.e. possible teasing of the animal)
- There are always 2 sides to a story . Not necessarily the dogs fault
- People should take responsibility for their pet.
- Or give the person their information before leaving incase things get too heated.
- Same as any damage to property. The owner is responsible for the dogs behaviour and actions the same way they are responsible for their infant child. Not every dog owner has pet insurance or can afford vet visits just cause some stranger let their dog attack another dog and walked away.
- It's the responsibility of the owner to make sure there dog is under control.
- Or leave contact info like a car accident
- I think it is important that the all parties who are involved stay to resolve the situation.
- Common sense, but no owner will do this.
- I don't know why you guys decided to fixate on pit bulls considering the only dog that has ever bit me was a German Shepard. How many attacks have we had in Calgary that were pitbulls because we never hear about them??
- Owners are responsible for their dogs. This should be no different that remaining at the scene of any accident like a hit and run where another is injured.

- It would depend on the severity of the bite and the attitudes/behaviours of the people/animals involved. Ideally, they would stay to make sure each party (animals included) were okay, and if deemed necessary, they can stay until an enforcement officer is there. I don't think having a rule to designate people staying will do much. The type of people who would not stay at the incident are going to leave regardless of a rule or not.
- It is a serious incident for a bite. Law requires you stay on the scene of an accident, a dog bite should be treated the same.
- Just as is required in motor vehicle accidents, an exchange of licence information should be required
- The owner is responsible for the dog, and thus should be responsible for providing information related to any incidents related to their dog, if required
- usually a dog bite is caused by owners who do not understand dog behaviour or lack of training (both the dog that bites and the dog that is bitten). Education for both parties should be a requirement and hopefully although it is an emotional situation, owners will be willing to discuss the incident and try to understand how and why it happened.
- This should have always a rule, like a car accident, if you and your property (in this case; dog) is at fault, you should morally and legally stay.
- It's just like a car accident. If the person leaves, they should be subject to law informant like a hit and run
- To pay vet bills or anything.
- When an incident like that happens it's possible the dog/person bitten might not be in the frame of mind to check thoroughly for injury and realize later. If say a vet bill is involved I feel like the person responsible should pay for that.
- information and pictures should always document the incident
- Accountability
- I think it's only right that the owner takes responsibility and share their side of the story. I don't believe all dogs that bite did it with malicious intent. If a kid is egging the dog on the parents should take responsibility for their child's actions.
- Yes. Even if there is no blood shown to be drawn, information on hand would be helpful in case there is bruising or other damage. I have had dogs make my big dog squeal in pain and the other party just brushed it off because there was no visible blood. Also not a pit bull, by the way! Shepherd mix.
- Only responsible to do so
- Owners should take responsibility, if there dog is involved.
- How is this not a law already?
- It's necessary for the owner to remain present to give any necessary information. Too many flee before any information can be given.
- Ensures the dog and owner can be identified
- So long as the dog and other individuals are not at additional risk

- You need to know if the dog has been updated on shots and I do think the owner should be responsible for vet bills. That being said I think people run away because they are scared your going to take and kill their family member.
- We need to confirm that the dog is up-to-date on shots and that the person who is with the dog is their to provide their statement. A dog may bite for many reasons, such as a child harassing it. You need to see both sides.
- There are many irresponsible do owners, especially under the age of 25. They do not control their dogs and when asked these individuals to control their dogs the response is "Get out of the park if you don't like it"
- I have a small bichon and two pitbulls. My pitbulls have never attacked or bit anyone at a dog park or otherwise but my bichon has been attacked 3x that requires veterinary care by strangers dogs - their breeds were as follows: chihuahua, jack russel, Rottweiler. Not once did the owner stay. The chihuahuas owner laughed even though she was bleeding, the jack russels owner gave me fake information, And the owner of the Rottweilers yelled and swore at me, saying it was my fault because the dogs sensed my fear. (We were literally walking with my dog on a leash when her dogs circled and attacked - they were off leash).
- it is important to gather all information regarding a dog bite. It is important to make the distinction between whether the dog aggressively attacked without reason, or if the dog was provoked. Health history (ie. Vaccines) is extremely important information as well.
- It is the owners responsibility to control the dog. If the owner is unable to control the dog and there is an incident it is ultimately the owner at fault not the dog. There are no bad dogs only bad owners. ALL DOGS Not just pit bulls should have to go through obedience training as much for the owners benefit as the dogs.
- I am extremely against labelling "bully breeds" and pit bulls, aggressiveness is a behaviour not a breed, if you label pit bulls you should name every small dog breed out there as they are more prone to bite.
- So many times the owner runs away with the dog or tgey become confrontational and refuse to give personal info. We need that to be a bylaw, just like when in a car accident, you must remain at the scene.
- Too often, irresponsible owners flee & the victim does not have an opportunity to collect information for vet or doctor purposes.
- Allowing the the bylaw be written to uphold the intent of the law applying to severe or actual instances of a bite. Again there is tremendous fear in me that this will be abused (by citizens in this case much more than enforcement). In all my years at the dog park I have seen more false accusations than actual bite incidents (to be fair it is on the order of 3/2 in actual numbers).
- Same as a hit and run incident
- It's important for records to be share (up to date vaccinations) and to offer to pay for vet/medical costs. The city should also have a record of who has bitten. (Only if the bite breaks the skin)
- Only if everyone can remain safe while doing so
- People need to be responsible for their pets. Period.

- or at least leave information so person can be located.
- Ultimately the dogs behaviour is the responsibility of it's owner and thus they need to be held accountable. They contact information MUST be obtained.
- To many people are not owning up and being responsible pet owners
- Just like a car accident, need to exchange information in case something happens and then they can get ahold of the owner to communicate issues.
- "To hear both sides of the story (was the dog provoked? Did the owner say ""please do not pet my dog"" and someone pet it anyways?)
- To ensure the dog is up to date on rabies vaccine"
- No different than any other offense/incident. Stay at the scene of the crime.
- It's necessary to know the owners info for future complaints and to be responsible.
- Need to better define "if necessary"• . Any bite? Just human? Vet attention required?
- Owners need to be responsible for the pet
- need to know
- the owner is more at fault than the dog, they were the ones whom has trained the dog for however many years - and if their dog has bit someone it is due to the lack of attention or poor training the dog has received. Therefore, if the dog has bitten someone, the human is liable and needs to stay to provide proper information to enforcement officers and/or medical attention to the persons/animals involved.
- Regardless of type of dog this should be reported.
- Every owner is responsible for their dog and their actions
- It is the owners responsibility to care and provide for their dog/pet, and others interacting with said pet. Whether that be humans or other pets, it is up to the owner to be responsible for the actions of their dog. If their dog causes harm to another person or pet, the owner should have to remain at the scene to make sure everyone is okay and do not require medical attention.
- Again. Not all bites come from bully breeds, forcing people to stay when their dogs nips or becomes a problem
- A dog owner should have to stay and talk to an officer to get both sides of the story, to help determine if the dog was reacting to being taunted by the other person/pet or if the bite happened as a result of the owners negligence
- The dog owner represents their animal as the animal cannot defend itself and as such, if a dangerous event occurs, the owner of the animal should be responsible for assisting in data collection. Much like a vehicle accident, those present should wait for authorities to gather data.
- if the person who has been bit requests they stay to talk to bylaw officer, then yes. But if they exchange information and the party who has been bit is fine to go, then that's fine.
- You should always make sure you stay at scene. It's just like a driving accident. You are responsible for your animal.
- If it is a severe bite and the animals can be safely managed.
- I am currently employed in the animal welfare industry and consistently speak to victims of dog attacks. Pet owners are responsible for their animals and should be legally required to take responsibility for any damage that they do. In situations where the animal is in care and control of someone who is not the owner the guardian should have to stay behind, as well officers should reach the owner and discuss the situation with them.

- So that the issue can be addressed.
- Absolutely. This shouldn't even be a question. If something happens due to the bite someone needs to be held responsible so contact info is a must.
- Ideally information is collected when it's fresh not later when things get forgotten or become hazy.
- It is important that responsible dog owners discuss their dogs vaccinations and any situations of elevated risk with a person or owner of an animal. If a dog owner flees a situation where this occurs, they should be held liable.
- if they don't stay then fine should double
- If a dog has reacted then that is usually sign the dog needs help, yes the one that reacted help!! Some dog owners don't realize that and getting them some helpful information would be good that an enforcement officer can provide. Also there are far to many owners that just take off cause they don't want to pay a vet bill or get in trouble so people are left without answers like "is your dog vaccinated?". More accountability needs to be met from dog owners with this.
- It's the owners responsibility to answer for a misbehaving dog
- They are responsible for the behaviour of their dog and should follow up.
- All owners should be accountable for their dogs behaviour. Ensuring the dog owner stay at the scene so both sides of the incident can be heard and taken into consideration
- Yes, they need to be held responsible for their dog.
- If this was a case that the dog was a repeat offender, if you will, this will give the owner an opportunity to take a class in managing their dog. There's dogs at the dog park that are smaller breeds, like a Chihuahua that have been more aggressive than a large breed.
- It needs to be somehow recorded if someone has had multiple offenses with their dog to determine if it needs training etc.
- Owners should be held responsible for an injury caused by their dog. Especially if it was an unprovoked attack
- I think both parties should be required to stay on the scene - just because a dog bites does not always mean it is the dog's fault (i.e. an off-leash dog charges on on-leash dog and the on leash dog bites)
- As per owners we have to be accountable!
- This seems obvious unless I'm over looking something
- A bite is equivalent to an assault. Leaving after your dog has bitten would be the same thing as leaving the scene of a crime.
- I believe this is fair as there could be complications after and the owner of the dog in the incident should be responsible for any vet bills
- The owner needs to provide proof of rabies vaccines and be held accountable for the damages their pet has caused. It is also in their best interest to stay in order to provide their own version of events

- I believe that if a dog bites a person or another animal, the responsible thing to do is to remain at the scene to allow any gathering of information. By walking away, you are being an irresponsible pet owner and human being and probably shouldn't own a pet.
- I cannot see a reason why the dog owner would be allowed to leave if their dog bites someone. Dog owners MUST be responsible for their pets.
- If a dog bites someone or something the owner should definitely be expected to stay at the scene until they have spoken to an enforcement officer of some kind.
- Taking responsibility for your pets actions. Common sense.
- I would think this is more important than a car accident. If a animal bit my son I would want the owner to stay and get his info more than I would a car accident. Being attacked by an animal can create mental and physical issues so the owner of the dog should be held responsible to cover all costs in therapy if needed and any physical appointments needed.
- There are always two sides to a story so it would be Important to know if the incident was in self defence or not
- if any dogs bites someone, the owner should definitely stay and wait for police, as I consider it the same as hitting a vehicle
- Just like a car accident, the dog owner should be obligated to share contact info in addition to staying nearby
- Increases responsibility of owners to train dogs or understand their dog's behavior
- I think responsible dog owners already do this. The issue at hand is not dog breed, it is irresponsible pet ownership. Staying at the scene is the responsible thing to do as it facilitates follow-up on the dog's health records (e.g., rabies vaccinations) and potentially any history of aggressive or violent behaviour. This should apply to ALL breeds - the only people I know who have been bitten by dogs were all bitten by small breeds not being discriminated against in the language used above.
- Just like an accident scene
- Only if it happens outside of an off-leash dog park. My dog has bit ans also been bit by other dogs as a result of overplay (or 1 way play) at off leash dog parks.
- Seems fair
- Its like a car accident. In case anything else is needed.
- Similar to a car accident if damage is done responsible parties should be required to exchange information.
- the need to collect information and to manage future problems?
- To prove they are a responsible dog owner and to explain the situation
- Owners/person with the dog should be held responsible, so it is important to identify owners/person with the dog.
- Must be able to identify the dog and hold the owner responsible
- I believe both parties should have to remain at the scene unless the dog that was bitten/attacked needs to get to a vet right away.
- Always. The owner should be responsible for any and all vet or medical bills and should be present to talk to an enforcement officer as the typical person is not qualified to assess severity

- Make it an expectation to train your dog. If you don't train the dog, and be responsible for the dog (regardless of breed) it should be treated like driving a car with no license.
- Just like any crime you should stay at the scene
- You'd stay at the scene of a car accident
- accountability, receive a fine.
- The owner is normally the start of a nuisance animal, not the breed.
- Owner of offending dog must be responsible for costs of injured dog, etc
- As someone who has been attacked by a dog and witnessed a dog being bit not too long ago I feel like it is no different than a car accident... Give the information if it was your dogs fault you should be fined and paying for the vet bills as well.
- Must exchange information.
- A responsible owner will be willing to take this step. This will encourage that.
- Obviously a person needs to be held accountable for the actions of their dog.
- This would be helpful if the case is required to go to court.
- I have worked at a vet for 4 years, and since have dealt with easily over 200 dog bite injury patients and their owners, the amount of people that were able to get the other dog owners information I can count on two hands, the amount that actually followed through and contributed to the invoice, paid it in full, or showed the consideration or empathy they should have I can count on one. People would be help responsible for their kids and themselves if they hurt another being, we need to hold owners accountable for when their pets injure something. If owners were more educated on the repercussions of sticking around and were not under the false impression it would automatically be seized and more than likely euthanized, maybe my experience with this would be different. In the mean time I think something needs to be in place to enforce owners to remain on the scene and some sort of repercussion for not doing so.
- They are responsible for the animal and must be held accountable for the actions of the animal
- As stated previously, a pet(s) behavior is 100% the responsibility of the owner. If they dont train and treat their pet correctly things go wrong. They need to be held accountable and be able to explain to the responders what happened.
- This seems like common sense. If your dog bites someone you're responsible.
- Like a car accident, you should make sure the other party is ok or offer first aid if possible. There may be times though where the offending dog needs to leave to deescalate the situation. There should be an exchange of contact information.
- Always, but I don't always agree that the dog that bit was in the wrong. A fair judgment should be made once both sides of the story are heard
- I hear stories of people leaving the scene and it is only afterwards that the injured party becomes aware of a bad bite, etc. Only makes sense to exchange info (just like in a car accident).
- I can't believe this isn't a rule already.
- What about that answer requires further explanation?
- Or just providing information for later contact

- If there is a bite dog to person or dog to dog both responsible owners must assess any damage and discuss if follow up communications may be necessary and contact information exchanges.
- Of course. Do you leave the scene of an accident in a car No!
- Make a statement. Share your side of the story. A copy is given to you but should not be hours of time to wait.
- It seems like many owners leave asap to avoid being held responsible in these situations. Would be nice to have it legally required that they stay and take responsibility.
- The owner should remain on the scene. Information on past incidents etc need to be addressed
- All witnesses should be mandated to be stay as most dog on dog attacks are cause by more the just size. The size of the dog shouldn't be the only factor of wrong doing. Instigating should be equally if not more important.
- It's the right thing to do
- They should be held accountable. However, there should also be someone to keep the other side accountable too if it was a person or dog that was coming up to the other party causing the dog to act defensively.
- I dont agree with removing the owner from the animal as there is WAY to much violence that goes on behind the scenes and to many animals die because of biting someone... honestly its straight up stupid that small dogs just get pushed aside if they attack someone but as soon as a big dog does it everyone flips out and media is all over it... i thought calgary was better then this stuff clearly i was wrong ... seriously disappointed
- It is important all parties are heard and follow through on the incident
- The owner needs to take responsibility
- Accountability has to be established.
- If these owners leave, there is little chance of finding them. By the time someone gets looks after the bit and thinks to get out a cell phone camera, the offender is long gone. Maybe if they know they have to stay, they will.
- Too easy for owners to try and flee and escape responsibility
- More information for statistic and type of dog breed can be verified this way instead a false claim of what someone though the dog breed might be
- If it is serious enough that the other animal/person is severely injured, it's the responsibility of the owner to share details especially when covering other vet bills/ medical bills
- Dogs should not be biting (unless provoked). It is 100% the owners responsibility to ensure their dog is friendly toward people and other dogs. And if not, they should be wearing a muzzle or kept away from others. If a bite happens the owner should be held accountable so this doesn't happen again.
- There should be additional fines if they leave the scene just like leaving the scene of any crime. Too many owners take off if their dog bites and the recipient of the bite is left to figure out who they are and how to process charges.
- It's no different than leaving the scene of any accident. Of course they should stay put (unless there's a medical reason, such as getting the biting dog to the vet if also injured).

- I cant tell you how many times I've been attacked by these mini dog breeds at off leash parks. I have a Staffordshire Terrier I rescued and he is terrified of these pests. The owners take zero responsibility.
- Bad behavior is, in part, the responsibility of the owner.
- But I don't believe the rule will make a difference. People will stay or leave, regardless of the rule.
- Absolutely. How is this different than a hit and run? The idea that a person's dog can bite and injure (or even kill in the case of small animals) a person or dog, and their owner be allowed to walk away is frightening. I don't know why such a law doesn't exist, but it certainly should, with hefty fines to back it up.
- It is important to have BOTH sides of the issue. If the dog bites because someone is acting inappropriately around the animal and is defending itself verses biting for no reason.
- When there's a serious interaction, nobody should leave the scene unless the owner needs to remove an aggressive dog.
- That's taking basic responsibility to the animal in your care
- My son was bitten by a dog and by the time I had him calmed the dog was loaded in the car and owner fleeing the scene. It added to my distress for so many reasons.
- It is a clear incident and the responsibility of the dog owner to stay at a scene. I do not agree with the breed specific targeting made above in the survey (re: bull breeds) "the reason they are listed here is because a pitbull's strength allows the potential for a more severe bite." - please provide references for this information if you are going to state this - this targets bully breeds and will inadvertently lead to breed specific legislation which I am not in support of.
- It is impossible to track down dogs and owners in some situations, victims need support
- Dogs are animals and need to be trained. If an owner is not fit to train or handle the dog they should not have one. In the case of the bite the owner should be held responsible. It is also important to get the owners contact information to ensure the dog is up to date on shots.
- Absolutely. This is part of being a responsible dog owner. No different from traffic accidents.
- only if the dog is not continuing to be aggressive and depending on how long the officer make take to get there. If they're backed up and going to take 30 minutes or longer it's not a good situation to stand around and wait
- If your dog bites someone it's cruel to leave without sharing your info. Just like leaving after a car accident, it needs to be illegal.
- Dog owners need to be held responsible for their animals behavior.
- A responsible pet owner will stay. Those who choose to take off should be fined.
- hold people more accountable for the actions of their dog.
- Owners should be held accountable for the dog's behaviour. This includes the owners of small dogs who often display aggressive and dangerous behaviour, but due to the small size of the animal, these incidents are not treated with the same importance as medium or large breed dogs.
- there should be a fine if they don't stay.

- There are way too many animal attacks that happen where the owner of the attacking animal (this includes cats) leaves the scene. I think the owner of the animal that attacked should be financially responsible for any vet bills resulting from the attack.
 - The owner is responsible for the dogs actions and should remain on scene to give all information.
 - This way the owner of dog that bit has a chance to give a statement and say whether or not this was provoked or spontaneous
 - I have seen dog owners try to justify their dogs behavior and put the blame elsewhere
 - Goes the same for hit-and-run you should stay until the police come to give the information Goes the same for hit-and-run you should stay until the police come to give the information I don't need to know that the dog doesn't have rabies they are up-to-date on their shots etc.
 - Many dogs and there owners flee the scene after an incident, there needs to be some accountability.
 - You need to know information about the dog like if they have been vaccinated or not
 - Should be a common courtesy to remain at the scene. First order should be to secure their dog, but then they need to return to the scene.
 - Your dog has caused harm to someone. You should be responsible and be there too see the accident through to a final solution.
 - The owner knows the habits of the dog best.
 - Staying at the scene is integral to sorting out what happened and ensuring appropriate responsibility is taken.
 - The owner should have the chance to explain their side and be accountable
 - This is already what is expected but is not done and when people do they are often blamed when they are only part of the problem
 - "There needs to be an allowance for the owner to take their dog to safety, calm their dog down.
- Breed specific laws are discriminatory."
 - The owner would be able to provide much needed information-animals history and vaccination record.
 - The dog owner should be Held responsible for the attack; they need to be available to the authorities to contact; if they don't stay at the scene it can be difficult and inefficient to track them down.
 - I think it's just responsible to do so
 - This isn't the question where an explanation is most important. This survey really feels like it's pushing a preferred agenda Calgary.
 - Owners should be responsible for the actions of their dog so yes they should stay and give information.
 - They should be responsible for their dog, such as training and proper leashes and equipment on while out of the household. If the owners don't follow proper guidelines, and someone got bit because of it, they should face the repercussions.

- It's their responsibility to stay, make sure the person is okay / call an ambulance if necessary and identify themselves so the dog can be assessed if necessary.
- "Absolutely!"
- But how will you enforce this?
- "Offenders often flee immediately"
- It is important that the owner stays so the dog gets proper behaviour training to prevent another incident
- I think this is the same as a car accident. Your dog hurt someone you need to stay at the scene to provide your information.
- Owners of all breeds must take responsibility
- It is easier to get all relevant information
- Like a car accident the police are called this is an actual attack and enforcement should be there.
- There is information you need to know about the dog such as vaccinations, behavioural history, and training history.
- Full details need to be explained while all parties are there at the time of the incident.
- If a person's dog harms another person or pet, it is only fair that the owner take responsibility and remain on the scene
- I believe in responsible pet ownership and a component of that is being accountable when your pet is involved in an incident. Pet owners should be made fully aware of the requirements of pet ownership, and the rules should be made to protect the pets and their owners as well as the general community.
- My dog was attacked in Sue Higgins last week which drew blood. The owner of the other dog quickly commented that yes there was in fact blood, then walked off while I was assessing my dog. It would have been nice to get some information from him in case my dog was more injured than he appeared.
- The owner is liable for their dog's behavior as they are responsible for the training of the dog. If it is determined that it was an unprovoked, unjustified bite, then the owner should be legally responsible for any injuries incurred by their negligence in training their dog.
- Too many people and animals getting bit. My bf was attacked by 2 pit bulls in our own yard. Upstairs neighbors didn't care. They also bit my dog.
- Common sense
- Yes, depending on whether a dog needs a vet appointment immediately.
- Depending how long. The city is slow and I wouldn't expect someone to wait an hour for this. This rule should be applied to all dogs.
- It is what any responsible owner should do. Helps with vet contact info and exchange of info to the bylaw officer.
- So proper info is obtained.
- They need to take responsibility for costs. They also need to be assured that their animal won't be immediately taken away.
- This is the responsible thing to do

- Be responsible
 - Both sides must be considered. Dogs put down because bit kid hitting it with stick is wrong.
 - It's the right thing to do.
 - Part of your responsibility as a dog owner is to ensure the safety of others around you when you are out with your dog. This includes staying at the scene of an incident if it involves your dog.
 - it might be very difficult to find the offending party again, after the bite has occurred.
 - There's always two sides to a story.
 - Need to share health status of the offending animal and have the ability to follow repeat offenders. However many owners do not stay at the scene, particularly in off-leash areas
 - Accountability for your dogs actions
 - "For instance when my pit bull was attacked and I had to pay $1500 to the vet for emergency surgery.
- If my pit bull was the one who attacked they would have wanted her to be put down. It's not fair or proper"
 - Unless the dog is a continued safety risk, in which case they should provide contact information to the victim or those around so they can be contacted.
 - It should be handled exactly the like a traffic accident. Both parties should remain, witnesses and witness statements should be checked so that all necessary information is documented for future reference ie. legal or court proceedings
 - Responsibility, follow up on dog, and pay any damages.
 - Of course they need to remain at the scene. If they leave the scene and can be identified and found they should be facing hefty fines.
 - I think it would hold people more accountable for an incident that may occur. And if insurance is required for nuisance animals they the victims need contact info so they can have vet expenses covered.
 - Yes, because a bite can always be avoided and the cause of the bite should be found before any party leaves a scene.
 - But there needs to be exceptions, such as dog was at large or needs to be contained in a home immediately and you can provide information within a short amount of time
 - The owner must be held accountable. As I stated previously it is the owner that is at fault rather than the dog in most scenarios. Dogs only act as they have been taught is acceptable.
 - If you shoot someone, do you need to stay nearby? If you hit someone with your car, do you need to stay nearby? Dogs are a symptom of their owners behaviour and when you have a bad dog owner, you have dog with bad behaviours. They are nothing more than a tool or accessory to a bad human. If bad humans are held accountable for their poor rearing of ANY breed of dog, they must be held accountable.
 - It's the scene of an accident.

- Often those dealing with a bite are shocked and worried. They want to get medical treatment right away and sometimes damage is not immediately noticeable. I have been bit by a neighbor's pit bull. Luckily it was minor but the bruising was significant. The neighbor was responsible and came and sat with me while I called Healthlink to discuss steps needed.
- In the event that the victim dog requires vet care, they could get reimbursement
- The owner is liable for damages caused by their dog. They should remain on scene.
- No different than any other incident where injury may have occurred.
- People should not be allowed to run away and hide from their dog biting. As a responsible pet owner you are responsible for what your dog does.
- When a dog bites a person, the owner is responsible and accountable. NOT the dog. The owner should be required to remove the dog from the scene to make others safe and be required to present themselves to police for arrest, no different than in an assault. Someone who leaves without providing contact info or who carries in with no regard to the assault that their animal was part of should be subject to arrest and additional charges. If they cannot stay because their animal makes staying unsafe they had better call 911 and turn them self in.
- Like any accident or attack for any of us we must stay at scene or at least get each other's info.
- If there is enough damage to another person or animal it is the responsible thing to do.
- only in the case of a severe bite where blood is shed. It seems as though many irresponsible dog owners are not responsible enough to stay on scene in the event of an attack though
- You don't know where they live, if they walk away then how can it be enforced. Make it like a hit and run offence.
- Similar to a car accident. They cannot glee the scene of an accident
- As long as the dogs are contained safely. The owner must leave their contact information
- Transparency
- Like owning a car. Must be responsible owner
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs actions
- owners should be held liable for a dog bite, not the breed :)
- It's like a hit and run scenario with a car- don't leave the scene if your dog. It's a human or other dog/cat etc.
- You need to be a responsible dog owner, maybe making people stay will make them train their dogs properly
- Any dog can bite, the owner should be responsible for any and all mishaps
- Any responsible dog owner would stay on scene.
- this is dependent on the severity of the bite.. a small nip that was not intentional or did not cause harm does not warrant enforcement actions.
- No different than a Motor vehicle accident.
- Their dog hurt someone or something and they should be held accountable
- I think it is similar to a car accident and there should be information exchanged and potentially an investigation based on the severity of the incident.

- If your dog did nothing wrong, you have no reason to leave
- Dog attacks should be treated like car accidents and neither party should be allowed to flee the scene until authority comes or until situation between two parties is assessed and appropriate information was handed over.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs action whether it was provoked or not.
- People taking off are not responsible owners. Like a vehicular accident
- Same as a car accident. Stay at the scene and defend what happened
- Well trained dogs do not bit until there is a reason.
- if your dog does harm to another person or animal then you should take responsibility and remain on the scene, Otherwise be fined at a higher rate for leaving and having the authorities track you down
- because it is your responsibility to care for your animal and others...
- The owner is responsible for their pet's behaviour and should be held accountable for the outcomes of the incident. This could include fines and being responsible for costs incurred due to the incident.
- It shows they are a good owner and want to do what is best
- This should be required for all breeds of dog of any size not just pit bulls and pit bull like breeds. I myself have been bitten by smaller "less aggressive" Chihuahuas. Just for the sake of following up with whom got bitten and make sure the person is still okay after the incident. We are all aware pit bulls have a more intense bite but with proper training and care they are the sweetest breed next to a golden retriever. People who wish to own pit bulls should require back ground checks to ensure they will care properly for the dog and will not be abused that leads to aggression in any dog
- Sometimes these bites are serious and require medical attention especially with another animal and if required that person should have to cover the cost. But they should also consider the situation, sometimes it is the other animal that starts it and the dog is protecting himself. Just like a human would protect himself if someone attacks them, this should be no different.
- Yes, however it is important to ensure the dog is also removed from the situation immediately to prevent the dog from attacking again.
- I agree that contact information should be shared. However, the person with the dog that but may need to get their dog to a safer location to calm down rather than staying around in a stressful situation.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility for their animal's behaviour
- Same as if a person harms another, that person would have to stay on the scene. Same if a dog does so, the responsible party needs to stay
- Owner's need to be held responsible if their dog bites someone.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions and are liable for any injury
- The owner of the dog is responsible for the dogs actions and should remain at the scene. Just as you remain at the scene for a car accident.
- With any incident both parties should share the appropriate contact information with any all people
- if time is an issue then the dog owner should give his contact info to the victim
- Too many people "hit and run" so to speak

- Owners should take responsibility for their dogs actions. They should stay, exchange info and have to repay expenses incurred by the victim
- Same as a car accident. If there's a problem involving you, you should not be allowed to leave.
- It's the right thing to do. It is what a responsible dog owner should do.
- I believe that the owner is soling responsible for their pet. They need to be held accountable for their actions.
- It would depend on circumstances. If the dog is hurt and needs medical attention they should get it. The contact info should be given to other person/owner that was bit if that is the case.
- Take responsibility.... it's the humans fault.
- The owner needs to be accountable for the dog's behavior
- Just like a car accident information should be shared cause of damages and injuries
- Of course. Just like you when you are in a car accident. Stay and get the incident reported from both sides.
- Because both side are heard
- People must be help responsible and almost to be able to explain if the bite simply wasn't the dogs fault (antagonized or provoked)
- ownership goes beyond just the animal. It is irresponsible to leave a scene where a dog has bitten without resolving the situation.
- Just like a car accident ... people need to be held accountable if they don't stay and are tracked down later there should be a provision similar to leaving a scene of an accident and incur extra penalties
- Any responsible pet owner should be willing to do this
- Depending on the severity of the bite I feel it is required to do so.
- If the dog bite someone, it was out of 3 reasons, one being you were getting too close to the owner and pitbulls are natural guard/nanny dogs, two you seemed thretening or the dog was scared of you. And three, if there was a severe bite, then yes there should be info taken
- I've heard of many dogs and or people being attacked by dogs at the dog park and then the owner of the attacker takes off and leaves the victim and there are no repercussions. I feel like this is absolutely disgusting and the owner should be held accountable.
- A person should have to stay if their dog bites another person. They should be responsible for their dog.
- There is always a reason and explanation . The owner is responsible for the accident. Not the dog if it is put in a place where they are not comfortable and scared that is on the owner . The owner is setting the dog up for failure if they are putting the dog at risk of biting or attacking anything . The owner is responsible for ensuring the dog is in a safe and good environment where the dog can be free and understand it's surroundings.
- The owner of that dog that bites another should be responsible for any vet costs and also it should be noted on the Cit of Calgary website under that dogs name/license
- Absolutely, I think if your dog regardless of the breed the owner needs to take responsibility for their dog.

- The dog is the owners responsibility so should be required to address the issue
- we must be accountable for our pets and its the right thing to do.
- It's never the dogs fault it's an irresponsible owner that has not provided proper training and socialization. The owner is responsible and should be punished for not being able to control their dog.
- If my dog bit someone that is on me not my dog that means I have not trained my dog properly or need to take it to training .
- Animal protection
- If one dog bites another dog, and they need medical help, the owner of the dog that bit should pay.
- It is the same as any accident. You need to be responsible for the actions of yourself and your family (the pet). The owner is usually a large part of the problem by not knowing how to properly train or look after the animals needs. By requiring that they speak to an enforcement officer, hopefully they will get the education they need to prevent future incidents.
- Too many owners quickly leave the scene when a bite occurs. It should be like a car accident
- Again - the owner should be held accountable and fleeing the scene of an "incident"• is not right.
- Get All medical history of dog, law enforcement doesn't usually help and shouldn't be there unless summoned by victim
- Well maybe the dog was provoked . Information from both parties is important to get to the facts. If said dog has never been in an altercation before with other dogs, maybe said dog felt threatened, and reacted accordingly.
- The dog owner is often the one at fault and not the dog. Dogs are raised and act according to the way they were raised. Also dog owners need to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- Just handle things appropriately charging people more money and having pit bulls on the list to add more trouble and money to your bank is ridiculous.
- You can't leave the scene of a vehicle crash, the same needs to apply to a dog bite. If them staying with the dog is not an option due to an aggressive dog or emergency care is required, then the information needs to be left with someone at the scene or the person needs to call the police and report the incident and give personal information for the situation to be dealt with, the day of the incident.
- My little dog was attacked at the dog park and the other owner did not have any consequences. That dog should have been required training or something
- No different than a hit and run if they leave
- It's not the dogs fault it's the owner that hasnt trained or treated their dog properly
- All owners should be responsible for the actions of their pet.
- Treat it like an accident. If you leave before an officer gets there, they cannot fully determine what happened.
- I think it is important to tell your side of the story.
- At minimum contact information should be given; but staying in a heighten situation with a dog(s) in the red zone this may not always be possible

- Unless there is a need to have the dog removed from the scene immediately in which the owner should at least leave contact information with victim and then contact bylaw and explain what happened
- Absolutely, the owner should remain on site to ensure contact info is given should there be medical costs to the individual bit, as well as an investigation into why the animal bit
- Like a car accident exchange info and call city by law officer to at their time contact both.
- Too many owners are not responsible pet owners, and it hurts the responsible owners.
- If a dog bites someone else it's that dogs owners responsibility
- It encourages owners to take responsibility for the actions of their animals (although I am aware irresponsible owners will likely not stay).
- While it will be difficult to enforce, the fact that people can hide a potentially dangerous dog by running away, is unacceptable.
- I don't see how this is different from any other accident scene. I think they should also be charged if they do leave the scene.
- The owner should be responsible to pay for other animals vet bill
- I believe sharing information or having a police officer present would create a safer space and help unfold what had exactly occurred during the incident. Hopefully removing prejudice from the dogs breed.
- Its common decency to right a wrong.
- There should be a specific branch of Bylaw services which handles dog bites.
- The owner of the animal should definitely take responsibility for the bite and ensure that the other person/animal is okay, or pay for any needed medical attention.
- People must be accountable for their dogs behaviour regardless of breed or size
- Your dog is your responsibility, if your dog injures someone or another animal, you should be responsible for the vet costs.
- Dog owners should be responsible for their dogs actions. Staying at the scene is an important part of that.
- You can't hit someone/something with your car and walk away. A dog bite or incident should be no different.
- As long as the officers involved get both sides of the story. A dog can bite someone because they are poorly trained, or because they were provoked. A dog who was provoked into biting someone should not be punished, the person who did the provoking should be.
- Same as a car accident. Get facts and both sides of the story. Sometimes the dogs are threatened and have the right to protect themselves.
- They are responsible for their dogs actions and should be accountable
- If the person do not remain at the scene than it is difficult to gather the information. We need the people involved in car accidents to remain at the scene so why not dog bites?
- The faster you discuss the situation the more chances you get at getting all the information of the incident unaltered which usually occurs when the incident becomes a memory and it is no longer 100% unchanged

- My dog was bit by a large mixed breed and by the time I found the bite the owner of the other dog was gone. It was an unprovoked attack, the other dog was hiding in the bushes and ran out and launched itself on my dog while she was running ahead of me in Edworthy offleash area a couple years ago
- The dog is your "property"• and has been involved in a "crime"• similar to, or defined as assault. Therefore, the owner should remain at the scene to give their account of the incident and be held accountable if deemed at fault. It should require ALL parties involved to remain at the scene to ensure that everyone's concern and account of the incident is given.
- If a dog/human is attacked by another dog then yes they should stay around because it is still an accident. You would stay if you crashed into someone or witnessed a fight so I think it is reasonable to stay and change information, however I think it is also important to separate the animals in their respective vehicles if possible
- Responsibility for dogs lay with the owner. We should not blame a dog for their actions, they can't speak for themselves.
- Owners should not only have to share their info but given the opportunity to share their side of what happened. The dog that bit may not have done it without being provoked or attacked themselves. Unfortunately stigmas against certain breeds automatically put the blame solely on them when often it's been due to defending themselves or their family
- Its the same as a traffic accident....consequences should be had
- As long as they feasably can. If its too dangerous then no
- Any responsible dog owner would share their information.
- It's the fastest way to gather all information
- All dog owners need to be held accountable. It should be a criminal charge just as if you left the scene of a car accident
- Owners should be held accountable for dog bites, as they must be in control of their dog.
- Its common sense!
- Everybody needs to be held accountable for there pets actions.
- No different then any other incident.
- It's like a car accident. Everyone should take care of each other and make sure no one skips out until it's time.
- It depends on the severity. Dogs bite each other from time to time. If a dog bites a person I believe it should be up to the parties involved to determine the next step. If the person bit wants to call bylaw then the dog owner should be required to stay to explain their side of the event
- Owners need to be accountable. Our dog was bit and seemed ok (with only a minor wound). The offending owner left the scene without providing any contact info. Our dog went on to have a terrible infection days later which needed vet care.
- They should stay as there have been incidents of people providing false information.
- Owners must represent and take responsibility for their dog
- Dog owners should always be responsible for their dogs. Hold them more responsible

- It is similar to a car accident - yes, it was an accident but you are responsible for your actions and the actions of your dependents
- If your dog injures another dog or person it is your responsibility, no different than a car accident
- It is ethically right to stay on scene, how would a dog attack be any different than a car accident
- It's like remaining on the scene of an accident... but the problem with dog owners is that they do not take responsibility and will likely leave. There is no "license plate" to track so how would anyone even know who the dog owner is or where they live? Bylaw officers are nonresponsive and have never shown up quickly to any incident that I have seen... and police defer dog incidents to bylaw... trying to get through to 311 is impossible.
- It's important to gather all relevant info from both parties
- To take accountability and to explain the incident
- Pet owners need to be held responsible for their pets, similar to an incident with a vehicle accident
- That is the responsible thing to do
- Dog owners must be held accountable for their pets actions
- People need to take responsibility for losing control of their animals. It is the owners responsibility to train, rehabilitate and secure their animals
- yes, that is proper animal owner care. As they can share their side of the story. Just like a car accident scene.
- If the bite has caused injury contact info must be shared. If urgent or emergent care is needed care is needed this may be more difficult
- Because it is important to find out the dogs information and ensure it is not aggressive, it has up to date shots and to hold the owner accountable.
- dog owners need to be held responsible for their dogs behaviour. If they leave the scene of the crime the owner should be charged accordingly as well as be legally obligated to pay all necessary vet bills for the injured or attacked dog
- "It should include all dogs. The only potential problem is the safety of people and the animals. During these incidents things could be heated which could make matters worse and more heated, waiting for the response time of a bylaw official.
- It would be better to use cell phones and technology to exchange information or photo/ video. Especially in a public park or off leash there should not be a privacy issue."
- follow up is needed , owner info is available
- Must be held accountable.
- As when any crime is committed, it is required for all individuals involved, and all witnesses, to remain at the scene of the crime regardless. IT IS ALREADY LAW FOR ANY OF YOU NOT INTELLIGENT ENOUGH TO KNOW BASIC LAW.
- They must accept responsibility for their dog's actions.
- I think that is a good idea.
- They need to stay on scene to accept responsibility
- Owners should be responsible and accountable, especially because most of these incidences occur while dogs are off leash.

- Of course! It's no different than leaving the scene of a car accident.
- Just like the drivers in a serious vehicle accident the owner should be required to remain at the scene. This allows the determination if the animal is licensed, has had its shots etc.
- It is no different than a traffic accident. If you leave the scene prematurely you are charged with a hit and run. Same should happen if your dog bites someone and you take off.
- Although if they are unable to control their dog or they attacked person or dog need immediate medical attention this won't always work
- Would be the same as staying at the scene of the accident, get more information quickly
- Owner must understand seriousness of the incident
- You need to know if this dog has been given its shots and the owner needs to be aware of what the person is going through who has been bitten.
- Removing euthanasia penalty would encourage owners to stay at the scene as well
- Yes, due to others as you would want to be done to you. I have stayed. I do the right thing. It is called being a responsible dog owner.
- Same as an automobile accident if you are part of an incident you need to remain on site or be charged for leaving scene of incident
- follow-up may be needed for insurance purposes & vaccinations. Also that way we can track down nuisance animals.
- My dog has been bitten and false contact information was given and they took off as quickly as possible
- Often the dog and owner disappear after a bite and there is no way to know the health of the dog who did the bite.
- Absolutely!!! If not, the owner could flee, allowing the dog to become a repeat offender.
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets.
- so all answers are told and we know the dog and to tell if he or she are good pet owners
Responsible
- People need to be responsible for their pets and if their pet causes damage to someone else they need to pay for it
- This is part of being a responsible owner of that dog. Running away should be like a drunk running from the scene of an accident and extra-fine should be assessed or community service applied.
- I believe it would add accountability for owners, which is the bigger issue than a breed ban that WILL NOT WORK.
- It is the owner's responsibility to look after their pet, so remaining at the scene is vital
- There are too many cases of people fleeing from the scene leaving owners with large vet bills
- Being a dog owner, I understand that it is a risk to allow my dog off leash. I should be responsible and ensure that my dog does not attack or bite anyone but in the event that it does occur, it is important to ensure everyone involved is safe and uninjured.
- Being responsible for your pet.
- This is the minimum amount of responsibility - much like staying on scene of a vehicle accident.

- Dog behaviors typically lie with the owner, meaning, a dog is aggressive cause the owner is aggressive towards the dog. I strongly believe in most cases (if not all) the owner has full responsibility for dogs being aggressive therefor should have to be held accountable.
- Owner needs to be held responsible
- Just like an accident, they need to remain so that any required follow-up can happen. Leaving is likely an indicator that the dog has done this before.
- This allows the owner to explain the situation as a witness and makes the owner responsible for the dogs actions
- I think it's important that the dog and the owner share in the responsibility for the dog's actions.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dog's behaviour. It should not be up to the victim to track them down after the fact, they should be required to remain at the scene and speak with an officer.
- Yes because if ANY TYPE OF DOG !!! Even a Chihuahua bites a responsible owner makes sure everyone is okay and if further has to swap numbers should.
- Same if a human drove into another car.
- Yes, so it can be found out if the dog is up to date on it's vaccination. Also so the owner can be held responsible for not training their dog correctly.
- I answered yes...it's self explanatory.
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets' actions.
- This would give the owner a chance to explain the situation from their point of view, as well as allow the official to educate the owner or notify them of repercussions.
- I see it as no different as a car accident. You remain on scene until authorities are present.
- All owners of dogs should held accountable . As it is their responsibility to make sure their dog is trained properly , it is not the dogs job.
- It is no different than an accident in a car.
- Please don't take bad ownership out on pitfalls. Ive owned one for my whole life theyve never done anything wrong. Go after owners not dogs. Dogs are bad they're made bad and id be disappointed if calgary turned into the east coast
- It's beyond important any dog owner or any shape of size dog be responsible for any other there dogs actions!
- Too often the bite occurs and the offending leaves. More bylaws are required to hold people accountable.
- The dog owner should always be responsible for there dog REGARDLESS OF THE BREED. Stop discriminating the breeds!!
- People need to be held accountable for their pets. (Ie covering a vet bill if your dog injured another dog)
- Both sides should tell their story for full disclosure and information sharing
- They are responsible for vet costs. If they leave and are not located the victim owner is on the hook for costs

- Just as in a vehicular accident. Remaining at the site and exchanging of information should be necessary
- Dog biting strangers for no reason should be put to sleep
- This is common sense for any responsible dog owner unless it's a wild animal
- That's what a responsible dog owner should do. This way they would know who the owner of the dog is and they would be liable to cover any medical costs associated to the incident.
- The owner of the dog should be responsible for its actions. Only fearful, misunderstood dogs will bite and the owner should stay to calm the animals and diffuse the situation. Also the owner should assist in any way they can to the victim.
- I think it should be the same for all animals, if someone's cat attacks my dog I should be able to obtain information from the owner and officers to help myself and my own animals.
- As a dog owner, it really is just the responsible thing to do.
- Lways two sides to the coin. I think there is a higher chance of the dog having a case if the owner gives their input on scene.
- I think regardless of breed, anybody who has an animal who has bitten another person or another animal should be help responsible and needs to understand their responsibility as an animal owner.
- I think this is a given. Absolutley inappropriate to leave the scene if your dog has been involved in an incident
- At the very least they should stay on scene to explain what's happened and if it was The dogs fault
- Of course no one should leave the scene of an accident.
- It's required for anyone in a vehicle injury accident and should be the same for pet owners who's animal injurs another person or their pet. Trying to track them down after the fact can sometimes be impossible. If you need to be responsibly liable behind the wheel, then you should be equally responsibly liable for your pet.
- There is always 2 sides to every story and both need to have their say.
- You're required to do this in a vehicle accident where something under your control may have injured someone else or caused damage - why would it be any different if a dog under your control may have injured someone!?
- Responsible ownership is the most important part of dealing with nuisance dogs. Owners need to be held accountable for their dogs and breed should have no part in the decision making process.
- My submissive dog has been attacked twice at offleash parks, now. The first time the other owner ran over to make sure she was okay and apologize, and removed his dog. The second time, the dog owner did nothing to discipline or correct. The dog had instigated a few times before our paths crossed. He should not have had a dog.
- Simple. It should be like a car accident. You stay to discuss. You provide info and in a perfect world, offer to pay vet bills.
- Unless one of them are severely injured, the ONLY cause for a dog bite is an ill trained dog. Sometimes that can be the victimized dog as well.

- If you hit someone with your car what do you do? Do you stay and give info or do you leave? Responsible pet owners should already be doing the right thing but there is a few that are malicious or don't care.
- Absolutely, a bite can occurs for many reasons. Dogs bite because they feel threatened. What ever is causing this, is also a problem. The owner should stay on the scene to explain his side of the story. Because many dog owners don't know how to read dog behaviour.
- if you have a car accident you need to stay at the scene. It makes sense.
- More information is always helpful with investigating what happened
- Though not practical if dog is at large when the event occurs.
- It's not always obvious the dog bit someone. For example, it was only after we returned home one day from the dog park that we realized a smaller dog had bitten our dog and drawn a small amount of blood. We knew the smaller dog came up and attacked our dog but did not realize the severity, therefore obviously that owner would not remain on the scene/provide contact information.
- Absolutely! The amount of damage that may (or may not) have been caused could be exponential, and not able to be assessed in the heat of the moment. Out of everything on this survey, I would support this the most.
- Any responsibility dog owner should remain at scene to talk to officers. How else would they know if the injured party requires medical attention and how to get in touch with them.
- People need to be responsible for their pets actions. Held accountable for that dogs actions.
- Its like leaving the scene of an accident. You dont do that. Why would you leave the scene of a dog attack?
- Absolutely, take it in a sense of a vechile hitting another. Everyone should remain on scene unless a common ground is spoken between the two parties involved.
- Just like staying at the scene of a car accident.
- As someone who has experienced my dog being severely attacked by another dog, it's imperative that the owners of the vicious dog be accountable for the incident. Too often they simply disappear with the dog and nothing can be done. However I believe the appropriate amount of resources must be available to actually manage this issue. It's one thing to put bylaws in place, it's another thing to be able to enforce and address them
- Owners must be responsible for their pets.
- You are responsible for your dogs behaviour , there for you should be obligated to give your information to the person. If you know you have a dog that bites don't set them up for failure!
- They need to be held accountable
- Just like a hit and run
- The owner is responsible for the dog and so should remain to be accountable for its actions. Face consequences and review need for additional training, muzzle etc
- Both parties should have to stay and declare their side of the story including witnesses. It is a part of responsible pet ownership.
- Dog bites happen and it is rarely the dogs fault. Owners need to be held responsible for their own training a d that of the dog. Post incident they should be required to complete a minimum of 6 reactive dog classes mostly to teach the owner about responsible handling. We have a reactive dog and these classes taught us about how to handle him in public safely as most people have no idea how to be around dogs. It was training for us the owners that made the difference.

- Dog owners need to take responsibility. Leaving a scene is like a hit and run, however they would have to be at a safe distance as dogs need to be removed from the trigger (what caused them to bite/attack) in order to calm.
- This should be the case for any event where you or your pets/kids cause harm.
- A dog's behavior is a reflection of the owner.
- Dog owners are just as responsible for the incident as the dog. Without requiring the owners (or whoever is responsible for the dog at the time of the incident) to remain at the scene, there is no way to gather both sides of the story. In some cases the actual incident could have been provoked by the person/dog who is claiming they were attacked. If there were a fine for leaving the scene this may also be an incentive for people to stay.
- Thus is tricky as they also need to remove the dog.
- Responsibility for your dog's actions lies with the owner/walker, not the dog itself
- Owners should be responsible for their dog's actions
- Dog owners need to be accountable for their dog's behavior
- Same as a car accident. Must stay and take care of the issue.
- No different than a car accident, if someone is injured because of you or your dog you wait for help.
- My dogs have been bit by other dogs. Often the other person doesn't even ask if my dog is ok
- The person needs to take responsibility for what their animal has done. The only reason why they should leave is to take that dog home. Then that person needs to come back.
- Owners need to take responsibility
- The dog owner should be responsible to pay for any vet bills or other problems caused by their dog.
- It's common courtesy. But I think people don't because they're afraid their dog will be euthanized. Sometimes a bite will happen in play or unintentionally. Usually the person who thinks their dog has been attacked doesn't understand certain behaviors in dogs and doesn't know the difference in dogs body language
- This to me would be the same as a hit and run. If someone's dog bites mine, or vice versa, contact information should be shared and the owner of offending dog be required to pay vet bills for the dog attacked. Unless in an off leash area, if my dog (on leash) is attacked by a dog off leash, then the offending off leash dog would be liable
- IF there is a fair process, where people are given options to retrain their dog, and get assistance training themselves how to train their dog then yes. IF the city is just going to euthanize animals, impose massive fines and offer NO assistance then no I do not agree.
- Leaving the scene of a traffic incident is considered a crime, why should a pet-owner be let off the hook?
- My submissive dog has been attacked twice at offleash paros, now. In one instance, the owner ran over, apologized and checked my dog to ensure she was okay. The second time, the owner did nothing to correct or discipline. He should clearly not have dogs. He should not be allowed at offleash parks - his dog had instigated with a few other dogs before we crossed paths. I would have liked the option to get his information (though I realize that would have been highly unlikely).

- I've had my dog attacked multiple times while running on leash, until I get my phone out and can take a picture of the owner they are always trying to leave the scene and run away. I believe harsher penalties for leaving the scene could encourage someone to see the process through.
 - This is like a hit and run, should be treated as such
 - We need to times a dog bite is because it's protecting itself from another dog. Or from a human having the understanding of what happened at the time is important many times you will discover it is actually the owners fault and not the dog
 - "I think that they should have to share contact information. Depending on severity I think it's necessary for the dog owner to remain at the scene and/or contact ems (for people) or and emergency vet (for pets) if the wound is moderate to severe.
- I do not think giving fines is the answer for this stuff I think rather than fining first time offenders we should be mandating training for their animals. It's not the breed of dog that's the problem it's the training they've had from their owners."
 - The bite could be more serious and require medical attention. We need to have medical history (rabies vaccine for example) and owner should cover costs of any surgeries required.
 - How can someone be held responsible if their dogs bites someone and they leave the scene?
 - owners need to be held accountable.
 - It is the owners fault they didn't have control of their dog so they need to take responsibility
 - People need to be held accountable for when their dog bites somebody.
 - It is important that there share in event of vet or medical assistance needed and to determine if pet has adequate vaccines
 - So many people leave the scene and are never seen again . Just like a car accident if you leave the scene should be a criminal charge .
 - Same as any other accident. Take responsibility.
 - An owner is responsible for their animal the same way they are responsible for their vehicle. They should always be in control of their animal. And if you get into a car wreck, you are required to stay to access the damages and provide information. Only makes sense that if your animal hurts someone, you should stay to make sure the right steps are taken. A lot of people would not stay, because they would be afraid of having their animal euthanized. If that option was removed for say, the additional training or a training rehab program, perhaps people would be more likely to remain at the scene.
 - It should be treated as if it were a motor vehicle accident.
 - yes, the offending owner needs to be identified as well and tracked as they are usually the problem and not always the animal.
 - If they leave, how do I find them?

- Will allow for enforcement of bylaw requirements and provide an opportunity for education of owner. Will ensure that any necessary information for treatment of the injured person or dog is obtained or can be obtained.
- Same as a car accident, you remain at the scene and exchange information. Totally reasonable
- regardless of breed or size owners need to be held responsible
- Just to make sure the pet is up to date with vaccines, the dogs normal behaviour and discuss behaviour training
- We should be responsible for our dogs actions just as we are for our own actions and those of our children. It would never be acceptable to leave a scene if yourself or your child injured someone as you would be responsible for damages. The same should be true when your dog hurts someone.
- Dogs can be like a weapon sometimes.
- The dog is your responsibility. The training is your responsibility it's not solely a "breed" situation.
- owner needs to take responsibility just like a vehicle accident
- It is normal to stay because he/she was the dog owner.
- Only if no attempt to seize said dog is made.
- same as a car accident
- Presumes that enforcement officer attendance is timely.
- Yes cause that way it can be sorted out properly
- Rehabilitation is what we use for criminals, it should be the same for dogs. This allows follow up and proper resources for such rehabilitation.
- everyone needs to take responsibility when an incident happens.
- Pet owners must be held accountable for their animal's actions.
- No euthanasia
- Owners need to be held responsible, and take responsibility.
- N/a
- Should be no different from a car accident or personal property incident as long as the parties involved don't require immediate medical care.
- I
- It is the owner responsibility to train their dogs. dogs will defend their territories, but it's up to the owner to correct bad behaviour.
- All owners are responsible for their dogs, just like we must share contact info for a car accident I believe it should be the same for a dog incident.
- The owner of a dog is responsible for it's behaviour, therefore owners should be required to stay at the scene of property destruction or bites.
- if a human can't leave the scene of a crime they are involved in, the animal and it's owner shouldn't be allowed to leave either
- Yes, the owner is responsible for the dog, therefore, responsible for his/her actions.
- The same as an auto accident wait for the authorities
- It allows insurance (if applicable) to be exchanged, fines and court appearances to be issued

- Just like a car accident, people have to be responsible for what happened. Not run away and hide.
- Much like a car accident. If your dog bites you should be responsible and share info
- Of course. Even a person in a car accident should remain at the scene. He said/ she said Happens frequently. One persons depiction on an incident can be completely different then another's. And especially anyone with a bully breed type dog may need to defend their dog. Just because they can do the most damage doesn't mean the other dog doesn't need manners.
- Provided it applies to ALL dogs
- All dog attacks must be treated, and the pet owner should be held responsible for any damages
- If the dog bit is major or harm is done then the owner of the offending dog should be held accountable financially and or legally.
- Most dog bites against other animals don't initially seem to be that bad but once inspected by a vet can be far more serious. By leaving the scene, these dog owners are not being held responsible for their dogs actions
- Fines must be handed out to deter another incident. Owner must be aware this cannot happen
- I expect any animal owner, not just pit bulls, ANY BREED to stay at or report The issue.
- If a dog, ANY BREED OF DOG, has hurt someone, it's the owners responsibility to stay there.
- It requires owners to be responsible
- Of course. Having them not stay at scene completely defeats any reasonable attempt at remediation, restitution, or corrective actions. May as well allow people to hit and run if they're allowed to have their dog bite someone and walk away without concern.
- Too many people just leave and are not taking responsibility for their dogs behaviour
- Ownership of a pet is a responsibility.
- Many individuals whose animals have been the aggressors often leave the scene which means it is very difficult to contact them again regarding the health status of the animal/ connect with them regarding payment for the injuries. I would support both members being required to stay so long as the dogs were being taken care of appropriately (e.g. if a dog was in critical condition and needed to see a vet that would need to be done by the person first or by a partner/ someone who can do so)
- Just like any other accident the owner should be held accountable and stuck around to speak with officers
- Owners of these types of dogs are either very responsible pet owners or the opposite. The dogs that bite are usually owned by the irresponsible owners - they should be forced to account for the incident to police or animal control.
- If the victim animal has sustained significant harm, the antagonist or attacking owner should be somewhat responsible for any cost incurred by the victim owner. I do believe that in some circumstances the at fault owner should not be charged by an enforcement officer but educated and advised to take an appropriate behaviour course with the animal.
- I believe the pet owners should remain at the scene. They should also have to cover Veterinarian costs (in accordance to the attack)

- The owner should give information as to why the bite happened. If it is a one-off, no-problem, but repeat offenders should be given orders for training, fined, and monitored.
- It's for the safety of everyone
- I think the reason for the bite needs to be addressed and explored. The actions of a dog are the responsibility of the owner and thus they need to take responsibility and speak with the individual or other owners. I don't think it is necessary to speak to an officer unless the incident was moderate to severe.
- and no. getting the dog away from the scene and preventing further trauma (mental or physical) to the victim is most important. if the dog owner is able to get someone to come and retrieve the dog, then yes. they should stay. contact information should be exchanged regardless.
- This should already be law. If you flee the scene, further charges should be laid. Though it should be case by case. If someone runs up to a dog and pets it without permission and gets bit. That person should get in trouble as well for now endangering that dog by risking it being euthanized. Dangerous dogs should be labelled dangerous as well when in public.
- As long as officers were timely and non-breed prejudiced
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets' behaviour. This includes paying vet bills when an injury is sustained to another dog. The contact information is necessary to enforce this.
- Dog owners should be held 100% responsible for their animals behavior. Including give the above information after a bite
- If you have to stay at the scene of car accident then why should it be any different for a bite?
- Under the correct circumstances. If medical help is needed for either party. This can be done at a later date.
- we all need to be held accountable for our pets behavior, especially if a person or animal was injured.
- That should be common sense.
- Why do you need an explanation for something that is so obvious.
- The dog should be immediately leashed and moved a distance away. But owners must stay in order to be charged
- often we don't hear both sides!! When a dog bites more often someone has provoked the dog! We never get to hear that side as people are so afraid city will just come and take their dog!!!
- Dog owners should be held accountable for their actions, and the person affected should have the choice in what they're going to do. It should be up to the person who was affected not enforcement officers.
- if a nuisance dog owner remains anonymous how does the infraction get dealt with if they take off
- If harm was caused to another dog/animal. The owner of the aggressor should be responsible for any vet bills.
- If possible. Depending on the severity of the bite. Animal health comes first.
- I believe as a dog owner we are liable and if our dog bites it is our obligation to provide our information
- There are two sides to every story.
- If not proper information could not be documented.

- A dog is a member of a house hold, The police should have no right too see the dog after the incident occurs because the officer may be swayed by breeds under circumstances and try too execute the dog on site. Dogs are also seen as dependant by the owner, and therefore should be the responsibility of the owners and any damage inflicted should be seen as an assault
- It's how other injury/accidents are handled without animal involvement- why wouldn't it be the same with animal involvement.
- Dog owners should be responsible for their own dogs, and what fines may occur.
- It's important to document these bites and people should take responsibility for their dog and its behaviour.
- Dog owners should not be allowed to leave, the same as an accident. So many irresponsible dog owners cause issues not only in off leash parks and need to be held responsible.
- Mixed because animal may need to be removed from situation but accurate information needs to be exchanged.
- I believe treating it like a vehicle collision & allowing the owner and affected a chance to speak with an officer is helpful.
- If a dad hind bites my pit I'll in good fun, that owner needs to hold responsibility for the incident
- I'm still to pissed off about the pit bull stuff to have read that we'll enough to have a response here.
- Enforce responsible dog ownership regardless of breed
- Though I do understand the risk of the situation escalating.
- Just like any other accident, the dog is their responsibility, they should have to wait
- Owners should be responsible for the harm of a person or animal. To many people run and don't pay others vet bills.
- To explain the situation and to make sure the dog has all his shots. Make sure the person is okay
- For insurance/heath purposes
- The owner of the dog should be held responsible for any damage done.
- If the biting victim (person or animal's owner) wants to call an enforcement officer, then the biting dog's owner should have to stay/give contact info. That dog and their owner should have to take obedience training and a record should be made of how many incidents in a certain time frame a dog has had before it should considered that restrictions like keeping the dog at home to train or surrendering the dog due to owners' inability to properly train the dog.
- I have seen/heard of people with aggressive dogs just letting it happen and then walking away with their dog. This would add increased responsibility on the owner. Though with the threat of euthinization over their head they may not want to stay.
- Just like a car accident
- If a dog bites another dog or a person (depending on the situation) than that dog needs training to prevent future incidents by sharing contact information and talking to an office allows that dog to be followed to ensure the necessary steps are taken by the owner (appropriate training, muzzling etc)
- Care and control are required of dog owners, walking away from a scene or not providing you information say you lack your own personal care and control. Stay at scene or provide info is simple ie dog tag info

- Yes the owner should be responsible for their dogs actions but pending on the situation it might be better if they give their information and leave instead of waiting around. I.e: leave (after sharing their contact information) if they are having trouble controlling their dog or if the other person is acting aggressive towards them
- Your dog did it own up to it
- The owner should be there to give their input on what happened. Often it is the owner that needs training, maybe the enforcement officer could ascertain this and take the appropriate action.
- Too often bad owners are responsible to dog incidents. In the various off leash park and animal owners Facebook groups all too often you hear about incidents where an incident occurred, and the owner scoops up the dog and leaves, or refuses to share information, etc.
- if the bite is severe and someone has been injured.
- Responsible thing to do.
- I think of it like a hot and run with a vehicle. If you flee the scene of an accident then you are not do your job as a responsible owner.
- The person or persons who own the dog need to be accountable and the first step is to remain at the scene hiding is not an option.
- If contact information is given, the dog is more likely to go through a training process to better the behaviour of that dog. As well as the owner is held accountability for any vet bills caused by the dog
- Xx
- I don't understand why anyone would leave the scene of an attack either animal related or not.
- If there is a biting incident the owner of the dog should be expected to remain at the scene and to provide all contact information
- Absolutely!
- Owners responsible for their dogs. It's not the breed its the owner
- I believe the owner of the dog is 100% responsible for the behaviour and actions of the dog, regardless of breed and they should be held accountable for their dogs actions.
- .
- I've been in this situation before. Was appalled that the person responsible for the dog who attacked was simply allowed to carry on with their day as if nothing happened. Not only was I stuck with thousands of dollars in veterinary bills, but the trauma my dog went through was with him until he died.
- Of course they should stay at the scene so long as the animal can be secured safely.
- I think it's best to have all the information when a dog bite occurs.
- It is the responsible thing to do.
- Just like a hit and run! They need to stay and be accountable for what the dog did!
- Provision of information is essential especially vaccination information. People must take responsibility for the actions of their dogs.
- My dog was bitten by another dog and required 2000$ in medical bills from that incident, as the owner they were responsible for that cost so they should have to stay, and provide information, or face harsher criminal charges if they dont.

- Creates accountability for the owner of the dog.
- Responsible ownership
- it's simple responsible pet ownership
- Like a car accident, i.e., hit and run... YOU STAY. OR YOU GET CHARGED WITH A COMPARABLE FINE JUST LIKE LEAVING AN ACCIDENT IN A CAR!!!
- There is nothing wrong with pit bulls as a breed it is the owners and how they train their dogs.
- So many people do not acknowledge that their dog has done damage to another and just leave
- It's like any other incident.
- The dog owner is responsible for their dogs behaviour so their contact info is required.
- If there is further contacted needed such as vet bills to be covered, then you have their information.
- Unless it is unsafe to keep the dog in the current situation and there is no way to keep others safe.
- Yes, this should be treated like a car accident.
- As long as it is safe to do so
- I believe dog owners should be accountable
- Seen too many cases where people whose dog attacked someone be it a bully breed or not turn and run off.
- the enforcement officer will be able to get both sides of the incident at the same time and see the scene of the incident. see the "attacker's" breed as some people assume "pitbull" type and the enforcement officer may have a bias against pit bull types.
- Enforced accountability and hopefully prevents repeat offenses without documentation
- It should be treated like any other situation that causes damage to another person or other person's property. When there's a car crash involving other people do we not do the same thing?
- It should be the owners responsibility to cover any associated costs or medical expenses to the person or other animal bitten.
- I've been nipped by a dog, and was close to reporting it.
- Would make contact tracing easier for animal bites for public health / Alberta Health Services - the officers should be issued this form and complete it on site with the pet owner and provide to injured party to provide to hospital.
- To obtain police reports only and gather and witness statements on the scene. Enforcement officers should be objective.
- Prevents bite and run scenarios.
- This will give the owner an opportunity to explain the situation that led up to the incident. It also makes dog owners accountable for their animals regardless of breed or size!
- Yes
- It's the only way to hold them accountable
- I believe most people do this already, unless the dog needs immediate vet care.
- If a dog bites someone it is that dogs owners responsibility to take accountability of that animal.
- Train owners. Please train owners. Nothing wrong with the breed. [removed]
- Accountability

- Because the owner is responsible for their pet
- Owners need to be held responsible if their dog attacks a person or other dogs.
- If something that you own causes physical damage or injury to another person or person's property, you should have to stay to record said damages.
- Absolutely otherwise it allows for the individual to avoid consciences.
- we all need to be responsible for our pets.
- If ANY dog bites a person or another animal is the the responsibility of the pet owners to do just that.
- Share contact information for sure, and same as at a vehicular collision it's the victims choice whether to call the officers or not
- It is common sense that the owner of a dog remain at the scene of the incident
- And I think this should be heavily promoted so everyone knows the law. Too often I hear "but they let so I don't know where they live"
- This would be in keeping with any other accident
- Only to quickly exchange info. If at all possible, the dogs involved need to be separated from the event to avoid further actions
- Owner accountability
- Again, the OWNERS should be assessed and held responsible as well. If the dog is aggressive there is a reason why and there is rehabilitation training that can be done to fix this. If the dog has a bad home environment it is going to be reactive. I believe they should stay on scene if an altercation happens but every aspect of the dogs life should be looked into as well.
- It should be no different than leaving the scene of a motor vehicle accident
- I think they should stick around to give information to the other owner. Only if NECESSARY should an officer get involved.
- I think singling out a breed is absolute nonsense. Why should a dog be discriminated against, when its done nothing wrong. Innocent until proven guilty should apply to everything.
- If my dog required veterinary care due to an attack or bite, I would hope that the owner of the offending dog would take responsibility, If there were a rule, it might cause owners of non socialized or reactive dogs to more seriously consider whether or not to frequent an off leash park
- Like any accident (with a vehicle) , this is the case
- Owner must be held responsible for their pets behaviour
- Their dog, their responsibility. They should not be allowed to flee the scene.
- You want to ensure the dog is made a note of, plus is update on vaccines
- Should be the same as a hit and run. The owner should be responsible for any costs associated with the attack, for instance grief counselling for children or replacing torn clothes. The dog should face justice.
- It's only reasonable. No different than a car accident I figure.
- It's important for them to be accountable as well as present their perspective of what happened
- It would be similar to a car accident. Don't leave the seen of a crime.
- Like an accident there is a responsibility

- As long as the dog can be safely watched and the situation had calmed down.
- Maybe. However securing the dog should be the first priority so if that requires leaving the scene but returning or leaving contact info that should be ok.
- Any dog can bite and the owner must take responsibility. It is not breed specific.
- Same concept as if you hit someone's car
- That's being responsible dog owner and you should be able to tell what you saw that happened with out being judged by anyone there
- This will help ensure, that the correct information is given.
- It needs to be followed up on - the dog is not always at fault.
- I support staying if requested by the victim/owner or guardian of the victim.
- Many people who know their dog could possibly bite still use off leash parks or put their dogs in situations that they are ill equipped to handle. I have seen and heard of people taking off without so much as an apology. I'm assuming that this would carry a fine for leaving the scene which I would support as well.
- Yes the dog owner should have to fully account for the actions of the dog
- it is important that pet owners be responsible and take responsibility for their pet at all times
- This requires no explanation. Of course the owner should stay, and be held responsible for its pet!
- Just like any other accident, leaving the scene should be a crime.
- B
- I was personally involved when off leash pit attacked my leashed dog in Bowness park and the owner left leaving behind severally injured dog. Many people including children were traumatized.
- This helps insure accurate accounting of events.
- Any accident big or small, the owners should always exchange info. It's like an vehicular accident.
- Its their responsibility as a dog owner to remain at the scene. Plain and simple.
- But if the dog could be euthanized then it makes sense for the owner to flee the scene.
- Don't make people believe their dog is toast if they stick around
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dog
- No explanation necessary
- Treat as car accidents
- Either that or able to share with the other person involved and give contact info to them
- Just like any other incident the owner should remain on the scene. There should be a substantial fine for an owner leaving the scene.
- Any dog can bite.
- It's just like leaving the scene of a vehicular accident.
- Pet owners should be responsible for the actions of their companions. A reactive dog is reactive because of lack of training/ proper exercise not because they are a bad dog/breed.
- Responsible owners would already do this.
- Similar to a car accident, an incident occurred and you should remain at the scene.
- If you are a good dog owner you understand that you must take care of what happened

- Absolutely. Fleeing the scene should be considered a criminal offence.
- Most responsible owners know this isn't even a question or statement you just do it. Obviously the owners actions need to be addressed if they are leaving the scene, not just the dog
- Information should be share
- it's the OWNERS responsibility. If the dog bites, the owner is responsible, therefore should be held responsible
- Bad owners should be held accountable for thier dogs bad behaviour.
- 100% yes! They should be held accountable for the vet bills if their dog bites someone!
- They should do that
- As a pet owner and driver the responsibility lies with me. My property damages something I have to pay for it.
- There could be heavy vet bills associated. That I believe would be the owner at fault with the aggressive dog should have to pay.
- Just like a car accident, serious injuries can occur
- To allow for thorough investigation of the event.
- All owners need to held responsible, including providing contact information and speaking with enforcement officers to ensure all necessary steps are taken to protect other animals and humans.
- Finding resolution is key
- Vet bills are costly and the responsible party should be liable.
- Within reason, sometimes distance is okay- persay they return to their vehicle. But yes they should remain at the scene to share information or follow up- much like a car accident.
- Owner should be held responsible
- But only if there is also a witness bc it may be less confrontational that way.
- The liability lyes on the biting dogs owner. Police can make that easier for the victims
- I feel it is reasonable to require a dog owner to stay at the scene if their dog has broken the skin of an animal or human.
- It is part responsible dog ownership.
- because it;s the owners responsibility
- Dog owners need to be held accountable
- Although may not always be possible if injuries occur as one or both parties may need to get care
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets. Lots of Calgary owners do not currently do this.
- I think that it is so easy to take off and "hide" a vicious dog and not have to deal with the consequences. You can pretend to rehome the dog to a farm, when really - it's just a temporary fix andthe dog will be back after a few months. If you are forced to stay there and accept the consequences, we can get these dogs off the street.
- Owning a dog comes with the responsibility of being accountable for their actions, i think any reasonable animal owner agrees
- Owners need to be held responsible for the actions of the dog. Not punish the dog for his owners lack of training

- This is part of responsible ownership.
- I think it is the responsible thing to do if your dog is involved in an incident. I think a lot of people don't stay though because they expect officers are going to seize and destroy their dog without considering/investigating the situation.
- This should already be happening but some dog owners don't care
- I have seen to many stories posted about people running off and leaving while an owner is dealing with their bloody animal and it's not ok. The owner of the dog who attacked should be responsive for the vet bill.
- It is important to give both views, just like any other incident.
- Fines if owner abandons the scene, except possibly to secure the animal indoors, and return
- The owner is the reason the dog does not behave. [removed] The owners need to held accountable and responsible.
- Too many people give wrong information or ignore the request for info. If they had to give their correct info to police it would cut down the times that people would be spending trying to find the owner.
- The pet owner has to take responsibility for their pets actions.
- Of course.
- Oftentimes the extent of damage to another dog isn't fully seen until examined by a vet. An owner needs to be able to collect information from other owners if seeking financial retribution for damages, filing police reports, etc.
- Personal experience has shown that this does not always happen, allowing aggressive and nuisance animals and their owners to avoid a record of behaviour and appropriate intervention.
- If your dog bites something it is only fair that you stick around incase it is costly to the one that got bit and should be on the offending owners cost
- This is common sense
- It's important to remain on scene, you can see what went wrong and also learn from that. A dog attack is an important thing to report, especially if it has happened multiple times, you can tell how that dog is then.
- Absolutely!
- I think information should be traded and then the owner should take their dog home to reduce further stress on their pet while things get sorted out.
- It's damage of personal property (yourself or your animal). The same rule applies for vehicular accidents then it should be the same here.
- Bites are usually triggered from something else. While lack of training is a contributing factor, there is often a reason behind the attack that was preventable from both parties.
- Owners should be responsible for properly training and socializing their dogs. If an incident occurs, owners should remain at the scene to allow for a proper process.
- The owner should take responsibility

- Too many people leave the area after their dog attacks and severe and costly injuries may have been sustained by a person or dog. It needs to be documented to determine if an animal is a threat to other people and animals
 - It's the owner's responsibility. The dog bit because it wasn't properly trained, don't blame the dog
 - Currently, people are scared that their dog will be euthanized or taken away if it bites a person or animal, so they leave the scene hoping they won't be identified. However, this results in a biased summary of events leading to the bite by the victim. By requiring the individual and dog to stay, both sides of the story can be taken at the scene of the incident.
 - Just like in a traffic accident, people should be held responsible for their dog's actions. And also be able to explain their side of the story. If the animal is injured, then they should be able to leave to take the animal to a vet but should give their information before leaving.
 - Take responsibility
 - They need to take responsibility and ensure all parties have contact info for further investigation
 - A responsible owner will stay and do everything possible to own up to what happened and minimize trauma to everyone involved. This includes staying and telling their perception of the event
 - Share contact info for sure. Stay for officer if victim wishes
 - Depending on the severity of a dog biting another dog, the owner should be responsible for paying vet bills
 - As with any other incident procedure, it's the right thing to do and gets to a resolution quicker
 - "This is just common decency."
- Since you don't give space to provide thoughts on your attempt at Breed Specific Legislation, I'll provide my thoughts here. You are basing decisions on myths and outdated information and this isn't okay. Please do your research <https://www.pitbullinfo.org/dog-bite-scientific-studies.html>. Singling out a certain breed of dog and forcing their owners to abide by additional restrictions will do absolutely nothing in improving public safety."
 - It is important for the owner of the offending dog to be present to take responsibility of the attack
 - It's called pet responsibility. Live it. Learn it. Own it.
 - Too many cases of people's dogs being attacked either in off-leash or public areas where the owner of the attacking dog leaves the scene to avoid having to pay the other person's vet bill.
 - If a creature you're responsible for is involved in an attack, it makes sense for them to have to deal with an authority when necessary; however, I do think it should be able to be done by appointment if it's not able to be processed in a timely manner.
 - Same as a car accident. Something bad happened and they need to make sure the person is okay. If the bitten says it's no biggie, then they both move on. We've got free healthcare. If they ask for info or cops or whatever, then it happens. But gotta check up
 - Na

- An owner or handler is responsible for the actions of the animal and should be required to show i.d to prevent giving false information
- Responsibility of the owner.
- The owner is the most responsible for the behaviour and actions of the dog and must take full responsibility by being present at the scene.
- This should have always been a rule.
- The biting dog owner should have to pay any medical bills for the bitten dog or human.
- I think that should be fine, but that doesn't mean to euthanize the dog because dogs don't just bite for no reason. You guys need to understand that dogs aren't always just trying to bite other people or animals.
- Similar to a motor vehicle accident, all parties involved need to be identified.
- Too often these are thought of as minor injuries but end up requiring veterinary care
- I know of instances where dogs have attacked other dogs or people and the owners have fled with no consequences. This leaves the opportunity for the same problem to continue if it's not addressed
- If your dog bites someone they should have to stay.
- Definitely a rule such as this would be a very good idea and stiff penalties and large fines should be imposed for those who don't comply.
- I believe contact information should be shared and then they can leave. I don't think they should have to wait for By-law to show up.
- People should all be held accountable, both parties should have to stay at the scene.
- The owner of the dog that was the aggressor should definitely remain there. Because they are the owner of the animal and the animal has caused distress to either a human being or another animal. It is the responsibility of the owner to take responsibility for the actions of his pet.
- The owner should display responsibility and accountability for the situation, and should also be available to explain what happened in their point of view immediately after the incident.
- Yes. However if I feel threatened, I will protect myself and "pit bull"• by taking Steps to defend my dog and myself. I will protect my staffy at all costs so it isn't scapegoated into being a problem when it's other pathetic people and animals.
- The owner should always be held responsible for their dogs.
- Seem obvious
- Health and history of the animal are important to the treatment of the individual that was bitten.
- To cooperate on the investigation
- That is what a responsible pet owner should do without question
- A dog that bites is a dog that isn't under proper control or isn't trained correctly. Owners should be responsible for the actions of their animal 100%.
- Far too often the offender flees the area or gives fake information that cannot be followed up on. These incidents SHOULD BE TREATED AS VEHICULAR ACCIDENTS! This protects ALL persons/pets!

- The owner is responsible for their pet's actions. They should be able to wait and provide information needed, for health and legal purposes
- Yes, if you own a dog, you should be accountable for their behaviour. When I am walking at Nose Hill and I encounter an aggressive dog, most owners will say their dog is friendly. This tells me they are completely out of touch with their dogs' social skills. If their dog bites me or my child, the owner should be reprimanded and have to take obedience training.
- I think they should be held accountable and should pay for some vet bills etc
- I think people should at least be there to give a statement and be held accountable for their animal.
- Yes if a dog attacks another person or dog then they should have to stay. But this should apply to any dog. There are many more dog attacks from different breeds than pitbulls
- No one should ever leave the scene of an incident that their dog has been a part of
- Owner should be held responsible and understand ramifications
- As an owner you are responsible for your pet's behaviour same as when driving a car. You should remain at the scene of the incident.
- Any responsible pet owner would/should stay and exchange information.
- I think this is self-explanatory! If the dog bites a person or another animal, the owner cannot run away. He needs to take responsibility and need to surrender the dog to law enforcement to be euthanised. We cannot allow biting dogs in society! Dogs like pitbulls, rottweilers etc should not be allowed in residential areas!!!
- It's like an accident with a vehicle. Both parties should talk with police
- Not remaining at the scene can be comparable to any accident involving vehicles a bit and run per se
- Owners should take full responsibility for the behaviour of their pet. Train or contain your dog.
- It is the same thing if you get into a car accident. If said dog attacks my dog then owner of said dog should pay for my dog's medical care
- Some dogs aren't aggressive and some may bite out of fear or if they are threatened and instead of making assumptions and type-casting on the dog it's a good idea to keep in contact so that if complications arise both parties are involved in the solution and the dog in question isn't just taken away or treated negatively if the dog has had multiple offences this can also be noted when contacts are exchanged and can further the care and necessary precautions
- I think that should always happen! Just like any accident that happens you always remain on the scene and wait to speak with someone about the situation
- Self-explanatory
- When I was a dog owner I witnessed too many owners grab their obnoxious or aggressive dog and run from the scene of the incident.
- Yes, OWNERS should be the ones held responsible. Training for the dogs afterwards.
- Your animal, your responsibility.
- As long as it is safe to do so. A dog that has been in an incident should be contained in a home or vehicle to prevent further incident. I also believe that people are generally unreasonable if they feel they have the right to act that way, such as being the victim of a dog incident

- responsible thing to do
- It can help sort out issues early on and is helpful if the dog has any special circumstances (ex. The dog is a rescue and is being re trained out of behaviours picked up when being abused)
- This is just responsible ownership
- Yes I think it important for the owner to share details with victims; however, I do think it is also important to get their animal out of the situation (put in car, or house) which may be difficult if they are walking far from their house/car. They should at the very least give their name/phone number so bylaw can contact them.
- It's too easy to lose track and not be able to follow up with the owner of there is no obligation to remain on the scene.
- The owner should be responsible for their dogs actions.
- ABSOLUTELY!! It should not be the responsibility of the owner who was attacked to have to pay for vet bills and whatever else comes with it. If you are a responsible pet owner, you instantly have feelings for the attacked animal and would want to make sure it's ok or help rush it to the vet quickly so it doesn't pass away (in rare instances). Not only that, if this isn't the first time the dogs has attacked a person then we need to be 1. Giving fines to the owner responsible 2. Having that owner and dog go through training to fix the problem or 3. Have that animal put into a rescue/rehabilitation, the owner fined and after the animal has been retrained they can go on to their new loving home.
- It allows for both sides of the story to be recorded at a time. However depending on situation I would recommend owners keep distance while waiting for an enforcement officer as things may escalate based off the situation that unfolded.
- Easier to support the person with the injured dog
- Yes, but there should be some flex because if someone agitates my dog and he defends himself, he will be fine if I can take him home but will escalate further if I have to stay, which makes him more likely to be apprehended in a situation that wasn't his fault (btw my dog is a well trained mini labradoodle)
- Said offending dog owner should be held accountable for injuries inflicted on victim dog or human
- It is important for both side to be shared and information given.
- To assess the situation and provide contact info and reimbursement of vet costs
- I have been left with vet bills and training bills due to my dog being attacked and bitten by another dog. The owner left the scene. Not only did I have to pay for the vet bills due to an injury an irresponsible dog owner caused, I now have to get a trainer for my dog because of the trauma caused to my dog by this incident.
- I agree if it's the owner of the dog that bit that other person or animal. Most dog owners that have dogs with multiple offences won't stay so there should be a fine for leaving the scene. However if the person or animal that got bit also has to stay, then I don't recommend them staying because they would need to go to emergency or a vet hospital.
- Only for bites that caused an injury (e.g. at least broken skin).
- This puts accountability back on the owner of the dog that attacked

- As stated, I work at a 24 hour animal hospital. Seeing these cases daily, it is rare if the owner of the dog that caused injury will offer their help. I completely agree with this being along side "leaving a crime scene"
- If it serious I believe the owner should be held responsible.
- It should be treated like any other accident and if you dont abide by it and run away then you get another fine and the dog automatically seized.
- Same as an accident or a fight, yes. Shouldn't be different for biting dogs
- if it is a "hit and run" type situation, if found the owner should be fined an extreme fine for walking away i.e. $5k
- there are too many dog bites where a person takes off. I am of the believe that it should be the owner held to the highest standard. A dog is only as good as their owner.
- the owner takes full responsibility off the dogs actions.
- The owner should have to provide documentation that the dog is up to date on vaccines. Also, if the dog was provoked in any way the owner should be able to defend themselves
- Like an accident they must stay and swap information at the least.
- Like a car accident, if you are the owner, you must take responsibility.
- In the same way if you are in a car accident you must remain at the scene. However, if someone provides their information, maybe photo of their driver's license or ID and has to go, let them leave. Also should not have to wait longer than 45 min for an enforcement officer.
- I see this as akin to remaining at the scene of an accident in a motor vehicle.
- Obvious reasons
- I can't imagine why this wouldn't be the case. Dog owners have to take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
- he is responsible for his pet, this would be similar to a motor car accident. an example being leave and your guilty of a hit and run
- Owners should be held accountable not the dog. Harsher punishment and fines for the humans behind the leash.
- Too many pet owners get away with it especially if the owners don't have the pet licensed, and they don't like the penalty for them.
- For them to be allowed to leave the scene would be the same as leaving the scene of a car accident. They should be forced to stay, to make a written statement to law enforcement officers, stating what they believed caused the incident/factors leading up to the incident.
- it's the same as a vehicle accident, your liable, so stay there and deal with it. Train your dogs and if they are reactive, make it clear to others, then they will not bite.
- I believe that a responsible owner would already do this so a rule would ensure those less responsible owners are also accountable
- Dogs should wear collars with their license. All dog bites to anyone who is not owner must be reported no matter what (like vehicle accidents)
- Accountability
- The owner is responsible for their dog. They need to deal with the consequences of their animal

- Same as an collision scene. Be an adult and take ownership
- If both parties share contact info and agree bylaw is not emergent, owner does not need to stay, if it's a serious incident or one of the parties wants bylaw involvement immediately, parties should be required to remain on scene.
- Owners are liable for how their animal behaves. Fleeing the scene after they cause harm should punishable.
- Yes, provided the incident it severe enough to require medical or veterinary attention.
- I support the concept but there are going to be mitigating factors like dogs and people being very riled up and if you understand animal and especially dog behaviour, they react to the emotions and feelings of their owners which might make them display other unwanted behaviours or if one person or animal need to seek immediate medical attention "which may not be the perceived aggressor or if the situation is drawing too much attention there may be public aggression towards the dog or owner who is perceived to be the bad guy. For everyone's safety there needs to be alternative plans to get the information to law enforcement" an app which could allow for pictures of animals and owners could be uploaded along with exchanges information...
- This is a double edged sword because if the dog is only responsive to one person, it makes it difficult for the owner to stay at the scene. I do support the rule in cases where medical attention is needed or something of that nature.
- The owner should take responsibility and pay the vet bills. This actually is a real problem at some of our dog parks. I stopped taking my dogs to the off leash for this reason.
- Just like leaving the scene of a car crash. Leaving the scene of a dog involved incident should be the same unless your dog needs emergency vet treatment. But then the owner should be responsible for contacting and updating the police/bylaw of their location.
- Responsibility. You don't leave th scene If an accident you stay and report it.
- More for the animal. And to ensure the right story is told. Also, teaching dog safety to the owner AND others. Teach the public to ask before approaching a dog. Most people do not approach dogs properly (like coming directly at a dog they don't know and touching their head). Even a non-aggressive dog can be triggered by behavior like this as it is threatening and scary to them.
- People need to be responsible for their dogs. If they can't handle their dog properly or need help with a dogs behavior then it's on them to seek help and learn to understand the dog.
- If the bite is sever it is important to get insurance information, enforcing this on small bites, or big bites/attacks will help people stuck with enormous veterinary bills due to other dog bites and attacks.
- It would put the responsibility more on the owner. Officers would be able too see interaction between animal and owner
- Depending the situation, the owner is not taking care of the dog properly.
- Too many times irresponsible pet owners leave after their animal has bitten another animal. There is no excuse for this.
- The owner of the aggressive dog needs to uphold responsibility for not preventing the dog from attacking
- "Owner or person responsible for the dog at the time of the incident m, example

- Dog walker"
- It is the owners fault. Hands down. They need to take responsibility
- I would expect the owner to help with any hospital bills, or vet bills if there animal caused injury or harm.
- You are responsible for your dog. If they hurt someone, that makes you responsible.
- dog owners are responsible for the bite
- If a dog bites another animal, medical bills should be covered by the owner of the offending dog. But waiting for an animal control officer is unreasonable in most circumstances.
- Would be good to have an explanation from both sides to understand the reason it happened
- It shows responsibility and liability for your dog's behavior and and negative outcome caused by your dog's behavior.
- Always you should be the one paying the bill for the other dog if your dog attacks someone else's dog
- Just like a car accident, all parties should be present and accountable.
- It's important if a dog attacks the owner stays to talk with an enforcement officer because this will allow proper tracking of problem owners. I don't believe the issues are breed specific, often times it's irresponsible owner. It would also allow the city to see if a pet owner continues to have issues with the same or different animals.
- The owner is ALWAYS responsible for their pets behaviour in any circumstance, especially one that may bring any sort of harm to another, for which the owner should most definitely remain on scene to take ownership for their pet and tend to those injured.
- It should be considered a crime to leave. If someone is badly injured?
- Yes, to ensure accountability and that the dog receives the appropriate treatment and training to prevent this from happening again. Dogs do not bite when not stressed and for no reason, the dog needs some form of help.
- Personal experience. It is paramount all information is known about the dog. Dog owner or other caretaker with the dog should remain.
- Well it's sort of like a car accident or if you assault someone or if your child does, your responsible for that all and a dog is sort of like a child and you own it so it's your responsibility to take the liabilities that go along with an accident or an attack
- But only if safe
- The fact that it is not a rule is upsetting.
- The dog bit someone. The owner is at fault. This also depends on the severity of the bite. Dogs play.
- Yes, because often times a dog biting is not the fault of the owner or dog but the victim. Encouraging the owners to stay on scene is a form of protection for those individuals to explain their side, but also a way to hold vicious dog owners accountable. It works for both groups.
- My dog has been attacked on several occasions by smaller breed dogs, yet the owners of those dogs have got away with it. Most of the time, attacks by smaller breeds go undocumented due to lesser damage. We seem to only hear about pitbull stacks due to the stigma. If all of the attacks get documented, we might see a different picture.

- The owner should be responsible for the actions of the dog in most cases.
- There should be a penalty for leaving a scene without leaving your information.
- The owner of the dog should not be allowed to leave the area and should be held responsible for the dog's behaviour
- Speaking with all parties involved leads to proper fact finding.
- You can't hit a car and leave the scene without exchanging contact info/etc. You shouldn't be allowed to leave a scene if your dog has hurt someone either.
- This will help police understand who is at fault for attacks, as well as begin a record that could reduce improper owners from getting additional pets.
- That is so they are held accountable for any vet bills that have arisen
- Dog owners should be held responsible.
- I feel like this is self-explanatory and really no different if a human were to assault the human.
- A dog biting another dog or human is no different than if a human were to hit another human or dog. They would have to remain at the scene to talk to someone and since they are responsible for the dog they should have to wait to explain
- Should be treated the same as a car accident
- A neighbour's dog was attacked and the dog owner took off and has never been held accountable. However, like pretty much every existing bylaw now, the likelihood of enforcement and lack of education on rules may result in the person leaving anyways.
- It doesn't matter what size the dog is. Everyone should be required to remain at the scene. If either party leaves the scene they should be charged.
- It's important to record the incident as it may happen again and draw attention to an out-of-control dog.
- Just like a vehicle accident, leaving the scene of a crime should be illegal.
- I would expect the same if your child or your car hurt someone, should be the same for dogs
- If severe enough, all information from both sides should be considered.
- The dog is never at fault for biting and therefore the owner should have to be responsible for their dog.
- Absolutely. Unfortunately, many dog owners who have aggressive dogs will not be aware of or follow this rule because they are neglectful and do not want to be held accountable.
- Unless the bite is minor and agreed by both parties then leaving is fine
- It's the right thing to do and the dog can be supported through programs for their problem behavior that they can learn about from enforcement officers
- Same as a hot and run, if you cause damage you need to be held accountable
- Pet owners need to be responsible for their dogs' actions. Or, be there to defend their pet if the incident was of no reasonable fault of the dog.
- It is important so these situations can be tracked
- The owner is responsible for the actions of the dog, they need to take responsibility right then and there and if they are unwilling to stay then there should be harsher consequences on them

- Any incident (whether with an animal, vehicle or otherwise) should always include the exchanging of information and cooperation from all parties involved.
- You are responsible for your pet. Nuff said.
- Yes that is responsible pet ownership
- Of course they should stay at the scene.
- It's like when someone gets in an accident. They need to remain at the scene to explain what happened. Same thing should apply to this!
- Owners of aggressive dogs need to be held responsible. I frequently go to the dog park and have witnessed several dog fights and owners just walking away without taking responsibility.
- If you are the owner of a dog that has bitten then it's your responsibility to stay at the scene
- I think the owner should be forced to deal with the consequences of their animals actions as most can be trained and i believe animal behavior of pets is based on training not nature.
- people should be responsible. But rules need to apply to all dog owners, not just large dog owners.
- This is a great rule. The owners need to be held accountable
- If a person injures a person same rules apply. A person is rest for the animal.
- Owners of a dog who has bitten someone ARE RESPONSIBLE. They absolutely must be held accountable.
- The dog owner should stay at the scene of the attack (bite) just as a driver should stay at the scene of an accident and should be responsible to provide any information that is requested of the victim/caregiver/parent.
- It is the same as staying at the scene of any other incident.
- If your dog bites someone and draws blood accept responsibility
- Ive seen too many incidents where an owner doesn't take responsibility for their dog biting either a person or another animal and they just walk away like nothing happened. Most cases it's the owner, not the animal that is the issue.
- This provides the dog owner the opportunity to explain the potential cause of the incident as well as discuss follow ups to review all medical records and potentially decrease rates of euthanasia.
- I think everyone should hear the full story
- Better information for cases and will help determine factors involved. Many pets are hurt and owners are left with vet bills they dont deserve or cant afford. Both victim and aggressors plus owners should be considered into it
- That would be logical
- That's wrong. Don't they stay anyhow??!!!
- Owner must take responsibility on the spot and in person.
- Your dog, your responsibility
- When the dog bites, it is the failure on the owner. They failed to train their dog properly.
- The owner needs to be held responsible
- Makes sense to take responsibility for your dogs actions and be responsible owner.
- Too many people take off

- The owner of the dog who inflicts damage on another person or animal should be held accountable for their dog's behavior. They shouldn't be able to just walk away from the incident.
- Though sometimes it's not possible to both remove your aggressive dog and remain at the scene.
- It's an assault and should be treated as such
- Dogs are property by definition of the law. If damage is done to an individual's dog by another individual's dog then the owner of the attacking dog should remain on scene to await a by law officer to collect statements. This process should be no different in how it is handled than when two vehicles are involved in a traffic accident. Owners should be responsible for their dogs behaviours out in public and that includes taking financial responsibility where needed. Owners who choose not to take responsibility for the actions of their own property (their dog) put others in the public at risk and put victim owners in a financial bind for incidences that they were not at fault for.
- They are responsible for the dog.
- It's an accident.. just like a car accident you exchange information and go from there
- At the discretion of the victim/victims owner depending on the severity of the situation.
- It's the same thing as a car accident. The owner is at fault when their dog bites someone, therefore should be held responsible.
- Make people accountable. If they can't do this one simple task they shouldn't have a dog
- I had my dog bitten by a vicious small dog, and the owner fled. I speak from experience that it is unnerving, not knowing if the owner is responsible enough to maintain vaccine records. I didn't care about vet fees, I cared about the well being of the animal and myself.
- Would encourage people to stay and sort out the problem. Additional ticket for offenders who run. May also deter people from running.
- I absolutely support pet owners being held accountable to the actions of their animals. This will also ensure both sides of the story are heard as bites are rarely unprovoked.
- The owner of the dog responsible should be held liable for any costs associated with damage done to another dog.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs and should take care of vet bills as well allow bylaw to fine and declare dog a nuisance if it should be. Owner also needs to be made responsible pet owner
- Any bite is an incident. Just like a fender bender.
- Important for context and clarity
- To many owners and dogs get away with biting and attacks this would be a great enforcement
- To me, this is the definition of responsible pet ownership. If it were my animal (which is a very large Labrador NOT pitbull!) bit someone I would remain their until the issue is dealt with
- If a dog owner needs to be held accountable for the dogs actions. If there is a bite or injury there needs to be accountability and measures need to be taken to make sure it doesn't happen again.
- You should always get both sides of the story. The dog that bit may not be the one who started it. They could be trying to protect them self or their human.
- I see this as similar to hit and run csr accidents. If your dog has caused damage, you should be held accountable. One exception might be if your dog has also been injured and requires urgent medical care

- If a bite causes damage it would be worth staying if both parties would or could remain civil. Dogs usually don't bite unless provoked or highly untrained.
- It's important to get both sides of the story and determine cost/vetting responsibilities
- It's the same idea when it comes to accidents while drive, would you leave the scene of an accident? The answer is no, you should either exchange information or wait for an enforcement officer if needed.
- If the owner of a vehicle commits a driving offense, they are required to stay at the scene, this is a dog owner committing an offense, they should have to stay.
- The only issue is it would be a more stressful situation for both the owner and the dog to stay at the scene which could lead to more aggression possibly with the already hyped dog and further Behavior outcome.
- Need to know if the dog was defending itself or owner. Was it a proven med attack? Who attacked first?
- Absolutely should be necessary. This will prevent irresponsible owners from thinking its not their problem and allowing the dog to do it again. Great idea!
- It's ALWAYS an animals owner whom is responsible for the actions of the animal, of course they should stay at the incident until the issue is resolved.
- Common courtesy.
- Drivers are responsible for car accidents, serial killers are responsible for their spree of murders, and so on. Owners are responsible for their animals and what happens on their watch.
- The owner does need to take responsibility but under no circumstance should an owner lose there dog because of this, taken away or euthanized it's not right.
- Owners should be held responsible for the actions of their pet. It is often the owner's poor training and care for the dog that causes the dog to bite and not an issue with the dog itself.
- if necessary - would largely depend on context, many animals will bite out of fear and defensiveness, if there was an altercation with another animal especially, how and why would be relevant
- It's important that this information be gathered to support this initiative
- Too often, the owner leaves the scene to avoid enforcement.
- Dog behaviours are allowed by an owner. The onus of the incident should be placed on the owner, not the dog.
- This would alleviate having to search for the dog owner if the flee from the scene.
- Depends on the availability of the enforcement officer. It may not be practical to wait however if contact information is shared the officer can follow up
- They must take responsibility for their dog. They must provide pertinent info. Just like with a car accident.
- The owner is responsible for controlling their dog while out in public. Including on a leash, muzzle, distancing from other people and dogs if needed.
- A bite needs to be explained, even if its an isolated incident.

- If a dog bites a person the owner should be accountable to the person affected and be available to answer any questions along with collaborating with the appropriate officials on a plan of action and steps to prevent future dog bite incidents
- Any dog any breed should have this law. No different then a car accident
- If you hit someone with a car, would it be acceptable to drive away after causing injury? No. Owners need to be held responsible for their actions and statements need to be taken. It takes 2 to tango when it comes to dog bites.
- I've been bit and the owner fought it tooth and nail. If it had been dealt with immediately, things may have gone differently.
- Like a car accident. You have to wait and talk to police.
- Since there is injury to either a person or another pet, the scenario becomes similar to leaving the scene of an accident where a car hit a person.
- Owner should explain what happened and why, and how they'll prevent it from happening again.
- Like any accident it is important to share information for future contact/exchange of information if necessary
- It would seem to be common sense that the owner remain on the scene.
- It sounds like indirect assault, the owner is responsible
- That is at minimum what should be done
- Accountability.
- Seems straightforward: not being allowed to leave the scene of an accident without sharing your info and making a statement. Especially if your dog was the aggressor.
- They should stay and give all their info and etc. Because the dog is their responsibility
- This seems obvious
- I know from experience the owner generally leaves quickly
- All dogs that do bite, regardless of size, I believe should be documented.
- I think people may flee the scene as they're scared of enforcement officers making life altering judgment without a good understanding of the situation. These situation need to be used for education and to promote better management. Not to scare and punish dogs and owners.
- Owners should take responsibility for their pets
- They should stay there, but only if they are able to do so safely. If the dog in question continues to be difficult to handle, and they have no reasonable way to contain it, they can't and shouldn't be expected to stay. That's just going to lead to more injuries.
- I think owners should be held accountable for the incidents their dogs are involved in so the dog can get proper training to prevent future incidents
- This encourages good dog ownership, if you're required to seek support or training for your animal it helps create more educated dog owners. There are no standards for ownership so if there are behavioural issues owners should be accountable and decrease repeat offenders with no boundaries.
- Both sides of the incident need to be taken into account much like any other accident.

- The owner and dog should be evaluated
- This is something that needs to be enforced with small dog owners as they tend to leave believe that a smaller bite is nothing and people are over reacting , if anything small dog bread are more a nuisance and owner are more irresponsible
- "In regards to the previous question claiming pit bulls have the strength to do more damage. If you factor in the size of the dog Labrador can have a significantly stronger bite however appears weaker due to the strength to weight ratio usually used on comparison for bite strength.
- Punish bad owners across the board. The breed has nothing to do with it."
- Again, without targeting a specific bread of dog and instead looking at the entire situation, without prejudice. If a dog was being harassed or teased and as self defense, bite a person or another dog, it should be treated fairly because they are animals, not humans. They rely severely on their instinct and when people intentional try to tease a specific bread, by law officers should be provided with unbiased training that will allow them to make an informed decision on every situation.
- essentially leaving the scene of a crime so better to stay and explain situation
- The owner is more responsible than the dog and so should be there to be held responsible for the dog's actions.
- Accountability
- I would support such a rule as long as it is applied across the board no matter the breed. There are plenty of small breed dogs that bite as much or more than a large breed dog.
- right thing to do
- Unsure how you would enforce this?
- It's not different than a car accident
- Any other physical interaction considered serious requires all involved parties and witnesses to turn over relevant information to authorities.
- This way the dog/owner has to take responsibility for what happened just like on the scene of any other incidents.
- The owner of a dog should be responsible enough to stay and talk with enforcement officer
- Like any accident, ALL parties should remain present.
- Q
- It is important for accountability
- A dogs behaviour is its owner's responsibility, however owners should be allowed to remove themselves from the situation if they feel that they or their animal is in danger.
- This culture change would be supported if owners knew that there dog would not be at risk of being euthanized for their honesty. There are two sides to every story and a dog being reactive (biting or acting aggressive) is always a last line of defence for an animal that's been trying to express their discomfort long before the bite ever occurred. The animal should NOT be punished for this.
- This will allow them to be charged, the dog placed in care, the victim being able to sue to collect reimbursement for treatment for their dog, pet, child or themselves or damages when there is a loss of life or a disability that results.
- This is being a responsible pet guardian.

- To ask if the dog had it's rabies shot and ask if this has happened before.
- NA
- Help to cover insurance and cost of vet bills fairly
- I think it's important people take ownership for actions of their dogs, as it's often a representation of how they trained or deal with their dog.
- They should be able to explain the circumstances surrounding the bite (if their animal is on leash and a strange animal or person approaches without permission, they should not be held accountable)
- Because information needs to be exchanged. If my dog gets attacked I need to take it to the vet to get checked and I will have to pay out of pocket for something my dog did not do or if a kid gets bitten (I work in an ED in Calgary) we need information on the dogs immunization status and if they are outdoor dogs in the mountains for example
- If a dog bites someone or another animal it shouldn't just be the animals fault the owner should be at fault also
- The owner should stay and take responsibility for their pet and any damages
- Should stay at scene because the guilty party could give false information and not pay for the vet bill.
- Yes
- Both parties involved should talk with the enforcement officer and the enforcement officer should be wary of extended circumstances on either side of the issue. For example an on leash dog at an on leash park who does not like being approached by other dogs has an off leash dog run at them. If the off leash dog is then bitten, the owner and dog who were on leash should not be at fault or considered violent.
- This rule would be very helpful for if criminal or other court proceedings needed to occur after the incident. And it would also be a good indicator if the dog that acted out was being not taken care of properly and the owner should be held responsible
- I view this the same as a car accident and remaining on scene unless both parties have proof that everyone is okay
- Treat it the same as a car accident. Exchange info
- Having the owner stay enables essential animal information to be provided immediately. However, this means the dog likely also must stay which could be problematic if the dog is not well controlled.
- I think it is important to obtain contact information of the offending owner. However, if a dog is in an escalated/aggressive state, the owner should be able to remove the dog promptly from the situation once contact information is provided.
- If the owner of said dog bites someone and leaves then there's only one side of the story for the police to process(the person who got bit). Most of the time the victim of dog bites are the dogs themselves because it got scared by who it attacked. And unfortunately the person who got bit will usually play the victim even though they antagonized the poor dog.

- Absolutely. It's part of being a responsible pet owner- if the person or pet who was but needs medical attention after the fact the owner should know and be willing to accept the consequences of their dogs actions.
- I think the owner should absolutely share if their pet is up to date on vaccinations and talk to an officer about whether it's a first time offence or if it has happened before.
- As the owner responsible for the dog, of course they are responsible for its behaviour and should stay
- If the other party was at fault the dog owner should be given a chance to defend themselves.
- It has been my experience that dogs who bite have owners who either don't care or encourage it. These people are irresponsible and often don't have their dogs leashes.
- The dog owner is responsible for all costs.
- Should be the same as a vehicle accident
- It's only logical
- A dog bite is a big bite, this has nothing to do with the breed of a dog. Have you learned nothing with the BLM movement ? You cannot put any person or animal into a box based on looks alone. Shame on the City for even having these questions.
- People should be held accountable for their pets actions, especially if they are not in control of them.
- Remaining at the scene of an incident is part of being a responsible pet owner. It is also part of being a decent human being.
- On the condition that they Don't automatically blame a pitbull
- If you bites a person you need to take responsibility for your dogs actions.
- You don't flee the scene of an accident, I see this as the same thing. But stop using pit bull and stop discriminating against this breed. Do your homework instead of following a prejudice and see that Chihuahua bite more often and are more vicious as a breed overall...there are no bad dogs, just bad owners/people. Register the breed more so, see who owns them, punish the bad owners and remove the good dog from a bad situation. Don't be so narrow in your thinking and so blatant in your prejudice. Geez, this is CALGARY for goodness sake.
- I have had a dog owner leave the scene of a bite, in this case it was my dog leading to large bills.
- Best way to for victim or bite to obtain dogs medical records i.e rabies vaccination. Also, in a motor vehicle accident, you'd be required to offer your info. Same rule for dog bite, makes sense.
- It's important to get all statements of those involved in (and witnesses) the incident. There's more than one side to a story.
- I don't believe it's the animals fault it's the owners fault when a dog bites or is aggressive. Law enforcement should be involved and assess whether the owners or potentially abusing the animal, which is causing the aggressive behaviour.
- My sisters dog and dad were attacked and the owners left and we couldn't find them after
- Only if there is no immediate potential of the dog being euthanized
- The owner may have to leave the scene to remove the animal but should leave their contact info
- Owners should be held accountable

- If it is safe for the parties involved they should remain. However exceptions should be made if the dog is injured or is not able to be settled at the scene. In this case contact information should be left in some way.
- If there is an incident that draws blood, and both or either guardian HONESTLY believe it was malicious: both parties should wait for an enforcement officer.
- This could be the only way to gain the owner's information
- Important to stay just like a car accident. Unfortunately I think these situations always blame the dog so owners are scared to stay and fear having their dog taken away or they feel that their dog acted appropriately to the situation that unfolded.
- Accountability is key and if they are required to remain, then the real story comes out when you piece the two together.
- Unless immediate medical attention by either dog or person is needed, it should be similar to how car accidents are handled.
- Owners need to be held responsible for dogs that hurt other dogs or people
- Its the mature thing to do.
- Dogs like humans have different temperaments I think it's important for the owners to be able to defend the animal, for example if another dog was off leash and came up to a nuisance dog who was on leash and the nuisance dog lashed out it is not fair to punish the nuisance dog as the other owners were responsible.
- If someone or a pet is injured and the dog behaved this way out of random aggression then yes, this seems appropriate.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs. Dogs are only as good as the owners who train them!
- A responsible owner should do this anyway. A rule should not be required and it's unfortunate that one is, so I support such a rule.
- The owner should have to provide his info and be able to provide vaccination records for his dog. Any damages made by the offending dog should be covered by its owner e.i. vet bills, property damage, doctor's bills, etc
- How else can you track dangerous dogs/ irresponsible owners
- How is this any different then leaving the scene of a vehicle accident?! If the owner of the offending dog leaves without exchanging information they should be criminally charged as they would leaving any accident. I'm shocked this isn't already illegal.
- Owners should always take responsibility for any harm their animal may cause
- so discussions can take place as to who pays the vet bill. it is ridiculous that it is ASSUMED the owner of the biting dog will pay. where did that come from and when?
- Thought that was already the case is someone got hurt.
- it is the responsible thing to do. Otherwise, how could the victim press charges etc, especially if they are hurt.
- same as any other offense

- Yes the pet owner is ultimately responsible for the actions of their animals and should stay if there is an incident where an enforcement officer needs to be called. I assumed this would have already been the standard.
- Like a car accident you need to stay at the scene of the crime ESPECIALLY if you are the owner to help communicate what happened
- At minimum, they should be sharing contact information with the owner of the affected dog (if it was a dog that was bitten), or person that was affected (if the person was bitten)
- If both parties agree to walk away and let it be, they have the right to do so. But someone shouldn't be able to just walk away if the other party isn't agreeing. Moving their dog away a bit, considering the incident is understandable. But they shouldn't leave entirely without sharing information in case medical issues come up.
- treat it like any other incident ex car accidents
- Just like a vehicular accident, stay at the scene of the accident until assessment is completed.
- Unless there is such a rule that can be enforced, dog owners may flee the scene to avoid legal consequences
- I've seen owners pretend it didn't happen or blame the person attacked (or owner of other animal attacked.)
- The owner should show accountability
- Many times when a dog attacks or bites a person or other animal the owners leave.
- no
- If they are requested to stay to give their information to law enforcement, they should have to stay to do so.
- Dogs who bite may or may not be to blame. The only way to deal with these matters is to discuss what happened and determine the level of threat that does or does not exist. A lot of times animals who bite are not well socialized, trained, or are highly anxious animals. It's about the owner, dog, and involved party equally.
- It is important that owners take responsibility for the actions of their pet and the potential cost of veterinary care in the case of a serious attack.
- The owner is responsible and needs to be held liable. Contact information should be exchanged and there should be an incident report.
- The requirement to remain at the scene of an incident makes sense, as long as it is safe to do so. (If someone has to leave in order to remove their dog from a situation if it can't be calmed down, then there should be an option for contacting enforcement within a certain time frame to declare themselves the owner of a dog who bit a person or animal and take responsibility for the incident.)
- If there is a serious dog bite incident I feel that exchanging information would be valuable for the same purpose it would serve following a car accident.
- People must be held accountable for their pets behaviour but this should include all dog bite incidents even regarding small dogs
- It is called responsibility.
- ALL PET OWNERS should be responsible for their animals!

- Common decency
- Obviously you should be required to stay and discuss with an officer.
- Well this is the type of thing that makes sense. Focus more on measures like this.
- "A vast majority of Bull Breed owners take on these miss understood breeds and need to have the opportunity to explain why the incident has occurred. Do I agree that there are people who miss treat loyal breeds and use them for an aggressive purpose??? ABSOLUTELY. Sadly that's not the dogs fault that they are so loyal to their owners. Those of us who understand and work hard to be educated on signs of stress, over stimulation, or feeling threatened for our dog need to have the opportunity to address these issues that may have occurred and created the opportunity for a bite. Whether it's a kid or the pet. At the end of the day the damage caused by ANY breed of dog is 90% due to pet owner training, lack of education, lack of time spent with their pet, and not teaching their own friends/family/strangers and neighbors how to properly approach their pet. It is solely our responsibility to look out for these possible situations and recognize the danger WE are putting our pets Into.
- If you have a reactive, nervous, temperamental, easily over stimulated dog, then why on earth are you taking it to a dog park, why on earth are you expecting it not to defend it self or react to things that make it u comfortable.
- We would never turn our children loose or take them to places that cause stress so why are people doing this with their dogs."
- Only if safe to do so, or they can provide contact info to someone over the phone.
- Yes, definitely. The owner should take responsibility, but this may be a one off and they fear for their dog.
- I believe any responsible pet owner would do this anyways, creating a fine for the irresponsible ones and provide more accountability for irresponsible owners is important.
- The owner should be responsible for the bite. Also, the dog should do obedience training after the incident.
-  I think if it is a serious/ vicious bite (not an accidental bite to another dog while playing), then similar to a traffic issue the individuals involved should wait/ share contact info as needed.
- Both sides of each story need to be heard and considered. Too many biased situations and he said she said. Right now people are scared to stay BECAUSE of these HORRIBLE breed specific legislation though so good luck.
- The victim should have a way to follow up if necessary. However, pitbulls and bully breeds should not be treated differently from other breeds. Animal behaviour specialists should be an active part of case handling, and enforcement officers should not have the power to require euthanasia.
- I'm surprised this isn't already a bylaw
- I have 2 dogs. I would stay if there was an incident and I would expect the same. That's responsible dog ownership.
- Dog owners, like parents are responsible for their pets/offspring actions and should be required to remain on scene of an incident.

- Depending on how severe the bite is the victim could need stitches. It is also important that all dogs are registered and therefore need to have a record if they have bitten people.
- I cannot believe that this is not currently a rule in place
- only if it is safe to do so
- The dog's behaviour is the responsibility of its owner.
- The owner and those around at the time should stay to clearly provide a case of what happened. This includes other witnesses, and must be FACT BASED
- A responsible dog owner should be there to tell their side of what happen. There is always two sides to a story
- The vast majority of these instances appear to be negligent owners. All parties involved need to be spoken to.
- Dog behavior is, in large part, the responsibility of the owner
- The owner should stay at the scene do to get information just in case the animal has a certain disease or rabies that the owner is not aware of or it's the animal or person was bad enough that they could go through insurance to get their bills paid especially for vet bills cuz they're a very expensive.
- Dogs are our babies and just as a parent would be on and apart of any emergency with their children pet owners should be present for their animals as well.
- For the fairness and a good assessment of the situation, both parties should be present to discuss the situation.
- The owner should stay and share their information like any other accident
- I feel it's important for the dog owner to be held accountable for the actions of their animal.
- Owner must be held accountae for the actions of their dog.
- Dog bites are serious and should be treated seriously.
- Just to possibly help or contribute to any vet bills
- The owner must stay there unless the dog is a potential risk to everyone else around.
- I think this seems like a fair route to go, so long as it is dependent on the severity of the bite, and can be appropriately regulated.
- I do believe bits should be reported but everything is circumstantial
- If the owner leaves the scene they should be fined like a driver that leaves the scene of a motor vehicle accident.
- Communication is key
- Yes because owners should be in control of their dogs at all times and of a dog is ownerless then it was not under control or within control reach.
- Dogs are an owner's responsibility. What their dog does is their problem.
- Owners are responsible for their pets and their actions so much like you'd expect someone who caused a car accident to remain at the scene, pet owners should be required to remain at the scene of any incidents their animals cause
- Is this not common sense? Why is this even a question

- Same as an accident
- The dog owner is just that...an owner. As such, when their property (dog) creates a disturbance they should be available to provide their details.
- It's the same a car accident. If your property causes damage then you must be held responsible.
- I have seen and heard of too many situations where the offending dog and owner run away. Then victim has a heck of a time finding the offending owner. Exchange of information is so important when dealing with bite and injuries.
- This should be a given. Unfortunately it isn't. There should be a fine for leaving the scene.
- ANY breed that bites either a person or another dog, the owner should be present for. This includes small breeds such as chihuahuas and pugs. Not just limit to large dog breeds.
- Responsible pet owners must take ownership of their dog's actions.
- Similar to a car accident, it should be classed as a hit and run otherwise. If a pet has been attacked there will be costs associated.
- Absolutely an OWNER should be held responsible for the actions of their pet and stay to speak with an officer if there was an incident.
- If the severity was at large, one dog may be injured and it's that dog owner that should have to cover vet bills
- Why not? The owner can actually explain the situation and call out if the reasoning was from a person being stupid or not.
- They might just leave and get away with it
- We have to be accountable and responsible.
- They should be responsible for any costs associated with trauma.
- Both parties should be present to assist in a proper investigation. However, the aggressive dog must be kept a safe distance away from the victim so as not to escalate the situation.
- The owner is responsible for the behaviour of the dog and it's not different than staying on the scene of an accident.
- It's common sense
- its important to make sure proper steps are taken and that the owner takes responsibility
- It is the responsible thing to do?
- Responsibility of owner for dog behaviour.
- The person should remain at the scene, but the animal needs to go to a safe place while decisions are being made.
- The person should, at minimum, give accurate contact information, however, if a dog is being aggressive, keeping that dog at the scene might make a bad situation worse.
- If a dog bites, the contact info should be required from the owner
- It should be the same logic/reasoning as motor vehicle collisions.
- thats the right thing to do !!?
- I think if the individual dog has bite then the owner should be punished, after all they are the ones raising the dog it's not the breed its the irresponsible owners. Dont blame the poor breed

- If a dog bites someone, the owner should stay until officers arrive
- The owner should be present to explain what they witnessed in the incident
- they should at least give contact information to the person or owner in case of injury
- A dog owner is responsible for their dog. This includes small, medium or large dogs and all bites should be treated with the seriousness they entail.
- If you crash your car into someone you wait. Your pet and their actions are your responsibility
- As a dog owner , I believe, just like our kids , we always have a responsibility to their behaviour. A dog attack , be it on human or another animal, the costs can be high.
- When you hit someone with your car, you must stay at the scene to make sure the victim is okay and exchange contact details. Why is this different for dogs? Just the same that you are in control of a moving vehicle, you are in control of your dog
- If damage is done to the other person/animal, it should be the responsibility of the one who caused/allowed it, same as in vehicle collisions.
- A dog owner is responsible for their dog. This should include any and all breeds, not just large dogs.
- Similar actions would be taken in a car accident why not a dog bite accident!
- No matter the breed of the dog, the owner should 100% provide contact information if there is an attack or bite.
- I think that this would provide a better source of data on incidents. It would provide better breed identification and more detail in what lead up to the incident as both parties statements would be recorded.
- I think it should be based on the severity of the bite. Some dogs may just nip and have a cranky owner, in that case just an exchange of information would be fine. Of course if it's a severe bite then yes, the owner needs to stay there.
- A person should definitely be penalized if they do not stay on scene to exchange information with the person who is bit/whose animal was bit.
- If a bite happens, all parties should have the opportunity to explain why the incident occurred and the events leading up to it.
- All disciplinary measures should be targeted to the owner(s) involved in a given incident, particularly if it avoids needlessly broad rules (e.g., rules that begin with "All pit bulls must...").
- Safety and accountability
- I think there should be a requirement for owners of dogs that have attacked and nuisance dogs (NOT pit bull or breed specific) to leave information and in some cases carry insurance for potential victims of attacks).
- I think this is about ownership of the incident. People need to take responsibility for their pets.
- If it happens, discuss potential medical issues involved
- This question is not clear due to the conjunction. Contact information should be exchanged always. enforcement should only be engaged as required. I see this like a car accident. Information should be exchanged so that the party suffering damages can assess (including speaking to a vet or doctor if necessary) and then follow up. Those two parties can choose to then part ways or engage authorities if needed.

- but the bylaw needs to understand dog behavior, their needs to be a voice for the pet not just one bylaw officer
- The owner should remain at the scene of an incident to share contact information
- If mutually agreed that it is or isn't necessary by both parties. What's necessary can be determined prior to the law being put into effect.
- Any dog owner who would choose to leave the scene after their dog bites a person or animal is someone who should not own dogs or any pet . Seriously irresponsible to leave the scene .
- Seems to make sense, just like a car accident.
- This only works if the owner is present at the incident.
- Best to explain what, when, where and why it happened upon occurrence rather than going thru tribunal review which can falsely claim events
- See above answer to question 4
- Full circumstances should be heard, otherwise dogs and owners may be penalized unfairly for actions that may have been defensive and not offensive.
- This means that the owner is held responsible for not training their pet properly. DO NOT BLAME THE DOG.
- A bite is a bite, contact information is a must!0
- Ensure everyone is ok, vaccinate up to date and enforcement followup
- Only if a dog bites a person and there is trauma caused to that person should this be necessary.
- If there are injuries caused (skin breaking, bleeding, etc)
- If the owner leaves the scene there is no way to follow up or ensure that the owner is held responsible for their dogs actions.
- You are responsible for your dog and should be there to make sure the other person / dog is ok.
- Accountability for the actions of their lack of responsible pet ownership.
- All involved parties should file a report
- People need to be responsible for their dogs and any time a bite occurs an investigation of rabies prophylaxis should occur.
- It would depend on the severity Of the bite. I think just like fender benders sometimes intervention may be helpful or not necessary.
- This should be treated no different than a hit and run type of scenario. Severe fines should be handed out if information is not given, regardless and on top of any other fines administered.
- it only makes sense. Perhaps your dog wasn't the aggressor. There always two sides.
- How else could the dog be declared a problem if the owner and dog can walk away?
- Perhaps there needs to be some guidelines around when an owner should stay present at the scene to have a universal clear understanding of when it is necessary to exchange info
- There needs to be a record . If there is another attack they can not lie and say it's the first time and the owner and dog will be known
- Owners need to be accountable for their animal. It also depends on the bite. Viscious unprovoked bites are what concern me.

- Stay at the scene to stop confusion of the case
- It's not always the owner/dogs fault if they attack. I've had more incidents with off leash dogs that owners let run about come at me & my dog and my big dog is afraid of smaller breeds now. Just because my dog is a certain breed or bigger don't mean it's mean, sometimes they are just scared. I'm constantly moving my dog out of the way of small dogs that come running at her. For some reason people think little dogs are safer. I've been bit as well as my son by only small dogs.
- That's what a responsible dog owner should do
- Owners should be accountable for incidents involved with their dog, in the same way they are accountable at the scene of a car accident.
- Yes as long as it is done in a timely fashion
- if a dog bites another animal or person the owner won't want to give information
- if there are injuries or traumas the pet owner should be held accountable
- If the dog is no longer a threat, then stay. Do not punish the VICTIM for leaving.
- Accountability- only if skin broken and "victim" indicates necessary
- Must be held responsible
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs similar to drivers of vehicles
- I was shocked to discover that this currently wasn't required? It seems morally and ethically correct but I think if there was something legally enforcing this, that would be fantastic! We all need to be accountable.
- Since the bite could cause damage requiring the intervention of healthcare or animal hospital and the animal owner should be held responsible.
- Any dog owner should take responsibility for their dog regardless of its actions.
- Individuals should be held responsible.
- Owner accountability
- The owner needs to be responsible.
- I'm surprised this isn't already a rule
- Owners are responsible for their animals behavior, like they are their children's behavior and their own behavior. If they damaged someone's car, they have to provide insurance info. Same if an animal does damage to a person or property.
- Maybe not remain at the scene, but I do think it's important to exchange information between the parties involved to Be informed if the animal who bit is fully vaccinated. I think this should be punishable by a fine if the pets doesn't exchange info and worthy of investigation.
- This enables dog records to be verified. Also there are many perspectives - the dog may have been teased or threatened by the victim. The owner must stay at the scene as this is "an accident".
- Yes as it can go on record.
- I feel the least offending party can do is to provide proof of dog's vaccination records and have the incident recorded.
- All sides of the story need to be heard

- How is this not a rule already or why is this not common sense? If my pet hurt anyone or anything it should be expected that the situation would be handled before I leave the scene. It sounds like if the person is leaving prior to resolving the issue, than the issue isn't the pet but rather the owner.
- The owner should be responsible for their dogs behaviour. Be good to see if this is a repeat offence or if it has its vaccinations
- If a dog bites a person, it is the OWNERS responsibility to take the blame and they should be held accountable.
- A dog biting another person or animal is a serious community concern and should be reported so that the animal and owner can be monitored for future situations. If the owner is allowed to leave they may not be able to be contacted later.
- There is a possibility if a dog owner does not stay at the scene, he/she may deny being there in the first place.
- Yes if you are involved in an incident you should have to stay until it's properly reported
- If the owner of the attack dog bites another dog, they should be responsible for the vet bills.
- There have been lots of cases of owners leaving to avoid legal issues. It should be treated with the severity of a hit and and run.
- I was attacked in a small county in Idaho by 7 dogs, that ran off someone's property into the community street, as a teenager. The owners needed to be held responsible to prevent further attacks. None of the dogs were put down, but the owners were charged for housing the dogs while they were tested for diseases and the dogs, who were not up to date on any of their shots, were given all their shots at the owners expense. The owners were also required to put a fence up and house the dogs properly so they could no longer run off the property and into the neighborhood. As a dog owner, you absolutely need to take responsibility for damage caused by your dog, remain at the scene, and talk to enforcement if someone is bitten.
- Yes, owner needs to be held responsible
- To help with insurance and monitoring bad dogs
- Yes. I think that if there is a bite then it would be similar to a car accident as well I think the offending dog should be required to do additional training after.
- Common sense
- Dog owners should be held responsible for their dogs, REGARDLESS OF THEIR BREED
- It's part of being responsible for your pet.
- Absolutely necessary
- Why does this need an explanation. Really?
- This question is very situational. If the dog got loose or slipped out of its collar, yes the owner is responsible for whatever happens. If the dog was being provoked or approached without permission from the owner, it is not the dog's fault and the owner should not be held responsible.
- A dog's behaviour is a reflection of the owner, not the breed of the dog. Owners are responsible for training their dog, and should be held responsible for any incidents and should stay to answer any questions.

- If you are involved in a vehicle accident and leave the scene you will be criminally charged. If an animal in your charge causes injury you need to be responsible and explain the situation and be on record if that behavior intensifies.
- It is disgusting that you are considering attacking the pit bull breed like this. Shame. Do not make special requirements for breeds.
- Only if it's safe for all parties to do so.
- Responsible owners would stay around regardless of a bite or not.
- There are far too many incidents with owners not remaining at the scene.
- Owner must take responsibility for dogs' behaviour.
- I think it's crucial for everyone present to provide a recap of the incident t
- It would be similar to a car accident. Both parties should stay on site.
- People need to take responsibility of their dog if it injures another dog or person and should have to pay for those medical expenses.
- Yes, like a car accident.
- There needs to be an immediate explanation at the scene. Please ensure your enforcement officer is NOT AFRAID OF THE ANIMAL(s) or the people.
- The owner is responsible and should not attempt to flee the scene.
- Similar to a car accident
- I absolutely think people should take responsibility for their pets and themselves.
- Depending on the scenario. If the animal is in distress from the incident, remaining at the scene will cause further distress to the animal and it's owner and should be allowed to leave the scene. I agree with the owner sharing their contact information to an enforcement officer as a mediator, not directly to the other party involved.
- It's like a car accident. No one should leave until officials have said so
- The dogs are not at fault owners are..
- I feel that all dogs have the potential to be dangerous and mean, it's not breed specific. In fact some of the meanest dogs I've come across are small breeds such as chihuahuas, poodles and shitzu's. All dog owners need to be responsible owners no matter the breed and going after breed specific dogs show a lack of knowledge when it comes to specific breeds.
- Can't control the dog punish the onwer
- Hear both sides of the story before judging
- A dog is as good as it's owner - the animal is not responsible for their actions the owner is. An animal does not understand our rules and regulations, they act on instincts, fears... etc. It is an owner's responsibility to advocate for their animal, or take responsibility for the actions because of bad training, abuse or lack of care of an anxious or aggressive animal.
- I would support this if the bite was severe. I know the difficulty would then lie in quantifying that but I think requiring the owner to stay would help to gather relevant facts and information. It would hopefully help all parties come to a better resolution.
- I support rules that encourage owners to be responsible, rather than needlessly penalizing we'll behaved dogs of particular breeds.

- Only if blood is drawn
- Unless owner cannot safely contain the dog in order to stay
- The same as a car accident. The owner should stay to explain the incident and to ensure what was bitten is ok
- Hold them responsible for their pets actions and charge them like you would if they ran from a motor veichle accident.
- Owners need to be accountable.
- BREED SPECIFIC LEGISLATION IS CRIMINAL!!!!!! I'm not explaining my answer here when there's nowhere to say the above.
- This is an irresponsible dog owner. They must own up to their poor handlings of their dog and offer information and to pay any vet bills that may arise from the injuries caused to the other dog.
- Aggressive dogs need to be stopped in this city. We need to identify people who promote these dogs.
- Offenders know who they are and the majority will try to leave
- An owner should be held accountable if their individual dog has attacked someone/something.
- It would be no different than if it was an motor vehicle accident.
- Pet owners need to be responsible for their pets
- You should probably say your side
- Hit and run is not different than bite and run/hide
- It's important to get both sides of the story sand find out of the dog was provoked in any way or not
- It is the individuals responsibility to share their contact info and talk with an enforcement officer.
- This is necessary but in many instances remaining at the scene is not appropriate as the other parties involved may be going to a hospital/ vet clinic. Additionally the dog that was attacking may not be safe to remain out. In these cases the dog owner should provide appropriate contact information and not remain
- Owners are responsible for their pet and actions, so need to stay in scene and take accountability
- Biting is rarely the fault of the animal, so the owner should be present to explain the situation and the dog's history, as both are highly relevant to any such situation
- Absolutely, just like a car accident. Gotta stay at the scene of a crime.
- The owner must take responsibility for their animal
- You should have to remain on scene just like a car accident
- Promotes accountability.
- It is very important that the owner stays at the scene and has their dog under control. Too often they try to take off and you have no way of contacting them. This is especially true if you end up with a large vet bill.
- Accountability is important
- Absolutely, it should be treated the same as a car accident, including fines associated if they do not
- I would imagine responsible owners do this already
- If you can't leave a car accident you shouldn't leave an animal accident!

- information needs to be shared for correct course of action. Except when the owner needs to take the animal home or to a vehicle to remove them from a situation
 - "By requiring the owner of the animal to remain at the scene where an incident has occurred, this rule in question would promote the accurate reporting of facts and would prevent the mislabeling and misrepresentation of breeds as ""dangerous"".
 - Not all people are familiar with or able to identify certain dog breeds. Having the the owner remain at the scene, where they are able to clarify the breed of their dog or, at the very least, provide additional facts, promotes the accurate reporting of data and information."
 - If there is trauma (broken skin) to either a person or a dog the owner should remain at the scene, unless the dog is being uncooperative and aggressive. If there is just a scuffle between dogs there is no need for information exchanged.
 - accountability
 - If your dog causes an injury, it is your responsibility and you should be held accountable.
 - Owner must take accountability for incident.
 - Yes, but this has nothing to do with the breed of the dog.
 - "If a dog/person that was bitten sustained severe damage, then yes, that would be the responsibility to the owner to deal with the situation.
- Also, in regards to increasing limitations on pit bulls is ignorant. Smaller dogs statistically are more aggressive than bigger breeds. Also singling out only pit bulls instead of Rottweilers or Dobermans for instance, who have the same capability for causing damage, is not fair. When in actuality, it is all how you train and handle these animals that governs their behavior. Maybe instead of all these restrictions, look into training classes for owners, breeders, and adoption services. That way it could deter people from adopting, and therefore a decrease in ownership. Or seeing a decrease in bad behavior."
 - That way there can be more tracking done on the dogs. If a dog is dangerous to anyone then there should be consequences, if it's not then it should not be treated any different just because of its breed.
 - This will allow everything to be sorted more efficiently.
 - Owners should be held responsible, it's very rare it's the dogs fault. If you as the person owner know you have a problem pet, should be responsible for keeping that said pet away from dog parks, pathways with lots of people etc. It's usually human fault and not the pets. There are some circumstances and these need to be looked at and addressed. No matter what the breed is.
 - Owners should be responsible
 - As long as it is any dog. Equality should be equal.
 - Owners need to take responsibility for their pets behavior.
 - But only if the person who has been bitten or had their animal bitten feels is is necessary.

- This should be treated like a car accident. People should take pictures and get witnesses. The current standard is simply he said she said and results in dogs being wrongfully punished for something they may not have even done. Owners of the offending dog should also be liable for any bills the victim requires.
- People need to be responsible if their animal bites or attacks. Leaving the scene should only be allowed if there is an injury
- If a dog of any breed bites, the owner should have to stay and talk to a law enforcement officer, make sure the other individual is alright, that they get medical care if needed.
- Take responsibility for your actions.
- This should happen with every species
- Pet owners need to be held accountable when injuries occur.
- If a person's dog bites another person or animal, they need to take responsibility for it.
- I believe that if harm has been done by a dog it is the owner's responsibility to handle the situation appropriately. Make sure that whoever was affected is okay and proceed with law enforcement to determine the outcome of the situation.
- To actually find out what happened with factors contributing not always within the blamed dog's control. For example small dogs can be fairly aggressive and not controlled by the owner same with kids who should be patented and not allowed to approach a strange dog. These both examples have happened while out walking my Shepard Lab cross
- The animal's actions are at least in part a reflection of the owner's care, therefore the owner themselves are just as if not more responsible.
- How else are you to track them down?
- Good dog owners are always with their dogs.
- Because that's what responsible pet owners do.
- If your a dog bites someone you need to be responsible for it.
- Once the dog attacks or bites another person, even if it is the owner, it automatically gets euthanized. No questions asked!
- If there is need to follow up or concern
- Yes, because dogs and their owners go unpunished if they just "bite and run". Just like motor vehicles, they need to stay and have fines/punishments applied before taking off.
- It's like remaining at an accident scene until the police arrive.
- Any responsible dog owner should stay at the scene of an incident. It is sad that this needs to be a law.
- The owner needs to be present when a report is filed to ensure all facts are documented
- I believe dog owners are responsible for ensuring that their dog does no harm to a person, property, or another animal. In order to ensure that dog owners are following the appropriate bylaws, they should be required to remain at the scene of an incident (similar to an operator of a motor vehicle being required to stay at the scene of an accident).
- Yes because some incidents can cost a lot at the vet and it's unfair for the owner to have to pay if someone's else's dog attacked theirs

- Owner needs to be responsible and accountable
- I once witnessed a dog bite a 6 year old boy unprovoked and then the owner and dog fled.
- Absolutely, they need to take responsibility for their dog's behaviour. Vet bills should be paid for by the owner of the dog that attacked.
- I think it should be similar to a car insurance claim, if the bite is serious enough that it could need medical attention for an animal or human then they should be liable for the damages
- I think this is a good idea, but only if the incident met certain conditions. Was it a provoked incident? Was blood drawn? Will a vet be required?
- if necessary
- It is important that both sides of the story are understood. Sometimes people approach the dog without asking the owner if the dog is alright with it. The public needs to be educated in this manner, some dogs can't be trained to adore everyone and some have previous trauma that keeps them from approaching certain individuals.
- You are responsible for your dogs behaviour
- It isn't the dogs fault but the owner make owner responsible
- Owner should have to wait for officer if the person bitten or parent calls for an officer. In any bite situation the pet owner should have to give the person their personal contact information/licence number
- Not unlike a car accident both sides have a story and the truth is often in the middle. Both parties should be available to give statements and it does the dog owner no favours by leaving the scene.
- Too many pitbull owners don't want to risk having their dog euthanized, so they hide ! Once a pitbull attacks once !! It's going to attack again , this is a fact that Pitbulls owners deny !
- It is the responsibility of all parties involved to remain at the scene and to give authorities a statement through their lens to determine what happened.
- Of course. The animal has been involved in an emergency. Just as a witness must stay at the scene of a crime so too must the dog's owner remain and be held accountable UNLESS the injuries to animal/human require going to a vet or hospital before an officer can arrive. But information should still be exchanged as should witness information.
- Only if necessary. People's sensitivity towards dog behaviour is extremely variable.
- Our pit bull mix was attacked by 3 dogs and they left the scene. It cost us $800 at the vet and there was no way to claim. FYI - our dog was not aggressive at all but is considered in City plans as aggressive/nuisance.
- It's the responsible thing to do!
- How else would you gather the necessary information to identify potential nuisance animals?
- Provide both accounts of the situation
- If there are any injuries especially to get the owners information and statement and any necessary reports in case vet bills are required in the case of an injured animal
- Dogs only bite when provoked. Safety for both parties is the foremost concern, and proof of vaccination against rabies etc must be provided. I do not believe police should be involved, Animal experts would be a better choice.

- no explanation needed
- An individual dog should be assessed and owner itself should be assessed for risks associated with possible risk for harming again. It is the dog owners responsibility to ensure their dog is safe in the community
- We need accountability
- It's already the responsibility of the pet owner to stay at the scene or provide contact details for an incident.
- Yes, we need ways of keeping track of the irresponsible owners and possibly dangerous dogs.
- I think it's important they stay, unless doing so would be of higher risk. For example an aggressive dog at large, caught but not under control, should not stay at the scene of a bite incident.
- Wouldn't anything else be "bite-and-run"? Huge fines should be issued for anyone who leaves the scene of the incident, but bylaw response must be timely (can't make people wait for an hour).
- A health history is important to any dog bite victim
- the dog owner should be able to defend their dog in the instance of a person provoking the dog. Dogs do not attack without reason.
- "I think the owner of any animal should be held accountable for the actions of the animal. Not just dogs. Especially not just ""pitbulls"" as you have been referring to them.
- Yes. You stay at the site. Is that not common sense?"
- Dog owners always need to be accountable for their dog's behaviour
- Sharing information helps to find out why the dog is biting and if it is being abused at home
- Stay or give contact information to be able to take the dog out of the situation and still be able to talk about the incident.
- If the bite is serious enough and they seek medical attention
- If their dog bit someone, you should stay with the injured party to ensure they are ok and don't require further assistance.
- As long as there is a requirement for both parties to remain civil and cooperative. No one has to stay in a abusive situation.
- Yes the owner should be there to assist in the investigation, it is not always the dogs fault
- "People who should stay:
 - Owner of dog
 - Person who got bit
 - A witness of there are any
- Some people provoke and abuse dogs and the dog retaliates. Also if the dog bites unprovoked a witness would be helpful to determine who is in the wrong."
- Basic responsibility.
- Pet owners are responsible for training and behavioral issues. They should maintain responsibility for any attacks or incidents
- Yes
- Of course, just like a car accident, be civil and exchange info. Talk to witnesses.

- If your animal attacks another animal or person, they have not been trained right. No animal is naturally aggressive, except small dogs like chihuahuas. The owner is at fault for an attack, they definitely should wait and talk to an officer.
- Dog ownership requires responsibility and accountability for your animal
- As long as it's safe to do so. False claims can be made against anyone who takes off.
- Obviously????
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their dog, this includes providing necessary information to ensure safety and follow-up for the victim and proper actions taken for the dog and owner
- Shouldn't be any different than leaving the scene of a car accident.
- It is asking too much of a person who might have been injured by an animal to have to follow the owner home in order to obtain necessary information.
- Owners should be held accountable for being poor owners. They should provide information in order to track if they respect the obligation they took on by being a dog owner.
- Dog owners need to be held much more accountable for. Or training or have control of their animals.
- If a dog bites someone regardless of size or breed, it is the owner's responsibility. It should be treated like a car accident. You have to stay on scene until otherwise told.
- The owner knows the dog the best, and the dog is most comfortable with their owner. It can help the dog not be as stressful, and the owner can give accurate information about the dog.
- It's important to be responsible for your pets actions. However, I do not support punishing an animal before the crime and forcing certain breeds to wear muzzles. I am a pitbull owner and my dog is the sweetest most friendly dog ever. She's been attacked 5 times and never fought back. Please stop dog racism!!
- It prevents people from fleeing or failing to understand appropriate next steps.
- You, as the owner, are responsible for the dog. Owners should be held responsible to properly train their dogs, the dogs should not be punished for what their owners failed to do.
- There needs to be accountability for irresponsible dog owners.
- Don't flee the scene. Pretty standard for any injury accidents
- Common courtesy
- I've heard first hand heard from many of my neighbours and family that dog owners of vicious dogs often RUN after their dog attacks another dog. There should be a rule to implement that they are required to stay and when they are caught/tracked down - there should be a higher fine for running much like a hit and run of a vehicle accident.
- So long as it's safe to do so (i.e. the animal isn't going to harm anyone else), the owner should remain at the scene. If they can't do so, then providing valid contact details to the other party before leaving is a must.
- It's the responsibility of any pet owner to answer to their animals behaviour. Remaining at the scene of an incident is an extension of that responsibility
- The owner is responsible for the actions of the animal. Therefore, any luck of obedience is upon the owner.
- They should have to take responsibility.

- They are responsible for the safety of the dog and others
- Dogs do not randomly attack or show aggressive behaviour, it is trained or learned. This could help to expose incompetent dog owners if they are held responsible for their dog's actions against other people or animals.
- Same concept as a vehicle hit and run, especially when there is an injury.
- Common sense
- Yes, everyone should take ownership if their dog bites.
- Too many people don't take responsibility
- The dog is considered property and bad owners should be responsible for their actions
- Na
- It's better for the owner to stay there to tell them their side of the story, there is always two sides to every story and if the owner doesn't stay it could lead to the dog being taken away for improper information. Dogs just like any animal will defend them selves and there owners if they feel threatened and accidents happen we can't blame and animal for doing what there instincts tell them to do. It's our choice to own animals but our responsibility to train them correctly and to treat them with respect and not abuse.
- The dog is the responsibility of the owner. In addition, an owner can give more explanation to potential reasons why the dog attacked. For example, if the dog had no history of aggression, why would this type of attack have happened, and if it can be tracked back to a particular reason, why that dog may or may not attack in the future (i.e avoidable behavior).
- "1)People are responsible for their dogs actions
- 2)dog can not explain its own actions"
- The owner must be held responsible, especially in the case that they should be on file. If the owner is having repeated negative interactions, especially if it's a violent interaction, I think it's important to both fine owner and possibly have other punitive actions
- An owner shouldn't be able to leave the scene of the incident, just like in motor vehicle accidents.
- Responsibility for your animal's actions should be emphasized.
- People need to take responsibility for their pets
- They need to take the responsibility for there pet
- As a dog owner we are responsible for the behavior of our animals just as we are of our cars.
- The owner of the dog that bites should be held accountable for medical bills of the person or animal that was bit.
- But how do we make them stay there?
- Yes. Always should the owners of both parties be present to exchange valid info and be held accountable for any vet bills associated
- This should only be used for the purpose of ensuring both parties have resolved any actions that wish to be taken. This rule should not be implemented to allow the City to mandate control of an animal, or decision on how to treat the animal.
- Only if skin is broken on person or vet is required to other animal

- They need to be held responsible and it's very important to know if their dog is up to date on their shots¹
- I agree to let the pet owner to hold the responsibility of the pets' behaviour.
- How else can the offender and the dog be identified if they leave the scene?
- If your dog bites someone then it is your responsibility.
- Liability
- If a dog bites another animal, vet bills can be expensive. Bad owners make bad dogs and that owner should be responsible for that.
- The owner is responsible for their animal and should be present during a claim being filed. It's important to have multiple witnesses in these cases.
- This is a no brainer...should be treated the same as fleeing the scene of a vehicular accident.
- In case vet bills need to be paid
- I do agree that if a bite occurs all of the above action suggested in question 5 should be taken
- Similar to a car accident where neither parties intended for something to occur; it must be handled appropriately
- a person but could need medical care that could potentially cost them money.
- I think they should assuming it is safe to do so. If not, I don't think there is anything wrong with leaving as long as information has been shared
- need to know if bite was provoked or accident
- That's a responsibility as a responsible pet owner
- makes it easier if they have to go to court
- It's important for dog owners to be responsible for their pets.
- The owner needs to take responsibility.
- This aspect of citizenship and responsibility is important in order for a more complete, equitable, and just understanding of the situation only when all parties are actively involved in reporting incidents could appropriate resolutions be found.
- Heck yes if there is an incident.. then you remain.. you and your dog might be the victims/maybe not clear or your dog is the aggressor. like a hit and run you need to stay or its a criminal violation
- their dog caused damage, they should be liable for any expenses
- Yes, this is necessary so that vaccine information can be shared and if another animal is injured and requires medical attention, they can help with the bill.
- I only agree if the bite was severe and unprovoked or was provoked no matter how severe the bite. If a stranger did not listen to an owners commands and proceeded to provoke the dog, I believe that person should receive a fine for animal abuse
- if the dog bites someone unprovoked and not in defence of themselves or their owner then the owner should have to stay on the scene. if the dog bit someone in defence of themselves or their owner then the owner and dog should be allowed to leave for their own safety.
- The situation has to be explained in case the dog was provoked which led to the attack which shouldn't be a punishable offence

- You are responsible for your dog
- Yes, the owner is responsible.
- People need to be accountable for their pets actions, they need to train them and care for them and if they don't, they must be accountable.
- It should be similar to a car accident, where the owners need to exchange information and have a bylaw officer some and fill out a report.
- If the owner is there, they should stay at the scene.
- I've seen or heard of too many people giving false information to the owner of the injured pets or they just choose to leave as if nothing happened. Owners need to held accountable.
- It's the same as a traffic accident. Often, owners of dogs who bite take off to avoid consequences.
- Absolutely contact info should be exchanged so that there can be follow up to ensure the victim recovers and that the dog owner receives, at minimum, an opportunity to be educated on responsible pet ownership.
- I believe the owner is still responsible for their dog. If a child bit another child they would stay on scene I'm sure.
- In most cases, there is more to the story and the owner should be there to explain it. Sometimes the dog could have been provoked
- Same as hit and run accidents
- In my opinion, it is usually the owner that is to blame for aggressive dogs, so the owner needs to be held to a higher standard.
- You never know. Although if dog is in care and control by the owner or authorized individual then it must be determined on a case by case basis
- It's important for the owner to remain at the scene and be held accountable. It's also important for an officer to hear all the facts about the incident from ALL parties involved.
- All responsible dog owners should remain at the scene to explain what happened and provide vaccination history for proper medical care.
- Owners are responsible for their behavior
- This should be at the discretion of the victim. If person is unable to speak or animal does not have a present owner, then yes.
- It is always the owner that manages the environment and past learning history of the dog.
- Don't understand how this wouldn't already be a rule
- The owner is responsible and should be required to remain on scene until law enforcement arrives to get statements
- If a dog bites a person, the owner must understand they are accountable and need to be around to provide information.
- Owners are for the most part, responsible for their dogs behaviour. Behaviour of the people involved is just as important. People have to be respectful of dogs. It is moronic to consider the entire pit bull breed as nuisance dogs. Anyone that any experience with dogs knows his. PLEASE Make decisions based on facts, and advise given by those who have an expertise and are knowledgeable in this area. What idiot came up with this pit bull ban? Why haven't you properly educated yourselves on this breed?

- i think that owners whos animals have been involved in an attack should be required to stay at the scene. I believe this will make it even more apparent that ALL breeds of dogs can pose a risk and if the animal stays at the scene, demographic information can be more accurate and prejudice will not be the only thing determining who is at fault
- Bites often result in medical or vet bills. The dog owner should be responsible for a portion of the damages
- If the victim of the bite wants to involve an enforcement officer then the dog owner should have to remain. If the victim doesn't want to report it then everyone should be free to go.
- There isn't much to explain. It should be treated the way a car accident is.
- I think too often the owner just takes off so yes the incident is reported the owner should have to talk to the officer.
- To many pet owners flee the scene when their pet hurts someone and this is not acceptable
- And if they dont big fine just like leaving a car accident
- Accountability is important. Most of the time it's improper training, not the breed or dog itself.
- I believe that the person of the dog who bite another person/animal should stay because it gives them the opportunity to tell their side of the story. Maybe the other dog was attacking that dog and the dog who bite defended itself. There are always two sides to every story and if both parties aren't there to tell them, who do you believe?!
- This is just responsible pet ownership.
- If you own a dog that bites a person or animal, you have a responsibility towards the victim.
- it is 100% the dog owners responsibility to remain at the scene if their dog attacks anything/one.
- Owners that have dogs that inflict damage to another should be held responsible of the situation and any medical costs associated with fixing the victims trauma
- Dog owners should absolutely remain at the scene. Not having dog owners remain at the scene seems very irresponsible.
- This would be no different than leaving the scene of a car accident.
- If I hit someone with my car, I am expected to stay and share contact information AND speak to enforcement. Why in the WORLD would it be any different if my DOG attacked a person or another pet? Make it a CRIME to pit and run. It is not a secret that pit bull owners are known to flee the scene after their dog bites someone, that's not news, and that needs to stop. There has to be major consequence; if you want to have a fighting dog breed in your home known for being statistically and genetically more inclined than any other breed of dog towards violence, then you had better be ready to step up when your dog follows their genetic predisposition for aggression and attacks. Point blank, period.
- A persons animal is their responsibility so any harm their animal does to another animal or individual should be treated like any other incident involving bodily harm
- This should be self explanatory and required no different than not leaving the scene of a motor vehicle accident.

- They should be held liable for not having control of their animals and this may help people whose animal was hurt
- Owners should be accountable. If their dog is on a leash however, and a dog runs up to them and gets bit by a leashed dog, the leashed dog should not be penalized. The reality is, if there is off leash parks, you truly know EVER, if ANY dog will react to another, regardless of breed.
- If you are injured in a car crash you have to. Why would this be different
- But it's not just pitbulls ! I've had a German Shepard attack my dog as well as a chow husky mix. There should be a law for responsible dog owners period. Not be discriminatory against one breed. It's the owner not the dog.
- It is the owners responsibility. The dogs behaviour is a reflection on the owner.
- Both sides of the story needs to be heard, and maintain responsibility
- The owner should be held responsible
- I think the dog owner should take responsibility for the dogs actions
- No
- That is the responsible thing to do but it doesn't happen because people are afraid of the process and that their dog will be euthanized. Dogs bite because they perceive a threat. It is natural behaviour. Help owners get their dogs trained. Dogs CAN be rehabilitated with an experienced person.
- Too many pet owners dont take responsibility for their dogs actions. Staying to discuss especially because medical Bill's are expensive.
- That way you have all the pertinent information
- the owner is responsible for the dog's actions, and should have to deal with the situation.
- If your dog bites another dog, animal or person, by law must be notified and if possible everyone must remain at the scene
- Dog learns from ppl..ppl are responsible
- Dogs who attack are many times just whisked away by their owners.
- My dog and I were attacked by a dog that was let out of its yard by the owners children. I knew what house it was from so I went and rang the doorbell and the owners hid in the house like cowards and did nothing to help or to prevent another attack. There are too many people with this mindset in the city.
- It's common sense that if your dog bites you are responsible
- To ensure there's follow up for safety
- Leaving the scene should be a warrantable offence, And the animal immediately forfeited to the municipality to be destroyed. If the human in control makes bad decisions, then for sure the animal will as well.
- Yes because ALL sides to the story are valid and equally important to have fair and just ruling as per the case.
- Every owner should take responsibility for your dog. Regardless of breed if you know they show aggression, it is your responsibility to manage the situation
- dog owner needs to take responsibility for any offence their dog is involved in

- The dog owner should remain at the scene as described but also needs to have the ability to remove the dog from the dangerous situation.
- Yes or to leave full contact information with others if they must leave the scene in order to control the dog
- "All rules should apply to all HUMANS, as they are the problem, not the breed of dog. I am an owner of a Labrador retriever, but I feel that the discrimination against the breeds you are proposing is a massive overreach on behalf of the City. Bad owners make 'bad dogs' - not a certain breed. More resources should be spent promoting responsible breeding and placement of dogs in homes.
- Frankly, I'm confused as to why the city is prioritizing this issue at all when we know that the city will be faced with unprecedented challenges in the next few years."
- Dog owners should be liable, and both dog and owner should take classes. Some people shouldn't be allowed to own dogs.
- People need to be held accountable table for their dogs behaviour regardless of breed. Breed discrimination does not work. Attention to people and stricter enforcement when they allow their dog to become a nuisance or choose to ignore bylaws which can affect others.
- "insurance information, contact information.
- An owner of a dog who was bitten should not be solely accountable, that owner of the biting dog should have accountability ad a role in supporting payment for vet bills etc.
- The OWNER of the animal is responsible for injury of another animal NOT the dog."
- You should be required to stay at scene and take accountability
- Yes in theory, but wouldn't it be safer in some cases to get the dog home and contained? Rather than having a stressed/aggressive dog remaining at the scene and potentially causing more issues. Perhaps just make the punishment reasonably mild eg. $30 fine for leaving the scene.
- Too often, people involved in these incidents take off and you're left with an injured dog and substantial vet bills. If they leave the park, once found it should be an additional fine.
- the owner needs to take responsibility for their dog.
- Unless there is a medical reason for the owner not to stay on scene, the owner should be responsible enough to answer questioning and potentially bring their dog for professional assessment to determine if the behavior was just a freak accident or if it is a pattern that needs consist management
- Need to have contact info for vet costs
- Be responsible for their animals behaviour and ensure other person is ok.
- For any serious bites
- Dog bites are serious no matter the breed and should be recorded. If the dog has a history of bad behaviour and the owner is not being held responsible that's a problem
- I think it's a part of responsible pet ownership. I have been involved in a situation where another dog went after mine to the point, I had to pick mine up. The owner was lagging far behind, talking on his phone and when I tried to talk to him about it, he told me I should stay out of the dog park and left. I love taking my dog to the park and want to be able to continue to do so, but there are some terrible stories of dogs being attacked and owners not taking any accountability for it.

- Ultimately, the owner is responsible, not the dog. The owner should have to stay on the scene.
- The victim shouldn't be paying the medical bills, unless it's determined by an enforcement officer it's the victim's fault.
- Both sides of the story must be heard
- Actions must be taken so it does not happen again.
- But, one cannot always remain. Obviously they cannot control the dog enough, so sticking around would not be ideal. Give phone number and go home.
- You can drive off from a car accident why should you be allowed to leave if your dog does something. You need to be accountable
- It's usually not the dog's fault no matter what breed it is. It is the owner that is responsible for the dog.
- Similar to car accidents, having both parties present at the scene allows for a greater understanding of the incident and the possible remedy that both parties can discuss. And it is simply good manners.
- "As a responsible dog owner, it's important to provide all information necessary. I disagree with targeting pit bull type dogs. All dogs need training as do their humans. Any dog

- As a responsible dog owner all information should be provided if an animal bites a person. I dislike the idea of focusing on pit bull type breeds. There are no bad dogs just bad owners and all dogs and their humans need training."
- Absolutely, that dog is your responsibility just as if your kid punched someone at school the parents get called to the principal's office to deal with the situation accordingly
- Same protocols as when you're involved in an accident.
- Responsibility is good.
- Staying at the scene shows you're willing to figure out what happened and see if there can be an easier answer. Running always means super guilty.
- The dog owner should be required to remain at the scene of the dog bite and take responsibility for the actions of their dogs.
- Responsible ownership.
- It makes sense and is fair
- I believe aggressive behaviours are learned and not blamed on breed aggression. Aggression could also be from an abused rescue or provoked. The owner should remain on site and exchange information so that it can be better identified as to why the dog reacted in a manner that was deemed aggressive

- Yes and how is this NOT the law already? Leaving the scene should also include a fine.
- Yes, I think a similar concept to a collision in a car can apply. But, a requirement to remain at the scene should only exist if under conditions such as blood or a fall that requires any medical attention.
- This should be the same as the exchange of information at a vehicle accident. If severe enough of an incident they should have to meet with an officer at the time of the event to provide a statement and not be given the chance to fill it out later. ie have a chance to modify the story to their benefit.
- Responsible pet owners should and would do that anyway.
- Obviously.
- It's just like a car accident. If ANY kind dog is to bite It's the pet owners responsibility to deal with it and remain at the scene until dealt with properly.
- Dog owner could possibly give a false name or contact info.
- Yes. The owner is responsible for the actions of the animal. Wouldn't leaving the scene be the same thing as leaving the scene of a vehicle accident? People must stay and be a part of the investigation.
- No one should be able to flee if someone or an animal has been harmed, proper channels should be followed.
- Most owners of non aggressive looking dogs which are more likely to cause bites (ie smaller terrier types) laugh/shrug off aggressive behavior and attacks by their dogs due to their size. This should be taken just as seriously as for larger dogs. Aggressive behavior is aggressive behavior period and should be addressed as such.
- There should be a requirement to do so in order to uphold accountability. Otherwise, there is the potential of incident occurring, and then false information being provided to avoid repercussions.
- I think the owner should be present to give their side of the story.
- I absolutely think the dog owner should remain at the scene: If the dog has had issues before it needs to be noted by an enforcement officer so they can take action as needed (ie declare the dog a nuisance based on prior biting incidents).
- They should be responsible for their pets behaviour.
- They are responsible for their pet and as such should provide information to help those impacted.
- It's the responsible thing for a dog owner to do.
- I think it's a responsibility in the case of harm but had NOTHING to do with breed
- yes it is your responsibility to follow through with care and concern for the animal that is injured. Pet owners need to be advocates for their pet.
- If your dog has bitten another person or dog you should remain at the scene as you would if you hit another vehicle.
- the owner of the dog needs to be held responsible
- If there are any fees associated with said bite then the owner of the offending dog should have to pay.
- If the bite requires medical attention.

- Yes, they should be required to provide information but if the dog is causing more trouble by remaining on site they should be able to leave their information and remove the dog
- If there is another human being present the responsibility is to share contact information to track potential rabies or other diseases/medical repercussions.
- It's part of being a responsible dog owner.
- It's responsible pet ownership
- I don't support breed banning I believe Humans need to be accountable not the dog . A dogs only jobs are to protect and serve. Let's go after the owners. A no kill policy would be nice to see. I have 2 shi tzu's and I totally keep them away from small kids I know they will bite as they are afraid. This is no reason to ban the breed or euthanize them.
- Dog owner should ALWAYS be in control of their animal and if not should be held accountable
- Anyone owning an animal that has attacked or bitten another animal or a human should stay at the scene and be held accountable.
- Owner should be able to discuss the incident.
- The owner is the one that is ultimately responsible for the pet. They should have to remain on scene to give a statement.
- Responsible pet owners should take responsibility for their pet's behavior
- Take responsibility for your dogs reaction what whatever made it bite, or else to explain why it happened/there side of the story
- It's important to share both sides of any situation.
- Owners should be able to discuss the incident with all parties.
- If the owner runs off there is a large chance the dog will bite again in another situation
- This is something that should be in effect already, so to protect all parties involved.
- I do not agree with breed specific legislation. [removed], the former director of Animal Services stated that in his research and over a decade of experience that BSL does not reduce the incidences of dog bites. BSL can be difficult to enforce particularly if the breed of dog cannot be clearly established. The legislation is discriminatory towards responsible pet owners. Bite rates for different breeds are unreliable because the data is unreliable (breed is unknown or misreported, not all bites are reported, statistics ignore other important factors such as socialization, neutering and proper containment). As said by the American Veterinary Medical Association, "Breed-specific bans are a simplistic answer to a far more complex social problem, and they have the potential to divert attention and resources from more effective approaches." The City of Calgary has demonstrated leadership with responsible pet ownership over BSL. While I would encourage strengthening responsible pet ownership through education and enforcement of problem owners and nuisance animals, enacting breed specific legislation is a simplistic band aid solution to a complex problem and will not make Calgarians safer.
- The owner is responsible. Why allow them to flee the scene if there has been an injury?
- It's simply the right thing to do
- Or provide identification and contact info to a witness or victim, if the animal is too hard to control at the scene or continues a state of aggression or intimidation

- It should be enforced that pet owners of animals that bite should be held accountable and should be made to stay at the scene.
- Thought this was already a rule.
- The owner of the attacking dog should be liable for vet bills, if any, for the injured dog. However there needs to be witnesses. The dog could have been acting in self defence or as a warning to an annoying/untrained dog. If that's the case, the injured dog owner should be liable.
- It shouldn't just be pitbulls declared a "nuisance" all dogs that have attacked or bit in the past should also be declared a nuisance.
- Yes I think if somebody's pet harms another person or another pad and it's bad enough that a third party needs to come in, then the owner should definitely stay unless they had a different agreement between them and the victim. But I would think it would be a similar process 2 when you are in a collision with another vehicle. you staying exchange contact information and depending on how bad it was you decide to leave or call in additional support.
- Absolutely! This is no different than leaving the scene of a crime, and the owner is effectively an accomplice. There should be criminal penalties for any dog owner that leaves the scene of a dog altercation without providing true and reliable contact information.
- I believe that the owner should remain on scene in order to talk to an enforcement officer as this may help resolve the issue from happening again. I think the owner is just as responsible for the action of their pet, as they are the ones that are raising the animal. If the owners are held more accountable, it may influence how people view pet ownership and training. It isn't always the animals fault in these instances, and by directly involving animal owners, hopefully this will allow the owner to understand more time needs to be spent with the animal to get them to where they need to be when it comes to obedience and training. We need to set the animals up for success and most cases the issue is the owner and not the animal.
- There have been too many cases of dog bites where the owner of the aggressor then leaves with the dog, and the owner of the bitten dog (or parent of a child, or other person) has no history and no way to know what they may have to deal with outside of a standard dog bite. If proper information is shared they do not have to stay at the scene (the same as a traffic collision).
- Sometimes when another animal has been there a vet bills that the other owner should pay for if their dog inflicted the wound
- As long as it's reasonable to do so... if it's safer to leave (e.g., to get the dog away from the situation), there should be some allowance for that as long as they either return or talk to the enforcement officer at another time.
- It should be considered akin to any other property or casualty damage
- In case the animal had been involved in other incidents, or is in violation of rules placed for nuisance animals
- You can't just have your dog biting people and walk away
- "If its against the law to drive off from a scene of a car accident, I don't see how its any different if you ""bite"" & run.

- Stipulation should be that it should be safe to do so, ie. dog can be sufficiently restrained & restricted from doing any further damage."
- Exchange information of vet history and everything is important.
- It seems like it makes sense to me, similar to a car accident.
- I just think that's being a responsible pet owner
- Owners should be held accountable for their dogs behaviour, and should be willing to provide contact information.
- Definitely. The owner is responsible if that dog bites someone
- Only in sever cases
- Be responsible
- Why the hell not?
- The owner of the dog that attacked the other person/dog should be held responsible, but if the person can't keep the dog under control and there is no safe place to tie the dog's leash to, I think it is perfectly reasonable to take the dog home and then immediately return to the scene of the incident and then exchange information and wait for police. The person should communicate the plan with the other person first before leaving though.
- It makes no sense that there are no consequences for not doing the right thing which is staying at the scene of an incident.
- Except when necessary to obtain medical attention and or to reduce the risk of further harm to people or animals
- The owner has to take responsibility for their pet simple as that.
- Far too many people in off leash parks let their dogs roam and if an incidents occurs, are quick to blame the other person for their lack of control of their dog. Even if this were a law, these types of people would not stick around because they know they are to blame.
- I think it's best to hear both sides of a conflict rather than just one so yes, the owner of the dog who bites should remain on scene and share contact information and/or speak with an officer.
- However if you need to get your dog under control, and that means leaving the scene, as long as you call 311 or something to identify yourself and your dog I'd be okay with that too.
- If anyone is injured, then the dog owner should be paying for surgery.
- owners NEED education. dog bites are rarely the fault of the dog but the situation the dog is exposed to combined with the lack of training.
- a dog bite can cause severe trauma for the victim, this is similar to a car accident. This should be so as to convey the absolute serious nature of the incident.
- So that proper follow up can be assured because the officer has the contact information. The rules should be the same as for hitting a pedestrian with a car.
- As with traffic incidents, I believe it is necessary to remain on scene to ensure correct information regarding incident and parties is collected and recorded.
- Unless this increases danger/stress, in which case just leave contact info

- Because not all bites are caused by aggression. Sometimes dogs bite to defend, out of fear or if they are being harassed. Dogs who are sick or in pain may bite when approached suddenly or if touched in the wrong place.
- depending on the bite, the hurt person or animal may need to go to the vet, so it would be hard to ensure the person remains, it also might be dangerous to have the animal stay there
- To avoid future problem such as life threatening situation. Dog owners should be more aware in public area.
- If a dog bites another animal or a person and the owner of the dog leaves the scene, the analog is assault and leaving a scene. The owner should also share a hefty fine for leaving.
- As long as it is in the animals best interest to remain there. If there is a fight between dogs and the dogs are worked up, sticking around is not a good idea.
- This would depend on whether there was an emergency health issue. Both parties should be able to leave the scene for emergency health.
- Remaining at the scene is responsible. The fear owners have is breed blaming and that their dog will be declared the problem and euthanized and they will be charged so don't stay.
- You need that information to follow the rules
- This is a no brainer.
- If it causes enough bodily harm to animal/ person, I believe information should be shared
- If a dog bites another dog or person, the owner needs to know about it and needs to take responsibility for their dog.
- It'd be like hitting a car while driving, then driving away. You're responsible, so your attendance is necessary.
- Bylaw would need to be more efficient in responding to bite calls though.
- Owner should remain and then reason owners don't right now is because they fear their pet will be put down. Once again, ITS NOT THE DOG'S FAULT! Sometimes it's an unexpected reaction for whatever reason. So make the situation safe for the owner so they know they get to hold onto their dog and they will stay at the scene of the accident.
- How is that not a thing yet?
- Just to be clear, I agree with a person who's dog has bitten remaining on scene. What I do not agree with is lumping pit bulls as an aggressive and nuisance breed. This is an outdated and problematic view. Bad owners create bad dogs. Pit bulls are not inherently bad dogs. Pit bulls are historically considered nanny dogs.
- Owners are the ones responsible for their dogs lives, and as long as such exchange is done without putting the dog into any further danger.
- I can't believe this isn't already required.
- If the dog and owner are present the owner can be assessed because it is usually the owner that makes the dog s nuisance
- The owner is responsible for the dog. If they cannot manage the behaviour then they need to take accountability

- Absolutely. This way follow up can be done.
- That would be the responsible thing to do
- Ultimately it is the dog owners responsibility to ensure that their dog is not reactive. First offence should not be a fine but education from a caring bylaw officer and owner should have to agree to a few home visits for bylaw officer to observe if there is any further reactive behaviour.
- This is common sense. And should apply where it's a small dog doing the biting or large dog. Doesn't matter. Stay at the scene as you should if it was a vehicle accident.
- Because it's the same as if it was a car accident, you stay on the scene to answer questions that those individuals might have. Like I said before NOT THE DOGS FAULT
- Unless removing owner/dog in that moment neutralizes the scenario.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- For all breeds and incidents.
- Any responsible dog owner should have no problem with that.
- The owner is responsible for their animal and any actions that animal may take. Therefore it is only sensible that the owner must stay to acknowledge their dog's actions and any consequences.
- It's important to foster an environment of responsibility among pet owners and remind those who might avoid responsibility that owning a pet means proper care/training, or facing the consequences otherwise.
- You are responsible for the behavior of your dog, if you cannot control your dog, you should not have one. And you better be able to stand behind it's behavior. The problem is not the dog, it is the owner. The owner and not the breed. I've been bitten by dogs, small little yappy dogs. Owners think they don't need training because they're just a little dog. Please stop focusing on Breed and start holding owners to account.
- Dogs that bite usually bite a lot of people before they seriously harm someone. Serious harm could be avoided if dangerous dogs get extra training before the biting escalates
- Regardless the size of dog, all owners should be held responsible. The dogs are only as good as the owners train them.
- The owner must be held accountable for the dog he or she has cared for and trained or lack thereof.
- people need to take responsibility. I believe in mandatory training courses for owners and animals.
- People are responsible for there own dogs and the way they act in public.
- Because they are at fault. It is not the dogs fault that they were not trained correctly to know that it is not appropriate behavior
- often people leave after an incident and there may be major unknown damage to another dog/person
- The owner needs to be held accountable.
- In my opinion when a dog bites another animal or person, it is the owners responsibility. They should be held accountable and stay at the scene.
- Have to take responsibility for your pet
- There needs to be accountability to owners

- Exchanging information might help in reducing the repeat offenders
- Yes. For the responsibility falls on the owner of the dog that bites
- Any time an animal causes trauma to another animal informations should be shared
- It is necessary for preventing further incidences that everyone involved be present for this. Also, if another pet were injured it is a way to ensure that its veterinary treatment is paid by the owner of the animal at fault.
- They need to be accountable for their dog and pay vet bills/fines necessary
- I mean it would be basic responsibility. However, if the dog is agitated and needs to be taken away/back home, that should be accommodated somehow.
- If a dog bites another animal or a human there should be both sides of the story heard, large dogs are immediately attacked just because they are larger and stronger while small dogs can run around biting whatever and whoever they want without consequence. Sometimes the large dog is simply defending itself.
- In case of veterinary or medical complications and further information helps.
- This allows both parties to explain what happened during this situation.
- The owner should be required to take responsibility for their animal.
- too often they leave and the victim is stuck with a huge bill
- The owner is responsible for the behaviour so this makes sense.
- I feel that is reasonable
- Part of being a responsible dog owner, and seeing if there is any mediation or agreement that can be made (e.g. mandatory training, vet/doctor bills) that can be agreed upon to avoid euthanasia
- you should remain at the scene so both stories are heard
- I feel like it's fairly straight forward - you're responsible for your dog and how it behaves. If a dog attacks another person or dog and is UNPROVOKED, there should be a process in place to review the event and plan going forwards to prevent the event from happening again.
- Owners should be held accountable for their animals actions. If their dog bites another dog or a person, they should be responsible financially and legally for any damage the dog causes.
- Both side need to be equally heard at the time, so no info is forgotten or misinterpreted
- Of course. In many cases, the fault isnt always on the dog who bit. Some people dont understand appropriate dog communication and allow their dog to invade space, get too excited etc and that may cause another dog to react. Sharing information allows both parties to communicate and come to an agreement on how to settle things.
- a dog owner should understand and be responsible for their dog actions.
- Again, the animal should bot be punished, only the owner up to and including removing the dog from the owner's possession.
- A dog owner should be held responsible for his or her dog's actions.
- Owners need to be help accountable for their negligence and I think they should be treated this way.

- If a dog bites a person or another animal it should be mandatory for them to remain at the scene. How else do you get the persons information? They need to be held responsible for what has happened.
- "Dog bites are accidents. They never happen on purpose, of course the owner should stay at the scene until they can speak with a law enforcement officer. At the very least exchange information with the victim.
- A dog bite should be the Same as a car accident. You wouldn't drive away from the scene of an accident!"
- I believe the owner should be help responsible.
- Absolutely, just like if you cause an accident with your vehicle (your property, since dogs are also considered property in the eyes of the law) you should have to remain at the scene.
- They are the responsible party. The dog is only one part of the equation. Whether the dog was bred to be aggressive or not. Sometimes dogs act out because their owners are negligent and they should be held responsible. You should not discriminate based on breed especially when some dogs have just the smallest amount of that breed in them. It is their training that is important.
- No different than a requirement to stay on the scene of an automobile accident, if there is a possibility of liability you have a responsibility to stay there
- A dog is the owners responsibility. Responsibility should be taken as if they were the ones doing the harm.
- Obviously if a dog is dangerous (to the point where it actually bites/attacks a person or other animal) the owner needs to be held responsible. There should be more restrictions on who can own a dog rather than what sort of dog anyone can own. If an individual does not properly care for their dog, they allow them to be aggressive, and it results in a person or animal being injured, that individual should not be allowed to own dogs anymore. They are clearly an irresponsible pet owner. Sure, a Pit Bull may be inherently more aggressive than other breeds, however it is PEOPLE who are allowing that behaviour.
- They should stay to provide contact information or to speak with enforcement officer if necessary as there is always two sides to the story and someone can twist the story at any time just to make them not at fault for encouraging the dog to bite them
- To describe the event from start to incident
- Just like a car accident, people should exchange information
- Owner is responsible, must take responsibility. Neither bylaw or police should waste time trying to track them down
- Aggressive dogs should be identified.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions and should have to pay for damages to person, animal and/ or property

- I believe that the owner should stay to help in anyway possible! Dogs behaviour is directly related to the care and effort from the owner and you are exactly that. The owner. So your dog and anything involving the dog is your responsibility
- Just like when someone is hit by a vehicle, dog bites can be severe and the owner should have to wait on scene or at the very least give some form of identification and contact information.
- Only if the bite is severe (As in, sheds blood, or causes quite a bit of pain)
- Yes so they can explain what happened.
- If you get into a car accident both parties remain at the scene and exchange information. Same should be for dog attacks. The owners should be liable and held accountable for their pets actions.
- It is important for both people to be present to get the story straight and so that the owner can be held accountable.
- If there has been an incident involving dog attack/bite. The owner of the dog needs to make available information to be responsible for helping to rectify the situation and be responsible for any claims from the victim bitten or animal injured or killed
- Dont let people hide from it... people are a bigger problem than the animals
- Because the owner would need to be held responsible for the actions of their animals.
- This is the best way to get the full story from both the victim and the owner. Was the animal unfairly provoked. Was it a vicious act. All parties should be present for explanations.
- If they are responsible they will be willing to talk about the incident and first hand reports of incidents are crucial because so many factors go into a dog altercation.
- The owner, by the act of having the pet, should by law be responsible in any dealings with insurance and or law enforcement just as any other incident would be handled.
- Demonstrates responsibility.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs.
- If you're dog harms someone or their dog, you should be held responsible for any cost associated with the attack.
- Yes, I believe that owner should remain at the scene.
- Just like a car accident
- It is important to know the dogs health and vaccine history and this can be provided by the owner
- Explain the situation, understand both sides and not just one. Dogs are not naturally aggressive. It's the owners that are at fault not the dog.
- Accountability
- Take responsibility for our dogs actions. If it bites another dog or a person contact info should be exchanged
- Someone should be responsible for their pet and if their pet happens to attack/injure a person or another animal, then the owner should stay at scene. I believe this because you are responsible for your pets actions and should wait to see if the person/animal is okay and sometimes people don't have pet insurance to help treat their animal and if your pet did that, then you should have to pay for it.
- Responsible pet owner ship says you should have to stay and deal with bylaw.

- So long as all parties can remain safe while waiting. Dog/person who was attacked and the dog and owner of dog who attacked. If unable to must leave contact info.
- This should already be a thing
- Yes, the owner needs to be accountable for the dog's behavior.
- It should be no different than a traffic accident. You, your body, your dog/animal/property has been damaged (bitten) by someone else's negligence which has financial impacts. Those financial impacts should not be the onus of the victim.
- If any dog bites someone or their pet they should be required to do this. Not just bully breeds.
- it's like a car accident they should have 2 exchange information
- Yes I believe the owner should stay on scene to give their statement and discuss. Sometimes it is the dogs (or owners) fault. Sometimes it is the other persons fault for approaching, reaching to pet, petting, etc without permission. Both sides need to be taken into account.
- I think as a dog owner yiu need to be present if a situation arises
- People often give false information or are not known to the person biten
- A responsible dog owner would remain at the scene. They would not need to be told to do so.
- Owners need to be held accountable when their dog attacks someone, this would also help to create more responsible ownership
- To some extent. If the bite is not severe and the victim agrees, the owner and the dog should be allowed to leave rather than making both parties wait for enforcement to show up.
- The owner needs to take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- Yeah.
- They should be responsible for thier animals
- A pet owner should be responsible and accountable for the actions of their pet
- Dog owner should remain present to take responsibility for their pet's actions, though there should be leeway to allow for removing the pet to a location away from other animals and humans where it can calm down.
- Too easy for them to leave the scene and not face the consequences
- When an accident happens and someone is injured, all parties involved should stay. This is for all cases, not just those involving dogs.
- Only in major offenses not minor infractions between dogs
- Some dogs can cause extreme damage and even death to other dogs or even humans. This should be treated like leaving the scene of an accident and the owner should be charged for leaving
- You should have control of your dog no matter the breed, size or age. As a responsible owner it's your obligation to make sure to pay or file reports if your animal is in a fight and bite a dog and or human
- Its the same as a car crash to stay at the scene.
- An exchange of info is important, but allowing the dog owner to secure their animal in their vehicle or other means can be very important to diffuse the situation.
- The measures I indicated I supported above rely on identifying and tracking repeat-offense dogs

- Pet owners must take responsibility for their animals, on and off leash.
- Unless there is a need for the dog to go to emergency or is need of basic need like food or water or safety (people or animal), all owners should be present as they would if they hit another car and someone got hurt.
- yes & no, accidents happen, & depending on what triggered it or not, the dog could still be in a fragile state & leaving the situation could be best scenario
- Having both parties is key to getting the whole story. This is of course only if the bite is significant and being reported. Don't think it should be mandatory to report for either party if they are in agreement.
- A responsible pet owner should take responsibility for their dog's actions - no matter the breed.
- too many people take off and don't act responsible for their pet's behavior.
- Same as if you hit a person or property with your vehicle, even if it's an accident you need to wait and provide your information.
- As long as this does not include any breed discrimination
- Dog owners must take responsibility for their dog. However, if the dog requires immediate vet care the dog owner may leave so long as they give contact info to other parties who do remain
- If you are a dog's owner you are responsible for their actions and should be financially responsible for any damages they do.
- Doesn't matter what breed or size, of dog. It all comes down to training. More affordable training programs should be offered to all dog owners not specific breeds.
- Yes. Owner needs to be responsible for dog
- Knowledge is needed on the animals vaccination history, and whether it has don't this before.
- 100%.
- It should depend on the offence. How did incident happen where was the owner. What did the owner do, how did the owner react.
- This is no different than a vehicle accident.
- It's an accident. You cant just leave... The dog is your responsibility. Just like a car is your responsibility while driving
- I know people whose dogs have been bitten at the Edworthy off leash area and while their attention was on their injured dog, the owners of the dogs that did the biting disappeared without providing contact information. The owners of dogs that bite need to be held responsible.
- just like a car accident, don't flee the scene
- It should be similar to car accidents. If severe, for sure the person needs to stay. Needs to set up guidelines for what defines severity.
- Most incidents are due to some form of provocation. I feel that people must take responsibility for any vet expenses their dog has caused
- Just like if you are in an MVA.
- It is important to understand the reason for the bite and to come to some type of conclusion whether there was negligence by the dog owner or the person/animal who was bitten.

- To take responsibility
- Owners need to take responsibility. However, this will only work as long as the dog has not been injured (may need to see a vet) and knowing the dog will not be seized.
- Owners have to be accountable for their pet's behaviour. It's no different from leaving the scene of an accident.
- They should fill out information, but the enforcement officer can not take away their animal from them no matter what if they are willing to stay and fill out the information.
- Yes, too often there is a dog bite/altercation and all that is reported it was a black dog, with a generic description of the owner. Then it is a matter of 'hoping' that owner is responsible and comes forward.
- Yes so the appropriate contact information can be documented in case payment is needed for the care of the other animal and so the officer can make appropriate recommendations for the dog.
- Pet owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions
- I have heard to many stories of people disappearing after their dogs have attacked other dogs. And then having them 'stay with friends until the heat dies down. Never being found guilty.
- No different than a car accident
- However if either animal is severely injured the owners should be allowed to seek immediate medical assistance for the animal
- The dog owner needs to take responsibility for any financial issues due his dog biting. Also needs to go into the record in case there are further instances. The owner needs education to prevent further instances.
- But what justifies as a bite? Lots of dogs nip when playing hard. It would be easy for someone to claim they were bit when they weren't.
- Yes but how do you enforce it? If someone knows they will get a fine, why would they stick around?
- 100% - it seems that small dog owners think it's not a big deal. This is NOT the case. A bite changes the scenario for the other dog regardless of size.
- Should be treated as a equivalent to a car accident.
- The owner should remain at the scene, similar to a hit and run.
- It's like a car crash
- Clear and equitable communication for all parties should be of utmost importance for dealing with incidents. It improves the possibility of all parties involved reaching consensus about how to best deal with the situation.
- Owner of dog in question should be held accountable and pay for any damages. Must remain at site to exchange contact info
- I believe this would shed a light on the fact that most times the dog was aggravated by another dog/person. These are animals and should be respected as such. For example parents should be held responsible if their kid is pulling dogs ear etc. Little dogs should also be held responsible for antagonizing larger breeds.
- People need to be held accountable for their pets and the damages caused by them.
- Any responsible dog owner would want to remain at the scene

- The owner can explain themselves and vouch for the dog or try to come up with a solution for what to do about the dog.
- The owner should have the opportunity to explain if this is the first incident that has ever occurred with the dog. And on the other hand, the owner should have to remain at the scene to figure out a solution with an officer if the dog is declared to be a threat.
- if an animal causes harm to another being the owner should remain on scene until it has been dealt with properly- and cover all costs incurred.
- An owner needs to take responsibility for their animal.
- If the victim is hurt and there is legal or financial (ie. Vet bills) the dog owner should bear that financial responsibility. And it should not be the victims responsibility to have to hunt the other person down. Should be treated like a vehicle accident
- Information should be shared and people should stay to properly report unless immediate medical attention is required by any party then treat that occasion as required.
- Same as a car accident, if the injuries are serious and require medical attention then the owner and dog(s) NO MATTER WHAT BREED should stay at the scene until the proper authorities have taken statements and assessed the situation.
- It is important that all dog owners be present at the scene to speak with officials and or police.
- owners need to take responsibility.
- Of course there needs to be some accountability if someone is bitten by a dog. However, it should be a fine levied against its owner, not the dog's life that is the expense.
- This seems obvious for any incident resulting in injury
- Needs to be done for insurance purposes.
- I think that similar to a vehicle accident there needs to be a way to assure liability
- It's the responsibility of the dog owner to train and be a responsible pet owner. Whether it's a pit bull or not should not have a bearing on what the punishment is. If the pet owner runs away he/she should be subject to mandatory court such as leaving the scene of an accident and could be subject to criminal proceedings through POPA.
- In order to determine if the animal is a one time offender or a true nuisance, you have to be able to track them somehow.
- my child has been bit by dogs while riding on the path and the owner every time takes off - this is 100% not OK and should be dealt with. We have tried calling by law and it was completely ineffective - they don't send officers and since I don't have any owner info they do nothing.
- Both sides of the story need to be heard.
- Like any other injury case, this is important.
- If you or your animal are injured and the owner of the offending animal is not helpful and leaves the scene, this could lead to a very serious situation. Medical assistance may need to be called and assistance for getting to help may be required. Medical costs and loss of income may also become an issue. Accountability is of the greatest importance!
- The dog owner should have an opportunity to explain. Some people let their kids terrorize dogs assuming nothing will happen....

- Absolutely! They need to take full responsibility
- Both parties should be present to convey what happened, ie..a dog may have been provoked to biting.
- I feel there are many scenarios as to what could happen in this instance and it may not be the dog that's at fault
- I think this depends on the severity of the bite- hopefully agreeable by both parties. Sometimes minor scuffles just happen by accident and some folks can be overly Sensitive about it. However, there needs to be accountability on part of some really irresponsible dog owners, but the dogs themselves should not be punished for poor training and/or socialization. I think many owners flee the scene for fear that their dog will be euthanized rather than a series of other intermediary interventions that could be used to curb dog bites (I.e muzzling, mandatory training classes, rehoming repeat offenders, etc).
- Common sense and decency
- I think if someone responsibly owns a pet they should feel confident speaking on its. behaviour. This includes the right to defend that their animal may have acted out of fear and has not ever shown signs of aggression in the past. Dogs are not the problem here- the owners are and it's about time our legislation reflected that. Dogs should not be punished for their owners negligence.
- This should not be an immediate opportunity for punitive action. This should be an opportunity for both sides to have their view of this experience shared, and someone versed in canine social behaviour should be consulted to determine what can be done for the dogs or owners to prevent any future incidents.
- How else would there be any accountability?
- it is important to know that the offending animal has been immunized
- It is it the owners fault for a dog attack. Not the dog
- Yes, because the owner should be accountable for the incident and be available to discuss the situation with an officer.
- The behaviour is the owners responsibility and leaving the scene of an accident, such as a bite or aggression towards an animal or human, should be considered an offence, subject to arrest leading to jail time and/or a fine.
- It would be no different if it is a scene of a vehicle accident in which they were part of. if authorities are to come because they were called, owner stays.
- Would prevent bad owners from getting off the hook
- My dog has been bitten and attacked by a german shepherd, the owner hopped in their car and drove away. My dog ended up with a broken shoulder and a chunk taken out of his hind leg. He's a 150lb bullmastiff. Size and breed don't matter - TRAINING DOES. Due to the financial burden of this person's irresponsibility, I am the one in debt and with a fearful dog. Had they stayed, I would have gotten their information, reported them to the authorities to have the dog and owner looked at for behaviour patterns and had them pay for the medical costs.
- Needs to be some accountability. By having the owner stay there, they are more accountable for the dogs actions

- And there should be fines if someone leaves without this happening - like there would be for a car involved a hit and run.
- It should be treated as just like a car accident.
- Similar to an accident, information should be shared.
- They take ownership for their dog
- It gives a witness and report if it happens again, and if the victim needed medical or veterinary attention, there would be documentation on who the responsible party was.
- Too much of this is going on in off leash parks...that's why I don't take my smaller dog. It is unsafe
- I also believe this can be up to the people at the scene. Just like a traffic accident, the expectation should be to remain on the scene. However, every scene is unique and owners/victims are capable of understanding this and knowing what caused the issue and whether further action is required.
- Leaving the scene could mean the owner or dog is uncontactable again.
- People need to be accountable for the actions of their animals
- Be responsible
- To be held accountable for the incident, document the incident, and help figure out ways to prevent more issues in the future
- Absolutely. Dog bites should be considered alongside other accidental harm incidents (like car accidents or other harmful negligence) and owners should be penalized for fleeing a potential crime scene.
- Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their animals and the lack of training given to their animals. Dog bites/fights can be prevented in some cases and owners should be taught how to read their animals body language to be responsible pet owners.
- It is a good dog owners obligation to take responsibility in the event of an incident although it is important to note that this can take place with any breed (big or small) at any time - not just pit bulls.
- It's important to stay and share information incase of serious injury or longer-term effects resulting from the injury. If a dog bites Me or my pets, I would expect the owner of that dog to pay for any vet or medical bills.
- Then the officer gets both sides of the story not just one
- this would make owners much more accountable considering so many of them take off after something happens. So, much stiffer fines etc. For leaving the scene should be in place!
- Common sense.
- Owners of all breeds should be held accountable for their dog's actions.
- Owner responsibility is imperative
- If applicable, owners should be responsible to voice their side of the story. As a responsible dog owner, they should remain at the scene.
- Pay for the damages to such property so for vet bills and such
- Pit bulls are not dangerous animals !!!! It's the owners who make them mean.
- Everyone should be held accountable for their animal.
- People should be held responsible for the animals in their care.

- Why shouldn't they remain at the scene. It's a serious incident, not unlike a collision.
- Owners need to take responsibility.
- obviously yes, an accident occurred and all parties should stay on site.
- Yes, as long as the dog can be controlled while waiting for an officer to show up. Alternatively they should have to leave their dog registration number with the injured party for follow up.
- If a bite happens the owner needs to assume liability for the final outcome. There is always a reason that the dog bites, usually to protect themselves or their owners, and both parties involved should be required to speak to an enforcement officer in order to resolve the situation.
- I think its necessary just so then its caught in the moment, people know the stories well since it just happened and it gives better opportunity to find out the truth and quickly at that.
- Yes! They should always remain at the scene! As a responsible pet owner they should without hesitation! If their dog bites another animal or human then they need to stay until authorities arrive
- Owner needs to remain at scene so they can be held accountable for the actions of their dog.
- Small dogs bite far more often than large dogs, yet are not treated with the same level of disdain. If this is going to be a rule, then the rule has to be for ALL dog breeds, not just pitties and large dogs.
- It's called being a responsible pet owner!
- Dog bites are the sole responsibility of the owner
- It is the owners responsibility to ensure their animal behaves. This is no different than if you were in a car accident.
- Pet owners should be required to take full responsibility of their pet, good, bad and ugly.
- it seems like a logical and good thing to do
- Owners must be responsible for their pet and should have to ensure the rectify the situation accordingly.
- The owner is responsible for their dog just like in a vehicle accident, so they should remain at the scene of an incident.
- Its important to take responsibility for what happened, but this is only effective if the cases can be handled appropriately and the owner/dog is not treated unnecessarily poorly during the process.
- So that the city can be aware of the potentially dangerous dog if it has a pattern.
- It is important for all sides to be heard and explained. Things tend to get blown out of proportion when just the victims side is heard. For the dog owner/handler to explain why the incident occurred immediately would allow for more clarity on the situation
- Yes the dog owner should take responsibility for their dog.
- Common sense. It is no different than a traffic accident etc.
- If a bite is severe in nature then I agree that all parties should share the appropriate information. If the nip or bite was superficial and wasn't an attack then I don't think so.
- The vet bil should be paid by the owner of the dog who caused the damage
- This bylaw unfairly targets "pitbull" type dogs. If owners were required to stay at the scene of the incident, I believe it would become extremely evident that the issue is poor ownership and handling, rather than breed specific issues. Plus the owner would be held responsible for the actions of the animal under their care

- Or be requires to share their contact information.
- If there is a serious incident requiring medical attention for another animal or human, this should be standard.
- The responsible thing to do
- You are required to remain at the scene of any other serious accident. Why should this be different?
- Answer is self- explanatory
- As a responsible owner you need to stay and also they need to provide their side of the story
- yes, better to explain what happens, 99% of the time the fault its the human
- the owner is always responsible for its pets actions
- Owner must take responsibility.
- Are a lot of dog bites in the presence of an owner, or not? How will this be enforced if the dog owner decides to just leave the scene before an officer gets there? Will video footage ie phone footage taken by bastanders be acceptable evidence?
- Yes assuming that the enforcement officer does not have a preudjice against the specific breed that did the biting like these bylaws seem to. Pitbulls do not bite any harder than any other dog their size. To say any different is pure ignorance.
- "If blood is drawn then the owner should cooperate with the victim and bylaw officer. My dog has been bitten at the park and the owner just left without asking if my dog was ok.
- Also in reference to question 8 as you don't have an option to type an answer. In reference to coloured bandanas. My main issue with that question is that it is up to parents to educate their children on how to behave around dogs. Colour coding dogs isn't going to stop children from reaching for dogs when they shouldn't. My dog doesn't like people touching him and I find a lot of parents lack the responsibility to teach their children the appropriate manners around animals."
- Responsible dog owners would do this but your proposed bylaws would make even them hesitant to hang around.
- If safe to do so
- They can explain what happened—if the other person or animal were at fault. All sides of the story should be considered.
- Contact information should be shared for the safety of both parties
- if the dog bites another animal the vet bill must be paid for by the attacker.
- It only makes sense.
- I support the sharing of information not necessarily having to wait for an enforcement officer... if it isn't a bad bite that's a waste of everyone's time and money.
- My dog and I have been attacked twice. Both times, the owner quickly grabbed their dog and left. Both incidents were in on-leash areas, where my dog was on-leash and the other wasn't.
- A dogs behaviour reflects how it was raised. If the dog bites it has most likely been raised in an abusive and/or unstable home. Owners should have to go through some form of training if the dogs life is at risk. If a parents is not suitable to raise children, the parent has to prove through evidence that they are fit to raise kids and can supply a stable home for them. This should be no different for dogs. We need to stop giving people the benefit of the doubt and blaming the dog.

- My husband was chased and bitten by a pair of dogs. A complaint was made to the police however the dogs were moved out of the city and nothing was done. The owner should have had to talk to police before he hid the dogs. Nothing was done.
- Any responsible dog owner would be willing to do this.
- If any laws have been broken, formal statements must be made. Procedures must be strictly enforced, however putting down an animal should be the absolute last resort
- So that any follow up such as seizure of the animal can be undertaken
- People should be held responsible for their animals. However I believe there should be leniency and understanding. Many people have good dogs and most times, dogs bite not because of them but because of other people such as a stranger coming into their space and touching/grabbing at them.
- If a pet is not being raised responsibly there should be a way to track it to the owner to take action
- Vet bills are expensive and the owner needs to take responsibility
- An owner needs to be accountable for their dog.
- It is common sense that if you are involved in any type of incident you should be responsible to correct the situation.
- I feel there are too many dog owners not taking responsibility for their dog's actions. If an owner needs to stay at the scene to provide contact information to an officer rather than just the victim, they are more likely to be truthful.
- Both parties should be able to be contacted for insurance purposes, or any follow up. This information could be used in Tribunal Decisions.
- The owner should be able to justify for their dog's actions should it be serious
- It is important for an owner to be present to a situation to explain what happened and advocate for the dog. They are a witness to the situation just as much as any other party involved.
- Everyone should be held accountable for the behavior of their animals, and answering a few basic questions can help in treatment if the person or animal bitten requires medical attention (eg. Is the rabies vaccine up to date).
- No different than a hit and run with a vehicle.
- This is important for health and safety. Owners should exchange information.
- Many people don't stay at the scene when their dog bites and therefore there is no recourse and no documentation to support a dog being labelled as aggressive. This would make that easier to track and follow up on
- Is there not one already? This is just common sense.
- But they never do..
- Provides clarity at the scene on what has occurred and who was present
- Most of dogs behavior is based off of the training and guidance received from the owner. It is the responsibility of the owner to ensure their animal is behaved in public and does not pose a threat to any other person or animal and have control of their pet. Any actions of the animal is the owners responsibility. All dogs regardless of breed can either be aggressive or extremely docile. My father was a vet in Calgary and owned his own practice for over 40 years. The smaller dog breeds were usually more aggressive than the large breeds. It is all how the animal is raised and trained by the owner. That being said every dog has a different temperament and level of comfort in different settings and the owner should know this and treat the dog accordingly. This is why the colored bandanna/vest program visual showing a dogs temperament was a good idea and should be expanded upon. If the dogs are still uncomfortable or aggravated in the situation the owners could always put some space between each other to calm the animals down but not leave the scene until information has been exchanged.

- This should apply to a dog of any type, not just a specific breed.
 - I say yes as long as the owner have control of their pet. The owner should be allowed to take the dog inside their home or yard or veheciles if they do not have control of the animal on leash. They should have to provide their info so the proper measures can be taken to investigate and enforce restrictions
 - I think just like a car accident, it should have everyone there. but also we have to realize dogs do sometimes get out or sometimes kids or adults dont listen and pet or dont ask the owner to pet and they get bitten. Again lets not keep blaming the dogs its not always them.
 - People will try to avoid taking responsibility, just as leaving the scene of a vehicle accident leaving the scene of a bite incident should be considered just as serious.
 - If the bite was a one off and the offending animal is no calm there is no reason for the owner to leave. They should stay and give a statement. However if the dog is continuing to show aggressive behaviour or would be best if they left the area for the safety of others.
 - Your dog your responsibility
 - i find that people who own smaller breed dogs get off the hook way to easy. As soon as you see a terrier type they automatically get blamed. I know from experience that my little breed is way more aggressive than my big dog
 - Most people disappear after an offence so they/ their dog does not get in trouble and they are never reprimanded
 - This seems obvious
 - "It depends on the circumstances. Some people have no respect for dogs boundaries. Dog etiquette should be taught in schools briefly each year to children.
- Sometimes dogs get disagreeable with each other and that is nature. Usually no one gets hurt and you carry on and work on that behavior with your dog."
 - This way vaccination information can be shared and liability can be assessed. However, the dog should be allowed to leave with someone else if possible, because it is already a high stress situation.
 - The owner has a duty to the people and their dog to be able to explain what happened and why it happened

- 1000% the owner must remain there! That dog is their responsibility, therefore they must stay for all required information.
- No different than a car crash. You are responsible for something that caused harm, and have to face the consequences.
- An owner must assume responsibility for their dogs actions, they should remain at the site to provide additional details to an officer
- There are costs involved.
- Seems reasonable
- As a dog owner, I believe it's always the owner's fault when their dog bites someone. Dog bites can result in a serious injury. So absolutely all owners should be 100% liable
- hit and run ... bite and run.. same thing, Avoiding responsibility.
- It's common sense - it's a violation and all witnesses must stay at the scene
- There should be no breed specific language. You can have a terrible dog if you are a terrible dog owner no matter what breed the dog is. Singling out one breed of dog is like singling out one ethnic minority or male vs female. Very divisive language.
- Dog owners are responsible for the actions of their dog and need to be involved in the solution.
- Absolutely they must stay. Why is this not already a rule?
- It is important the owner take the responsibility not the dog as the owner is the trainer.
- It's a traumatic incident for all involved that must be accurately documented and put into proper context. This can result in the owners' behaviour being observed and evaluated on scene to judge the possibility of reoccurrence and if any further steps are needed (warning, mandatory training, fines, voluntary surrender, seizure, et al).
- As long as they can get their dog under control they should not leave a scene where their dog has hurt someone!
- Common sense
- In my opinion this is no different than a vehicle accident. The owner should stay with the dog and give all information required.
- I feel it is important for the owners to stay around and or exchange information so the people have a right to explain why said person or animal was bit or attacked. Maybe it was provoked or protecting the owner from a situation or other attack. Both stories need to be heard
- Both owners of any bite situation should be able to voice their sides
- It is the responsibility for the owners to make sure all is okay.
- for serious bites defined as breaking the skin. Puppy nips, and mouthing shouldn't need to wait around.
- if a dog bites someone, or another animal of course the owner should have to stay and face the consequences. just like in a car accident if you leave you should face stiffer penalties.
- It's the same as an assault
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets. As parents should be for children.
- The dog should be allowed to be at home with their owner until there is a resolution.

- This is obvious
- As per the answer above, an owner is and should be held responsible for their animal at all times.
- There is always context on both sides. Many times there could be circumstances that are not explained by the victim of a bite.
- Unless it is unsafe for them or their dog to do so, in which case they could provide Contact info
- People stay behind when they hit a car, it should be the same if your dog bites someone or another dog. It's the owner's responsibility to look after their dog and make sure it's not being overly aggressive with other people and animals.
- It should be treated as a car accident would be. Information should be exchanged, obviously police and ambulance called if warranted.
- When this unfortunate situation occurs, yes the owner should be held accountable and should wait until an officer comes so that the owner can do its best to aid the process
- Absolutely, just responsible pet ownership
- It's important for the enforcement officer to have the full story.
- As long as the officer is able to arrive within 30 minutes.
- I want contact info from the owner of a dog that bites me or my loved one so that enforcement and/or medical personnel can communicate with them regarding their dog.
- It's like a car accident; you can't just leave the scene and go on with your day like nothing happened.
- The owner knows the dog best and can hopefully shed some light on why the incident occurred.
- Because someone was attacked
- "Your animal is considered property. Your property caused injury.
- You should be responsible to provide information, the same as any other injury "accident""
- However I don't support targeting specific breeds. Even this form clearly states that pitbulls are not responsible for the most bites and are only being targeted for their appearance and power. If this is justified then people who take any sort of fight or strength training should have to be clearly identified and muzzled in public because their strength or capabilities would result in more damage if an incident occurred. I am so ashamed of this community for even suggesting this level of discrimination.
- Yes. If a loose dog, or pitbull attacks and kills an innocent household animal or injure a human, there should be severe consequences to both the dog and owner
- Take responsibility for your pet. Felony charges otherwise.
- Depends somewhat on weather tho.
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- Many times owners just take their dogs and leave, avoiding their responsibility for their dog's behaviour and consequences for the dog.
- Any dog breed/owner should have to do this. Even the house dogs.
- Most people with problem pets will run away from the scene, how long should one have to wait for bylaw to show up?

- The owners are 10000% responsible for the behaviour of their dog. If it was a child who hurt someone else the parent would have to stay there. Should be the exact same for a dog. The owners are responsible for anything the dog does.
- ultimately all owners need to be responsible for the actions of their pets and children.
- 100% owners need to take FULL responsibility for the actions of their dogs, and must be held responsible for any costs incurred as a result of such actions by their dogs.
- To be able to enforce the bylaw infraction more efficiently by getting all relevant information.
- Dog owner should be responsible for all costs of treating the animal.
- Follow-up rabies testing requires testing the animal that committed the bite. Great hardship is incurred by the bite victim if the biting animal cannot be tested.
- The owner needs to take the responsibility for their animal. Period.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets.
- It's important that there is accountability and responsibility with dog owners.
- Always need both sides of the story.
- Hold the owners accountable for dogs that are not properly trained and controlled
- Owners need to be responsible for their dogs actions.
- People need to be accountable for their dogs harming others, just as much as they would be if they themselves harmed another. They need to remain there to be issued and consequences and most of all to get the help they need to fix the problem with their dog.
- At the owners must be responsible for their dogs.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their dogs behaviour. If they flee the scene this is a lack of knowledge on how to train or control their dog.
- It is the right thing to do.
- The incident would need to be discussed.
- If they leave, the other owner is left with vet bills and no recourse. There needs to be stiff penalties for leaving the scene. Even stiffer if a child is involved.
- If your dog bites a person then you should stay at the scene or exchange information for further handling. If it's a dog attack on another dog the same rule applies unless it's a joint fight against each other where both parties are equal blame.
- It is important for the owner to take responsibility if their dog is acting out. If it becomes dangerous to others that is the time they need to be muzzled
- Owners should be held accountable for their pet's behaviour
- you are responsible for a bite victim.
- I think if there is a bite incident, the owner should be responsible for providing the paperwork showing the dog has all the vaccinations up to date.
- Unless needing medical attention.
- Dogs bite at off leash and then owners leave to avoid consequence
- Again, dog bites occur when an owner has not properly trained their dog. It has nothing to do with the breed, and the owner needs to take responsibility. By remaining at the scene and exchanging information, we can move forward in finding answers as to why the dog bit in the first place, and agree on a strategy to make sure it doesn't happen again.

- I do not agree with the proposals in section 3. This feels like we are racist towards certain dogs, and dog owners should be held more accountable- not the dog itself. There are plenty of other dogs aside from pitbulls who match all of the above characteristics, it is not fair that we are targeting pitbulls as a breed.
- How is that not a rule already??
- That way the enforcement officer gets both perceptions of what happened and can report on that .
- that is just being a responsible human being.
- Persons that own animals have to be responsible for there/their animals actions
- The owner should be held liable for not training their dog properly.
- I believe it is part of responsible ownership to be accountable for your dog's actions. If my dog bites someone, I would feel it's my duty to stay with the injured person, share my contact information and collaborate with enforcement officers.
- If they don't stay they can continue to take their dog out and not resolve the issue. More bits!
- No different then an mva or kids getting in a fight. Might be minor and there may have been reason for it but still good to exchange info at minimum.
- This should be for all dogs and not specified breeds. small dogs typically go untrained and can provoke bigger dogs if they feel threatened or if someone/another dog goes to close to their owners. Smaller dogs or any untrained dog of any size can be a threat if owners are no taking any sort of steps for training/manager dogs energy. if you're dog is in an incident, information should be swapped and the specific situation should be assessed accordingly. if a dog is chased/nipped by a untrained dog (of any size or breed), and the victim dog defends it self (which results in injury/death) , should be handled completely different than a "random attack". Dogs are like vehicles, without proper steps for car safety like obtaining a license or having automotive insurance (untrained/limited socialization/dog is unable to run&play/ not challenged mentally - for comparison purposes) any vehicle can be dangerous, and not just the larger trucks or sport performance vehicles. I believe local vets should be consulted on what is defined as a "potential dangerous dog" and not on looks alone.
- I feel for the safety of anyone even if it's a Pomeranian or chihuahua the dogs owner must remain. So that all proper vaccinations are confirmed for the health and safety of others. Also payment for vet or medical bills should be incurred by the dogs owner.
- Absolutely. Any dog attack should be documented and both sides of the story taken into consideration and documentation provided.
- Depending on the severity of the bite, especially if the dog has bitten another dog.
- This seems to be the ethical thing to do. Especially in cases where dogs have attacked humans, or when injury to the other dog is severe.
- It is important to stay on scene to ensure all parties involved are ok and do not need any further medical attention from the incident. The owner of the animal may have to pay for the victims medical/pet bills and bylaw should be involved to ensure this situation does not happen again with the particular animal.

- It is part of being a responsible dog owner.
- It is stupidity itself to blanket ban pitbulls and to put all the blame on them. Responsible ownership is key.
- Currently it is too easy for a dog owner to simply walk away and not be held accountable for the incident. Locating the dog owner after the fact in many cases would be difficult, so they should be compelled by the law to provide information or wait for law enforcement.
- Only if an injury is sustained. But yes, this should be treated like a car accident.
- They absolutely should stay at the scene. It's not ethical that they leave as a person should know if the dog is up to date on vaccines and it's part of being a responsible pet owner.
- Any responsible person should do this!
- Leave good dogs like Pitbull a alone! They are amazing pets. Punish bad owners!!
- Taking responsibility for things that happen with your dog is what you sign up for when you do get a dog.
- Both parties should remain providing no emergency. Enforcement should consider whether dog was provoked or not.
- I have too often been at off leash dog parks and seen irresponsible dog owners just unleash their dogs and let them get into trouble, when an incident like a bite or fight happens they just take their dog and leave. I feel they should be fined, the same if you leave the scene of an accident. I believe that almost all bites/fights are because of irresponsible owners. All dogs can be trained.
- Just like a car accident causing damage/injury, the person responsible for the damage should be required to remain at the scene until both parties have satisfied exchange of information for future claims.
- They are still our responsibility
- If it is safe to stay there, they should provide contact information - the people need to know the dog's vet so they can check for rabies vaccinations
- If safe to do so for all parties.
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their negligence and there needs to be consequences for it, just like any other altercation.
- The dog is the owner's responsibility. If your dog commits a violation, which it is not able to comprehend and therefore can not be held accountable, the owner must be held accountable.
- EDUCATE! This is an opportunity to educate the owner and victim!! Offer supports, inquire about the dogs health, etc. EDUCATION IS KEY TO SAFE AND WELL TRAINED DOGS!
- Most dog bites occur from either a dog being in a stressful situation or because of bad ownership, I do think that the owner should stay at the scene until a bylaw officer shows up. I also believe that the owner and the attacker should be held responsible for there actions. Not just the dog. There is usually a reason for a dog to behave that way.
- Blame the owner for dog bites. Not the dog.
- If a dog bit someone or another dog, then the owner has to take responsibility.

- If there is injury to another person or dog, similar to a car accident they should remain at the scene to get things resolved
- I believe the owner should remain on site, because it's possible that the dog bit someone in defence from being provoked.
- How is this not already required.
- This may not always work if a dog is highly excited due to an incident in a public area and there is no way to easily contain or calm them and then share information. But efforts to share info should always be made.
- Pit bulls as a breed are less dangerous than German Shephard, Husky, Great Dane, and other large size breeds. these bylaws are discriminatory to a species of dog. Poor ownership should be the main outlook for these programs rather than blanketing all owners with insignificant measures.
- If my dog attacks anyone or anything, it's common sense to stay on the scene to exchange info.
- Only if a dog bites a person or bites another animal causing significant harm. animals occasionally fight and it is natural.
- Owners should be help accountable
- The dogs behavior (good or bad) is the responsibility of the owner. Period. Victims shouldn't have to pay hefty vet bills because of the irresponsible actions of another dog's owner.
- Absolutely support this. Owners are ultimately responsible for the behavior of their dogs and must be held accountable.
- I support this
- They should remain their as a responsible pet owner. Explain their part of the situation.
- It's about responsibility.
- Injuries should be taken care of by the dog owner not the victim, so it's important that information is exchanged
- Need to know if the animal is vaccinated and ensure owner is held accountable.
- There are always two sides to a story and a victim is less likely to outline what, if any, responsibility they might have in the incident.
- This would provide the full story, as well as information for medical/ vet bills
- Stay to exchange info but not to wait for an officer. If dog is aggressive best to remove it from situation.
- Right now there is very little liability for dog owners especially those that say their "dog is friendly". This puts the public at risk.
- This should apply to all breeds and incidents.
- There are always two sides to the story. The dog owner can provide valuable insight into why the bite occurred
- Owners should be held accountable for their animals
- Absolutely! If a dog bites a person or other animal they should remain at the scene to explain what happened from their end to the enforcement officer.

- If your dog bites someone, you are ultimately responsible, unless that dog is protecting you or itself from attack
- Same as a traffic accident ...
- If there is a situation where a vet and or Dr is needed costs are involved. Both parties or the dog of the attacker should be held responsible for any financial burden.
- This is common decency and part of being a responsible dog owner.
- Yes! We have experienced a dog biting our dog and the owner leaving the offleash park and not sharing info. If common sense or civic decency won't ensure the behaviour then a rule might.
- The dog owner should stay at the scene to provide their information/talk to enforcement as long as the person who has been bitten or the owner of the animal that has been bitten wants it.
- Same reasoning as a car accident - no hit and runs
- Yes is self explanatory (it means I agree with this part)
- That just makes sense
- Absolutely the dog owner should pass on contact information and be available to speak to an officer. HOWEVER the dog should be controlled first and if that means the person has to remove the dog from the scene to somewhere safe that should be in consideration. If the dog owner has multiple dogs or is unable to control their animal that should be done first and the person must leave information.
- It makes the owner responsible for the actions of their animals instead of just running away trying to hide that anything went wrong
- You own the dog therefore you are responsible for the situations you put the dog in. If you put an aggressive dog in a situation where he/she could harm someone you are 100% responsible.
- While 90% of the time a bite from a dog will be caused because the dog feels that either itself or it's owner are threatened it can still cause some trauma and if any kind of medical care that can't be performed at home then both parties should be involved in payments
- "ONLY if the situation is safe!!
- If there is not a safe environment while waiting, both parties should take photos, get contact information for witnesses and report asap, go home to the safe environment until an officer can attend!!"
- Exchange if information is needed as the seriousness of the bite not been known plus repeat offenders should be identified
- There are two sides to every story. The owner of any dog who injured a person or animal Needs to accept responsibility for their pet.
- Information should be obtained for future investigation, for example, repeated offences
- Yes, unless it is in the best interest of everybody involved to remove the dog from the situation immediately, which results in the owner having to leave the scent prior to authorities arriving.
- Should know if the dog has bitten people before.
- People are responsible. Not dogs. No bread is more vicious.
- It's obvious, no?? Just like a car accident.

- If a person damages another person or their property with their car it is illegal to leave the scene. Why can someone who's dog does the same leave the scene? If you have damaged someone's person or property (pet) with your own property (pet) it should be no different than a vehicle.
- It is part of being a responsible pet owner. You are responsible for their actions. However most don't stay, because it seems regardless of the circumstances, they are afraid their animal will be seized and eventually euthanized.
- this makes sense, owners have to take responsibility for their animal, however it should be inquired further about the circumstances of how the incident occurred.
- If the dog owner leaves the scene, how will we know their contact information to issue a fine?
- PLEASE do not call out a specific breed. Focus the bylaw on nuisance dogs.
- Support. Just like a hit and run.
- That seems like common sense to wait if your dog has bitten someone.
- A dog owner is responsible for the actions and training of their dog.
- Yes, pet owners should share contact information based on the incident. That would be responsible. I agree in theory, but practically I can see an emergent situation where the dog must be removed by the pet owner to reduce further harm or tend to wounds, etc. and they are unable to share information or wait for an officer. I'm not sure how you will enforce this rule. I imagine irresponsible pet owners will continue to flee the scene. Those that would stay likely are doing this already.
- It should be like sharing information in a car accident or if you witness an assault.
- Staying at the scene is just responsible ownership
- Depending on the severity of the bite, the owner should definitely swap information incase there is long-term effects for the victim.
- the dog cant speak for itself
- To own a pet makes you responsible for that animals behavior and so you must be responsible to deal with any incidents including providing your information.
- Responsible owners take responsibility for their dogs actions.
- If something you owns attacks someone then it is your responsibility to stay and deal with the consequences. So yes if your dog, of any breed, bites/attacks/causes harm then you should be staying and dealing with the injured person or dog
- I think they should stay long enough to share contact information. If they need to leave at that point, to get their dog away from the other person's dog, I would be fine with them leaving at that point. But just walking away without exchanging phone numbers/address shouldn't be acceptable. However, when my dog was bit, I left quickly. I wouldn't have wanted the other dog owner to be in trouble for also going home. He knew where we lived and knocked on our door to apologize, which I thought was acceptable in the circumstances.
- That's the responsible thing to do
- I have had my dog attacked and dog and owner ran away. Never to be seen again or pay for 4500.00 vet bill
- Common sense
- People need to be accountable no matter what pet you own.

- Should be no different than an accident, do not leave the scene
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs behaviours and that includes training, fines and possible vet bills.
- Both parties are entitled to full disclosure and an opportunity to speak on the incident at the time of said incident.
- In all dog attacks/incidents situations need to hear both sides of the story. If a German shepherd shook a chihuahua, it needs to be understood if it was unprovoked or if the chihuahua was incessantly nipping/barking/biting said bigger dog.
- Your dog your responsibility. You need to take charge and responsibility in what your animal did. that means making sure you can be reached and held responsible if something occurred. While still giving your side of the story.
- It is the right thing to do as a responsible pet owner.
- Both parties should remain. that way it should be easier to explain circumstances.
- I think that this way, the owner of the biting dog can be contacted by the individual bitten or the owner of the animal that had been bitten
- Too often the owner is more responsible than the dog and should face harsher penalties. We need to focus on rehabilitation for the dog rather than punishing them for their owner's behavior.
- People are responsible for the actions of their pets, and should be responsible for the damage caused by them
- Pet owners must be held responsible for an animals behaviour and this rule ensures that.
- Information should be shared and the owner should be looked into
- If necessary, then yes the person should remain on scene, however I also believe that the first priority would be for the suspect dog to be removed from the scene to somewhere safe for it's safety (and stress levels) and potentially the safety of others.
- It is necessary to gauge the owner's competency in raising a dog, and how they react to the situation of their dog biting another person or animal.
- Would be the same idea as if you were involved in a car accident, you need to stay on scene and exchange information
- Owner should take responsibility for their animals behavior and poor training
- The needs to be consequences.
- It would be the responsible thing to do if your pet bite someone.
- Vet/health bills are expensive, the owner of the pet who bit should foot the bill.
- Too many times the owner just walks away.
- Common sense
- The human guardian needs to take responsibility for how their negligence had resulted in a anxious fearful dog and be required to follow up with force free training.
- Yes I do. Your dog has committed an offense and you leaving the scene should have the owner charged. Likely nothing can come of the altercation unless the owner is decent and offers to cover vet bills. But if not then it would be nice to be able to sue civilly for your money.

- To ensure that the person affected is safe and well, not to be charged but to ensure the victim is safe and taken care of
- It's the responsible thing to do.
- Shouldnt be any different than a vehicle altercation. Exchange insurance. Ect
- All pet owners should be responsible for the actions of their pets. It is not ever the dogs fault, it is the owners fault. And they should stay at the incident to be responsible.
- It may be a rule but the likelihood of the owner of a dog that bit a person or another animal is next to nil - rule or not.
- As owners we are responsible for the animals and absolutely should be required to remain and provide information as long as it is safe for everyone to do so. If the owners needs to leave to make the situation safe for all then I feel they shouldn't be charged. As longs as they come back and make an attempt to notify someone
- It is extremely important to have history of behaviour from the owner, and also their perspective on the incident. If information is only taken from the other party it sounds very bias.
- Owners must take responsibility for their dogs.
- It's their dog they should face the consequences for it's actions
- They are responsible for their animals, they should stay
- just like at the scene of a motor vehicle accident, people should remain at the scene
- To reinforce that dog owners are responsible for the safe handling of their dog and the safety of those in the presence of their dog
- Instead of staying at the scene, it should be required they report it to police. If they need to remove their dog from the scenario they should be allowed to.
- People can hide the dog if not addressed at the scene
- Yes, as with any attack the offending party must remain to take responsibility
- All bites, people should be sharing information with one another and owners need to be responsible for any care and attention that occurs as a result. Common sense prevails. In addition, I do not trust city or non-city representatives already, there could be a high degree of bias and professional expertise is already questionable.
- This would allow the officers to determine if the bite was of a repeat offender as a result of poor training/raising of the dog.
- How do you contact these people, what is the response time? What if the dog requires emergency vet care? Or the person?
- If there are vet bills or other costs, the owner should pay all or a portion of depending on the circumstances. This can be worked between the two dog owners. If immediate medical attention is required contact information is even more important.
- Seems like a no brainer - any responsible pet owner would stick around to ensure everything is in order and do what they can so it doesn't happen again.
- the owner should be held accountable
- The situation is similar to a motor vehicle accident.

- All sides of a story need to be explored. And often time the dogs aggression has more to do with the owner and their neglect (whether it be lack of training, obedience, or emotional/physical neglect).
- many small dogs bit or nip and the owner thinks it is okay because they are small. Some people think only large dog bites hurt or are worrisome, but statistics show smaller dogs attack more than larger breeds.
- People refuse to admit when their dog is a problem because it directly reflects their training and lack of connection with the dog. Victims end up paying thousands out of pocket when someone flees an accident where their dog was the instigator.
- "Owners are responsible for their pets. No matter what breed.
- Yes, owner should stay and take necessary steps to remedy the situation"
- Owners should take full responsibility
- Hold people accountable for their dog's actions. The dog is only as good as it's training.
- The person with the dog should have to give their contact info and a statement.
- Each dog owner is responsible for their pets. If a dog bites he or she should remain at the scene and should be comply to share any personal information that might be needed
- There are always extenuating circumstances surrounding a bite. Both parties should be present to give their side of the story.
- Regardless if the victim is human or canine, owners need to be held responsible.
- Collecting statements from both parties and bystanders for a fair case to be had in court is the only fair way to decide fate or future restrictions of animals, as is with people.
- No need to explain - it's common sense!
- This is fine - the officer should ask specific questions about which/if any dogs were under control. If the dog bitten was off leash in an on leash area the leashed dog should not be at fault.
- If a dog bites another dog or a human, that dog owner should contain the dog in the wrong and wait until they can be questioned and investigated. Like when you get in a fender bender and have to remain on scene.
- As long as the person could remain at a safe distance, the dog was no longer a threat, or was in the process of calming down, then both parties should remain at the scene.
- Duh
- Only if the dog bites a person, or has seriously injured an other animal.
- If it's a severe bit and they arrive quickly. Expecting people to wait > 15 minutes with no timeline isn't fair.
- To get the facts straight
- because it's the human thing to do?
- I believe that to be the due diligence of the pet owner to ensure the victim is safe, information regarding vaccines of the dog provided, and to communicate the incident from their witness testimony to a Bylaw Officer.
- It's the responsible thing to do as a pet owner. If your dog bites another dog you should cover the vet bill.

- Because it's the responsible thing to do.
 - Yes the owner should take responsibility. But one bite does NOT make a dog a bad or harmful animal. They could have been provoked. You never know the circumstances. As for "bully breeds" trying to muzzle them because of the type of dog they are in no different than treating a person a different way because the color of their skin or their ethnic background. It is all in the upbringing whether its human or animal, no one breed should be singled out. If anything it is certain owners that can turn these dogs aggressive but that is not the case for most.
 - Damage has been done, and needs to be dealt with; it depends on the severity of the bite though
 - Dog owners have to be responsible (and accept that responsibility) for their dog's behaviour. If a dog bites - action has to be taken to ensure that dog is no longer a danger to other people or animals
 - It's no different than a scene of a car collision. Take ownership and responsibility
 - You are responsible for your animal and their actions. No different then a car accident, if your dog is involved in an incident you should be required to stay at the scene or provide valid contact information.
 - Pit bulls should not be grouped like this. I know chihuahuas that are way more dangerous than most pit bulls. Again it sll comes back to training and owners.
 - Offender needs to provide immediate assistance and face the consequences. It's almost impossible to find out the person after they leave the scene.
 - "Not doing so is the equivalent of a hit a run.
- As a dog owner it is your responsibility to have your animal under control at all times. If your dog does damage to another dog or human then the owner should be held responsible, issued a fine, and pay any damages caused by their dog. For example, if your dog attacks and sends another dog to the vet, the owner of the dog that attacked should not only be fined, but they should have to pay the other dogs vet bill in full. This could apart of the tribunal process mentioned above.
- I also believe that education is key. Pet owners who have shown they do not have their dog under control should be forced to take obedience classes as a condition to keeping their dog.
- If people flee the scene and are caught later, their fine should be doubled and their pet licencing doubled for how many years the city seems fit."
 - My pit bull has been bitten multiple times by small dogs resulting in blood being drawn and the owner took the dog and left with no repercussions.
 - Responsible owners do this without rule requirements, Irresponsible owners do not. A rule of law protects breeds and dogs from irresponsible owners.

- This should apply to all dogs! Small dogs are often more aggressive and repeat offenders but they tend to get away with it as their bites don't cause as much damage. This needs to change. Don't pick on Pitbulls. Don't make this about Pitbulls. Enforce this with all dog breeds and sizes equally.
- A responsibility owner should definitely stay and deal with what their dog did! 100% their responsibility!
- Often the dog owners are the ones at fault, the dogs are communicating and the owners are misunderstanding their communication. The dog owners and their dogs need education, having them being enforced by an enforcement officer to seek that education should be the first step before going to tribunal. The education should be coming from a dog trainer or behaviourist that has no breed bias and the people should seek their own dog trainer/behaviourist (No city bias).
- It is the owner Who is responsible for that behavior, not the dog. As a responsible dog owner you need to stay and give your summary of the events that took place.
- It makes people accountable for bad or dangerous behavior from their dog for ANY breed of dog....all breeds being equal and not singling out a particular breed!
- People need to be responsible for their dangerous and out of control animals
- Vet/medical bills can be expensive and you should take responsibility for your pet. Same as a car accident.
- Pet owners should take responsibility for their pets
- Sometimes small dogs provoke other dogs with their big dog syndrome. Both parties MUST be talked to by officer.
- Only in certain circumstances
- The owner of the dog is liable for what the dog does
- I think this is reasonable so that tracking and appropriate monetary compensation if necessary can be established.
- I think you should stand up to what has been done.
- If the injuries prove more severe after the incident than first suspected I think it's fair to follow up with the owner.
- Any pet owner is responsible for the behaviour of their pet, and this includes taking the appropriate steps to support a victim of their pet's behaviour (or misbehaviour), as well as ensuring their pet receives the proper training/rehabilitation to ensure such incidents do not reoccur. If the owner is not held to this standard, it is unlikely the pet's behaviour will ever be addressed which is unsafe for the pet as well as the general public.
- You are responsible for your pet.
- You're are responsible for your dogs actions
- Its almost like a hit and run if there has been an offense and police called all owners and witnesses should stay and report
- Owner needs to take responsibility.
- Dog bites are fully the responsibility of the owner. Dog bites can happen for a number of reasons that are not related to aggression - fear and trauma can cause dogs to react defensively. Owners need to be able to communicate with officers so that the reasons for dog bite occurrences are better understood and to ensure we are using the best enforcement and compliance options for these instances.

- Because both version of the incident should be heard and equally accessed to make fair judgments.
- Yes, depending on the severity. Dogs bite, nip and make contact when they play fight. Unless medical attention is needed then it shouldn't be necessary. You don't want people taking advantage of a rule such as this.
- Just like with your car, you cause damage, you must remain on scene. It will make follow-up much easier for then victim and authorities.
- pretty self explanatory.
- It's important to know the owners history as well as the dogs history. It would help in the healing both mental and physical health of humans and other animals when seeking medical help.
- If you hit a person with your car don't you have to stick around? Should be no different it should be considered an an incident that requires further investigation with all parties involved
- This creates a record for that animal. If it has repeat offences, you have proof.
- The owner to the pet needs to be accountable for its behaviour - just like a vehicle accident the person needs to stay at the scene
- X
- Responsibility
- This will help THE OWNER to be accountable and get the correct resources needed for THEM and the DOG. Education, training ect.
- If a dog bites another person it is a very serious incident. It should be handled by the police. If there is a fight between two dogs and one suffers an injury that is on the owners to resolve and they should be required to exchange information so the incident is on record.
- Dog owners should be required to remain at the scene, where safe, to exchange information in the event of a bite.
- Allows for a clearer picture and questions to be answered
- Take responsibility for your dog's actions. It's your job to control/train them.
- If that person is in serious harm it is the dog owner's responsibility to ensure that person is safe/okay. Similar to staying at the scene of any accident.
- Poorly trained dogs and owners often leave the scene because they know they're in the wrong.
- Just like a vehicle accident, the owner should be responsible enough to stay onsite, for any breed.
- Dogs that bite someone need to be held accountable. Owners remaining at the scene can clarify what happened. Maybe the dog was being teased and pestered and had reason to snap.
- Owners must take responsibility for any incidents involving their pet.
- I have been bitten by a dog while the owner was present. I went into shock and was not coherent for a short period of time and the owner was no longer around when this information exchange could have occurred.
- "• The ban is unconscionable. As dogs are considered pit bulls unless proven otherwise, the law is open to abuse through false allegations and unfairly penalizes low income individuals, where an

- accusation can mean the de facto death of their dog.
 - Focussing on breeds gives the public a false sense of security, as individual dogs may be - dangerous, regardless of breed; and punishes many dogs that are not dangerous.
 - It is costly to enforce, both for municipalities (through increased sheltering and enforcement costs) and the province (through lengthy, expensive and high-profile court cases).
- Various jurisdictions have found that BSL does not work because it targets specific breeds instead of irresponsible owners. The Centres for Disease Control in the US noted that, not only is it virtually impossible to calculate bite rates for specific breeds, but dogs of any breed can become dangerous if they - are raised to be aggressive and individuals who exploit dogs will simply turn to another breed. In an article
- written by Global News in 2016, statistics show that even after 10 years of BSL in effect in Ontario, the - number of dog bites has increased."
- This would provide the owner to explain the situation, as most times it is not the dog attacking but the individual(s) provoking the dog
- yes cause so many run away and leave victim to suffer and not get justice
- I do support this. But I understand the fear of an accidental situation and a dog owner terrified of losing their best friend and fleeing the scene. Every side needs to be looked at.
- Pit Bulls should not be singled out for their breed and punished for those that are the problem. I grew up in the 70's/80's with German Shepherds and they were the targeted breed back then. It's not the breed, it's the dog owners we should be worried about
- like a car crash you dont leave the scene. also in any legal dispute/problem youre required to stay at the scene so makes sense
- The same general principles as a car accident should be applied to a dog bite. Including a thorough investigation that might find the person with more damage ie the person who got bit at fault
- [removed]
- You're responsible for your pet, this is a matter of taking responsibility
- When a dog bites, the owner needs to take responsibility for that
- They need to share this information so they/their dog can receive the correct consequences
- At the very least owners should exchange ID verified by picture and contact info with each other or a responsible person.
- Just as the owner/driver of a vehicle must stay at the scene of an accident that should be true for accidents involving animals. Both sides of an incident need to be heard and a dog can not speak for itself thus it is the owners responsibility to do so.
- Owners of small dogs often get away with their dog biting other dogs and people because they are not viewed as "dangerous" and rather "cute". These small dogs often come after bigger dogs and blame is often put on the big dog. If owners of small dogs were held responsible for their dogs actions they might actually leash their dogs and train them properly.
- It is the owners responsibility.

- Need to take responsibility and provide explanation of what happened.
- Owner should provide contact info in order to ensure that dog has been vaccinated and won't pass anything to victim if there is an open wound
- Great idea!
- It seems like a common sense response for an owner to take responsibility for the bite and to wait and provide information that would be required for the bite victim and bylaw officer.
- As a dog owner it's my responsibility to take ownership if it misbehaves. As a park user, if I was injured by an animal I would want to know it wouldn't happen to someone else by the same pet (training of the animal, house sentence, not allowed off leash, muzzled or something)
- my dog was bit before by another dog off leash - the owner took off and I was not able to identify them later making it hard to get reparations for medical costs or follow up.
- Any owner is responsible for their dogs actions.
- It's like any other offence where someone gets hurt. You have to remain at the scene of a fight, accident, etc. It shouldn't be any different.
- Its not always the owner/gods fault, ive seen people step over their boundaries despite being warned or eere aggressive and the animal could react to tey and protect and they should get the chance to explain their side to the proper people
- the Dog guardian is responsible for the dog's behaviour, and should be obligated to remain and exchange information similar as required for vehicle collisions. However, many owners hiring dog walkers and trainers to exercise their animals therefore the bylaw should be specify that the person responsible for the animal at the time of the incident must remain. otherwise a paid dog walker could simply walk away and refuse to provide contact information because they aren't the owner. the owner might be very engaged and responsible but is penalized because the person hired to look after their dog did not have full control of the animal at the time of the incident.
- I think they should remain on scene because it's the responsible thing to do. If you're going to own a dog there is a responsibility that goes along with that. I also think it's helpful to get the two differing points of view. Most dogs bite only after giving several warning signs and as a last resort so I think it would be helpful to have someone giving information from the dog's point of view.
- Every person is responsible for how their animal is trained and their actions.
- That is a prime example of responsible pet ownership. The owner must own the actions of their pets.
- I think, much like a car accident, if your animal has caused harm to another, you should be required to stick around. I just hope that this wouldn't mean that the animal is instantly at fault...I'd like for both parties to be present to explain the scenario.
- owners need to take responsibility for their pets, even if it was an accident
- If they leave the dog, the dog will continue to roam, it's harder to locate the owner and dog. Like a car accident, they should remain at the scene to help everyone involved.
- Dogs may react differently to certain situations, a dog bite doesn't make a bad dog and housing a dog in a shelter can cause other issues with the dog. It should be in its home, provided the humans are determined to be capable of proper rehabilitation with the animal. If a dog is seized for reasonable grounds, it should be offered the option of rehabilitation with any number of capable rescue/sanctuaries, and should be the first course of action to a dog that cannot go back into its home. These dogs should be offered to reputable rescues/sanctuaries that have been deemed fit by their history of rehab. Yes a dog owner should be required to remain at the scene of an incident, unless otherwise deemed unsafe to remain. Information should be shared between all parties involved just as in a car accident.

- As a dog owner if my pets ever exhibited this behavior I would stay and report everything because that's responsible ownership. The bylaw officers cannot act in good faith if one half of the story is missing or the person responsible has fled the scene because they were intentionally teaching the dog malicious behavior. If the person chooses to flee the situation it should be seen the same as fleeing an accident and charged accordingly. Dogs will cross boundaries with other dogs who won't hesitate to stand their ground, so it's vital that each side is present to give an account of what happened. One side is likely to be hysterical and refuse to accept personal responsibility for what transpired, but that would get sorted out in tribunals. Not all dog bites are signs of aggression and I wager some transpire due to nuisance children who's owners refuse to curb the behavior.
- Just a common courtesy . Both sides of every story needs to be told .
- It is the dog owners' responsibility to deal with their dog's actions and also there are 3 sides to every story.
- So things like proof of vaccinations and such can be collected
- If necessary, if my dog were to ever bite another animal or human I would of course remain there. The exceptions would be if my dog was protecting me from harm, then I would not remain.
- Pit bulls do not have a stronger bite force than even a German shepherd. Stop breed shaming for no damn reason! If a damn chihuahua can get away with biting people on a daily why aren't they banned ???
- It should be treated as an assault
- Because it's the right thing to do. How else do you keep track of an owner who doesn't take responsibility for how they have trained their dog. ITS NOT THE DOG. ITS THE OWNER.
- Owners should be held responsible for the actions of their dog. A dogs behaviour is a direct result of their training.
- In severe bite cases owners should take responsibility for their dogs behaviour and stay present on the scene in order to communicate the events and give their contact information
- The owner needs to be accountable as their dogs actions are their responsibility.
- They should remain to provide information so the person but can know if the dog has had its immunizations and it would creat a level of accountability for owners. Or at the least provide contact info if the dog is unable to be subdued or is still agitated to the point of being a danger and needs to be removed.
- it's important for obtaining medical proof of the offending dog being up to date on shots and for payment of vet or medical costs for the victim
- The dog owner is responsible for the behaviour of the dog and should stay at the scene to provide their information.
- Contact information should be shared just like any other public incident.

- If one animal has done harm to any other it is your responsibility as the pet owner to help out in any way and help pay charges or vet bills or hospital bills.
- If the bite is severe.
- To tell their side of the story of what happened
- Two Large dogs on a leash attacked my small dog at an off leash park. The owner ran away. Some resources to find these owners is also required. She should have paid my $800 emergency vet bill but I couldn't find her.
- The owner of the dog that caused a bite should be held accountable. I also feel they should be there to tell their side of the story as the dog that bit is not always at fault for the behavior.
- Same as a car accident. There are always 3 sides to a story.
- While no specific breed should be considered 'extra dangerous' as a dog's behaviour directly results from its training and not it's breed, any dog that injures another person or dog, and their owner, should be held liable for damages done.
- The owner is responsible for the actions of their dog and should be held accountable. It also allows for a more accurate decision to be made when an enforcement officer hears both sides of the story, within a short time frame.
- they should be accountable for their dogs behavior, even if it was an accident or misunderstanding.
- As long as it is safe to do so and they have a safe place for their dog to be during that period of time.
- It's in the best interest of everyone involved. The person who was bitten can feel more reassured that the dog will be under control and not bite someone else until it's been dealt with. It can have a negative impact if the owner leaves and you start being afraid of every dog. Saying this, it may not have been the dog's fault 100% - the person could've been ignoring what the owner was saying "please don't pet my dog, they aren't friendly." "Please don't let your child poke them in the eye" and ignoring signals given by the dog. If the owner is present, they can explain that too
- It's like being in an accident. You have to remain at the scene. The ONLY exception would be the owner getting the dog away from the victim - in which case they should still return when it's safe to do so.
- It's important that dog owners are held accountable for the actions of their dogs. If a dog owner has failed to properly train their dog, regardless of breed, it's on them to be responsible.
- As the dog owner you should remain to take responsibility of your dog, as well as share your side of the incident. It's not always totally the dogs fault. Are there circumstances that caused the dog to act in a defensive manner. Did the person who was bit, do something to provoke the response by the dog.
- Every owner with a dog who bites should have to stay to talk to an officer to have mandatory training and behavior modification put in place. I don't think fines work, the owner needs to be taught how to properly handle their dog safely and the dog needs training instead.
- Owners NEED to be accountable for their dogs.
- Again, as the person is the problem, they should be required to remain on scene and be held accountable - as with any other crime. We need to shift the focus from punishing the animal to punishing the people as they are the source of the problem.

- I think its important to get the owners information, the victim needs to know the dogs medical history, ie. Shots etc.
- Thats the responsible thing to do. If they were to leave, that should be treated like a hit and run vehicle incident.
- Too many dogs at off leash parks have tried to or have succeeded in attacking my dog that is on a leash. Then the owner just picks up their dog and leaves as if vicious attacks in public places are normal behaviour for a household pet. Usually it's a chihuahua or terrier dog.
- It's no different than a traffic accident!
- Violent attacks from someone's animal should be a reason to legally be required to stay at the scene.
- I believe it is the responsibility of the pet owner to stay at the scene if their dog were to bite someone or another dog/pet.
- It's best to get the whole story. What if that dog was being provoked?
- People should have to wait for bylaw officers after an incident just like with vehicle accidents.
- Of course someone should come help if it's necessary. But dogs don't bite for no reason, it's ALWAYS on the human for provoking it. Dogs can be trained.
- I have had a friend that was bitten by a dog then the owner refused to give contact information. The threatened them with their dog to leave. Eventually he followers them back to their car to get their license plate. This needs to be mandatory.
- There should be responsibility for a pets actions, such as taking on the injured pets vet bills
- I am disappointed to hear that the City is considering discriminating against Pitbulls. There are many examples of Pitbulls being gentle and friendly dogs. The onus is on the owner to train and handle their dog properly, and responsible Pitbull owners shouldn't be punished for poor dog owners. Although incidents occur with Pitbulls, this is not due to their breed being inherently aggressive, but rather the trend of Pitbulls being purchased/adopted by careless owners. Any dog can become aggressive if not trained properly. I suggest that the City consult with animal rescue organizations in Calgary. I'm sure they will tell you that they have many gentle Pitbulls that don't have homes because people are too scared to adopt them, and by implementing measures such as the ones you're suggesting that specifically target Pitbulls, you'll cause more gentle Pitbulls to spend their lives in a shelter.
- owners have to be accountable and present to share both sides of the story
- The dog is your responsibility therefore you are responsible for it's actions. If it causes damage, you are responsible for it.
- This will put more responsibility on dog owners
- It is not the dog or the breed, it is the OWNER and how they have raised that dog. They (and only they) need to stay and accept the responsibility that their dog bit someone or something.
- They should be fined if they leave!
- If your dog bites someone, their information should be taken & steps should be taken to ensure it doesn't happen again.
- For both sides of the story

- The owners need to take responsibility. A lot of the time owners run away because they haven't trained their dog and haven't taken the time to understand the signs of a dog in distress or an anxious situation
- Incidents and unfixed behaviours are the responsibility of the owner and not a result of the breed so the owner must remain accountable.
- I have seen and heard of a lot of small dog breeds biting larger dogs breaking skin and having those dog owners walk away because they do not care how aggressive their dog is because of how small they are. Please do not judge a dog based on their bite. Judge an owner for not providing training and care to have a well trained animal. I'm tired of hearing that pitbulls should be banded.
- You are the responsible owner of the dog. It is similar to remaining at the scene of an accident. The owner may need to assist in controlling the animal, and assisting the victim. The dog owner must be fully accountable for their dog.
- That way it can be tracked what breeds and what individual dogs are actually biting
- Most people don't take responsibility and take off before you can get their info.
- It's the decent thing to do. The human should be held accountable, not the dog being punished. Human should be mandated to take training courses with their dog!! Again, all breeds!
- The more information the better
- If someone feels that sufficient harm has been caused by a dog bite to engage an enforcement officer, I believe the owner of the dog should be required to share contact info and communicate with a bylaw officer.
- It needs to go on record so if it happens again it is known that it is not a one off. This animal is developing dangerous habits. That way they could be addressed before it is too late.
- it should be required and is the responsible thing to do
- Responsibility and safety. But to encourage people to stay a dog bite shouldn't automatically mean a dog will be put down. People may run to protect their loved pet
- My daughter was bitten 13 years ago and nothing was done about it the dog should have been forced to have training and the owner should have had a permanent record of improper training of an animal .
- It's common courtesy
- Depending on the severity of the bite, I believe it would be beneficial to get the dog's health records to be able to catch diseases passed through saliva such as rabies.
- Not sure how you can enforce that most people leave
- Of course there needs to be accountability as the person or owner of the animal that was bit may also exaggerate the story or omit important information that could determine why the bite happened. Example: two dogs playing fine, suddenly one gets a bit snappy and asserts dominance and neither owner is aware of the proper way to break it up without escalation. Dogs play and fight sometimes, it doesn't always mean the dog is vicious.
- If it is bad, sometimes dogs can be unpredictable as they are animals, and escalating a minor occurrence may lead to negative outcomes
- Owner is responsible for dog's behaviour, it is not a wild animal.

- I think regardless of breed if you're allowing your animal to be off leash or close enough proximity that it can bite someone, it should be well behaved enough or restrained (ie. muzzle) and be trained to handle these situations better. And if the dog isn't acting appropriately and does bite, consequences should be taken seriously. Accidents do happen so there should be amends for that (in the same way fights can break out on a playground).
- This makes sense.
- It's common sense they need to be responsible for there per.
- There should be severe fines for someone leaving the scene of a dog bite without exchanging information including insurance/license information.
- A person/animal has been injured, insurance etc will be needed to pay for medical needs to either person or dog bitten.
- its the responsible thing as a pet owner to do
- I don't agree with the tribunal because people outside of the city should not have a say in our city's bylaws. A system should be in place that examines ALL parties involved. That means the owner of said dog, and the "victim(s)." I also think a better alternative to the tribunal would be animal behaviour specialists that can really examine the dog and get a better understanding of what happened, whether poor training and/or ownership, a reactive response to a trauma trigger, or other. The person should have to stay on the scene of a dog bite because the owner is almost just as responsible and should be included in the investigation.
- Absolutely must take responsibility for their dogs actions and stay at scene
- A dog is a part of your family so if it breaks a rule you should be required by law to present yourself to stand accountable for you family member.
- It is important to understand the dog that attacked for purposes of insurance and any disease it may carry
- Its like a hit and run; if you are involved in an incident, remain at the scene until officers arrive, or at least provide reliable contact info if you must secure the animal elsewhere.
- I think it is important that people realise they are responsible for their pet's behaviour, and should be accountable to anybody their dog harms.
- Dog owners should be responsible for there pets actions
- Seems pretty simple. Should be the same as if you're in an accident. If you leave, you're charged with leaving the scene.
- Same rules as a car accident
- Contact information is important in case there are complications
- I think this would be a good idea if there are puncture wounds.
- Only if the victim wants them to
- Dogs don't have a voice. The owner needs to be the voice for the dog. The owner should be looked at in the same respect as the dog. There's no bad dogs, it's bad owners that is not teaching them. If the owner feels the dog is a threat, keep them on leash and handle them.
- See 4.
- They are the owner!! They are 100% responsible for this behaviour and the choice to own an animal.

- Each dog must be regarded as an individual and assessed on its specific behaviors... This comes straight from our own Calgary Humane Society. Please do not use your personal bias to force pit bull owners to mistreat their dogs. By muzzling and treating Pit bulls differently we are doing nothing to help the animals. Please leave your personal bias out of this and instead look at scientific facts/studies which show that Pit bulls are no worse/different from other dogs.
- This should be the normal process for any dog bites. Not just specific breeds
- All owners should take responsibility for their dog's actions and be present to offer a solution for whom ever was bitten (dog or person). Also to determine who was at fault, ie. dog who was bitten was running at large towards a dog on leash/ under control, and dog at large was bitten because owner did not have control of it, owner of dog at large is at fault unless at an off leash specific area.
- Too many owners leave the scene and do not take responsibility for their dog. This must apply to ALL dogs as small dog owners are often ones to leave claiming it was only a small bite. Small dogs are more likely to attack without warning than large dogs.
- Dog owners should be held responsible for their dogs actions. We shouldn't tolerate hit and runs when it comes to traffic so the same should apply to dogs.
- Absolutely, should be treated like any other accident. Stay at the scene.
- At the discretion of the individuals involved
- Info must be exchanged so that the victim has recourse for vet bills, and/or civil action.
- Just like with vehicles, if an incident occurs you should legally have to stay at the scene to exchange information & provide a statement of events.
- only for person bites, requirement for both types of bites would be to share contact info
- I think this is really important
- They should have to pay for injuries
- Just like driving a car if you're inviting an accident that requires officials then you should stay
- Yes only if safe for everyone involved, including the dogs. If stress is high then I think the situation needs to be dealt with either over the phone or at a distance from where the situation occurred
- It could be tough to get them to stay and/or identify themselves
- Yes, similar to a traffic incident. However there should be allowances to permit safely removing the animal(s) from the scene to prevent further problems.
- the owner should be held responsible instead of running away
- I believe all incidents should be reported by both parties and both sides given! If you refuse to stay and accept what happened and defend your animal then you should be fined and have to go through a program with dog training that is mandatory or you have the potential to lose your dog! If it's not okay to leave a hit and run then it should be okay to leave an incident where your dog injures someone and you need to take responsibility
- people need to start taking responsibility. There are no bad dogs only bad owners.
- If their dog is at fault they need to remain at the scene as they should be liable for expenses the other dog owner may have due to vet bills or personal injury
- Your dog your responsibility to answer for him/her.
- It's a huge fine for leaving the scene of a car accident. It should be no different here

- n/a
- However, the owner must be allowed to safely secure their dog somewhere else so they can speak to said people.
- I mean... this seems to make sense if the owner is at the location at the time of the biting.
- That way you have a record of such incidents with the actual dog and owner.
- A dog owner is responsible for the behaviour of the animal
- Too many people can just leave with their dog and nothing is done for enforcement if they are not held responsible.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their dogs actions
- I believe that the owner needs to give information however depending on the situation because sometimes your only option is to get the animal removed from the situation so it doesn't escalate and cause stress to everyone including said dog
- Dog owners should be responsible for their pets
- For the sake of the dog, the owner, and the victim, I believe that the owner should speak with an enforcement officer to receive guidance and referrals to resources that would prevent a similar incident from happening again. If the injury is severe, the dog will need to be seized.
- So based on this question if a person is being attacked and their dog intervenes in this essence absolutely do I believe the dog should be praised. Also I believe if you have an animal that bites a random jogger etc etc. That is not on the animal that is 100 percent on the owner and should remain at the scene. Where this is skewed is were so quick to destroy the animal and not look at other alternatives to remove the animal from said environmental where alot of the times if placed in different surroundings with someone educated on the breed "problematic dogs have different outcomes. It all comes down to the owner and responsibility they have for proper care and exercise not to mention correct discipline
- I think if the injury is at a certain severity. Just like a car accident
- I have seen multiple incidents at local dog parks where owners flee after their dog lashes out and attacks another dog. I believe that they should be held responsible for some or all of vet costs.
- That's just simply part of being a responsible dog owner. Plus, there are always 2 sides to the story that must be considered.
- The same as any other incident
- This shows accountability for the dogs actions and therefore the human is responsible for any and all damages done to animal or human.
- It is important to share if the dog is up to date on vaccinations and well as any other needed information.
- Absolutely. If I get in a minor car crash I'm required to stay at the scene and exchange information. It makes sense to have the same criteria for a dog biting incident.
- Any responsible dog owner needs to accept the consequences of not having their animal under control but it needs to work both ways. If I have my dog on a leash and some other dog or person runs up to that dog and gets bit, their should be zero chance of a fine or penalty aside from a warning and a muzzle recommendation. It should be documented in case it persists.

- They need to be there along with any other witnesses to advocate for all involved parties
- I agree with this but there are plenty of other types of dogs who are aggressive towards other dogs. Pitbulls are so friendly and loving.
- It's the right thing to do. Like a car accident or any other incident
- Pet owners are responsible for the damage caused by their pets, whether that be to a person another animal, or property. They should be required to face that responsibility.
- The owners should be held accountable for the dogs biting people
- It's not the dogs fault. It's that persons fault they haven't put the effort in to train their animal. They should have their animal taking away because they aren't a responsible pet owner.
- If someone gets injured by my dog. You can bet I'll stay or make sure they are ok! As everyone else should as well.
- IT IS COMMON SENSE THAT A PERSON REMAIN AT THE SCENE OF ANY ACCIDENT
- It is basic responsibility. If my dog bit a child I would stay regardless to at least ensure that they are okay and see if I could help. However the contact sharing should include ID and the owner should be permitted to bring the dog home first and return to speak with bylaw if necessary
- If another dog attacks me or my dog the responsible owner needs to be held accountable and not be able to just walk away from the damage they have caused.
- A dog bite could be likened to a car accident. Drivers must remain at the scene of a car accident. All parties involved should be required to remain at the scene of a dog bite.
- its the responsibility of the dog owner
- This is common sense. All cases, the owner must stay, and take responsibility. It doesn't mean their dog should be declared dangerous, perhaps the dog felt threatened. It must be reviewed fairly, case by case. Do not stigmatize pit bulls.
- think the exchange of information could be likened to leaving the scene of a minor car accident.
- Of course! Your animal caused potential harm to a human or animal they are essentially committing a hit and run by leaving the scene.
- any incident should require someone to stay
- Owners are responsible and liable for actions of their dogs, they can't be allowed to get away without consequences to themselves for their allowing or promoting inappropriate behaviour in their dog
- A dog owner needs to be held accountable for their pets' actions. The responsibility lies with the owner to ensure that their dog behaves properly.
- There may be criminal or civil liability arising from the incident. Treat this like a collision. Fleeing from the scene and failing to render aid should also be considered serious.
- Absolutely a pet owner should have to stay to be questioned and potentially fined.
- They should be held accountable for the actions and can provide information of whether the injury occurred due to aggressive behaviour or animal instinct as a result of provocation.
- Stating at the scene is common courtesy it's scary to think there ISNT a law requiring this.
- Just like a car accident, the owner responsible for the dog should be obligated to assist the responding officers by filling in any gaps in information they might have. This is primarily for the safety of the dog and potential future victims.

- Both sides of story should be heard by neutral party
- If the bite is severe than yes because it costs quite a bit for veterinarian care
- The dog owner needs to take responsibility and explain events leading to the incident (kids throwing rocks, pulling on collar, etc)
- I was bit in the face as a kid and it's traumatic
- I think every dog (not just the pit bull breeds) should be under the same restrictions. An animals behaviour is engrained in the owners ability to train/commitment to the dog, and I don't think just one breed should be held responsible. I've been bit more times by small (house) dogs than by any other dog.
- The behaviour of a dog is solely based off of the owner. For an owner to flee after it's dog bites someone, that's just irresponsible.
- Owners need to take responsibility of their dog. It's not the dog that's the problem, it's the human
- I have a Pit Bull mix. If another dog attacks my dog and my dog defends himself, my dog is automatically persecuted due to his breed. The dog owner should stay, ask for witnesses to stay and both be present to state their version of events.
- Bites should be investigated appropriately and dangerous dogs do need to be reviewed/documentated to protect the public. This legislative should NOT be breed specific in any way though or designed to target certain types of dogs.
- I think that the pet owner should remain at the incident location to talk to an enforcement officer, regardless of the breed of animal. No one breed is more likely to bite than another.
- It gives all parties a chance to explain what happened and how to move forward. Although one dog bit someone or something, it may have been the other person at fault. Staying to talk with enforcement officers gives everyone a fair chance to explain themselves and have it sorted out. Just like a car accident where police come and then everyone has a chance to explain what led to the accident. No difference. People who leave the scene should be seen as guilty and ticketed for leaving.
- the owner of the dog that caused injury to the person or / and dog may be held liable for expenses of recovery from the incident
- Because it's the right and responsible thing to do. Similarly to a car accident.
- When a dog bites, there is a reason. The owner knows his pet better than anyone else and should be there to explain behaviour. Was the dog provoked? Was the dog badly trained or not trained at all? The owner should be held responsible before the dog.
- For so many reasons! To defend or explain themselves or dog. To ask for witness statements.
- People need to be held accountable for their animals and just in some cases the circumstance is more severe than first assumed.
- Proves owner responsibility. If they leave, unless for a very good reason - should be a fine.
- It's only fair that the owner owns up to the dogs wrong doing unfortunately the several attacks My dog has been subjected to, the owner is either nowhere to be found or takes off. Don't know how you would implement a rule like this but it should be a rule.

- as to any incident (etc. vehicle accident), both parties will exchange information for recourse or settlement. This should apply to all incidents without discrimination of species.
- If they bite and run they should have huge fines/jail
- The owner is fully responsible for the behaviour of the dog and should be held liable for any damages that occur
- The dog owner is ultimately responsible for their pets behavior. If the dog was otherwise provoked (protecting the owner from adult or protecting itself from another dog attack) the statements need to be taken from both parties
- Owners are responsible for the actions of their pets and should absolutely remain at the scene of any incident regardless of the severity. It should be treated just as a vehicle accident.
- you are responsible for your pet
- Allows for appropriate identification of animal to ensure responsible owners are held accountable for animal behaviour moving forward
- People I know that have been victims of dog attacks say that the owner grabbed the dog and left the scene, leaving them with no way to identify, or any other recourse. Penalizing that lack of citizenship is appropriate.
- If your dog bites someone, there might be a reason behind that would need to be expressed by the owner
- People I know that have been victims of dog attacks say that the owner grabbed the dog and left the scene, leaving them with no way to identify, or any other recourse. Penalizing that lack of citizenship is appropriate.
- Dog owners should stay on scene to tell their side of the story. Regardless as to how bad the bite is.
- Of course the dog owner should remain at the scene.
- If a dog bites a person (not a playful bite) I view that as assault in the same way a person hurts someone else.
- Owner should be responsible for the vet bills of the animal bit
- The pet owner has to be responsible for their pet
- People need to take responsibility if their dog bites a person or another animal.
- If the issue cannot be resolved amongst the two involved, best to wait for an officer
- I would support this if done for ALL dogs. Smaller breeds bite more frequently and owners barely ever stay to support the injured.
- Similar to car accident fender bender, owners must stay at the scene to give contact information including drivers license or ID card
- The animal has committed an offence and as the owner is responsible for the animal they should wait for enforcement officers. Most nuisance dogs are owned by the low life of society many of them criminals, they must be held responsible.
- The owner should be responsible and give their information but if the situation is out of hand and they need to leave to put the dog away. What can you do, it has to be done
- If things are taken that far, sure. Figure it out and what the incident was, if bad enough, then yes remain there.

- The extend of injury is hard to know right away. If the injury of a bite is excessive, I would expect the owner(s) of the dog who bit to pay for any veterinary costs associated with the attack.
- Dog bite is an assault, especially on people
- They must remain so dog can be assessed and owners can give their side.
- Sometimes a dog owner will be very aggressive on scene and staying there could be dangerous. An intentional bite or aggressive behavior caused by not having your dog under control or not supervised should be fined and be held responsible for all caused injuries.
- I would like to see more ownership and responsibility from dog owners. Even if the bite was accidental.
- That should be happening regardless of the severity. There should also be mandatory obedience training that they will have to take in case this isn't an isolated incident.
- Owners need to be responsible and if another dog or person is injured by their dog they need to be financially responsible
- Owners are responsible for their pets just as drivers are responsible for their vehicles.
- I agree, and it had better be with ALL BREEDS. There are negligent dog owners of any breed, and this extends to ALL BREEDS, not just pitbull type dogs.
- Dog owner responsibility is IMPORTANT
- depends if blood is drawn in animal cases. Sometimes a dog bites but as a warning instead of intent to maim.
- If it is a minor skirmish between 2 dogs, no. If there is injuries to either person or animal, then require the owner to remain there for bylaw. I've seen dogs defend toys at parks when another dog attempts to take their toy with no major injuries. I wouldn't require bylaw for that. I'd expect both owners to separate and avoid one another with their dogs.
- People need to be held accountable for poorly raising their dogs. Dogs should be rehabilitated with responsible people.
- All parties involved should have to give information the same way you could in a car accident.
- Ownership of any animal should require the utmost responsibility including ownership or your animals strengths and weaknesses. Witnesses should also have privilege of offering information. If an "intimidating" breed bites someone or some other animal and others witnessed poor ownership and obedience of the other potentially non "intimidating" breed the opportunity for defence should be there.
- Owners need to be responsible for their pets. Period. It's illegal to hit and run, why shouldn't it be if it's a bite and run?
- This requires officers to be available in a short time.
- Common sense
- "Owners must be responsible for their animals as they are product of their behaviours and training techniques. Owners must be properly taught animal behaviour and psychology to maintain a well balance mental mind of the animal.
- What is the root of the problem when it comes animals that are aggressive? Is it the breed or the owner?"

- It is a pet owners responsibility for whatever actions and consequences there are caused by their pet.
 - The dog owner should be responsible for their dogs actions.
 - Both dog owners involved have to remain on scene as well as gather phone numbers for any witnesses.
 - As long as parties are safe to do so.
 - Responsible pet ownership must include the owner. The pet owner should be held accountable for the actions of their pet, and this includes nuisance or aggressive behaviour.
 - People need to be held accountable for their dogs behavior
 - Sometimes bites don't look bad at the time, but can much worse within a short time. Any bite to human/animal should be looked at by a doctor/vet. Too many brush off the incident and carry on. For some dog owners they can have numerous incidents like this and no one is any wiser. It builds a history of the dogs behaviour if a bylaw officer is made aware of it.
 - You wouldn't leave a car accident before reporting to an officer. Why would you bite and run? Although, if the dogs cannot calm down, they may need to leave before it escalates further.
 - Yes. Everyone should stay and resolve what happened. Training the human to own and train a dog should be an option. Both parties should be looked at. It takes two to have an interaction.
 - Pet owners must be responsible for their pets
 - Is ANY dog bites anyone, the owners should be held liable in the same situation as a car accident.
 - Just like a car crash, hit and runs never turn out good for the person who left the area should be the same with dog bites
 - It's polite
 - "You would expect people involved in a car accident to stay on the scene, same should apply for any injuries or harm done to individuals at the hand of someone else.
- Something to keep in mind. If a dog has been aggressive and bit someone or their animal they may need to be removed from the area or situation promptly as to not further stress out the animals or avoid any further injuries."
 - The dog owner that bites another dog or person is at fault. They should also be paying for vet bills for the injuries dog. They should also be looked at to see if they are a responsible dog owner and should complete a dog assessment from some one that is qualified. Like a dog counsellor if some sort.
 - Same as a Vehicle collision. IF you damage someone else's car you are required to leave contact information. If your dog bites someone else's because you failed to handle it properly you should take responsibility.
 - Owners should be responsible for their dogs actions.
 - people should have to take responsibility for how their pet behaves.
 - The aggressive dog must be restrained.

- If the dog was being teased or other behaviours exhibited by the person being bite then that should have a major play and why the dog bite.
 - It's obvious
 - These incidents should be treated similarly to car accidents. There should be a mandatory exchange between the owners involved and the enforcement officers.
 - It's a pet owner's responsibility to be held accountable for their pet's behaviour.
 - we need transparency with bites and owners need to be responsible
 - Only leave to secure animal on property or in a vehicle, but The incident needs to be recorded and owners both need to be help to responsibility.
 - Need both sides of story and for the person bitten would be good to know if dog has all its shots etc and if dog is bitten contact info for vet bills to be sent to the irresponsible person with the dog who bit
 - It's common sense. Why does everything have to be mandated and made into bylaws?
 - At the very least, the owner of the dog needs to remain to see if the bite was severe enough to require proof of vaccination.
 - unless the person that got bit was attacking them, ie) assault or being robed and the dog was protecting the owner
 - People should be responsible for their pets
 - All incidents should be treated seriously and fairly
 - a bite is assault. If it is serious and can't be settled between the parties, the owner should stay
 - It is the same as if you hit a car. Do not run, but take responsibility for what your dog has done. Same as people do with their children.
 - Responsibility!
 - For every incident regardless of breed.
 - If it is a serious injury, no matter what dog breed, the owner should be held accountable. If required to remain at the scene, there is less confusion and more likely to get the correct culprit.
 - "no different than a car accident, except people care more for their pets than their car.
 - Vet bills are very expensive and the risk of someone fleeing or leaving false information is very high.
- an exception would be if contact information is shared in a reasonable manner like exchanging insurance at a car accident."
 - Owners need to be accountable for their dogs actions.
 - A responsible owner would stay around, period!
 - Equivalent to a hit and run if they don't.
 - Dog owners must take responsibility for their dogs behavior
 - Implications if they don't comply
 - Considering that more often than not people panic and leave, it does more harm than good. If the dog really hurts the person or other dog, they need to know that there are consequences. People typically leave because they don't want to be fined. If people were to stay and take responsibility then we would have a better grasp on the aggressive dog situation, and also understand that it does not also breed-specific as everyone would have a first-hand judgment of the breed as opposed to the people just claiming it was a pit bull when in reality it was nothing like one. It is a smarter idea and then would keep he said she said to a minimum. Just like the protocol with car accidents. Both involved stay at the scene.

- It is necessary for the owner to remain and take responsibility.
- I think the owner should be there at the time to be questioned when memory is the clearest.
- There are always two sides
- My dog was attacked at a park and she subsequently attacked another dog due to trauma. A responsible owner will remain on the scene and provide contact information.
- if you're doing to force owners to muzzle their pitbulls then you should also force people to muzzle their mastiffs, German Shepards, Rottweilers, Cane Corsos, just to name a few. All the dogs I just listed have a much stronger bite force than a Pitbull. Please reevaluate your stance to be more in line with scientific facts instead of personal bias.
- As someone who has owned a small dog having a larger dog bite her then have the owner just runaway was traumatic
- This could be especially useful both ways. Perhaps a disease your dog carries but is asymptomatic can be discovered in the wound of the other party, allowing your dog treatment as well. It just seems like good practice. It's an incident the same as a car accident.
- It is important for the dog owner to take responsibility especially in the victim's case, and so the dog will not have another opportunity in the future to injure someone
- If a dog is aggressive and bites another dog or human, the victim needs to know if the dog is up to date on shots. Plus, the enforcement officer will be able to find out if the dog is a repeat offender.
- As stated above, all parties need to remain on scene including owners of small dogs. I once had a small Pomeranian run up to my collie and was HANGING OFF HIS JOWL while his owner laughed at how cute it was. I finally asked the owner of the pomeranian to control her dog before my collie reacted and would be blamed for anything. By the way my collie stood there and just took it for a good minute before the owner pulled her dog off. Had my collie so much as shook his head loose, he may have been blamed for something he didn't do.
- I think due to liability it should be required. Just in case the bit is severe and law enforcement/the person/medical staff involved need to know the history of vaccines the dog has had.
- Similar to any offense, if you or your "property" are the result of injury you should be held responsible and remain with the victims until help arrives. However the cause of the harm should be put somewhere safe to avoid more issues.
- Owner needs to held accountable, no matter the breed. And also be able to tell their side of things.
- It's the dog owner's responsibility to be accountable for their dog's behaviour particularly in a biting incident.
- That's just common decency.
- Of course, they should be fined if they leave the scene. It should be treated no differently than if someone was attacked by a human.

- Dogs are dogs. They are only a reflection of their owners who have trained them, HOWEVER, there are circumstances where a human may be bothering, teasing, or acting in a manner the dog doesn't like. Dogs typically give a warning before snapping or biting and in that situation it's the human's responsibility to stop provoking the dog. If they don't, it's fair for them to be bit. You wouldn't expect a human to repeatedly be aggressively provoked and not stand up for themselves, why would you expect a dog to?
- Owners should be held accountable
- If it is a severe bite and not a playful bite that some dogs do while playing
- Unless the individual feels that they or their dog is in a situation where they feel unsafe or require medical attention.
- The owner remaining at the scene seems reasonable. It should also help clear up incidents where someone is bit and blames the wrong dog
- Because the owner of the dog is responsible and fleeing should be a criminal offence
- Both sides of the story will need to be heard. If the owner leaves then there is no one advocating for the dog
- Because it's the same as a car accident, if you cause harm to someone the right thing to do is stay, leaving is pretty much an admission of guilt
- I agree as long as the rule is NOT BREED SPECIFIC!
- Too many owners leave the scene of a bite to avoid fines or responsibility.
- This should be done regardless - if people leave the scene of an accident it's a crime! Same should go for a dog bite!
- You need to make sure the dog is up to date on shots and if surgery is needed then the owner should have to pay for half.
- Yes. If there was a bite information could be exchanged for the purpose to prevent the spread of disease
- The owner needs to take all responsibility for it pet and everything that happened
- Responsible pet ownership
- We need to get both sides of the story to make an educated and accurate decision
- The owner should be responsible and accountable for their pets actions.
- Responsibility.
- Serious dog bites causing harm can be seen as akin to car accidents. No hit and runs (without serious repercussions) should be acceptable in either case.
- Yes but only if at least 1 of the people involved think it's serious. (Sometimes there are minor and non aggressive bites when multiple dogs are trying to catch a toy and an ear gets caught). If deemed necessary, both owners of the dogs involved should be required to complete a detailed incident report with their contact information, regardless of this is done at the scene, vet police station, etc.
- If the animal is severely injured yes there should be some contact between animal owners for vet purposes only

- Exchange of information is key for vet bills, proof of vaccination and possible past offences if the owner is irresponsible.
- Just like a traffic accident - you cannot leave.
- This is just basic responsible dog ownership. It's like remaining at the scene of a car accident.
- If possible yes. If my dog bit someone, it's my responsibility to ensure the other dog is taken care of.
- My dog was mauled to death on my property. The owners of the two dogs who did this didn't give it a second thought and refused to contain their dogs after the attack. This resulted in us shooting the dogs.
- Absolutely as dog owners we are responsible for our dogs behaviour
- My dog succumbed to dog bite injuries and complications in November 2017. The bite incident took place in July 2017. The owner of the dog who attacked has no idea. Furthermore, it cost over $2000 in surgery and medication.
- Owners need to be held accountable for the actions of their dog as should the person who received the bite or aggressive action unless emergency medical attention is needed. There are always 3 sides to the story.
- I think it's absolutely necessary to see who is at fault before leaving the scene. Discrimination against a breed of a dog will always play a part, so the incident needs to be explained as soon as possible to some sort of officer.
- As long as the situation is controlled. Removing the dog as fast as possible is frequently the best way to contain and manage the situation.
- However, they should be allowed to take their dog to their car or somewhere away from the scene as to not escalate the situation any more
- I thought this was already the case?
- It should be like a car accident. People have to remain on scene to not only ensure the wellness of the person that was bit, but to explain their side to an enforcement officer.
- It's like a car accident, if at fault, you need to be made responsible, and provide a statement
- Should either party feel the need to involved bylaw then both parties involved should remain at the scene until enforcement arrives in the same way any other incident between two parties is managed. This allows for both sides to be document for clarity in future discussions as well as an unbiased set of eyes to see any injuries and collect additional witness details in real time.
- A responsible pet owner should always stay on scene!! Also have the dog assessed for behavior problems
- Owners need must be responsible for their dogs. It's the same as a car accident, no one wants a hit and run.
- This will depend on the severity. If its just a small bite, let the owner take the dig home. If its a damaging bite, require owner to remain on scene for bylaw.
- When my dog was attacked the vet bills were going to be over $2000. We could not afford this. One months pay cheque was less than $2000. Luckily the owner of the other dog gave us her contact information. We tried calling her but she wouldn't answer. Eventually the vet gave her a call and convinced her to pay. Requiring owners to stay at the scene would ensure that they take financial responsibility for the injuries that their dog has caused as well as it would allow the incident to be documented so that steps can be taken to ensure that it doesn't happen again.

- Absolutely. It's like a hit and run. Stay on the scene and be responsible
- To explain why the dog bit the victim. May have been the victims fault ie provocative behaviours against dog.
- I feel that sometimes explanations are needed as it's not always clear on what happened or how it was triggered and this will also help for any injured pets to get compensation for vet or medical bills
- How else is a tribunal going to work?
- This will provide the victim with the pet medical history and also assist in resolution. By staying, it gives the attacking dog a better chance than leaving the scene without the owner giving a statement of what happened. By leaving, the attacking dog looks guilty when it may have been instigated by the dog or person that was bitten. My pit bull mix has been attacked at the dog park for new reason but she did not fight back, she ran away. If there was injury, I would make the owners stay for enforcement to arrive because my dog was innocent. She was attacked by a bull dog. Pit bulls should not be treated any differently in the laws as it is not the breed, it is the owners. Other dog breeds are larger and stronger than pit bulls and it is unfair to alienate this breed. My rescue came from Ontario because of these laws and she spent months in shelters and she is the sweetest dog you will ever meet.
- Owners must remain accountable for their animal's behaviour.
- As long as the dog is under control, sharing contact information is the responsible thing to do
- Yes but depending on the situation. A fight between two off leash dogs, no, because that should be sorted out between the owners. Unwarranted dog bites on a dog minding their business then yes.
- Just like when a car accident occurs the driver must remain on the scene but good luck getti a dog owner to
- Of course they should remain at the scene and take responsibility for their pet and ownership.
- There is always two sides to a story so both sides should be heard.
- They should be responsible for the actions of their pet and should remain at the scene to ensure that they are able to advocate for their pet and be fined if necessary
- Common courtesy. If you hit someone with your vehicle you have to stay on the scene.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs actions and should remain present at any incident.
- It is important to get the owners information for follow up.
- The dog owner is wholly responsible for the situation, they should be there to talk to the person/owner and also in the case that the person antagonized the dog in any way they may be able to make that know for the dog who can't speak for themselves
- if they stay they can exchange pet heath records.
- it's important to be responsible for your pet and their actions.
- Law enforcement should be providing information regarding training and where to attend same to a) lower the fine and b) avoid unnecessary removal of the dog.
- similar to a car crash, both parties should be able to provide their account of the incident.

- I believe a dog bite should be treated similar to a car collision. Both parties must stay to exchange information and file the appropriate police reports.
- Owner are responsible for their animals.
- Absolutely. It should be the owner of the attacking dogs responsibility to pay all vet / medical bills and fines
- But I believe that they should be able to remove their dog and come back. If I dog bites, it's usually heightened or over its threshold. So keeping it at the scene could cause more issues. The owner should be able to remove the dog from the area to eliminate any further aggression from the dog, before returning and staying to talk to an enforcement officer.
- OWNERS need to be held responsible not the ANIMALS
- that pwrson is responsible for the damage, just like a hit and run car.
- This is a basic condition of accountability for your pet. I see too many pet owners leaving their pets to roam while they are on their phone. That is the first sign of lack of accuntability. So anything to give the message that you are accountable for your pet's behaviour is good.
- Or to leave name and number to be contacted as some times it is best to remove the animal from an upsetting scene
- Any owner who allows ANY dog to bite a person or another dog should be relieved of ownership of that dog and the dog should be euthanized. This should not be breed specific. Punish the negligent owner behavior, not the way the well behaved dogs look.
- Yes only if it is possible, some cases may not be suitable. Ie a dog fight and both dogs need vet attention
- No one dog breed is bad. The people that own them are bad. This would be like banning certain cars because they "crash" more.
- This would hold the owner accountable for the animal's actions and prevent owners from fleeing the scene.
- If a dog causes another dog or person to bleed from a bite, their owner should be liable to cover vet or hospital bill. Info should be exchanged in a situation like that.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs - just like any motor vehicle accident they should remain at the scene for dog related accidents as well. Behaviour isn't always breed specific - owner responsibility is key
- Should be common sense. Kind of like car accidents
- Maybe people run off with their dog when they know they are in the wrong or their dog has bitten before. Responsibility needs to be taken by the owner of the dog. As a dog owner myself it is important I am responsible for my dogs at all times including if an incident occurred.
- Both parties should remain at the scene to give their respective sides of the story. Context matters, especially if the dog bit someone due to being harassed or antagonized by the person first.
- But only in circumstances where the animals can be dealt with appropriately
- I don't think that requires explanation. It's an assault for which the owner is responsible.

- For severe bites this should be a requirement. Fines should be levied against an owner who does not comply. I get that this is a bit tricky as it essentially amounts to a citizen's arrest in cases where one party wishes to call bylaw enforcement while the other does not.
- Nothing to explain as the answer is in your question.
- Beyond needing their information for enforcement officers, the person/animal that was bitten needs to be aware of vaccines and potential exposure to disease.
- My dog was bitten by a Dalmatian and the owner laughed and didn't acknowledge the fact that I had to take my dog who is bleeding to the vet
- Yes, only to make sure other party's are okay and to receive the help they need. Not so that they can punish an animal for the mistakes of the owner. Should always be on the human and not the dog.
- The owner is responsible for their dog and thereby should remain at the scene of an incident to provide information and eye witness account
- Always important to get both sides of the story.
- Ensures tracking of bad owners and available follow-up if tribunal measures include dog training.
- My mother was attacked by a dog whose owner retreated into their home. The dog went on to kill another neighbourhood dog.
- responsibility
- It would be the same reasoning behind fleeing the scene of an accident.
- "Well I would think that any dog owner would be adult enough to stay around after this happened.
- But there are a few I'm sure and they should not own a dog."
- So the situation can be dealt with appropriately
- But owner of the dog should be given time to take the dog somewhere safe then return to the scene
- if the bite is severe, both owners should remain.
- There should be accountable by the owner if a abut occurs. Only contact information and vet information should be shared.
- Just like in a car accident info should be exchanged. So if a tribunal needs to be done it can. How ever if a dog bits someone because they are protesting there owner it shouldn't matter.
- the owner should take responsibility just like if there was an auto accident
- This is more a comment on the previous questions. Dogs cannot just be classified by breed - that's pretty much racism for dogs. "All pit-bulls are bad" Hogwash. I know many people that own the most loving, personable dogs that are pit bulls.
- People should be accountable for the actions of their dogs, as they should be for the actions of their children. If a dog is known by the owner to be reactive (regardless of breed) the owner should be aware enough to not put their pet in a situation where something like a bite or attack can happen, and therefore should be made to actually make a conscious effort to make whatever amends to resolve the situation that are required for both parties involved.
- You need both sides of the story. Like I said above was one dog provoked by the other and the owner did nothing to stop their animal provoking the other?

- Barring necessity to seek medical attention for the owner or dog, remaining at the scene, if safe to do so, should be mandatory - and seems in their best interest, as stories can be very one-sided in these unfortunate situations and extend the length of investigation.
- Biting a person yes you should stay and ensure the person is ok and doesn't require medical attention. With animals it can be more difficult due to the other owner not listening to warnings about the dog, and keeping 2 animals that are already stressed around each other after the incident can cause more issues.
- Yes, the owner and its pets should remain at the scene, to call for him, and offer emotional support to the victim, if, the dog can be controlled. If not, provide your info, and call for help, stay until help arrives. Its creating more areas to have disagreements with one's neighbors, and causing the city to possible add more by-law officers to deal with disagreements. Lets put our resources, to feed the hunger and get the homeless of our streets.
- I think if your dog bites someone you have a responsibility to stay and wait for law enforcement. You should be the one to call for help if your dog bites someone. I think this could be beneficial for both parties.
- If the encounter is not serious and the party responsible needs to leave (ex. has to get to work, pick up a child from daycare, etc.) it should be allowed for them to simply share their contact info. (For instance, they could allow the other party to see their Driver's License or other official ID in order to verify their name/address for the purposes of follow-up.
- "Yes of course I believe that. If something happens to the dog because someone else's dog bites or attacks it they should be responsible.
- Also to know what kind of shots and medical stuff the dog has"
- People need to be responsible for their pets. We shouldn't be blaming the animals for poor owners actions and/or training.
- They need to explain the situation and provide there side of the story
- I support this rule because if your dog seriously injures other dog/person, I believe it is the owner of the dog that has bitten the person/animal responsibility to pay for the medical/vet bills. So, this would require gathering each other's information and that person staying on the scene long enough for that to happen.
- Yes, so you can actually see what types of dogs are biting and causing a scene rather than just generalizing and saying "pit bulls" it'll likely be the annoying little dogs that cause issues.
- Owners need to be as decent as their pets are required to be.
- Just like staying at the scene of a car accident. It's about taking responsibility
- It's like a car accident, you should stay and give your information.
- Yes, but only if it is safe to do so and the dog has calmed down and is no longer a threat to anyone or anything else. Otherwise the owner and dog should leave their contact information and then leave.
- so long as they have regained control over their dog and it is no longer a threat to others (e.g. secured in a vehicle)

- Not doing so is irresponsible on behalf of the owner. You should be in control of your pet. Accidents happen and if that is what happened then you should be witness to it and explain the case, even if at fault.
- Owners are responsible for the dog, and there's always two sides to every story.
- If an accident occurs, it needs to be taken seriously. Everyone should be accountable and wait, exchange info, and call police if severe.
- If the dog actually attacks or bites without good reason, I would say the owner should have to stay there. If the dog was being teased or tainted and not left alone after warning someone to back off, it is not the dogs fault and the owner should be able to leave.
- Only if medical assistance is required to a larger extent, not just a couple scrapes. Dogs have emotions and get angered, snapping at each other is how they show this, it happens sometimes.
- It's accountability and responsible ownership. We are required to stay at scenes of a car accident. People that witness assaults are required to stay and give statements. BUT this would require more officers to police all this.
- This should not focus on Pit Bulls. This should focus on the yappy small VIOLENT dogs who are never trained and more dangerous than any PitBull. They get away with it because they are small, they are the biggest problem.
- Similar to a hit and run. They need to held accountable if there are serious injuries or damages.
- It would be the same as a hit and run for example.
- Everyone involved should stay so both sides can be heard
- Shame on you calgary about pit bulls. Its the owners Not the dog get a clue.
- The owner of the dog who bites should pay the vet bills for the injured dog.
- yes , but most people run away from site. it could be a personal safety issues as well. Best measure will be mandatory dog license and microchip. City should offer microchip services to all bully breeds, medium and large breeds of dog for a fee. Decrease the license fee for dogs and cat who have microchip and are spayed neutered. Microchipping should be made mandatory. City is also paying significant medical bills to emergency injured animals, which citizens take to emergency clinic. Most of these animals likely has no ID, so no way to find the owner and get the expense back, if animals has and ID , Owner should be made to pay for those bills regardless, as their irresponsible pet ownership let the animal to be out on the road and get hit by the car.
- I think it is important that the dog owner be present so they can be a point of reference for what happened
- The owner is 100% responsible for any bite that has happened. They are solely responsible for the training and handling of their dog, and if that results in it biting someone then they need to be held accountable. Being made to stay at the scene and provide information is a way to do that.
- It's like a car accident. If there's damage, both parties should share information.
- It is the owner's responsibility to train their animals, and face consequences if they choose not to.
- If something happens both parties should remain at the scene so the situation can be assessed evaluated and coaching etc can be provided on a real case by case method not hypotheticals based on false data.

- That way the issue could be properly assessed and addressed. In addition, it could be determined which person/animal is at fault (whether the dog bit out of self defence or aggression) and hopefully reduce false allegations.
- Because there are always 2 sides to every story. Both accounts should be given. I believe the dog should be removed from the situation (put in a vehicle) while the owner remain to give a statement
- I've been bitten by a dog and the owner left the scene.
- Except if the person or animal bitten is the aggressor in the situation. If someone attempted to stab and rape me I would ve happy my dog defended me and I would not hang around. Likewise if I was attacked by a bear and my dog defended me, I would also not stay at the scene. My safety comes first.
- I agree because of the fact that one any type of dog can bite or get bitten, so just calm the situation having the owner there would be helpful I think
- It is ultimately up to the owner to take responsibility for their pet
- Prevents a 'hit and run' of dog attacks
- I think people should take responsibility. It's not the dogs fault.
- Take responsibility and to explain the situation. Example if someone was teasing your dog or another nuisance dog is aggressive towards you or your dog, and your dog protects you and themselves
- Get the story straight. No confusion. The owner could not disappear.
- Responsible do ownership, begins with responsible owners.
- One must remain at the scene of the incident that they are responsible for as the owner of the dog. This is regardless of what breed the dog is.
- It is the owner who is responsible for the dog and should have control over that dog. They should be fined if the dog attacks another dog or a person.
- Owner is fully responsible for their animal
- They need to be held accountable for the actions of their pet.
- The owner should remain accessible, however, as someone with extensive experience handling dogs, this should contain an option of being able to move to a spot where the dogs are not able to see each other. In the case of a large dog that is over stimulated, it could be very physically difficult and dangerous to the handlers to remain on the scene. In this situation perhaps requiring both parties to call a certain number to be able to have an information exchange would be a good option. Or at least allowing the handlers to remove the dog(s) from the situation whether that be waiting out of site around a corner or confining the dog elsewhere and returning.
- The owner of a dog that would bite another person or animal should take responsibility for their pet.
- The owner is responsible for the dogs behaviour and should understand this.
- A dog owner should absolutely have to stay and provide contact information with the victim(s). This would allow the victim to seek compensation for medical bills or other expenses related to the attack. Depending on the severity of the bite, this would also allow enforcement officers to label a dog as a 'nuisance dog' and suggest behavior training or other options to the owner.

- ABSOLUTELY! Too many owners grab their dogs and run after their dogs provoke an attack on people or other animals. It should be viewed the same as a vehicle hit and run - if your dog attacks a person or another animal and you run away from the scene, BAM! you had a much higher, stronger fine or possible time behind bars.
- I have witnessed dog owners walk away after their dog has but another dog. It is the responsibility of the attacking dog owner to ensure that the attacked dog is ok. As well as to be responsible for any vet bills that come with it. If the attack was in Provoked
- It is no different than a car accident or assault
- The owner is responsible for their dog's behavior
- Similar response to a car accident
- It's just like a car accident. Must share info
- Dog owners need to be responsible for their dogs actions but also be able to tell their side of story.
- There should always be open communication between parties, and a satisfactory agreement should be met before anyone leaves.
- There should be contact information and vet records shared when there is a dog bite.
- With the exception that if the dog cannot be calmed down and contained, the owner should be able to return the dog home and be contacted by by-law when safe
- for many reasons, not least of which to share the dogs side of the story. Often a 'dog bite' isn't a bite at all, but a dog with an open mouth turning their head quickly, often when startled and if a tooth catches someone it is called a 'bite' when it clearly isn't.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs and thus, responsible for any damage they do.
- There is always 2 sides to an issue. If a dog bites there is usually something to cause it, if the owner is not there it turns into a "he said/she said" situation that is harder to decipher
- It's the responsible thing to do, just like any other accident involving another person
- The owner needs to take responsibility for the dogs actions. They are responsible for their behaviour and should be the ones facing penalty. The dog should be given rehabilitation training.
- This is a part of responsible dog ownership.
- also if a dog bites another dog this should apply
- Accountability is important. However situations should always be THOROUGHLY investigated to insure that fault is determined to the best of bylaws ability.
- Running off is irresponsible
- It is important that the dog owner give a statement of the incident. Depending on the severity of the bite and wait time for the bylaw officer . Dog owners information would have to be left with the appropriate authority.
- Only if the bite produces blood
- Remain at the scene if at all possible. If not possible due to reasons (like needing to remove the dog from the scene), the owner must leave a card or note of how to reach them.
- It is no different than remains in scene at an accident

- The dog owner must share contact information but doesn't necessarily need to remain at scene since this might be dangerous for various reasons.
- I think that people need to take responsibility for their animal. However if a large dog that was on leash hurts a small dog that was running free in a leash only area it should be the fault of the small dog owner.
- I think this rule will keep owners accountable for their dog, i do not agree that this should apply only to 'pitbull type dogs"
- So the can be held accountable
- Yes, but no harmful actions should be taken against the dog. All actions should be taken on their owner
- If they leave it is difficult to find them again, and owners should be responsible for the actions of their pet, including medical costs
- The owner should be held responsible in all cases. Dogs only bite when they are fearful or if they were taught to do so by aggressive behaviour from their owner
- It is not always safe to keep the animal in the area, it might be in everyones best interest to remove the animal from the location.
- Very important so that the vaccination history can be given
- Ownership and accountability.
- So can get things cleared up and not go on and on
- and responsible dog owner would stay to make sure the incident victim was taken care of and that responsibility would include contact info
- Treat it like a car accident. Owner must stay on scene and must provide information or get fined for failure to report. Which should be mandatory court
- Same as a car accident, either party could be at fault information must be shared.
- Best for the health of both dogs to ensure they can access medical history
- I think you should encourage this for all dog bites to bring light to how bad small dogs owners are at training there dogs or keeping other dogs or people safe.
- insurance, tribunal proof on the spot - photos, movies
- Too many owners are not responsible for their dog, lack of training their dog, and showing responsibility by remaining on scene.
- It's only fair that the other person (victim) know the details of the animal that attacked there's. And the person should be held responsible
- Absolutely. Have heard many stories of dog owners that leave scene after their dog bites another, the hurt dog needs vet services and car that is costly. The pet owner that bite the dog should cover or help cover the costs. Can only get that if dog owners don't leave the scene and if they provide their contact info.
- Medical and financial reasons and to be fined by the officer
- The pet owner is responsible
- The owners are responsible to share all details

- Only if an animal or person is injured.
- Once the dog is taken away from the scene (put in the car) the owner should be on-hand to speak to the enforcement officer.
- This makes the owner liable. You have to fix the main problem, not try and fix the inevitable consequence being the dog. The dog is not the issue so having the owner their would have them more liable for their actions of poorly training the dog in the first place.
- this way you can get the whole story and not just the injured persons side.
- Just like any incident this should be expected.
- Absolutely. It should be the same as leaving the scene of any crime. The owners are responsible and can teach a dog not to be aggressive.
- Treat it like a car accident.
- Yes this is good practice for ALL breeds of dogs for health reasons for the person bit. However singling out pitbull type breeds is retarded and does nothing. Chihuahuas are more likely to bite ir be agressive than a pitbull type dog so these owners should be required aa much as any other dog breed owner to control their pet and be responsible during bite incidents.
- owners are responsible for their pets, if an car accident occurs your not allowed to leave the scene why should you be allowed to leave with a dog bite incident
- "They need to be held accountable.
- FOR ALL BREEDS!!!!"
- I think that dogs should get charged after an offence (which requires the owner to be present for statement) and based off of how many charges they have (by doing a background check on a tag number or on the owner themselves) there should be levels to punishment. Such as 1st offence, warning (depending of severity) 2nd, obedience training with weekly/monthly check in, 3rd time, dog requires a muzzle and owner should be investigated and 4th- dog is seen as a threat and should be (at worst) euthanized. Or taken away from the owner who trained that dog.
- This is too arbitrary. Often, the victim, will go to the doctor immediately so the dog owner is supposed to stand around for what? Enforcement can come to their home.
- It would encourage owners be responsible for their pets / actions.
- Yes because the owner should be able to own up that they did not train the dog properly and it was the owners fault for letting the dog become aggressive and disobedient
- people own the dog. It is their responsibility.
- Keeping the dog at the scene could be traumatic for everyone but I support having to share contact information before leaving the scene.
- there has to be accountability for a serious dog bite - and some investigation as to why the bite incident occurred - sometimes it is not all as it seems .. provocation, reactivity etc
- They can give there side of the story.
- A person should take responsibility for the way THEY raise there dog!
- All dog owners, regardless of the breed they have should be held responsible for their dog biting.
- If they don't remain how are you going to know if they are a repeat offender.

- I feel as a responsible dog owner you should be staying on the scene anyways to ensure the victim is properly taken care of.
 - The dog owner should indeed leave their contact information with the victims. It is the right thing to do, as often a responsible dog owner whose dog made a mistake would pay for the vet/medical bills of the injured animal/person.
 - Owners should be responsible for their dog and remaining at the scene of an incident is part of that.
 - It's ultimately their responsibility, so they should remain.
 - our dog was attacked and hurt - we had to pay the bill and couldn't track the owner down.
 - It is what a responsible dog owner would do.
 - "I want small dog bites to be taken seriously. My daughter has scars from small dog bites, I've had to take two large dogs for stitches in one in the tone to the ear due to a small dog attack. When I called animal services it's taken as a joke by the owner and animal services because of the offender being a little dog. No followup on either occasion.
- I'm sick and tired of these little dogs and their owners getting away with everything just because they are little.
- The mental scars are the same."
 - Seriously, this goes without asking.
 - Knowing their dog may be apprehended, there is no incentive to stay.
 - It's just like in a car you hit someone you stay or it becomes a hit and run
 - It's the only way to track if a dog is a repeat offender.
 - It would be the same as a hit and run if they could just walk away.
 - It must be determined who is at fault. It is not always the dog who is at fault. A person on a bike that comes upon a dog walker and is on the sidewalk and tries to pass without warning is at fault if an incident occurs.
 - Contact information will be required to follow up.
 - Same as assault. Why should the aggressive dog be allowed to leave.
 - I think the onus needs to be on the owner. They should treat it the same a vehicle accident; someone gets bit, the owner should stay and talk to an officer.
 - Responsible owners already do this, but this would provide the injured party legal options.
 - It is important for the owner to give a history of vaccinations to those it concerns. You are also responsible for your pet and their behaviors
 - If children or anyone gets hurt there could be possible infection. It's good to be safe for people as well as animals
 - Important to be able to provide information regarding vaccination and insurance. No different from car accidents

- I think pet owners should take responsibility for their pets actions.
- its the responsible thing to do
- Treating a bite/altercation like any other accident/incident, like a fender bender.
- Yes because dog owners need to be held accountable when their dog attacks.
- There are no bad dogs, just bad dog owners
- Accountability
- Totally irresponsible if a person does not remain at the scene
- Regardless of the breed a dog or size-owners should take full responsibility for their dog's actions. A dogs actions are a direct reflection of the training, care and attention they are given. Only irresponsible owners would ever object to this.
- Incidents resulting in damage should require all involved parties and any witnesses to remain on scene to exchange information until an enforcement officer arrives to mediate unless requiring immediate medical attention. However, whenever possible, incidents should be treated like vehicle collisions in which all parties record their experiences both through writing, sketches and photos.
- I have been attacked twice by 4 at large Sheppards and both times the owner ran away after she got her dogs. I had to go through bylaw and the property management company both times before the dogs were declared a threat.
- If the situation warrants a response from enforcement
- I agree with this. Owners must be held accountable for their pets and their actions as they are direct reflections of the owner's training and treatment of their dog. It's not a dog's fault it has a bad owner.
- In the instance where the dog or handler is injured, they must remain at the scene until they are released by a figure of authority.
- Only is severe. (Bite with intent) If incident is by accident, like a nip, cause by teasing the animal. That should not qualify as biting!
- It is necessary to at least know the health and status of the dog that has attacked/bit a person or another animal. For proper medical care you would need to know if that attacker is up to date on shots, etc. It is for the health and safety of the attackee.
- To receive a full narrative of the incident from all parties involved
- They need information about the dogs vaccination records, home life.. general demeanor for day to day life. If the attack was provoked or simply the dog was the aggressor.
- It's like the scene of an accident you cannot leave if there's damage or someone injured
- Seen too many owners who failed to congtrol their dogs leave the scene and the victims left without recourse for medical fees.
- On the condition that it is atleast at a reasonable severity for such measures
- It would be good to hear both sides of the story. Most dogs that bite need to he provoked first.
- accountability
- If your dog bites anyone, you should stay until proper authorities have come to assess any damage your dog might or might not have caused.

- It's just like when one car hits another. Make sure they're okay, give contact info so you can try and offer help later on. Explain what happened to the officer
 - Everyone is responsible for their dogs behaviour. Information should be shared.
 - Someone needs to know if this is a pattern by a dog/owner. Owners (not just dogs) who have a history of being involved in offences should look at not being able to have dogs
 - All owners should be responsible for their own pets.
 - An incident where someone is hurt u provokingly should be considered a crime and information should be shared like a car crash.
 - If your dog has bit another dog or has been bitten, it should be necessary to share information as a responsible pet owner.
 - Its like when you rear end someone. Its unfortunate, and not always reported. However, it is something we must do as citizens to try and maintain good standings.
 - There are ALWAYS TWO SIDES of a story.
 - Of course!
 - For follow up information in the event of injury and longer term effects
 - I believe it is a dog owners responsibility that if their dog was to attack a person or animal that they stay at scene and explain their side of things, I also believe it should be a dog owners responsibility to pay for vet bills or medical bills for the dog or person if it was an issue the resulted because of their dog.
 - This is a responsibility of pet ownership.
 - "If the owner does not remain at the site of an attack how does one identify the owner of the dog?"
 - If the owner is not going to remain then it will be necessary to restrain the animal, which might involve killing it, in order for it to be identified.
- If an owner tries to remove an animal which has attacked a person or other animal then I would have to kill or injure the attacking animal. This would distress me. It would also distress the owner."
 - I think owners must take responsibility for their dog's behavior, including covering costs.
 - Th is would ensure that the conditions surrounding the dog bite were clearly understood before any disciplinary measures were taken. Example: was the dog being tormented, were the dogs on or off leash, were the dogs on private or public property, etc.
 - As the owner, it is their responsibility to stay and take responsibility
 - Should be no different than if you hit someone's vehicle in a parking lot. If you are responsible to damage to property or people you should be fined for leaving the scene.
 - Any dog - regardless of breed OR size. We allow small dogs to remain aggressive due to their size and then are shocked when they attack a larger dog who defends itself.
 - Only if a bylaw enforcement officer arrives, not a police officer.
 - Dogs are rarely the problem, it's usually the owners. Making them more accountable is a step towards improving the situation

- Again, several irresponsible dog owners in this city! Bites can cause serious damage and even more serious financial burden on the victim or their dog
- Too many people flee the scene when things like this happen.
- or provide Name and Address details at the scene
- Within a reasonable amount of time and with exceptions made for seeking medical or veterinary attention.
- "I think both parties should be able to explain their side of the story. I can appreciate that some animals have a prey drive, those dogs should benefit from a socialization course so owners can properly introduce their dogs. As a little dog owner and someone that works in the animal industry, we often see that a little dog is often the cause of them getting attacked, they have poor manners with larger dogs because again they're also poorly socialized, but because they're smaller they have a much higher serious injury rate than a large dog. And although it isn't ok that a dog is attacking another, little dogs are just as at fault as the big ones. I also heavily feel that a dogs body language is often misinterpreted by people.
- My friends dog is a prime example, he's a lab mix and is very nervous around strangers. He wags his tail very fast and wide, and crouches down when someone walks by him. People often mistake that as a friendly dog because he's wagging his tail. But the tail pattern isnt in circles like a happy dog, its side to side and he crouches like a submissive nervous dog. Its behaviours like this that people need to be educated on. I think a training program on dog behaviour would help pet owners as well as training classes for ANYONE wanting to use off leash facilities should be looked at. As well as proper leash system, green/blue leash for friendly dogs, yellow/orange for beware I'm sometimes not the best with strangers, and red for do not approach.
- I think in allthough it is important for everyone to be aware of the situation, the officers to see both sides of a story and owners to take responsibility when need be for their animals mistakes. The only exception is when a dog needs to see a vet immediately, then at least a phone number should be given and they should see a vet as soon as they can."
- It is agreeable to stay and state the facts of what has happened. The most accurate information will come at this time.
- I've seen certain dogs play rough and certain owners being too over sensitive. As long as it is reasonable to exchange information, then yes.
- I have been bitten by SMALL dogs before and you don't seem to want to take them away. It seems incredibly biased to target one type of dog.
- "dogs that are a concern should be held accountable. They deserve to be retrained and they deserve the right owners.

- I've met small [removed] dogs that nip at big dogs with their superiority complex and wonder why the bigger dog barks or nips back. Its a 2 way street. If people are scared of dogs acting like dogs and setting their own personal boundaries they don't need to own dogs. Dogs scrap! Just like kids. [removed]"
- Yes.
- Yes, it is basically a hit and run if they leave.
- Of course this is important
- Dogs are not always the ones at fault it is often the owner.
- In case of any transmission of disease, or severe injuries, the owner of the aggressor dog should be contacted if felt necessary.
- Every owner should be sticking around if they dog bites. It's like leaving the scene of a a car accident. However you guys should stop being racist towards dogs. Its is ridiculous. Be aware you will have thousands of people leave Calgary if you follow through with this ridiculous plan.
- Responsible thing to do to ensure the same dog isn't attacking multiple people and needs to be dealt with.
- To provide vaccination and vet information
- In a timely manner.
- a few years ago, my dog (a boxer) on leash was attacked and bitten by a little dog (off leash) and the owner literally laughed and did nothing, i had to get her dog off my dog and my dog was bleeding and injured. please note it is not always so called bully dogs that are nuisance or problem dogs and dogs outside of pit bulls can do considerable damage.
- with the stipulation that the bite draws blood. Otherwise owners could get into an argument as to whether a bite occurred or not and dogs can nip to say back off when feeling threatened, which is normal.
- This would ensure that both sides of the incident would be heard. Many dog bite attacks could be prevented by exhibiting proper dog handling behaviour, both on parts of the dog owner and the bite victim.
- As it is their dog, it is their responsibility, and as such the owner should be there to share their information and take responsibility for anything their dog has done.
- No difference than a motor vehicle accident, if the incident is severe enough that an officer should be called, both parties should be required to stick around
- You have to do it with a car accident...why not a dog accident?
- As a dog owner, I think that taking dogs away from their owner is only going to exasperate the issue in most cases. There may be cases where the dog would be better off if the owner is teaching the dog to be aggressive or is beating the dog making it aggressive. A tribunal to speed this process up is a great idea.
- it is a good idea for dog owners to remain and give information in case of vet / doctor bills and to keep track of biting or aggressive incidents
- It's always a good idea to get the story from both sides. Sometimes kids/adults are jerks and try to provoke a dog, so it's a good idea for the owner to stay and explain their side.

- Most small dog owners just laugh when their small dog attacks someone and they keep walking! I highly recommend that they stick around and be held accountable for what their “ankle biters” have done!
- The same principle as if you were to get into a car accident. Stay at the scene of the "crime" exchange information and if warranted talk to the police.
- Absolutely an owner should remain to explain the situation; unless they/their animal/their family is in immediate danger
- I think both the bitten and biter should remain on scene.
- if the person or animal gets sick (rabies etc...) its good to know where it came from. People need to take responsibility for their own and their dogs actions
- This is responsible dog ownership if your dog (of ANY breed) bites. Not just “pit bulls”.
- A responsible pet owner would. If they don't, they should be heavily fined for leaving the scene.
- Dog bites, like many crimes are contextual. Just like an accident, people should be encouraged to exchange information at the scene of an “incident”. This also allows for owners to have an opportunity to explain to a peace officer the circumstances of the incident.
- it just makes sense and shows responsibility
- If they leave the scene it to me implies guilt or trying to not take responsibility. No matter the breed there should be accountability by all dog owners for their dogs behaviour.
- "Too many people run away from
- The scene since they aren't a responsible owner. These are all type of dog owners not just pit bull type dog owners!!"
- This is what should be done. Taking steps to deal with the “humans” in this equation and ensure that they are being held responsible. Going after a specific breed or look is the same as taking medication for a head ache but continuing to bang one's head against the wall. We must deal with the people, not the breed, in order to make lasting change.
- Need to provide info to the person involved to pay for vet/doctor bills or medicine
- Often times people grab their dog and leave quickly. The owner with the injured dog is then forced to pay for the vet bills (which should be paid for by the owner of the dog that attacked).
- At the very least there should be an exchange of information in the case of vet bills etc.
- As a responsible owner of anything (car) it is law to remain at the scene of an accident or exchange information.
- It's about taking responsibility just like a car accident
- The dog owner is responsible for their dogs actions at all times and needs to be held accountable
- Don't single out pit bulls, please.
- Allows for both sides of the incident to explain and discuss the situation. However I don't agree that the dog biting in the situation is always in the wrong automatically. Hence why the reviewer should be unbiased.
- Taking responsibility for ones actions or their animal. Situation needs to be assessed FAIRLY and there does need to be consequences. Did the dog literally bite for no reason? Or was the dog overwhelmed or being aggrieved?

- Owner needs to take accountability for the actions of their pet
- Take responsibility for your pet
- To a certain degree, some dogs are a little more aggressive from past traumas and some dog owners are a bit over sensitive. Where it is appropriately called for them yes, information should be exchanged
- If the dog bites and owner flees, there should be a fine similar to leaving an accident
- I would compare it to a vehicle accident. All parties involved need to be held accountable & information definitely needs to be given so the owner with the offending animal cannot just disappear
- If the injury to a human or animal is severe, then it is important to understand the full situation with an officer. However, if it is just two dogs getting to a scrap, because they are animals after all, and there are no severe injuries then it can be settled between the logical and rational owners.
- If your dog bites a person, the owner of the dog should take the blame before the animal.
- The owner of the dog should be present to provide vet information to the victim and bylaw.
- Same as a hit and run. Doesn't matter why an injury occurred if you are responsible you should show that.
- All sides of a story must be present to best clearly understand the situation. If one leaves, and the other wishes to speak to enforcement, they should be fined.
- It is the owner, not the dog that is responsible for the incident. If they have been involved in an incident, they are legally responsible for damages. This needs to be enforced by an officer. The owner must be present in order for the offer to investigate.
- Owners need to be held responsible for this behavior in animals.
- That's be an accountable owner, in my opinion it is no different than being involved in a vehicle accident and if they leave and are later located, an applicable reprimand should be given.
- The owner should describe the conditions that lead to the event as soon as possible.
- Dog owners should take responsibility much like a car accident. Remain in scene and provide all required information.
- I think hearing both sides of the story is best!
- It's the right thing to do.
- If there is any incident it is up to the owner to secure their animal and make sure information is gathered as with any incident.
- Only if it was a person that the dog bit.
- Only if necessary. If the note inflicts severe harm, they should be required to stay around to ensure everyone is okay. But if dogs bicker a little and a couple small bites occur with no real harm, then there is no need to stay.
- I think it's important to get a handle on the situation and actually get appropriate data to be able to impose bylaws like is being suggested. Also, if it's a kid that is walking a dog that they can't control, it's an important lesson for both parents & kids alike. The strength of the human walking the dog, even if the dog has never reacted before is a HUGE factor.
- If a dog bites someone it is the owners responsibility to ensure the victim is okay and report what happened.

- My dog was bitten as a puppy at the dog park and the owner took off as I was checking the injury and stopping the bleeding. I wasn't even able to get a license plate. This means it wasn't recorded as a nuisance dog.
- No different than traffic accidents
- Owners are responsible for their pets' behavior in the same way drivers are responsible for their vehicle's operation. You shouldn't leave the scene of an accident.
- Should be the same as when in a car accident
- Should provide history (has this happened before or is it the first time) and vaccination information.
- This needs to be enforced
- Any responsible dog owner would remain present. I don't know if adding a rule would make less responsible people stay, but it's worth a try
- Because if an owner leaves sometimes it becomes a he said she said situation after the fact .
- I consider fleeing after your dog bites to be equivalent to a pedestrian hit-and-run while driving. They should be made to stay and be held accountable and provide information.
- It's their/our responsibility.
- the dog owner should remain at the scene of an incident .
- The owner is responsible for the dog, there fore the owner should be held accountable for setting the dog up for failure and all means taken to rehabilitate the owner in terms of appropriate training and guidance to make them a better pack leader. If this fails or the owner does not want to comply the dog should be removed and rehabilitated and moved to a proper home. Last resort should be euthanasia. People are a failure to dogs.. Also it should be by weight, not breed specific. All dogs over 40lbs have the potential to inflict a damaging bite..
- You should never leave the scene of a crime...
- Its the minimum the dog owner should do
- This is a simple matter of accountability. However the response to these calls should be timely. If the animals in question are stressed, they should be taken to a safe location.
- I rescued a lab cross dog who had a lot of trauma. We worked hard but sadly one day someone came out of nowhere and began yelling and acting terrifying upon the sight of my black dog. He was on a long line practicing his ability to be off leash but her reaction scared him and he nipped her. We were already in training so we let the trainer know. We stayed with her and we did have to go to court. She had a bruise from the bite but no blood. He didn't attack her he reacted out of fear which we continued to work on. The courts seemed to understand despite her persistent efforts to get him euthanized. I found her very frustrating though as she didn't understand what I tried to explain to her and that was that her reaction could also trigger other dogs, maybe even the most well behaved. She kept yelling at me that my dog was aggressive and I explained that my dog had a traumatic past and is not agressive but scared. As a responsible dog owner he doesn't really get to be off leash because we know his fear reaction and it's very engrained since we rescued him at 2. So we actively manage his environment to avoid risks like him getting scared. That being said I understand people moving here from different countries grow up in places where dogs are strays and sometimes aggressive so they are fearful. I think we could do more to educate people on how dogs here are mostly not stray and how to react when you do see a dog and you are scared. It would help dog owners and people alike.

- That's just being responsible. However, this should not be just about the pitty breeds!
- Unless the incident is minor and information has been taken care of by involved parties and witnesses.
- Vet expenses for an injured pet should be paid for by the owner of the pet that caused the injuries.
- Vet bills
- BECAUSE IT IS THE OWNERS FAULT AND HE SHOULD PAY FOR IT NOT THE DOG!
- Dog owner must be responsible for the dogs behaviour
- Both sides of the story need to be documented.
- The owner needs to take responsibility and needs to provide necessary information.
- Dog owners (of all breeds) should be accountable for the actions of their pets.
- This is important in order to know whether the dog has had its vaccinations, in addition to having information to claim any liability/compensation/vet bill issues that may arise later.
- The victim needs to know if the dog has been vaccinated. The owner of the dog needs to be fined. If this has happened before, the dog may need to be destroyed and the owner fined $5000. And the victim will need the information if they would like to pursue legal action.
- Yes BUT if the dog is continuing to be a threat I think the owner and the dog need to leave.
- Both sides of the story and any witnesses need to explain to the bylaw officer. If one is not available in a timely manner, then the contact information is necessary to determine if one or both of dogs are a danger or liable for any vet charges.
- It's always good to have both sides of the story in regards to the incident, and to ensure that all medical issues are taken care of by the dog owner
- I think this is important to have more answers behind the bite rather than just the victims statement.
- The owner needs to explain what happened with their dog. The person who was bitten may be at fault for the bite and blame the dog. The owner should be there to defend their animals action
- You do not know if the dog that has caused the bite has all of its shots or not. My husband had been bitten and the dog owner refused to answer her door to let us ask if her dog had all of its shots or not.
- To protect BOTH involved. For example, my "pit bull" was bit by a much smaller dog and he did not retaliate at all - stood there and waited while this lab mix shook it's head with his ear in it's mouth and did nothing... owners did nothing and didn't act like it was a big deal at all.. luckily he didn't need stitches but I had no way of contacting them if he did... but if my dog had have fought back I would want to stay around to ensure both sides of the story were told. Sad that it's no big deal when a pit bull type is attacked but if he were to have stood up for himself and the other dog was injured as well all the focus would be on him..
- Kinda like a car accident, if its serious remain at the scene until help arrives or just exchange info and move on

- If a dog (ANY BREED) is involved in an incident where someone or another animal is injured, then as a responsible pet owner info should be left for insurance purposes only. Many individuals flee in fear they might lose their beloved family member.
- People who have time to perfect their story will do so during the time apart. Depending on the severity of the offence I believe this would be in the dogs favor as most dog bites are the humans fault. However I believe that the owner should be allowed to remove the dog from the stressful environment so they can focus on the event.
- Of course you should be required to stay if your dog attacks someone.
- You shouldn't flee the scene of any incident. But don't give cops the right to execute our babies just because they are scared of them.
- The owner knows their dog, a statement should be collected in regards to their impression on the cause of the dogs behaviour. To aid in evidence collection of dogs intrinsic and trained nature.
- As a responsible pet owner it is my responsibility to be accountable for my dogs actions.
- The owner needs to take responsibility. This provides protection for the owner and the dog.
- When a person assaults another person the hope is that law enforcement is able to attend the scene quickly, talk to both parties, assess the situation while it is fresh, and make decisions based on observations. The same should go for when a person is attacked by a dog.
- why would they not stay??? That answers your question right there.
- Responsibility of the pet owner
- If the incident is serious
- If a dog bites a person yes. If it bites another dog it depends on the severity. Dogs are animals not people. They can have tiffs that are loud with no real damage. If it is an attack then yes the owner should remain and share info.
- If the severity demands some sort of enforcement officer is needed.
- The OWNER of the biting dog is the one to be held responsible or penalized; NOT THE BREED OF THE DOG!?
- For the sole purpose of protecting animals from unnecessarily being put down.
- They are responsible for their dogs behavior.
- Seems reasonable
- But only if it is safe to do so. If the dog is not in the owner's control, that can't be safe for anybody.
- It's important to get contact information and get all sides of the story from both parties.
- I feel both side of a story need to be told not just the victim.
- Owners should be held accountable for their dogs behaviour.
- People should not be allowed to run when their dog bites someone or another animal.
- Dogs often bite out of fear once provoked. It is important to understand the owner's side of the story and see the relationship they have with their pet. Also, having the owner present with the dog that has just bitten someone and may still be in a state of fight or flight/aggression, is most likely the best way to calm the dog down and cause the least amount trauma to the dog
- You should be able to contact the other owner

- Dogs who bite/attack should be more harshly punished. NOT breed specific. Of all of the issues that I've had with other dogs, only once was it a pit bull. I've had dogs for many years and was a behavior modification trainer for many years. I'm way more careful around shepherds, personally, but any breed can bite and many can do significant damage. As for bite strength, have you ever been bit by a st bernard!?! Breed specific makes no sense.
- However I am very opposed to any breed specific legislation
- You should never leave the scene of the crime your dog was involved with
- Needed to get history if the dog, where is the residence, etc.
- Yes, this is merely responsible dog ownership.
- Responsibility of owner to ensure their dog is safe, but also that everyone else is safe from their dog. There may be mitigating factors that led up to the bite that must be explained.
- Dog bites from any dog, regardless of breed or the size of the dog, can result in long-lasting damage to the person/people or animal that is bitten as well as many medical/vet bills. Victims of any dog attack, regardless of breed or the size of the attacking dog, should be compensated for any/all costs associated with being attacked. A bylaw forcing irresponsible dog owners to provide personal information for the purposes of victim compensation would be a good step towards ensuring dog attack victims are taken care of.
- if needed the person and dog should stay but we should always remember they are animals and for the most part only bite when provoked.
- It is the responsible thing to do, also because there are always 2 sides to a story. As a bite recipient from when I was 3, it was my fault that I got bit, not the dogs fault. Sadly the dog paid the ultimate price.
- Pet owners need to be responsible for their pets actions and pay any costs that may incur, as well as providing vaccine status and any medical info required
- No dog should ever bite, however the irresponsibly lies with the owner not the animal.
- Along with the dog.
- As the dogs owner you know your pet and can identify why the situation happened. These incidents are not always the dogs fault but the dog is blamed %100 of the time.
- Dog owners should take responsibility for the incident and assist with damages caused by their pet
- The owners need to take responsibility of their dogs actions.
- Dog bites can be extreme and the owner of the attacking dog should have to see the other person/animal is attended to and should have to pay for all expenses faced by victim due to dog bite
- People are the problem not dogs. Poor dog owners should be held accountable. Ownership is a privilege not a right.
- Needed to track for future reoccurrence
- It is no different that leaving the scene of an accident. This is an aggressive act and it needs to be assessed by a trained observer. The offender needs to be identified as not all biting incidents are cut and dry. Was the animal at large, was the animal protecting itself or family member from another potential threat, human or otherwise.
- It is your responsibility to remain at the scene if your pet was involved in a bite.

- The owners are responsible to how their animal behaves, but also, if a person is bitten they should not antagonize the animal either, I have seen this many times, as I have 2 small dogs and when I would walk them they would kick at my dogs and spat at them and kids would throw stuff at them.
- The owner needs to be held responsible for their animals behaviour and/or at least be present long enough to state their side of the story to enforcement.
- this makes sense.
- Shouldn't this already be a rule?
- Because sometimes the dogs are provoked by untrained pets, or by uneducated/not supervised kids and these are huge factors
- dog bites can be serious. Especially when its dog on dog and vet bills are expensive. Owners of dogs who bite should be responsible for any costs associated with the incident
- But there should be a need for witnesses before any charges. Pet owners are usually extremely protective and won't take responsibility for their dog's role in the incident. And pitbulls should not automatically be blamed as sometimes they have to protect themselves from off leave dogs
- Dogs are the owners responsibility and it's actions reflect the owners ability to train and control their dog.
- It's the responsible thing to do
- I support this as it is part of responsible ownership. However, in circumstances where they are unable to provide safety of others against their dog they should be permitted to remove their dog from the area. They should state this and provide information to the other as to who they are, where they are going and that they can be expected back.
- Its like a car accident. You need to stay and ensure your property and the other person are dealt with responsibly
- Yes cause then you have the ability to see if this dog has bitten before, and a responsible dog owner would/should be responsible for the actions of the dog
- Caveat being if the dog is injured, owner should be allowed to go to vet with their animal.
- They need to stay there to deal with the situation, and all the possible consequences, just like with a car accident
- If the dog is injured the owner must still be able to go for vet care. Vets should have a responsibility to report injuries that they suspect are caused by dog fights/altercations.
- If your dog attacks someone you should have to wait and give reasoning ex.(it attacked my dog first)
- Knowing if a dog has his shots and is violent is important
- It makes sense. Dog bites may appear minor at first but can become more severe soon after.
- Just like a vehicle accident
- Because the owner should take responsibility, it's not the dogs fault but the owners themselves.
- It's the same as someone remaining at the scene of a car accident - information needs to be exchanged, etc, and if the law needs to get involved the owner of the offending dog needs to remain on scene. You can't penalize/prosecute someone with a dangerous dog if you don't know who they are.
- Of course the owner should take responsibility and wait for the law enforcement to arrive.

- If necessary means that it is a severe bite then yes they should remain present
- Higher fines should be considered for not staying at the scene.
- Too many just leave and are never found. Thereby not receiving the necessary training to properly care for their dog
- At minimum contact info should be shared.
- It's only logic to remain at the scene of a incident involving your dog
- Yes, they should remain at the scene because it's accountability!!! They own an animal, therefore they should also be accountable and responsible for everything they do, that also includes any incidents.
- Make it easier to track dog history
- What's to explain. It's like being in a car accident. You get the other party's information.
- A record does need to be made and the owner (not the dog) be held accountable.
- The owner should be required to pay for whatever costs occur as a result of that bite PLUS by not staying at the scene, the owner is allowing a possibly dangerous dog to perhaps repeat the bite/attack. The owner is also not allowing the dog to maybe be exonerated due to the circumstances of the bite, e.g. did the other animal bite first or was the animal being teased or threatened by someone?
- two sides to a story
- If a dog bites the owner should be allowed to give reason as to what happened, why, and he allowed a voice for the pet. Often bites are provoked and that should be the fault of the bite victim, not the dogs. Often times, the dog is hauled off, owner told to go home and then bite victim ya all the voice, the dog is punished but no one asked what happened to provoke the incident.
- The owner should take responsibility for the animal no matter the animal
- That way everything can be worked out with the help of an officer
- That's responsible pet ownership
- This is just common sense!
- Act responsibly
- It is responsible pet ownership to remain at the scene and share info.
- Owners should take full responsibility for dogs actions
- An all witnesses
- I have a dog who if he is approached too quickly or provoked he will bark and potentially bite. Having the opportunity to explain the situation is very important. It's the same as having a child who has a tantrum and hits or BITES another child.
- It seems like common sense to remain at the scene of an incident as a responsible citizen.
- I think this works in favor of both parties. The owner of the dog staying on scene ensures both parties get their story out while being able to defend themselves. However this only works if the victim or witness also stays on scene so if one has to stay so does the other.
- Any accident requires both parties to remain there until the have given their statement to an official

- Dog ownership is a responsibility. No different than having children and if my do or my child does something bad or illegal I must take responsibility for those actions.
- I support the above so we can actually identify bad owners, as dogs will behave as dogs do, its the owner that needs to be educated and be held responsible
- no different than a traffic accident, force responsibility.
- Because it was most likely an accident and for example when a car accident happens everyone that was involved or witnessed it needs to stay so we should treat other accidents the same ro make sure the correct information is known
- If the scene can be attended to in a reasonable timeframe I do support this, or at least providing all contact info if that does not make sense.
- An owner is ultimately responsible for their dog
- "I think dog owners should be responsible for bites (unless provoked by other people, including implicit instructions from owners to not pet their dog and kids or adults do it anyway) and should remain at the scene of the victim wants to speak to law enforcement. There should also be some sort of protection for dogs and dog owners for when bites and attacks are not their fault.
- Also I think it's disgusting that the city is even considering putting in bully breed restrictions. Disgusted with the city council for suggesting this when it is PROVEN that bully breeds are not more aggressive or cause more damage. Appalling and repulsive behaviour and suggestions from the city. Shame on all of you."
- Like a crime scene this will allow the investigation to go ahead in a timely manner.
- Regardless of the breed, the dog is the owners responsibility .
- The dog owner should be held accountable for its dog's actions. Similar to a hit and run, the dog owner is responsible for the offence.
- it sounds good but the chance of the owner actually staying is unlikely.
- It's called personal responsibility. This is a basic fundamental of living in a CIVILization. Being civil.
- This is no different from a vehicle accident.
- Owner should take full responsibility of their dogs actions. When you own a dog it is your responsibility to teach it correct behavior. If your dog is biting, that is on you. If you can't control a dog, don't own a dog. Also singling out the pitbulls is breed discrimination. Educate yourselves.
- To show responsibility, the owner should stay to give any relevant information. Unless the animal is still in a vicious state, in which case the owner should secure pet on their property before returning .
- The owner is responsible for how a dog behaves in public, if something happens with that dog the owner needs to take responsibility.
- It's called being a responsible dog owner. This does not include seizure of the dog by the officer at the scene
- It makes sense to have someone stay and take responsibility if their animal bites a person or another dog.
- People of all breeds need to be accountable
- The owner and Dog should claim responsibility.
- Yes with all breeds NOT just PITBULLS

- People need to take responsibility
- When trying to remove your animal from the area, it isn't possible to also stay and give information, but you can remove the animal and return.
- once information has been exchanged they should be able to go on their way without having to wait for bylaw officers
- Not sure an explanation is necessary... this should be standard practice.
- It's responsible pet ownership. Most decent humans would do this
- The owner of the dog needs to be held responsible for its actions— good and bad.
- I think people should be accountable for their pets when an incident occurs, if the other party deems it necessary then the offending party should have to stay at the scene
- If a dog bites a person it needs to be documented
- I believe the dog owner should stay at the scene because it makes getting ahold of the owner easier.
- It's similar to a car accident, leaving the scene of the incident should not be allowed.
- I am shocked that this isn't already a requirement.
- Responsible dog ownership.
- Of course , if a dog hurts another animal OR person . The owner should be held responsible.
- No explanation necessary. The dog owner is as responsible as a driver.
- It's the owner's fault, not the dog
- Please define "if necessary" further. If the victim party wishes it? If a witness contacts authority? What does it mean?
- An adult should be responsible for their pets and BOTH sides should be heard fairly. The problem is the majority of people already have a pre-disposed judgement of any dog that is pitbull, Rottweiler Doberman or otherwise used as a protection dog. If you do not hear both sides the judgement on the dog regardless of the behaviour issue can be awarded out of fear of a breed.
- Owners need to be held responsible for their dogs' behaviour.
- Just like with a vehicle, you can't flee the scene, you need to share your contact information and speak with authorities if need be. This should be no different as people need to take responsibility.
- The dog owner should be known in order to follow up with after the incident and ensure proper measures are taken so the dog doesn't become involved in another incident
- There needs to be owner accountability
- Take responsibility
- If any dog isn't properly trained the owner must take responsibility
- In order to get the correct info and determine what made the dog bite. Owners have the opportunity to defend their dog as well. Get both sides as it takes two.
- The same if you got into a vehicular accident.
- So the dog owner can have a chance to give their side of the story.
- BUT only under certain circumstances and depends on the situation.
- How is this not already the law?

- The biting may have been provoked. Each situation is different and all sides of a story need to be heard.
- Only to provide contact info then owner should remove the dog to de-escalate the situation. Talking with an enforcement officer can take place after the fact
- The responsibility and consequences need to be on the owner. Otherwise its pretty much a hit and run.
- This will allow bylaw enforcement to track breed types and bite statistics so they can prove to themselves that breed specific legislation is backward looking.
- All pet owners must be held responsible for their pet's actions, regardless of breed.
- Common sense and responsible way to handle things.
- Too many times irresponsible owners walk away from the scene.
- This is only fair - at the very least providing information regarding the dog's vaccination status
- This just makes sense. You can't leave the scene of an accident.
- Expect people to be responsible pet owners, no matter the pet or breed.
- Owners should always take responsibility for their dog. Being a responsible pet owner is key.
- Needs to be documented however dog should be punished for lack of training and owner neglect
- Of course. It's public safety focused as well as common decency. Likely this will be hard to enforce.
- Yes taking responsibility for your actions is always the right thing to do. Although not everyone will, increase fines for these people.
- I think that allows for verification of rabies shots etc. And allows for the immediate investigation into the incident including witnesses
- owners are responsible for the actions of their pet.
- Like any accident. Exchange information
- Owner of a dot that bites must stay to share information on if the dog is vaccinated plus any additional information regarding the incident.
- The owner should be there to ensure their side of the story is shared, and to take responsibility for anything that happened. They may have crucial information regarding the situation and their pet.
- The owners should have a chance to speak. To explain that maybe the person who was bit was harassing or provoking the dog. Perhaps the dog was protecting the owner, you must look at it from all sides
- Taking responsibility
- There should have to be some way of contacting the individual who's dog was involved in the incident.
- Must not seize the dog though as no one will stay around if they are in danger of losing their dog.
- If a dog bites a human I think it is reasonable to remain at the scene. If a dog bites another dog, I believe the parties should exchange their contact information and follow up occurs afterwards.
- I believe that that the owner needs to be at scene as otherwise how is by- law to charge owner.
- Responsible owners would do thus anyway!!

- I believe its in the best interest of the dog/owner to stay and explain the situation as not all are the same and should not be judged the same
- you should always stay if there is an issue with your pet
- Investigate both sides of the story
- Any incident where a dog bites, person or animal the owner should remain at the scene. Breed specific bans and certain restrictions for breeds is ridiculous.
- It's a responsibility of a pet owner
- Dog bites are a form of assault and could be repeated unless measures are taken to control that animal. The owner should be responsible for their pet.
- On many occasions the owner of the aggressive dog, simply grabs their dog and walks off leaving the effected dog/owner and any witnesses left no knowing what to do without causing further altercations. I support the rule in theory, but think that in all likelihood it would be hard to enforce and may cause owner arguments. Worth a try though!
- In a dog bite incident it is crucial that an owner remains to ensure that the medical history of the offending dog is obtained so that doctors/vets know what protocol to follow. Also information should be shared to gather statistics regarding repeat offenders & to have the owners information available should further action need to be pursued, or questions need to be answered.
- The dog owner should prove the dog has up to date vaccinations.
- This should be the case for all dog bites.
- A dog owner should take responsibility for their dog's actions. And be present to explain a situation.
- The owner is responsible for the dog behaviour
- As a responsible owner, if that terrifying even ever arose I would never leave the scene without making sure all parties involved were okay, and information had been exchanged, as with a car accident as an example.
- If an animal bites it is best an officer hears both sides. However just because one dog bit someone or something does not always mean that dog is the guilty party, often dogs are protecting themselves. I have watched many people or other dogs continuously pester a dog, only to be upset when the dog fi ally reacts. If someone continued to pull your hair and nip at you (can be person or dog) at a certain point you would defend yourself as well.
- Responsible dog ownership
- I've seen dogs lose it, and the owner just walk away and claim no responsibility. Dogs are property, like cars, and if your car causes damage, your expected to remain at the scene - why would dogs be any different?
- All involved should be required to give their versions of the incident in order to get an accurate assessment of the incident.
- Banning pitbulls is disgusting. You should be ashamed of yourselves.
- The owner of a dog that bites is responsible for their dogs' actions
- As a dog owner we're liable for any harm they cause. So yes, Ofcourse.
- Of course they should stay as that is what a responsible dog owner does and if they don't then the owner should be fined.

- It's the responsible thing to do as a pet owner
- In the heat of the moment it always seems no one knows what to do and at the least an exchange of information would be helpful.
- Sometimes a dog can get spooked and it's a one time thing and little dogs bite more then big dogs and little dog owners always get away with their little dogs biting people
- You don't get to drive away from a car accident, do you?
- Depending upon severity vet bills should be paid by offending dog BUT how does one decide "who started it"
- Makes people more responsible for their dogs.
- Responsible ownership is key to maintaining ANY breed of dog. THIS IS NOT LIMITED TO PITBULLS!!!!
- This would encourage more dog bites to be reported, including those from breeds who do not fall under "pitbull type's". So often you hear of dog attacks that were never reported as the dog was too little to do harm, but these attacks should always be reported no matter what.
- It is a "no-brainer" but most people at fault will not stay. Also remember - a lot of parents let their children run up to a dog and pet them without asking first and this causes problems. Those people should be held responsible and fined also.
- Unless the dog requires medical attention then share information then follow up later
- Like a car crash, leaving the scene of an accident should be a crime. I can't believe this isn't a bylaw right now!
- There has to be a way to track dogs/owners to find out whether dog has had its shots and for civil liability purposes.
- It would assist in the process of the tribunals and also ensure that the right dog and owners information is taken.
- You should remain at any scene where you or your animal causes harm. Take responsibility for your actions.
- Owners are responsible for controlling their animals regardless of breed. They should be required to remain at the scene of the attack until police/bylaw arrive
- Dog owners are responsible for the damage theyve done such as vet/doctor costs
- No matter the breed staying to ensure the victim is taken care of and sharing contact information is important, just as it is in a vehicle accident.
- Bylaw should be structured the same as that for leaving the scene of an auto accident.
- Why run and hide if you have nothing to hide?
- You stay at the scene of an accident. People who flee a bite scene should get an extra charge for leaving the scene.
- It is very inconsiderate to leave a bite victim without any way to contact the owner and receive justice. It is up to the owner to take responsibility for what their vicious dog does to others
- I think this would help ensure the dog is properly vaccinated. But it needs to be a bite that draws blood

- It's not bad dogs it's bad owners with poor training! Raise fines for dog and cat licenses and fines by by law and put that into a owner training program to learn about dog behaviour and how to interact with dogs.
- To get all of the necessary facts stated and persons held accountable, however they have permission to leave if urgent medical care is required.
- As long as the officer arrives in a reasonable amount of time and the dog is able to be kept under control and won't cause further incident.
- Obvious
- More often than not if an owner is guilty of negligence in a dog bite incidence they'll flee without apology or explain action.
- Dog owners of any breed, be it large or small (small dogs can be just as mean) need to be responsible for their animals actions
- Not unlike a scenario like a car crash, both parties should be on hand to provide statements to authorities.
- Dog owners should be responsible for any actions taken by their dog. Staying at scene is the same as staying at the scene of a car accident.
- I support it but know it can't be enforced. Bad owners will take off. They do now and they still will even if there's a bylaw.
- Owners should be held accountable
- Dogs are animals and they do not always get along with other dogs and can be provoked. If a dog bites it's not necessarily at fault and both sides should be heard
- It makes sense to stay at the scene of the accident
- Too often, if an incident happens, the owners grab their dog and leave for fear of having their dog taken away or getting in trouble. As a responsible pet owner, we must show that responsibility by owning up to whatever our animals do.
- Just makes sense. Like a hit and run.
- They must also provide information proving the animal is up to date with vaccines.
- You need to take responsibility if your dog bites someone
- A responsible owner needs to stay a the scene!
- you should always take ownership if your dog makes a mistake. Including small dog owners
- You have a license to own a dog the same as a license to drive a car. If there is an accident or incident you are required to stay at the scene and should be the same with dog ownership
- An owner should take responsibility when their animal does damage
- It is important to know if the dog is up to date on vaccines and it is a nuisance dog already.
- Remain at scene to share contact info as needed.
- In the event of medical bills, the dog owner should be responsible if the animal was not provoked.
- If a dog bites a person, it is common decency to stay and speak to law enforcement. I support this rule because I believes if an accident such as this should occur, everyone should be present to speak to law enforcement to give their sides.

- My dog was attacked and the owner blamed me and then fled the scene.
- People need to be responsible for their animals
- Same premise as a car accident, they happen sometimes by no fault of your own but that still should be explained to the proper authorities
- That is their responsibility. If they left it's like a hit and run.. they knowingly injured a person and then bailed. Irresponsible.
- All owners with vicious dogs must be held accountable.
- This also depends on the severity of the bite. And if the owner can't stay, they should have a way to contact bylaw themselves
- Owner should have to stay. If their dog is out of control they should at least leave phone # before getting their dog out of the area.
- The owners are responsible for the dog, they need to be accountable.
- It seems that most people whose dog bites another dog or person leave so that their dog doesn't get put down
- This indicates responsible ownership.
- Too many ppl leave to avoid paying someone else's vet bills for damage their dog caused.
- It's like a car accident, information should be shared
- "Every dog owner should be responsible and take responsibility for their dogs actions. If they haven't been to the training that would be prevented this, then they should be fined, the dog removed from
- Their ownership, a great training program for the dog and rehoming, depending on situation."
- per ownership is a huge responsibility and pet owners need to be held accountable when their dog bites and behaves inappropriately. Most times these issues can be fixed with the right type of training.
- As a dog owner, you are responsible for that situation. As long as the process is fair - if someone teases and harrasses a dog and then gets bitten, that's self defence. There should be a thorough process similar and it be considered tantamount to a hit and run of people leave the scene.
- Many owner's leave the scene as they don't want to be held responsible. If they are you stay at the scene, they were then to be held responsible for the dog who bit the person/animal and can give any information required.
- Owners should be held active for their pets action, regardless of the breed. Small dogs charging pet and other pets should be investigated even if physical harm is minimal. Small dogs cannot be allowed to bite without the same repercussions.
- "If it is a bite that breaks skin.
- Also it depends on the circumstance. If a dog is loose and runs up to a dog on leash and gets bitten, the owner of the loose dog is just as much at fault."
- I think this is required so long as both the victim and antagonist are safe and do not require medical attention.
- Dogs are like kids. If your kids bits someone you should stick around. But doesn't need you need to put your kid down

- Any pet owner needs to take responsibility for any injury their animal makes and deal with consequences.
- They need to take responsibility
- It's the owner that should be held liable and not the dog. A dog with proper training is a happy and safe dog.
- I think most dog owners are responsible people. Some need more training in how to best manage their dogs behaviour. This goes for ALL breeds. My border collie cross on leash has been bitten by toy sized dogs running off their property,, which would have been disastrous for the toy dog had I not been right there to intervene. In my experience untrained dog owners are those who have "non dangerous" breeds. I think EVERY dog owner should be trained. All owners of an offending dog 100 % reposable for the vet bills their dog initiates. They should definitely exchange information.
- Dog bites are serious. The owners need to take responsibility for their pets actions and remain at the scene to #1 give their side of the story and #2 be accountable for their pets actions.
- It is always the owner's fault. Not the dog.
- Dogs that bite need to be dealt with quickly and city resources shouldn't be used to track them and their owner down. Those costs should be reflected in the fine.
- There is liability on the part of the owner, they should be accountable.
- It is vital that people are able to follow up with dog owners after an attack.
- As with any incident, all parties should remain at the scene if safe to do so. All parties should be expected to openly participate in giving statements to police.
- Take responsibility
- I was always taught that a dog will not bit for no reason, there is always a reason for a dog to bite someone or thing! We as dog owners have to be the voice for our dogs cause they do not have one.
- Contact information is needed in case the dog or person bit needs to phone the offending dog's veterinarian to see if the dog is up to date on shots. It is also important for the City to have that information in their system to be able to class a dangerous or vicious dog for public safety.
- This should say remain or return to scene of an incident (in the event where someone has to chase after their dog).
- It would be the responsible thing to day
- This would not necessarily mean the dog is at fault though, such as in the case of a child being bitten due to running up to and touching an unfamiliar dog, or an off leash dog approaching and trying to interact with another dog and getting bitten as a self-defence tactic. Dogs bite when they feel threatened, more needs to be done to ensure individuals understand and respect dogs personal space.
- background information and accountability
- Both parties should remain at the scene, or if needed at the emergency clinic.
- "The dog owner should take responsibility.
- Animals bite.
- Its how the owner acts is the crime."
- Yes but this goes for Karen and her little yappy Pomeranian

- The owner should take responsibility but also it allows their side of the story to be heard prior to any action being taken
- If a dog has bitten someone or their pet, the owner should be held responsible for the dogs actions. It is very difficult to pursue legal action without the contact information of the owner
- This is a responsible thing to do but I would add if there is another dog or animal involved it would be necessary for the person to be able to find a place to calm the dog down since biting it a reactionary response to something meaning it could have been provoked. Safety for all but especially the dog needs to be considered.
- I believe this should be treated as any accident, you have to remain at the scene.
- A dog's breed doesn't make it a problem dog, the owner does. Please stop furthering discrimination and misinformation against "bully breeds". Identify problem owners and help them learn to be better, and only take away a dog when the owner is not receptive to this.
- I don't care what breed it is. It's an accident you must remain on scene or face further charges
- The same as a car accident, the owner should have to stay and talk to the other party.
- It's now a crime scene, you're supposed to stay.
- The dog owner should be staying around to tell their side of what happened
- It is no different than an accident. Part of being a dog owner is responsibility. That said, there should be safe guards in place to not have the owner fear their dog being put down over one incident.
- I thought this was common sense that if your dog bit someone or another dog you give your information. There can be long term effects from this.
- But only until you share information. Then take the dog home.
- Many reasons for a dog to bite. Example is a dog biting when threatened or owner threatened. People need to be educated on animal behaviour
- The owner should be held responsible. Dogs are products of their training.
- Any dog owner should take accountability for their dog's behaviour. This is NOT BREED SPECIFIC.
- They would have to provide id to a responding officer and a case started.
- There are always two sides of the story , i believe both need to be heard. BSL is an insult.
- If it was unprovoked.
- This is important like a car collision
- Helps to know vaccine history and to hear both sides of the story
- Your dog, your responsibility.
- Proper thing to do is stay and speak to someone.
- If someone's dog bites a person or another animal I feel the owners should stay until someone shows up, it's like if your in an accident if it's a hit and run your in big trouble once caught should be the same for dog owners.
- Often times there is a reason behind why a dog bites. The owners are the best to explain their dogs behaviour and personality. As well, this way you don't just get the "victims" statement and point of view.

- You don't leave an car accident without leaving your insurance, same goes for your dog. ANY BREED.
- No different than leaving the scene of a car accident. There's vet Bill's that the owner will need to be responsible for.
- I believe this should include ALL BREEDS of dogs involved in biting incidents (exception a working police dog)
- Your animal, your responsibility.
- So u have and know the person at fault for the behaviour and damages
- There's 2 sides to every story
- The owner needs to be held responsible for its dog. It's not different than if my kid bit another kid...I'd have to stay and answer for my kid. There are no bad dogs, just bad dog owners.
- If the dog bites medically you need info and owners can hopefully control the dog
- The owner of the dog is responsible for that dogs actions.
- What if the person of injured and required medical attention? It should be necessary for people to take responsibility for their pets behaviour
- We have way bigger problems in Calgary than pitbulls! To whoever came up with this , pull your head out of your [removed]!
- Dogs are animals none the less. The owner has an obligation to stay and share any information about their dog and the incident. It's about taking onus.
- it's too easy for a dog owner to walk away and not take responsibility for their dogs actions. It can be very difficult to track them down later.
- It should be treated the same as a car accident.
- Dog or human may require vet or doctor visit and should be paid for by the owner of the dog that bit the opposing party
- But only if they are able to do so in the situation.
- It's a common courtesy and expected of other incidences that occur (car accidents).
- There are always 2 sides to the story
- The owner must always be the one to be responsible for their dog's behaviour - just as in a vehicular incident, " bite & run" should be against the law!
- I feel they are responsible for the actions of their dog and should have to remain at the scene
- Only if it is safe to do so, if you have some where to put your dog away from harms way. As long as everyone is calm and collected about the incident. Accidents happen, people who have any type of dog needs to be aware any dog can feel scared or threatened and must know there dogs signs
- Reduced possibility that they will disappear.
- A responsible dog owner would stay at the scene
- The dogs behaviour needs to be tracked, and the owner needs to be responsible for the veterinarian expenses
- Not needed
- Any dog owner should do this. No matter the breed.

- I feel that remaining on the scene is the responsible thing to do.
- It's the owners responsibility
- Absolutely. People should be responsible for their pets. My dog was attacked at the Auburn bay dog park and the guy refused to give me his info. I got a picture of the dog and even waited till the guy left to see if I could get a license plate but he walked there aka lives in Auburn bay area. The dog that attacked was a lab/Shepherd mix.
- No matter the circumstances people should at least exchange info and if necessary help each other get the help needed for any injuries
- The dog is that person's responsibility. So is the aftermath.
- You don't flee an accident. Also the owner should be there to share what happened.
- A dog should only be punished if it did wrong not pick on certain breeds
- Similar to a hit and run.
- a dog bite should be held to a similar standard as a car crash. As the owner, it is their responsibility to properly train and socialize their pet. If an incident occurs it is the civic duty of the owner to insure the victim is okay and to remain at the scene until the issue has been resolved.
- If your personal dog causes damage it is important for witnesses and you to stay at the scene and speak to an enforcement officer to actually understand the situation. People who just leave are running away from the problem. For minor incidences people should be compelled to enroll their dog in mandatory training. My personal dog has had more trouble with huskies and German shepherds than any other dog ... he is a boxer that I have attended many obedience classes with but as a submissive dog he gets picked on. 6 years in Calgary and its never been a pit bull that's bothered him
- If it is reasonable to do so. Sometimes it is actually safer for all involved to get out of the situation. However I understand this would be very hard to determine.
- The definition of "nuisance dog" is ridiculous. Specifying that pit bull type dogs are the breeds that pose risk is untrue. As you well know small breed dogs are more likely to bite but saying it is the pit bulls strength that differentiates them is unacceptable. There are many large breed dogs that are just as strong and more likely to bite than pit bulls. Statistically pit bulls consistently perform better in behavior tests compared to other breeds. Responsible dog ownership is not about breed it is about providing a nurturing, safe and supportive environment for your pet whatever the breed in an effort to reduce reactive tendencies. So focus on the owners treatment of the dog and the dogs responsible handling and not the breed itself. Also consider the actions of the victim... Also consider some PSA information around the meaning of colour coded bandanas and telling people to ask permission to approach/touch other peoples pets... There are reasons why dogs react.
- Small dog tries to attack me, my pitbull stands between me & the small dog & the dog bites my pitbull. The small dog owner says nothing, DOES nothing & runs off. Yet, you want to take my dog because it was protecting me & just stood it's ground while the small dog gets NOTHING.
- It's 10000% the owners responsibility. Dogs act and behave like dogs. People are the ones stupid enough to believe dogs should think like them. If there is a problem, the people must be made accountable. Don't punish the dog for human stupidity.

- They must be responsible and take action to ensure it doesn't happen again for the sake of the animal
- That is the absolute bare minimum that should happen. There needs to be more in place PRIOR to getting a dog.
- Only if any substantial injury has been made.. at the end of the day these are animals and dogs will fight from time to time, as well as bite if provoked which is normal!
- The owner responsible should stay but be able to bring their dog away from the scene, allowing everyone to calm down and reduce the risk of more damage. The more crowding done by bystanders can increase the dog's nervousness, which could've been the case in the first place.
- It's important the owner takes responsibility for the animal.
- It has to be a true bite and not one fabricated by the mind of a non-drug owner.
- In many dog bite incidents, owners of the problem dog flee & there are no repercussions. I imagine this would still happen, but might encourage more to hang around.
- A record can be kept of the owner, if the owner (Not necessarily the same animal) has multiple incidents against them, then maybe look into that person's ability to be a responsible pet owner.
- I think we need to track the people as much as the owner. Dogs although wild animals inside are trained by their owners.
- "Yes because i know someone that owns a dog has bitten people at dog parks 7 times and there yet..... Those dogs dont get punished, no one did much about it and yet you guys still want to punish a specific breed PITBULL. IGNORANCE and it hurts to see that for humans.... We are doing everything to support but for animal lets just generalize because it is green or white or black?"
- [removed]"
- Dog owners must be held accountable for dog bites
- People should take responsibility for their animals.
- If that person loves this animal I'm going to fight for its life. So I think anybody should fight for a life that has no voice
- No matter the size of the dog, the owner should be held accountable. All bites have the potential of causing damage. Big and small. Small dog owners should not brush off their dogs biting.
- Unless the dog or owner is physically injured and must get to an emergency health clinic or hospital
- So the incident can be investigated
- Just in case that dog that is attacked needs medical attention.
- It is responsible
- Your dog, your responsibility
- Absolutely but this must be required for all breeds not just potties. What about German Shepherds, standard poodles and on and on. Any large breed can cause injury.
- I agree that they should stay. But how dare you single out a specific type of dog because of the way they look. [removed]
- Yes
- If an animal owners pet bites someone the should own up tobit just like a car accident

- It's better if the policemen can hear both sides the owner and the victim
- Would be the same as a car accident
- There are always 2 sides of a story. The owner of the dog should stay and give their side to an officer.
- It's important for the situation to be explained from both sides. But as long as specific breeds aren't discriminated against.
- Yes but only to do background check on the owner. Any animal has the potential to do harm it's the people raising the dogs that affects their behaviour. Not rocket science people!
- Common sense says
- It would help ensure it could be properly investigated...vaccination history etc could be confirmed etc.
- Same as a Hit and run, except with a dog instead of a car. Should be similar rules and penalties.
- This needs to be treated like a vehicle accident. Both sides need to be heard, before a dog is wrongfully taken away and put down.
- Everyone should be able to first hand explain their side of the story at the owner may view the incident as self defense or being provoked and the victim may view it as they attacked for no reason, all sides of the story should be told immediately after the incident, just like a car crash situation.
- People are too comfortable leaving the scene without any consequences.
- If there is ever an incident the owner should always stay until its resolved. Thats how a responsible owner behaves. However bylaws aren't made to be enforced against responsible owners usually.
- It is the owner's responsibility.
- Yes, as long as it is not the police. It should be addressed by an animal control officer who has a better concept of animal psychology.
- It makes sense to stay at the scene so more information regarding the situation can be procured.
- Way too often people/pets/livestock get attacked with the offending dog and owner leaving or giving fake info. The victim's are left to deal with their injuries, in some cases fatal injuries. The public ends up usually picking up the tab with Gofundme pleas for medical/vet bills.
- Dog owner should take responsibility for the actions of the dog just as you should if you hit someone else's vehicle.
- Only if severe. Dogs are animals, we can't expect them to be perfect 100% of the time
- It is the owners responsibility and more than likely fault, most dogs are not vicious without reasoning its bad owners not bad pets no matter the breed there for owners should be investigated and dog should be given fair chance at rehabilitation.
- How else could the be contacted for further question ing?
- It is the responsibility of the pet owner to stay and speak to lay enforcement
- The owner is responsible
- If you're involved in a car accident, you're required to remain on scene, right? If someone's dog bit & injured someone they are responsible

- Similar to a hit and run, if a dog bites someone then more information needs to be gathered from the dog owner. Also similar to a hit and run, if other treatment/removal from scene is required then information for follow up contact would be shared prior to the dog owner, and dog, leaving the scene.
- Dog owners need to take responsibility when their dogs cause bodily harm or property damage.
- hard to enforce and easy to say that they didn't know so not sure how useful it is.
- I believe just like a car accident, you should be required to stay at the scene until information is exchanged, some form of govt issued ID is presented, and in the case of injury to the bite victim (blood drawn, bruising, etc) that an enforcement officer has attended the scene. There should be very stiff penalties to discourage people from leaving the scene. I also would support cameras installed parking lots of off leash parks that can capture license plates of those who leave the scene. The fines can be used to fund this feature.
- I think it is important to get both sides to the story just after the incident happens for accuracy.
- Required only with evidence of injury to person or animal.
- It's important to the law officer to collect both statements. To remain in the scene gives the owner of the dog more liability since he will need to wait just, as same as the attacked individual will also need to wait for medical care if that's the case.
- Should be treated the same as leaving the scene of a motor vehicle collision, your property injured someone barring exceptional circumstances, you should have to stick around to deal with it.
- The owner should be held liable in all cases.
- If the owner fails to train the dog they need to be held responsible.
- all owners should be accountable for their dogs behavior, its not the dogs fault but the owners for lack of training.
- Should be like hitting someone with a car, if damage is done there should be exchange of information and pertinent officer should be called. Person who owns the dog should have to cover vet bills if another dog is bitten
- Yes if you don't take the dog and look at the whole picture because it not always the dog's fault if they were teased or being hurt because most of the time it is the person's fault.
- If an officer is necessary the owner of the dog should remain at the scene in order to take the right steps to resolving the issue.
- It's very rare for a domesticated animal to attack when unprovoked. The owner should stay to show their willing to cooperate and to have the chance to explain the situation from another perspective. Human instinct is to bend reality to fit the situation that benefits them.
- "I believe that if a dog of any breed causes harm to another being that is completely
- Expected to the owner to stay and figure out a solution. A solution being assisting in medical aid if someone was injured, covering vet bills of the other persons animal if it was a pet that was injured and then picking a course of action to ensure this doesn't happen again (obedience training)
- It is not fair to take specific breeds and descriminate against them based on poor training, no specific breed is bad, and especially not these breeds. I have personally had a lot more issues with smaller dog breeds and typically ones that are extremely common in a family household. I have found those breeds to be a lot more aggressive than any “bully” breed. A dog's temperament can easily be fixed through some training and most of the time these issues come from poor training of the owner, not because of the breed. If negative dog behaviour is a common problem, fix it by making puppy training more mandatory in ALL breeds, or require a higher insurance policy if a dog isn't trained, but don't just pick and choose breeds because that won't fix the issue. All dogs need to be trained properly and it isn't fair to limit how many of a breed a person can have or enforce muzzles on a dog that has a 'powerful bite' but a much sweeter temperament and have no expectations of people who have smaller dogs with much much worse temperaments."

- A dog's behaviour is a reflection of its owner's teachings, therefore I think it would reinforce accountability for proper dog training if dog owners are required by law to remain at the scene of an incident.
- Owners need to step up and be responsible for their animals behaviour
- Better to have everyone present that was involved
- The dog is under supervisions and care of the owner. Their actions reflect upon the owner, their abilities, and level of care for the dog's wellbeing/lifestyle and how they engage with the public.
- Responsibility of owner to ensure everything taken care of.
- The dog harmed someone or something. It is no different than a car accident
- A fine and warrant should apply if owner does not stay
- Yes because if they leave the officer will only hear one side of the story instead of both and ultimately the dog will be blamed in that case for sure.
- If I'm walking my dogs on a leash and someone's unleashed dog is running around and attacks my dogs, I want them to be able to provide the information to the police so that should a court case happen, that there be documentation.
- I believe if an incident occurs it's important to get to the bottom of what caused it, just like a traffic accident
- This is especially true for dogs like Pomeranian chihuahua and jack russel terriers who's owners don't treat them like dogs which leads to further bad behaviour
- The owner/dog should be required to take (and show passing grad proof) of training classes.
- I know many people who've been attacked by other dogs and the owners have taken off and unable to be found and the victims get stuck with the bills and the dogs couldn't go on attacking others.
- This is taking responsibility for something you own
- If one's dog bites another animal or person, the owner of the offending dog should take responsibility for their dogs behaviour. On the flip side, if the dog was provoked due to another dogs or another dog owners poor behaviour, that owner should also remain at the scene. An investigation should take place and all statements should be taken. Statements should also be read with an open mind and without biased, meaning the breeds of the dogs involved should not play a role in determining the outcome.
- BUT They may have to leave the scene to put the offending dog away or to get veterinary help, They should however have to leave identification behind or return to the scene to avoid charges

- Not much to explain. It's the right thing to do to ensure others safety. No different then leaving an accident scene.
- I've seen dog owners flee the scene after their dog has attacked and/or killed another animal. Being responsible for your pets actions should be part of being a responsible owner.
- Yes. It's like hitting someone's car. Need to exchange info so proper channels can be met.
- When a dog bites someone is it most often the owner's fault (except in cases where its a shelter dog who is fearful or someone is trying to approach the dog when the owner has instructed them not to) as such the owner should be obligated to take responsibility for their pet.
- An owner must take responsibility for his or her pet.
- Pit bulls and other similar breeds are compassionate and loving companion animals who do not deserve to be demonized. The behavior of the dog relies entirely on the owner!!!
- I feel like it's no different than if you were in an accident with your car. You would need to stay at the scene to give your information so you can be held responsible.
- Any responsible pet owner would be willing to exchange information and a statement in case damage was done.
- The owner of the dog that causes injury should be legally required to stay at the scene to exchange info
- THis is the same as if you hit a vehicle, you stay at the scene till we can exchange information
- It should be treated as a crime scene, just like an assault or rear-ending someone in a vehicle.
- It should be the responsibility of a dog owner to remain at the scene if their dog causes injury to a person or animal as the dog is their property and therefore their responsibility. An owner should be held criminally responsible for having a known aggressive dog in a situation where it can attack a human (ie. loose in a front yard, off leash)
- It's like a car accident. A Hit and run is not ok. Same with a bite and run. It should not be allowed. Now a days you can exchange phone numbers, addresses, names, etc. Dogs could have diseases that could be transmitted. It should not a be problems to exchange contact information.
- That goes for all breeds, not just big dogs. Most bites and attacks are done by small dog breeds and then a lg dog will get blamed for it.
- The owner should be accountable if the dog bites another animal or human but there could be possible motives so that needs to be taken into account.
- I do, but it may be necessary to remove the dog from the situation in order to diffuse it entirely.
- Seems pretty self explanatory
- Owners should be responsible for their pet and responsible for financial payments of vet bills. If a person is injured the pet owner should be responsible for emergency care or ambulance bill or future wage loss.
- There needs to be an understanding as to what caused the incident. Yes, the dog owner should always have accountability for their dogs actions but should also be allowed to save their dogs life if the dog was provoked. You don't see small dogs being put down when they bite, whether it causes severe injury or not, recognize the double standard.

- Dogs bite when they play and some people overreact to these encounters. However, I feel that if the seriousness of the incident required veterinary or medical attention then I would support this rule.
- Accountability of dog owners is necessary.
- Yes as a responsible dog owner everyone should do this anyway. But even with a rule doesn't mean people will follow
- All parties should remain at the scene of the incident to get an accurate statement of events, including whether the bite victim (dog or human) provoked the dog into biting
- I think it is necessary. It's a responsibility of the owner just like getting into a car accident.
- this is only the responsible thing to do - just like car accidents
- Responsibility of the owner to deal with the consequences.
- It's like a hit and run
- The owner needs to be held accountable, as biting is a serious problem. The dog owner may need more training in how to properly manage their dog, and the dog may need a muzzle.
- Owners are responsible for their dogs and therefore must accept the responsibility for their dogs behavior. No bad dogs only bad owners.
- If it is a bite and there's damage that needs to be documented.
- A dog owner is responsible for the dog's actions. It should be treated the same as leaving the scene if a crime.
- "This is...and say it with me...responsible pet ownership.
- Just don't be a garbage human."
- The owner is responsible for anything their dog does and needs to be held accountable.
- Well I believe that a dog's owner should be responsible for his / her pet
- That is reasonable.
- IF severe and it cannot be resolved between both parties.
- i have been bit by more dachshunds and chihuahuas than pit types. The small dog owners flee faster than anyone.
- Absolutely since the owner is responsible for their dog.
- People are responsible for their pets but Pitts are not bad dogs
- But as long as it is safe to do so.. they may need to distance themselves from the person/other dog to try to ensure no further damage or they may need to put the dog in a house/yard or car while the humans talk
- It is important to get health information from the pet owner to decide if rabies prophylaxis is needed.
- It is like any other crime you should be required to remain or provide id and contact info
- Owning a dog is a responsibility. If a dog bites someone or another dog, i would expect that the human would have to give information to the victim.
- As a dog owner you are responsible for your pets actions
- The animal could be dangerous. And the event must be investigated further
- It is important to assess by an officer who can impartially assess whether the owner is competent enough to control their pet.

- To know the status of the injury and if the pet has been vaccinated for rabies
- In the latter incident mentioned at the end of question # 3 above, the woman with the dog that killed our neighbour's puppy fled the scene immediately with her, not 1 but 2, vicious creatures. If we require a person to remain at the scene to exchange information in the case of a minor car accident even when no one is injured, why do we not require it in an incident where a pet is injured or even killed?
- SIMPLE - far too often owners of dogs that bite know their dogs are dangerous and that they could get in trouble so they flee the scene, when they most definitely should be held accountable for the attack and for any costs involved in treating the victim
- A owner of any breed of dog needs to be held accountable about for their pet.
- It's like any accident...no one should leave until all information has changed hands.
- I have had four instances in Calgary, twice off leash dogs on city streets and twice at the off leash parks. Both park incidents resulted in my pitbull being injured requiring veterinary care. Both times the other owners left the scene. My dog is a pitbull and she did not bite back!
- If in a severe case it should be required, a sever case would include significant trauma to a person or animal where it had no ability to be because of play where the bite was minor to very minor and very possibly accidental.
- Dog owners need to be involved. And held accountable
- People with little dog breeds for example chihuahua leave when their dogs bite and these dogs are never subjected to the same treatment as pitbull and the like of breeds and to my knowledge continuously bite other people or dogs and are never destroyed.
- Just like a car accident.
- The OWNER is responsible for its dogs behaviour not the dogs.
- They should be held responsible.
- The owner needs to be held accountable, just as a driver would need to be if they hit someone
- The owner of a dog must be accountable for its behaviour.
- People stick around after car accident, don't they? (Some level of distance should be allowed to break line of sight between animals.)
- The owner of a dog that bites must take the responsibility
- You should not be able to leave if you are responsible for harm, and ultimately the human is responsible
- Its an accident and you stick around at accidents
- Recently a problem dog attacked our cat and the owners left the scene and did not offer any information.
- Accountability is currently lacking
- Problem dogs often belong to problem people. The people often see no problem with their dogs behaviour or they seem to enjoy getting I to frequent conflicts. It should be like a car accident. There are often vet costs. The person will not be known as a repeat offender if they leave.
- There is 2 sides to every story and they need to be heard.

- I think it is acceptable to expect the owner to stay as long as their side of the story is heard too. Eg if a kid kicks a dog or otherwise harasses or harms it this should not lead to the owner getting fined and/or the dog being euthanized.
- To identify dogs at risk of biting
- A bite is an assault, remaining at the scene should be required by all parties until the authorities can attend.
- Dog owners, regardless of breed, must be responsible for the actions of their dog.
- "Again we need to determine the why...it's not always a black and white answer
- Why is there only "1" a or b or both question regarding g cats?
- Where are the other opportunities to give more feedback regarding roaming cats and irresponsible owners?"
- Owners must be responsible and accountable for their animal's behaviour.
- I believe it would be in the best interest o both the injured person/animal and the dog owner
- When a dog bites and may kill another dog it should be treated like dogs that bite humans, which is not the case currently
- Absolutely! A dog who bites is a threat and their owners should be subject to fines and/or criminal charges. Enough is enough!
- This is comparable to a traffic incident where you are required to exchange information. This information may be required for vaccination history, insurance or other proceedings
- There is a victim and a person/animal at fault. Whether it was a premeditated attack or not. Also only saying yes if it gets reported. If both parties agree no further action is necessary then no.
- Owners need to take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
- "Ability to determine/identify:
 - animal, owner, and victim;
 - vaccination records;
 - animal history;
 - incident details;
 - log incident details etc."
- The owner is responsible for the pet's behaviour and as such must stay at the incident scene.
- Because it is the owner that is ultimately responsible and as such should be available and accountable.
- The owner is involved in a crime. The owner fleeing should carry the same weight as fleeing an accident etc.
- The owner should be held accountable as if they committed the attack themself.
- A dog is the responsibility of its owner and they are responsible for its actions
- Responsible pet ownership ensures owners take responsibility for the actions of their pets
- Doesn't that just make sense?
- If the bite is serious enough to cause an injury, the responsible thing is to remain at the scene.
- A dog owner needs to take responsibility for their animal.

- It's like getting into a car accident. The owner should be charged with fleeing the scene if they leave after such an incident.
- This should be a basic requirement, why is this not happening already?
- The dog bite incident is comparable to a car accident. The dog owner is responsible for the dog in the same way the driver is responsible for the car.
- Don't people stay at the scene of a car accident, same thing.
- If they don't remain at the scene with their dog, they are NOT good owners.
- In the case of a car accident those involved are required to stay at the scene, so it should be at any incident including dog bites.
- It's the most straightforward way to get the correct information. If the parties involved are unable to stay (due to weather or elements outside their control) and alternative must be agreed upon by all parties involved
- The owner is responsible for their pet and needs to assume the responsibility for its actions.
- "It's only fair to the victim. Especially if treatment is needed and expenses to be paid. Only proving if the harmed animal/person didn't cause the attack/bite.
- Too many assumptions that a BULLY BREED is at fault!!!!!!"
- Dog bites are serious. The owner should not make excuses for the dog and should be aware of the seriousness. As well, it may be unrelated but animals don't belong in public places such as Walmart, restaurants etc. Not everyone loves animals and many of them shed, drool etc. And some people have a fear of animals.
- People should take responsibility for their dogs, accidents happen but there should be clear procedures for when they happen
- It would be the owners responsibility to cover for any damages and this would be determined by the enforcement officer.
- It's important that there is accountability for the dog. It's also important that the owner be present to give their side of what happened.
- Being held responsible as the owner of a dog who bit is very important.
- Unfortunately there is plenty of grey area in the term "bite". A playful puppy bite is certainly different than an aggressive or scared bite.
- I think the owner is responsible for the behavior of their animal so should have to stay and share contact info with the other animal's owner and the enforcement officer.
- It assists with responsible dog ownership
- It needs to be investigated as a bite could cause serious harm, and we need to know if an animal has been vaccinated properly, and to report if it's been an offence before.
- Should be the same as any accident why would you ever leave if someone was injured
- They should be required to give their contact info to the Victim like if you get into a car accident
- Absolutely. Just like in a vehicle accident you must stay and give your information.
- If a dog bit me or my kids I'd want the owners of that dog to take responsibility for their dogs actions
- Accountability is a must.

- It needs to be fair and without bias. I have seen small dogs provoke fights with big dogs by biting at the big dogs face and attacking the larger dog, the small dog owners due nothing until the big dog reacts then everyone blames the big dog
- If the owner is present at the scene they should stay if it's safe to do so.
- Just like any other accident
- Only makes sense
- Unless the biting dog is still out of control. It is the same as a car crash, information should be exchanged.
- Dog bite can cause injury or trauma, same as a vehicle collision that requires drivers to remain at scene. Why would dog owner departure be any different than hit and run ?
- Except if there is injury to the dog or a risk of further escalation. Then it would be best if the dog and owner left. There should be an exchange of info for sure but every incident is different.
- I think having them remain at the scene is just common sense.
- Be responsible for your pet and its' actions. You can't leave the scene of an accident without sharing your information, it should be the same rule.
- Too often you hear of dog attacks happening and the other owner just takes off once it's over. And people are left to not only fit the bill, but the owner of the dog who bites is not made aware of what their dog is capable of.
- If your dog bites someone or another dog, you better not be running away. That's similar to a motor vehicle hit and run in my opinion
- Often ppl flee without giving time for the other pet owner to check on their dog after an altercation
- It is important for dog owners to take responsibility for their dog's behaviour. The problem is NOT the dog or the breed. The problem is the bad owners!
- Should stay due to possible medical problems and to determine who has the problem animal
- Yes I believe someone whose dog has bitten, needs to share contact information.
- A passerby near my house was bitten by a dog - apparently the owner had left the dog at a location across the street to be looked after by a friend. When the bylaw officer arrived, they wanted to order the owner to come get the dog, but they didn't have the authority.
- If you're in a car accident, you have to remain on scene and provide contact information. Any incident with physical or property damage should be treated equally
- It's like leaving the scene of an accident. Shouldn't be allowed.
- It forces them to take more responsibility for their dog.
- I believe they should exchange phone numbers and DV license if able . Then remove the dog from the situation that caused the incident
- They need to be held responsible for their pets actions as an owner.
- Self explanatory
- That wasn't already the case!?!
- "this will make it easier for peace officers to get a statement from both parties at the same time.
- This decision will make the process faster and convenient"

- Otherwise they may just take off, and you won't know who they were. Like a hit and run
- Owners need to be accountable for their animal's actions.
- The owner of an attacking/nuisance dog needs to remain on the scene in order to take financial responsibility for the incident if necessary, and provide vaccination history for their dog. It's common for these owners to flee the scene of a bite incident, which also makes it difficult for the City to track the individual dog's bite history.
- All pet owners must assume responsibility for their pets actions
- It's their animal their responsibility, they are accountable for the dogs actions
- If an animal attacks another animal the owner of the offending animal should remain on scene and exchange information.
- Dog owners are responsible for their dogs and should answer to an enforcement agent if necessary.
- To be held accountable.
- Like a car accident, the perpetrator should remain at the scene of the crime and take responsibility of their actions (or lack thereof).
- Owners must be held accountable and cannot leave scene to flee responsibility
- Adds safety for the person who was bitten, allows for accountability to be taken
- How else can you hold them accountable?
- They are accountable for their pets actions.
- The owner must be accountable
- Owners should be responsible for their pets' behaviours
- "provided that the person that was bitten didn't provoke the bite!"
- Not all dog bites are reported either."
- Absolutely, everyone should carry pet insurance.
- It is common sense to stay at the scene of a "crime". If your dog was responsible for biting someone or something then they should absolutely be required to remain on scene
- If an incident occurs, a dog owner MUST give their information to the victim, and wait (if necessary) for for an enforcement office.
- I would want to make sure everyone involved is ok.
- Pet owners need to be accountable for the pets, that includes getting appropriate training and not taking them into situations that may encourage negative behaviors in their pet. As a responsible pet owner if their pet bites another person or animal they should be held to the same standards as if involved in a motor vehicle incident as a member of the community.
- It should be at the victims discretion. Bystanders opinions of the events are irrelevant unless needed as official witnesses.
- Absolutely necessary. People will leave the scene of an incident just to avoid fines, medical bills or punishment. At least this would put in place wording saying that by leaving you'd be breaking the law.
- Treated like a car accident. Must exchange info, must stay for enforcement officer if serious.
- It allows for full understanding of the incident

- Simple accountability for both parties. Not all attacks are unprovoked.
- People need to know if the dog has been properly vaccinated and who is legally responsible for the dog for recovery of any expenses
- Everyone has their own side of the story. If only one person is stating what happen it can result in bias views. People in general should be responsible for their pets actions, regardless if the owners are aware of the animal's behaviour or not.
- Human decency and responsible citizenship/ownership.
- All too often the owner runs away with their dog. This has happened to our family when our daughter was attacked/injured (by a golden retriever).
- This is the only way to make the law work. If dog & owner leave the scene how do you get the contact information?
- It's your responsibility as a dog owner.
- It's important to take accountability and responsibility for the incident and be given the opportunity for all parties to come to a fair and reasonable resolution.
- Owners should always be held responsible for their dogs behaviour
- Hit and runs are illegal; It's the same with dog bites.
- This allows for a more fair assessment as the dog owner too is heard
- The owner should be held responsible for any injuries, and might not be found/held accountable if they leave the scene of the incident.
- No different to a car accident.
- Pet owners need to take responsibility for their pets' actions.
- Its obvious
- That's just logical for any good dog owner. Especially for small dog owners as their dogs are more likely to bite and they tend to treat it more lightly than large dog owners in my experience.
- If the bite is serious or is to the point of broken skin or hide then the owner should be required to stay as to have a chance to explain their side of the situation and not have their dog blamed for the incident as there is a chance the dog was provoked prior to the incident.
- The dog owner is responsible for the dog and its behaviour and misbehaviour. The bite is a crime of violence. The owner must remain at the scene of the crime.
- Owners must take responsibility for their pet's actions and must ensure any harm is addressed appropriately, and perhaps, legally.
- The dogs actions are the responsibility of the owner. They need to be held accountable for their actions.
- People need to be held accountable for their pet's actions. That said, this might not be feasible in situations where the attacking dog needs to be removed from the scene immediately.
- There are 2 sides to every incident. Both parties need to give their point of view of the details while it is fresh on their minds.
- No different from a car accident. Dog owners are responsible for controlling their animals. They should have to stay at the scene until enforcement officers arrive or face a fine.

- All people involved need to be held accountable for their dogs actions. There needs to be more public advertising about training your dog and how to be safe with your dog.
- Obtain maximum information hear both sides of the story
- It's like a car accident. The owner should be required my lawyer to stay and take responsibility.
- Owners are responsible for their animals.
- Owner should be held accountable for the action of their dog. Given the dog was not provoked in any way.
- Fleeing the scene of an accident or assault is illegal so why not make it illegal to flee the scene of the dog (that you're responsible for) attack/bite/etc?
- To many people when there dog injures another just leave the scene and then the injured dog owner is left with the bill. Both parties need to stay and any witnesses so that it can be determined when happened because just because a dog is injured doesn't mean that that he is innocent. If he was the one who started it then that needs to be realized. You can't have a dog that is always starting fights but getting hurt get away with it. Just cause a dog fight happens doesn't mean that it's the dog who bites fault.
- However, the dog that has bitten needs to be seen to and secured to reduce/minimize stress and anxiety.
- Accountability
- Absolutely, it is the owners responsibility just as if it were a child. It is also important for records, insurance, the victim and the owner.
- I've never heard of somebody leaving the scene after a bite.
- obviously you can't cut and run
- Just as you are required to exchange information if an injury occurs in a vehicle, dog owners also need to be responsible and accountable.
- Too many irresponsible pet owners get away with these incidents and need to be held accountable to train their dog properly
- To share info. Bylaw can contact owner later. Leaving reactive dog especially if fear based at scene could be problematic.
- Yes is better than no, but what is the likelihood that the owner remains at the scene. Probably slim and/or nil. This is a useless rule.
- Dog owners often run away after an incident. There needs to be a way to keep them at the scene.
- In cases where the incident requires vet care, both owners should be required to provide pertinent information.
- I am surprised that it is not already in the bylaw.
- Absolutely! The owner of the dog that bit it is there responsibility for their dog and everything their dog Does. If they don't stay at the scene their animals should be taken and they should be fined.
- I agree with this because the owner is responsible for the animal. And more at fault if their dog has bitten a person or animal. They are in charge of their pet and should deal with the repercussions.
- People should always remain when their dog has injured a person. If the dog injures another dog the severity of the injury and the circumstances that led to it should determine if they remain. If the owner of the injured dog does not see the injury as outside exuberant dog playfulness then they can leave. I would only allow owners to leave if they have provided identification and contact information only if the dog in question is unable to be calmed down and remaining there creates an additional hazard.

- It's the owner's responsibility to be in control of their dog, plus I think it's important to understand the circumstances around the event. Someone having a dog on leash and being protective of their dog in an off leash area is ripe for problems to occur. I think it's important for the enforcement officer to understand and hear both sides.
- Everyone has to be accountable despite the breed of dog
- any dog that bites must be recorded, the owners information collected, and that dog should be limited in where it can be in future (i.e. do not walk in playgrounds, no off leash parks, etc)
- Of course. Leaving would be like leaving a crime scene, or a hit and run.
- I dont think enough people take responsibility for their dogs actions so in turn the actions of themselves
- It should be like leaving the scene of a Crime and a serious penalty involved if they don't stay.
- Dog owner must be held responsible for damages that their dog inflicts in others. Must face consequences of having a poorly trained/dangerous dog.
- If I get in a car accident I have to stay so why not the dog owner
- This shows that the owner is willing to take responsibility and consider options like training to improve dog behavior. The owner is responsible for the dog at all times, regardless of incident.
- It would be like a car accident. All people involved should be there for a statement. At the end of the day it's not always the dog that bit whose fault it was. Dogs are still animals with wild animal instincts.
- People should be doing that already, unless immediate vet or medical care is required.
- Absolutely. Vet bills are expensive and the trauma of seeing your pet being attacked or killed is devastating. Dog owners must be held accountable and I 100% feel if a dog kills another's pet it should be euthanized immediately.
- I think it is important that if a dog bites the owner is kept their to determine what caused this issue. Did someone/another animal come up and instigate issues with said dog? Did someone come up behind said dog and scare it issuing a reaction? That way the issue is dealt with properly right away and there's less time for that animal to be restricted in a shelter potentially creating violence because they are scared. Just because a dog reacted wrong at a certain time doesn't always mean they are violent. Consider a situation where you scare someone by coming up behind them and they react by punching you as a normal instinct because they think they are being threatened. It is important for people to educate themselves and their children on how to properly approach animals, not restrict the animal more. A lot of times it is the owner who create a violent animal as well.
- As a dog owner you are responsible for your animal and their behaviour
- It is a owners responsibility to be there and be accountable. Providing info is necessary.
- There are too many incidents when owners of an aggressive animal do not take responsibility during a conflict.

- Yes. Owners should take full responsibility for their animals.
- Just like you must remain at a car accident. Your dog is your responsibility
- The owner of the dog who bites a person or another dog must be liable for any costs incurred to the victim. If the owner disagree then severe consequences should be imposed on the dog owner.
- What part of YES do you need explained?
- If a dog bites and the owner leaves the scene, it is similar to a hit and run. The owner should be responsible and remain there to provide their contact info. People must be accountable for their animals to prevent a free-for-all mentality.
- Owners should be required to stay at scene of incident
- The owner has rights too. Both sides should've heard.
- There are two sides to every story, the media will post the most eye catching headline, but many times where a dog is the assumed culprit, I often wonder if it was being provoked? I think is the offense is serious enough to involve bylaw, any responsible owner would wait to explain why happened and discuss actions moving forward. As I strongly believe there are no bad dogs, it's the owners wouldn't that be the mature and correct action to do?
- If they don't stay around, how can there be any consequences.
- The owner should be able and willing to provide vaccination information, any training the dog has had, the circumstances that led up to the bite and any other information they can provide to show responsible dog ownership.
- Leaving the scene after your dog bites someone is like committing hit and run. Your animal has caused injury to another, you need to be accountable for that.
- Yes if both owners feel it's required.
- No need for explanation. It's the right thing to do.
- Absolutely the victim of the bite needs to know who owns the animal and also to face any possible consequences.
- The owner must accept responsibility. The quicker the matter is discussed more likely nothing is forgotten
- You stay at the scene of a car accident. Why not the same?
- It's called being a responsible dog owner
- If a dog bites someone when the owner is around, the responsible thing to do is offer assistance to the injured person. This would include cooperating with law enforcement.
- That is a no brainer
- Supports evidence rather than heresay
- if the owner of said dog is present it allows for the owner to speak on behalf of their pet. This would also allow for both parties to provide their side of the story.
- Like any incident, responsible citizens should act accordingly and stay
- They often leave, flee or give false information. This would hold them more accountable for their actions.

- If the parties involved feel the need to talk to an enforcement officer about the incident then it could be beneficial however for superficial bites it seems unnecessary as the owners can likely deal with the situation on their own.
- They are responsible for ensuring the dog/person receives treatment. And to pay for any vet bills
- If a dog bites a person, yes.
- It's like a hit and run if they do not, but context must be understood as well, Like was the dog being provoked or prodded at
- Much like a car accident - you should be required to remain at the scene
- Because a responsible dog owner should make sure the other person and dog are okay. If they aren't there needs to be follow up regarding vet bills, etc..
- Responsible dog ownership.
- The owner of the dog needs to be held accountable.
- No different than an accident, plus the attacking dog owner must pay retribution the victim, if the victim's dog is killed then the attacking dog should be killed as well.
- it may have not been the dog who attacks fault and there is always 2 sides to the story.
- The dog owner must accept responsibility and make it right (eg paying vet bill).
- Yes and no. If a dog has bitten someone there is usually a trigger of some sort. So no the dog shouldn't be forced to stay somewhere when it's clearly distressed. How would you feel if someone did that to you. But should you have to provide your information 100 percent.
- Yes, often the owner takes no responsibility. But it's like a car accident - they should stay at the scene.
- Depends on the severity of the bite
- Because jail should be alternative for the owners ...
- Owners should be held responsible, which they can't be if they run away.
- The dog owner must take responsibility.
- This is just basic human decency. There is always a reason for a dog to bite someone. Whether the victim was enticing the dog or the owner was in danger. A dog doesn't just go and bite someone without a valid reason.
- Yes, unless they stay there with the dog creates more danger.
- Responsible pet owners need to be held accountable for their pet's behavior
- AGAIN... there are no Bad Pets ... there are BAD Pet Owners... It's all in the training!
- Of course. Any responsible dog owner will stay at the scene.
- People need to be responsible for their animals. Just like a car accident you need to be accountable.
- It's irresponsible and poor ownership not to
- it should be common sense
- I have had this situation occur and while the person did give me their name at the time they took off. It was much harder to track them down afterward.
- Because it's the decent human thing to do.
- Too many dead beat owners leave owing huge bills.

- This would be no different than a motor vehicle accident, again with all breeds regardless of size.
- To ensure history of dog and/or dog owner behaviour with other dogs AND health and vaccination details of the dog are disclosed
- To support truth in story & evidence to protect the animal who bit someone/something . Gives opportunity for defence as to the engagement prior to the event.
- I think that it is important for pet owners to take responsibility for the actions of their pets.
- The pet owner should be there as they are responsible for their pet and their actions.
- There should be consequences for the dog and owner, they need to stay the same way we need to stay when there is a vehicular accident.
- Regardless of any incident, it is the right thing to do for a the dog's owner to exchange information.
- It is the responsibility of a dog owner to have control of there pet no matter what breed eg Yorkie or Mastiff or Pitti. Like with our human children we are responsible for their actions. And no single breed SHOULD be unfairly judged!!!!!!
- "Of course the situation needs vetting
- both parties should remain until some investigation is conducted."
- Not any different than a hit and run.
- The owner should also be held responsible you have to stay
- If your dog is bites or is bitten there should be a reasonable amount of time for explanation of facts. As a former owner of a large dog who never bit anyone or thing and was often provoked by small dogs nibbling hind quarters, barking intensely and being jumped on aggressively why would retaliation behavior be the big dogs fault. Mine was trained to look to me for assistance in these matters. And yes I was nibbled by a small dog defending my large dog. They laughed when I objected to its behavior.
- How is this not already the rule?
- I myself have had my dog bitten by another dog and the owner left immediately and didn't take responsibility
- It should be required. Same as it would be if a human injured a person.
- Whenever there is an act of aggression or injury, regardless of the cause, the people involved absolutely should be required to stay and the scene and share info. Too often, people just walk away from bike crashes on pathways, Dog incidents etc with no accountability. This is akin to a hit and run. I have been injured by a person on inline skates with a large dog on an extendable leash and they just carried on. The injury to me lasted months.
- Because I have been attacked by an offleash pit bull in a City greenscape and the owner fled with his dog.
- The owner is responsible for that dog and must provide information to the victim(s), much like a car accident.
- It would be the owners responsibility
- Creates accountability on the owner as opposed to putting the blame on the dog.
- "Make the owners responsible and stop punishing the innocent dogs.....they only do as taught!
- People/owners need to pay the price, not the dog!!!!"

- Many dog attack incidents go unpunished because the owner of the dog who attacked refuses to cooperate and flees the scene before giving any identifying information.
- Yes
- You need to be held accountable.
- Responsible ownership
- Sometimes these can be worked out without an enforcement officer, and most times a dog biting another is not a serious bite or the result of a 'dangerous' dog. My one fear would be that IF an enforcement officer attends - the whole thing could be blown out of proportion. I don't think that every dog biting another dog incident should result in someone having to pay a fine and the dog having a 'strike' on it's records.
- Too many owners don't take responsibility, and in some instances shouldn't own dogs because they don't take ownership of their pet and it's actions. By having to remain at the scene, it forces these pet owners to own up to their poor pet parenting skills or lack thereof.
- There should be more accountability with owners. The dog breeds are a non issue. Neglectful owners that don't train their dogs properly should be tracked and have climbing penalties eventually leading to stripping them of the privilege of owning any animals for repeat offenses.
- In a word: responsibility.
- Take responsibility
- yes, dog owners need to take responsibility for their pets behaviors.
- Yes, dog owners have to take responsibility for their own dogs.
- Common curtesy and making sure the person or persons dog was okay.
- Any who has an animal that bites another animal or a human should be required to stay until information is provided as to their name, address, contact details in case further follow up is required. They should stay until police or enforcement officer arrives to sort it out.
- Owners of dog that bite/injure other dog must be held accountable and pay for medical treatment of injured dog.
- This holds owners accountable and ensures that a resolution will be reached.
- The dog is responsible
- Because an injury has occurred.
- that is part of being a responsible pet owner being responsible for their pets actions
- Owners are responsible for their pets & need to provide additional information concerning vaccines etc.
- For any and all animals you own you need to take responsibility for any incident that happens. Example hit and run
- A tribunal or some sort of repercussion for these incidents will be obviously ineffective if the owner and dog don't remain or share information after an incident.
- This is the right thing to do. Do it as a responsible pet owner even if dog hasn't bitten before. No excuses!
- Almost any animal can bite you. They should stay at the scene to make sure the victims alright but there's no need for taking a dog's life for a bite that was most likely accidentle.

- It's often the owner that it the problem, not the dog. There are usually factors that lead up to an incident and compelling the owner to remain would allow investigators to determine if the fault lies with the owners actions, management of the animal, behaviour etc or if it is the animal itself.
- But not the dog as this could be very problematic for the victim. How do you control this.
- Pretty straight forward. If someone I driving and gets into an accident they are required to stay in scene . Same should be said for dog bites .
- The 'biter' has a responsibility to relay health info (has the dog been vaccinated for rabies?) and contact info. 2. The victim may have recourse in a civil suit for damages, but it's useful only if they have identity of the 'biter'. 3. The 'biter' may have a history of bites, but if not reported b/c owner takes off, then it's impossible to document incidents.
- The same as a car accident, the people should exchange information.
- The owner is 100% responsible for the actions of their animal. It would be no different than leaving the scene of an accident.
- I think both sides of the story need to be heard. Dogs don't fight or become aggressive unless they are triggered or feel threatened, much like humans. This is something that should and can be explained when possible.
- "My dog has been attacked by others dogs at off-leash parks and the owner fled the scene immediately. Two weeks after, I witnessed the same dog attack another owners dog. And they fled again. Owners like this should be held at large, as well as their dog. Not to say it is the dogs fault, but the owners for knowing the tendencies of their own dog.
- Short answer. Yes. But who is to stop them from running away? Especially when I am a 120lb woman trying to chase down a 220lb man with a vicious dog.. (this dog was a lab mix, not pitbull)"
- A dog owner should always be responsible for their dog's behaviour and actions, regardless of the dog's breed.
- The sooner the complete 2 sided story can be determined the better we can understand what happened in a particular situation.
- Common courtesy.
- Duh
- Pitbull s of any sort shouldn't be the poster child for this bylaw because. German Shepard, Doberman, Rottweiler all have the same ability to lock their jaws. And honestly it's the owner not the species of dog that is the problem.
- Otherwise they will leave the scene and it might be impossible to hold them to account for their dog 's behaviour
- The dog owner should remain at the scene to give their version of what happened to enforcement officers.
- The owner should be responsible regardless of breed or severity. The dog should not be punished for doing something natural to them.
- As someone who has had my dog attacked the hardest part of my case was Bylaw trying to connect with the offender. There should be penalties for people who avoid owning up.
- It's not the dog it's the owner.

- If I leave the sight of an automobile accident I am fined, the same should apply to pet owners.
- I think all dog owners should be responsible for any incidents that occur
- Owners and handlers are immediately responsible for their animals.
- Dangerous
- Same thing as a car accident.
- In theory yes, but I don't believe people would, so it seems pointless. Maybe as a measure to eventually tack on a fine if the individual is found, otherwise not much value in my estimation.
- It is the ethical thing to do and is part of being a responsible dog owner.
- That is just common courtesy. Come on people.
- They should stay at the scene, as long as the other dog and witnesses to decide how the incident started. It is usually smaller dogs initiating the attack but the larger dogs getting in trouble, which is not fair or right.
- Pit bulls and nuisance dogs are usually owned by people that shouldn't have those types of dogs. As soon as a dog bites it should be surrendered to authorities.
- Safety first-absolutely information should be exchanged.
- Only makes sense
- There is always two sides to a story. Each owner should take responsibility for their part.
- "Same as a car accident
- Bite and runs should be punishable"
- It's like a hit and run accident. Stay on the scene and take responsibility for your pets actions.
- Just like you can't "hit and run" in a car accident, you shouldn't be able to "bite and run"
- Yes. Irresponsible owners are the problem. Not the dog.
- The animal should be obviously separated from the victim, but the owner should have to be there when the police arrive.
- I think dog owners are ultimately responsible for their pets. I would rather see a person/owner disciplined and the animal regimens and trained rather than have specific breeds be discriminated against
- I was badly injured by a dog. The owner disappears and I am left with medical bills and no way of collecting compensation for the medical costs.
- If the owner is on scene and leaves, it should be treated like any individual leaving the scene of an accident, crime, etc.
- They are leaving the scene of a crime otherwise. I very strongly support this one. With severe penalty for fleeing.
- Pet owners should be responsible for their pets actions.
- Like a car accident; you remain at the scene if there is reason to stay there, if not not, exchange information like adults
- If a dog bites the owner needs to face consequences but if the dog was provoked the provoker needs to face consequences
- Similar to leaving the scene of a vehicle accident

- Absolutely
- If a person is involved in a car accident, he is required to stay at the scene. It's the same if a person's dog causes injury - the person should not be allowed to run away like a coward, leaving a bloody, injured animal or person behind. He should be required to stay on the scene and report to the enforcement officer. This should be treated like a crime. You have to be responsible for your dog and face up to any charges due to the damage it has inflicted.
- Unless the dog cannot be subdued or controlled at the scene without further trauma to itself and others
- What's to explain?? No cowards allowed.
- otherwise they could walk away without any info
- It is the owner that has to take responsibility for their dogs behaviour.
- You wouldn't leave after a car accident without sharing information, should be the same if your dog bites another creature.
- Common sense?
- It's fair to want an explanation. It should be properly assessed to rule out why the incident occurred, and what caused it to escalate.
- Owners need to take responsibility for their pets.
- Like any incident this involved should be required to participate in the investigation
- Please stop dog racism towards pit bulls. Its the owner not the dog. I own a pit bull and she would never hurt anyone.
- Please note my story previously explained.
- This is a qualified "Yes". 100% if the dog bites a person. It is more nuanced if the dog bite is with another dog. What qualifies as a "bite", dogs like to rough-house and sometimes get nipped. Is that a bite? Does it warrant a report to by-law?
- Bite and run owners should be available to express whether this is normal behaviour for the dog. Officer can then determine responsible dog ownership, dog recall, etc.
- Requiring someone to remain at the scene allows all parties involved to express their concerns and provide full context to what occurred.
- No different than staying at the scene of an accident.
- Your dog is your child. You need to explain to the officer your side. Have witnesses if any as well.
- unless unsafe to remain at the scene, but should still need to report
- Just like a car accident doesn't matter how big or small we are required to stay, report, exchange information. This should also be the case for proper dog ownership.
- It can't be as strict as when driving. If your dog has gotten off leash, you don't want the rule be that you can't go after the dog.
- This would assist in tracking dogs that are 'a nuisance' .
- I think it's important that people take responsibility for their dogs.
- Absolutely, if a dog bites a person or animal, it is the owners responsibility to remain on the scene. Everyone is recording anyways. It would be hard to just up and leave.

- Obviously if there is someone responsible for the animal then you should question them to find out what happened and how.
- Owner needs to be held accountable.
- I know many people whose dogs were involved in minor incident but later found injury to be more extensive and had thousands dollars of vet bills
- Same as any other incident causing bodily-harm. People must be held accountable.
- Identifying the dog and owner can be difficult after the fact. Requiring the owner to remain is similar to the requirement to remain after a car accident.
- To prevent further injuries
- Obviously the person responsible for that dog should remain on scene
- Same idea of responsibility that is required of driver of car to remain at scene of collision.
- It's like any crime or accident. You remain at the scene! An owner that leaves the scene should be immediately fined the maximum amount.
- you need to know if the dog has had its shots.
- Like any crime or accident. An owner that leaves a scene without providing contact info or talking with an enforcement officer should be fined
- The owner is responsible for lack of control and proper training of the animal!! DONT BLAME THE BREED!!!
- I do agree!! More information obtained is always better
- It is the equivalent to an accident.....there may be injuries, and a need to contact the offending party.
- Absolutely. It is their responsibility.
- No matter what size or breed of dog , if it behaves inappropriately then its the owners responsibility . It is the owner of such animal that needs to answer why this has happened , all information must be detailed in such a fashion as to make sure of a clear honest judgment with the full information behind the incident.
- Bites can create a significant trauma and often the owners of these dogs do not seem to understand how big the issue is. Ensuring they talk to an enforcement officer after an attack will ensure they are on record and understand that what has happened is against the law.
- people need to take responsibility for their animals.
- no explanation necessary, this is common sense
- Just completely ban pit bulls. [removed]
- It's common sense that they would stay and explain what happened.
- An pet owner should be required by law to stay at the incident and be held responsible for what occurred.
- There are many factors that come into play when a dog bites either a human or another dog. Information such as if the dog has been vaccinated for rabies, the owners drivers licence information , etc should be collected at the scene as well as pictures of the animal for future reference. It does depend on the severity of the attack as well, but I believe the owner of the attacking dog should be held responsible for any major medical expenses.

- Because the owner needs to be accountable. No different to having to stay on scene in the event of an automobile accident.
- Accountability is important. Our son was bitten by an off leash dog (not in an off leash designated area) and the owner did not identify herself and promptly ran away with the dog. I think that some kind of fine would be appropriate if the owner did not remain at the scene.
- If the dog bites a person, the owner must stay at the scene to talk to an enforcement officer. If a dog bites another dog an exchange of info should be required but not require an enforcement officer to attend.
- The owner is accountable for the dog's behavior
- Any dog who bites should be reviewed.
- This is common sense, and important for any required medical or legal follow up
- People are quick to take their dog and run after an incident, leaving the victims without recourse or possible legal action against the offender.
- Of course if a dog harms a person or another dog the owner should remain on scene.
- Not only a bite, but any type of attack including knock down. There is otherwise no way of knowing if this is repeat behaviour. Owner may be responsible for damages.
- Same as a car accident. Accidents happen and should be treated as such, with respect to both parties.
- Own your dog's actions
- Any pet owner should be responsible enough to stay and take consequences for not having a well-behaved dog. It has nothing to do with breed.
- Every owner is solely responsible for the actions of their dog and must act accordingly
- Public injury by something you own is your responsibility.
- Irresponsible dog owners normally take off during an incident. It's the same as owners not picking up waste and walking away. You have good owners and you have bad owners.
- If your dog bites you should give contact info so that the situation can be dealt with
- A dog bite should be treated exactly as seriously as an armed assault.
- If your dog or their dog got bit someone is responsible
- A lot of the time it's the owner's fault just as much as the dog's. They should be held responsible.
- In an ideal world this is the way things should be / work. Unfortunately there are dog owners out there that will not stick around or even admit their dog bit someone or another animal.
- To standardize how these should be handled, it should be required as to remove bias.
- Follow up for dog bites with the dog and owner are required to reduce further incidents with the dog.
- So they can get both sides. Dogs rarely bite randomly. RARELY. So let's hear both sides before jumping to conclusions.
- They are responsible for their dogs
- Yes but it may be dangerous to keep them there if the dog is being aggressive
- It is unacceptable for any dog to bite anyone in public, fines should be very large and no one should have to feel threatened by someone else's pet.

- If they can't get information about the dog/owner it makes it harder to contact
- Only an injury that requires some sort of action
- N/a
- it would depend on the severity of the bite. Animals get scared and react from time to time and this should not label an animal vicious/aggressive.
- Dog owner (or the person with the dog) needs to be responsible for any medical bills, for another dog or person, if it bites.
- Yes, just like a car accident, provide dog tag number and contact info and then can leave scene
- There needs to be formal reporting of the incident to see if this is a pattern of behavior for the dog and owner. The person or animal who has been bitten may require treatment and there should be a check of the offending dog's rabies vaccines. The owner of a vicious dog should be responsible for the vet bills of another dog it injures in an unprovoked attack. This all requires recording of the dog owner's information.
- I think this should absolutely be a rule, just as you would stay on the scene of a car accident. This would allow for on the spot education/resolution of the issue.
- This is important for medical and other liability and to ensure appropriate follow up.
- I have personally owned a dog that was involved in a human bite, mine and my neighbour's male dogs got into a fight after mine escaped our house (sadly we left the gate open to our fenced yard that evening) and she stuck her hands in the middle of two fighting dogs and got bit, with her dog having the only history of biting a person. I felt it was absolutely respectful to be there with her.
- Yes, but the dangerous dog should be isolated from other potential victims at this time.
- My daughter was bitten by a dog on Halloween, the family just took off
- Ownership of an animal is being responsible for the behaviour of the animal
- Any responsible owner should remain where an incident happens or leave their information if they are unable to stay.
- If a child attacked someone the parent would have to stay and share contact info with authorities, it should be the same for dogs as many people treat them as family and they are the owners responsibility.
- Accountability? Seems clear enough.
- If there are fines for this and/or there must insurance coverage it would be no different than a car accident.
- It's the right thing to do. You own an animal you are responsible for your animal
- I have been bitten 7 times in my life, I want to know whom I am suing. I want the owner to help me and wait for bylaw. I have never sued before, I will from now on.
- The dog owner needs to remain at the scene in order to provide any assistance that might be needed (while distancing the biting dog in order to prevent further injury). Unfortunately there is no way to enforce that requirement.
- It is the responsible thing to do & take ownership of the situation
- Pet owners need to take responsibility for their animals' behaviour.

- This seems like common sense. If a dog attack takes place as a result of negligence by the owner, the owner has the responsibility to deal with the outcome, especially if the victim was injured without provoking the dog.
- I agree, a while back I witnessed a dog bite another dog. The owner just grabbed the biting dog and he left ignoring requests for his information. We were shocked we were too far as was the victimized owner's dog to follow him fast enough. This was in an off leash area.
- Often if it is against another dog, the owner incurs all vet bills to their dog, and if it is to a human, it's important to have their information to process this as a nuisance dog or to proceed to more formal charges
- It would be the responsible thing to do , with an exemption if a person or animal requires immediate medical attention and must leave the scene, or in cases where the only means of de-escalating a situation means removing the pets from the immediate vicinity to an area they can be safely contained.
- It is irresponsible to leave for the owner of the dog that has bitten a person or dog.
- Typically it is the owner not the dog that is the problem no training, or lack of attention or control over there animal. And then they runaway when the dog does what they have been trained or allowed todo.
- Absolutely, usually these incidents owners flee and don't take responsibility
- Owner must be responsible for the dog. No matter what the breed is. Small dogs bite more than bigger dogs!
- But it depends on the severity and the length of time required to wait.
- That owner is responsible for the dog's actions. If an owner leaves, it would be difficult to identify the dog/owner
- The dog owner is mostly responsible for dog's behaviour.
- As long as the owner and the attacking dog do not need medical attention. If the owner or attacking dog needs medical attention, officials in charge can contact them/follow up at the medical facility.
- People who run from that responsibility are more likely to reoffend
- My dog has been attacked, by a pit bull, and owner took off. Seems to happen a lot. There should be repercussions if the attackers owner leaves. However, it can be a challenge if the one dog is still in attack mode, or depending on the severity. Stopping to get particulars after your dog has been attacked and needs to go to the vets ASAP is a challenge
- Because both sides of the story are equally important and both owners need to share responsibility of this. Leaving would be the equivalent of a hit and run.
- My dog has been attacked by other dogs twice, and could have been severely injured if I had not intervned and subdued the attacking dog. Both times the attacking dog's owner just yelled "sorry" and took off. Totally irresponsible.
- They are responsible and need to be held accountable and in a way this is very similar to hit and run accidents.
- This makes sense, depending on the severity of the bite. Some people exaggerate encounters and are over protective of their pets.

- The owner and the dog in question should be responsible for any injuries that may have occurred.
- This is just common sense. An owner should be responsible for their dog's behaviours (again, regardless of breed).
- All pet owners should be responsible for their pets. Taking accountability is important.
- Unless the dog is seen as out of control or dangerous the animal and owner should remain behind so the attending city official can record all the information possible
- Common sense
- Dog owners should always remain at the scene unless they need to take somebody involved in the incident to hospital or to the vet
- Getting both sides of a story is important to ensure justice and fair treatment for the animal involved. Just because the dog bites doesn't mean the dog is at fault. Consider what happens to cause this incident
- The owners are responsible for their pets actions. If an incident occurs it's responsibility of both parties to deal with it properly.
- That's the right thing to do
- It is the decent thing to do to ensure that all relevant information is exchanged. Eg dog vaccination updates
- If a dog bites a person, they should eventually be euthanized.
- It is important to get information and apprehend the dog if needed
- Our Maltese dog was killed by a Pitbull in Mission, although there were plenty of witnesses and photos the owner took off and was never found
- With pet insurance becoming more popular this would benefit both parties. Not having this would be similar to a hit and run with a vehicle.
- owner should be held responsible
- However witness statements of outside parties should also be taken into account.
